John Touchwood must have possessed a highly developed sense of humour as well as a vivid conception of dramatic possibilities to think of giving his fine country mansion to his unsuccessful relations, provided they all lived in it together! At his birthday celebrations on April 1st, where all are present except the wealthy host himself, who has made a surprising and unpopular marriage with his secretary, we get a glimpse of the clashings and jealousies which the whimsical John foresees will lend themselves to situations worthy of the best stage farce. If you have read "Poor Relations" you will not need to be told that Mr. Mackenzie has excellent material in the way of character to work upon; for "April Fools" is a sequel and one which inflicts no pangs of disappointment. It is a sheer delight from first to last, the characters are drawn in a spirit of buoyant comedy, the dialogue so terse and pointed that you can hear a full house roaring with laughter at every line. There are the testy George and his actress wife; Laurence, the clergyman turned actor, with his devoted wife Edith waiting on him hand and foot; James; the emotional Beatrice; Hilda, the widowed mother of Harold—and what unlimited fun Mr. Mackenzie gets out of the solemn, bespectacled, literal-minded Harold, the butt of his Uncle Hugh and of his two lively cousins! But then he gets unlimited fun out of the whole family, with their individual absurdities and amusing human failings—and, like the artist he is, adds to the enjoyment of the farce by giving it an unexpected twist and neatly turning the tables on John Touchwood, and on the reader who has been sharing John's mischievous anticipations.

A. A.

FIRE OF YOUTH[2]

Guy Wetherby's life had been shattered by the early death of his wife, and he left his four children to the care of his sister-in-law. They grew up wild, joyous creatures in a little English coast town, swimming in the sea or, when the weather was calm, sailing on it in their canoe. It was the sea that brought Phil Wetherby her first romance, for she saved Terry Maclean from drowning, and the two young people instantly fell in love with each other. Terry however saw no immediate prospect of marriage, and felt it his duty to go away, secretly pledged to Phil, as she was to him, but leaving her to brood on his silence and absence while he tried to make their future happiness secure. Disaster fell on the family; Guy Wetherby died and, reduced to poverty, they turned their old home into a guest house. Thither came Timothy Wing, a man of mature years and comfortable income who, touched by the valiant struggle Phil was making on behalf of her sister and two brothers, helped them on in their various careers and then asked her to marry him. Prompted by gratitude, she accepted his offer, and then Terry returned. Poor Phil was stricken to discover that she cared for him still. He used fair means and foul to force her to break the promise she had given to Timothy, and she fought him and her own heart until—but you must read Mrs. Margaret Pedler's charming romance to learn how Phil solved her problem, or at least how fate solved it for her. It is a story full of interest and pleasing sentiment, and Mrs. Pedler's many admirers will find in it all the charm and graciousness which make her work so deservedly popular. A. A.

[1] By Compton Mackenzie. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

[2] By Margaret Pedler. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

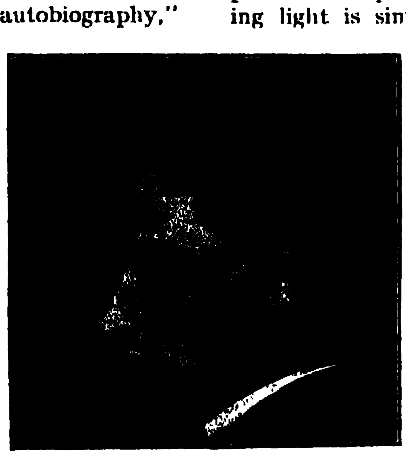
Miss Evelyn Scott.

MANY CAPTIVES.[3]

If you read Mr. Owen's "The Shepherd and the Child"—and if you did not you have missed a story of rare charm and beauty—you are not likely to have waited for anyone to recommend you to read his new novel, "Many Captives." This is written with the same quiet realism as the other, the same sympathetic understanding of men and women, and with something of spiritual significance underlying the development of its narrative. One way or another certain of its people are captives, they are shut in by temperament or circumstance from a full enjoyment of life, and the story is of how some of them—Crossford, the ex-convict, in particular, helped tactfully and finely by Gil Southwaite, the soldier whom the War had immured in a prison of deafness—broke out of bondage and found freedom. The characters are drawn and their destinies shaped with insight and imagination; but it is useless trying to summarise such a book as this; the delicate art of it all would lose too much in any sort of outline. You can only realise the pathos, the dramatic power and beautifully humane philosophy of it by surrendering yourself to its spell and growing absorbed in its atmosphere, and you will find it well worth while to do that.

A. R.

ESCAPADE.[4]



When a writer to-day promises "creative autobiography," the work, if well written at all, is almost certain of a succès fou. For there is nothing more wildly popular than the mental twistings of an ego and if laid bare to an erotic public. "Escapade" is well written, even if at times over-burdened with the too strained sophistries of morbid youth brought into contact with unforeseen eventualities, and forced to find its feet undefended by its natural environment. A slight infusion of mature humour and a little more critical discrimination would have made the book more palatable, but, on the other hand, it does in some degree recapture for us the reaction of ingenuous youth to its new and difficult surroundings. Otherwise it would be difficult to understand the necessity for such books to be written. After all we are asked to believe that this is an age of youth triumphant, and we must pay for this belief. G. F.

SHRIMPS FOR TEA.[5]

Here is a book of—we were going to say—short stories, but these are altogether different from the O. Henry tradition and probably only the most enlightened editor would believe that his readers might enjoy them. In that he would be wrong, seeing that the taste for something unmechanical, something lifelike, vaguely beautiful, has grown and grown since Katherine Mansfield blazed the trail. This comparison with an illustrious writer may seem excessive, for apparently this is Miss Blumenfeld's first book. But the fantasy of these little vignettes caused more than one of those to whom the present writer showed this volume to make the aforementioned comparison. And as in this rather unusual review of a strikingly unusual book we have been a little personal, one may surmise that we have here an instance of heredity, for the book is dedicated to "R. D. B.," whose Diary we have all of late been reading. It is hard to pick out for special commendation any one of these exquisite sketches, for if we were to praise one there would be several others knocking at our heart and asking why they should be left out. This is a book that one lingers over. People no doubt exist who would, on reading it, complain that they are not accustomed to such things. Begone, ye dullards! Know that you have held in your hands something whose fragile beauty, compact of sorrow and laughter, is too good for such as you. And turn to your dull magazines where this kind of story will be considered to be not sufficiently like honey and too much like honey-dew. H. B.

KINDNESS IN A CORNER.[6]

In fiction Mr. Powys has still to do better than his astonishing novel, "Mr. Weston's Good Wine." It was his high-water mark so far. It showed how capable he was of welding into one remarkable whole the dark realism and the fantastic comedy of his earlier books. It transmuted facts into symbols as easily and unconsciously and beautifully as a human being can transmute mere air into the music of the human voice. "Kindness in a Corner" in a sense carries us back to some of the earlier work of Mr. Powys. It is (as his publishers put it) comedy pure and simple. Comedy, yes; and simple as the morning light is simple falling across the sea. Nor perhaps would it be unfair to add that if you do not find it "pure" honi soit qui mal y pense. The Rev. Silas Dottery, whom Mr. Powys's readers will already have met in earlier tales, is the central figure in this new book. He passes through the chapters rather like a dear, benevolent dream—a simpleton in whom is no guile. What guile there is, down in that little Dorset corner pictured in the book, belongs to the neighbouring Canon Dibben and his pecking, prying wife. (Yet guile is a hard word to throw at two such flesh-and-bloodless creatures.) Between them they seek the downfall of that innocent and truly reverend gentleman; but there are apparently unseen presences guarding him; and the evil returns to smite the giver. Such an analysis however is rather like trying to catch a butterfly intact, bloom and all, by flinging one's cap at it—the poor crumpled thing bears no longer any resemblance to its quivering original. Mr. Powys's novels always evade analysis—they are like poems in that respect—and none evades analysis more successfully than this new one. If beautiful writing, limpid as a sunny stream, means nothing to you, or if you don't care for tales that, without any apparent rhyme or reason, go on for their own Portrait by E. O. Hoppé.

Mr. Compton Mackenzie.

[3] By John Owen. 7s. 6d. (Gollancz.)
[4] By Evelyn Scott. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)
[5] By Josephine Blumenfeld. 7s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

[6] By T. F. Powys. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

sweet sake, "Kindness in a Corner" will never please you. But if these things delight you, and if you care for art as coloured and detached and useless as a bubble, here is a book that will hold you entranced. C. H. W.

THE EDWARDIANS.[1]

Twenty-five years is not such a long time that the memory of many of Miss Sackville-West's readers, and even some of her reviewers, will fail to retain a very clear picture of the England she recalls in this devastatingly brilliant comedy of manners. It is not society at large with which she concerns herself, but that tiny corner of it wherein the "top-notchers" of this century's first lustrum disported themselves. If we are to believe Miss Sackville-West entirely, these gambols were even more scandalous and futile, the disparity between private morals and public respectability they indicate even more glaring, than contemporary gossip-writers (surely there were such people) could bring themselves to hint at. But the fact is we have detected Miss Sackville-West in one or two anachronisms (she is years out with the date of the first rubber boom). We have half a mind not to accept her arraignment of her Edwardian progenitors in its entirety. The devil, we are assured, is not so black as he is frequently painted, and it may be that like so many bright spirits among her young contemporaries this author is a little obsessed by that social conscience of which her forefathers only possessed the rudiments, and in her fervour to expose the follies and falsities of the old regime, has slightly overstepped the limits of fair comment. Nevertheless her book is brilliant: She conveys most vividly the atmosphere of that great house in the South (few will fail to recognise it) which forms so suitable a background for her post-Victorian but still feudal pageant. Not a few of her characters are, or were, real people, and difficult though it is to work celebrities into a novel, the feat is here accomplished triumphantly. Against that it must be said that the minor characters of the comedy, the ducal hero's dowager mother and his charming sister, the bourgeois couple whom his caprice introduced into the charmed circle with unsatisfactory results, the innumerable servants, are far more alive and convincing than the heavyweights, His Grace and that romantic explorer friend of his, Mr. Leonard Anquetil, neither of whom can we accept as honest flesh and blood. A. G.

[1] By V. Sackville-West. 7s. 6d. (Hogarth Press.)

FRANCISCAN SANCTITY.*

To establish the point of view and the controlling spirit, it seems desirable to indicate in the first place that this study of certain famous Tertiaries in the Order of St. Francis is the work of a Roman Catholic, that it bears the nihil obstat of the English Censor deputatus and the Imprimatur of the Vicar-General at Westminster. In the second place it is a competent production, giving full lists of the authorities from which it depends, though it has obviously the difficulties of its standpoint for those of other communions, and for those especially who are outside the official churches. Some of these will remember, for example, that the last word—which may be well a word of another kind—has yet to be said on the alleged "poison" of Manichæan doctrine and on the Catharist heresy. They may feel also that the primitive Rule of the Third Order is not only "at first sight" but otherwise "rather an uninspiring document." With its twelve Pater noster at Mattins, for those who cannot read, its seven for each of the other church hours, three for a lapsus linguæ and fifty for a departed soul, one recalls inevitably the Buddhist praying-wheel. There must be a justification of the latter somewhere in the world of ingenuity if these repetitions can reduce purgatorial fires and be acceptable at the Throne of God as a tolerable part of practice in any Dedicated Life. The studies are seven in number, respectively on Blessed Angela of Foligno, St. Margaret of Cortona, St. Louis IX, King of France, Blessed Ramon Lull—as fashion requires us now to remember him who from time immemorial has been known and celebrated as Raymund Lully—St. Bridget of Sweden, Blessed Ippolito Galantini, and Blessed Benedetto Cottolengo. One is grateful in particular for the last two monographs, the subjects of which have been known to very few in England.

It is difficult to mention the writer by name, as there is no ground for determining whether she is married or "single"; but I have termed her work competent. It is well done throughout, and corresponds to the conventional descriptive formula of "good reading," even though the literary palate feels somewhat jaded by recurring extravagance of laudation. Blessed Angela is amongst "greatest of Catholic mystics," belongs to the "great teachers," and her one book is "magnificent," seeing that some of its revelations reach "transcendent spheres." Three letters of St. Margaret remain extant, and these are "admirable." St. Louis is a synthesis of his century's "highest aspirations," and the inheritor of a "great tradition," not apart apparently from "the relentless crusade against the Albigensians," while he also left letters described as "beautiful." The expletives multiply in respect of Raymund Lully, whose alleged picture of his mother in "Blanquerna" is "delightful," while his "Art of Contemplation" is "colossal," his "Book of the Gentile" contains "delightful inventions," his "Ars Magna" testifies to "astounding richness and originality" of mind, and some poems of his old age are not merely "great" but one of them is among his "finest works in verse." Great also—"another great work"—is his "Tree of Science." These and many other enthusiasms and exaggerations offer unawares a touchstone for the thesis at large. It is throughout uncritical, especially on the miraculous side, to which conspicuous prominence is given. So also the supposititious "crown of thorns" sent to King Louis from Constantinople is accepted unflinchingly at the face value of the claim made concerning it, and is described as "a most sacred relic." Again, the pseudonymous writings which pass under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite are cited in terms which imply their authentic nature.

Among those who stand apart from the orthodox circles, I believe that there is none who recognises more fully than myself and perhaps has testified more to the importance and value of the Catholic records of sanctity, especially on the mystical side. But it is precisely in view of this standpoint that exception must be taken on my part to these indiscriminate studies, which seem to me the more harmful to their cause in proportion as their writer shows herself more fully equipped by an intimate knowledge of her subject, with its historical and literary connections. I am reminded continually of Ernest Hello and his "Physionomies de Saints," so pleasant and tender in its appreciations, so futile in the critical sense. As a particular case in point, occurring in the present volume: once or occasionally, once in fact, or "constantly" St. Margaret of Cortona, in her ecstasy of prayer, may have been raised, as stated, high up in the air. We know of such episodes, apart from all sanctity, in the annals of psychical research. They are all nihil ad rem, and it matters little whether they happened or not; but when we read of the same saint's affirmed mystical marriage as "performed in the presence of the saints and angels of Heaven"; when we note that "a ring was placed on her finger" and "a crown of rubies on her head"; and when we are asked to accept all this, not alone as a veridic but "a sublime experience," we know exactly where we are, that is to say, in the pantomime of a great subject. It calls to be delivered from the marvel side of psychical vision and illusion, and also—it must be added regretfully—from records of Franciscan Tertiaries which abound therein.

A. E. WAITE.

* "Among the Franciscan Tertiaries." By Nesta de Robeck. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

SCANDINAVIAN LITERATURE.*

English readers have within recent years had their means of acquainting themselves with the modern literature of the three Scandinavian countries considerably extended. For long only the two great Norwegians, Ibsen and Björnson, were at all well known here. Then came a rather indiscriminate cult of Strindberg, who however is still only partially represented in translation, much of which is of very inferior quality; but this will be remedied by the new series of versions which, thanks to the generosity of Mr. Bernard Shaw, Messrs. Cape have in course of publication. Other writers who are now tolerably accessible to those who cannot read them in the original are Knut Hamsun, Selma Lagerlöf, Johan Bojer, Martin Andersen Nexö and, our most recent discovery, Sigrid Undset. But the work of some of the older writers, such as Jonas Lie and Henrik Pontoppidan, are hardly known to us. It is a pity, by the way, that in the "Selected List of Scandinavian Books in English Translation" appended to the handbook under consideration only those published in America, with the names of the American publishers only, though many of them have appeared also in England, are given. The translation was made and printed in the United States, but one would have thought that in an edition intended for this country the necessary revision might have been made.

Otherwise this is an extremely useful book. Mr. Topsöe-Jensen, while giving a multitude of precise information, has contrived to avoid a mere uninspiring catalogue of facts and dates. Whether he deals with a movement, a man or a book, he is able in a few words to make us realise his or its essential character, and his critical dicta are illuminating. Take, as an example of his power of getting a great deal of meaning into a small space, this paragraph on a book well known in England, Knut Hamsun's "Hunger":

> "This brilliant book is laid in Christiania (now Oslo), and it pictures a young author's hopeless struggle for existence. Hunger itself, which gradually breaks down his nervous system, is described realistically enough, but the point of view is quite other than that of Naturalism. Hamsun had learned from Dostoievsky and, so far as style is concerned, from Mark Twain. Everything is subjectively apprehended; the book deals with the moods that hunger calls forth, the visions and wild imaginings of fever; the total disturbance of the normal mental life. At the same time his style, by its sensitivity and its wealth of nuances, marks a complete rebirth of Norwegian prose."

Mr. Topsöe-Jensen traces the development of the Scandinavian literatures from the intellectual awakening in the early seventies, of which that remarkable man, Georg Brandes, was the trumpet-voice, through the naturalistic, neo-romantic and symbolistic movements down to the present day. He deals with the three countries, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, concurrently, though in separate chapters, for, he says, "in the days of the great men of the North, the days of Brandes and Strindberg, the North formed an intellectual entity." This however he considers is ceasing to be true.

> "Each of them goes its own way, even though each constantly follows attentively and with understanding the development of the other two. The twentieth century will speak of a Danish, a Norwegian and a Swedish literature. The term 'Scandinavian' will then be a geographical designation, but it will not be the expression of an intellectual reality."

That is a fruitful theme for this able author's further development.

F. B.

* "Scandinavian Literature: From Brandes to Our Day." By H. G. Topsöe-Jensen. Translated by Isaac Anderson. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

King Thor-Adam, or Sig (Tur, Dar, Ada, Sagg or Zax in Sumerian), deified as Zeus.
(From Atricolli bust in Vatican, after Alinari).
From "The British Edda," by L. A. Waddell (Chapman & Hall).

THE EDDA INTERPRETED.*

In the view of most authorities on the subject the elder or poetic Edda, regarded as the chief monument of early Scandinavian literature, is a collection of detached lays of which the subject-matter is purely mythical. But that is far from being the opinion of Dr. L. A. Waddell, who, already the author of several striking and highly controversial books on the origin of civilisation in general and the British race in particular, has made a new translation of the Edda and published it with an elaborate interpretative commentary.

> "The Edda," he asserts, "is historic, not only in the sense in which epic poetry in general is historic, in respect that is to say that it expresses the ideas and aspirations of a nation at some great stage or crisis of its development; but also in the sense and by reason of the circumstance that all its main incidents are both in spirit and in actual fact things which befell the ancestors of the people among whom the poet lived, and for whom he composed his epic."

That, though sufficiently startling, is only the beginning of his argument. Maintaining—what indeed is universally admitted—that the lays as they exist in the twelfth century manuscript are in a state of utter disorder, he has with an infinity of pains worked out a new arrangement for them; and that, he claims, displays them as a coherent whole, the homogeneous work of a single poet, whose theme is no less than the authentic history of the birth of a civilisation. Further, that civilisation is our own; for Dr. Waddell is convinced, on philological and other grounds, that the Edda is not Icelandic but British in origin, a point on which he receives more support from other scholars than he is likely to obtain for all his theories.

For in his inquiry into the identity of the hero of his epic, the culture hero of Britain, he travels a long and fantastic journey, which leads him far from any western island, be it Albion or Thule. To follow his arguments in detail, whether to endorse or to controvert them, would require a great deal of space and an erudition as wide as his own. In brief, having sought in earlier books to establish "the identity of the Sumerians with the early

* "The British Edda." By L. A. Waddell. 21s. (Chapman & Hall.)

Aryans or Goths, the ancestors of the Early Britons and Anglo-Saxons," he maintains that the "British Edda," as now reconstructed, furnishes him with a final proof. It "is disclosed to be all unsuspectedly the great national epic of the ancient Britons of the pre-Christian period, which was sung adown the ages by our ancestors in these islands. It is also seen to be the hitherto unknown source of floating British tradition on which were based the fascinating legends of King Arthur and his knights and their Holy Grail, of 'St. George of Cappadocia and Merrie England,' with his Red Cross, of many of our Nursery Tales, and much of the imagery of Milton, and of the 'Faerie Queene.' It also preserves early and authentic historical versions of the Adam-Eve-Eden legend, and of the historical human originals of the leading gods, demigods and goddesses of classical antiquity, who were deified or canonised in gratitude for their great benefactions to mankind. And nowhere else, except in the Edda, do we find a complete ancient literary tradition of the early history of the world and of pre-Adamite man which will bear examination in the light of the ascertained facts of Science."

This is pretty comprehensive, and a theory which equates the Northern Thor not only with King Arthur and St. George, but with Zeus, Prometheus, Adam and Indra has at any rate the interest of audacity. It is supported by a wealth of illustrations, from Sumerian seals and other sources. F. B.

HOW PLANTS GROW.*

Sir Jagadis Chunder Bose is indefatigable. It is barely twelve months since we had his "Motor Mechanism of Plants," a big book in every sense of the word. Now there comes "Growth and Tropic Movements of Plants," a continuation and amplification of its predecessor, running into 450 pages. Naturally it is for the scientist; and even he will not find it "easy" reading. But the points discussed are most fascinating, and though there is bound to be controversy over some of the findings, it cannot be doubted that the author has proved himself a great pioneer in the field of plant physiology.

This latest explanation of his experiments and investigations deals particularly with the movements of growing organs under the changing conditions of environment. We may long have taken it for granted that variation of temperature, for example, or the alternation of light and darkness, will affect the rate of growth. Here we are given proof, the outcome of most meticulous observation and the employment of most sensitive instruments. How great are the difficulties confronting the investigator may be gathered from the statement that the average rate of longitudinal growth in a plant is about one hundred-thousandth of an inch per second, a length which is half that of a single wave of sodium light. Even with the magnifying growth-recorders hitherto employed, several hours were required to detect its measure and rate, and as it is essential to accurate investigation that all other conditions, such as light and heat, should be kept strictly constant throughout the experiment, it was obvious that the element of uncertainty could only be eliminated by reducing the experiment to a few minutes. This necessitated the devising of a method of very high magnification, and an automatic record of the magnified rate of growth.

It is the descriptions of such overcomings of seemingly insuperable difficulties which make the book interesting to even the non-technical reader. It is well illustrated with drawings of the instruments employed, and contains numerous graphs of the results obtained. In one special particular Sir Jagadis sets an admirable example to other writers on complicated technical and scientific matters: he gives a lucid summary at the end of each chapter and a general review at the end of the book.

W. R. C.

* "Growth and Tropic Movements of Plants." By Sir Jagadis Chunder Bose 21s. (Longmans.)

THREE ENGLISH WOMEN IN AMERICA.*

The title of this volume might lead one to expect that it was yet another of those unnecessary compilations that used to be termed "publishers' books." But the reading of a very few pages is sufficient to dispel that surmise, and to bring the pleasing conviction that here is a true book, carefully and adroitly planned, informed by an excellent central idea, and most skilfully written.

It was undoubtedly a very happy idea to bring together in one volume the American experiencee and impressions of three gifted women so various as Mrs. Trollope, Fanny Kemble and Harriet Martineau. Chance took all three of them to America at the same moment of its history—to wit, the presidency of Jackson, when "Chicago was a village of about twenty houses; Detroit a hamlet." It was the time when America was beginning definitely to break away from Europe and to work out its own destiny. Certainly it was not an easy time for the English visitor. American manners were then at their nadir, and expectoration was the national pride and solace. Self-consciousness was extraordinarily acute, and the faintest breath of criticism hurt like a wound. Dame Una Pope-Hennessy remarks that "no English persons of their day were ever prepared to admit that they were not generally attractive and superior to every foreigner they met." Assuming this to be approximately correct, we can see the perils awaiting the English visitors, none of whom was a model of circumspection. Mrs. Trollope's visit was part of a harum-scarum enterprise foredoomed to failure, and her disappointment and sufferings added zest to her scathing indictment. Fanny Kemble, after repeating her stage triumphs in America, married an American slave-owner, and promptly found herself in a hornet's nest. Her accounts of the plantations are ghastly reading, and bear the hall-mark of truth.

The best equipped and the most self-assured of these travellers was Harriet Martineau, who entered America with introductions of irresistible authority. She was fêted and lionised to her heart's content, but her barque also split on the rock of slavery. She was, to say the least, a competent and clear-sighted observer, and her testimony is impressive and terrible. When she wrote her book on her return, she insisted that the radical American weakness was "the worship of opinion." The soundness of the view did not obtain for her immunity from vituperation, and America, as after Dickens's report, "went up like a soda-water bottle." "She fed at our tables and she calls dear, delightful Boston pedantic." "Does a woman of circumscribed education and recluse habits feel herself competent to teach a whole nation?"

But it was poor Mrs. Trollope who left behind her the most lasting resentment. Her strictures became bitter jibes in stores and saloons. "When a man threw his legs on a balcony or spat on the floor of a music-hall, he heard shouts of 'a trollope! a trollope!'" Since these days English visitors and residents have learned prudence and politeness, and have come to understand better American susceptibility. The author of this valuable and most entertaining volume is herself a model of discretion. She has retold three absorbing chapters of biography, and has skilfully allowed her characters to speak for themselves. This is a book warmly to be recommended to all who value good workmanship. It is full of human interest and rich in entertainment, and is a not unimportant contribution to history. L. L.

* "Three English Women in America." By Una Pope-Hennessy. 15s. (Ernest Benn.)

ARTHUR ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

It is with the deepest regret that we record the death of Mr. Arthur St. John Adcock, Editor of THE BOOKMAN.

HODDER & STOUGHTON LTD.
R PERCY HODDER-WILLIAMS
RALPH HODDER-WILLIAMS

In place of the customary editorial "Bookman's Diary," we have invited appreciations of St. John Adcock's many-sided activities and genius from among the host of men and women of letters who so prized his friendship and shared our admiration of the spirit in which he conducted the active editorship of this paper during more than twenty years

ST. JOHN ADCOCK—THE MAN

BY ROBERT LYND

Arthur St John Adcock was loved as very few men among contemporary writers have been loved He was loved not only in the inner circle of his family and friends, but even by those who knew him little more than as an acquaintance It was impossible to meet him even casually without realising that here was a man of invincibly open and generous character which would stand all the tests of circumstances He had a natural flow of kindness—not of vague, sentimental kindliness but of eager and unselfish interest in his fellows and their fortunes—that could be guessed at from a glance at his pensive face with its quizzical smile and his kindness was matched by his courage

He had to work hard all his life and often to work in circumstances that would have made other men miserable with apprehension When I knew him first he was living the always precarious life of the free-lance, knowing that he must not allow illness itself to interfere with his work, and though he lived under the constant threat of serious illness, he would never submit to becoming an invalid but performed many a day's task in defiance of the doctor's orders Few people realise how much courage it needs to remain cheerful in such circumstances when the very existence of a writer's home is menaced by the black shadow of ill-health St John Adcock however was as little of a valetudinarian as Stevenson, and his anxieties could do as little to diminish his cheerfulness as to diminish his astonishing industry

He was fortunate no doubt in having an inborn love of writing He loved writing to such a degree that, when unable to write the poetry and prose which he would have written if he had possessed a private income, he would turn what to most men would have seemed the tedium of compulsory task-work into a pleasure. If he stole a few hours of the day in the company of his friends or in the busy assistance of someone in trouble—possibly a man he scarcely knew—he never allowed those stolen hours to lessen the day's output, but would make up for their loss by sitting up when the rest of the world was in bed, and hammering away at his type-writer till the day's belated duty was accomplished When one remembers the frailty of his constitution one realises that his industry, like his cheerfulness, was on the heroic scale

Like most men who mingle journalism with literature, he had to live a good deal in Grub Street, but he never became a spiritual inhabitant of Grub Street Unexhausted by his almost ceaseless professional activities, he still contrived to find time to write poetry and imaginative prose that expressed his spiritual longings He had time even to write long letters to his friends He had time for his club and his dining clubs He had time to go to the help of innumerable people in difficulties He lived indeed like a man who had twenty-four waking hours in his day

Of his innumerable kindnesses to others no one but himself knew the full tale If it was money they needed, he would give more than he could afford If it was work, he would put himself to endless trouble to secure it for them If they were in distress of mind and needed sympathy, he would put his work aside and let them pour out their woes by the hour without ever showing a sign of boredom or impatience He was so little of an egotist that it never struck him as unreasonable that so many people should make large demands on his time and vitality while he himself made no demands on anybody

The truth is that frail though his health was it was impossible to exhaust his spirit When he left his work for the company of his friends he was like a man who had never known care or weariness He was as eager for an argument as an undergraduate was equally happy when silent or quizzing or adding to the comic news of the world with a good story of someone he had recently met Modest tolerant without a grain of malice he made friends even among those who in most points were his opposites in character

He was a man indeed in whom good nature existed without weakness, and in whom goodness was charming To visit him in his home if one was in a mood of dejection was like passing from winter into summer In a home so rich in affection the death last month of his brilliant daughter Marion St John Webb must have been a sorrow all but insupportable "We have a firm belief in the future" he wrote to me after it, "and are more certain than we are of most things that she is not dead" But the grief of the parting I suspect broke his heart—as unselfish and precious and heroic a heart as I have ever known

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: THE FRIEND.

By Alfred Tresidder Sheppard.

It is an honour, but an honour which makes one feel very humble, to be able to write these words. A fortnight ago to-day, on the eve of leaving England for a few weeks or months, I had a long talk with St. John Adcock in his office at St. Paul's House He was bearing the burden of a recent loss with splendid and indomitable courage; but I think the unintelligible mystery of this world led him to speak of deeper things than we usually discussed. He spoke with an unusual warmth about a recent scathing attack on Christianity, and said that evidently the writer had mistaken political and official religion, as Gibbon did, for real religion, which was far more than ceremony and form. Before parting he asked me to send him my address, as he wanted me to let him have some contribution to this paper. And here I am, with woods around me, and the singing of birds in the sun, and flowers, and the sea's rumour very near. When I opened my day-old paper this morning it was to read, with a sorrow which makes it difficult to write, the news of his death.

I can only say very imperfectly what many are feeling just now; that he knew the art of friendship to its last syllable. Always loyal, always generous, always helpful, always appreciative of one's own efforts and work, in friendship he gave himself most royally. One never left him without some new inspiration to put out, if possible, one's own best; he belonged to that noblest, I think, of all armies, the Noble Army of the Encouragers. There was never any pettiness or meanness in his nature; it is not too much to say that his unselfishness and tolerance and kindness bordered on the quixotic. He was always doing someone a good turn; I am sure that not a hundredth part of his unobtrusive kindnesses and generosities will ever be known to the world. How he found time for all his work, as Editor, Critic, Poet and Novelist was always a mystery; but he could always find a few hours to go to the help of anyone in distress. Need was the only recommendation to bring him to the rescue. More than once I found him in the act of doing some kindness to those who had let him down already; "Well, I couldn't refuse to help the poor fellow when he was down," would be his excuse.

And so he, who was always busy, rests. I think he might have been pleased by a scrap of verse by an ancient, long-forgotten Irish minstrel, which comes to my mind.

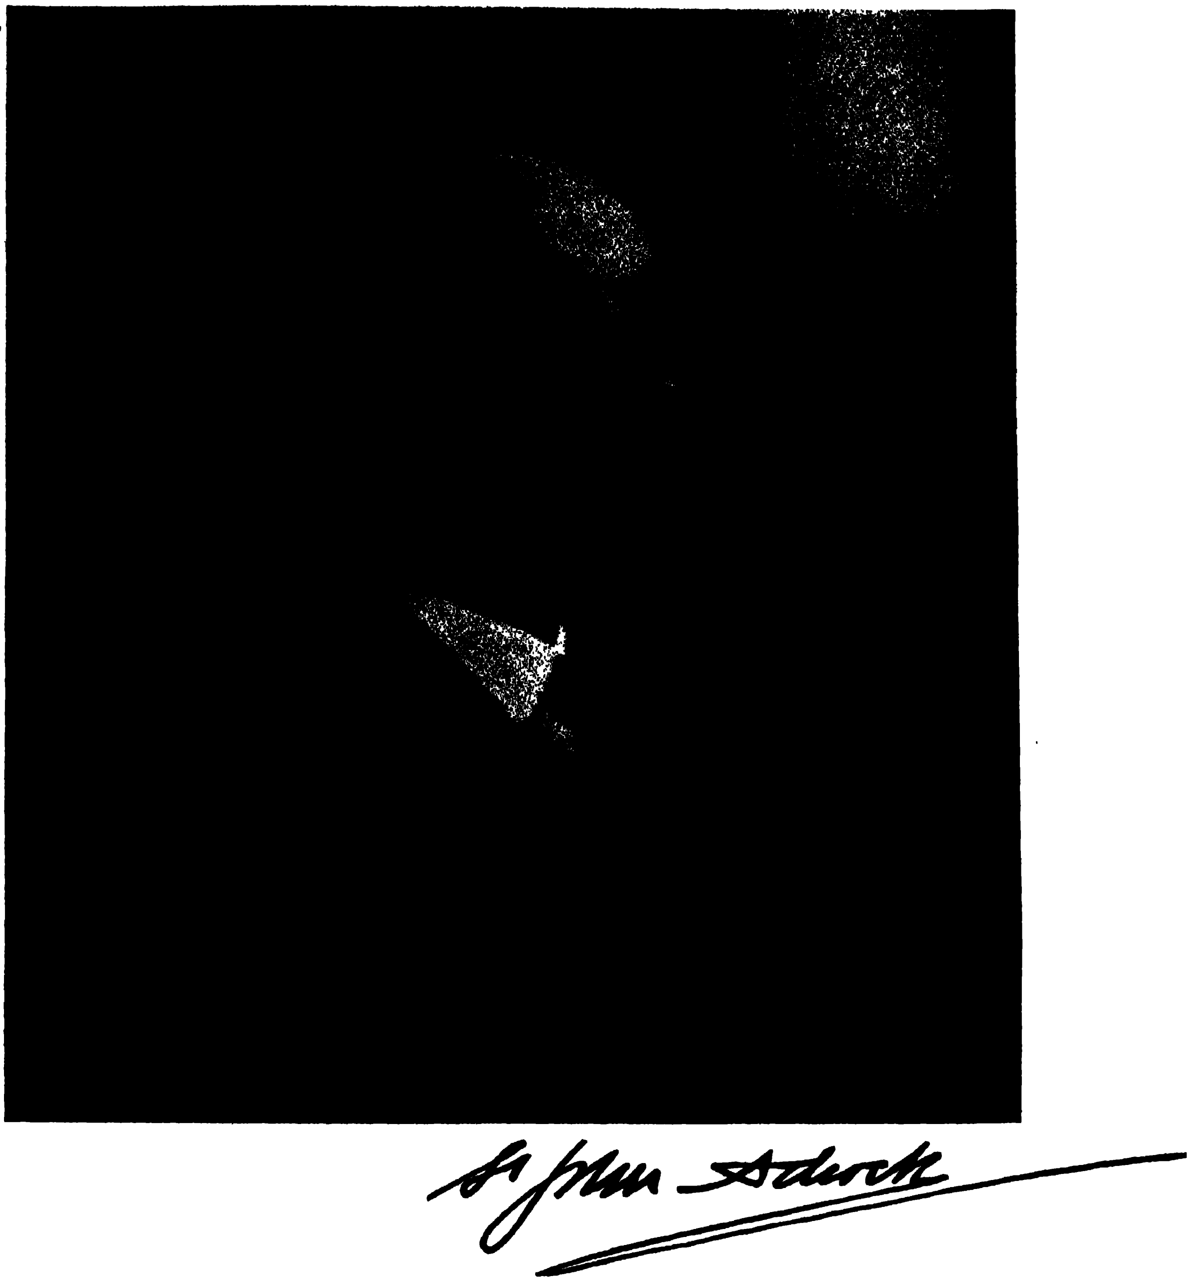
> "Over my house rain never falls,
> There comes no terror of the spear,
> It is a garden without walls,
> And everlasting light shines here."

Aucassin asks, "In Paradise what have I to do?" St. John Adcock would find an answer different from that of Nicolette's long-ago lover. Wherever he is in God's wide universe, I know he will find no happiness but in helping and giving happiness to others; he was too bright and eager a spirit for long idleness.

It is no mere form of speech to say that he was a man whom one could not know without loving, and one's heart goes out to those who knew him and loved him best.

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: THE LONDONER.

By W. Pett Ridge.



The number of writers on London has never been adequate in view of the extent of the subject; one looks around and sees peoples and places that have remained undescribed; incidents not yet set down. New fountain pens will come along, but this assurance cannot lessen the sorrow at the passing of an eminent and very industrious chronicler. St. John Adcock loved his town, and showed his affection in every line he wrote, whether in prose or in verse. I think he must have counted a day wasted unless he paid some tribute of regard. He had an acquaintance with its history denied to most of us. In walking through the streets of his day he kept eyes open, mind alert.

I have in my time encountered many writers. Few possessed so much gentleness of manner as St. John Adcock. Some there are upon whom London has a truly alarming effect; they arrive timid of voice, and shy in deportment, and before you can reckon up ten they have become clamorous, aggressive and ready to contradict any statement made in their presence. At my last meeting with St. John Adcock it struck me that, whatever changes had taken place in myself, he most certainly had not altered since the far-off evening when we first encountered each other at Robertson Nicoll's house in Frognal. Robertson Nicoll had a sound judgment of individuals, and I remember how highly he spoke then, and afterwards, of St. John Adcock. It was a fortunate occasion for both when they became associated with the control of The Bookman; it proved most uncommonly helpful for literature.

Possibly it was at Bay Tree Lodge that St. John Adcock learnt the value of being enthusiastic in criticism. Before Robertson Nicoll came to London, the general view of criticism seems to have been that to be notable it had to be adverse and, if possible, hurtful. It was not W. E Henley, but another editor of similar temperament, who once sent a book to a member of his staff with a note: "Let yourself go on this!" And to let yourself go meant you were to say everything in dispraise that could be said. Robertson Nicoll struck a fresh note by looking out for new talent and, having discovered it, he applauded whole-heartedly. The pages of The Bookman show how well St. John Adcock carried on the method

He must have led a happy life, or he could not have given so much happiness to others. I fancy he enjoyed the business of presiding over The Bookman lectures, although public speaking had no sort of fascination for him; very wisely he prepared beforehand, leaving nothing to the spur of the moment that has so often failed to goad a man into eloquence. The courtesy which was in his writing proved a notable asset elsewhere; I can recall no single occasion when I was not genuinely sorry to bid him good night.

St. John Adcock had friends everywhere. It is easy to believe that, in the next world, he is receiving a welcome from the many who preceded him. For myself I can wish for nothing better than that I may, some day, meet him again.

Portrait by Elliott & Fry.

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: AS POET.

By Alfred Noyes.

The "Collected Poems of St. John Adcock" are the best memorial that can be raised to one of the finest and most lovable characters that have appeared in modern literature. They sprang from the heart; they were true; they were deeply felt; they spoke of human affections, deeper than all the passions, and they faced the thought of the final parting with that deep sadness of the happy man, who fears death only because it severs us from those we love.

> "Wiser men than I may say
> Heaven is high and far away;
> Or may prove with reasonings rare
> Heaven is neither here nor there;
> Here where thou art, I with thee,
> This is heaven enough for me."

So he wrote in his beautiful lyric, "Enough," and again, in his dedicatory poem:

> "Let us, then, go together, and when we go
> Take all our memories from the world we quit,
> That we may laugh, content to leave it so,
> Forgetting us, whose heaven will be remembering it."

Those who knew him best know that this prayer, in a somewhat different sense from its intention, was fulfilled; for, when he stood by the grave of his daughter, a few weeks ago, he had the look upon his face of one who has accepted the last blow, and is content to follow.

This is not the moment for literary criticism; but I have been asked to deal specially with his poems. His satires were not his best work; for he was of too kindly and tolerant a nature to feel very much more than an amused pity, even for the hypocrisy that most deserved scourging. But in his poems of the affections, while he is always himself, he has a notable kinship to those poets of New England, Whittier and Oliver Wendell Holmes; he has something of the same spirituality and, at his best, his work is of as enduring a quality. For these poets will endure, and will be re-discovered when all the belauded bosh of the novelty hunters and fashion worshippers has passed into oblivion. There are technical flaws in his work here and there; lapses which, in his busy life, he had small time to correct. But if I were condemned to that desert island which has so often been used to test our love of literature, and if I had to choose between the "Testament of Beauty" and the Collected Poems of St. John Adcock, I should seize the latter as a hungry man seizes a crust of bread. St. John Adcock's poems would be a little household of the affections, aching, loving, sorrowing, and dying into life. There would be laughter in it and tears. The castaway would walk through London streets with him; ride on a bus, and share his gossip about books over a Dickensian tea in a cosy corner off Paternoster Row. The author of the "Testament of Beauty," as an amazing critic said in his praise, "moves in a sphere too exalted to care about interesting his readers." On our desert island we might well prefer a friend and a brother.

All the scholarly "gestures" and archaic spellings in the world are as nothing compared with one true pulse of this life-blood. I know all that can be said for those classic superiorities. They are quite compatible with something less than the spontaneous feeling of poetry, as Burns knew it.

An obituary writer has referred to Adcock's lyrical verse as "facile." This word is often used nowadays of the writer who is able to do something perfectly that others cannot do at all—as, for instance, to write the stanza quoted above, in such a way that, read once, it haunts the memory. This is often the result of infinite pains. But again and again, Adcock wrote lines that outweigh all the neo-Georgian anthologies put together:

> "The greatest kings are never known as kings;
> The gods come not in shapes of power or dread,
> But clothed in flesh, the sport of time and fate;
> Not till they rise and go—some flash of wings,
> Some sudden vision of the crownéd head,
> Humbles our hearts, and makes us wise too late."

This dead poet was among them; gentle as a child, but with something more austere, the steel of the spirit, sheathed in his own breast. He had taken the measure of worldly success, and he knew the meaning of "victory":

> "Once, stumbling to his goal through dust and heat,
> Wounded and bleeding, slandered and denied,
> The chief of Conquerors fell as in defeat:
> It was not Cæsar whom they crucified."

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: AS CRITIC.

By Frank Swinnerton.

If you were to ask the average man what he means by the word "criticism," he would answer: "Finding fault." This is the last thing that the critic lives for, but fault-finding is very easy to tired men, and a great deal of what appears as criticism in our periodicals is a mere weariness of mind and heart. St. John Adcock, I think, had never heard the common definition of criticism. At any rate, he gave no sign of ever having heard it; for he was never tired, and he never found fault. Indeed, it is his single defect as a critic that he was too generous. He was unable to condemn.

That was because he was above all things a man of the greatest humaneness. He loved his fellow-men; and he saw good in them. What good he saw, he mentioned with energy: to the less good he was, if not blind, at least courteous. He knew too well what pain, what toil and trouble lay behind even a bad book, and he could not despise that which had cost the author so much travail. When he thought of the author of a book that would have made me scream with indignation it was as if he said to himself, with the greatest simplicity, "There, but for the grace of God, go I!"

It might be supposed, by the severe, that this kindness made him uncritical; that he was a sort of Cassio, easily and fatuously pleased with everything, who said "Why, this is a more excellent song than the other!" But that was not the case. Adcock's gift was that he saw farther into the hearts of even inferior authors than most men are able to do. He found treasure there. Sometimes this treasure melted in the sun; sometimes it was not of the finest quality. But if Adcock said that there was treasure, there was treasure. Though others might have missed it, the treasure had been there for Adcock to find. He did not invent qualities. He discovered them more generously than others.

That is why he was such a valuable critic. He had not to wait for fashion; he judged for himself. He never staled or grew rigid in his views. He could admire writers of the most diverse talent. But he did not admire the bad work of these writers; he insisted firmly and laughingly upon the qualities of their best work. No man had a more fluent taste; but the taste was in the first instance good and sure. While Adcock sometimes praised, in the course of his journalistic work, books and authors of less than the highest class, I should doubt if he was ever deceived by a bad book. He had the twin essentials of the true critic—taste and experience. He was shrewd. He loved letters and he loved men. If his humane sympathy sometimes made him too kind to the literary product, there was no fault in the judgment, but only a kind of additional mercy or understanding such as every moralist must admire. There may be greater critics: there will never be one with more unaffected delight in good work.

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: AS BOOKMAN.

By Arthur Waugh.

St John Adcock was a citizen of no mean city; for he held the freedom of the World of Books, and to be a Bookman is much more than to be an author. There are plenty of authors who are not bookmen at all, just as there are some bookmen who are not authors. Adcock was both author and bookman too; but it was perhaps in his capacity of bookman that he exercised most influence, and made the majority of his friends.

The true bookman lives in a world serene and self-sufficing; he belongs to no clique; cherishes no secret dislikes; literature is the essence of his interest, and if a book is good it matters not a whit to him who may have written it, or to what cause it may be devoted. He is both human and humane. He knows the difficulties of the writer's task, and he can recognise promise in the bud. Every new book makes to him the importunate appeal of a possible discovery; and, when the discovery is made, he refrains from arrogating the credit to himself. In short, he loves literature better than his own reputation, and he remains entirely free from jealousy as he is sincere in encouragement and praise.

Everyone who knew St. John Adcock intimately will agree that, in all these qualities, he was a typical Bookman of the most sympathetic kind. His interest in literature was inexhaustible, and it was supremely guileless. He made no parade of patronage or assistance; and yet how many young writers, who now flaunt themselves in the sunlight, have owed their first opportunities to Adcock's watchful appreciation? There was no touch of snobbery about his approval; he was never swept off his feet by the acclamation of a popular success; he looked to the quality of the work, and to that alone. And he judged that quality out of his own wide and comprehensive acquaintance with the best books and the best thought in the language.

Life was to him perpetually irradiated with bookish influences. He loved literary associations and literary shrines; his imagination revelled in the past, and he could fill every quarter of his native London with the shades of bygone bookmen. But he lived just as keenly in the present, alive to every new talent in the library or the newspaper office, and ready to range them all by merit and achievement in the swiftest flash of fancy. He will be greatly missed and mourned, wherever books are read, retold and remembered. And most of all he will be missed for his gentle and unfailing urbanity, the very bond of all the virtues of the bookman's human creed.

ST. JOHN OF FLEET STREET.

By Arthur Mee.

The friend of every struggling scribbler has gone to his rest. The Knight-Errant of Fleet Street is walking it no more.

A great shadow it is that has fallen over the street that leads from the Crown of Saint Dunstan to the Cross of Saint Paul, for St. John Adcock was of the very stuff of which our Street is made. There are men who have been in Fleet Street all their lives and passed through it unknown; this man had been in it and of it forty years, and these worn pavements have known no figure more familiar, none more beloved.

He had lived through Fleet Street old and new; he had seen its transformation from the narrow way of the nineteenth century to the crowded thoroughfare which, more than any other street on earth, sways and shapes the destinies of men.

And all these years this modest man, this good fellow who had always a smile and a friendly word, and a bit of good counsel and an immeasurable self-sacrifice, was the finest type of Englishman who ever held a pen. Let every Down-and-Out in Fleet Street weep, for their best friend is dead.

There was nothing he would not do for them. His was the charity that suffereth long and is always kind. He believed in everybody a little; nobody was too hopeless. Long ago there was a ne'er-do-well in Fleet Street who flitted in and out of offices, and on and off papers, disappearing and appearing again until most people were sick of him; but not our Knight-Errant. To the last of these disappearances he believed, and in the end the news came that the Stella had gone down and a woman had cried for a place in the boat. A man got out and made room; it was the Disappearing Ne'er-Do-Well.

A thousand times the end was happier than that. Just twenty-five years it is since I asked our Knight-Errant to seek out a tramp in a Rowton House who had done some scribbling and printed it. He had picked fruit and sold pins and sung in the street for a living, but the good heart of our St. John could not bear to wound a poet by calling on him in a Rowton House, and so they met in a teashop with some sort of sign by which they could know each other. There the Poet received his first big friendly word, and to-day he will remember it, for his name is W. H. Davies.

Two generations of life this fine fellow of our Street has seen. He was hardly on the threshold of journalism when he tried to rival Punch, and all through the never-wearying years his wit was bright and keen. He wrote a witty corner in every issue of the Children's Newspaper since its birth, and in this week's corner there is probably the last thing that he ever wrote; it reached the editor after his friend was gone. This is one of his last written words:

> Somebody has been asking, What would you do if you were left a million? Take it."

That was his way of writing, but everybody knows that our Knight-Errant, if asked what he would do with a legacy of a million would have said, not Take it, but Give it. It was good that he gave up Law for Literature; any scamp of a client would have talked him out of his fee.

His chivalry was in every forlorn hope. He seems to have been on endless papers that struggled and died. He helped to make no end of reputations. Struggling himself in the early days, too frail to insure his own life, he was the guide, friend and burden-bearer of all who came his way. There was nothing he would not do, nowhere he would not go to be useful or kind. He never failed. If ever contributors loved an editor it was him. If ever editors loved a contributor it was he. He was the universal man, the good fellow longing to be of use to somebody, the Knight-Errant always at his post, the Galahad whose heart was pure. No man could count the things he did to make life better for a struggler. He was Charles Kingsley's good fellow, helping lame dogs over stiles.

And now he has gone, and those who were laughing with him a day or two before can hardly believe it is true. This man who was in our heart of hearts was like a touch of ancient chivalry among us all, like a sovereign turning up among a pocketful of silver. He whose wit was clean and kind is dead from a tragic blow of Fate, his last days darkened by a shadow that must have broken his gentle heart. He has followed a child he loved into the grave.

Never again will our Street be quite the same, for the old familiar faces fade away. But still the memory lives—

> "Still are thy pleasant voices, thy > nightingales, awake,
> For Death, he taketh all away, but > them he cannot take."

ST. JOHN ADCOCK: AS EDITOR.

By Leonard Rees.

St. John Adcock's editorship was confined to The Bookman but, with his acting occupation of the Chair, covered a period of twenty-two years, during which the paper made a steady advance in prestige, influence, and prosperity. Of a modest and retiring nature, he had yet an arresting personality that almost from the first found expression in the paper. To begin with, he had a passionate love of letters, and he had formed himself while yet a youngster for the post he was ultimately to fill by comprehensive and thorough reading. Books were always his closest companions and most familiar friends, so much so that when he was fagged with editorial and other work he instinctively turned for recreation to his library. The range and regularity of his reading catholicised his taste, and kept him from any danger of falling into grooves, so that the doors of The Bookman, as of his own mind, were always open. Perhaps it leaned to the side of those things that were pure, and those that were lovely, in the old-fashioned sense, but it was never tied to any school, or coterie, or clique, and it never shut out from its purview the new and sometimes revolutionary movements that arose from time to time. To the Editor nothing that had its roots in sincere human feeling, and in a genuine attempt to widen the limits of literary expression, was outside the province of the journal. And so very unpretentiously but very effectively The Bookman became a guide to current literature which was absolutely single-minded in its purpose, and was free from any suspicion of priggishness or pomposity.

Adcock contributed to the paper some of his best critical work, a good deal of which has been happily preserved in book form. He had a fine insight and charm of style, and perhaps the only defect was an undue measure of mercy. He had not the temper of an old-fashioned Quarterly Review, and could not play the butcher to a work which deserved to be cut up but was manifestly a first offence. Not the least of his values as an editor was his capacity to find new talent, and to get the best out of all his contributors by his commendation and encouragement. They were a family group, with himself as the much-loved head.

As representative of very many gracious tributes received we print the following from contributors of many years standing.

By R. Ellis Roberts.

I never met any man so devoid of malice, envy and bitterness as Adcock. His own work was comparatively neglected, yet he never seemed downhearted or disgruntled. His passion for books was secondary only to his liking for men and women; and some of us regretted that at times his kindness controlled too severely his critical abilities. He always had time for the out-of-work and the hard-up; and he had a remarkable power of getting the best out of his contributors: he never worried one, but one naturally did one's best for an editor who never did less than his best for you.

By Ronald Campbell Macfie.

Life has brought me into contact with many men, but I have never met any man with a more gracious and lovable personality than Arthur St. John Adcock. Warm-hearted, loyal and unselfish in his friendships; modest, patient and courageous in his attitude towards life; conscientious and self-sacrificing in his professional labours; sound and critical, yet charitable and generous in his literary judgments; above all pettinesses and jealousies; of gentle wit and ready sympathy, he will ever live in my love and memory as one of the wisest, noblest, most lovable men I have ever known.

TO ST. JOHN ADCOCK ON A BIRTHDAY NOT LONG AGO.

THE HEART THAT WILL NOT GROW OLD

Here, in a world where hearts grow old,
You still retain your heart of a boy;
For still you follow and uphold
A creed of charity and joy.

Here, in a world where hearts grow cold,
Life still runs warmly in your blood;
For still your April dreams unfold
Blossom on blossom, bud on bud.

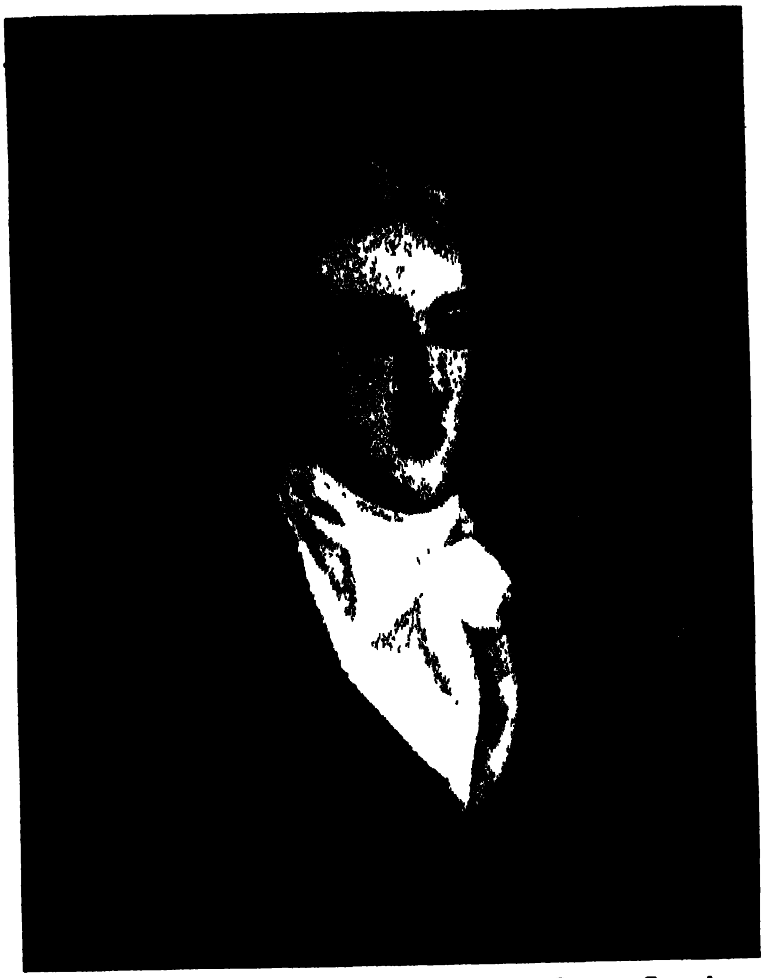
Here, in a world where hearts grow old,
Your heart is still with youth aglow;
For beauty still you make and mould
And beauty still you reap and sow.

Here, in a world where hearts grow cold,
Warm to your heart returns the love
That you to all the world have doled
As to its nest a homing dove.

Here, in a world where hearts grow old,
Still young and full of hope you live;
For, like a star by stars controlled,
New light you gain from light you give.

R. C. M.

The Bookshelf.



A GREAT ENGLISH STATESMAN.*

Publications coming from the eminent firm to which wewere so long indebted for blue-books and official papers, seem bound to suggest—shall I say solidity ? One cannot imagine a work by Mr. Lytton Strachey, or even Mr. Guedalla, issuing from such a source. It is in keeping with the fitness of things therefore that Sir Charles Petrie should be a writer with—shall I say a solid style ? Industriously he traces the tortuous and at times contemptible course of Canning the politician. The man Canning seems to elude him. That is a pity, for in this instance it is the man rather than the politician who requires elucidation. There is little new to be learned, and upon the materials in hand nothing at all new to be written about Canning's public career. There exists however no adequate study of his personality and character; a work of this nature might be of value and could hardly fail to be interesting. There is still room for it to be produced by some student of early nineteenth century affairs.

One judgment of Sir Charles Petrie's may be quoted to show how little grasp he has of Canning's mind. He offers as "the clue to his character" that he was "first and foremost an Irishman." Now Canning had in fact few or none of those idiosyncrasies with which the Irish are generally credited. He was neither generous nor vindictive. He seldom acted on impulse or spoke what he afterwards regretted. His line of conduct was the result of hard thinking, rapid but well based on facts.

When he persuaded the Cabinet, in which he was for the first time Foreign Secretary, to "Copenhagen" the Danish Fleet, he acted neither upon intuition as to what Napoleon might do if England remained inactive, nor with rash precipitancy. He had information which he trusted to the effect that the Tsar had agreed with Napoleon at Tilsit upon a policy which might include a seizure of Danish ships of war. Whether by making public this information he could have prevented an international outrage it is impossible for us to say. By deciding to leave nothing to chance he certainly defeated the plot. The international outrage was committed by England, not by France. The morality of this may be blamed, its expediency may be questioned, but no one can suggest that Canning behaved otherwise than as a cool, cynical statesman, displaying the qualities by which English statesmanship at its most successful has always been marked.

Or consider Canning's recognition of the South American Republics, when in his own magnificent (if bombastic) phrase he "called a New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old." There was no impetuosity here. The step was pondered. When it was taken, Canning said in his dispatch that the Spanish Government "must have been long prepared" for something of the kind.

George Canning.

From the portrait by Hickel, in the possession of the Most Hon. the Marquess of Crewe, K.G.

From "George Canning," by Sir Charles Petrie (Eyre & Spottiswoode).

All through the struggle with Napoleon, so far as he had official responsibility for it, Canning's acts were deliberate, carefully considered; he took long views. The same qualities distinguished his handling of the situation after the war. Patiently he stood firm against the rage of Metternich and the fatuity of the Tsar. Sir Charles Petrie says very sensibly that "the forces of disorder are best overcome, not by bayonets and agents provocateurs, but by the redress of practical grievances combined with a firm administration." That was the method which Canning favoured, and he is entitled to rank on this account as a statesman of foresight and faith. Whether it places him "with the greatest of the nineteenth century," as Sir Charles Petrie claims, would be a matter of more controversy, were it not that Sir Charles offers names.

The names he offers are those of Bolivar, Cavour and Bismarck. Let us look for a moment at the conditions of their countries to-day. South America is only now emerging from a century of disturbed industry, of backward social life, of politics both fantastically incompetent and incredibly corrupt. Italy has gone back to the crudest of dictatorships. Germany is recovering from the effects of a War due to the work of Bismarck. The provinces he took from the French kept resentment alive in their hearts and produced the unnatural alliance with Russia. The Empire he created became so uneasily vainglorious as to incur the enmity of almost the entire world. Surely great statesmanship builds upon sounder bases than did Bolivar, Bismarck and Cavour. Surely Canning is great for the very reason that he was not, as they were, in a hurry.

He cared little about the names of things or their outward shows so long as they were in themselves sound. "The temper and practice of the British Constitution," he said once, "is to redress practical grievance, but not to run after theoretic perfection " Thus he was in favour of Catholic Emancipation and opposed to the reform of the House of Commons franchise, which would, he predicted truly, give that House the whole power of the State Where he failed was in not seeing that the many had a " practical grievance " in the country being governed for the benefit of a small class

* "George Canning." By Sir Charles Petrie. 12s. 6d. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

If any further proof were needed that Canning was not what is known as a typical Irishman it lies in his humour Wit most Irish persons have few are gifted with humour Canning had both but in him humour was predominant over wit When he received the challenge from Castlereagh, a letter of many pages, and muttered as he glanced over it I'd rather fight than read it by God "—when he embodied in a Foreign Office dispatch under cipher the familiar lines beginning

> In matters of commerce the fault of the Dutch
> Is offering too little and asking too much when he made fun of professional philanthropists in The Anti-Jacobin, he indulged that sense of schoolboy fun which is inherent in the cleverest of the English and which the Irish possess not at all

HAMILTON FYFE

SUNDAY MORNINGS

Sunday mornings in winter, lying late in bed, eating breakfast slowly, crunching the toast appreciatively, the paper propped up before one ! Sunday mornings in summer, sitting in the garden, smoking, very comfortable and still the paper ! Sunday morning is perhaps the most delightful part of our week It is better than Saturday afternoon because on Saturday afternoon we never get quite away from that morning's work It is better than Sunday afternoon, because then there is beginning to loom over us the approach of the new week at the office !

Yes, we are very fond of our Sunday mornings ! And we are very careful to whom we grant the privilege of sharing in them Not for us the ordinary news of the week on that day of all days, when we really have time to digest it ! Not for us the last novel we had from the library ! Not for us any heavy books of reference ! No ! We keep our Sunday mornings for the Observer and Mr Squire Or, should we say, Mr Squire and the Observer ? For assuredly he it is to whom we first turn Yes in spite of all our jealously guarded seclusion on that morning, we let Mr Squire in We just can't help ourselves He is so irresistible His enthusiasm is so infectious his delight so catching his praise so generous his blame so fair

And we know that we shall always find something worth reading. It does not matter whether the review for the week is on a collected edition of Congreve or The Book of the Inn," we know that we shall enjoy it And we do ! Here, in this new collection of his reviews,* we have old friends turning up again How glad we are to see them ! How happy to be able to recall the time when we last read them that one in front of a good log fire that other by the side of a trout stream !

Sunday mornings ! What happy times they can be ! What happy times they must be when one can spend them in such delightful company !

No matter of what Mr Squire is writing, he is interesting and more than interesting He takes us from the New Prayer Book to Mr John Lane and the Nineties, and on the way we meet such people as Mr Chesterton and Mr Lawrence We have a fleeting glance of Mr Lynd completing his seven-hundredth essay for the New Statesman We listen to Sir William Watson and the late Mr Herbert Trench. And then we rush off for a lightning visit to Pirates and Smugglers And a Sunday dinner at an English Inn And then Cricket ! And what a good companion Mr. Squire is here ! How he infects us with his own enthusiasm, so that even those of us who never play cricket begin to wonder if after all we might not " take up " the game again

* " Sunday Mornings By J C Squire 6s (Heinemann)

But while we are still wondering, Mr. Squire firmly but kindly begins talking about the Fairs and Shows of his own childhood We see Mr Barnum, Lord George Sanger and many more We hear how Lord George Sanger became ' Lord ' George Sanger We confess that we had forgotten And then, while we are still thinking of the clowns and showmen of our own time—and how feeble they sound compared with those giants of the past !—we are off on a visit to Congreve, Webster, Ben Jonson and Otway And to these dramatists Mr Squire brings the same fire and enthusiasm that held us on Broad Halfpenny Down

And last of all we come to that part of the book called Chapters Ended ' Here we meet the men who were with us until very recently Maurice Hewlett, Joseph Conrad, Thomas Hardy, Edmund Gosse, Arthur Benson Neatly Mr Squire sums up their work No one could be more generous in his praise and no one could be more kindly when he points out the faults which even these giants made

This is the kind of book which we all like There is something for everybody here And once having borrowed the book from our library we shall want to buy it It is that kind of book There are so many things here which we shall want to read again and again to have them always by us Thank you, Mr Squire !

JOHN LINDSEY

LONDON AND DICKENS*

There are two subjects which possess a perpetual attraction for the reader London and Dickens The number of books that have been written on both is wellnigh countless Hardly a day passes without producing its tale of such And the variety of these works in size and importance is amazing Within the last few years additions have been made to what the booksellers call Londoniana and Dickensiana which are alone sufficient, to use Ruskin's phrase for a life's liberal reading And yet there always seems to be something new to be said on these well worn themes Thus in Mr Blake's charming little volume, although there is much necessarily that is familiar to most of those who know London even but superficially, there is also no little that will be new to many readers and the photographic illustrations (there are no fewer than one hundred and twenty of them) give the handy little book a special value in addition to that contained in the author's short but pregnant notes

The latest book on Dickens is also concerned with London and is a reprint in convenient form of its author's earlier work published in 1923 Mr Dexter has been so long recognised as the leading authority on Dickens that it is superfluous to say anything in praise of this present edition of his standard book on the subject One may however note that it has one advantage over its predecessor in that its form is such that it can be conveniently carried in the pocket, and with it there those wandering about London in search of the spots which Dickens has made immortal, can at once identify landmarks and read once again of those fictitious figures connected with them, who seem often more real than people of flesh and blood I observe that one or two misprints that had crept into the earlier volume have here been corrected, but I think the London Coffee House (page 192) was at 24, not 42, Ludgate Hill, and I suggest that the Serjeant's Inn mentioned on page 191, was the place of that name in Chancery Lane, not the one in Fleet Street

Mr Harper is so well known as the writer of innumerable books on all parts of England, and as the clever illustrator of many of them, that anything from his practised pen cannot fail to appeal to those who love the highways and by-ways of their native land, as well as to those who visit this country from vaster but not more beautiful ones. In his latest book Mr. Harper has collected with obviously infinite patience and care, the essential data concerning those monastic remains which in their ruin are perhaps more picturesque than they even were before "the unimaginable touch of Time" had cast its dissolving influence upon them. In the preliminary chapters of this fascinating book Mr. Harper traces the rise and decay of the monasteries, and points out those reasons which led in many instances to their ultimate downfall. He deals with the vexed question, now an almost insoluble problem, as to who designed the many splendid structures, the decaying ruins of which are all we now possess; he shows how the increasing luxury of these architectural landmarks, the frauds in relics and so forth, gave a certain justification for the seeming injustice of the great suppression. And then he takes us on a pilgrimage to those exquisite remains some of which are familiar to us, but with all of which he here makes us familiar: Glastonbury, Fountains, Kirkstall, Roche (about which Dr. Aveling produced a folio many years ago), Newstead and Battle, Waverley and Tintern, Furness and Melrose, and the rest. He tells us of the Llanthony, in Wales (which Walter Savage Landor purchased), as well as of that earlier Llanthony Abbey, at Gloucester, whose remaining archway is part and parcel of a railway depot, which was the parent of the greater and better known institution. Indeed this excellent and most attractive work contains, as it seems to me, all that anyone wishing to become familiar with such things could possibly require, and I cannot but think that it will stand as one of its writer's most successful works—which is saying much.

* " London Cameos By A H Blake 5s net (Herbert Jenkins)— The London of Dickens " By Walter Dexter 3s 6d net (Cecil Palmer) – The Abbeys of Old Romance " By Charles G Harper 15s net (Cecil Palmer)—" The Story of Lambeth Palace " By Dorothy Gardiner 15s net (Constable)

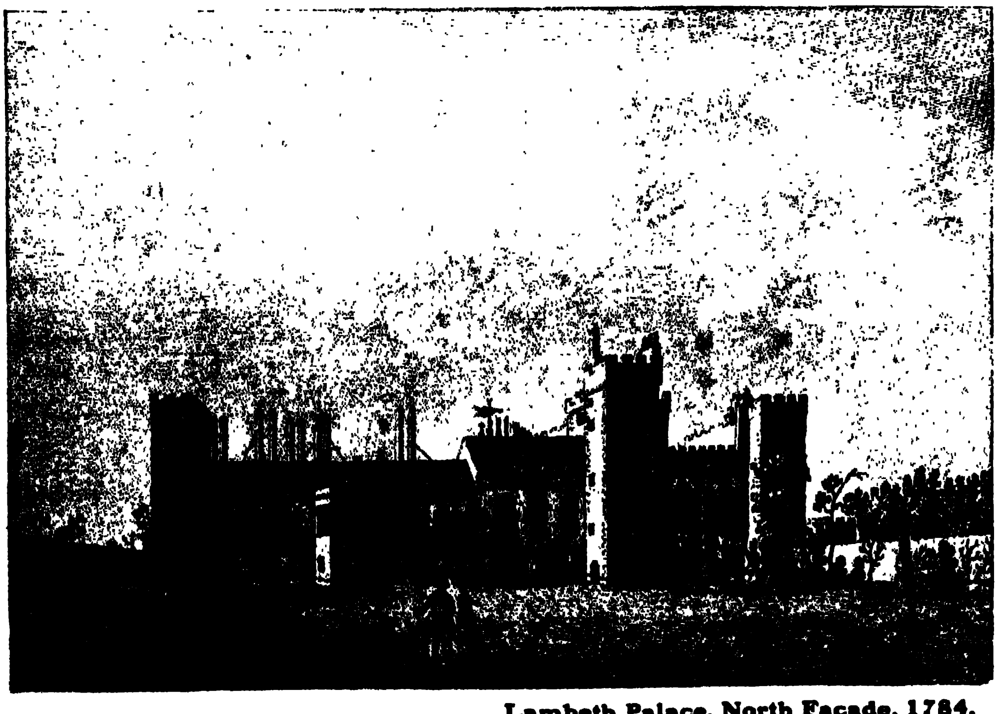
From a consideration of these disjecta membra (so to call them) of the ecclesiastical life of long ago to Mrs. Dorothy Gardiner's learned and documented account of Lambeth Palace, is an easy step. Lambeth is contemporaneous with the best part of our national history, and although various books have of course been written about it, we have had nothing bringing the latest historical investigations to bear on its annals, until the late Archbishop Lord Davidson encouraged Mrs. Gardiner to undertake this authoritative work to which he wrote a preface just a year ago. That the late prelate was right in his judgment in this selection (as he was in so much else) is proved by the soundness and accuracy with which the authoress has performed her laborious task. With this book for perusal and reference, one cannot imagine anyone in future troubling himself to turn over even the erudite labours of Ducarel, or the later ones of Dr. Denne, or even the important book published in the eighties of the last century by the Rev. J. Cave Browne. Because, besides having these authorities on which to base her narrative, Mrs. Gardiner, by the light of later information, has been able to correct such errors as inevitably crept into more or less pioneer work, and has given us at last, which was long needed, at once an authoritative and essentially readable account of what is an outstanding London landmark as well as a landmark in the ecclesiastical history of the country.



E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR.

BOOKS—SERIOUS AND OTHERWISE.*

Mr. J. Alick Bouquet has given us in "A People's Book Of Saints," a pleasing and concise history of some of the saints of Christendom. They are chosen from all times and most countries, while special attention is given to the saints of England. Many well known stories are retold in this book while there are also told other incidents in the lives of the saints less generally known. One may well speak of the lives of the saints for one realises afresh, reading this book, that the saints even while they renounced the joys of life were never detached from it. They realised more than ordinary people the beauty of the world and the immense opportunities of happiness given to man. These saints were soldiers, scholars, travellers, statesmen and women of affairs, often great ladies and great gentlemen:

"St. George, the Cavalier, with the shield scored with the blood-red cross, is the patron saint of lords and ladies; but the kindly, thoughtful Archbishop of Myra, St. Nicholas, clothed in stiffly jewelled vestments, and with three golden balls at his feet, is the patron saint of the common people."

How he leaps out at one, that kindly Archbishop with his stiffly jewelled vestments, the patron saint of children, of friendless maidens, of the poor. There is in Florence a church dedicated to St. Nicholas, the church of the children, where the children romp and make merry under the painted eyes of his statue as though they felt themselves at home It is St. Nicholas in Germany who brings to children their Christmas gifts, and he is, of course, Santa Claus. There are warrior saints in this book, other than St. George and St. Ignatius Loyola, that most chivalrous knight, and there are kings and queens. But there is St. Colette of Corbie, the carpenter's daughter whose kind eyes surely watch over the rest of the British soldiers who were buried in her village on the Somme, and there is St. Richard of Chichester who began life as a ploughboy, and St. Christopher the giant and kind patron saint of travellers. One misses one or two beloved saints from this Lambeth Palace, North Facade, 1784.

From an engraving by Godfrey in Ducarel's History of the Palace.
From "The Story of Lambeth Palace," by Dorothy Gardiner (Constable).

* "A People's Book of Saints." By J. Alick Bouquet. 7s. 6d. (Longmans.)—"Selected Works of Richard Rolle, Hermit." Transcribed, with an Introduction, by G. C. Heseltine. 8s. 6d. (Longmans.)—"Marcus Aurelius Antoninus: His Life and Times." By C. Clayton Dove. 3s. 6d. (Watts.)—"The Little Man in Blue By Ernest Ballard. 6s. (Williams & Norgate.)

collection. For instance, St. Francis of Assisi and his brethren with their teaching of love and pity for all creation, and St. Anthony who finds your lost possessions for you, and who preached to the fishes when the cold ears of men were turned from him. And but little space is given to that most wise saint, Francis de Sales, who commanded the great ladies who were his penitents to adorn their beauty so that they might by it draw the souls of men to God. Surely such a wise saint might be invoked as the patron of dressmakers! This is a book of peaceful and lovely living, with much to be learned from it and much comfort to be derived from it for life as it is to-day.

The "Selected Works of Richard Rolle, Hermit," will be of chief interest to clerics and religious orders for their spiritual guidance and instruction. But the layman will also derive much good from the works of this learned and saintly hermit, whose manuscripts, written in spiritual language of great beauty, exceed in numbers those of any other mediæval writer. They were read all over Europe and were among the earliest printed books in many centres of learning. He wrote in language of great beauty and power and it has been said of him that "he reached the highest pinnacle of prayer when the soul is ravished to behold Heavenly things," and to enjoy a foretaste of the Beatific Vision, "while yet bound in the flesh." Like many of the hermit saints of mediæval days, his reputation for sanctity drew thousands to visit him from all Christian countries. He tells us himself that his childhood was vain, his youth foolish and sinful. But he watched and fasted and prayed until, marvellously purified and uplifted, he was impelled to wander, to preach and write. His life is of great interest and helpfulness, proving if proof were needed that the most headstrong sinner may become the greatest saint. Mr. Heseltine has done his work well, modernising where necessary the old English which would have made a literal transcription somewhat difficult to understand.

Mr. Clayton Dove has given us in "Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, His Life and Times," more than the writings and thoughts and wisdom of the great Roman Emperor with which most of us are already familiar. This is a generous book, giving a detailed account of Marcus Aurelius's life through childhood and boyhood to the height of his greatness, and ending with a most beautiful account of his death. This is so much a classic that it is hardly necessary to dwell on the wisdom, the philosophy which this great pagan has left us. He was the precursor of the Christian saints without recognising it, for he persecuted them. But one can hardly believe that he had real hatred in his heart for them. Probably Christianity seemed to him a deception. A thousand pities he had not the full vision. But his wisdom has comforted many men, many gentle souls. Doubtless he is much read and loved by those of the faith he persecuted. His wisdom will always be loved. "Do not say: Let me not lose my little son. Say rather: Let me not be afraid to lose him."

"The Little Man In Blue" consists of a number of pleasant sketches which have a gentle philosophy of their own and are concerned with characters of one kind or another. One thinks of a traveller going, in very leisurely fashion, a ribbon of country road, meeting now and again a fellow traveller or someone by the road side, stopping to talk, and gaining some wise or whimsical experience. The thought is not very profound, but one travels a while in very agreeable company, and sees through sympathetic eyes the human round, the daily task.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

"PERDITA."*

Mary Robinson, universally known as "Perdita," has unquestionably made for herself a place among the world's celebrities. Everyone who is acquainted with the social history of the eighteenth century in England has heard of her as a beauty, an actress, and a mistress of a Prince of Wales. It would be going too far to say that everybody who is acquainted with English literature of the eighteenth century is acquainted with her works, for though she wrote many poems and novels, they have long since passed into oblivion. The only book from her pen that has survived is the volume under consideration. This contains many poetically-expressed perversions of the truth, and those unacquainted with her true history have accorded to her much more sympathy than she deserves.

It was of course hard luck to have married at the age of sixteen a blackguard, and to have soon after been imprisoned for debt in the King's Bench prison—a most unfortunate start. By the good nature of David Garrick she was released, and was engaged by him for Drury Lane Theatre, where at eighteen she played Juliet and other Shakespearean poetry, as well as appearing in plays by lesser authors. One performance of hers has made history. On December 3rd, 1778, she played as Perdita in Garrick's version of "A Winter's Tale" at a command performance. The Prince of Wales, who was present, was greatly attracted by her and arranged a meeting. She became his mistress. The moral character of his Royal Highness is so black that of course kindly writers have assumed the young woman was seduced. Something may be said in mitigation of sentence on this particular count. Mrs. Robinson explains that for years men of all ranks had persecuted her with "proposals of a libertine nature," which she turned down with scorn, though some of them were made by "a royal Duke, a lofty Marquis, and a City merchant of considerable fortune." So, by her own admission, she was, if innocent, at least not ignorant. Also she was twenty and the Prince eighteen, so that it was no question of cradle-snatching. Further, she made very satisfactory financial arrangements for her compliance to his desires. And it is to be remembered that, as a leading lady at Drury Lane Theatre, while her salary may have been small, yet it was sufficient to keep the wolf from her door.

After a short time his Royal Highness tired of this charmer, and proceeded to another. Mrs. Robinson then demanded payment of the bond for £20,000, which the Prince could not meet. She certainly did want the money, for she was living in an expensive house in an expensive part of the West End of London, and her bills must have amounted to a considerable sum. She does not mention in the "Memoirs" that she then threatened to publish the royal correspondence. George III was horrified, and through the medium of Fox, the bond was commuted for a pension for life of £500 a year, of which one-half was to be continued to her daughter. She is supposed to have been presently on the best of terms with Fox: "Who," said George Selwyn, "should the Man of the People live with but with the Woman of the People?" A liaison with Colonel (afterwards Sir) Barrantre Tarleton endured for nearly a score of years.

This is a bald outline of one who almost ranks as a national heroine.

LEWIS MELVILLE.

* "Memoirs of the late Mrs. Robinson." Written by Herself. A new edition, with an Introduction. 7s. 6d. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

CHAPMAN AND HALL.*

The firm of Chapman and Hall is celebrating its centenary this year, and is fortunate indeed in having Mr. Arthur Waugh for its historian. Until his recent semi-retirement (he is still Chairman and literary adviser) Mr. Waugh was managing director of this famous publishing house for twenty-eight years. He is moreover, as every bookman knows, a distinguished literary critic who combines scholarship with charm in an unusual degree. The record of Chapman and Hall's fluctuating fortunes could in no case have been dull: the facts themselves are too interesting. But Mr. Waugh has thoroughly vitalised the facts, and has given us a singularly fascinating and human story. There are not too many good books on publishing and its history, and Mr. Waugh's volume should immediately take its place as a standard work.

* "A Hundred Years of Publishing: being the Story of Chapman and Hall, Ltd." By Arthur Waugh. 15s. (Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Waugh begins with a brief glance at eighteenth century conditions, and then describes the evolution, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, of "publishing" as a distinct activity from "bookselling." It was as booksellers that two ambitious young men—Edward Chapman and William Hall—opened a double-fronted shop in the Strand in 1830. They hoped to become publishers in time, but they started with a retail counter. It was over this counter—so appropriately did coming events cast their shadow before them—that in 1833 Charles Dickens bought the copy of the Monthly Magazine containing his first printed story; but it was not until two years later that his immortal association with Chapman and Hall really began. In the meanwhile he had made some name for himself as the author of "Sketches by Boz," issued by Malone, while Chapman and Hall had launched a few modest publishing ventures of their own, among the earliest of which was a pamphlet entitled "The Christian Register, or Annual Record of the Several Religious Metropolitan Meetings, held for the Promotion of Christianity and the Diffusion of Education." In 1835 they were looking around for an author to illustrate a new series of sporting pictures by Seymour, and, after various names had been rejected, their chief clerk thought of "Boz." Dickens was approached and, through a further series of fortuitous circumstances, about which Mr. Waugh supplies some new details, the laughter of Mr. Pickwick broke upon a delighted world. Nay, to be accurate, "The Pickwick Club," issued in monthly parts, at first fell a little flat. It was the appearance of Sam Weller that raised Dickens at one leap to the pinnacle of popularity from which he was never to descend.

Photo: F. W. Maycock. Arthur Waugh.

"From "A Hundred Years of Publishing," by Arthur Waugh (Chapman & Hall).

For the next eighty years the publishing of Dickens in innumerable editions was to be the primary activity of Chapman and Hall. Through a trivial incident—Dickens's sensitive, overwrought nature was always ready to imagine a slight where none was intended—he left Chapman and Hall for Bradbury and Evans in 1844, but returned to them, through an equally trifling accident, fifteen years later. He roamed no more, and until the last copyright expired in 1912 the imprint of Chapman and Hall appeared on every complete set of his works. His publishers had been generous to him from the start. Generosity would in any case have been exacted. Dickens was warm-hearted and appreciative, but he was not the man to undervalue himself. He lived at a pace which prematurely killed him; he was always in need of money; and the demands and wishes of his ardent, impulsive, irritable genius became law to Chapman and Hall. That they were able to retain him, with only one temporary severance, was due partly to their own wise forbearance and partly to the tact of John Forster, who always remained the best friend alike of Dickens and the firm.

It was Forster who brought to Chapman and Hall many of the other famous authors whose names adorned their list during the middle Victorian period. It is impossible to mention them all, but a few must not be omitted. The firm "fathered" Carlyle in his obscurity and retained him in the days of his popularity. They issued several volumes of Browning's poems before they became profitable. They introduced the world to Mrs. Gaskell, and for many years they published for Anthony Trollope and later for George Meredith, who succeeded John Forster as their literary adviser. One of the most interesting chapters is that in which Mr. Waugh, himself able to recognise the claims both of commerce and of literature as such, weighs Meredith in the balance as a publisher's "reader." Another excellent chapter deals with the Fortnightly Review which, under the successive editorships of G. H. Lewes, John Morley, T. H. S. Escott, Frank Harris and W. L. Courtney, has enjoyed unique distinction and success among its own class of periodical literature.

With a prosperous magazine, and a monopoly in Dickens and Carlyle, Chapman and Hall could afford to be easygoing. They became in fact too easygoing. Before 1895 a "lack of continuity and cohesion" was already apparent, and with the death of the last Chapman in that year the firm lapsed into a somnolence from which Mr. Waugh himself was called to awake it in 1902. The task was the more difficult in that events had stolen a march upon him. The whole world—and with it the whole book trade—was in a state of rapid development amounting to revolution. The Dickens copyrights moreover were rapidly expiring. Of his arduous reign as managing director Mr. Waugh gives us fascinatingly intimate glimpses, and there are good stories about Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. Arnold Bennett and a host of other famous and lesser known authors. From beginning to end indeed Mr. Waugh's pages are packed with rich and varied interest, commercial, literary and human. His volume is more than the record of a single business; it is an outline history of the whole book trade during the period, and a picture, intensely vivid and vital, of the social changes of a hundred years.

Mr. Waugh has left Chapman and Hall a prosperous and growing concern. Not only has the firm a strong list in general literature, but during the last sixteen years, through Mr. John L. Bale, who has now succeeded to the managing directorship, it has become the leading house in England for scientific and technical publications. All readers of Mr. Waugh's delightful book will unite in wishing the firm another century of life. Lucky indeed will it be if, having weathered the storms of a further hundred years, it finds another chronicler so authoritative and engaging as its present one!

G. T.

SEEKERS.

When you have read Mr. A. P. Herbert's new novel, "The Water Gipsies"[1] (selected by the Book Society as the "Book of the Month" for June), you will never again go through Hammersmith without a thrill of pleasure, glancing over the bridge at the barges alongside the wharves, and wondering which is the old Blackbird, where Mr. Bell lived with his daughters, Jane and Lily. There is some touch of magic about Hammersmith now that was not there before, for Mr. Herbert has cast a spell upon it, making us aware of the romance of common things and common people, and the busy lives of those who work the boats on river and canal. Jane Bell is an ordinary London girl, simple, romantic, fond of the "pictures" and young men; yet the background of her workaday existence is the glittering water and the roving life of barge folk, familiar to all Londoners though so strange to them. The story of Jane's love affairs, marriage, hunger for adventure and final acceptance of the best fate has to offer, is told in a book of outstanding quality, rich in humour and a kindly knowledge of humanity.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman.

Miss Pamela Hinkson.

Miss Pamela Hinkson's novel[2] is a quiet-coloured romance set in France—France with its dreams and traditions, its stifling conventions and brooding antiquities. Old Madame de Lassage, like a true French mother, had managed her daughter's affairs and guided her into an expedient marriage, but Marguerite had longed for freedom, to feel the west wind blowing in her face, and her daughter, Solange, was a child of love, all her mother's longings pent up in her soul. Shut away in a convent during the War, she knew little of the freedom of other girls. Not without bitterness Miss Hinkson writes: "The young had spent everything in that immense effort of youth while the old stood by, saving their strength. . . . Only in other countries the women had won freedom and were using it to the full, not asking if it was worth the price paid." Solange it is true had more liberty than many French girls, but she might have bowed to tradition and gone her repressed way if Peter Quincey had not come to France. He came like a wind from the west, from the far-off freedom of America, in love with France and, after their first meeting, in love with Solange also. Thereupon began the battle between the old and the new, the clash of modern ideas with deep-rooted customs, and Miss Hinkson gives intimate pictures of present-day Paris, telling her story with delicacy and charm, and a generous tolerance toward various points of view.

A very different Paris is introduced to us by Mr. Francis D. Grierson in "The Lady of Despair,"[3] for Geoffrey Barsette was a young writer who haunted the underworld in search of copy. Here it was, amid crooks and drug addicts, he caught a glimpse of the coldly beautiful Madelon Marly and heard her tragic history. Her lovers always met their end by sudden death. He soon found himself entangled in a plot exciting enough to gratify the heart of any would-be novelist, and moreover deeply in love with the fatal lady. But he had a rival in Vicomte de Caramie—a rival who within a few days was found dead. Madelon herself was accused of the crime, and the reader is kept in a delicious state of torment until ingeniously the web is unravelled.

It was in Paris too that David Maxwell fell desperately in love in Mr. Hugh de Blacam's fresh and delightful romance, "The Lady of the Cromlech."[4] He saw his lovely red-headed Irish girl coming out of a church; later met her at a dance, and then she vanished. Crazily infatuated, he set off on a quixotic search for her, traced her to his native Ireland and travelled through the country on foot, getting in with strange company, meeting with odd happenings. The book is a joy from beginning to end, sparkling with all the poetry and humour and gay things of life. To miss "The Lady of the Cromlech" is to miss a fund of happiness and laughter.

Mr. Rhys Davies, in his "Rings On Her Fingers,"[5] strikes a more sombre note. He writes of Wales, and how the dark, harsh lives of the Welsh miners invade the lives of the better-off, bringing to them a roughness and squalor and rugged strength. Edith Stevens, the eldest of the large unruly family of a schoolmaster, surrounded by poverty and quarrelling, instead of being overwhelmed by her environment, grows up curiously detached from it. Her artist friend, Raglan, says she is "a tall, proud lily drooping in a fly-blown jam-pot." Hating the ugliness of her life, shrinking from the coarse admiration of a young miner, and trying to escape from her secret passions, she marries Edgar Roberts, a prosperous draper. But there is still her own nature to contend with, and the marriage brings no satisfaction. Mr. Davies's revolt is against the new world, the new generation, and in this outspoken book a critical and ironic mind is at work. The characters are well done, drawn with a cynicism which tenders them little mercy.

All the people in these novels are seeking something: love, romance, adventure, freedom; and Veronica Lewis, the tired school teacher in "Quest,"[6] by Miss Doreen Smith, is seeking too, but her search is for beauty, the fundamental beauty of life—which perhaps is what the others and what we are all seeking, though we call it by different names. Veronica sacrifices much to find peace eventually in the Roman Catholic Church, and the book gives a sympathetic insight into the thoughts and emotions of a convert.

ALMEY ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

[1] "The Water Gipsies." By A. P. Herbert. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)—[2] "Wind From the West." By Pamela Hinkson. 7s. 6d. (Macmillan.)—[3] "The Lady of Despair." By Francis D. Grierson. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)—[4] "The Lady of the Cromlech." By Hugh de Blacam. 7s. 6d. (Murray.)—[5] "Rings On Her Fingers." By Rhys Davies. 7s. 6d. (Shaylor.)—[6] "Quest." By Doreen Smith. 7s. 6d. (Burns, Oates & Washbourne.)

THOMAS HARDY.

After an interval of almost two years Mrs. Thomas Hardy has given us the second and concluding volume of her biography of her husband*. It is a curious fact about most biographies—and this one is no exception to the rule—that, contrary to expectations, they are more interesting in the earlier than the later chapters. We all know something of the history of, say, Napoleon, Beethoven or Dickens in their later years. What we want to know most of all and what we cannot know until we have read their biographies is the story of their beginnings, what they were like as boys and youths, what early signs they showed of their genius. Mrs. Hardy told us all these things in the admirable first volume of her husband's biography, and though the second part covers the more important part of Hardy's career as an artist—from the publication of " Tess " and " Jude," and the storms which followed, to his death in 1927—it has not, it must be confessed, the peculiar interest of the first.

* "The Later Years of Thomas Hardy (1892–1928)." By Florence Emily Hardy. Illustrated. 18s. (Macmillan.)

But Mrs. Hardy has done her work well, and she has done what few other biographers in her position could or would have done: she has effaced herself and her own opinions almost completely. Not even in her account of the " Tess " storms (which seem almost incomprehensible to us to-day) or in her description of Hardy during the last few years of his life does she intrude herself. She is content to let the diaries and the letters of the great man speak for themselves, to pick out for us the germ of such a typical Hardy poem as this :

" October 10.—Am told a singularly creepy story—absolutely true, I am assured—of a village girl near here who was about to be married. A watch had been given her by a former lover, his own watch, just before their marriage was prevented by his unexpected death of consumption. She heard it going in her box at waking on the morning of the wedding with the second lover though it had not been touched for years."

In the present volume we watch Hardy abandoning the novel and turning again to his old love of poetry. " He abandoned it," writes Mrs. Hardy of her husband in the late nineties, " with all the less reluctance in that the novel was, in his own words, ' gradually losing artistic form, with a beginning, middle, and end, and becoming a spasmodic inventory of items, which has nothing to do with art.' " Hardy's theories of the writing of fiction, especially his insistence on the melodramatic and the prodigious, were not always right, but he came close to the mark in an entry in his diary in 1913, describing his impressions of the younger novelists of that time— a piece of criticism which is even more to the point to-day :

" They forget in their insistence on life, and nothing but life, in a plain slice, that a story must be worth the telling, that a good deal of life is not worth any such thing, and that they must not occupy a reader's time with what he can get at first-hand anywhere around him."

Hardy, it is not improbable, will be remembered in later years for his poetry rather than for his novels, and Mrs. Hardy gives us many quotations from letters and diaries showing that poetry rather than fiction was the great interest of his life. " Speaking about ambition," she wrote in her own diary in the last months of Hardy's life, " T. said to-day that he had done all that he meant to do, but he did not know whether it had been worth doing. His only ambition, so far as he could remember, was to have some poem or poems in a good anthology like the ' Golden Treasury.' " Mrs. Hardy throws an interesting sidelight too on her husband's theories about poetry—on what some critics, years ago, mistook for roughness in his verse and imperfect technique. She tells us that Hardy (himself an architect, it will be remembered, in his earlier years) discovered for himself a curious analogy between the arts of poetry and architecture. He was drawn, we are told, to the principle of the spontaneity, of the " unforeseen " of the Gothic, and so " he shaped his poetry accordingly, introducing metrical pauses, and reversed beats ; and found for his trouble that some particular line of a poem exemplifying this principle was greeted with a would-be jocular remark that such a line ' did not make for immortality.' "

The impression we get from this book is that of a great man who tried desperately all his life to " believe," but who would not allow himself to be humbugged, and who had the courage to fight hypocrisy and social injustice when to do so meant nothing less than ostracism. It is hard to believe on reading to-day the accounts of the storms which raged about " Tess " and " Jude " that such rages and furies could ever have been possible. I doubt if even Mr. James Joyce ever received (as Hardy did) " a letter from Australia containing a packet of ashes, which the virtuous writer stated to be those of his iniquitous novel." Nor can I believe that the late W. L. George, who had a reputation for being able to portray and understand women, was ever deluged as Hardy was after the publication of " Tess," by letters from men and women, confiding in him the intimacies of their matrimonial entanglements and appealing for his advice. What has happened to the reading public ? Or is it the novelists who cease to arouse such furies and such enthusiasms ?

H. L. MORROW.

Photo by Bernard Griffin, Dorchester. Thomas Hardy.

SOME OLD FRENCH POEMS.*

Mr. Wallis has produced a book which will be of great interest to students of mediæval French literature. It contains two hundred and fifty poems, of which only some three have hitherto been printed, and those in a bulletin of the Société des Anciens Textes Français issued nearly fifty years ago. They are taken from half a dozen manuscripts in the British Museum, and one hundred and ninety-four of them comprise the entire contents of a single manuscript—Additional 15224.

After an introductory note, which one would have liked a good deal fuller, Mr. Wallis proceeds to a careful bibliographical description of the manuscripts, including some which he has not used, and that is followed by a bibliography of printed French poetry ranging in date from Alain Chartier and Christine de Pisan to the Pleiad. The last is a valuable piece of work, though its alphabetical arrangement is very inexact, and one or two curious omissions are to be noted. Thus while Mr. D. B. Wyndham Lewis's recent and very good book on Villon is mentioned, M. Pierre Champion's much more important work is not ; nor is his companion study of Charles d'Orléans, nor Gaston Paris's classic little life of Villon in the Grands Ecrivains Français.

* " Anonymous French Verse An Anthology of Fifteenth Century Poems collected from Manuscripts in the British Museum." Translated and edited by N. Hardy Wallis, M.A. 12s. 6d. (University of London Press.)

Next comes an index of first lines—Mr. Wallis's arrangement of his material is unusual—and then the poems themselves. These are presented exactly as they stand in the manuscripts, unpunctuated and without emendation. The text in fact constitutes a body of raw material, on which there must be a good deal of useful critical work still to be done, by Mr. Wallis or some other scholar. All the poems are anonymous, and no attempt has been made to attribute any of them to any of the known poets of the period to which they belong.

Perhaps that would not have been a very profitable undertaking, for the French poets of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries were a conventional lot, writing on set themes and set models, their work monotonously alike. Between Villon and Ronsard there were no great poets, for even Clément Marot, though he wrote many charming things and towers above his fellows, hardly deserves that high epithet, which Mr. Wallis however confers on both him and his father. It is only now and then in reading these verses that one discovers a faintly individual note or evidence of an eye which has looked at nature in its own way. The freshness of such earlier poets as Adam de la Halle or Jehannot de Lescurel, or of contemporary folk-song, is for the most part lacking from these lovers' complaints of the cruelty or the absence of their mistresses—the overwhelmingly predominant theme—expressed in the artificial form of ballade, rondel or virelai.

To the text Mr. Wallis has added a glossary which contains the modern French equivalents of the old words, without grammatical or philological explanation, and a detailed analysis of the various metrical forms used.

Finally come his translations, which are in the metres of the originals. Their making must have been an arduous undertaking. In comparing them with the French, one notes not infrequent slight deviations from its exact sense, for the sake of rhyme or metre. But this was almost inevitable, and as a whole they are very competently done, as literal as may be, reading easily, and giving a just sense of what French poetry of the fifteenth century is like. Their greatest value will be as a crib for those who can read the original but not with facility or expertness; and on that account one could have wished that they had been printed face to face with the text, instead of separately.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

THE PASSING SHOW.

Mr. R. D. Blumenfeld's publishers describe him as "a power in Fleet Street for over forty years." This is a claim the truth of which Fleet Street will confirm, though the world that is not Fleet Street will protest that it never until now heard of Mr. Blumenfeld, which will be equally true, for throughout a long and most industrious career R. D. B. has been content to remain a man of mystery, even to his colleagues. However, the secret of the very considerable success achieved by him in an exacting profession is now made plain in the pages of his Diary, if we mistake not the first occasion of its author's putting that potent and mysterious "chop" of his upon a title page. In the ensuing chapters Mr. Blumenfeld reveals himself as a really great journalist, whose flair for selecting from the day by day happenings of forty years the matters best fitted to be recorded in his notebook is positively uncanny. The hasty memoranda of a very busy but extremely methodical man, they do not claim nor possess any literary pretensions, for the most part are a précis of news rather than views, and usually news of the type whose interest continues to increase from the date of its being recorded. This applies to the homeliest and most prosaic trifles: the price of coal, the price of provisions, the preponderance of "drunks" in Tottenham Court Road and the Strand on Saturday nights, the vogues and vagaries of fashion, both feminine and masculine.

* "R. D. B.'s Diary: 1887–1914." By R. D. Blumenfeld. 8s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

Naturally there are also contacts with innumerable personalities, R. D. B.'s friendships taking, especially in his early days, a catholic range which included cabinet ministers and international crooks, captains of industry and cab-touts, Whitehall war-lords and "Junoesque" barmaids, R.A.'s and their humbler confrères who painted the eyelashes on Madame Tussaud's waxwork figures. Some of the comments on events and people betray a singular prescience, others in the light of subsequent history appear oddly wide of the mark. Stanley Baldwin, the diarist considers, though a pleasant and well-mannered young fellow, is unlikely (February, 1908) to go far in politics. In the same week a paragraph beginning, "This is the era of young men," nevertheless records that "when told in the House that young Mr. F. E. Smith, M.P., was to be made a K.C., I didn't believe it." And the following earlier entry is amusing:

> "Dined at the Savage Club, in Savoy Yard, with Harold Frederic, who persists in predicting a world war, and George du Maurier, the Punch artist (father of Sir Gerald and author of 'Trilby'), who is also a lecturer. Much amused by the conversation of an old actor named Odell, who appears to be the permanent attraction of this interesting club."

The date of this entry is June, 1887, and the "old actor," as we know, remained the star turn at the Savage for another forty years.

Another note of this period (the diarist had newly arrived from New York):

> "Had my first experience of Hades to-day, and if the real thing is to be like that I shall never again do anything wrong. I got into the Underground Railway at Baker St. after leaving Archibald Forbes's house. I wanted to go to Moorgate St. in the City. It was very warm—for London at least. The compartment in which I sat was filled with passengers who were smoking pipes, as is the British habit, and as the smoke and sulphur from the engine fill the tunnel, all the windows have to be closed. The atmosphere was a mixture of sulphur, coal dust and foul fumes from the oil lamp above, so that by Moorgate Street I was near dead of suffocation and heat. I should think these Underground Railways must soon be discontinued, for they are a menace to health."

R. D. B. served Northcliffe and Pearson in turn, but does not throw very exciting new sidelights on either of these remarkable Fleet Street personalities, though one episode is of interest:

> "Alfred Harmsworth came into my room and said: 'There is nothing I would like better than to obtain control of The Times. I've got a million pounds in Consols, and I authorise you to play up to that sum.' So I went to Printing House Square."

Actually R. D. B. gives more space to his first chief, Gordon Bennett ("The Commodore"), who was responsible for bringing him to Europe, and whose treatment of his subordinates was certainly both arbitrary and eccentric. Amusing and vivid however as are these thumbnail portraits of the "well-knowns" of four decades, the main interest of this book attaches to its character as a precise record of social progress throughout one of the most kaleidoscopic chapters of English history.

A. G.

THE VATICINATIONS OF LORD BIRKENHEAD.*

Lord Birkenhead has produced an extraordinarily stimulating book, with something to quote, or to question, or to contradict, or to take one's breath away, upon every page. Listen to this for instance. I take it from his opening chapter:

> "At present we derive the energy which drives the wheels of industry from coal and oil. Both these substances are won from nature at the expense of much money and vast stores of muscular energy, nor are these supplies inexhaustible. By means of the most efficient methods, moreover, a pound of coal can only be made to yield energy of the order of one horse-power for one hour. Yet locked up in the atom which constitute a pound of water there is an amount of energy equivalent to ten million horse-power hours. . . . As yet, physicists do not know how to release it; or, having done so, how to make it perform useful work. This problem will be solved before 2030. . . . The consequences of tapping such stupendous sources of cheap energy are almost illimitable. For the first time in history man will be armed with sufficient power to undertake operations on a gigantic scale. It will be open to him radically to alter the geography or the climate of the world. By utilising some 50,000 tons of water, the amount displaced by a large liner, it would be possible to remove Ireland to the deeper portion of the Atlantic Ocean. The heat obtainable from the same quantity of water would suffice to maintain the polar regions at the temperature of the Sahara for a thousand years."

* "The World in 2030 A.D." By the Earl of Birkenhead. 12s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

And in the paragraph which follows we are assured that in those days "a power plant of six hundred horse-power will carry fuel for a thousand hours' working, in a tank no bigger than a fountain-pen."

The entire volume is in this vein. Lord Birkenhead has equally startling things to tell us about aeronautics and psychology, about food and money, about wars and women. About women, above all! Even Mr. Havelock Ellis and Mrs. Marie Stopes, even Mr. Bertrand Russell and Mr. H. G. Wells, may gasp a little when they read what they will find in these pages about ectogenesis. The very word is new to most of us, and one had not expected to find Lord Birkenhead an authority in this field of knowledge. But he delivers himself unhesitatingly of what follows:

"Science . . . already foreshadows the possibility of producing living offspring in the laboratory from the germs of various animal species. Hitherto no living animal has been brought to birth ab initio; but the fœtus of various species has been removed from the maternal organism and further developed by skilful manipulation in biological laboratories. It is certain that scientists will one day succeed in producing a living human infant by such means. This process, known as ectogenesis, will be violently and furiously opposed by the spiritual descendants of all those who now attack contraception."

And we are reminded how hand-weavers broke steam looms, how surgeons fought the antiseptic inventions of Lister and the asepsis of Pasteur, and—to take a less beneficent innovation—how breech-loading rifles were condemned by a British general on the ground that they would transform infantry into "long-range assassins"!

Lord Birkenhead's book is illustrated by the well-known poster artist (if we may so describe him), Mr. E. McKnight Kauffer, whose designs, in their very different way, are as remarkable as the letterpress.

FREDERIC WHYTE.

JOHN XAVIER MERRIMAN.*

In writing this full and exhaustive account of the life and activities of one who was not only a justly famous man but a friend of long standing, Sir Perceval Laurence, for more than thirty years a distinguished judicial figure in South Africa, as well as an authority on its politics, has performed his task in a fashion which only makes the modesty of his preface, itself an important part of the book, the more attractive.

The most formidable aspect of his undertaking was obviously the selection and arrangement of the vast amount of material left behind by a man whose public career extended over such a tremendous period as that of Merriman; second only to that was the problem of presenting to the reader a smooth, comprehensive and completely coherent account of the tortuous and teeming history of the many phases of South African politics in which his subject took a leading part. Third, and most delicate part of the undertaking, was the necessity to temper enthusiasm for the character and achievements of his subject with that flavouring of detachment without which no biographer can attain first rank.

Long practice in the impartial survey of statement, and the grasping of the salient outlines of involved and prolix matters, have doubtless aided a former High Court judge in the handling of his materials, but seldom surely is the result of judicial labour so informed with humanity as in this instance. And the supreme merit of Sir Perceval's performance is that a sense of humour, equally rare in the legal mind, has enabled him to touch on Merriman's failings in a spirit which, while it names them without bush-beating, serves only to throw into bolder relief the root strength of his character.

The history of those British migrations which on the whole have tended to advance the cause of progress throughout the world contains figures of greater stature than John Xavier Merriman, but hardly one whose career more perfectly illustrates in one individuality the peculiar genius of the race.

The son of a West Country parson who rose to a South African bishopric, after three refusals of a see, Merriman was born in England, where he also received his schooling; but rejoining his family in South Africa while still in his teens, he became so identified with the country of his adoption that one of the most famous South Africans of modern times, in paying tribute to him in Parliament when death removed him at the age of eighty-five, claimed him outright, and rightly, as "one of South Africa's great sons." And the speaker was not only South African born, but a pure Dutchman and, as such, one who had fought to the bitter end in a war against the country that gave Merriman birth.

When flag-wagging and the bombast of the more extreme type of what is called Imperialism are forgotten, it will be found that the creative success of the typical Englishman transplanted to distant clime is due to two main and abiding characteristics: common sense and the tolerance which is the truest liberalism. It was these which laid the foundation of Merriman's success, and the unique esteem in which he was held by the people of two races in times of both strife and peace. Without them as basis Merriman, the politician, the economist and the singularly gifted speaker, would never have achieved the position he did.

His character, thus rooted, was tested in the most searching way. To him was assigned the destiny of having to work for long stretches of years with partisans as well as statesmen of both races. With more than one of them, and of both races impartially, he found himself at sharpest variance from time to time. During the period of the great Anglo-Boer War the controversies of party were fanned to fever-heat by racial passions. Yet when Merriman publicly urged the most unpopular of all causes in the face of his fellow-Britishers, not a man but listened to him; and when he fearlessly attacked the Dutch extremists afterwards, the most embittered Dutchman paused to hearken. They both entirely trusted him in that reliance paid only to absolute integrity.

The turning-point of Merriman's career was when, though he was unrivalled in experience and statesmanship throughout South Africa, and then Prime Minister of the Cape, the Senior Colony, Botha was preferred to him as the Union's first Premier. Great man as Botha was, the reason for his being chosen was primarily because, as leader of the war-hit Dutch, his selection most fittingly consummated the final work of Campbell-Bannerman conciliation; and the proof that Merriman appreciated a circumstance the outcome of which little tended to diminish his prestige, is clearly indicated in a letter that does his character most honour. The greatest tribute to the unparalleled position which he reached and held for the best part of half a century is to be found in the fact that whatever South Africa's paramount problem in peace or war during that vast period in man's life, the view of "J. X.," whether in office or out, was sought in each and all of them.

Brigadier-General Howard Gorges has made a contribution to Great War literature less sensational but much more welcome than many a recent one. No campaign throughout that enormous conflict was waged against greater odds of climate than the conquest of the Kameruns; none excelled it in the cheer and pluck, shared by white and coloured soldier alike, with which the capture of this former enemy colony of swamp, desert and hill was achieved. General Gorges writes with a soldier's straightforwardness, flavoured with a sense of humour that makes his narrative unusually easy reading. His description of the Bimbia River action between the British "Dwarf" and the enemy "Nachtigal" is vivid in the extreme. The book is superbly got up, and contains no fewer than 192 illustrations and 15 maps.

* "The Life of John Xavier Merriman." By Sir Perceval Laurence, K.C.M.G. 18s. net. (Constable.)—"The Great War in West Africa." By Brigadier-General E. Howard Gorges, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O. 21s. net. (Hutchinson.)

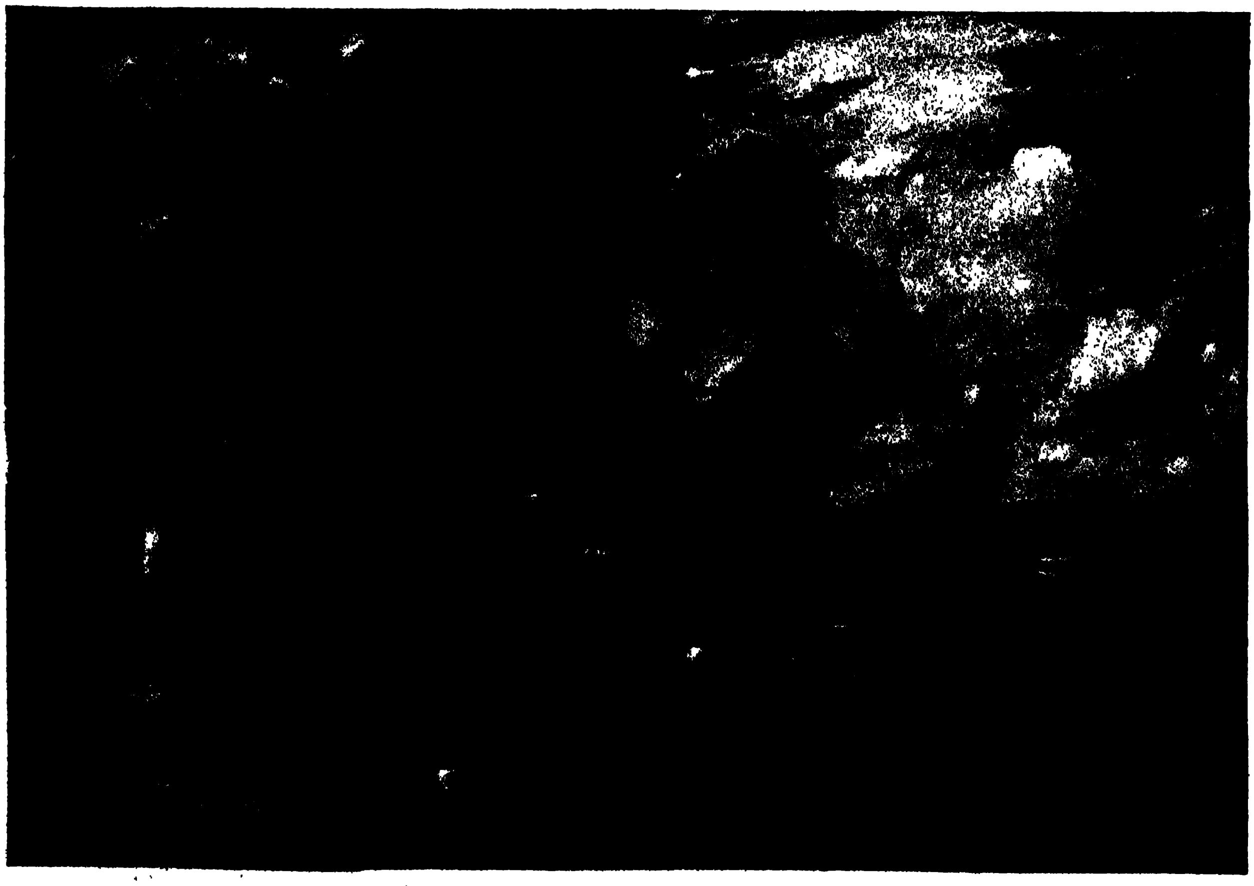
MOORE RITCHIE.

THE ENGLISH HERITAGE.*



Two of these books certainly come at an apt moment, and are linked together by memories of many a cricket match on the green fronting the village inn. And it might be said that the subjects of these two come, in one sense, within the scope of the third, as the greater includes the less. The English inn and English cricket are certainly, in the common idea, part of the English constitution. But this perhaps is to jest, in a holiday spirit induced by tavern talks with Mr. Burke, on a serious matter—to which we will return presently, after a little refreshment at the inn.

The great merit of Mr. Burke's book, one that should make it part of the equipment of every car, along with the maps and the A.A. book, is that it is no mere literary guide-book. There are plenty of famous inns which should be visited for their historical or literary associations, regardless of what they may offer in the way of sustenance or sleeping room. Mr. Burke has many interesting pages on such associations. But he is primarily concerned with the first function of the inn—to shelter and feed the traveller, who may never have heard of Chaucer or Borrow or Stevenson. And in this matter he is not afraid to name names, to commend such as deserve it on one count or other. He does not tantalisingly leave us to speculate about the name and whereabouts of the inn that sends to the room of the newly-arrived guest a glass of cherry brandy—"Custom of the house, sir." He tells us where he has been well fed and lodged, in little places and big —from the "Hoop and Grapes" at Aldgate, to the "Spread Eagle" at Thame, noted not only for its artist landlord, John Fothergill (if only there were more landlords like him!), for its Black Soup, but also for its library. How many inns can offer you anything to read but last year's almanac?

And having begun to name names, those of a few of the inns Mr. Burke knows must serve for any further indication of the scope of his book. Do you know where to see the sign-boards of "The Rent Day," "You Might as Well," "No Hurry," "The Trip to Jerusalem," "The Marvel of Marvels," "The Quiet Woman," "The Flat Iron and Frog," and "The Black Boy and Stomachache"? The long list from which these are taken would alone mark out Mr. Burke as a knowledgeable man: with a knowledge of his subject which makes him declare that "of all inns there is none so good as the English inn"—when it is good. But when the English inn is bad it is horrid.

Mr. Neville Cardus almost summarises his own book, certainly gives a good idea of it, when he says that "If a psychoanalyst were to rap at me the word 'cricket' the chances are that my responses would be (all on a single breath), 'Lord's—buckle missing on pads—next man in —shady pavilion with shirts on pegs all inside out—Old William, "pro" at Shastbury—"left leg forrard, sir"—Nursery end—Mound Stand—dots on scoring card, lovely to go round them with a pencil and print the M's in the maiden overs—a new bat—linseed oil—Hobbs—Canterbury—first practic. in April weather.'" All these things are in his book and much else good stuff besides: memories of great cricketers and famous matches; of boys' cricket in which a composition ball was stopped by the wicket-keeper with a coat. A lovely chapter this-one to make the goutiest old curmudgeon buy his nephew

* "The English Inn." By Thomas Burke.—"Cricket." By Neville Cardus.—"The English Constitution." By Sir Maurice Amos. 3s. 6d. each. (The "English Heritage" Series.) (Longmans.)

The Hay Wain.

By John Constable, R.A. From the painting in the National Gallery.

From "Art in England," by W. T. Whitley (Cambridge University Press).

a new cricket bat. And never was there a book so free from the cricket cant which makes Mr. Cardus declare that "this perpetual insistence on the 'gentlemanliness' of cricket seems to me as unnecessary as it is offensive."

The English Constitution—how many people could immediately define it ?—is no subject to be treated in a few lines. And it would take a good many lines to give a proper idea of the amount of information on the subject which Sir Maurice Amos has got into one small book. He traces the growth of the Constitution down through the centuries, explains clearly the functions of Law, Crown and Parliament, and the share of each in our government. He has an illuminating chapter on a matter often mentioned but very imperfectly understood—the liberty of the subject. This is no book for light reading; but to anyone who is curious to know how we are governed, and how the government—to use a loose term—got its powers, it will be invaluable.

K. K.

BRAHMS.*

We like our great musicians to be romantic, and when romance seems to be missing from the records of their lives, we are prone to conjecture and surmise, thereby sowing the seeds from which a legend springs up. Dr. Richard Specht, himself a pure-blooded romantic, writes this life of Brahms with as much fervour as if he were dealing with Chopin, seeking out sentimental reasons for events which conceivably had quite prosaic origins. This insistence upon romance is not unattractive in these days of intellectual scepticism, and at least it has the good effect of counter-balancing the curious conviction current in otherwise well-informed quarters that Brahms was a dry-as-dust theoretician, whose works reek of the midnight oil, and whose musical achievement, however impressive on paper, is apt to be boring in performance.

How the composer of some of the most perfect songs ever written came to be so misjudged is a mystery. His pianoforte music alone, with its wide range of emotional expression, from the playful Capriccio, Op. 76, No. 2, to the solemn, almost mystical, Intermezzo, Op. 118, No. 6; from the wildness of the Rhapsodies to the gentleness of such intermezzi as Op. 117, No. 1, should give the lie to this strange illusion; and even a superficial knowledge of his chamber music and choral music—leaving the symphonies and the so-called German Requiem on one side—ought to dispel the idea that their creator was a man without emotional experiences, inventing musical patterns with scholarly ingenuity and no inspiration.

In truth, there is more evidence of romance in Brahms' music itself than Dr. Specht has been able to deduce from the circumstances of his life, which seems, on the whole, to have been no more eventful than many lesser artists', and distinctly unspectacular. He never married. Why, is not apparent. He appears to have formed a deep attachment to Clara Schumann, the wife of the composer who was the first prominent musician to recognise Brahms's promise. That this affection was kept within bounds during Schumann's lifetime is quite clear. Why, if it was deep as Dr. Specht maintains, it did not lead to marriage after Schumann's tragic death is not so clear. Other women played an important part in his life—notably Elisabeth von Herzogenberg, whose sympathy and criticism were invaluable—but whether he was actually in love with them is not as evident to the reader of Dr. Specht's book as it appears to be to Dr. Specht.

"It is pathetic to see Brahms ever in an aimless search after human beings, until he suddenly throws himself with all his soul upon an individual," he writes; adding, rather inconsistently, "He, loved by almost every one, would have been so unspeakably glad to love—and yet could not." He was intensely individualistic and not only failed to suffer fools gladly but dismissed as fools or charlatans men who were neither. That he could be charming, affectionate, warm-hearted and undemonstratively generous is beyond disputing; but his frequent bad manners and lack of restraint sometimes made enemies of those who would have been his friends. It is recorded that when still a young, unknown musician he visited Liszt, who played the difficult E flat minor Scherzo and parts of the C major Sonata at sight, from a very imperfect manuscript, wishing thereby to show his young visitor unusual attention. Liszt, then one of the most powerful figures in the world of music, afterwards played his own Sonata in B minor—and Brahms fell asleep! With all its faults, this is not a work which could be justly described as soporific and Brahms might have contrived to keep awake.

* "Brahms." By Richard Specht. Translated by Eric Blom. Illustrated. 21s. (Dent.)—"A History of Music in Pictures." Edited by Georg Kinsky, with an introduction by Eric Blom. 1,500 illustrations. 30s. (Dent.)

The battle royal which was waged between the Wagnerites and the Brahmsians, like all such battles viewed in retrospect, seems to have been meaningless enough, for, as Dr. Specht points out more than once, the two composers have much in common. If Brahms was for the most part content to cast his work in traditional moulds and Wagner rebelled very consciously against old forms, that does not prevent the emotional content of their music from being frequently on the same plane. It is somewhat ironical that one of Brahms's best-known works—the A major violin Sonata—should have come to be known as the Meistersinger Sonata because of the resemblance which the opening theme bears to the Preislied. Wagner was frequently guilty of attacking Brahms, often spitefully, but there is good evidence for believing that he was not unaware of his competitor's greatness. Brahms rarely allowed himself to be drawn.

Dr. Specht's book is a valuable contribution to Brahms literature. His somewhat over-burdened and flowery style presented a difficult task to his translator, Mr. Eric Blom, who must be congratulated on the fluency of his version. It is not his fault if one sometimes sighs for a clearer and more direct utterance.

Mr. Blom is concerned, also, in the sponsoring of "A History of Music in Pictures." This was a happy idea. Fifteen hundred pictures—the frontispiece a coloured portrait of Beethoven, which is as it should be—tell the story of music from the third millennium B.C. down to the present day. The first picture is of a Sumerian drummer—the last a facsimile of part of the score of "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Stravinsky, and in between there is a profusion of portraits, pictures of instruments, buildings, stages, contemporary drawings, manuscripts, all briefly but exactly annotated. The work has been edited with great care, and should prove an invaluable reference-book for students and a fascinating picture-book for the mere lover of music.

HERMON OULD.

ELEONORA DUSE.*

In the autumn of 1859 Austrian soldiers saluted, as a casket of holy relics, the tiny glass case with gilt mounting in which Eleanora Duse was being carried to her christening, and her parents thought the error a happy omen. In the spring of 1924 the Italian nation buried its most famous actress with tremendous pomp—with wreaths, and with the graven wish that her restless spirit would rest at last.

This authoritative and colourful biography which fills the gaps between the two spectacles is the work of a German dramatic critic who was inspired in the task by Olga Resnevic, an intimate friend of the tragic actress. From personal memories, conversations, and a vast literature the biographer builds up the very image of Eleanora Duse who conquered the world, the theatre, but never quite her own heart.

Poverty darkened the child's most impressionable years, for her father was a wandering player who yearned to be a painter.

* "The Life of Eleonora Duse." By E. A. Rheinhardt. With 8 portraits. 16s. (Martin Secker.)

"To pack up and go on, always to go on was her first experience of the world. An image of one of those perpetual leave-takings out of the faint dawn of her memory always remained with her. . . . The kind hearted landlady had given her her first doll, a lovely doll, worthy of all the love of a child . . . the new leave-taking came. . . . She ran back to the empty room, laid the doll in the bed where she had slept and covered it up tenderly. Later she said: 'I left it there, so it, at least, might be warm.'"

School brought fresh terrors. During her sporadic attendances as the company passed through small Italian towns she learned her letters from occasional teachers. The other children, mistaking her shyness for pride, bawled after the sensitive child in the streets: "Showman's daughter!" But in solitude she dreamed dreams and talked to the stars. And her first appearance on the stage was at the age of four.

One evening in Verona, when she was fourteen, her mother died, and she was too poor to buy mourning. But there, too, on another evening, her love for the theatre awoke. D'Annunzio has told in a famous novel that when Duse as Juliet heard Romeo's "O she doth teach the torches to burn bright!" she was set on fire and became a flame. Another writer here quoted describes her reactions to that first triumph: "The garret, the squalor around, all were gone . . . she had been Juliet . . . it was her revelation in which she had found grace."

As a girl of twenty in Naples she was betrayed by a libertine. Her child only lived a few hours. The boy's grey and wrinkled face, which seemed from the first too old and sad to live, haunted her for years even amid ovations and cheering crowds. But she rejected the temptation of suicide with the proud phrase: "That would be too trivial, too easy!"

Although this biography tells in detail of Eleanora Duse's evolution as an actress, quotes many judgments thereon and portrays with discrimination and effect her triumphs in Italy, Vienna, Russia, New York and London, it is her own loves and personality which grip the reader most.

There is, for instance, as prelude to D'Annunzio, her husband Tebaldo Checchi, who married her to protect her from her manager's too pressing attentions. When Duse fell in love with Flavio Ando, her leading man, Tebaldo said good-bye to Duse, to Italy and to the stage without a murmur. His last act, after an obscure existence as an Argentine consul in England, was to leave his wife and daughter his savings "just when we needed them, always the same Tebaldo."

In her middle thirties one evening in Rome, as Duse returned to her dressing-room, after the second act of "La Dame aux Camélias," weeping with excitement and weariness, a young man with glowing eyes saluted her with the words: "O great lover!" It was D'Annunzio, a slight figure with metallic gaze, husband of a princess, grandiose follies to his name, and gloomy rumours afloat that he was, at thirty-three, a physical and spiritual wreck. Later, in the gondolas of Venice, there was a romantic reunion. He was then a famous poet and novelist, but when Eleanora Duse asked him why he did not write for the theatre he answered with a boyish laugh. The woman who asked the question lived to make known to thousands in the great centres "La Citta Morta," "Francesca da Rimini" and "La Gioconda." Her devotion to the poet never died. When D'Annunzio afterwards wrote "Il Fuoco," a novel which was to make her name notorious in several continents, she declined to stop it because her sufferings counted as nothing when it was a question of adding one more masterpiece to Italian literature: "Besides I am forty and in love!"

"Ashes, ashes!" Duse exclaimed when D'Annunzio went away. "Before my eyes, on my lips, in my empty hands." But she had other triumphs before her, and one feels when this gracious and indomitable genius told women: "Work; don't ask support from any man but only love; then your life will have the meaning you are looking for," she summed up her own dauntless spirit and noble career.

DESMOND RYAN.

THE STRANGER IN OUR GATES.

Great acting expands one's knowledge of humanity—I had written "extends"; but the other is the juster word. For the actor does not create, though the term is much used of him. His art anatomises human relationships; he interprets us to ourselves; and the chief virtue of great acting is to make crystal-clear to us our own private emotions—including those which, though ourselves have not suffered them, we may yet recognise to be potentially ours. "It is we who are Hamlet," Hazlitt deeply said; and the great actor reminds us so. True, his range will contain the grotesque, the bizarre, the monstrous, as an orchestra contains drums; but it is not with these that he will play on our hearts. That is why melodrama (the emotionally monstrous) is as like to draw mirth as awe. It was with Lear's "Look there, look there!" rather than with contemporary fustian, that Spranger Barry "caused all the critics of the pit to burst into tears"; or to take modern instances, some of the cleverest acting of our time served the Grand Guignol's horrors (just as the cleverest of the seventeenth century, I dare say, served Tourneur); yet it is by Miss Thorndike's Hecuba and Medea, by her Jane Clegg, that old men will remember her. The universal is the actor's high test; the challenge of "There, but for the grace of God . . .," or more finely, "There, but with more grace of God than you dare claim, go you!"

This challenge is present, to a supreme degree, in the acting of Yvette Guilbert.* In her stupendous "Ma fille, ne puis le cacher; Renaud est mort—et enterré!" she is the bearer of all bitter news since human sorrow began. In the conclusion of "Le Voyage de Joseph" she is the ageless triumph of meek faith over casual cruelty. Her "C'est le mai" is exquisitely funny—what a range this great artist has!—but it has also some of the same triumph; a triumph of old women plodding in devout procession, of village worthies, of little children in stiff frocks singing out of tune; and touches the heart as deeply.

Such moments are too rare in the routine of the theatre; but this month has been rich in them, thanks largely to the stranger in our theatrical gates. I should not like to say the Pitoeffs' "Ste. Jeanne"† is quite Mr. Shaw's (is there a strain of sentiment between the Maid and Dunois, at which he may look askance?), but it has passages of unmatchable power and beauty. The tent scene was superbly done. One felt that not only the technique of M. Larive, but the very shape of his neck, had marked him out for de Stogumber. Cauchon again—"Men will be the worse for remembering me; they will see in me evil triumphing over good . . . yet God is my witness I was just. I could do no other than I did." M. Hort's every gesture, every intonation, led up inexorably to those words of the epilogue. Or M. Penay: a Warwick more bone-English than one could have deemed possible, and speaking his native tongue (if I am not mistaken) with just the faintest, least malicious touch of an Oxford accent. But the chief honours go to Madame Pitoeff, in a performance to which I have no space to do justice. Her mere bodily presence (if one can use the word of anything so spiritual) was an unforgettable experience; and her demeanour at the moment of sentence seemed to sum up, in one soul's anguish, all that is crushed and broken in the story of man.

I was less moved by Herr Moissi's "Hamlet"† than perhaps I ought to have been. It was a thing of brilliant episodes—the amorphous horror of the ghost; the soldiers' panic fear at it; Hamlet's use of the candlestick at the climax of the play-scene; the most actor-like realism of the First Player; and many more. But the production was uneven; its details did not cohere. Herr Moissi's mutilation of the text was murder most foul. And the last act made nonsense. I would go far to see him in fantastic comedy—Puck, Dubedat; Cyrano, perhaps; but farther to see more Pitoeff, whether in "La Dame aux Camélias" (their second string) or in any other play.

* Arts Theatre. † Globe Theatre.

Another rather patchy Shakespearean production is the Savoy "Othello," staged by Miss Ellen van Volkenburg, to whom we owed the "reproduction" of the exquisite "Charles and Mary" from the Everyman. Her "Othello" strikes me as too contrived, too "actor"-ish, and with too many B.B.C. voices at large in it. Mr. Montesole (looking remarkably like the illustrious author) is miscast as Cassio; and Mr. Browne should be discouraged from slapping at everything within reach, including himself. Nor do I like the interpolated dance, since it transforms the castle chamber into the kind of cabaret to which Othello would certainly not have taken his bride. But Miss Ashcroft's Desdemona is a lovely thing; and Mr. Robeson, after a first act which unexpectedly lacks something of poise and dignity, goes from strength to strength. One touch is especially notable—the way he faces the rest at the end; noble, dignified; yet with a, somehow, infinitely pathetic hint of the naughty child—the very spirit of that inferiority-complex which is innate in Shakespeare's conception. A performance not to be missed.

Another entertainment of foreign origin, Feuchtwanger's "Ugly Duchess," has been unlucky in its short run;* for it was far more interesting on the stage than "Jew Süss," besides being better presented. Miss Esme Beringer made a prodigiously good job of the Duchess; as did Miss Vera Beringer, I should judge, of the adaptation. It is a pity no West End run could be arranged for this play—or better still for "The Blue Coast," which is about to finish at the Everyman as I write. "The Blue Coast," being an all-British production, has no business in this article (I will not be so shameless as to urge that its author, Mr. N. F. Webb, is an Ulster man!). I saw it unofficially, expecting nothing extraordinary—though I have yet to find an Everyman production that is not worth the trip. But to hear good news accidentally is no reason for keeping it dark; and "The Blue Coast" struck me as being an even rarer joy than "Young Woodley," which it somewhat resembles. Walk up to Hampstead, you gentlemen of the theatre who deplore the dearth of fine plays!

GRAHAM SUTTON.

Novel Notes.

OLIVER'S DAUGHTER. By Richard Church. 7s. 6d. (Dent.)

Mr. Church writes of simple country people—a village grocer and his daughter. The father, tied to a querulous, invalid wife, is a man of some intellect and a philosopher. The girl, Jessie, has ambitions to become a school teacher. A musical genius, a composer, temperamental and masterful, invades Jessie's life when she is on the eve of going away to college, and eventually she becomes his mistress. When she discovers that he still cares for the wife from whom he is separated, she leaves him and returns to her native village in time to see her father die and to take over the responsibilities of her mother and the business. But we do not feel that is the end of happiness for Jessie, because a faithful lover has been hovering in the background, and the story finishes on a note of hope. It is not a swiftly moving story; there is a good deal of unnecessary dialogue which tends to make it drag in parts and, despite its heroine's unconventionalities, it gives the impression of being a little old-fashioned. Oliver Kingsley and John Bembridge —the grocer and the musician—are the most definitely drawn characters; the others, even Jessie herself, are more obscure. But the book is interesting mainly as a work of fiction by a man who has already distinguished himself in the field of poetry.

THE SECRET OF THE CREEK. By Victor Bridges. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Victor Bridges's new novel is not a bedtime story, for if you start reading it before going to bed, you will find yourself sitting up half the night to finish it. It is quite one of the best mystery stories you could run across, for it has, besides a first-rate plot (concerning a seventeenth century volume of travels with a message in cipher on the back page), some excellent character drawing, an atmosphere of horror relieved by breezy humour, and a strong vein of probability, which make it among sensational fiction something of a work of art. Jim Cameron, purchaser of the valuable old book, soon discovered it was of greater value than he suspected when a stranger came along, offered him twice as much as he had given for it, and became abusive when he refused to part with it. Going for a cruise in his yacht round the coast of Essex, he and his friend visit the place from which the book originally came, and find themselves drawn into weird and exciting adventures, in which a pretty girl is a fellow victim. So ingeniously does Mr. Bridges keep the reader in suspense, that one is prepared to suspect everybody of being in the plot, and to regard every trifling incident as a trap. It is extraordinarily well done, and you certainly will not be able to curb your patience till the mystery of the cipher is cleared up and all the perils and pitfalls are satisfactorily removed from the path of Jim Cameron, Peter West, Jean Franklyn and the wily late detective-inspector, Mr. George Jennifer.

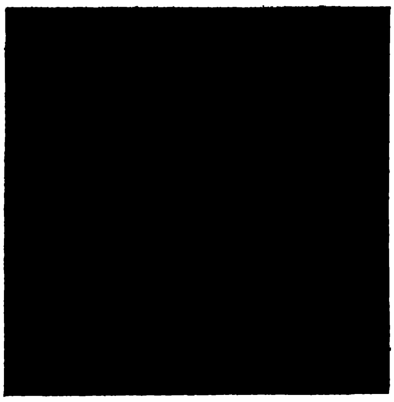
JIM TRELAWNEY. By Ottwell Binns. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

Mr. Binns is an indefatigable writer of the sort to grip and hold one's interest from the word "Go"—although, as he himself will probably admit, literary subtleties are less fascinating to him than the rapid intricacies of his plots. The story's the thing—a good, rattling, never-flag-a-moment yarn to stir the blood and set the pulses beating. In his latest we meet Jim Trelawney who, accused of forgery, emigrates to Canada, where he joins the North-West Mounted Police. In the North-West also, on a secret mission, is June Rimington, whose life Jim saves and eventually shares. Between page 1 and page 256 are any amount of excitement and "atmosphere"—and what more could an energetic and romantically-minded urban reader desire?

THE HUNGRY ROAD. By G. U. Ellis. 7s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

The story of an arterial road that scores its way not only through a hitherto peaceful village and an old-world estate, but through the souls of the men and women concerned, directly and indirectly, with its construction. The two diametrically opposed outlooks—rural conversatism and urban restless innovation—are expressed fairly and without undue exaggeration on either side, and Martin, Sue and Ray (the three chief characters) are all such stuff as this tangled life of ours is made on. Mr. Ellis knows how to write a novel that is a novel, with beginning, middle, unforced climax and end; but behind the novel he writes we recognise not the mere story-teller but an author to whom the problems of every day are of more urgent importance than any story.



DIANA. A Novel by Emil Ludwig. 8s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

"Diana" is composed of two novels written in 1917 and 1918 respectively, and now revised and rearranged as one story. They would not have been thus resuscitated, and certainly would not have been here translated into English—excellently translated, it may be added, by Eden and Cedar Paul—had not their author, Herr Emil Ludwig, made an eminent mark in the meanwhile with his biographies of Bismarck, Napoleon and the rest. For "Diana" is in no sense a great novel. It relates the loves—always the loves—of Diana de Wassilko, on whose figure is expended a wealth of words without bringing it to life. We hear much of her slim, sunburnt beauty, her carriage, her well-poised head, her elastic body, and a bronzed profile such as Antonello da Messina loved to portray, but we never quite realise her in the flesh. And so with her mind. Her old, romantic type never properly emerges from its ultra-modern trappings, nor is she convincingly consistent in her determination to be free, and to give with her body only that she shall gain in the spirit She dominates her poet, her diplomat, her newspaper magnate, and the others, and finally yields to her princeling, in Italian, German and Balkans scenes that glitter and arrest, but she never is in herself a commanding and authentic presence She never quite lives, narrowly though she misses doing so.

THE LOST CRUSADE. By Daphne Muir 7s 6d net (Chatto & Windus)

The shameful end to that tragic adventure, the Children's Crusade of 1212, is well known The suvivors were sold in the slave markets of Alexandria Mrs Muir, taking this most extraordinary chapter in the whole history of the Crusades for the theme of her romance, will not let Stephen, the French shepherd boy who started the unhappy business, make so poor an exit Nicholas and his contingent from Cologne quickly disappear from the story, but Charla von Gothenfels leads the Swabian children through Italy, and taking ship from Brindisi to Cyprus is captured, brought on Stephen's vessel and henceforth is Stephen's fellow captive We see the two depart with Hassan, whom Stephen has won to the Cross, from Bagdad, voyaging on the waters of the Tigris "They knew instinctively that this was the end" Much study of the period is evident in Mrs Muir's work and the book has many descriptive passages, finely wrought Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman Mr. F. L. Lucas.

CÉCILE. By F L Lucas 8s 6d (Chatto & Windus)

It seems curious that "Cécile" should be put before the public on its merits as proxime accessit in a publisher's historical novel competition, for though the setting is eighteenth century France the background seems purely accidental, there are no costume extravagances of colour or language, and the atmosphere is as modern as can be Many readers, and those not the least intelligent will welcome these attributes of Mr Lucas's novel which for the quiet distinction of its writing, subtlety of its character analysis, spirit and polish of dialogue, and poetic grace of its narrative and descriptive passages, deserves the highest praise It is hardly criticism to suggest that the title might more reasonably have been 'Andrée,' for it is the elder of a charming pair of sisters who is certainly the principal figure The volatile Cécile flits in and out of her more sober sister's life like the butterfly she is, too soon to be broken like so many of her kind on the wheel of a fate she is constitutionally incapable of avoiding Both girls make unfortunate marriages There is a hint of reconciliation between the disillusioned Andrée and her Gaston wiser now and very much more lugubrious, and the pair fade from our view in a half light that is as gently and pleasurably melancholy as a nocturne of Chopin played on an autumn evening Sweet sadness is indeed the note of the whole book

Miss Dorota Flatau.
Author of "Lady of London" (Hutchinson).

AUBREY DENE. By Sylvia Hooke 7s 6d (Longmans)

"Aubrey Dene" had a vivid tradition which stretched back to the crusades and onward through all the wars to the Great War, being a great country house which dominated a quiet English hamlet The novel opens with a murder Sir Denis Aubrey, of Aubrey Dene, has been acquitted for the murder of his temperamental and unfaithful wife Only his son Leonard had seen his father's deed Upon this sensational opening, and the love tangles and reactions due to Leonard's sensitive and loyal nature, Miss Sylvia Hooke builds a poignant and subdued story Leonard falls in the trenches, and for a moment the work of generations is threatened Tragedy overshadows everything, but how Sir Denis Aubrey found peace and the great house was saved for the future can best be learned in Miss Hooke's careful, comely and romantic pages She can tell a love story, suggest a quiet country-side, and depict a shelled trench with equal ease

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E C 4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration

The Bookman's Table.

HORACE WALPOLE. By Lewis Melville Illustrated 18s (Hutchinson)

Horace Walpole, "a splendid example of the man of inaction" as his present biographer calls him, was an industrious enough little fellow in his own way As became the son of a prime minister, he sat in Parliament for twenty-six years, cultivating little interest in politics, but much in politicians He drew a fat income from unblushingly "farmed" sinecures, but that was the custom of his time He built himself a Gothic house at Twickenham, and wrote a Gothic romance, neither of which would appeal to modern taste (anticipated by Hazlitt) but in their day attracted vast admiration He collected pictures, books bibelots, and comic characters, and established a private printing press He despised and shunned "professional writers, except the author of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard, in whose company he made the Grand Tour, but before that was over quarrelled with him Even his correspondence he affected to regard as an occupation for idle hours, yet preserved clean copies of most if not all the letters he wrote Three thousand and more of these, addressed to one hundred and fifty persons remain for the edification of posterity, and Mr Melville rightly claims that there is not a dull page in them and that as an intimate chronicle of eighteenth century England (they extend over a period of fifty-six years) their value is unique With an uncommon gift of character-drawing and that "nice spice of malice which makes the whole world kin" "Horry" discourses of politics, internal and external, notably of the troubles that ended in American Independence, dishes up all the gossip of the Court, the clubs, the drawing-rooms, and the more Bohemiam worlds of Literature, Art and the Stage. Through all the eighteen volumes in which these epistolary remains have been embalmed, with the distinguished expert assistance of Dr. and Mrs. Paget Toynbee as editors, Mr. Melville has enjoyed a permit to roam, making what use he pleased of this gold mine of material. His selection has been judicious, and the emergent portrait, given to us, as it is, very largely in the ipsissima verba of the subject, is literally a speaking likeness. It does not alter much our previous estimate of Walpole as one of the outstanding grotesque characters of a somewhat grotesque epoch, but it does show us a likeable side that few previous biographers have contrived to bring out. By nature thrifty and old-maidish in his habitual economies, Walpole could be and was generous on occasion, both in word and deed. Perhaps not all the obloquy which his share in the Chatterton scandal brought down on his head was deserved, and though his bête noire, Lady Wortley Montagu, must have wounded him deeply with her famous " men, women, and Herveys " epigram, he found towards her end some kind words to say even of her.

THE ROADS OF SPAIN. By Charles L. Freeston. 10s. 6d. (Humphrey Toulmin.)

It is a little disconcerting to be informed by the author of this book that an expectant crowd of spectators at Burgos told him " nous attendons un [sic] personalité," because Burgos is a place with fine traditions, and apparently they make elementary mistakes in the French language. As for Mr. Freeston, he does not profess to have any Spanish, and how one can write of a country of whose language one is in total ignorance we do not know. Of course Mr. Freeston does not set out to deal with anything except the roads; yet roads are only of interest (except for the engineer) in so far as they enable one to arrive with greater or less ease at the towns and villages. But Mr. Freeston deals so exclusively with the roads that he has very little time to spare for the intervening sights. One short paragraph is all that he allows to Zamora, a charming old town where three or four days should be the minimum stay, and so swiftly did Mr. Freeston traverse it that he talks of the " spacious central square," whereas the square is particularly small. The wonderful and ancient church where the Cid, Spain's national hero, received the honour of knighthood is not mentioned; but this building is locked, and it would have taken five or even ten minutes of Mr. Freeston's valuable time to discover the aged woman with the key. One is naturally a little dubious about a book furnished with an introduction by the Spanish Ambassador, for such a book will scarcely contain any criticism of things Spanish, and Mr. Freeston commits himself to the astonishing statement that " it would ill become any tourist to interfere in the politics of a country to which he is only making a passing visit "—by " interfere " he means " discuss." Shades of Karel Capek! Mr. Freeston actually prints a good deal of a brochure which was given him by the President of the P.N.T.6, the official travel association, and he was assured that it had been compiled by an impartial authority! There are a good many quite meritorious photographs in this book, although one gets a little tired of seeing Mr. Freeston's car reproduced, like a film star, over and over again.

PLATO AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. By G. C. Field. 12s. 6d. (Methuen.)

Though books on Plato, the most attractive of all philosophers, are innumerable, there was room for the one which Professor Field set himself to write and has accomplished with a distinction of style and a lucidity of exposition worthy of its theme. To many who have delighted and found mental profit in the dialogues their author, the theorist of ideas, is himself but an idea. His master, Socrates, with his snub nose, his termagant wife and the final cup of hemlock, is a far more actual figure. The motive of this book is that the dialogues lose by being read in vacuo. He considers that with Plato, as with other writers, a knowledge of the man contributes to an understanding of the work. He begins therefore with two admirable chapters of biography, based on a discriminating study of the extant material, which is regrettably incomplete and often obviously apocryphal. It is remarkable how substantial a brick he has contrived to build with such a handful of straw. But his main thesis is that, idealist as Plato was, his " chief interest in all his activities lay in his own age and its problems." So he proceeds, after a description of the Academy, a brief survey of the writing, and a dicussion of the obscure question of the chronology of the dialogues, to a critical and descriptive consideration of the background, moral and political, literary and philosophical, against which his hero was set in history. In short, while Plato himself is never for long out of the picture, this book is a contribution, and a very valuable one, to our knowledge of the general culture of Greece in the fourth century. The characterisation of individuals important in the story, such for instance as Diogenes and Xenophon, is particularly excellent.

Pablo Casals.
From the bronze bust by Brenda Putnam.
From "Pablo Casals," by Lillian Littlehales (Dent).

ADAM AND EVELYN AT KEW. By Robert Herring. Illustrated by Edward Bawden. 21s. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

The virtuosity of this book is alarming. Having finished reading it, we confess we feel as we have sometimes done on coming away from an exhibition of modernist paintings : when our visual sense has been so consistently shocked that, stepping out into the street again, lo ! all the buses, the shops, the taxis, the people appear unwontedly grotesque. Similarly with Mr. Herring's book. Could one read it in summer and go straight off to Kew, why, there is no knowing what one mightn't see in the folk there, the flowers and the trees. But virtuosity is not all we look for in an author ; and when we have taken proper apprisal of Mr. Herring's ladies like flowers and men like trees walking, what are we left with ? Echo answers, What indeed ? There remain of course Mr. Bawden's drawings ; very individual, a trifle grotesque and more than a trifle satirical. But then Mr. Bawden's drawings could have made a pretty packet all on their own ; they gain little from the prose they accompany here. And what is it all about, this starry prose ? There was a gardener at Kew : Adam. There was a film star, naked in a pond at Kew : Evelyn. How either got there, or why, is all unknown. It was apparently a dream ; Adam's dream. And it all serves to provide Mr. Herring with an opportunity for incredible virtuosity. He knows all about his Kew, never fear. But whether it is likely to prove your Kew is another matter. Perhaps you like such pyrotechnic displays as this, for instance : " You might tell her to speak not, whisper not ; here is fringed pool, fern-grot, God wot--she wouldn't in the least." We have an idea, knowing Mr. Herring's intelligent interest in the films, that he has tried to transfer the medium of the expressionist film to prose.

PABLO CASALS. By Lillian Littlehales. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

With the coming of the gramophone even executant musicians are assured a certain conditioned immortality, and many music lovers who are unaware of Pablo Casals's claims as a conductor, as a pianist, or as one of those who helped to raise Spain's musical standard, have enjoyed his 'cello playing. To the general public indeed Casals is first of all a 'cellist, and probably the finest 'cellist now living. And yet once, when he was climbing a mountain in California and a dislodged rock crushed the first finger of his left hand, his first thought was : " Thank God, I shall never have to play the 'cello again ! " This unexpected reaction is not to be taken as Casals's considered judgment, but merely as a protest against a world which is so apt to object to its great men being great in more than one direction. Miss Lillian Littlehales's frankly hero-worshipping monograph leaves one in no doubt as to Casals's greatness. He was born with no special advantages (except genius) and a good many disadvantages, of which poverty was not the least ; but his strength of character and single-mindedness were such that he conquered one field after another. He was a born pioneer, with that tenacity which reveals the Catalonian rather than the Andalusian, and his attempt to found in Barcelona an orchestra worthy to rank with the other great orchestras of the world only met with success after endless delays, intrigues and almost insuperable obstacles.

THE DRIFT OF CIVILISATION. By C. G. Abbot, Admiral Byrd, Albert Einstein, G. Ferrero, Sir Philip Gibbs, Maxim Gorky, J. B. S. Haldane, Rudolf M. Holzapfel, Dean Inge, Count Keyserling, Paul de Kruif, Martin A. Nexo, Professor Michael Pupin, Professor H. J. Robinson, Bertrand Russell, H. G. Wells. 7s. 6d. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

When that famous American paper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, reached its fiftieth anniversary the editor, Joseph Pulitzer, felt that the occasion demanded a symposium. He therefore " addressed thinkers throughout the world and asked them to write of civilisation " ; with the result that his list of contributors is " like the roster of a world's academy of intellect and action." And well it might be ! Six of the " leading intellects of the world " discourse on the " Future of Man," six more on the " Future of Science " and five are left for the " Future of America." Here's richness, as Mr. Squeers would have said. Information, warning, encouragement and reproof are uttered by these seventeen good men (no woman, it seems, has yet graduated in the " world's academy of intellect and action "), and the reader will be heartened, if he is not cast down, by the tale of shortcomings and by the message of Sir Philip Gibbs on " Death-makers : the Next War." Signor Ferrero reminds us that " the modern world is great, rich, powerful, wise. It can boast of having created the most humane civilisation in history." At the same time " great new things are being prepared in the history of the world and we must be worthy of them." But Martin Andersen Nexo, the Danish communist, insists that in the present state of things " there is little room for the theatre, for æsthetics in general." And " anyway, art in the by and large is a cultural precipitate rather than live culture, and the proletariat's obligations toward life do not lie in that field." After that we are not surprised at Mr. Bertrand Russell's discovery : " One of the really difficult problems of education is to secure in the young the necessary minimum of good behaviour without producing the attitude of anger at the existence of insurmountable obstacles, but this is a problem of conditioning." On no account should Professor Leacock on the " Future of American Humour " be missed.

BRIGHAM YOUNG. By Susa Young Gates. 18s. net. (Jarrolds.)

This biography of the famous leader of the Mormon community, although written by one of his daughters, presents no new material of importance, and because of its sustained loyalty to the subject cannot be regarded as a serious addition to the literature of Mormonism. In a foreword of elaborate and challenging panegyric Mr. Shepstone remarks that Utah "has much to teach this perplexed and harassed age," and would seem to suggest that the religious aspects of Mormonism possessed particular originality or unsuspected virtues. It is long since an accepted commonplace that the quite remarkable success of Utah was due to the commercial, not spiritual genius of Brigham Young. Mr. M. R. Werner, in his altogether admirable biography, has reminded us that the prophet himself remarked: "I am a Yankee; I guess things, and very frequently I guess right." With this quality of a modern business stores, Brigham Young possessed a genuine belief in his cause, and a formidable determination to stamp out all opposition. Fanaticism coupled with autocracy will make any people both united and outwardly impressive in their government and social structure. But fanaticism and autocracy do not necessarily spell permanence or make any contribution to civilisation. Mormonism as a driving faith has long been in decay, and as a creative emotion it has, apart from the charlatan who founded it and the subject of this book who made it a power, produced nothing of æsthetic value to preserve its memory against the slow challenge of the ages.

BAR AND BUSKIN. By E. F. Spence, K.C. 15s. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

Mr. Spence is only one of many famous people of his generation whose careers have progressed along the parallel grooves of letters and the law, but his case is unusual in his refusal to abandon either in favour of the other when circumstances appeared to warrant some such step. Indubitably he has won distinction in both his chosen fields. His juniors of to-day however will be put to shame at the magnitude of working effort revealed as necessary to accomplish that success. What young hopeful in his twenties, and throughout his thirties and his forties too, would condemn himself to a way of life that involved a long day in court, a nightly sessions at the theatre, and thereafter the obligation before bed was earned of turning out as many as three different criticisms for as many papers, with printers' devils waiting on the doorstep till the milkman arrived? There are intimate and very charming references to a happy home life, tragically curtailed by circumstance, as background of these prodigious working activities. Retirement for such a one could not spell a dolce far niente, so we hear much of gardening, golf and fishing in the Newbury retreat, and indications that this gay and gallant volume of reminiscences may not be the last that we shall hear of its distinguished author.

Books of the Month.

From May 15th to June 15th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

ART

DENT.—Artwork. Edited by D. S. MacColl. 2s. 6d.
DUCKWORTH.—Egyptian Sculpture. M. A. Murray. 15s.
JACK.—The Tate Gallery. J. B. Manson. 42s.
OXFORD PRESS.—A Miniature History of European Art. R. H. Wilenski. 4s. 6d.
STUDIO.—Chinese Art. William Cohn. 10s. 6d.—Masters of Etching. Levon West. 5s.

CRITICISM AND BELLES-LETTRES

ALLEN & UNWIN.—Casual Observations. Arthur Ponsonby. 6s.—Polish Romantic Literature. Julian Krzyzanowski. 7s. 6d.
CHATTO & WINDUS.—D. H. Lawrence. Richard Aldington. 1s.

ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—County Anthologies: Cumberland. Walter and Clare Jerrold—Middlesex. T. Michael Pope—Lancashire. Prof. R. H. Case. 3s. 6d. each.
JOHN MURRAY.—Sir Joshua's Nephew. Edited by Susan M. Radcliffe. 10s. 6d.
WISHART.—Sligo. Jack B. Yeats. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL

Fundamental English. P. B. Ballard. Junior Series: Book Three. 1s. 2d. Teacher's Book Three. 2s. 3d.

FICTION

(Price 7s. 6d. each, except where otherwise indicated.)

APPLETON.—The Painted Minx. Robert W. Chambers.
ARTHUR PRESS (London).—The Apes of God. Wyndham Lewis. £3 3s.
GEOFFREY BLES.—Post Mortem. Gilbert Collins.—Mrs. Mason's Guests. Dennis Corry.
JONATHAN CAPE.—Escapade. Evelyn Scott.
CHAPMAN & HALL.—Hell on Earth. F. Haydn Hornsey.
CHATTO & WINDUS.—Vanishing Shadows. J. Maconechy.
COBDEN-SANDERSON.—Corduroy. Adrian Bell.
COLLINS.—Grayson's Girl. Katharine Tynan.—The Hardway Diamonds Mystery. Miles Burton.—Burglars in Bucks. G. D. H. and M. Cole.
CONSTABLE.—Arm's Length. John Metcalfe.
HEATH, CRANTON.—Limousin Folk. Jean Nesmy.
HARRAP.—Coronet. Manuel Komroff. 8s. 6d.—Free. Blair Miles.—Galanty Gold. Victor MacClure.
HEINEMANN.—His Master's Voice. Ivy Low.—Gondolas Pass. Helen Mackay. 6s.—The Loveable Outlaw. Geoffrey Williamson.—My Lord Lucifer. Bertha Selous.—At All Costs. Richard Aldington. 1s.—Other Man's Saucer. J. Keith Winter.—Iron Man. W. R. Burnett.—Robert Peckham. Maurice Baring.
HODDER & STOUGHTON.—Spider Web. Alice Campbell.—The Thirty Thieves. B. Dyke Acland.
HUTCHINSON.—The Gleam. Mary Forrester.—The Arches of the Years. Ethel Boileau.—Swan House. Baroness Van Hutten.—Broken Arcs. Pat Vian.
JARROLDS.—Memorial To George. Anonymous.—Green Timber. James Oliver Curwood.—The Yellow Mistletoe. Walter S. Masterman.
KNOPF.—Gladiator. Philip Wylie.
JOHN LANE.—The Crystal Beads Murder. Annie Haynes.
JOHN LONG.—Six Merry Mummers. Amy J. Baker.—Miracles of the Turf. Campbell Russell. 5s.—The Padgate Mystery. Edward Charles Reed.
ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—The Car of Crœsus. Ernest Poole.
METHUEN.—Murder in the Village. John Skinner. 3s. 6d.—The Low Road. Hugo Morrison. 3s. 6d.
JOHN MURRAY.—Tony Potter. T. J. Morrison.
NELSON.—Speed Fever. Barry Lyndon.
ERIC PARTRIDGE.—The Seventh Bowl. "Miles."
STANLEY PAUL.—The Man Without a Necktie. Arbib-Hauser.—Outside Heaven's Gates. Ivy M. Clayton.—New Leaf. Alan Bendle.
RICHARDS.—The Case Books of X37. Major A. J. Dawson.
ALSTON RIVERS.—The Dark Secret. Alison Vivian.
SECKER.—A Quiet Street. Michael Ossorgin.
SELWYN & BLOUNT.—To What Red Hell. Guy Brown. 5s.—Lunatic Love. Henry Connolly.
SWAN PRESS.—Chameleons. Sydney Alberga.
WARD, LOCK.—White Hands Cannot Offend. A. R. and R. K. Weekes.—A Clue in Wax. Fred M. White.—Jim Trelawney. Ottwell Binns.—The Unexpected Daughter. Paul Trent. 3s. 6d.—Fishers of Men. Carlton Dawe.—Mr. Buffum. Hugh De Sélincourt.—A Moorside Feud. Harold Bindloss.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND TRANSLATIONS

ALLEN & UNWIN.—Three Masters: Balzac, Dickens, Dostoievsky. Stefan Zweig. 12s. 6d.—Tyrol Under the Axe of Italian Fascism. Dr. Edward Reut-Nicolussi. 12s. 6d.
ERNEST FLAMMARION (Paris).—Russia. Henri Barbusse.
HUTCHINSON.—The Calas Case. Marc Chassaigne. 18s.
NASH & GRAYSON.—Espionage. H. R. Berndorff. 10s. 6d.
RIDER.—Man's Highest Purpose. Karel Weinfurter. 10s. 6d.
SECKER.—Women and Monks. Josef Kallinikov. 15s.
SHEED & WARD.—Pascal. Jacques Chevalier. 15s.
HUMPHREY TOULMIN.—The Human Pair in the Work of Thomas Hardy. Pierre d'Exideuil. 10s. 6d.
LES PRESSES UNIVERSITAIRES DE FRANCE (Paris).—Le Vrai Ami Du Traducteur Anglais-Français et Français-Anglais. Félix Boillot.
WILLIAMS & NORGATE.—The Germans at Versailles, 1919. Victor Schiff. 7s. 6d.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

ALLEN & UNWIN.—Company I Have Kept. Henry Salt. 10s.
BLACKIE.—Scotland: The Ancient Kingdom. Donald A. Mackenzie. 15s.
THORNTON BUTTERWORTH.—The Ways of Yesterday. A. M. W. Stirling. 18s.
CAMBRIDGE PRESS.—The Small Years. Frank Kendon. 6s.
CHAPMAN & HALL.—A Hundred Years of Publishing. Arthur Waugh. 15s.
DUCKWORTH.—By Way of the Sahara. Owen Tweedy. 12s. 6d.
EFFICIENCY MAGAZINE.—Kelvin. Herbert N. Casson. 7s. 6d.
MARTIN HOPKINSON.—Penultima. Sir Alfred Hopkinson. 18s.
HUTCHINSON.—Raffles in Real Life. George Smithson, alias "Gentleman George." 12s. 6d.—Swaraj: The Problem of India. Capt. J. E. Ellam. 12s. 6d.—The Romance of the Derby Stakes. Alan Macey. 10s. 6d.
JARROLDS.—The Underworld of Paris. Alfred Morain. 18s.—Confessions and Impressions. Ethel Mannin. 10s. 6d.
JOHN LANE.—Across Iceland. Olive Murray Chapman. 15s.
LIPPINCOTT.—John Jacob Astor. Arthur D. Howden Smith. $3.50.
SAMPSON LOW.—Amy Johnson. Charles Dixon. 3s. 6d.
METHUEN.—Pompeii and Herculaneum. C. G. Ellaby. 6s.—Oriental Memories. Friedrich Rosen. 15s.
STANLEY PAUL.—Women Bluebeards. Elliott O'Donnell. 18s.—Good-Bye to the Battle-Fields. H. A. Taylor. 21s.
RICHARDS.—It Isn't Far From London. S. P. B. Mais. 7s. 6d.
SELWYN & BLOUNT.—The Prodigious Marshal. Edmund B. d'Auvergne. 18s.
SHELDON PRESS.—The Royal Navy. Geoffrey Parratt. 7s. 6d.
TARAPOREVALA (Bombay).—Commercial Policy of the Moguls. D. Pant. Rs.6.

JUVENILE

BAILEY.—More About Jane. N. Gurney Callier. 2s. 6d.
MURPHY (Simla).—Boomba. Hugh A. Brinkworth.

MISCELLANEOUS

ALLEN & UNWIN.—Beyond Physics. Sir Oliver Lodge.—Your Character From Your Handwriting. C. Harry Brooks. 3s. 6d.
BAINES & SCARSBROOK.—Snapshots of Africa. Walter Reynolds. 1s.
BALE, SONS & DANIELSSON.—Civilisation and the Cripple. Frederick Watson. 10s. 6d.
BELL.—Historical Association Publications, 1928–9. 1s. each leaflet.
BURNS, OATES & WASHBOURNE.—In Praise of Divine Love. Alice Lady Lovat. 6s.
PETER DAVIES.—War Books. Cyril Falls. 10s. 6d.

HEINEMANN.—Woodfill of the Regulars. Lowell Thomas. 10s. 6d.—The Baffle Book. Edited by F. Tennyson Jesse. 2s. 6d.
HODDER & STOUGHTON.—Getting Wickets. C. V. Grimmett. 3s. 6d.
HUTCHINSON.—Frogs Don't Grow Feathers. B. L. Jacot. 7s. 6d.
JOHN LANE.—What's Wrong With Your Game. H. B. Martin. 7s. 6d.—Law-Breakers. Charles Kingston. 12s. 6d.
WERNER LAURIE.—Mental Radio. Upton Sinclair. 8s. 6d.
LIPPINCOTT.—An Hour On Health. Morris Fishbein. $1.00.
SAMPSON LOW.—Lawn Tennis. H. W. Austin. 5s.
ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Famous Shipwrecks. Frank H. Shaw. 12s. 6d.
METHUEN.—The Archæology of Middlesex and London. C. E. Vulliamy. 10s. 6d.—The Intelligent Man's Guide to Marriage and Celibacy. Juanita Whitefield Tanner. 10s. 6d.—The Science of Folk-lore. Alexander Haggerty Krappe. 10s. 6d.
MORLEY & MITCHELL KENNERLEY.—Some Craftie Arts. Jan Gordon. 5s. 6d.
GEORGE PHILIP.—The Seal Princess. C. A. Dawson Scott. 8d.
PUTNAMS.—The Power and Secret of the Jesuits. René Fülöp-Miller. 21s.
RIDER.—My Larger Life. Violet Burton. 5s.—The Story of Psychic Science. Hereward Carrington. 24s.
SEELEY, SERVICE.—Lawn Tennis. A. Wallis Myers. 12s. 6d.
ELLIOT STOCK.—Beyond Our Ken. Mrs. Arthur Stallard. 5s.
STOCKWELL.—Humour in the Schoolroom. Robert Strachan. 2s. 6d.
TWO WORLDS PUBLISHING CO.—Sweet Corn From Heaven. Richard Arthur Bush. 3s. 6d.
VALENTINE (Dundee).—Humorous Scottish War Stories. Allan Junior. 1s. 6d.
WILLIAMS & NORGATE.—Mediæval Internationalism. R. F. Wright. 7s. 6d.—Cremation. Florence G. Fidler. 2s. 6d.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

CHATTO & WINDUS.—Michael and Mary. A. A. Milne. 5s.
DUCKWORTH.—Plays. John Galsworthy. 7s.
JOHN LANE.—Scandal At Court. Graham Rawson. 2s. 6d.

POETRY

ERNEST BENN.—The Collected Poems of Edward Thompson. 10s. 6d.
CORNISH (Birmingham).—The Pool of Silence. Dallas Kenmare. 1s. 6d.
DUCKWORTH.—The Collected Poems of Edith Sitwell. 8s. 6d.
MITRE PRESS.—The Spring Anthology, 1930. 10s. 6d.
COLON O'LOUGHLIN (Dublin).—Poets in Paradise. W. P. Ryan. 1s.
HUMPHREY TOULMIN.—Mystery and Tragedy. Sturge Moore. 7s. 6d.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

DENT.—The Free Church Sacrament and Catholic Ideals. T. W. Coleman. 2s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

CASSELL.—Arnold Bennett: Journal, 1929. 7s. 6d.
CONSTABLE.—The Listeners and Other Poems. Walter de la Mare. 3s. 6d.
JOHN LANE.—Montes the Matador.—Elder Conklin. Frank Harris. 3s. 6d. each.
WERNER LAURIE.—The Origins of Popular Superstitions, Customs and Ceremonies. T. Sharper Knowlson. 7s. 6d.
CECIL PALMER.—The London of Dickens. Walter Dexter. 3s. 6d.
PUTNAMS.—Portrait of the Labour Party. Egon Wertheimer. 5s.

The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—Burton

THE RIGHT WAY TO COLLECT.

IT is quite evident that there is a serious interest in book-collecting, judging from the many letters on the subject that reach us from time to time. Most correspondents, while shrewdly enough recognising the commercial value of first edition collecting, are deeply interested in the higher aspects of the matter; which surely means that the standard of literary conception has not only developed in the individual mind, but has advanced collectively more than is generally recognised. This is as it should be. It is the only satisfactory evolution of collecting; for there is no other way of arriving at a true valuation of what books are worth gathering to ourselves, and what are to be rejected.

Even so, there are many who are yet in the elementary stage of collecting, and it is to them that we are venturing to offer these suggestions. To begin collecting is to discover a new and happy field of contentment and interest. Almost we envy those who are starting out upon so pleasing an experience. For them it is a field of pleasant anticipation—a place where many good things will be discovered. Sometimes there will be disappointment, which will make the gems upon which they must surely come, as wisdom and understanding arises quietly and convincingly, all the more precious. Time will bring that understanding, and with it a pleasure of mental experience rarely to be found in any other field of collecting.

Old Angling Lithograph in Colours.

From "Old Books and Prints": List No. 66, from Mr. Harold Hill, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Collecting those books which are known to most people is the easy way, if the pocket is deep and long—for they require much money. The real art of finding first editions is to be reached by way of a knowledge of the intrinsic worth of an author. What value indeed is there in the so-called guides as to what to collect, in the urgings that "Walter de la Mare is worth buying." Of course he is—at a price. Or "there is a boom in Wells," or "Hardy is a safe purchase," or "George Moore is now being collected," or "Ernest Powys is a writer who will always have a certain following." And so forth. These things are what we read lately in a notable weekly.

There is no virtue or, to be fair, there is less virtue in collecting those writers whose fame is already established, and whose first editions everyone is trying to find at low prices. We do not condemn the suggestions. They have their value. But it is easy to recommend authors to the book-collector whom everyone, providing he has enough of this world's material goods, is collecting. There is little art in that, so long as your bank balance is big enough to foot the bill.

Real book-collecting is more than that. It starts from much earlier beginnings. Money ad lib. for book-collecting robs it of all the joys of the hunt. Robs it of individual valuation, of personal selection and judging. What we need is a sense that enables us to select those whom the affluents have not yet discovered. Doing it this way provides a literary ecstasy that cannot be measured by the riches of a Crœsus. There is no monetary possession that can offset the inestimable joy that comes to the modest man who, out of his inner soul, chooses the author of to-morrow, by reason of his long and persistent and earnest study of literary standards. And all this can be accomplished by the man of small means, as well as by the man of many possessions.

Those who would show us how to collect should not, in their well-meaning phrases, tell us that this and that author is being collected, when it is obvious to all. It is easy for all of us to be obvious, but it is quite another thing for us to be distinctive. This is the harder way. But it is the right, the constructive way, and the expert—let him be modest about it, knowing his own limitations—should do his best, if he would, by adventuring to give a little constructive help. He must, if he would be respected, do his level best to point the way to those—at present—unknown authors, who will, we believe, truly and faithfully be collected on the morrow.

And so we must justify our preachings.

For instance: I wonder how many readers of "The Collector" know anything about the work, very frugal at present, of A. M. Ritchie? She has written two stories, which have been recognised as a little more distinctive than most modern novels. Not much notice has been taken of them, except by those whose literary vision is not limited by a narrow horizon. And yet there is something very real in the mind that conceived and wrote these books. When it is realised that they come from the Hogarth Press, with which the Woolfs are associated, it will be realised that Miss Ritchie's work has been approved by the best judges. Even in the case of Mrs. Woolf herself, only a few collectors are awakening to her promise of greatness. Miss Ritchie's books may take time to reach high values, both literary and economic—but for me they already promise a future that will surely materialise.

There are many others close upon the door of the inner house of literature. We have here a dozen names of whom we will write as time and space and pleasure come to us.

THE MARKET.

This month there is a sale of a number of very interesting manuscripts of Tennyson at Messrs. Sotheby's. Some of these manuscripts are important, and all are, we understand, autograph. Naturally the copyright in the material is reserved. One of the items is a notebook containing a number of very early poems, and another is "The Devil and the Lady." This was written by Tennyson when he was fourteen years old, and incidentally published a few months since. Also some 1,200 lines of "The Princess" will be put up.

Since we wrote our last notes, the Poet Laureate, Robert Bridges, has passed on, and left almost a great reputation behind him. He was a purist in style, with a standard that no one could question, unless it were himself. At present his books are not very closely sought for, except by those who cherish the noblest form of expression, which can always be found in Robert Bridges's work. His "Testament of Beauty" will some day command an exceedingly high price. I suppose one can buy a copy of the first ordinary edition for four or five pounds, and the limited for anything from £10 upwards.

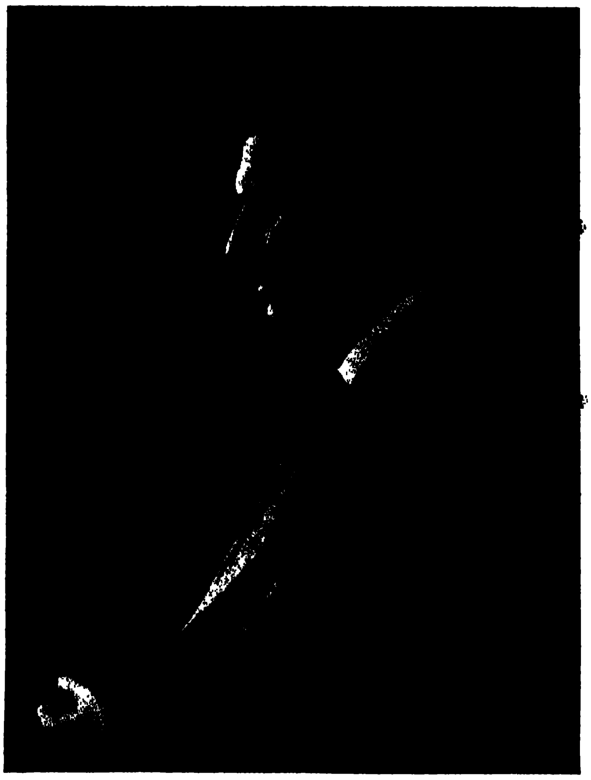
What a pity it is, that so many of our valuable historic documents should go to U.S.A. A few weeks since, the letter written by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Leicester was sold at auction to an American buyer for £580. If ever a document ought to have gone to the British Museum this one should have done, for there are not many personally written letters of Queen Elizabeth available.

Some interesting letters were also sold lately, all fetching good prices, notably a Dickens letter, describing his visits to the American Senate and House of Representatives, £480; a three and a half page letter from Jane Austen to Miss Martha Lloyd, £1,000; and a manuscript of Shelley's poem, "Swifter far than Summer's Flight," £820.

Naturally much attention has been focused upon Mr. Masefield since he was appointed Poet Laureate. It is a worthy selection. Mr. Masefield has been, and always will be, I suppose, a varied writer. One has only to look at the long list of his books to realise this. Mr. Masefield was widely interviewed at the time of his putting on the mantle of the Poet Laureate, and we caught new views of him. I expect, now that he is Poet Laureate, we shall find the value of his first editions appreciating. Not that they will rise to the high prices that obtained some years since. His "Salt Water Ballads" will always be a precious item—£40 to £50—because of its early date, and the fact that only a hundred or so were printed. Mr. Masefield has a great love of the sea, as many will recall who know something of his writings. His "Sea Fever" is always being quoted. One interviewer asked Mr. Masefield if he did not find the popularity of the poem somewhat burdensome. "The fact is," answered Mr. Masefield, "that the poem does not seem to belong to me. I am able to think of 'Sea Fever,' and of everything else I have written, in a spirit of absolute detachment. Once I have composed a poem it ceases to concern me."

When the Collected Edition of the works of Mr. Shaw was formally announced to the public, there was a great rush for sets. The publishers have not had an easy task to apportion the sets. We have ourselves failed to secure a copy! Only a thousand sets are being made. There will be about thirty volumes, octavo in size, and many will contain matter that has not before been published. The first four volumes will be published soon. The price per volume will, it is expected at the moment of writing, be a guinea. Anyone who is successful enough to procure a set will have a profitable possession, for there is no doubt at all that it will rapidly go up in price.

Here are some Limited Editions worth careful consideration:



"The Three Wayfarers." By Thomas Hardy.
"Theme and Variations." By James Stephens.
"North of Suez." By William McFee.
"The Ecstasy of Angus." By Liam O'Flaherty.
"At All Costs." By Richard Aldington.
"Soames and the Flag." By John Galsworthy.
"Moby Dick." By Herman Melville.
"Tales." By Edgar Allan Poe.
"Typefounding." By Simon-Pierre Fournier.
"Homage to Meleager." By Humbert Wolfe.
"Etchings and Drypoints of Arthur Briscoe." By James Lever.
"The Jealous Ghost." By L. A. G. Strong.
"Adrian Glynde." By Martin Armstrong.
"Arthur Symons's Confessions: A Study in Pathology."
"Salammbô." By Gustav Flaubert. Illustrated by Alexander King.
"Seventeen Letters of Lord Byron to an Unknown Lady." Edited by Dr. Walter Edwin Peck.
"Brief Candles." By Aldous Huxley.
"Between the Lines." By H. M. Tomlinson.
"Elinor Barley." By Sylvia Townsend Warner.

Of the making of limited editions there seems to be no end. And there is unwisdom in anyone who buys all and sundry. Some will suit one type of book-collector and some another. Limited editions are made to meet a demand; but they are not all justified. I watch my own purchases as closely as I watch the domestic outgoings! You will mix your purchases, earmarking some monies for ordinary editions and some for limiteds. Apply the same conclusions in book-collecting as do those shrewd gentlemen who go a-hunting in stocks and shares. Mix your investments. It is the best way, for both rich and poor and the middleman in this world's possessions.

Looking through the prices obtained at a recent important sale that included rare and valuable works both old and modern, it is evident that at the time of writing the market is depressed. Now is the time for collectors to draw upon their knowledge, to rely upon their taste and to make their purchases. The present low market prices will not always obtain. Before long there will be a distinct and definite advance. There are already signs.

We noticed at an American sale the following books were sold, and at prices that indicate the maintenance of high figures for certain kinds of old and rare books and first editions: Bennett's "Old Wives' Tale," $420; Dickens's "Christmas Carol," an uncut trial proof copy, $3,250; Hardy's "Far from the Madding Crowd," two vols., $1,000; Hardy's "Dynasts," three vols., $2,200; and Kipling's "Departmental Ditties," $1,025. The original MS. of Stevenson's "The Wrong Box," 147 pages, fetched $4,000.

Portrait by Walter Benington.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson.

Collectors might well look out for "A Book of Cats," being twenty drawings by Fougita, Prose Poems by Michael Joseph, S. A. Jacobs designer. There are to be 500 copies. Fougita will sign one of the drawings. The book, which emanates from America, is to be published at $25.00. Mr. Joseph is managing director of Messrs. Curtis Brown, the literary agents.

There is shortly to be issued "The Decameron of Giovanni Boccaccio," in two volumes. This new translation, by Frances Winwar, comes from New York. Mr. Burton Rascoe has written an introduction, and Mr. T. M. Cleland is the illustrator. And there is yet another one—translated by Richard Aldington, who lives in Paris nowadays. This edition is beautifully illustrated by Jean de Bosschere. It is in two volumes, and there are only 500 sets for sale in England.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson has been engaged upon a very important work for some time. The Soncino Press announce that they will publish it in November, in two volumes, and collectors should be sure of getting a copy. The title is "The Anatomy of Bibliomania." We are glad this is coming out, because Mr. Jackson—you will remember the charm of his "Eighteen Nineties," which we all ought to possess—does not write enough books. In this new work Mr. Jackson has accomplished a big task, in that he has traced the significance of books in the lives of men through all the curious and varied ramifications of their influence. The two volumes will comprise no less than 300,000 words. There are to be two editions—a limited one at twenty-eight shillings and a signed edition, also limited, of course, at six guineas. We shall refer to this again shortly.

It will interest our readers to learn that the first American edition of "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," with its forty-two illustrations by John Tenniel, is worth quite a nice sum. A copy, beautifully bound by Sangorski & Sutcliffe, was offered the other day for $250.00, roughly some £50. It was published in 1866 by the Appletons.

Although first edition prices are low these days, some very good sums were paid for rare items at recent sales. But quite a number were knocked down to dealers at moderate figures: Kipling's "The Second Jungle Book," £4; Stephens's "Here Are Ladies," £1; Barrie's "Meredith," £3; Kipling's "Just So Stories," £4 10s.; Shaw's "John Bull's Other Island," £1; Barrie's "Auld Licht Idylls," £39; Wells's "New Machiavelli," 18s.; Galsworthy's "To Let," £1. These will serve as examples of the low prices obtaining, compared with previous sales of the same book. But some of these items were not absolutely in "mint" state.

The Pegasus Press, Paris, is issuing two magnificent volumes, at the price of nine guineas, of a book entitled "Spanish Illumination," by J. Dominguez Bordona, Keeper of the Department of Manuscripts in the Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid. There will be only 100 pages of text, but 160 plates in collotype. The specimen plate before us is a very fine reproduction.

Mr. A. Edward Newton is one of America's famous collectors. He has a magnificent library at his home in Philadelphia, where there happily rests upon his shelves some priceless first editions, notably a number of Johnson firsts, among no end of other extremely scarce and precious items. Mr. Newton is not only a collector of books; he is a great and true lover of them. If you have ever read his delightful "Amenities of Bookselling" you will understand what we mean. This work by the way is fetching high prices in U.S.A., and the first edition will be very valuable one of these days. You cannot get a copy under fifty dollars. As a labour of love, Mr. Newton has written a book entitled "Thomas Hardy, Novelist or Poet." It is published by the author at $10.00, and the proceeds of the sale are to be paid over to the Committee for the Hardy Memorial. Mr. Newton, who always writes with so much charm, owns a great many Hardy letters, as well as the manuscript of "Far From the Madding Crowd." This new volume, "Thomas Hardy: Novelist or Poet," is decidedly worth collecting. There are reproduced in it many facsimiles of Hardy's writing.

GATHERING CATALOGUES.

Too few people quite realise the pleasures of catalogues. We never tire of reading them. There is always a romance in the entitled items in a nicely arranged catalogue. And the antiquarian bookseller has so much innate taste, that he presents them to us in a manner that must ever intrigue the imagination. More than that, he sets out his wares in so delectable a way, as to lure the silver from our pockets and the treasury note from our case. But who begrudges a few of these things for those gentle books which beckon us on his shelves? Not you and I, indeed.

Then let us look at the lists which follow. Beyond the poor praising that we have given them, there are thousands of others, and divers kind, for which the only knowledge will come from a reading of the catalogue by the pilgrim himself. And the lists are to be had for the asking.

"Give me good catalogues, sir," wrote a pleasant collector, "and I will give you a happy content."

That was a nice thing to say, and I understand, as many of my readers understand too, what he meant when, in his quietude of mind, he bid me know that he will give happy content in exchange for the pleasure of reading an alluring catalogue. Too little thought is sometimes given to these catalogues; for many are as finely made and edited as any book may be. For instance, there is one before me now that is a superfine thing. It is the noblest catalogue that I think has ever reached me from one of our famous antiquarian houses. It came to hand by the faithful postman, just a little while before I began these monthly notes, which always give me so much pleasurable anticipation as I approach the time for their writing. My small and modest letter-box was not wide enough to receive this Catalogue, which surely, more than any other that I know, deserves a capital first letter. So the good post messenger of His Majesty had to call my maid to open the door. That parcel was to give me many moments of bibliographic delight. It came from my friends, the Maggs, who are booksellers appointed to His Majesty King George V. A Grand List this: a superb List. One that brings a great dignity to my library. It contains no end of magnificent full-page plates, some of which are coloured. It measures nearly thirteen inches by close upon ten. The title of this Catalogue is "A Collection of French Eighteenth Century Illustrated Books." The plates, of which, as I have said, there is a goodly array, are after Moreau le Jeune, Boucher, Choffard, Cochin, Coypel, Marillier, Eisen, Fessard, Greuze, St. Aubin, Gravelot and Monnet. The 271 books described in this magnificent List of 144 pages are all "in superb contemporary bindings" by such famous binders as Derome, Bisiaux, Douceur, Padeloup, Bozerain, Tessier, Mouillie, Meslant and others. You will be more than interested in knowing that it is seventy years since this notable House of Maggs, renowned throughout the world, first took down its shutters. Literally I suppose—for those were the days when shutters were an essential part of the shop. And this Catalogue has been issued in commemoration of that momentous day. If I began to talk about the many wonderful books in this List, I should sit far into the night; but the light that I should burn would be worthily spent. The values of these books range from a few pounds to hundreds of pounds. I wish I could discover the printer of this elegant volume; for he deserves more than a word of praise. He is entitled to a well-being of mind, to some of that happy content that my kindly correspondent wrote me of. How could it be otherwise, when he has made so fine a work! Our congratulations to him; our respectful salutations to the Maggs' for the idea, and my thanks to them for sending me the Catalogue.

I have written about the low prices that obtain among the first editions. There is no need for disappointment. They will remain low for a time, but it is doubtful if they will come back to last year's high figures. Oddly enough, those prices were, like stocks and shares, somewhat artificial. The present prices are too low. When the upward trend begins again they will, I am sure, rise to their natural market value. An instance of the present low prices is to be found in a list that has recently reached me from W. H. Smith & Son, of Southport. There are some 352 items in it, and every one is priced at an extremely moderate figure. Truth to tell, the fall in prices is to be noted in pretty well all catalogues. There are the Dobells' list, which shows the present conditions in their capital catalogue which they regularly post to me. This is list No. 363. I notice some of the much-sought-after Blunden books. Also they have a Norman Douglas entry of "South Wind" for £30, many Dunsany items, and lots of other alluring things.

Catalogue No. 40, issued by J. D. Miller, is a good list of modern books, first editions and association copies, and a number of works of general interest. I am particularly attracted by a number of books by W. W. Jacobs who, mark you, is being collected, and going up in price; some excellent copies of Sheila Kaye-Smith, Priestley, Galsworthy and others. Readable catalogues of modern first editions have been issued by Herbert Tremayne and M. E. Hartley, and in both cases there is very distinctive evidence of the low market values that we are finding everywhere just now. So now is the time to buy; because I am confident that, before long, the prices of all first editions will begin to appreciate again.

Messrs. W. M. Murphy reached us with their 253rd list. I have known them some years, but I must admit I was surprised at the high number of issue. The list covers Remainders—there's a lot to say, one of these days, about Remainders, and in good time we will say it—and a considerable collection of first editions. I was particularly attracted by a dozen or so books by Charles Lever, whom we wish people these days would not forget to read.

One discovers many new gestures in studying catalogues. Henry Start & Sons, for instance, sent me recently, and I was most glad to have it, what they describe as "Black Country Book Bulletin," No. 48. But there is no blackness in it—not a tittle. It contains a list of excellent books, and many standard sets, besides a number of modern first editions.

Three catalogues are lying on my table that call for somewhat special analysis. A largish one is that issued by Elkin Mathews: Catalogue No. 31. I shall use this as a kind of textbook. Anyhow, it will get dog-eared before long, because I am bound to refer to it a great deal. Which is some indication of my regard for it. There are over 1,900 entries in it, and I should say that I had marked for comment several hundred. If I began to make a selection of these, I should be unfair to the others—for there are no end of fascinating books in pleasing array, at worthy prices, in this estimable No. 31 catalogue. Mr. Muir's "Notes for Collectors" are admirable. He has, happily I am sure for the firm, recently joined them. These notes are the key to the right collecting temperament. Do get a copy of this list, and I shall feel happier, because I've turned my mind against the very seductive temptation to start writing about some of these nineteen hundred books. See for yourself if I am not right in my judgment, that here are good gatherings of the best of modern firsts.

The second list is entitled "First Editions of Modern Authors, and Books from Private Presses," recently acquired by Ingpen & Stonehill. The list belongs to a new series, and is numbered 17. Not a long list this, but though quantity may be on the short side, the quality, as one would expect from this firm, is of a high standard. There are, I notice, moderate in price, books by R. H. Mottram, Robert Bridges, A. E. Coppard, John Galsworthy, Robert Graves, Arthur Machen, C. E. Montague and a number of items from private presses. There are one or two books by authors whose books I would advise readers to buy, as they come across them: Martin Armstrong, H. E. Bates, Helen Beauclerk, Rhys Davies, Eric Gill, Sean O'Casey and Con O'Leary. Some of these I shall write about at greater length, one of these days.

Douglas Cleverdon's New List—his fourth—makes the third catalogue I wanted to mention specially. It consists of five hundred modern first editions, and there is a very nice foreword from Mr. Cleverdon in this admirably produced list. The layout, as we say in Fleet Street, is very pleasing. Each author is set in the middle of the line in capitals, and the page is indeed clear and pleasant to the eye. And Mr. Cleverdon is obviously a bookman, as well as a bookseller; for he has set up a stock of books for you and me to purchase that would please the most fastidious of bibliophiles.

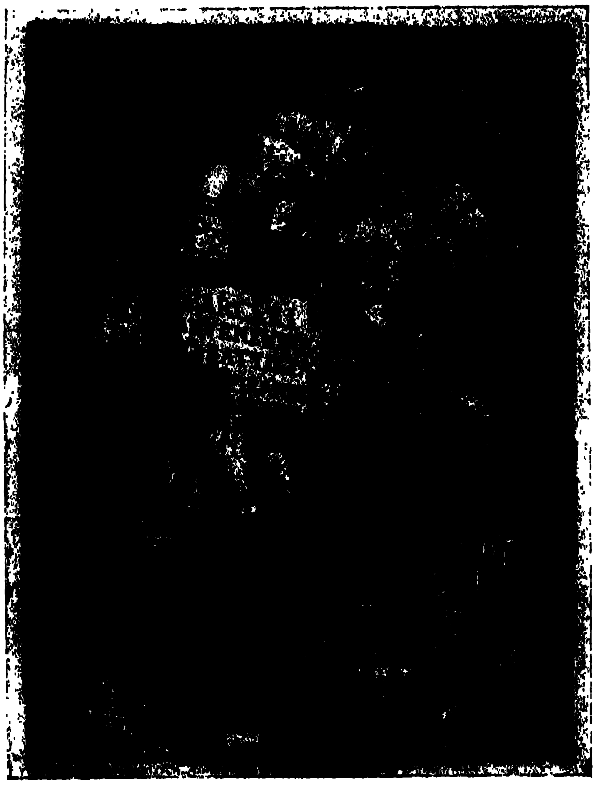
Time passes, and these notes, desultory and scrappy, but friendly, have to be set up in an hour or two, and they have to fly across London to the printer who is greedily awaiting them; so I must pass rapidly by, with just a nod and an apology to a list or so that I have kept to the last because, between you and me, they came to me last of all. It doesn't mean that they are of least value. Dear me, no. There are goodly things to be delved for, and luckily found in them. Two hail from London, and the others from America. Mr. Quaritch delivered to me his list of "Rare and Valuable Books Relating to Geography, Voyages, Travels and Navigation." I dare say you have noticed how this kind of catalogue sets me tingling, and restlessly wandering in spirit about the corners of the earth; to which I would journey across seas, no longer strange to us as they were to Frobisher and Drake and his kidney. Well, I can't go; so there you are. Perhaps you can't go either. Let's go building galleys for our adventuring in the titles and descriptions in this Quaritch Catalogue.

Then Maggs have issued a list (541) of "French Books Before A.D. 1700" A very useful catalogue And another issue (540) of books about "English Literature and History from the Fifteenth to the Eighteenth Century." . . . The American catalogues come nicely packed, and in friendly manner, from Goodspeed's Book Shop, Boston; and the White Rare Book Co, Miami. I think I shall have to reserve these for a little further talk next month. One is a list of autographs.

CONCENTRATION IN COLLECTING.



It is not a bit of good treating the business of book-collecting in a casual manner. Anyone who does that will never make a success of it.

The collecting of books, no matter what form it takes or what aspect of it is pursued, must be done with enthusiasm and with wisdom. Sometimes, when we become enthusiastic, discretion flies out of the window But that is not enthusiasm. It is merely ungoverned and misdirected impulse. There is, unfortunately, a good deal of this to be found among the pseudo-collectors. Those who catch at the straws of it, and miss the beauties underlying its pleasantness and its charm.

Book-collecting of the highest order, which is the right kind of book-collecting, only gains a reasonable end after much study and concentration. In saying this, the reader may fear that it is a hard task, and possibly not nearly so attractive as we would make out. On the contrary, the harder the work involved, the greater the delight. One is always finding a new facet for it; a new and pleasing road. Our quest, whether it be for the precious and the high priced, or just an inexpensive item, we must pursue both with equal concentration. No set of rules may be laid upon the table of our mind as to how we shall do this concentration. But it is necessary to say that we must steep ourselves in our great and glorious literature. Through this golden portal comes intellectual emancipation. Let the collector work out for himself his own valuation, study planes of literary movements, watch the growth and development of new coteries, analyse the work of untried but promising new writers, use the antiquarian catalogue in a way that the student would use a textbook; but above all, let him set up his own standards—so long as those standards are built upon the rock of knowledge, of wise enthusiasm.

The buying and selling of first editions for profit is all so much like buying and selling of stocks and shares. The wise man buys wisely and holds his investments, if he has no interest in risking his fortune in the hope of capital appreciation. Those who go in for stocks and shares for the latter purpose, sometimes in their haste buy on a rising market—and then the prices take a turn downwards. Or a man holds on too long, and he loses in that way. If an individual means to make money out of first editions, he needs to buy very carefully, for one can never be sure how the market is going to move. Many people rushed to buy certain books last year that were fetching high prices, and now they are very sad when they see them on their shelves, and realise that if they sold them now they would lose at least half what they paid for them, whereas they had hoped to make a hundred per cent. profit.

Piranesi, Carceri (The Prisons), 1750.

From Messrs. E. Parsons & Sons' Illustrated Catalogue of Books on Art.

This is not the way to buy and sell. Buy at the beginning, when an author is unknown to the majority, but who is known to you. After long study, you have reached a point of literary discrimination which helps you to guess with some shrewdness about an author's future.

That is the way to make a big profit. But it is the hardest possible thing to do. Besides, when you have come to that point, you'll find it even a harder task to sell your old friends. The book is a much more valuable thing then, than the big margin of profit. It is a way books have with us.

A MEDIÆVAL MORALIST.*

The moralists and preachers of the Middle Ages were apt in telling illustration. They loved to enforce attention to their admonitions by rejoicing anecdotes. As they possessed a robust conscience they were not particularly squeamish as to the propriety of these narratives. If they could secure and hold the attention of their audience, better things might be added unto them. Did the mediæval moralist think it necessary to urge his readers not to beat their wives mercilessly on insufficient provocation, he would apply his text by an anecdote of the inconvenience suffered by the husband of a wife with a broken nose or a blind eye. "It is hard to keep a wife whom everyone admires, and if no one admires her it is hard to live with her yourself." Mediæval moralists so abound in illustration that the light is obscured by their richly painted windows. This passion of the Middle Ages for parable could be illustrated from many of their most popular books—"The Gesta Romanorum" for instance. It is very evident also in the volume under notice, "The Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry," printed and published in a most tasteful form as the first venture of the Verona Society, to which we offer our hearty congratulations and wish every success. The Society could have commenced its career with no fresher and less hackneyed work. "The Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry" contains the advice of a French mediæval father to his three daughters on many delicate and interesting topics, with anecdotes appropriate in his judgment to the occasion. Geoffrey de La Tour Landry was an Angevin gentleman, living in the fourteenth century, who after some experience of war with the English settled down on his estate and devoted himself to his family. For the edification of this family of two sons and three daughters, and undeterred by the fact that he was a widower, the good knight wrote two books profitable for admonition, for rebuke and for instruction in righteousness. He was obviously the possessor of a remarkably fine library, and was assisted in his labours by two priests and two clerks of his household. These extracted such passages from the Scriptures, from history and from classical sources as were suitable for his purpose, and to these the knight added from a copious and well-stored memory. It is unfortunate that the manual for the edification of his sons is lost. That for the daughters remains, and indeed "was the manual of deportment for girls of birth in France, England, and such parts of Germany as were relatively civilised, from the year of its appearance to well in the Renaissance." The popularity of the original caused it to be translated into English in the reign of Henry VI, and later on a version was prepared by Caxton for the service of his press. The version used by the Verona Society is based on that issued by the Early English Text Society in 1906, with considerable portions taken bodily from Caxton. The more archaic terms have been simplified in the interest of the unlettered student, and a glossary added to explain such as remain in the text. Above all an introduction is provided by that admirable scholar, Mr. Wyndham Lewis, abounding to the full in his whims, whams and temperamental qualities, and telling the general reader precisely what it is necessary for him to know.

The object of the Knight of La Tour Landry in writing his book was to press upon his daughters the cultivation of those Christian virtues which make not only for salvation in the next world but also for prosperity in this. Temporal success and eternal felicity are like a tangled yarn inextricably mingled together. Anecdotes abound, for instance, to prove that the grace of courtesy leads a woman to queenship on earth, as well as to the Kingdom of Heaven. In spite of the deep and evident piety of the writer, it is clear that the virtues regarded by him as so desirable in woman may be considered as the modest ideal of the mediæval husband. For generations men have pressed upon women gratuitous advice as to their dress, the making up of the face, the government of their eyes, and the danger of applying hot and rebellious liquors to the blood—advice which woman consistently has ignored. Such touching counsels were offered by the Chevalier de La Tour Landry to his daughters; they are urged by insistent parents on the wilful maidens of to-day. And the moralist of the future will still persist in well-doing with a similar result.

* "The Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry." Edited by G. S. Taylor, with an Introduction by D. B. Wyndham Lewis. The Verona Society, London, 1930. £3 3s. (Hamilton.)

It is to be hoped that the success of "The Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry" may encourage the Verona Society to continue its activities, for it is the intention of the Society to carry out a complete survey of those novel classics of our literature that were a part of the daily reading of Shakespeare. This is a consummation devoutly to be wished. EUGENE MASON.

THE WORKS OF FRANÇOIS VILLON.*

Mr. Atkinson has written his introduction to this collected Works of François Villon at a time when we most needed it, for we have been lately led astray by the musical play and talking film in which the "povre petit escollier" (as he named himself) is shown as the romantic hero, the king of the vagabonds. "Latter-day writers," says Mr. Atkinson, "have created a 'Villon' whose existence is denied by the words of the poet himself." It would seem by this that a man must allow legend to play fast and loose with him to be certain of his immortality. But Villon stands so plainly in his work that there is no fear of the real man being lost to those who care to read. His short poem, "Le Debat du Cuer et du Corps de Villon," with its recurring piece of dialogue in which the heart cries: "Plus ne t'en dis," always with the body's reply: "Et je m'en passeray," is a masterpiece of self-revelation.

Mr. Atkinson has set side by side with the original French his translation into English prose. If he aimed at suggesting the full beauty of Villon's verse in his translation he has not succeeded; it escapes prose; and Mr. Atkinson's prose has too often an air of the schoolroom about it. To take an example at random—the lovely stanza in "Le regrets de la belle Heaulmiere" (from Le Testament): "Ainsi le bon temps regretons Entre nous, povres vielles sottes. Assises bas, a crouppetons, Tout en ung tas comme pelottes, A petit feu de chenevottes Tost allumees, tost estaintes; Et jadis fusmes si mignottes! . . ." is reduced to a shambling prose passage beginning: "Thus we poor silly old crones look back with regret, among ourselves, to our happy days . . ." But if Mr. Atkinson merely aimed at giving his translation as a guide to those of us who would find difficulties with the fifteenth century French, this he has adequately done.

His introduction is divided into chapters on Villon's Life, Language, Culture, Experience, Personality and Character, and his Art. There is much in these chapters that is interesting, though in "Language" Mr. Atkinson sometimes speaks of "poetic" and "unpoetic" words as though Byron had never written: "To the kind reader of our sober clime, This way of writing will appear exotic," nor Bridges "The Testament of Beauty."

The edition is limited to five hundred and sixty copies.

CHRISTOPHER HARRIS.

GRAVESTONES OF ACADIE.†

This is a beautiful piece of typography, and the printers, Messrs. A. Smith & Co., are to be highly congratulated upon

* Edited by Geoffrey Atkinson. 25s. (Eric Partridge.)

† "Gravestones of Acadie, and Other Essays on Local History, Genealogy and Parish Records of Annapolis County, Nova Scotia." By William Inglis Morse. With photographs by the author. Regular Edition, £3 3s. net. Edition de luxe, £15 15s. net. (Quaritch.)

it. The paper is very desirable, while the binding of the ordinary edition—which the reviewer has before him—is really excellent, being what is called, we suppose, quarter bound in red morocco The photographs are extremely well done The binding has been carried out by S & S—which we suppose stands for Sangorski & Sutcliffe A worthy piece of work. There are fifty copies of the edition de luxe, and four hundred and fifty copies of the other

Annapolis County is a place full of interesting historical data And Mr. Morse has put the facts before us in a readable manner. There are twenty-five illustrations, all of which are referred to in the eight chapters. The work will not of course appeal to a great number of people, but there will be a few for whom this valuable historical record of these gravestones will have some attraction The author might well have written a book around his subject in a dull and uninteresting manner, but Mr Morse has been intelligent enough to make his work readable It is Chapter One that concerns itself with the Gravestones of Arcadie, and the other chapters have to do with a French vase, the story of which has its beginnings in one of the wildest parts of Nova Scotia, and the documents having to do with the fisheries—all of which are of considerable interest The parish records of Annapolis, Granville and Wilmot, and the data about the Mayflower all make good reading

---

Further replies concerning Mr Kirby's article in last month's BOOKMAN

My practice is to revise catalogue lists each year where six or more catalogues have been sent and no order has resulted, the name is removed from the mailing list My comment on the three classes is

Number one No business man but merely the printer's friend Number two Perhaps too hasty fair trial should be given Number three Bad policy with real buyers

C HOWES (St Leonards-on-Sea)

My own practice is to send catalogues regularly to any applicant for at least three years I do not think it is reasonable for the collector to expect the bookseller to continue sending catalogues if repeated offers of a wide selection of his stock have failed to produce any response over a reasonable period, but I think it would be unwise to remove any name from his mailing list quickly It seems to me that the collector has a legitimate grudge only against your third class of bookseller, which I think must be a very small class indeed On the whole I think catalogues are well appreciated Anyway they are an essential tool of the trade, and although some pseudo-collectors use them merely for gathering information, their good service outweighs the disadvantages BERTRAM ROTA (London)

I belong to the first class of bookseller and send catalogues for a reasonable period, say two years, after which period I revise my mailing list I have never heard of the third class In practice I have found that an addressee may pass four or five catalogues before he finds something to interest him R BRIGG (Arundel, Sussex)

As auctioneers it is not our practice to send catalogues regularly to anyone who has not expressed a wish to receive them Those who desire to have them usually indicate their wish by paying a nominal registration fee for the various classes of catalogues, at the rates shown in the leaflet which we enclose All our more important catalogues are published in two editions one of which contains illustrations made by the collotype process

SOTHEBY & CO (London)

As far as possible we send catalogues whether a purchase is made or not We check the interest of our customers periodically by sending out a form which they are asked to return marked with the subjects they collect. We can understand the motives of Mr. Kirby's second class of bookseller, but we should have thought that [illegible] anxious for quick returns, he would have chosen a[illegible] profession The third class of bookseller expects th[illegible] lectors to pay him for issuing catalogues An exce[illegible] idea! Then the collectors will be in a position to dem[illegible] that the bookseller has them printed more carefully [illegible] pleasantly than he does now

J KYRLE FLETCHER, Ltd (Newport)

It is our practice to send our catalogues to all custome[illegible] on our mailing list, and we continue to do so whether th[illegible] purchase or not The list is of course overhauled ev[illegible] few years DOUGLAS FOULIS (Edinburgh)

It is our practice to follow the first catalogue applied [illegible] with the next two or three issues of our monthly supp[illegible]ment If no order or other communication has b[illegible] received from the applicant by then we drop the mat[illegible] presuming that the catalogues do not interest this pa[illegible]ticular person With the present high cost of catalogu[illegible] production and postage we cannot afford to send unappre[illegible]ciated lists for indefinite periods As to book buyers i[illegible] general being appreciative of catalogues, we think they a[illegible] knowing that a great number of those who apply for [illegible] lists promptly send an order and many become very [illegible] customers We have built up a large and valuable [illegible]g list in this way

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd (London)

I have no hard and fast rule, but generally [illegible]king if catalogues are sent to a collector over a pe[illegible] of two years (which in my case represents twenty cat[illegible]alogues) and the collector finds nothing to order througho[illegible]t this time, I can only conclude that the type of books I d[illegible]al in are not such as the recipient collects, and that he [illegible]can have no further interest therein The preparation [illegible]nd issue of catalogues represent a large expenditure of bo[illegible]th time and money, and the employment of a staff of skille[illegible]d assistants All this is freely and willingly given, but the p[illegible]rimary object is to sell the books that are offered An oc[illegible]casional order ensures that the collector's name will be re[illegible]tained on the permanent mailing list But why should a collector who has continuously received a catalogue for two years, without ordering therefrom expect more? Or if he wants more why should he expect them free? Any tradesman must cut non-productive expenditure sooner [illegible]ot later or he could not carry on "Silence is golden" b[illegible]t the silent collector who responds neither by order nor thanks nor even an offer to pay mailing expenses, does not help to meet the inexorable demands of the landlord and the rate collector P J DOBELL (Bruton Street, London)

I circularise certain groups of people to whom I think my catalogues may appeal Anyone who orders is put on my mailing list (more or less permanently) Any who write acknowledging the catalogue and asking for future iss[illegible]ues are put on my mailing list, and if no order is forthco[illegible] in twelve months the name is taken off The first [illegible] who sends catalogues, etc, must waste a lot of money [illegible] does not weed his mailing list every twelve months or [illegible] The second dealer is not to be blamed in any way The thi[illegible] dealer must be able to issue really fine illustrated catalogues to demand an annual sum for a further supply"

F GUNTRIP (Tonbridge)

Further replies will be published next month.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 467. Vol. LXXVIII. AUGUST, 1930. Price One Shilling net.

1/- net monthly, except Special Numbers.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS (Post free including all Special Issues): British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, £1 5s 6d. per annum. Foreign, £1 4s. per annum.

Editorial and Publishing Offices: St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4

Registered at the G.P.O., London, for transmission to Canada and Newfoundland by Magazine Post.

Entered as Second Class Matter, March 15, 1929 at the Post Office at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879 (Sec. 397, P.L. and R.).

A CALL TO ADVENTURE.*

By Hugh I'A Fausset

MR TOMLINSON has done a bold thing. He has challenged a mechanistic civilisation in a land where the machine has most signally triumphed. But he has also done a wise thing. For he has addressed his challenge to the young. It would be very interesting to know how his audiences at Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Cornell and Columbia Universities reacted to his words. But it is too much to hope that a single lecture could explode the modern faith in the immortality of machinery and the eternal output of engines. I cannot doubt that it set many of his listeners upon a new road which may lead to a change of heart and of mind, while it fostered in others that secret revolt against the hard, material aspect of their age which, if still unvoiced, is slowly gathering momentum. It is needless to say that, although Mr Tomlinson lifts his voice crying in the industrial and scientific wilderness, his intonation is not that of an Isaiah or a John the Baptist. He has seen enough of explosives in his life to know that the appeal in all matters of the spirit is more effective than the assault. And no critic of the accustomed ways of the world ever spoke with more gentleness or humility. For one of the secrets of Mr Tomlinson's achievement as an artist lies in the fact that he has always humbled himself before the mystery of life. It was, perhaps, the sea which taught him first the wisdom and necessity of accepting one's own littleness, if one hopes to experience the greatness of reality. As he writes in the short tale by which he is represented in "Great Sea Stories of All Nations," "I murmured something feeble and sociable. I saw then why sailors never talk directly of the sea. Talking largely of the sea is something like the knowing talk of young men about women; and what is a simple sailor man that he should open his mouth on mysteries?"

Mr H. M. Tomlinson.

From a drawing by Helen Wilson

And perhaps the greatest loss which the machine has inflicted on the modern world is that it has fostered a delusion of mastery which is fatal to the illusion of mystery. And it is against that pride and all its sterile, sophisticated fruits that Mr Tomlinson opposes the humility of the sailor and the artist. For the sailor who cannot rest on land, who "would go to sea again, because it is better than suicide, or would sail the Indian Ocean, and go on till he comes to the region where day is born," obeys the same impulse and knows the same loneliness as the artist who must follow the inner compulsion of his genius though he cannot tell whither it may lead or whether he shall ever [illegible] the port of his desire. The vision of truth and of beauty, the intuition of some harmony to be realised and some new meaning to be won from the uncomprehended has, no less than the sea to which Mr Tomlinson applies the words, "moved the wonder of men, and has troubled their minds with surmises which went beyond the edge of the earth." The sailor and the artist each embark upon a voyage into the unknown, submitting themselves to elemental forces and the ordeal of the deep, yet opposing to these forces the tenacious logic of the human mind. And in Mr. Tomlinson the simplicity of the sailor is combined with the subtlety of the artist, and as he uses the language of the sea in discussing the hazards that the imaginative life involves and the integrity which it demands, so he interprets the hunger of the seaman for far horizons and his positive acceptance of hardship in terms of poetry. For him, in short, the life of thought, no less than the life of action, if it is to have real meaning, is a religious activity in the deepest sense of the word. And it is this conception of literature which he has upheld in "Between the Lines." "I see no essential difference," he writes, "between Isaiah and Swift as men with something to say to us. I am unable to separate religion and literature. For me they are the same. The writer who would give his public what it wants, with his tongue in his cheek, is in the same class exactly as the other fellow who once took pieces of silver in payment for treachery. He denies the light. And whether the public wants what we have to say has nothing to do with it. Perhaps the public is a good judge; perhaps the public realizes that there is precious little in what we have to say; and so neglects us, quite properly. That is for the poet to discover for himself; and discovery will depend on the depth and selflessness of his convictions and on his courage." And all through this lecture he emphasises the truth, so little regarded by those who reduce art to entertainment or to mere mental or sensational excitement, that our attitude to it is of the deepest significance, that it betrays our day, and that even bad and indifferent criticism of books is just as serious as a city's careless drainage. And this conception of art as a spiritual activity he opposes necessarily to scientific materialism. Against the idea, for example, that salvation can be found through external, mechanical manipulation he upholds the truth that all real advance comes from within. As he writes, "We change our thoughts and change our world. And that is the task of the poet." And the same creative conception governs his discussion of "style" Style means at once more and less to him than to self-conscious literary people. It is a little thing in the sense that it should never force itself upon our notice either as eccentricity or ornamentation. But it is significant because it is inseparable from substance, because it "depends, first and last, on what a writer has to say, and the kind of man he is. It is not his dress, but the essential man, the man even his friends may not know." It is good or bad according to the spirit which forms it, and if that spirit is creative it has that "indefina[ble] appeal which is in the form, colour, and poise o[f a] daffodil when the light favours it." What, in sho[rt,] Mr. Tomlinson pleaded for throughout this lect[ure] was a renewal of the creative impulse, and inevita[bly] that spectre of destruction, the war, haunted [his] thoughts. His own "All Our Yesterdays" is one [of] the few war novels in which the horror of that holoca[ust] is presented not as an awful accident but as inevitab[ly] determined by the slowly gathering forces generat[ed] by fear, lust and stupidity. But at least, as he adm[its] in this lecture, "the war made a revolution. It ve[ry] definitely displayed in Europe the reality under tho[se] polite and smooth appearances of society which till th[en] the young had never questioned. Now they kn[ow] what is in the family vault. No wonder they [cann]ot sing the old songs! No wonder, as there se[ems] to [be] no escape, they regard the saxophone an[ex]pressi[ve] instrument! No wonder they think there is no ne[ed] to look anywhere for the truth about life but in t[he] biological laboratory!"

* "Between the Lines." By H. M. Tomlinson. 5s. (Humphrey Milford.) "Great Sea Stories of All Nations." Edited with Introduction by H. M. Tomlinson. 8s. 6d. (Harrap.)

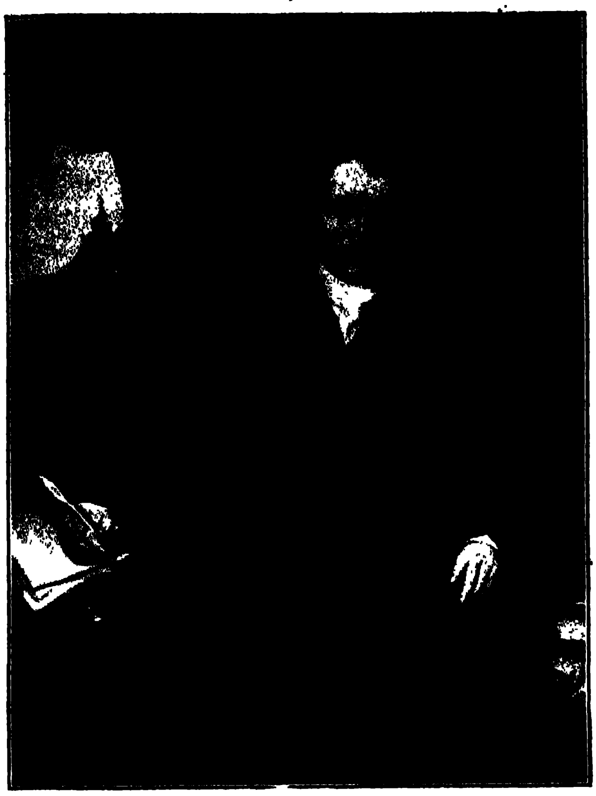
But inevitable a such disillusion may have been, [it] is, if persisted in, no less fatal than the folly and fals[ity] of which it is the fruit. And in place of this spirit [of] buoyant and freely expressed cynicism, accepting t[he] rule of Mammon and of the Machine because nothi[ng] matters, or cleverly deriding the faith that sustained m[en] in the past because it was mixed with credulity, M[r.] Tomlinson has held up an ideal of informed creativen[ess] and invited the young to respond to it at whatever co[st.] It may seem a forlorn appeal to make to anyone rear[ed] in our materialistic society. But though young peo[ple] may worship the machine, it is rare for them, as he sa[ys,] to admire Mammon. And since it is a call to adventu[re] it would be useless to look, as he writes of the call [of] the sea, for common sense in it. But the young a[re] not wed to self-interest and I cannot doubt that M[r.] Tomlinson's appeal to them to give the modern wo[rld] a spirit which it has not and without which all [its] ingenuity and energy can only prove death's ministe[r] will evoke a response. And to become artists in l[ife] as distinct from artful exploiters of it, hard as the ta[sk] is and dangerous as the solitudes of spirit are to whi[ch] it leads, is an adventure no less kindling to our manho[od] than that of the sea, of which "Great Sea Stories of [All] Nations" is a finely representative record.

CHARLES LAMB: SOME SIDE-LIGHTS FROM BARRY CORNWALL.



By John M. Turnbull.

IN an interesting article in THE BOOKMAN of March, 1922, Major Butterworth identified beyond dispute the portrait of Pope which drew from Lamb the glowing acknowledgment contained in his letter of April 13th, 1823, addressed to Bryan Waller Procter, more familiarly known as Barry Cornwall, the author of "Charles Lamb: A Memoir":

> "I have hung up Pope, and a gem it is, in my town room; I hope for your approval. Though it accompanies the 'Essay on Man,' I think that was not the poem he is here meditating. He would have looked up, somehow affectedly, if he were just conceiving 'awake, my St. John.' Neither is he in the 'Rape of the Lock' mood exactly. I think he has just made out the last lines of the 'Epistle to Jervi[s]' between gay and tender,
>
> 'And other beauties envy Worsley's eyes.'
>
> "I'll be damn'd if that isn't the line. He is broodi[ng] over it with a dreamy phantom of Lady Mary floati[ng] before him. He is thinking which is the earliest day a[nd] hour that she will first see it. What a miniature piece [of] gentility it is! Why did you give it me? I do not li[ke] you enough to give you anything so good."

The portrait concerned, as established by Maj[or] Butterworth, was an engraving by J. H. Robinson aft[er] Charles Jervas, executed as a frontispiece for Robe[rt] Jennings's 1819 folio edition of the "Essay on Man,"

Lamb might have had something to add to his appreciation, on the score of Modern Gallantry, had he known that the portrait was merely an extract from a larger picture from which the gay figure of Martha Blount hovering against a background of books had been excised. We meet Lamb's copy once more, in Procter's obituary notice in the Athenæum of January 24th, 1835. "The room in which he lived," writes Procter of Lamb's lodgings in Russell Street, which he occupied until September, 1824, "was plainly and almost carelessly furnished. Let us enter it for a moment. Its ornaments, you see, are principally several long shelves of ancient books; (those are his 'ragged veterans'). Some Hogarth's prints, two after Leonardo da Vinci and Titian, and a portrait of Pope, enrich the walls."

Charles Lamb.

From the painting by Meyer in the India Office.

Shortly after this exchange of courtesies, Procter was invited by the publishers, James Carpenter & Son, to contribute a commentary to their "Effigies Poeticæ: or Portraits of the British Poets," which was published in 1824; the "Conclusion" to the commentary being dated 10th April of that year, or just two days over a year after the date of Lamb's letter. The commentary was issued separately in a nicely printed octavo, the portraits apparently being made up in portfolio; though a handsome large paper issue of the former was also published with the plates interleaved. In the introduction, the commentator confesses the adoption of "another man's idea, which is neither the poet's nor our own." The identity of that other man does not seem obscure when the above confession is ranged alongside certain unmistakable veiled allusions to Lamb that are scattered through the text. If this surmise is correct, a still lighter demand on the imagination will suggest the deliberate expansion into a system of Lamb's fanciful treatment of the Pope portrait. Adoption of Lamb's method is clearly apparent in the notes on the portraits of several of the more famous poets even though the brilliance of the original instance is missing.

Photo by A. Debenham, Southsea. Alexander Pope.

From a contemporary painting.

"More of the adventurer, the soldier, or the courtier, perhaps, than of the poet," writes Procter, "may be traced in this likeness of Sir Walter Raleigh. There is neither the collected meditative look, nor the soaring glance which is said to accompany the 'fine madness'; but there is a gay, shrewd, undaunted eye, fit for a hero, or the gallant, who cast down his cloak amidst the dust for the 'virgin queen' to tread upon."

That of Prior:

"does not, indeed, coincide with our recollections of some of his verses; but it is an exceedingly striking portrait. It indicates the author of 'The Nut Brown Maid,' or perhaps the diplomatist, but scarcely the humorous fabler."

Thompson's face "is a personification of the Castle of Indolence, without its romance"; while Anstey, he considers, "looks fit to have been the author of the Bath or the Pleader's Guide."

Of Spenser he writes, "There is an eye accustomed to dwell on the shadows of the fancy, on fictions of the woods and waters,

"On perilous seas, and fairy lands forlorn"— and one feels that the aptness of the quotation, together with his share in giving currency as household words to the line, excuses the mutilation.

Pope, regrettably, is represented not by Robinson's engraving from Jervas's picture, but by the well-known head by Hudson, so extraordinarily like, in attitude, costume and expression, to Hoare's chalk drawing. No doubt considerations of copyright alone excluded the portrait which surely both Procter and Lamb would have favoured. The Jervas picture was at this time in possession of George Watson Taylor, by whose permission Robinson's extract from it was made and published. Taylor was bibliographer as well as bibliophile, being associated with the Roxburgh Club, and as such, whether under obligation to Jennings or not, would not lightly cheapen a privilege already extended to the publisher by authorising so early a reprint of this particular engraving. It may be assumed therefore that the Carpenters for their venture had to content themselves with the best substitute they were able to procure.

Two of the veiled allusions to Lamb referred to above strike so characteristic a note as to qualify them almost for inclusion in an appendix to the "Dramatic Specimens." One on Sandys's Ovid is consistent with such references to that work as are recorded in his correspondence:

"His best work, however, is his translation of Ovid; and from this volume we must take leave to make one extract, because it is a great favourite with a very excellent friend of ours. The passage relates to the change of Cadmus and Hermione into Serpents, and is in the fourth Book of the Metamorphoses.

His tongue was yet in motion, when it cleft
In two, forthwith of human speech bereft:
He Hiss'd when he his sorrows sought to vent,
The only language now which nature lent.
His wife her naked bosom beats, and cries:
'Stay, Cadmus, and put off these prodigies.
You Gods, why also am I not a snake?'
He licked her willing lips even as she spake:
Into her well-known bosom glides; her waste
And yielding neck with loving twines embrac't:—
Now they are two, who crept together chained
Till they the covert of the wood attained.
*These gentle dragons, knowing what they were,
Do hurt to no man,* no man's presence fear.'"

Charles Lamb.
Scratched on copper from life in 1825, by his friend Brook Pulham.

The other deals with Francis Quarles, bearing out the identity of the critic, and agreeably supplementing Lamb's observations on that author as expressed in his correspondence with Southey:

"The following is one of his elegies, and is admired by one of the very best judges of English literature, and our friend, to boot. We quote, once more, upon the strength of his authority, and in order to show our regard for him. The sixteenth Elegy goes to show the impartiality of death —that he strikes the eagle, and spares the kite—that

'Queen's drop away when blue-leg'd Maukin lives,
And courtly Mildred dies, when country Madge survives.'

and the seventeenth Elegy thereupon opens thus:

'Retract that word, false quill! O let mine eyes
Redeem that language with a thousand tears:
Our Mildred is not dead: How passion lies!
How ill that sound does relish in these ears:
Can she be dead whose conquering soul defies
The bands of death, and worse than death, the fears?
No, no, she sits enthron'd, and smiles to see
Our childish passions; she triumphs, while we
In sorrow, blaze her death, that's death and sorrow free.'"

In the portraits of Herrick, Henry More, and Swift, Procter finds respective resemblances to three of Lamb's most intimate friends—Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. One might well wonder who first discovered these likenesses. Their noting at least suggests a companionable perusal of the plates, before publication, by Elia and his biographer, whence also may have emerged the various significances of the portraits referred to in a higher paragraph as extensions of Lamb's contemplation of the Pope portrait.

In this work we find the first account of Lamb's famous Ben Jonson joke against Procter, who relates the story more circumstantially both in 1830, in the New Monthly Magazine, and in 1866, in "Charles Lamb: a Memoir." It is here introduced with true Boswellian ingenuousness into the notes on William Walsh, of whom:

"We have nothing to say for him—or against him. We are in the predicament of a friend of ours who once cut a indifferent joke for the first time in his life; whereupon a notorious wag who was present, observed in an encouraging tone, 'Ah, indeed, very well, very well: Ben Jonson has said worse things—and better.'"

"What a desperate postscript is this to a letter of compliment," adds the victim.

In his note on Dr. Watts, Procter observes:

"We have heard a witty friend of ours recite (with an emphasis on the second word)—

'How doth the little busy bee,' etc.

in a way to satisfy us that his industry might be traced with little trouble to the poem of Dr. Watts. Whether our friend's humour, his shrewdness, his fine talent for depicting the drolleries of our nature, may be ascribed to the same influence, we know not."

Although the little book is anonymous, we may assume from the note on Quarles, quoted above, that its author did not intend to conceal his identity at least from Lamb. Lamb's library was composed, for the great part, of the junk of the extra-illustrators, salved from the stalls. We learn from Moxon that none of them contained portraits; so one can imagine the interest the "Effigies Poeticæ" would have afforded him. Whether Procter was directly influenced by him in the production of the work or not, the indirect influence which we have traced should suffice to earn for it a humble place after White's "Falstaff's Letters," Wilson's "Defoe," Burnett's "Prose Specimens," and Dupuy's "Pamphile," in that chapter of Lambiana that might be entitled "The Finger of Lamb."

A further literary opinion of Lamb's is related by Procter in the introduction to his "English Songs." Here he asserts that after the death of Charles I:

"the belles lettres, as well as monarchy, were overturned for a time; but returned—the former in a new guise and thoroughly degenerated—with the courtiers of his son. From that period, till the time of Thompson and Collins (for I refer Milton to the earlier period), all our songs, and most of our poems, were evidently written by the celebrated 'Lady of Quality'"— adding the following foot-note at the end:

"Since the foregoing Introduction was written, I have submitted it to the perusal of a friend, whose opinion I respect; and he tells me that I have not done justice to the song-writers who have flourished since the Restoration."

The friend referred to can surely be no other than the commender of Procter's "Dramatic Scenes," of whom its author elsewhere wrote, "He had more real knowledge of old English literature than any man whom I ever knew. . . . No one will love the old English writers again as he did."

Lamb, in acknowledging a copy of Procter's "English Songs" sent him by their publisher, Moxon, assured the donor that he had "more than read them." Judging from the pieces that he mentions to Moxon in the same letter of acknowledgment as taking his fancy, however, one is inclined to question the thoroughness of his perusal. The distribution of his selection, moreover, discloses one of those venial weaknesses which, in his case, can only endear. Out of over two hundred songs he singles out for commendation nine. Of these, three are more or less evenly distributed amongst the first hundred and fifty titles; the remaining six, commencing with "An Epistle to Charles Lamb"—"'Epistle to What's his Name' (here maybe I'm partial)'—follow almost consecutively amongst a succeeding dozen. Interest seems to have been a recruit of the partiality for the epistle. The volume must have resembled his copy of Wordsworth's "Waggoner," which he complained to its author "is very ill put up in boards, at least it seems to me always to open at the dedication—but that," he adds, "is a mechanical fault."

ARTHURIANA TO DATE.*

By J. P. Collins.

MR. HAMILTON FYFE has here recast a study which he produced years ago, and although it may be superseded by some work of a deeper and more exhaustive kind, it is not likely to be beaten for liveliness and interest. He makes no claim to be definitive, or to work out a Pineronian philosophy. His treatment is aspectual rather than chronological, and appreciative rather than critical. For he writes with the knowledge and intuition of a contemporary, so far as the great period of the playwright's achievement is concerned; and he avoids the crude and hectoring tone that spoils so much current writing—and not of course on the drama alone.

Sir Arthur Pinero.
A caricature which appeared in The World.
From "Sir Arthur Pinero's Plays and Players," by Hamilton Fyfe (Ernest Benn).

Years ago, in the late William Archer's "Theatrical World" (the best conspectus we possess of modern English drama), Sir Arthur gave us a valuable bit of autobiography which Mr. Fyfe might well have condensed for his opening chapter. It showed how thoroughly the future dramatist had studied the provincial theatres before he joined the Lyceum company. Ellen Terry said of him as a colleague in the seventies that "consummate care, precision and brain characterised his work as an actor always," and this early reading was a right one, as events were to show. Whatever success he has since obtained, as he says himself, is to be attributed to "observation, great patience and perseverance." We all congratulate ourselves that he turned from the green-room to the study, but we need not suppose that if he had cared, he would not have reached the front rank as an actor. As it was, he had to be content with small parts, and when he rose to the level of the king in "Hamlet," a Birmingham critic said harsh things. But as Mr. Fyfe very aptly asks, where is the actor who has made a success of that thankless part? It was an American critic, I believe, who reduced it to its real footing when he wrote of some Western actor that "he played the king as if some other guy had already played the ace."

There is an apostolic succession in the stage world, as in the Church, and the book has yet to be written that shall reveal how much its leading figures have owed to the managers under whom they served their probation. Irving, with all his mannerisms, was as inspiring as any, and it may stand as one of his claims to remembrance that he was Pinero's mentor-in-chief. Autocrat though he was, he allowed "the young man in the Scotch cap" unusual latitude, and this was a form of recognition that under the cap lay a keen mother-wit. Nor was Pinero slow in turning it to account for correcting Irving's vagaries, as this example will show:

"At a rehearsal Irving saw him sitting on a piece of scenery that stood upright in the wings. Irving said: 'Get up, my boy, get up; you will cut yourself' 'Oh, that will be all right, Mr. Irving,' Pinero replied ruefully; 'we are accustomed to having our parts cut in this theatre.'"

In his early plays—and the reproach has been often levelled at him since—Pinero worked in the conviction that his best materials lay in the upper ranks of society. The best commentary on this is that when he varied his policy later and resorted to a middle-class atmosphere, he created "His House in Order" and "The Thunderbolt"—masterpieces which he has not surpassed, or anybody else. Again, it must be remembered that until the present century dawned, Demos had found no theatre of his own, and the lower orders were still used by playwrights chiefly as a quarry for low comedy and "sob-stuff." Poverty, like politics, has never been more for Sir Arthur than a kind of stalking-horse or side-wings. Acting is "an imitation of life," he has said himself, and he has always insisted that dramatists should tell stories "so as to give rise to the greatest possible amount of that peculiar kind of emotional effect which it is the theatre's one great function to produce." Obviously the process must be conditioned by the author's individual powers, and few creators of character and situation have realised themselves and their scope more completely.

* "Sir Arthur Pinero's Plays and Players." By Hamilton Fyfe. 15s. net (Ernest Benn.)

One thing that stands to his credit is that Sir Arthur has never used his great position to abuse his rivals or belittle his profession. He has helped towards a state of things where success descends in lavish measure on the veteran and the tyro alike. Certainly no one can complain that our audiences are not catholic in their tastes when they can appreciate a break-away in realism, like "Journey's End" on the one hand, and a brilliant intellectual satire like "The Apple Cart" on the other. Nor can we fail to see that in the one case the "emotional effect" is almost monotonous, and in the other it is absent altogether. The distinguishing characteristic in both, however, is sterling courage curbed by a fine discretion, and it is the absence of these qualities that accounts perhaps for so much that is depressing and undeserving in the theatre to-day. Fortunately there are signs of better things ahead, and one of them is the recent revival of "Dandy Dick" with so much acceptance and success. It can hardly fail to bring about the revival of Pinero's serious work at its best. Here he remains supreme, and we need fear no "morte d'Arthur," for he is secure of a permanent place in international drama.

BIOGRAPHIES OF THE MOMENT.

SCHOOL AND STAGE.*

By Horace Shipp.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY gives us the quintessence of a man. Not only does it tell the story of his life with an authority none but he can claim, but by its manner of telling, its omissions and emphasis, its choice of words even, it reveals the true personality of its subject-author. To individual friends a man subtly adapts his individuality; but here in the putting down of his life for all men's eyes, he will invariably present it as he himself would have it, so that we have not only the truth of the real but that of the ideal. So when we open the volume of Memoirs of Sir Frank Benson it is the actor-manager we expect to meet, but the public school boy and the public school man who emerges. In this book he is less an actor than a Wykehamist who has taken to the stage; less a theatre manager than an Oxford Blue with a theatrical team. He refers once to "the main interests of the subject of this chronicle—art and athletics." Henry Ainley appears in the pages to talk as much about being rushed off to cricket, football and hockey by his indefatigable chief as about the theatre. The pictures of schoolmasters and dons have a roundness which none of those of the theatrical personages of Sir Frank's mature acquaintance can boast. Indeed we are half through the book before we arrive at the chapter headed "I Commence Actor," and even then there are many glances over his shoulder at Wykeham, Winchester and Oxford.

Sir Frank Benson.
From a drawing by R. G. Eves.
From "My Memoirs," by Sir Frank Benson (Ernest Benn).

These institutions have a stout champion in the biographist. In our day of vociferous rebellion against their traditions and methods, he defends everything about them save the Winchester method of playing football, which comes in for really serious criticism. Rather is it that he does not so much defend as take for granted everything connected with the public school system, and record his own enjoyment and benefit from that system, extending the encomium to every public school man with whom life brought him into contact.

* "My Memoirs." By Sir Frank Benson. 21s. (Ernest Benn.)

Even Sir Frank Benson, however, is at last driven to talk of the theatre, and since most of the readers of this volume will be reading it for the sake of his pronouncements on this subject, one may be forgiven for becoming a little impatient with the length of his prologue. There is moreover a faint suggestion of waning interest in his writing when he gets down to this all-important phase of his life. It may be that the attempt to record any theatrical career as full and as long as his tends to produce a catalogue of names and productions. As Sir Frank has the habit of adding to the theatrical celebrities of his companies lists of local celebrities who assisted in making his provincial ventures successful, and even gives us the names of his personal hosts and hostesses, the tendency is exaggerated. But it is in the nature of memoir writers thus to digress, and we forgive much of the garrulous " who afterwards married Lord Blank " element.

Theatrically, even more than the many good stories with which the book is enlivened, and the insight into the early careers of numbers of now famous players, its value depends upon the record of the fight which Sir Frank made for his ideal of a repertory theatre for Shakespearean and other poetic drama. Again and again throughout his career the opportunity occurred for the establishment of some highly profitable theatrical enterprise, with foundations firmly set upon the long run system and himself as actor-manager. Regularly he put the temptation aside and pursued the way of his own ideals; any other would have been unworthy of a Wykehamist we read, written large between the lines and occasionally upon them. Seen in the light of this repertory ideal the record of the rise and progress of the Benson Company is one of profound significance in recent theatrical history, and that more than all else makes the volume a valuable document of contemporary affairs.

In the actual writing of the book Sir Frank himself realises his limitations in form and style. " I must plead guilty to possessing but little art or aptitude for the making of books," he says, and it is true that we must accept this volume as a somewhat shapeless outpouring of a life and personality so rich in interesting material that it could not but be worthy the setting forth. There is a hint towards the end of the book that Sir Frank intends at some time to elaborate the later chapters which contain his theatrical records, and this would give us more surely the portrait of that Sir Frank Benson who is the idol of " Old Bensonians " from either side of the footlights.

John Gibson Lockhart.
From a drawing by D. Maclise, R.A.
From "Sir Walter," by Donald Carswell (John Murray).

STINGING NETTLES.*

By Dr. W. S. Crockett.

It is difficult for a Scotsman and a lover of Sir Walter Scott to say all that he feels about this book. It is one of those books that should hardly have been written. No good can come of it. Mr. Carswell may have his own opinions, but it is not fair—it is not even respectful—to a great immortal memory, to rake up long-forgotten stories, especially to revive a piece of scandal-mongering which had never a shadow of foundation.

He shows no real appreciation for the author of " Waverley "—no affection. The Scottish people made a mistake, Mr. Carswell thinks, in taking Scott to their heart. He did not deserve it. At his best he was but a poor writer, and no less was he a poor specimen of humanity—" a great loutish lump of lameness with a big ugly face." Has Mr. Carswell ever seen Greenshields's statue of Scott in the Scottish National Library? If he has, how could he speak of Sir Walter as " ugly " ? On the contrary he was, in early youth, comely and good looking. In later life care became printed on his face, and his hair grew silver white. His eyes were heavy, his chin sagged. But he was not " ugly," though his face was " big." Above all, he was Greatheart personified, and always is the heart the measure of the man.

There are numerous passages one would like to controvert. That for instance on Lady Scott, who was not (as I have shown elsewhere) " the natural daughter of the second Marquess of Downshire and a French woman unknown." Mr. Carswell is only repeating a bit of country-side gossip, unhappily perpetuated by James Hogg, followed by a few biographers of the minor sort who knew nothing at all of the circumstances and did not trouble about the first-hand information which even then was possible. Mr. Carswell himself has not probed the matter. There are other insinuations. What does Mr. Carswell mean by telling us that at, or near, the end of Lady Scott's life, " fate and her husband found her out " ? Would he have us believe in something furtively wrong—that she had been living under a kind of mask which only long and sore illness forced aside ? Cruel things, to be sure, were said of her, as of Scott, in the lifetime of both. We must not forget, however, the extraordinary publicity of those brilliant Abbotsford and Edinburgh days prior to 1826—the vast number of visitors of all classes, and from all lands, many of whom gave their impressions to the world, and not one had a single derogatory, disparaging word to utter about their so agreeable and charming hostess. The fact is that Lady Scott was adored by the Abbotsford circle, as well as by those in the neighbourhood of her Tweedside home. She may not have been, from some points of view, the ideal spouse for Scott as a literary man. But she was a first rate helpmate to him for all that: often his amanuensis: his translator from foreign tongues: an understanding conversationalist: with a mind cultured and high-toned, amiable, kind, generous. I write as one brought up within a short distance of Abbotsford, as one who, in youth, knew many people perfectly acquainted with its ins and outs during Scott's lifetime.

* " Sir Walter: a Four-Part Study in Biography." By Donald Carswell. 15s. (John Murray.)

Lord Northcliffe at the height of his fame.

From "Northcliffe," by Hamilton Fyfe (Allen & Unwin).

Of course Mr. Carswell has much to say about Sir Walter in the light of his business connections. Nothing has been more a subject of controversy, and the whole case has been expiscated officially and exhaustively in publications of the Constable and Ballantyne firms, so that little needs to be added to the sad and sorry tale. Admitted that Scott was extravagant to a degree, that he was ambitious, somewhat rash, taking considerable risks in the matter of so much paper money, and with promises of new " Waverleys " which might never have been written, he had after all as good a right as any man to live out his dreams if he could. Conscious of his vast intellectual reserves, we must not blame him if he put them into an investment of which he felt sure it would work out all right in the end. He simply bargained for so much, and depended upon his brain and his pen for the devout consummation, as many do still, if not perhaps on the same lines, in these days when hard cash payment is the rule. It is not true that Scott was the " chief contriver of his own misfortunes," all traceable, according to Mr. Carswell, to that " fatal decision " in 1805, when he handed over as a " dead secret " the £5,000 he had realised from the sale of Rosebank, in consideration of a one-third interest in the new Ballantyne concern. Perhaps he should not have identified himself with any purely publishing business. Yet what harm was there in such a venture? Some modern literary men do the same. There is nothing "improper" or " dishonest " in it. Scott was his own man, responsible for whatever might happen, and by his recognition of this when the crash came, and in his herculean efforts to make amends, we have surely sufficient evidence of his real character as honest to the heart's core. The whole affair was superlatively unfortunate, nevertheless its outcome did more to establish Sir Walter's reputation and bind him to the hearts of his countrymen and of the world than even all his previous successes could have accomplished. Scott in adversity is ever a greater man than Scott in the hey-day of his triumphant prosperity.

Mr. Carswell's " study " deals also with James Hogg, John Gibson Lockhart and Joanna Baillie, each a pleasant contrast to his Scott chapters—the bitterness, the venom gone, a welcome calm behind the storm. Mr. Carswell can write well when he chooses. His " Brother Scots " was a piece of good work, if some stinging nettles were mixed with it also. But this diatribe ! No admirer of Sir Walter will take it seriously, except perhaps to grieve that it has been written. Between it and Mr. Gwynn's lately published " Life of Scott " the difference is that of midnight and morning.

ALFRED THE GREAT.*

By J. P. Collins.

THEY say that no man ever really failed to make Hamlet interesting, and we may fairly say the same about Lord Northcliffe. He was so intensely full of energy and personality that no book yet has rounded him up. The fault is that most of them have been written by men who were too much under the spell of the enchanter to see his shortcomings, or to distinguish how and why he was a symptom of a most amazing period, and not the Jove of it by any means. Even Mr. Fyfe, with his knack of presentation and his keen sense of interest, cannot wholly shake off the fascination that the great man exercised over his henchmen. Yet our author is well aware how necessary impartiality is if a book of this kind is to live; and he only succeeds in leaving an effect of cinematographic brilliance and uncertainty. So that the strain of hero worship breaks down, for we are almost asked to admire his idol's failures as well as his successes.

"Alfred the Great" had many advantages to start with, and they were nearly all tribal or physical. He was handsome and presentable; he had, when he liked, a most ingratiating manner, and he could attach his favourites to himself with a devotion that is growing rare in the newspaper profession. Mr. Fyfe rightly emphasises what Northcliffe owed to his wonderful mother, but there is always a mutual bargain of admiration between a warm-hearted woman and her favourite son. Besides, we must not ignore the influence she used over the rest of her sons in order to bind them to Alfred's chariot. There is only one example in our time of this Egyptian domination of a group of brothers by the ablest member, and this was that modern Joseph—Chamberlain. In each case there was intensive devotion to the common cause and the family interest, and the secret of success lay in the unified command. On the whole, the ruling member gained immensely by the combination of gifts it assembled to his hand, and Alfred Harmsworth was among the first to admit what he owed to the financial genius of brother Harold and the exquisite urbanity of brother Cecil. That is why we need not side with Mr. Fyfe when he reproaches the great man with the "mistake" he made in "filling his office full of brothers," and adduces it as a reason for his clearing the Times office of relationships or kindred groups. This was merely repeating the policy enforced many years before at Carmelite House, and even there the rule was incomplete in its enforcement, for two brothers might stay on if one cared to change his surname.

Mr. Fyfe quotes the Germans' praise of Northcliffe's "paper bullets" in the way of war propaganda, but those of us who were across the Rhine at the end of the war remember how the enemy snatched at anything that lessened the credit due to British pluck and strategy in the field. No paper had so inflated Germany's pre-war idea of itself as the Daily Mail had done by its alternate flattery and abuse of everything Teutonic. In his war policy, as in so much else, Northcliffe was peculiarly the victim of his prejudices and his impulses; and his antagonism towards Kitchener, Asquith, and Haig might have been much more serious if he had really wielded the Olympian thunderbolts that some folk believe.

A glutton for power and a man of immense capacity in a spasmodic way, he retained one touch of humility. He had a profound respect for unselfish idealisms that he could not share. The story has yet to be told of the way in which as a lad he actually signed his name as a convert on the books of the Salvation Army, and all through his life he remained one of its deepest admirers. When he was going to Washington to succeed Balfour he had a talk with the late General Bramwell Booth, and said: "Good-bye. I ought to have been one of your body, you know." Booth replied with a laugh, "There wouldn't have been room for both of us." And Northcliffe used to say it was one of the neatest compliments he had ever had. But these are only chance aspects, and it shows how many there were in this veritable jungle of a man. One question is whether anyone will ever achieve a better or completer portrait than Mr. Fyfe has given us here

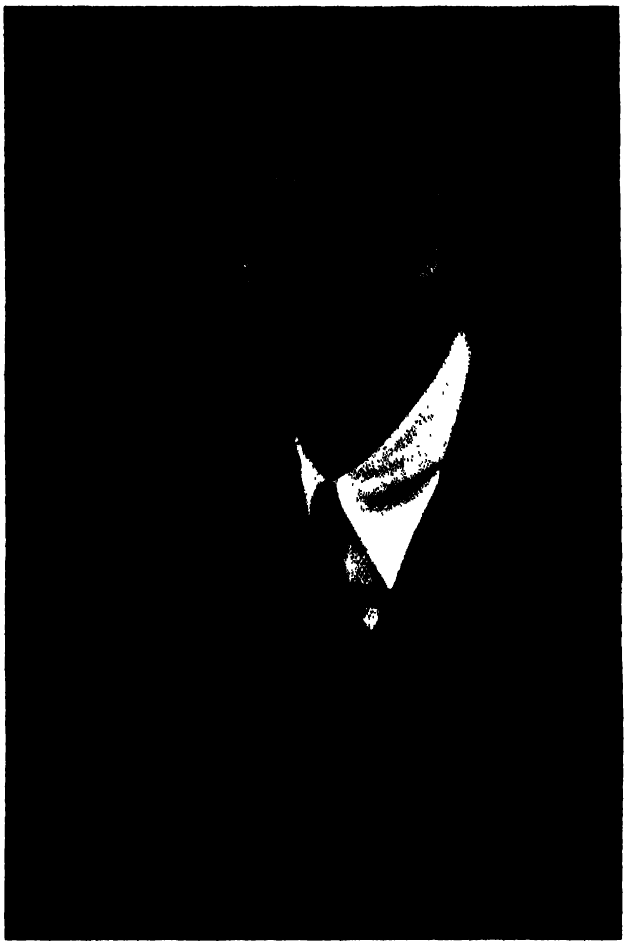
* "Northcliffe, an Intimate Biography." By Hamilton Fyfe. 10s. (Allen & Unwin.)

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

FRANK KENDON.*

A THOUSAND pleasures that were denied to our fathers are ours to-day for the lifting of a finger—or less. For this prodigality, however, a rich penalty has been exacted. Our present tempo of life has been bought at the expense of inner quietude. Nowadays, we do not so much laugh as shriek; and if the lily is not painted, or the rose gilded, we pass it by as unworthy. So, too, in the field of art. Experiment and so-called "daring" tend to attract all the notice. You may have very little to say, but if you can find a bold and flaring way of saying it, you will win the public ear. Conversely, no matter how precious the thing you have to say, if you insist on saying it in an unsensational manner, you will probably remain unheard by all save the discerning few. In a sense of course this has always been true; but never so true as now.

To find a poet attracting attention, therefore, who has never gone an inch out of his way to be sensational, is somewhat surprising; or at least it would be surprising if it were by his poetry that he won the public ear. So perhaps, after all, it is in the ironical nature of things that Frank Kendon, who is first and last a poet, should have "rung the bell" (as it were) by a book of prose. Those who are now reading "The Small Years" are, for the most part, reading him for the first time: as a poet they will hardly have heard of him.



Yet "The Small Years" could never have been written

* "The Small Years." 6s. (Cambridge University Press.) "Poems and Sonnets," "Arguments and Emblems," "A Life and Death of Judas Iscariot." (Bodley Head.)

if Frank Kendon were not a poet—and a very good poet at that. They do well who have been giving to this book the unofficial sub-title of "the childhood of a poet"; for it puts into our hands a key to unlock the intimacies of a poet's mind. But there is (or was) something of the poet in most of us, and therein lies the measure of our general joy in such a book as this. Once upon a time the clear mirror of our mind could reflect brightly, and one by one, the common miracles of everyday; but the rough usage of the years has smutched (if it has not altogether broken) that mirror, and now at best most of us can only remember faintly the bright things it once could show. He, therefore, who can magically contrive to polish up the mirror again and reveal, if only for a moment, the clear vision of our childhood's eyes, wins our gratitude—and, more, reminds us of those "bright shoots of Everlastingness" that once sprouted from our sap. None but a poet could do this, for none but a poet continues to hold that early vision clean in his mind's eye. "The Small Years" is the fruit of a poet's longing to keep that brief innocency safe from the spoiling clutch of mortality—not for himself only, but for us all. "They (these memories) have not been much," says Mr. Kendon, "but they are something the world may have by my labour, and could not have without me. If I was luckier in my earth than thousands, I am to try to leave them the shadowy forms of my joy, to wrestle with the angel of childhood till he tells me his secret, and then I am to put that down, truthfully, for a particular addition to the joy of the world. Therefore," he continues,

"I would change fingers with you, and let you steal raspberries and gooseberries, and white currants on a string like an unfastened necklace, so that you would remember this grown-up year, not only the taste of them, not only the theft, but their light leaves and rough leaves and thorns, and your hand going in among them, going in through a checker of sun and leaf shadow, to steal them from their bushes."

There speaks the poet—capturing for us all the lost Eden of our childhood. No wonder Mr. de la Mare, in a charming introduction to the book, exclaims, "Alas, how few of us can recapture it—and how very few indeed with Mr. Kendon's lovely truth and clarity." Truth and clarity, yes, for in his pages you will find none of that damaging sentimentality that seems always to clog the footsteps of those who try to find the way back to youth. In its quiet understatement the work is almost perfect. Near Mr. Kendon's early home, for instance, there was a certain wood, called by the family "Our Wood." It is in the nature of woods, however, to be cut down once in every twelve years. "I knew nothing of death then," writes the author, "but I remember the feeling of dismay, and now I know it was the same: that what has been will never be again, that the wood, which was a symbol, almost a person to us, was going out of existence." Then follows a passage which shows the entire difference between Mr. Kendon's remembering and that of so many others:

Portrait by Clifton Edwards. Mr. Frank Kendon.

'It was not that we felt any sentimental sorrow for the trees that were down or crashing; the hurt was not made in the world, but in us. . . . It was nothing really; in a week we had, like sensible children, accepted the new wood, with its tree-stumps, its piles of bats and faggots; and we soon played happily over the very ruins of the wood we had lost."

Deservedly, then, this new book has introduced Frank Kendon to a wider audience. But will they leave it at that, we wonder, and wait expectantly for his next book of prose? Personally, very much as we have enjoyed "The Small Years," we dare to hope that his next book will be a return to poetry: for poetry, when all is said and done, is Mr. Kendon's job. Previous to this last work, he had published four other volumes, of which three were poetry. When he was still up at Cambridge, he appeared as one of a quartet in "Poems by Four Authors." Then followed, in this order, "Mural Paintings in English Churches" (an Introductory Essay on the Folk Influence in Religious Art); "Poems and Sonnets"; "Arguments and Emblems"; and "A Life and Death of Judas Iscariot."

The background of most of Frank Kendon's poetry is the country. From it he has drawn his best inspiration; but, not being in the main an objective poet, he has not sought so much to paint it in words as to let it serve him symbolically. Yet his eye is clear enough at times. "The Small Years" gives, in exquisite detail, some account of the particular country-side in which he was born—that old and fertile stretch of the Kentish Weald that lies between Tonbridge and Cranbrook. Little has happened, fortunately, to spoil that rural loveliness even to-day—with its miles of apple and other orchards, its lily-ponds, its hop-fields, its white-kilned oast-houses, and its quiet, hospitable villages: in Mr. Kendon's youth, however, it was, if possible, quieter and lovelier still. In such a green land, then, he unconsciously harvested the rich store of rural experience ("the tiny circumstance of peace" as another country-hearted poet has put it) that later he was destined to give back again transmuted into poetry. He might travel far afield in the years to come; but it would always be to that Kentish country-side that his eager mind would return. Thus, though he saw war service in Palestine, it was not of the stony hills and cyclamens there, or of the mosques and white-robed Arabs, that he wrote: instead,

> "The brightest thing we knew
> In a land of gaudy flowers,
> Was a daisy tipped with dew,
> English! Ours!"

Not, of course, that he was a poet of any one part of the country rather than of another: home to him is wherever a lark sings over ploughed fields, or a wild violet hides in a green bank, or an English glow-worm lights its tiny lantern in a tangle of grass. Were it otherwise he might easily be a lesser poet than he is. He sings of the country-side not only because he cares for it æsthetically, but because, in so caring for it, he finds therein inspiration for his own (and our) spiritual illumination. Nature is a mirror which he holds up wherein we may see, not so much lark and violet and glow-worm, as our own selves by these things made splendidly responsive Both in "Poems and Sonnets" and in "Arguments and Emblems" the prevailing imagery is of spring; but beneath, all the while, the singing is of Life's own Spring of Love.

> "And thou, thou dearest treader of the slopes
> Of morning, look with courage and be blind:
> Live by the lark's example, Sweet, whose hope
> Grew into wings and left his doubts behind.
>
> "O little bird, begin thy song again,
> The deaf Earth hears thee in her dreams, and sighing
> Turns from her sleep, although her dreams remain—
> Lies listening to thee, pleased beyond replying.
>
> "O Love, not deaf as Earth, it is thy day;
> Hark to the lark that slept on earth so long,
> He's mounted with the mists and gone away,
> And now he calls the sun up with a song."

Though Frank Kendon's poetic background, then, is the English country-side, his ultimate concern, every time, is with man's spirit—its yearnings, its aspirations, its finest efforts to fight a way into expression through the paradoxically entrammelling flesh. All the beauties of earth and heaven are not enough if love is not in the human heart to inform them:

> "Therefore be thou, and not the stars, my faith,
> For in thy absence heaven and earth are void.
> Let not my wonder waste itself on death
> While thou, alive, can keep my heart employed.
> Thy age, thy tender youth, thy groans, thy mirth,
> Thy winged and daring love,
> These are the true creators of the earth,
> And heaven was a waste of stars till, looking forth,
> Thou didst discover beauty in the way they move."

There is the final appeal of Mr. Kendon's love-poetry: it sings the highest reach of love. In the opening poem to the "Arguments and Emblems" volume there is a line that runs, "Love is unjust that seeks an end"; and that particular philosophy is as a leitmotiv threading through all his work. Love that looks beyond the flesh can have no end. By such love the lover attains immortality: in the very measure of his ability so to love he reaches out to Love itself—to Life—yes, to God, if so you will have it.

Here, then, is a young poet whose achievement has already assured him a very definite place among the moderns—though that is a term he would probably scorn. He may have shown little concern with "window-dressing," but that is not because of his dislike of, or inability in, experiment. His numerous sonnets show the maturity of his technique. And his invention of "analysed rhyme" is a definite contribution to English prosody:

> "O tarry for me, sweet;
> I shall stir, I shall wake!
> And the melody you seek > Shall be lovely, though late."

That his is not only a lyric genius was shown in the long narrative of Judas Iscariot. The point of view (i.e. of Judas as an impatient idealist, capable of the deepest remorse, unable to wait for any less immediate heaven than one here and now) was not exactly a new one: what was new, however, was the sensitive development of Judas's character, from boyhood, against the beautifully conceived background of Judea. Mr. Kendon's enforced sojourn in Palestine was there put to noble advantage. One hopes for another long narrative poem from his pen. He has already blown fresh life into more than one of the old legends, such as "Orpheus" and (in MS.) "Tristran": will he not turn, now, to some more constructive theme of to-day?

C. HENRY WARREN.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

AUGUST, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 12th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I and II will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

IMPORTANT.—Please note change of date.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for a short description (one hundred and fifty words) of the literary associations of any place visited during the holiday season.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best commentary, in not more than one hundred and fifty words, of Goethe's remark: "The dear good people don't know how long it takes to learn to read. I've been at it eighty years, and can't say yet that I've reached the goal."

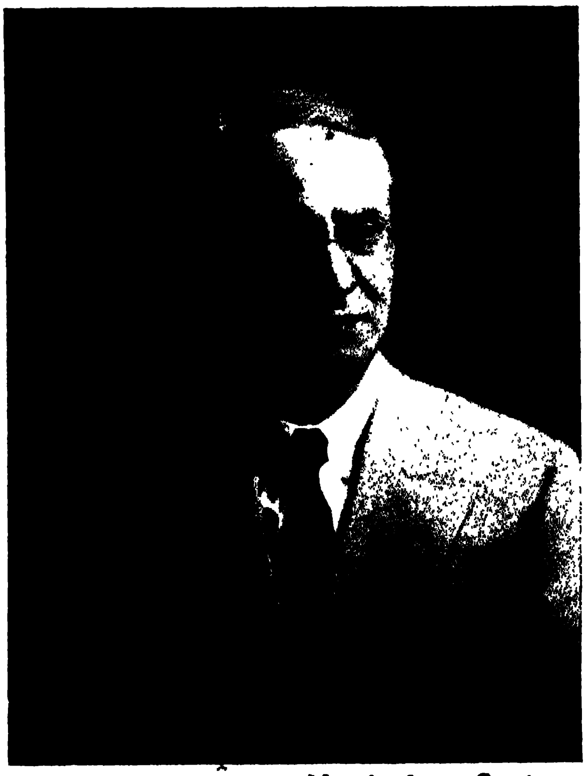
V.—HALF A GUINEA for the best example of a five-word jewel phrase, such as "Laburnums, dropping wells of fire," giving source.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JULY.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to May Herschel Clarke, 254, Burrage Road, Woolwich, S.E.18, for the following:



DIAMOND ON MY LADY'S FINGER.

Diamond on my lady's finger,
Lights that flash, and glow, and linger,
Like some elfin spirit peeping,
Darting, glinting, dancing, leaping;
Prisoned 'gainst that tender flesh,
Caught within a golden mesh:

Amber have you for her hair—
Delicious, scented, sun-wrought snare!
(Would I might languish a century there!);
Sapphire for her deep blue eyes,
Blue of the warm Italian skies;
Ruby, too, for her red young mouth,
Warm with the passion of the South;
But oh, what colour have you there,
Diamond, to which I can compare
The dimple playing hide-and-seek
Amid the peach-blossom of her cheek!

Diamond on my lady's finger,
Lights that flash, and glow, and linger,
Could I all your beauty know,
Whence you come and whither go;
All your fair inconstancies,
What your fiery essence is;
Could I grasp each changeful mood,
Catch each coloured interlude,
String it on a golden chain,
Like a thread of sunlit rain;
Could I wear upon my heart
Of your beauty every part;
Could I catch and clasp you whole,
Fiery one, unto my soul—
Something, then, O gem aglow,
Of a woman might I know,
Of my lady understand,
Diamond on her dainty hand!

We also select for printing:

Mr. Andrew Soutar, author of "Not Mentioned" (Hutchinson).
Reviewed on page 304.

CRIPPLE SONG.

I can go down to no broad sea,
Yet, with a heart on fire,
I loose for utmost ends of earth
The ships of my desire.

Though I may lift no single sail
To net the morning's rose,
Daybreak is mine, and every tide,
And every wind that blows.

My brother men are sped with flutes,
They track the farthest star;
But I move out with never a sound,
And journey twice as far.

Yearlong they challenge armèd suns,
Waylay a pilgrim moon;
And still account sweet venture less
Than I that tire so soon.

The fans of heaven are spread for them,
Her tents of cloud unfold;
Where all is change and time is not,
I fear nor heat nor cold.

Through many a happy dusk they slide
To shallows and to sleep;
High on the bound of dream is set
The lovely watch I keep.

I can go down to no broad sea,
Yet, with a heart at peace,
Nightly I bring from ends of earth
The ships of my release.

(D. F. Larkin, "Winchelsea," Reigate Road, Brighton.)

We also highly commend the lyrics by Ella Rivers Noble (Long Melford), R. J. Cowlin (Mold), B. O. Johnson (Cradley Heath), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), George S. Astins (Hove), John E. Woods (Coventry), J. M. Watson (Bute), S. R. Noyes (Johannesburg, South Africa), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), M. G. Hughes, Kathleen Blyth (West Hartlepool), Alice E. Collinge (Harwood), Joyce S. Benning (Dunstable), Hilda Crutchley (Winchmore Hill), Alice Winterhalder (West Ham), Irene Hubbard (Steeple Claydon), Margaret F. Woodzell (Plymouth), H. Broadberry Seaman (Bayswater), Teresa Bellamy Noble (Long Melford).

II.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to John A. Bellchambers, 40, Highgate Hill, N.19, for the following:

SPEED FEVER. BY BARRY LYNDON. (Nelson.)

"The rest is silence."

SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, Act V, Sc. 2.

We also select for printing:

MENTAL RADIO: DOES IT WORK, AND HOW? BY UPTON SINCLAIR. (Werner Laurie.)

"I grieve to say, I've winked at him,
And he has winked at me."

Bab Ballads ("Gentle Alice Brown").

(J. N. Banister, "Rollestone," Malden Street, Leyland, Lancs.)

BEYOND OUR KEN. BY MRS. ARTHUR STALLARD. (Elliot Stock.)

"She served kind, gentle masters,
Nor asked for rest nor change."

ADELAIDE ANN PROCTOR, "A Legend of Bregenz."

(J. E. A. Gedge, Cothelestone, Bagborough, near Taunton, Som.)

DOWSED LIGHTS. BY ADAM SADLER. (Ward, Lock.)

"There's husbandry in heaven,
Their candles are all out."

SHAKESPEARE, Macbeth.

(Mrs. Rabertson, 66, R. L. Stevenson Avenue, Bournemouth.)

SPEED FEVER. BY BARRY LYNDON. (Nelson.)

"He went with one prance
From Turkey to France."

EDWARD LEAR, Nonsense Rhyme.

(May Godfrey, Brockham, Danbury, Essex.

ESCAPADE. BY EVELYN SCOTT. (Jonathan Cape.)

"Saile against Rocks and split them too,
Aye! and a world of Pikes passe through!"

ROBERT HERRICK, His Cavalier.

(J. H. Plummer, 10, Court Road, Horfield, Bristol.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best list of six poetical similes is awarded to J. N. Banister, "Rollestone," Malden Street, Leyland, Lancashire, for the following:

1. "Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self."
KEATS, To a Nightingale.

2. "It is a beauteous evening, calm and free;
The holy time is quiet as a Nun
Breathless with adoration . . ."
WORDSWORTH, By the Sea.

3. "I touched the heart that loved me,
As a player touches a lyre."
ALICE MEYNELL, Without Him.

4. "He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunderbolt he falls."
TENNYSON, The Eagle.

5. "Between two worlds life hovers like a star."
BYRON.

6. "As she passed it seemed like the ceasing of exquisite music."
LONGFELLOW.

We also select for printing:

1. "I saw Eternity the other night
Like a great ring of pure and endless light."
HENRY VAUGHAN, A Vision.

2. "I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills."
WORDSWORTH, The Daffodils.

3. "It is a beauteous evening, calm and free;
The holy time is quiet as a Nun
Breathless with adoration . . ."
WORDSWORTH, By the Sea.

4. "And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer Never to hope again."
SHAKESPEARE, Henry VIII, Act III, Sc. 2.

5. "I see you stand like greyhounds in the slips, Straining upon the start."
SHAKESPEARE, Henry V, Act III, Sc. 1.

6. "And the barge with oar and sail
Moved from the brink like some full-breasted swan."
TENNYSON, Morte d'Arthur.

(John E. Woods, 63, Mayfield Road, Earlsdon, Coventry.)

We also select for special commendation the replies by A Davidson (Glasgow), Alice Winterhalder (West Ham), Ethel M. Kennedy (London, S.W.), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Grace M. Yallop (Gorleston-on-Sea), Emily Davis (Dublin), G. D. Mobbs (Birmingham), E. M. Glaister (Hampstead), A. C. Marshall (Edinburgh), John Coghlan (Dublin), L. Bruce (Ashford), N. Ray (Belfast), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), B. A. Billings (Manchester), Melfin W. Jones (Cardiff), Edith M. Walker (Bournemouth), Ruth K. Watt (Pulborough), John A. Bellchambers (London, N.), Fred B. Urquhart (Edinburgh), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), M. Luckham (West Kirby), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), May Godfrey (Danbury), M. E. Arthy (Esher).

Mr. James W. Bennett, author of "Chinese Blake," to be published shortly by Messrs. Skeffington.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best definition of (1) wit, (2) humour, with a short passage from a well-known writer illustrative of each, has been awarded to Edith M. Glaister, 19, Belsize Avenue, Hampstead, N.W.3, for the following:

WIT is the hitting of nails on the head, consciously and aptly, but not necessarily truthfully:

"He who can does, he who can't teaches."—SHAW.

HUMOUR is the juxtaposition of the incongruous and truth, often unconsciously characteristic:

"Howiver, I'm not denyin' the women are foolish: God Almighty made 'em to match the men" (Mrs. Poyser) —G. ELIOT.

We also select for printing:

WIT—The revelation of unexpected similarity or dissimilarity between previously unconnected ideas or expressions:

"A cynic is a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing."—O. WILDE.

Humour—The contingency of ludicrous incongruities in character or situation:

"Bunthorne: The poem is finished and my soul has gone out into it. It is a wild, weird, fleshly thing; yet very yearning, very tender, very precious. It is called, 'Oh, Hollow! Hollow! Hollow!'

"Patience: Is it a hunting song?"

(L. F. Goldsmid, 30, Crockerton Road, S.W.17.)

Surely Wit is common sense, or intellectual acuity, while Humour is the "mind's twinkle," which makes living worth while.

The cleric husband who introduced his wife to the Bishop showed wit when he said: "A poor thing, my lord, but mine own!" His wife showed humour (poor thing, she needed it!), when she replied: "A poorer thing, my lord, but mine owner!"

(J. A. Jenkins, 139, Heathfield Road, Handsworth, Birmingham.)

We also select for special commendation the replies by B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), L. Bruce (Ashford), Captain Wm. Jaggard (Stratford-on-Avon), Emily Davis (Dublin), J. D. Mobbs (Birmingham), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Kathleen Blyth (West Hartlepool), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden), D. Coop (Brighton), N. Ray (Belfast), B. A. Billings (Manchester), A. Davidson (Glasgow).

V.—The Prize of Half a Guinea for the best criticism, in not more than twenty-four lines of verse, of any book advertised or reviewed in the July Bookman, is awarded to Emily Davis, 23, Mornington Road, Ranelagh, Dublin, S.W.9, for the following:

Compton Mackenzie's "April Fools"
(Via the house where Cassell rules),
Tells how John Touchwood, risen to fame,
By writing plays, bestows his name,
Sub rosa, on his clerk, a lady
His relatives consider shady;
He asks these friends to dine upon
The First of April, when he's gone
A-honeymooning, having left
A lengthy note to that effect,
Which also wills, in compensation,
Share in his house to each relation:
Three families, well primed for strife,
A bachelor enjoying life,
A widow and her priggish son,
All shareholders, provide the fun,
Which waxes fast and furious, true,
Yet from this reader's point of view,
Although the cast are faithful all
To type, the fun begins to pall
Before the end; the writer seems Intoxicated with his dreams.
But it's a yarn that all should read
Who love a laugh; they'll feast indeed.

We also select for printing:

THE ENGLISH INN. By Thomas Burke.

The drought may do its sultry best
To thwart desire for work,
But those who own some kind of car—
Though springs may fail and brakes may jar—
Find, wishful to refresh their rest,
A guide in Mr. Burke.

He tells us how with radiant sign,
Our country-side displays
The little hostelries and great,
Where gracious landlords stand and wait
To serve who will but pause to dine:
And he who lingers, stays.

"The Rent Day"—ne'er forgot when seen!
"You Might As Well" go there;
"No Hurry," and, for him who'll trapse
To Aldgate, is the "Hoop and Grapes";
"The Quiet Woman"—how serene
And how benignly fair!

"The Black Boy and the Stomach-ache"—
Intriguing as it reads,
But indicates the generous fare
That left the child no room to spare:
Then, English traveller, come and take
According to your needs!

(A. E. Pinnington, 70, Pitt Street, Norwich.)

We also highly commend the replies from B. A. Billings (Manchester), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Edith M. Glaister (Hampstead), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Agatha Honnywill (Portishead), J. A. Jenkins (Birmingham), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne.)

VI.—The Prize of Half a Guinea for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book, is awarded to E. D. Young, 1, Bryn Bowydd, Blaenau Festiniog, for the following:

WAR IN HEAVEN. By Charles Williams. (Gollancz.)

Constantly we seek that mental refuge, of which our need grows even greater, in a fantastic life permeating the commonplace, as detective stories make the common policeman a form of high romance. Mr. Williams goes further. From the conventional opening—a dead body—he takes us by natural stages to where, in modern England, black magic strives with Prester John over the battered Holy Grail. Breathlessly we follow the conflict—a publisher and an archdeacon among its protagonists—and the highest possible tribute to the author is our deep satisfaction and relief when magnificently the powers of righteousness prevail.

We also select for printing:

LORD CARNOCK. By Harold Nicolson. (Constable.)

The chief attraction of this book lies in its honesty and clear conception. The understanding and appreciation afforded Lord Carnock by his son enlists unwittingly the reader's eager interest. We follow not only his career but the man himself, his personality and interest in life drawing us from Germany to Persia, from Morocco to the Embassy in St. Petersburg. The points of acutest interest centre round the Algeciras Conference and events leading to the Great War. Here is a book of real interest to all, but particularly to the student of history and lovers of a good biography.

(Renée Allen, 33, Huskisson Street, Liverpool.)

We also select for special commendation the reviews by D. Orford (London, S.E.), Isobel Neil (Cricklewood), B. Noel Saxelby (Buxton), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), Agatha Honnywill (Portishead), Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson (Manchester), Robert K. Spedding (Liverpool), Malcolm Hemphrey (Farnborough), Barbara Hughes-Stanton (Kensington), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), Dallas Kenmare (Barnt Green), Joan Vale (Moss Vale), S. R. Fuller (Streatham), Evelyn Bamber (Blackburn), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Mrs. W. E. Haslam (Cheltenham), N. Ray (Belfast), M. Luckham (West Kirby), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Mrs. E. G. Elton (Norbury), J. A. Jenkins (Birmingham), Keith Baddeley (Chesham).

VII.—A Prize of One Year's Subscription to The Bookman is awarded to Barbara Hughes-Stanton, Scarsdale Lodge, Wright's Lane, W.8, and to Robert K. Spedding, 92, Hartington Road, Liverpool.

AMBROSE BIERCE.*

By CLIFFORD BOWER-SHORE.

SIXTEEN years ago, Ambrose Bierce, man of letters, writer of fiction, essays, fables, satires and verse, shook the dust of Washington from his feet and went to Mexico, at that time in turmoil of revolution. And there the curtain falls. No confirmation of his death has been received, although his pupil and confidant, Dr. Adolph Danziger de Castro, is reported to have had a confession from Pancho Villa, the bandit chief of Mexico, who stated that Bierce, having been driven from the camp for criticising his (Villa's) methods, was followed by two soldiers and shot.

Ambrose Bierce.

Bierce was a strange man. Born in Ohio in 1842, he fought as a volunteer in the American Civil War, and took part in Sherman's march through Georgia He was promoted to the rank of major, and was wounded once. After demobilisation he drifted into journalism, and in 1872 came to London, where he wrote for Fun, at that time edited by Tom Hood Returning to America in 1876, he managed a mining company for some time before turning wholeheartedly to literary work. His letters reveal him to be an admirer of Shakespeare, prove that he was unselfish and encouraged talent in others, and afford striking evidence that he wrote for art's sake, and would not pander to "shallow public taste." His few intimate friends are conclusive in their belief that he went to Mexico as a means of committing suicide, for his last remark to them was "Everywhere I go I see only fools, and I am sick of it." In that sentence he admirably summed up the cynical attitude towards life displayed throughout his work.

Genius! In these days the word is far too often used, but none can legitimately gainsay Bierce's claim to the title. He wrote two of the most queer books in the world. In the first, "The Devil's Dictionary" (or as it was first called, "The Cynic's Word Book"), he finds a clear field for his petulant wit, and to read this masterpiece of both suave and bitter cynicism is to be forcibly reminded of the glib Johnson. Quaint definitions, curious traces of whimsey, flashing, stinging satire, all gambol daintily in this book which alone assures Bierce of posterity. It is here that Bierce, the short story writer, reveals his hatred for the longer form of literary art, when he defines "The novel . . . A short story padded. The art of writing novels is long dead. Peace to its ashes, some of which have a large sale."

The second weird volume is "Fantastic Fables." Many of the fables are original, but others are founded upon those of Æsop transformed by the touch of biting irony. Witty and cynical, showing a profound knowledge of human nature, he leers at conceit, sneers at false virtue and hates corruption.

It was in the most difficult branch of literary art that Bierce chose to exploit his astonishing gifts, for the short story was his true métier. Because he wrote stories that ended with a "snap" it has been said to his detriment that Bierce was "a magazine story writer." Bierce paints subsidiary detail with caution and local colour with skill. His stark simplicity, uniting beauty of diction with truth of presentation, arouses wonder, apprehension, curiosity and thrill, and the climax arrives with the reader pent-up with emotion. Then comes the startling dénouement, subtly simple, extremely plausible and pregnant with power. Bierce, the soldier, had lived dangerously. His stories of the American Civil War are among his best, realistic to a high degree, provocative of deep thought. He portrays for us the true horror of war without the obscenities resultant of retrospective thought, and the effect is to leave on the mind of the reader a more lasting impression of the futility and wanton waste of war than is made by any of the imaginative war novels at present in vogue.

Bierce's prose was strong, fluent and rhythmical. His vocabulary was like a river in spate, and though at times he was given to "fine" writing it can never be termed "tormented." He wrote a quantity of useless stuff, not surprising in view of his prolific output, and when he wrote badly he was insufferable.

Excelling in the macabre type of story, Bierce's work in this sphere loses nothing by comparison with that of Edgar Allan Poe. His morbid masterpieces are powerful in theme and forcibly told with perfect economy of technique. The bizarre, the mystic, the strange and extraordinary all attain plausibility under his skilful pen. On occasion his characters are shadowy, yet contradictorily alive, moving in an atmosphere of graphic horror and vague terror. He unveils unforgettable pictures of life, stripped of rhetoric, prejudices and padding, revealing himself a master in the art of living as well as of fiction. His vivid style imparts a tremor to every nerve, and the ultimate thrill is obtained by uncanny power of description. At his best he never wastes a word, his unique artistry ingeniously served by simple and subtle realism.

* "In the Midst of Life." (Chatto & Windus)—"Can Such Things Be?" (Jonathan Cape)—"The Monk and the Hangman's Daughter" and "Fantastic Fables." (Jonathan Cape.)—"The Eyes of the Panther." (Jonathan Cape)—American Publishers: Albert and Charles Boni. 3s. 6d each.

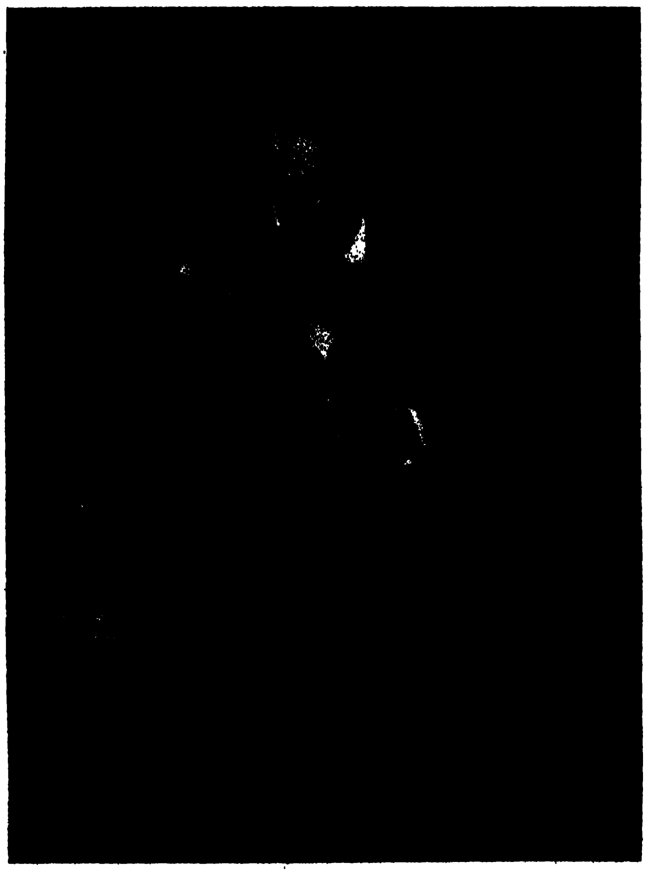
Bierce was the first to exploit the loose penetrative type of story favoured by many present day writers, who sacrifice plot, variety of character, action and place, to depth and subtlety with a rich vein of psychology. Grim and crisp in manner, with fearful dramatic power, he creates oppressive atmospheres, and reveals the malignant powers exercised by the dormant, so terribly detailed in "The Man and the Snake," a story to be found in the volume, "The Eyes of the Panther." Blending realism and fantasy with a happy sense of proportion, he suggests rather than portrays morbidity.

On the other hand he is a master of the extensive type of story, replete with a variety of characters, cunning in plot, with but simple psychology. Here by skilful plot development he produces an unforgettable story, alive with incident, straightforwardness and surprise. The climax of his stories are the cumulative effect of every sentence written, forming a harmonious and satisfying whole.



Bierce was a humorist too and, at his best, a most delightful one. His humour is typically American, consisting of under and over statement. The type of humour which treats the commonplace with portentous seriousness, and refers to barbarity and catastrophe with levity. His humour, although possessing richness, piquancy and stimulation, is in a lower category than his serious work, but illustrates admirably the catholicity of Bierce's talent. Even in humour Bierce's genius for the macabre is manifest, for he excels in the grinning skull type of wit. Five of his humorous stories are to be found in "The Eyes of the Panther."

Ambrose Bierce made a very definite and decidedly individual contribution to the art of the short story.

EDWARD JOHN TRELAWNY.*

By S. M. Ellis.

ONE of the most remarkable of the band of men and women who have obtained enduring remembrance by means of their intimacy with the great, and so passed into the realms of fame by hanging on to the skirts of the Immortals, was the Bombastes Furioso of the nineteenth century, Edward John Trelawny. This burly Cornishman was born in 1792, and in the course of a long life of romantic adventure—much elaborated and embroidered in the records he wrote of it—had experiences as a sailor and a privateer in the Indian Ocean, fought in Greece, swam Niagara, and married four wives, two of whom were wild, far-eastern maidens (though even thus he fell short of the aspiration of the youth in "The Lay of the Lovelorn," "I will wed some savage woman—nay, I'll wed at least a dozen"). Finally he died in the year 1881, and had his mortal dust deposited beside that of the immortal Shelley in Rome, no mean achievement. Thus he had in the course of nearly ninety years lived from the spacious days of the eighteenth century, through the period of the Romantics and the Regency, into what his biographer, Mr. Massingham, would call the most otiose and porcine decade of the Victorian era. For though Mr. Massingham is commendably free from the airy persiflage so common to the younger biographers, he has no respect for the period which he terms "The Great Frost," "a bear-garden for cruelty," "an enbalming paste," and all manner of other unpleasant things. But in his biographer's phrase, "Trelawny was the only one of the Great Victorians who was not a Victorian": his enduring fame is not to seek in that era, but in the few months of the year 1821 which he passed in the society of Shelley in Italy, consummated by the part he played in the appalling drama or ritual of the burning of the poet's mutilated body on the sea-shore.

E. J. Trelawny.

From a photograph in the possession of Mrs. Call.
From "The Friend of Shelley," by H. J. Massingham (Cobden-Sanderson).

The career of Trelawny was thus remarkably eventful, even though the accounts of his early exploits and adventures as recorded in his well-known autobiographical romance, "The Adventures of a Younger Son," need to be condimented with more than one grain of salt. This being so, Trelawny's life would seem to provide an excellent opportunity for a straightforward narrative biography, compact of picturesque description, particularly as hitherto no extended memoir of the man has been written. But for reasons he does not explain, Mr. Massingham says Trelawny's life is quite unsuited to that method, that is, "the usual course of an historical biography." I should have thought the opposite to be the case when the pen was handled by such a clever and cultured writer as Mr. Massingham, for though this is said to be his first essay in the art of biography, he shows that he possesses many of the primary gifts of the biographer—sympathy, intuition, an acute sense of psychology and, in the stock phrase, a gift for analysis of motive and character. What he lacks is an appreciation of illustrative detail and coherent incident so essential for building up the complete portrait of a man. His story does not progress or paint pictures: it lingers and speculates.

* "The Friend of Shelley." A Memoir of Edward John Trelawny. By H. J. Massingham. 21s. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

So it is, his book is mainly an examination of Trelawny's relations with Shelley, Byron, and Mary Shelley, and how these associates reacted on him, and he again on them. I think he has taken too grandiose a view of Trelawny's personality and attributed more importance to his influence on Shelley and Byron than can be substantiated by the facts. His theory that Byron's delight in guying the absurdities and gasconading boasts of the Cornish giant—a very Caliban at the withering blast of the poet's sarcasm—degenerated into a sadistic pleasure is a wild one. It amused Byron to air and exercise his persiflage on the writhing Bombastes; but that this wit had a deteriorating effect upon Byron's character, or that Trelawny thereby developed, in modern jargon, an "inferiority complex" (a "superiority complex" was ever his trouble) are postulates not easy to prove. As for Shelley, it is hard to find that he regarded Trelawny as anything more than what he called "a wild but kind-hearted seaman." He was without doubt a devoted and faithful friend to Shelley, who appreciated the fact; but one cannot take Trelawny's own statements, in his published "Recollections," of his relations with Shelley and Byron as altogether correct, for he was a congenital rodomontado, a veritable Baron Munchausen, one who exaggerated his performances and experiences perhaps unconsciously, for he would transmute even ascertainable facts, as when he said, "I built Byron a yacht," whereas he had merely been engaged to skipper the vessel. His egoism was as clamant as that of his namesake, the Trelawny whose fellow Cornishmen would know the reason why if he demised.

But his very exaggerations and exorbitances make him a remarkable figure, and as such he attracted the pens of Landor and Meredith and the brush of Millais. And he has been even more fortunate in attracting such a talented biographer at long last, for Mr. Massingham's volume is full of clever phrases and passages which compel thought, sometimes to agreement and at other times to controversy. This is a skilful exercise in dialectics, and my only doubt is if the subject is worthy of the thesis.

HARTLEY COLERIDGE.*

Professor Griggs has done a real service to literature in laying emphasis on the figure of Hartley Coleridge. His book was a successful thesis for a London doctorate in philosophy; but it is none the less a very readable contribution to the art of biography. It is the sympathetic presentation, carefully based on documents of which some of the most interesting are new, of a remarkable man, whose faults, if he had any, were far outweighed by his misfortunes.

Hartley's initial misfortune of course was to have been born the son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It might be argued with equal plausibility that that was his initial good luck. Had he not been Samuel's son, and brought up beneath the benevolent shadows of Wordsworth and Southey, occasionally illuminated by the firefly brightness of Lamb, it is possible that he would never have felt any call to literary expression.

On the other hand it is obvious that the circumstances of his childhood were impossibly exacting. His heritage was a highly nervous organisation. The power of his imagination was the wonder of a circle of elders which included the most imaginative men of that generation; and his infantile ratiocination was the amazement even of his father, who was accustomed to take such capacities for granted.

So far so good. Hartley was obviously nurtured in the very hotbed of genius. But there is another side of the picture. With Coleridge and Wordsworth writing poems to him, and exclaiming over his astonishing sagacity, his delicate organisation was unhealthily stimulated. He early came to recognise himself as something rather wonderful, which every recorded utterance of his childhood—and surprisingly many have been recorded—proves him to have been. At the same time he was equally early made aware that his father was a person of such outstanding capacity that he could never hope to emulate him: and that is another indubitable proposition, for if Samuel Taylor Coleridge's achievement had been in proportion to his potentialities, he would certainly have been, as both poet and philosopher, one of the world figures. The result was that Hartley grew up with an uncomfortable mixture of vanity and a sense of inferiority. It was wounded vanity which, when he failed to achieve the confidently expected Newdigate, threw him into the despair which he assuaged in alcohol. And it was his "inferiority complex" which was to tie his hands to the end of his days. He died—an old man in early middle age—an "ineffectual angel"; not, in the accepted sense of the word, beautiful; but, as mortals go, as good an angel as most.

Nor was he so ineffectual as he believed himself to be or as it has been too readily taken for granted that he was. Hartley Coleridge was a poet, and a poet is to be judged by his poetry. And to examine Hartley's poetry disinterestedly, forgetting that he was the son of a great man, a drunkard and an admitted failure in life, is to be astonished at its quality. He was incapable of sustained effort, and happiest in fetters. Therefore he wrote sonnets, preferring the strict Petrarchian convention. The best of his sonnets are among the finest in English. They are at once exact and easy. With whatever Hartley wished to say he could fill, to the brim but without overflow, his measure of fourteen lines. For the most part a meditative and introspective poet, he was a true romantic of his generation who, if he looked inward upon himself, also looked outward upon the world of natural phenomena. And he had a gift of pictorial expression which the very much greater but very much untidier Wordsworth might well have envied. At his best Hartley Coleridge wrote with the precision of Tennyson and the passionate simplicity of Christina Rossetti.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

* "Hartley Coleridge: His Life and Work." By Earl Leslie Griggs. 6s. (University of London Press.)

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

In connection with the death of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, spiritualists and others are discussing the possibility of checking his communications from the other side by means of finger prints. It is indicative of his vitality and quick interest to the end that he was deeply interested in this matter just before his death. Certain it is that he has left his mark on his own times as writer and man. Best known as the creator of Sherlock Holmes, he himself had long passed beyond that stage in his development and preferred to be known as the author of "The White Company," as historian, and as a scientific investigator and firm believer in the life after death and in the communication between the embodied and the disembodied. Death had no place in his beliefs nor in his estimate of life. Perhaps our finest tribute to him was our instinctive belief in his absolute sincerity even when we strongly disagreed with what he regarded as scientific proofs of communication. He lived a full life and fought a good fight and never stained a page. His last book, "The Edge of the Unknown," just issued by John Murray, has all the marks of his versatility and courage—do you recall E. H. Lacon Watson's article in the August BOOKMAN, 1929, on Conan Doyle as Poet?

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

I was glad to have a letter from Alfred Tresidder Sheppard a few days ago. He is spending a few weeks in Belgium, it may be a few months, but as you will see from this issue, his works do follow him. I expect he finds Belgium as quiet as Saffron Walden and has chosen it for that reason. Amid such quietness I hope his mind is deeply embroiled in the rich life of other days which in due time will result in another of his historical novels, for he always gives us reliable history and a fine story. Many of his readers, however, do not know his power as a short story writer and should read "Tuck o' Drum" just published by Hodder & Stoughton.

I see that H. G. Wells recalls history and continues prophecy in his new novel, "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham," with which we shall deal at length in our next issue. He has this at least in common with Cromwell that he knows how to say: "Take away that bauble," and has his own clear ideas of the baubles he would have taken away Heinemanns published the book late in July and Low contributes some characteristic cartoons.

It is proposed to publish a Memoir and selection of letters of the late Romer Wilson. Letters from her correspondents would be welcomed and returned by Edward J. O'Brien, Villa Pauliska, Muralto - Locarno, Switzerland.

In an appreciative letter Mr. Wilfred Partington thinks Dr. W. S. Crockett however gave too much credit to Scott, in his review of "The Private Letter Books of Sir Walter Scott," edited by Wilfred Partington. All that Sir Walter did was to write on the backs of a good many of the letters the names of the writers, sometimes the dates, and very occasionally a comment. The real editing, "overhauling, assorting, annotating," etc., cost Mr. Partington six years hard labour. And the book was worth it.

Almost, if not absolutely, the last words written by St. John Adcock for publication were: "Somebody has been asking, What would you do if you were left a million? Take it." Hetty Green certainly would and would have grumbled that it was not two!—"Hetty Green," by Boyden Sparkes and Samuel Taylor Moore (Heinemann). I found it difficult to read as a biography, the facts awkwardly presented at times, the chronology doubling and twisting about and the writing poor. But it should not be approached as a biography; it is a study in disease. Its interest is pathological not biographical. She had the Midas touch in the double sense, all things turned to gold and all her gold was dust. She was the richest woman in America and the poorest woman in the world. The book might be condensed with advantage and issued as a Tract for the Times—how to succeed in missing life. Such a tract ought to be distributed free, both to the Haves and the Have Nots. It would be a valuable contribution which would do something to modify the bitterness of class warfare, the root of which is the root of all evil.

Mr. E. O. Hoppé.

Reproduced from Sydney Press Cutting.

Talking about money, we are all watching with keen interest the opening round of the book price fight in America. A few American publishers are listing new novels at one dollar instead of the customary two dollars and a half. With the complications of publishers' economics we cannot deal at this time—amount and cost of distribution, advertising, overheads, etc. What I am concerned about is that I still catch myself noticing when I pay 7s. 6d. for a book and at the same time taking as a matter of course the cost of other things like a business lunch, a seat at the theatre and the necessary trimmings, clothes—I have just visited my tailor! I remember a year when I felt I had been especially reckless in book-buying—and found I had spent less than £20. The running of my cycle and side-car that year had cost me nearer £100 than £80. The question as to whether books are too dear or not is for many of us more a question of psychology than of economics, a question affecting our scale of values rather than the state of our finance.

Portrait by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe.

Mr. E. O. Hoppé has reached Australia in his world tour with his camera. A friend has sent me an enthusiastic letter with a press cutting, giving an account of the exhibition in Sydney of Mr. Hoppé's work. I know he will appreciate the title they have given him, "Photographer of Nothing." "He shoots his camera at four empty casks and a few empty bottles, and you see the dried soul in the shard of prohibition." Whatever this may mean, it sounds terrible. Mr. Hoppé has gone on to Central Australia and the Great Barrier Reef. Many of us are looking forward to seeing the world through the lens of a camera in the hands of this incomparable artist.

The time of the singing of birds has come, and almost gone. I think I am one of many for whom flowers and birds mean more as the years go by. Emphatically however I shall never sit down to study all about the habits of birds, their eggs, food, etc. And yet I want to be able to identify the birds that live in my garden and those I meet in my travels about England. I have found just the book I want which teaches me by pictures—"British Birds," by F. B. Kirkman and F. C. R. Jourdain (21s. net; Jacks). Each right hand page gives a beautifully coloured picture of the bird or birds in their natural colours and environment, whilst the left hand tells me all I am anxious to know about them. Such a book adds riches to the seasons.

Divorce, like the poor, is always and increasingly with us. Mr. Noel Douglas is to publish a book, "Divorce," in the early autumn expressing the views of H. G. Wells, Rebecca West, André Maurois, Warwick Deeping, Theodore Dreiser, Bertrand Russell and others. This will be at least interesting, if not final and conclusive.

Portrait by the Central Studios.

Miss Gillian Olivier,

Author of "The Broomwood Cellar" (Heinemann).

I saw a young man yesterday swaying in the Underground train all unaware that he was not in an easy chair. He was reading "Good Companions." It is one of the altogether good signs of our times that this book has attained such success and continues to win ardent admirers. It has been so much with us however that one was almost taken by surprise to learn that Heinemanns are to publish Mr. J. B. Preistley's new novel this month: "Angel Pavement." I like his title, which is indicative, for Mr. Priestley can always see the ladder in Charing Cross and help others to climb it.

Arbib-Hauser,
Joint author of "The Man Without a Necktie" (Stanley Paul).

Mr. John van Druten, the author of "Young Woodley," has certainly been on the way whilst writing his new novel, "A Woman on Her Way," which Putnams are to publish in September. The writing has been done in places as far apart as the Isle of Skye and the Riviera, solitude and society at least. The same firm announces for the autumn, an English edition of Michael Scholokov's post-revolutionary Russian novel, "The Silent Don," which Knopfs are issuing simultaneously in America. If we are to understand the Russians, ancient or modern, we shall have to turn to their literature rather than to their politics or economics. And understand them we must.

James Douglas once published a book, "The Man in the Pulpit." I have never read that book, but I know James Douglas as the parson of Fleet Street and the father confessor to thousands in every part of the world. Only a moiety of his writing is published, despite his magnificent contribution to current journalism. The greater part is in the form of letters to those who seek his guidance. There is no man in England who knows more of the sorrows of men and women than James Douglas and he has the wisdom and the courage to give of his best in those letters which never see the light, yet never fail to give light to those who receive them. He is strong enough to let his heart beat in his writing, a beat you can feel as you read "Down Shoe Lane," a volume of his collected articles just published by Herbert Joseph.

Portrait by Howard Coster, Photographer of Men.

Mr. James Douglas.

Arbib-Hauser,
Joint author of "The Man Without a Necktie" (Stanley Paul).

By the way, many will add to their special collector's shelf, "Celeste and other Sketches," by Stephen Hudson (18s.; Blackamore Press). Were it not a signed and limited edition it would still hold its place for the poignant beauty of the writing and for the joy of turning again and again to the exquisite wood engravings by John Nash. A few weeks ago in Germany, I wandered round my host's library after lunch, wandered hungrily. You see, he was an eminent bookbinder and his cases were full of choice books bound to match their inherent worth. Recently a friend of mine returned from Scandinavia deeply impressed with the book production he had seen, paper, type, imposition, printing and binding. It is all true, and equally true that we are still producing fine work in the British Isles.

I always fall for a book on Reading and suppose I always shall. Certainly I shall if written by John Livingston Lowes, whose four essays "Of Reading Books" (5s. net; Constable) brought this predilection to mind. They have also just issued a new and revised edition of "Convention and Revolt in Poetry," by the same author, to read which is a stimulating adventure and to re-read is a delight. To a degree that is seldom true, to read these two books constitutes a very liberal literary education. When he touches words they become luminous and incandescent, so that when he discusses Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," or the Bible, or when he compares Hardy's and Meredith's "Reading of Earth" much else is given by way of spiritual enlightenment.

Selma Lagerlöf has come to her own on our side of the North Sea and Elkin Mathews & Marrot are offering in the autumn a fine edition of her "Christ Legends," illustrated in black-and-white by Horace J. Knowles. This is their first appearance in an English edition. Collectors will naturally have their eye on two limited and signed editions coming from the same house: "Chelsea Way," by André Maurois, and "Two Stories," by Richard Aldington.

East has met with West and Black is mixing with White. A vivid insight into what this means is given in "Lobagola," an African savage's own story, issued by Knopf (10s. 6d.). Read as an adventure and as a human document it is thrilling. It does not leave the mind when the book is out of hand. You are doing a puzzling little sum of debit and credit. What is quite clear however is that the road for all of us is forward and not back.

A book that will interest Grecians is promised by the Oxford University Press for September—"Tradition and Design in the Iliad," by C. M. Bowra (10s. 6d. net). Mr. Bowra wrote the Introduction to the Oxford Book of Greek Verse, and is one of the younger Oxford dons. Another book from the same publishers will appeal to students of European history—"The Political Life and Letters of Cavour," by A. J. Whyte (17s. 6d. net), whose "Early Life and Letters of Cavour" is well known to students. The new book is promised for September.

Sir Ian Malcolm's "Lord Balfour" (7s. 6d. net; Macmillan), though slight has at least the merit of being close observations by one who knew Lord Balfour and worked with him for many years. It is a real loss that Lord Balfour did not live to complete his autobiography. In due course we shall have the story to where he had to lay the pen down, and later the completed story from other hands.

BOOKMAN.

Selma Lagerlöf.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

Mr. Clive Holland knows Belgium well, and a perusal of his friendly little book, THINGS SEEN IN BELGIUM (3s. 6d.; Seeley, Service), should help considerably to give the reader, if he has not already acquired it, a keen interest in that ill-fated little country, so rich in treasures of art and architecture. Only a few miles from our own coast it lies, and yet to visit some parts of it is like taking a step into the past. Brussels is there with all her up-to-date charm as well as her intricate history and priceless treasures, but Bruges with her legacies of Memling, the Van Eycks and many another continues to cast the elusive spell of her mediæval atmosphere as if in open defiance of modern progress. Its story down the ages is no less fascinating than the enchantment it lays upon the visitor of to-day, who probes its secluded nooks and corners in a spirit of perpetual wonder and delight.

In RAMBLES IN DEVON (7s. 6d.; Methuen), the completion of his West Country trilogy (having written previously of Somerset and Cornwall), Mr. J. H. Wade pays tribute to the playground of his youth and the land of his later adoption. He definitely aims at "the less showy but more serviceable task of providing the tourist with a catalogue of the chief things which he may expect to see," and in its accomplishment draws on the vast amount of miscellaneous information he has accumulated whilst tramping the "glorious" shire on foot from end to end and from shore to shore. Devonshire being the third largest county in England, the area is a large one, and Mr. Wade is to be congratulated on the variety of interests he has covered and the attention he has given to each.

THE NEW "PRUNELLA."

What happened to Prunella, after the night when she ran off with Pierrot from her "prim garden of the rectangular virtues" to taste a mummer's life? Her tale is already a classic—certainly the tenderest, daintiest, saddest little allegory that our stage has produced. Hitherto the details of that marriage—Innocence mated with the Romantic Temperament—have been left to our imagination; but this month, for the revival of the Barker-Housman fantasy at the Everyman Theatre,* the authors give us an additional act showing how the lovers fared.

This new part is as exquisite as the rest; one need say no more. And its inclusion should alone draw Prunella-lovers to Hampstead, even without the lure of an exceptionally fine cast (Ernest Milton, just back from starring in America, plays Pierrot; and Joan Harben, Wallace Evennet and Dorothy Green are also in the company). It shows a wayside resting-place of the mummer troupe. But their caravan has broken down; it has but one wheel; and presently, when the troupe comes back from its foraging with new wheels, these are all different sizes. "We each chose the one we liked best," they say. "How else?" How else indeed! The touch is characteristic. Little Prunella would not mind if the van stayed as it was; for she wants, of all unreasonable things—a home. Pierrot, dismayed, evades the issue by "imagining" one; it is unreal, fantastic, soulless, like everything else about him. Prunella begins to cry. To distract her they extemporise a play in which, though she knows nothing of it but the lines she is given, she is induced to take part.

* Revival on July 31st.

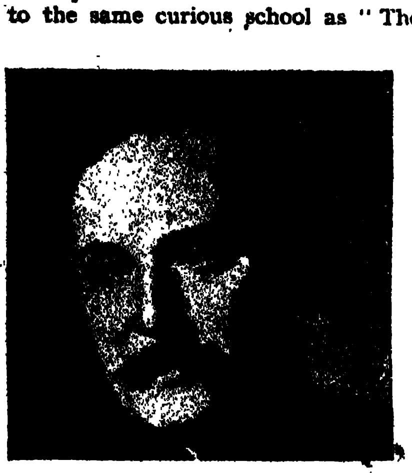
Now follows brilliantly the play which Scaramel has devised—a sort of blasphemous parody of the innocence of Act I, wherein Prunella is made to travesty her old self. It is laid in a garden, as before. Instead of Love appears a statue of Riches. The Aunts, now travestied by the jaded girls of the troupe, arrange to sell their niece to a rich lover. He arrives—Pierrot, clad in gold—preceded by his love-letter which is seen to be a cheque, and followed by Scaramel as his Purse. Even Prunella's lesson on the Moon is not spared; she repeats it, in cynical distortion: "The Honeymoon is often much shorter than the uninstructed would suppose. . . ." The statue, kicked round, turns into a painted effigy of Prunella, "unreal and bewitching." "But what becomes of me?" cries the real Prunella at last. "You stand aside and out of the way," mocks Scaramel. "If he loves me——?" "He doesn't know the meaning of the word!" She breaks away in horror, demanding "reality." Scaramel throws her in contempt her own clothes, which have turned to rags. And Prunella, deserted and disillusioned, snatches at them gladly as the troupe passes her by.

I have no space to do more than suggest the delicate, bitter satire with which this scene is worked out. It is grotesque, fantastic, oddly horrible; yet of such beauty as no lover of the original play can afford to miss.



GRAHAM SUTTON.

The Bookshelf.

CORONETS AND HEARTS.*

I wonder occasionally why novelists, including of course myself, write historical fiction when the formula among certain eminent critics runs very much as follows: 1. I do not like historical novels. 2. Very few people like them. 3. All historical novels are almost equally bad, except (a) those by novices who can translate the past into terms of cocktails and night-clubs, (b) the latest foreign novel which ignores the reticences former novelists held decent, and sees in the past only brutality, squalor and lust. I do not know what the reading public would say to a musical critic who began his criticism by saying that he cannot stand music nor can most other people; but the latest jazz-tune is better than Purcell, Handel, Beethoven, Chopin and Brahms.

You will avoid these four novels if you want the sordid, the erotic, or the brutal; though the authors of the three serious historical novels on my list do not shirk unpleasant facts, and the fourth book is quite innocuous. "My Lord Lucifer," in spite of the publishers' statement, is not strictly an historical romance or novel at all; it belongs to the same curious school as "The Castle of Otranto," "The Mysteries of Udolpho" and "The Monk." An old manuscript found in a secret room shifts the tale from modern times to the days of Charles II, and Miss Selous has reproduced the language of Pepys's day very carefully. The West Country was then as remote from London as America is to-day, and strange things happened; but nothing, surely, quite so strange as in this book, with its couvade, abduction, sorceries and horrors. Coincidence—a word one of the characters calls "co-co-co-what-d'ye-call-'em"—plays a part. But there are some dramatic scenes, and "My Lord Lucifer" will probably interest readers who do not worry too much about probability.

Manuel Komroff, author of "Coronet" (Harrap).

Mr. Baring's book is historical fiction nearly, but not quite, at its best. "Robert Peckham" tells his own story in the epitaph written by himself for his tomb in San Gregario in Rome (but his heart is to go to Denham, in Buckinghamshire):

> "Here lies Robert Peckham, Englishman and Catholic, who after England's break with the Church, left England because he could not live in his country without the Faith, and, having come to Rome, died there because he could not live apart from his country."

Here is a great and original idea for a novel which carries us from the reign of Henry VIII to that of Elizabeth; I wish more had been made of it. The rare virtue of compression has become a fault. But, except for a few careless sentences, like "I knew from that moment not only that I loved Joan, not only as I had loved her before, but more than I had ever known," the book is written in splendid though simple prose—and verse; the historical portraits, which include Ronsard, are good; and a gentle melancholy, like that of some quiet country church where hatchments and effigies catch the softened beams of evening sun, pervades the story, so that it lingers in the memory.

Mr. Wallace B. Nichols takes his curious but apt title from Bacon's comment on Henry VII: "one of the best of wonders; a wonder for wise men." The author—again a poet, and the majority of our best historical novels are the work of poets—touches lightly and without committal on the crimes with which, by different schools, both Richard III and Henry VII have been saddled; he is concerned chiefly with the folly and brutality of war in all ages, and with Henry as a king wise enough to realise that folly and that brutality. The period has been most carefully studied even in detail; the characters are alive; and the writing throughout is at a very high level. I am not certain that the episodes, vividly as they are described, in the revolt of Lambert Simnel are quite so convincing as the rest of the book, and I am a little doubtful whether Mr. Nichols is correct when he refers to the sporran of the Scottish Guard of Charles VIII of France. Did not the Guard wear the French King's own uniform, of white silk (or soyon) with gold, and the blue cassock? But, whether I am right or Mr. Nichols, he has written a fine, stirring, human book on which he may be warmly congratulated.

And now am I in danger of falling into the formula of certain critics I have criticised? My prejudices bristle like the quills of the porcupine which Louis XII—Henry's contemporary, and a king with certain strange affinities to our first Tudor monarch—wore as his badge. The author of "Coronet," Manuel Komroff, was born in New York, and a good historical novel from America is not an everyday event He worked as a journalist in Russia during the Revolution, in the States he saw and criticised twenty films a week—which one would imagine might incapacitate anyone from writing historical fiction of any value Indeed the brief sentences written below the heading of the books into which his novel is divided smack of the film-caption, for instance, under Book I—Renaissance 1700' (a puzzling Renaissance date, by the way), we read, "Evil springs from the dark core of the world and brings with it life And things without flesh and blood, things void and dead, begin to stir" Then the American Literary Guild has chosen it as the book of the month, and for many reasons, chiefly because certain books are given a fictitious value, and because in my view the proper salesman for books is the bookseller, I have no great love for these societies which spoon-feed a section of the public And finally (one may as well be frank) the publishers note urging reviewers not to dispose of the book, at all events within a certain period, seems to me unwise, provocative, and more likely to defeat than achieve its own ends

* "My Lord Lucifer." By Bertha Selous. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)—"Robert Peckham." By Maurice Baring. 7s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)—"A Wonder for Wise Men." By Wallace B. Nichols. 7s. 6d. net. (Ward, Lock.)—"Coronet." By Manuel Komroff. 8s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

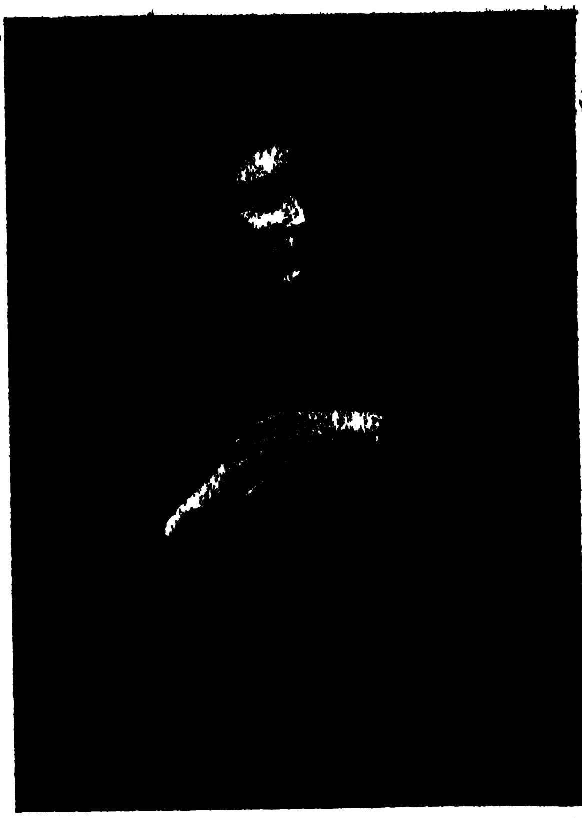
But Coronet" sweeps prejudice aside, it is not a book with which anyone will be anxious to part A collection of scenes or long short stories, beginning in Florence over three hundred years ago, going on to the Napoleonic era, and carrying one through the nineteenth century to the year after the conclusion of the Great War, is linked by the adventures of a golden coronet and a silver whip —symbols of power or glory, and of arrogant brutality and force The book has faults Frequently Mr Baring's blue pencil might have been borrowed with advantage Coincidence is freely used But many of the scenes are unforgettable, especially those in Paris, in Russia, and in the little town of Senlis, and whether one agrees with the author or not, his study of the aristocracies of descent art military rule intellect, and finally money as typified in the Chicago pork king is worked out with amazing skill Everyone should read the scenes in which Mademoiselle Georges, Napoleon and Octave David figure, and the brilliant account of the Moscow disaster It is without doubt a most remarkable and original book written by a writer to whom without hesitation, I apply that dangerous and perhaps indefinable word genius

ALFRED TRESIDDER SHEPPARD

THE POETRY OF EDITH SITWELL *



"Time wrote Cardinal Newman, 'hath a taming hand" No writer within the last ten or fifteen years has experienced a greater change in the public estimate of his or her work than Edith Sitwell, whose collected poems in one volume of two hundred and seventy pages have just been published

One does not need to be very old to recall the uproar which greeted a poem by Miss Sitwell when it first appeared in the periodical, Wheels With Bucolic Comedies' (1923) and The Sleeping Beauty' (1924) the uproar continued, though less noisily, for it was gradually coming to be recognised that her innovations in rhyme pattern and imagery were not to be dismissed as mere nonsense, but had a quality and purpose of their own An adjective for instance like "creaking," applied to the dawn, in the much discussed poem Aubade," suggested something harsh and unwilling about the cold light of early morning which had not been said so finally before

Like most poets, Edith Sitwell sets out to create her own world and by her own methods And like more than one contemporary writer (Walter de la Mare is the chief example), she finds this world through a reaching back to the memories of childhood "The Sleeping Beauty' and "Troy Park" are full of recollections—of the tinkling notes of a music-box, of gaily coloured flower-beds,

> 'Gold freckled calceolarias,
> Marigolds, cinerarias,
> African marigolds, coarse-frilled,"

* "The Collected Poems of Edith Sitwell" 8s 6d (Duckworth).

Portrait by Elliott & Fry Miss Edith Sitwell.

of the clown's booth or the roundabout at a country fair, of

> Maternal cows with a white horn
> As hard and dry as rustling corn

A child sees objects very clearly and very distinctly, and they remain for him, for the most part, unrelated objects—that is absolute in themselves One of the chief impressions which Miss Sitwell's poetry leaves is of a succession of images possessing just this quality that they are absolute in themselves

Her manner and methods are individual Indeed it was the parrot cry of her first critics that such a way of using the English language was arbitrary and unintelligible, and because unintelligible therefore monstrous The main discussion centred round the faculty of comparison, which is an integral part of the equipment of the poet. The poet's mind, working at pressure casts around for some image which will make clear and enlarge his meaning He may find it in a deviation from the normal way of saying things which by the shock of mild surprise it gives, effects his purpose Blake's

> Tyger tyger burning bright
> In the forests of the night,' is the example which rises most immediately to the mind. In Edith Sitwell this faculty is given supreme play She employs the romantic method as by a natural process, describing the audible in terms of the visible, the dynamic in terms of the static The impressions received through the senses are applied the one to the other, indiscriminately. Dew is bird-breasted, flowers are wooden and begin to cluck, fruits are wind-smooth, the fire is furry Often it would seem that Miss Sitwell's imagery is twice removed from the normal, the mind and the imagination have to go through two stages Dew falls softly, we say. Or the breast of a bird is soft Dew is bird-breasted, says Miss Sitwell When she speaks of "wooden flowers that 'gin to cluck,' the picture is of those hard, stiff flowers in a garden that dip and bend beneath the rain until they look (and seem as if they must sound) like hens clucking

It is a danger inherent in poetry which depends so largely for its effect on comparison that the comparison may miss the mark A thin line divides the inevitable from the arbitrary And Miss Sitwell's verse is not without its bad lapses But at her best she has brought into poetry an imagery which, by its brilliant flashes, lights up a whole new world of consciousness:

> "like a gold-barred tiger, shade > Leaps in the darkness";

or

> "pluck boughs of cherries
> That seem the lovely lucent coral bough
> (From streams of starry milk those branches grow)
> That Cassopeia feeds with her faint light,
> Like Ethiopia ever jewelled bright"

It is by passages like these that Miss Sitwell will be remembered, and this volume of collected poems affords proof that such passages stand in no distant isolation.

MARGARET A. SUTHERLAND.

INDIA FROM ALL SIDES.*

Anything which enables the British public to obtain a fuller and more accurate knowledge of our Eastern Empire is to be commended, and Messrs. Constable have done a public service in publishing Mr. Percy H. Dumbell's study of political growth, "Loyal India, A Survey of 70 Years, 1858-1928."

Mr. Dumbell is a senior official in the India Office and was for a time secretary to Lord Morley, for whom he retains an intense and whole-hearted admiration. In this volume he collects the leading documents of State, from Queen Victoria's Royal Charter to Lord Irwin's statement on the appointment of the Simon Commission in 1927. No one can read these chapters without being impressed by the whole-hearted endeavours of the British Government for many years past to seek a peaceful and satisfactory way out of the Indian maze. King George's Proclamation in 1919 revealed this. "I have watched with understanding and sympathy the growing desire of my Indian people for representative institutions. . . . It is my earnest desire at this time that so far as possible, any trace of bitterness between my people and those who are responsible for my Government should be obliterated." The Duke of Connaught, in his well known speech at Delhi in 1921, voiced the same appeal. "Cannot we bury along with the dead past all the mistakes and misunderstandings of the past?"

And yet, in the words of Lord Curzon, India, after two hundred years, "still stands like some beautiful stranger before her captors, so defenceless, so forlorn, so little understood, so little known." Why is this?

I hoped when I began to read Colonel Osburn's book, "Must England Lose India?" that I should find here a reasonable and convincing statement of the views of the extreme Indian reformers. Colonel Osburn is a soldier with a fine record. He fought in the ranks in the Imperial Yeomanry in the South African War, and served later for many years as a doctor in the Army Medical Corps, being mentioned five times in dispatches and receiving his D.S.O. during the Great War. This alone entitles him to a respectful hearing. Unfortunately he weakens his case and repels sympathy by the violence of his language and the unfairness of his methods of controversy, and at times reveals an imperfect acquaintance with conditions of Indian life.

He bitterly attacks the character of the Englishmen who go out to responsible administrative positions in India, maintaining that their minds have been warped beforehand by the pernicious training of our public schools which encourages a spirit of superciliousness, bullying and tyranny! Their temper is ruined by the Indian climate, causing them to show amazing irritability and lack of consideration in dealing with the native people.

If I were to base my views on Colonel Osburn's book, I should conclude that the British official in India largely spends his time in riding down harmless natives who obstruct him in the street and in flogging unhappy underlings who dare not retaliate, while his wife is engaged in whipping her servants. A favourite sport of British soldiers in India seems to be again judging from this volume kicking careless punka-wallahs to death!

Colonel Osburn gives a number of unplaced, undated and unsupported anecdotes to support his case. He admits that none of his anecdotes is new and none refers to recent events, but maintains that while the British rulers may not behave quite in the same fashion now, they would if they could!

Against the sadistically minded and ferocious Briton we have the misunderstood, maligned and innocent Indian, whose ways have been so sadly misinterpreted to us. Suttee, for example—the burning of widows on the funeral pyres of their husbands, which the blundering British prohibited—was a sacrifice often enough made by choice by well-to-do Hindu girls. Colonel Osburn boldly defends child marriages and condemns our interference with them. He excuses the prohibition of remarriage to widows in any circumstances. Were widows allowed to remarry in a land where girls are married to elderly men, the Indian woman could get rid of Captain J. E. Ellam.

From "Swaraj," by Captain J. E. Ellam (Hutchinson).

* "Loyal India: A Survey of Seventy Years, 1858-1928." By Percy H. Dumbell. 2s. (Constable.)—"Must England Lose India?" By Lieut.-Colonel A. Osburn, D.S.O. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)—"Swaraj, The Problem of India." By Captain J. E. Ellam. 1s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—"Nāvayāna, Buddhism and Modern Thought." By Captain J. E. Ellam. 3s. 6d. (Rider.)

The Bookman

VOLUME LXXVII

OCTOBER, 1929—MARCH, 1930

London:

HODDER & STOUGHTON LIMITED

WARWICK SQUARE, E.C.4

CONTENTS

OCTOBER, 1929—MARCH, 1930.

PRINCIPAL ILLUSTRATIONS

her husband by poisoning him and then marry a younger man of her choice and live with him in comfort, or remain a widow to have, perhaps, love affairs with her confessor.

Colonel Osburn retains however some Anglo-Indian prejudices. While on one page severely condemning young officers who turn rich Indians out of first class railway carriages which they have attempted to share with them, he declares elsewhere that efforts to increase personal contact in social matters between the average Hindu and the average Englishman in India are misguided and should not be persisted in, for such social contact at present is more likely to produce mutual irritation and contempt than respect. " To be shut up in the same railway carriage on a long journey with human beings whose habits are so different from ours is simply purgatory—it is only stupid sentimentalism to pretend that it is pleasant or even endurable. . . . The table manners of a wealthy middle class Hindu who has not been educated in Europe are to-day about as peculiar and as distressing as those of his late Majesty, King George II, of which we have such lurid and disgusting accounts."

In " Swaraj, the Problem of India," Captain J. E. Ellam gives us what the publisher describes as " plain ungarnished facts." He traces the development of India, pictures the internal strife before the advent of the English and describes what British rule has done, how it brought peace, conquered India's most terrible enemy, famine, developed industry and established justice.

Captain Ellam has no good word to say of the leaders of " Swaraj." According to him they are liars, cowards and men whose dominating purpose is to establish Brahmin rule over India. They represent only a very small section of the people and the unrest " is not a spontaneous popular movement, but an agitation engineered by a few unscrupulous and ambitious men to seek to replace the British for their own personal gain and enrichment." Behind it all " there lurks the sinister shadow of the Brahmin priestcraft."

One must make allowance for Captain Ellam's point of view. He has been for many years a Buddhist and was formerly editor of an English Buddhist magazine. He has recently published another volume, a lucid exposition of his creed, " Nāvayāna, Buddhism and Modern Thought."

Captain Ellam's solution of the Indian problem is the maintenance of absolute British rule. He regards Dominion status as impossible. " Our mistake has been in trying to graft upon a social order five hundred years behind our own, a twentieth century constitution." Dominion status would, he maintains, " mean the turning over of the British provinces to a handful of Hindu irreconcilables, who would at once reduce them to a state of chaos." In this conclusion he is supported by Lord Brentford, who writes a foreword in which he pleads that if, as he thinks, we find we have gone too far in our concessions to India, we should " amend our mistakes—say that India has proved herself unfit for democratic self-government, that she must, for some generations, in her own interests, be governed and controlled by Great Britain, and by that wonderful Civil Service which has done so much for India, and of which we are all so proud."

F. A. MACKENZIE.

THE BEST OF ENGLAND.*

It was obviously a good idea to get Mr. Vachell to write this book, which is intended primarily for visitors to our shores, and also for those " who long to do what others do, and don't know how to do it," just because Mr. Vachell is a man of the world, fit to discriminate between differing values, master of an easy and charming style. And also it is clear to see that he has in some measure at least mastered the Art of Life, for he has enjoyed England exceedingly, and apparently means to go on enjoying it. For Sport he has a passion. He says: " For more than twenty years I stalked the tall red deer in Scotland; I have hunted fox and stag and fallow buck; the memories of ' days of fresh air in the wind and the sun ' remain enchanting. Let it be inscribed on my tombstone, ' This dog had his day.' "

In the chapter on polo, Mr. Vachell explains that he is the Father of the Game west of the Rocky Mountains, and was captain of the first team of Englishmen who played against California. Obviously his heart is in the delightful and exciting pursuit. Sound advice comes from his pen ever and anon, and novices are sternly warned that it is impossible to get the best of anything cheap. " If you wish to play golf on our finest seaside links—and you don't know what the Royal and Ancient Game is till you do—you must travel to them, pay their green fees, pay your hotel bills, and disburse cold cash which will not have time to get warm in your pocket."

Many will turn to the chapter on " Collecting " as devout admirers of " Quinneys." " I find something that pleases me; I buy it and when it becomes mine, I set perhaps an inordinate value on it. This attachment is sentimental." Good work in wax is worth buying at a moderate price. " Perhaps old silver, unquestionably genuine, is the safest investment for any collector." Mr. Vachell tells us to haunt the antique shops of country towns. There many engaging trifles may yet be picked up cheaply—the lesser articles de vertu.

There is a valuable chapter on " Sight-seeing." We are advised to go down the Thames to look at London. " The secret of sight-seeing is to look up. Who makes a pilgrimage from the Gate of Katharine of Braganze to the wonderful Pool of London ? "

The " Best of England " holds the cream of a busy man's experience of the enjoyments of life. Because that man is quick, clever, a novelist, playwright and sportsman, the book is very characteristic, very vivid and enlightening.

MARJORY ROYCE.

* " The Best of England." By Horace Annesley Vachell. 10s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

THE TRAIL OF THE CRIMINAL.

While crime in its crude form has not the slightest interest for the healthy mind, crime as a pathological problem is both a fascinating and a profitable study. It is doubtful whether its mysteries will ever be explained, from so many diverse causes do they originate—savagery and weakness, premeditation and impulse, accident and abnormality. Dealing the whole time with realities, not fiction, we have to try to account for them by some human standard. But we have only to examine the records in these seven volumes,* together with police documents and the reports of trials, to find how impossible is the task. Heredity is an important factor in some of the dramas, and then we discover a " born " criminal, perverted and depraved, a case for the physician and not the penalogist. But there is no seeming link to connect this helpless victim of circumstances with the outlaw who deliberately chooses the path of vice, revels in his misdeeds and refuses all chances of reform. Yet who shall say no link exists merely because it eludes us ?

In the volumes of Mr. Morain and Mr. Ashton-Wolfe examples are given of the criminal by choice—men and women who resolved to misuse talents which could easily have been turned to good account, and who preferred the risks of law-breaking to the rewards of honest toil; and Detective Joe Smith, of the Waldorf, gives the history of a notorious woman who frankly told him that a criminal career, with all its desperate hazards, was more to her taste than virtue and comfort. Here are baffling problems for the psychologist. They are more difficult to solve than any of the mysteries which engage the wits of the detective force.

* " The Calas Case." By Marc Chassaigne. Translated by Raglan Somerset, with a Foreword by Hilaire Belloc. 18s. (Hutchinson.)—" True Stories of Immortal Crimes." By H. Ashton-Wolfe. 18s. (Hurst & Blackett.)—" The Underworld of Paris." By Alfred Morain. 18s. (Jarrolds.)—" Crooks of the Waldorf." By Detective Joe Smith (transcribed by Horace Smith). 12s. 6d. (John Long.)—" Raffles in Real Life; The Confessions of George Smithson." 12s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—" Law-Breakers." By Charles Kingston. 12s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)—" The Baffle Book." By Lassiter Wren and Randle McKay. Edited by F. Tennyson Jesse. 2s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

Murder, robbery, and swindles are poor and morbid and miserable themes in themselves, but motives and methods are all-important in casting a strong revealing light upon the workings of certain types of mentality. A sudden deed of passion is practically meaningless, but a contrived crime provides endless speculation and displays phases of human nature with its bewildering aberrations and its distorted outlook. Some goaded assassin, driven to fury, may be but the enemy of a single person, his marked-out victim; while the persistent petty thief is an enemy of society. Take Mr. George Smithson's confessions—he labels himself "Raffles in Real Life," and he gives an unvarnished history of many years spent in burglary. He has reformed now, but for a very long period it seemed as if nothing could check him. He never used a gun and he never descended to brutality; he was "Gentleman George" always; yet he would admit he was a greater menace to the multitude at large than a jealous wife who attacked her husband or a panic-stricken man who shot a blackmailer. And this brings us at once to the question of punishment. The person guilty of an isolated offence, perchance committed in a mad moment, is liable to be exterminated by the hangman; the person who commits fifty deliberate offences may simply become a prison pet. Something seems wrong somewhere, but who shall decide what it is?

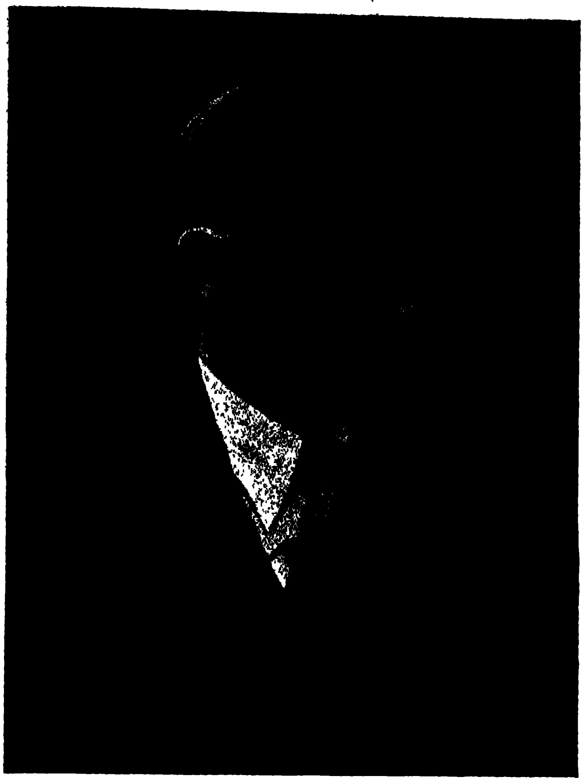
Man is a complex creature and the perpetration of crime is one of his eccentricities, a departure from the normal, an infraction of the common code. And the crimes of fact, irrespective of sensationalism, are far more amazing than the crimes of fiction. Any story-writer may construct an artificial case which is ingenious, but it will fall to pieces like a house of cards; it is the thing of real life that is truly enigmatical and leaves us gasping. We have only to turn to Mr. Morain's "Underworld of Paris" for proof of that assertion. No fiction-monger dare tell us of such infamies as those of the Apaches, or of such abominations as those of Landru, and expect us to believe the extravagances. They had to happen to be credited and accepted. And has any romancer ever had imagination so wild and strong as to concoct devilries like those narrated by Mr. Ashton-Wolfe in his "True Stories of Immortal Crimes"? He tells us once more of the dainty Marquise de Brinvilliers and her wholesale poisonings; of the "female Bluebeard," Lady Guilfort, and her beheaded lovers; and—more thrillingly than ever Carlyle with his discursiveness and apostrophes could manage it—of the tensely dramatic history of the Diamond Necklace. Mr. Ashton-Wolfe is more of an ornate artist and less of a mere chronicler than the other authors in this list. He is so picturesque in expression, so romantic in style, and so very literary in his handling of his subjects, that were it not for his continual assurance that he was depending upon official documents we should sometimes be disposed to doubt his narrations.

A very interesting comparison might be made between his glamorous chapters on Vidocq, master criminal and master detective, and Mr. Morain's matter-of-fact biography of the same person. Yet in both cases we are brought face to face with surely the most wonderful figure in the history of crime. His feats need no embellishment; his story demands no embroidery; his adventures are marvels without adventitious aid. Mr. Ashton Wolfe devotes the last six chapters to episodes in Vidocq's career which surpass anything of the bizarre fashioned by Dumas and anything of the macabre dreamed by Poe. They leave us palpitating, and we ask ourselves: "Were such things possible?"

Two chapters of more solid importance in Mr. Ashton-Wolfe's volume will be eagerly read by students: one, his explanation of the miscarriage of justice in the case of the Lyons Mail, and the other his solution of the mystery of the identity of the Man in the (so-called) Iron Mask. Many have been the guesses at the prisoner in the Bastille; Mr. Ashton-Wolfe definitely declares who the hapless captive was, and weaves a romance of the handsome Duke of Buckingham and the pining Anne of Austria about the long and obscure tragedy.

After such lurid revelations, the colourless chronicles of Mr. Charles Kingston in "Law-Breakers," and the rather monotonous monologues of Mr. Joe Smith (transcribed by Mr. Horace Smith) in "Crooks of the Waldorf" possess scant attraction; the best to be said of them is that they have some use and purpose as records. But Mr. Marc Chassaigne's study of "The Calas Case" stands in a class of its own; it surprises if it does not convince; and it leaves us questioning if for a century and more the world has been deluded on a subject from which it hoped the last doubt had been expelled. Voltaire lashed himself into indignation over the unmerited and pathetic fate of Calas, executed for a "murder" which was really suicide. But was Voltaire acting a part? was he animated by a pure motive? was he the apostle of justice? was he really concerned in the vindication of an innocent man? Or was he only a subtle intriguer, seizing upon an opportunity to bring the Church into disrepute, and carrying on his warfare against the priesthood by sinister contrivances? These are the questions which now arise. The noble triumph of Voltaire as a champion of right is aspersed. Let it be candidly said that M. Chassaigne does not challenge the accepted verdict without reason. He has searched deeply, he has burrowed in dark archives, and he gives to argument a cumulative power. In the end he leaves the issue still undecided, but he shakes faith though he cannot shatter it. The misfortune is that political prejudice and religious fanaticism are dragged into the controversy. It must suffice to say that the Calas case, long assumed to be closed, has now been reopened in such a way that it can no more be complacently regarded as a solved problem where the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth is known. Even the authors of "The Baffle Book," who have invented a new parlour game by supplying plots and providing clues by means of which the veriest amateur can become the triumphant detective, would not be able to forecast a settlement of the Calas mystery.

Three reflections are suggested by these volumes on crime and criminals. The first is that crime, however glittering, romantic, and audacious, is a sorry business, almost always unremunerative, almost inevitably a costly failure. "Gentleman George" and Chief Detective Morain are alike agreed on that point. The second is that the punishment of crime is often illogical and ineffective; it neither prevents a recurrence nor reforms the perpetrators. The third is (and here "Gentleman George" with his personal experience, and Mr. Joe Smith with his personal knowledge, are in complete accord), that our Borstal systems, reformatories, and prisons tend to promote crime rather than repress it. That is appalling, and by no means the least of the mysteries to which a study of criminology brings us.



J. CUMING WALTERS.

SINGERS AND SEERS.*

As poets, Dr. Edward Thompson and Mr. W P. Ryan, despite wide differences upon the surface, have fundamental affinities. Both of them, while using conventional verse forms with a free and individual idiom, are in the great tradition; both of them are single-minded and scorn all showy aids to popularity; both of them are idealists and mystics.

Dr. Thompson, it is true, is a "realist" as well. Some of his War poems, reflecting the campaign in Mesopotamia, are among the most objectively graphic, as well as the most humanly poignant that have been written. As readers of his novels are aware, Dr. Thompson is also familiar with India; while in his later poems he returns to his early love for the English country-side, which he sometimes views directly and sometimes through an aura of classical mythology. The large volume of his "Collected Poems" covers indeed a great variety of scenes, impressions and moods, and through its pages we are brought more vitally into touch with English and Eastern rural life than would be possible through reading a host of "nature" or travel books. Dr. Thompson is a fine interpreter of the genus loci, though it is difficult at first to see how he succeeds. He is always quiet and restrained; he is never "picturesque" or lavish with colour; and his verse, studied in detail, is often rugged and intangible. Yet the cumulative effect is one of singular clarity.

* "The Collected Poems of Edward Thompson. 10s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)—"Poets in Paradise." By W. P. Ryan. 2s. 6d. (Dublin: Colm O'Loughlin.)

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Dr. Edward Thompson.

It is of course a question of atmosphere. Dr. Thompson's objectivity is conveyed spiritually. His own vision is so intensely receptive and absorbed that it is transmuted, not photographically, but through some subtler alchemy of art. For Dr. Thompson is first and last a spiritual poet; and though into some of his work he introduces reflections and certain technical devices of the Indian mystics, he is essentially a poet of Christianity. His love for the figure of Christ—"The Eternal Comrade"—finds repeated expression in his verse, and nowhere more powerfully or sympathetically than in the long blank verse dialogue in which the spirit of the Master is represented as visiting John the Baptist in prison. It is the background of Christian idealism as well as his passion for nature that render, by force of contrast, this poet's war scenes so moving; and it is in the same dual light of nature and of Christianity that he sees the common majesty of humanity:

> "There is a spot, dim-seen behind our trees,
> Where for a space, ere sunny hours are told,
> Whoever goes goes garmented with gold;
> And I, to take my ease,
> Ofttimes, my book flung idly on my knees,
> That transitory company behold,
> Yea, much have mused and marvelled as they went
> In sun-brave pilgrimage magnificent.
> By largesse of that generous ample air
> Enwrapped with light beyond an angel's dream,
> The beggar moves; nor king, if king were there,
> More glorious than his meanest hind would gleam.
> No eyes but mine behold this daily show,
> The folk, the clinging glow,
> The ruddy stems of that majestic road.
> I watch my fellows go,
> Priest, labourer, child, the coolie with his load,
> All, man or woman, playing lad or maid,
> In one obliterating pomp arrayed."

The unity of life and of man, in the light of a pure Christianity that will ultimately absorb and blend all the apparently warring mythologies, systems and sciences of the past and present, is the theme which Mr. Ryan also pursues in the little poetic play and the few lyrics which make up his new book. Mr. Ryan's mysticism, though presented through a variety of imaginative and original settings, finds more explicit expression than Dr. Thompson's. In especial he is concerned with the current divorce between religion and art, and while he claims the function of the poet at his best to be almost god-like, he holds that all true art must be inspired, not by egotism, but by self-forgetfulness and service. He dreams of

> "Art returning to the primal fount
> Of vision—but of vision man-achieved
> By trained and Christ-filled soul, to take the place
> Of what the Gods in old clairvoyance gave.
> At last the Poet may to manhood come,
> A manhood kin to Godhood if he will,
> Himself a new Olympus in the world.
> With Art the Gods again will walk the earth,
> And we shall guide us by her Gleam and theirs.
> Yea, man, far-faring soul, has reached the stage
> Where understanding of the world divine,
> Seen by the primal races as in dream
> (Still childlike, tended by the Cosmic Guides),
> He must himself acquire, and enter in—
> Thought-labourer, his ego Christ-attuned—
> With all his force as Knower, ripe for Deed:
> Then e'en in Time he tills his Paradise."

It is not easy, either by commentary or quotation, to suggest the range and quality of these two poets. They both deserve the close study of readers who hold, with the writers themselves, that art is a dedication and not a mere diversion.

GILBERT THOMAS.

JOHN AND ME AND THE DICKERY DOG.*

Mrs. St. John Webb, whose recent death lends a special and pathetic interest to this, her latest book of verse, had a quite extraordinary understanding of the child mind. That is one of the main reasons for the enormous popularity of her poems. She knew so well what it feels like to be a little lonely when there is no real reason for feeling lonely at all, to be a little frightened when there is nothing tangible to be frightened of, to be very sad or very joyful over matters which, to the less sensitive mind, might appear mere commonplaces of ordinary everyday existence.

She had too that feeling for the universal experience as manifested in the individual consciousness which is so important a part of the writer's equipment. So that grown-up people, reading these poems, are apt to remember many things which they had forgotten.

"Why, yes," they say, "it was like that. I remember so well feeling like that."

But the children take these things for granted. They don't even have to think to themselves. "Yes, it is like that." It seems quite obviously self-evident to them. These children, these dogs, these "mummies," these exciting and entrancing sights and sounds, these swift and vivid fears and joys are part of the texture of daily life to them, and it is great fun to find someone writing about it all in a printed book.

And that is how it has come about that "The Littlest One" is now in its fiftieth thousand and that, together with its successors, it has an honoured place upon the bookshelves of nurseries (and not only of nurseries) in English-speaking homes all over the world.

This last book, which has a most attractive cover, and is altogether a very pleasant piece of bookmaking, with its delicate and sympathetic illustrations in line by Miss A. H. Watson, is mainly concerned with the fortunes of "John and Me" ("Me" being John's twin sister Ann) and "a funny little dog" called Dickery. A thoroughly engaging person this last, with just that sort of whimsical individuality about him that makes " Scotties " so lovable. There are many other people in the book. Miss Kilcame, the teacher, whose mother calls her " my dear child " so unexpectedly; Paul Montague Wellington Weeks, who " only came down for the day " (and even that was felt to be too long); also aunts of both kinds, the very nice, as exemplified in Aunt Carol, and the very nasty (but I think Miss Watson has really been a little too unkind to Aunt Jessie).

* "John and Me and the Dickery Dog." By Mrs. St. John Webb.

There is a very lovable " Old Nanny," too, who—

" Was our Mummy's Nanny too
Before she was our own."

Nanny's rather matter-of-fact, common-sensible, yet essentially motherly and tender personality pervades the book as in real life it assuredly pervades the household of which she forms a part, for Nanny is, beyond all doubt, a character drawn from life.

There are other interesting folk, such as the sweep, the French polisher, Miss Pringle, the friend of cook and Jane, who " has a lot of teeth " (a look one knows so well), a Mr. Cassidy who mends the clocks, Miss Foggerty who makes tarts and pies and, of course, SMUGGLERS.

Most of the poems are written from the point of view of Ann, who is of the imaginative, romantic type, but occasionally John takes a hand, and then we get a robuster atmosphere.

John is a very schoolboyish schoolboy and talks amusingly of the other boys: Jeremy Beal (Mrs. Webb had a real gift for nomenclature) who is " fat and slow " and the freckled boy who is " clever at sums."

Dickery doesn't actually appear as a contributor, but we hear a lot about his friends and activities. His well-meant efforts at fairy-finding form the subject of one of the most attractive poems in the book.

No mother, I feel, could read unmoved the last poem of all, " The Three of Them," in which the mother herself speaks to the sleeping children and Dickery.

Of John—

" Such brave adventures, gallant words
And deeds, he dreams about.
If only I were in his dreams—
Oh, John, don't shut me out! "

And again—this time it is Ann—

" The fairies seem to gather round
Wherever Ann may be.
Inside your dreaming Fairyland
Oh, Ann, find room for me! "

All the tenderness, all the pathos of motherhood find expression in the last simple lines of those two verses.

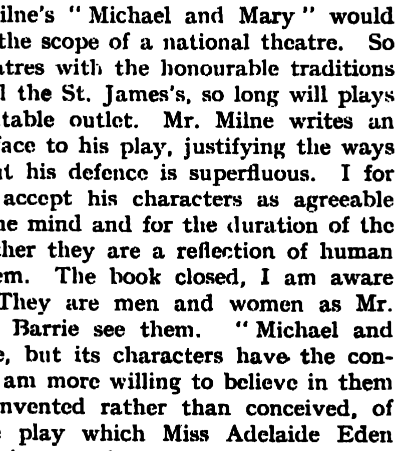
Rose Fyleman.

A NATIONAL THEATRE.*

The death of the theatre has frequently been prophesied. The cinema was at one time regarded as the predestined assassin; but the theatre refused to die. Then came the " talkies," and again the theatre shuddered and awaited its end. The shuddering continues, but those of us who have an ineffaceable belief in the necessity of the theatre are not uneasy. Some of us, hedging, may claim that the " talkies " are in effect the theatre; but the theatre's true believers resent and reject this claim as heresy. The theatre, to them, is a place in which the gamut of human emotion is expressed afresh every time the curtain rises on a performance. The producer of a " talky " may get from his actors the thrill which belongs to the theatre, but all he can give to his public is a thrill once removed —a *re*production, not a production; a reflection, not the thing itself. The æsthetics of the " talkies " will in course of time be discovered, as the æsthetics of the silent film were discovered by a handful of producers; and they will be found to be quite other than the æsthetics of the theatre.

The theatre is immortal and separate. Commercially, it may pass through a bad time owing to the cinema's rivalry, and the establishment of a national theatre, not dependent upon catchpenny successes, is the more fervently to be advocated. Mr. Granville-Barker's book, so quietly, tactfully and unexcitedly written, so wise in its prevision, so imperturbable in its facing of difficult facts, must convince anybody who grants the right of the theatre to exist. His scheme takes on a form so concrete that when I turned the last page of his book I had the illusion of having witnessed a task accomplished and was about to recite the Nunc dimittis when I came to my senses. But it may surely be assumed that Great Britain will not much longer lag behind the rest of Europe.

The arguments against a national theatre have all been met by Mr. Granville-Barker or by the experience of the existing national theatres. The fear that a State theatre is necessarily unventuresome is unfounded. The policy of a State theatre is the policy of its director, who must, of course, be a man of vision. I have seen plays of the most startling character in the national theatres of Germany, and productions which revealed a venturesomeness unknown to commercial managements. In some of the smaller Central European countries the only theatres engaged in the production of advanced work are the State theatres. Indeed one of the functions of the National Theatre will surely be the encouragement of experimental work. A commercial theatre cannot, as a business concern, afford to be experimental; it must play for safety and go no farther in experiment than a paying public allows. A State theatre, on the other hand, with a permanent staff of actors and an ever growing repertory of productions, can take experimental work in its stride, adopting or shedding at will.



A play like Mr. Milne's " Michael and Mary " would scarcely come within the scope of a national theatre. So long as there are theatres with the honourable traditions of the Haymarket and the St. James's, so long will plays like this find a profitable outlet. Mr. Milne writes an almost apologetic preface to his play, justifying the ways of his characters; but his defence is superfluous. I for one am prepared to accept his characters as agreeable projections of the Milne mind and for the duration of the play do not ask whether they are a reflection of human beings as I know them. The book closed, I am aware that they are not. They are men and women as Mr. Milne and Sir James Barrie see them. " Michael and Mary " is a fairy tale, but its characters have the consistency of reality. I am more willing to believe in them than in the yokels, invented rather than conceived, of " Yellow Sands," the play which Miss Adelaide Eden Phillpotts has turned into a pleasant novel for holiday reading.

Hermon Ould.

* " A National Theatre." By Harley Granville-Barker. 5s. net. (Sidgwick.) — " Michael and Mary." By A. A. Milne. 5s. net. (Chatto.) " Yellow Sands." By Adelaide Eden Phillpotts. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

ROMANCE OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY.

It is the fashion for an author to be critical toward his principal characters rather than sentimental, and this has its advantages, for it enables you to take an intimate but quite impartial view of a human creature such as you can take of nobody in life except yourself; and with yourself you are not often impartial and always disposed to be more sentimental than critical. Mr. John Metcalfe, in his new novel, "Arm's Length,"[1] which has been selected by the Book Guild as the Book of the Month, regards Gerald Imray with a detachment that shatters illusion and gives us a shrewd, relentless portrait of a man who is afraid of life. Imray endeavours to hold life at arm's length just as, when he first meets her, he endeavours to hold Sisley Pound at arm's length. But Sisley and her vulgar, frivolous, harassed family overpower him, as life overpowers him, sweeping down upon him, bringing him in contact with reality. The story has strength, is finely conceived, finely written and the characters are drawn with skill and humour.

Mr. T. J. Morrison.
Author of " Tony Potter " (John Murray).

[1] " Arm's Length." By John Metcalfe. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)—[2] " Tony Potter." By T. J. Morrison. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)—[3] " Printer's Devil." By Clemence Dane and Helen Simpson. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—[4] " Fishers of Men." By Carlton Dawe. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)—[5] " The Magic Seas." By Richard Le Gallienne. 7s. 6d. (Humphrey Toulmin.)—[6] " Frolic Lady." By S. P. B. Mais. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

The humour of "Tony Potter"[2] possesses a more robust quality. Mr. Morrison's "The Truce Breaker" was a first novel of uncommon ability, and his second is in no wise disappointing. Tony is a young man suppressed in boyhood by a bullying father; he runs away to London and, after many ups and downs, succeeds in making his name and a comfortable income as a short-story writer. Although he marries, he reaps the harvest of a self-centred life—loneliness; and indulges his weak nature with the practice of petty tyrannies, as his father did before him. Mr. Morrison is no more lenient with Tony than Mr. Metcalfe is with Gerald Imray, but though the theme suggests tragedy, the book as a matter of fact is sparkling with comedy, and its characters are joyously alive.

Tragedy and comedy mingle also in the thrilling murder story by Miss Clemence Dane and Miss Helen Simpson.[3] The tale is told briskly and wittily, but in the heart of it is the mysterious death of Horrie Pedler, a woman publisher, cheery, hard-working, sane, practical—such a vital personality, that when she is found dead at the foot of the fire-escape leading up to her flat, one feels like protesting that only the undesirables should be killed off in murder stories. But this is no ordinary murder story, as you may imagine, and at all events Horrie Pedler's death does not deprive us of the highbrow Gilda and her lover, Koko Fry, the publicity man, nor of Marmion Poole, the literary celebrity, whose memoirs, which would have torn so many reputations to shreds, are themselves discovered torn up and burnt in the dead woman's grate. Many people had cause to shrink from the publication of Marmion's memoirs. Could any of these be responsible for Horrie Pedler's end? You must read for yourself and find out, and you will enjoy the luxury of a murder story convincingly probable, highly sensational and richly humorous.

The murder in Mr. Carlton Dawe's novel, "Fishers of Men,"[4] is kept in the background. Richard Marton, out of work, is surprisingly offered a job by a man who describes himself as a dealer in antiques. Marton scents mystery, but poverty, as well as the attractions of his employer's niece, encourage him to continue with the work, and it is only when he is surrounded by danger that he learns he has been used as a catspaw and the antique dealer is a receiver of stolen goods, involved in a case of murder and robbery. The story is full of incident and has a dramatic and unexpected conclusion.

In "The Magic Seas"[5] Mr. Richard Le Gallienne has followed the recipe for genuine romance. He does not apply any methods of stern criticism to his hero, Henry Dionysus Mountjoy Norreys Lancaster, a dashing young Cavalier of the days of Charles II, blessed with good looks, charm, courage, recklessness, unfailing chivalry and unfailing honour. Like many of the young bloods of his time, Dionysus turned highwayman when he could not pay his debts; girls fell in love with him at first sight—Gaya, the gipsy, and a beautiful Puritan maiden whom he befriended on the London road. Then he goes sailing in quest of Spanish treasure with Captain Thunder, whose roaring laughter sets everybody laughing; and Gaya, unknown to Dionysus, disguises herself as a sailor to accompany him on his adventures. Later chance places him in the position of guardian to the beautiful Puritan, and they all—he and the two women who loved him, and the captain and crew of the Happy Return—are taken captive by the Moors. The story is told in a poetical vein and contains some exquisite descriptive passages, and is itself, as you have no doubt gathered, of the stuff of poetry rather than of life.

Very unlike a heroine of bygone days is Barbara Lynam in Mr. S. P. B. Mais's spirited novel, "Frolic Lady."[6] Barbara is a self-possessed, outspoken, exceedingly modern young woman, and relieves poor, shy, blundering Hugh Bellingham of all the difficulties of courtship, though the first remark she addresses to him is "You little devil," and the second "Clumsy coot." These however serve well enough to add fuel to his infatuation, and she likes him sufficiently to defy her eccentric father and marry him, despite the fact that by doing so she forfeits her share of her father's wealth. Which goes to prove that after all people are just as romantic as they used to be.

ALMEY ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

"AS ENGLISH AS WESTMINSTER ABBEY."*

Albert Kinross, author of "The Torch" and "God and Tony Hewitt." I had the privilege of meeting him on several occasions before he died several years ago, and the first of them, appropriately in view of the fact that this review is being written for THE BOOKMAN, took place in my old friend's editorial office in Warwick Square. I did not then know that Kinross was interested in cricket, but as we strolled along Fleet Street and the Strand, back to our club, his delightfully reminiscent talk revealed him as all that England's captain, Mr. A. P. F. Chapman, says he is—"an enthusiastic cricketer, and a more enthusiastic cricketer and lover of the game it would be impossible to meet."

Mr. Chapman's tribute appears in the charming, all too brief introduction he has contributed to "An Unconventional Cricketer," Kinross's last book. A very welcome book; for although the other two books I am writing about are welcome too, their appeal is to the craftsman of cricket rather than to the cricket-lover who does not feel inclined to pursue a study of the intricate technique of the game. "An Unconventional Cricketer" is a plain, straight story of a life's playtime, first on the London fields, and then on the many famous county grounds of Kent.

This however is not to suggest that Albert Kinross took no heed of cricket's art and workmanship. On the contrary he had excellent discernment. He writes of the method and style of great players like an expert when he so desires. Of the immortal "W. G." and his position at the crease, for example, he declares in explanation of his success that "W. G. Grace had a reply to every ball bowled to him, and depended less on 'footwork' than on his great reach." Incidentally this explains the doughty deeds of Mr. A. P. F. Chapman himself during the present summer—as Clarence Grimmett, who has written the second book in my list, would gladly—I mean sadly—testify.

It is interesting to read Kinross's book at this particular time of day, because in late years there has been a remarkable change in the quality of the critical writing on cricket. To-day such writing is recognised as having a definite relation to literature, and one or two cricket-scribes have a tremendous vogue independently of the chance that it is on cricket they are writing. I feel that Kinross would have been included among them had he taken up this kind of work seriously ten years ago. Here for instance is a taste of his quality. He makes the proposition that "the life of a batsman is a symbol that frequently contains all normal life," and goes on to develop it in a way that will surely have pleased Mr. Neville Cardus. Indeed Mr. Cardus himself has written something of the same kind.

* "An Unconventional Cricketer." By Albert Kinross. 7s. 6d. net. (Harold Shaylor.)—"Getting Wickets." By C. V. Grimmett. 2s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—"The Game of Cricket." By A. P. F. Chapman and others. 15s. net. (Seeley, Service.)

For Kinross suggests that Sir Edward Elgar should compose a Cricket Symphony, and in it he ventures to suggest that Tom Hayward, the old Surrey batsman with whom Jack Hobbs used to go in first, would be "revered in a dignified movement reminiscent of Beethoven." He goes on to develop the association of ideas in the happiest way, and a way that proves his wide knowledge, as when he writes that "a souvenir of Grieg would accompany the easy diabolism of Wilfrid Rhodes."

"An Unconventional Cricketer" is more than a cricket book; it is an autobiography. There are some fascinating pages in which Kinross tells how he became an author. He had a gift for foreign languages, and was able to secure employment in Switzerland and elsewhere on the Continent. Undoubtedly this helped to give him the wide experience which stood him so well when he came to write novels, but he did not stay at this kind of wage-earning for long, and he stepped right into journalism as free-lance, and then as associate editor of famous old journals like the Outlook. Somebody called Mr. Kinross "as English as Westminster Abbey," and his breezy way of describing his work as well as his play shows the epithet to be a really happy one, and as fitting as five words can ever be in an attempt to comprehend a whole man.

By real cricket the author of "An Unconventional Cricketer" means "the game as it is played away from the big cities, on real turf, in real sunshine, in real air and, last and most important of all, by real players." It is not surprising that he despises Test Match cricket, and he recalls that he has not often "endured the discomforts of a Test Match," nor paid "half a guinea for the dullest day's cricket I have ever seen." Many of us would be inclined to agree with him—before the present summer. But Mr. Clarence Grimmett and his colleagues from Australia have appeared on the scene, and from Mr. Grimmett's little book we may gather why it is that Test cricket has been transformed. It has become much more than the old battle of wits; it has become a combination of wit and enthusiasm and boyish determination to win or lose—to win of course if possible. I need not say that Grimmett's share in this later kind of game—or rather seriously intensified kind of game—has been memorable. And in his chapter on "Spin, Break and Swerve, and How to Obtain Them" we discover the truth about his devastating success against the English batsmen.

Photo: Krischock Studios, Adelaide. C. V. Grimmett.

From "Getting Wickets," by C. V. Grimmett (Hodder & Stoughton)

"The bowler should try to force the batsman to play a game he does not like. . . . It is not advisable to use more than one break, except as a means of introducing variety. In the first place, there is a strong chance that the bowler who does so will lose his length. That is the reason why the googlie bowler, unless he is a champion, bowls erratically on occasions. It is very hard to control more than one set of muscles at a time." The man who has written these things down—and I choose them haphazard from a multiple of riches—is plainly a thinker and a student of his fellow-man. Perhaps I might characterise the book as a revelation of what cricket can mean when it is a whole-time job. How it came to be Clarence Grimmett's whole-time job is admirably explained in a very human prefatory chapter entitled "A Long and Varied Cricket Career." All cricket-lovers hope that this career, already full of honours, will be very much longer.

"The Game of Cricket" is a further revelation. Eleven experts have combined to write it, and each of them, under the admirable supervision of Mr. Eric Parker, specialises on a particular phase of the game. Mr. Chapman for example writes about fielding, Mr. P. G. H. Fender about captaincy, Mr. D. R. Jardine about batsmanship and coaching, Mr. Leveson-Gower about umpiring, and the old Surrey "pro.," Herbert Strudwick, about scoring, the job in which, after his honourable career at the wicket, he is now just as honourably engaged. It is not without significance by the way that the editor, Mr. Parker, reveals himself in a foreword as "unconventional" as Kinross in that he sighs for the cricket that is not played as a business or as county or Test cricket. And he seems happy to think that "village cricket has not changed," and that "we can still watch the carpenter set about the blacksmith's bowling, and listen to the publican cracking jokes with the policeman as he sets his barrel in the pavilion; and there still blows about the green an air of mown grass and tobacco smoke, which is the true smell of English cricket grounds." How thoroughly English these people who have achieved something in cricket are—all of them, whether they be writers or players, even our Australian guests: "as English as Westminster Abbey."

THOMAS MOULT.

A PARCEL OF PLEASURE.*

Among modern writers of fiction there are probably few better suited by their works to please a wide range of readers, and also to suit the varying moods of that wide range of readers, than the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden." The immediate popularity of that book itself, when it appeared, proved how wide was its appeal. Shallow readers and serious ones too would lift the volume, open at the first page, read "I love my garden," and, if free from interruption, would go on to the end, interested, titillated, amused and conscious that they had been shown a bit of inside Germany by a lively and charming lady. It was a comparatively small book, a new style, an intimate, revealing (it seemed) diary, piquant, occasionally a little caustic, and entirely attractive. The readers enjoyed it all, felt impelled to talk about it, remembered "Elizabeth," and looked out for another book written by her. Some of the more conventional readers were rather puzzled by "Elizabeth's" references to and descriptions of her husband, "The Man of Wrath," but when, before so very long, "The Solitary Summer" made its welcome appearance, with its dedication "To the Man of Wrath with some apologies and much love," even the most puzzled were comforted, and delighted anew. "May 22nd," it begins. "Last night after dinner, when we were in the garden, I said, 'I want to be alone for a whole summer and get to the very dregs of life. I want to be as idle as I can, so that my soul may have time to grow.'" The Man of Wrath said many things, as if with superior knowledge, and finally remarked, "You will be dull." But Elizabeth risked dullness, and assuredly her book shows no sign of it. It is almost a continuation of the first one, vivid, amusing—picturing with a deft pen life and habits, nature and customs, persons and flowers, books and joys and annoyances, in the German house in the German garden. When May had drifted beautifully away into June, and on and on, the Man of Wrath said in October, "If I remember rightly, your chief reason for wishing to be solitary was that your soul might have time to grow. May I ask if it did?" "Not a bit," answered Elizabeth. The Man of Wrath laughed. But perhaps the reader knew better than did Elizabeth herself. "Elizabeth's" talents were maturing, there came larger schemes, more ambitious undertakings, deeper notes were sounded, though the light and lively touch remained. In "The Benefactress," also an early book, there is more than promise of this. It is a full-grown novel, and with many of "Elizabeth's" readers it still remains the favourite. In it there is, together with the initial charm, a gentler touch, a broader humanity, which were less obvious in the "German Garden." From the beginning the author was observing with quick, retentive senses not only the exquisiteness of the world round about her, but the subtleties of men and women, good and bad, selfish and oppressed, wounder and wounded, their faces, their clothes and also their souls.

* The Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." 14 vols. Pocket Edition. 3s. 6d. each. Leather, 5s. 6d. each. (Macmillan.)

Who, having read "The Caravaners," has not gladly returned to read it again? The husband and wife, Otto and Edelgard, who came over from Storchwerder to enjoy a caravan expedition in England with English friends, are both Germans, and perhaps it might be said that naturally we rather enjoyed reading the diary of the contemptible Otto. But Edelgard, remember, was a German also, and we loved Edelgard almost at once. The trials of the Teuton form a bitingly amusing record, and again the window is opened through which we may look into the German mind and mode of life.

But when we come to "Fräulein Schmidt and Mr. Anstruther" we come to something infinitely deeper. It is in its restraint and in its subtle self-revelation one of the most poignant books of its generation, a tour de force, an achievement, and among all the books of this writer it demands to stand alone. It is a series of letters from a German girl to the young Englishman who has been boarding in Jena with her family—her father and stepmother. He kisses her, loves her, and goes home to England. Within a month his love has cooled, he is first silent, then writes that it is urged upon him to marry another girl. Rose-Marie in Jena is stricken. She has loved so truly, so joyously. Before long a correspondence begins between them again. Although no word of his is included, we see him weak, discontented, always wanting what he cannot have. Rose-Marie becomes friendly, but she never recovers from the first blow. And when at last he pleads and pleads that she will see him, will marry him, in a series of five messages she finishes the intercourse. "It would be useless." "I would not see you." "I do not love you." "I will never marry you." "I shall not write again." The book holds much of the wit and lightness without which we should not recognise an "Elizabeth" book, but it is, as we say, poignant.

One of the great charms of these volumes is the gaiety of impulse which is to be found in so many of them—the impulse that made "Princess Priscilla" run away from her palace home; the impulse that made the bishop's daughter, Ingeberg, after having a tooth out in Harley Street, and her eye caught by a poster—"A Week in Lovely Lucerne. Seven Days for Seven Guineas"—buy a ticket and go for that week in lovely Lucerne; the impulse in perhaps the most joyous volume of all, "The Enchanted April," that made two ordinary women on a wet day, after reading a Times advertisement as the paper lay on the club table, decide to rent an Italian castle and escape to sunshine and wistaria.

Portrait by Bertram Park. Countess Russell.

Fourteen enticing volumes lie before us, slim blue books with a golden "E" on the covers. The type is admirable, the page and setting are very attractive; light, handy, well bound, nothing could be better for a pocket edition; and the cost is most moderate. Wit, glamour, joyousness, truth (sometimes ugly), incisive satire, laughter, beauty, common sense—all are to be found within these "delutherin" little books, something indeed to fit every mood.

LILIAN LOBBAN.

FIRE IN FABLE.*

Was there ever a time when fire was unknown to man? The question is one of those fugitive thoughts which come and go, and with which one seldom troubles to play. Knowing something however of the trend of that mind which gave us "The Golden Bough" and "The Worship of Nature," it was only natural that such a thought, coming to Sir James Frazer, should stay and develop, and not be permitted to depart until it had become a most fascinating volume, modestly described as an essay, in which are gathered together scores of myths of the origin of fire. From Tasmania and Ancient Greece, from Orient and Occident, from wellnigh every quarter of the globe have been garnered these tales of fire found and fire made, of fire used and fire kindled. There is a similarity about many of them which is surprising when one considers the seas and continents that separate the tellers.

Despite the many stories of the days when man knew not fire, Sir James declares it is very unlikely that these narratives embody any real recollection of the events which they profess to record; more probably they are mere guesses "invented by men in the infancy of thought to solve a problem which would naturally obtrude itself on their attention as soon as they began to reflect on the origin of human life and society." Even so, these myths contain possible explanations of the ways in which men first learned to use and also to produce fire.

* "Myths of the Origin of Fire." By Sir James George Frazer, O.M. 12s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

As showing how the same ideas may be found continents apart, the author reminds us that Lucretius suggested that man may have obtained his first fire from a conflagration kindled by lightning, and that he may have learned how to make fire by observing the ignition of branches rubbing against each other in the wind. He compares this with the tradition of the Bushongo, a nation in the valley of the Congo, to the effect that their ancestors obtained fire from conflagrations kindled by lightning, but did not know how to make it for themselves; to that of the natives of Nukufetau in the Pacific, which says that men discovered fire by seeing smoke rising from the friction of two crossed branches which rubbed against each other in the wind; and to the tale told by the Kiau Dusuns of Borneo of how two growing bamboos, rubbing against each other in the wind, caught fire and how a dog, passing by, seized one of the burning pieces and carried it home to its master's house, which soon blazed up, with the result that the fire not only roasted some cobs of maize which were in the house, but also boiled some potatoes which had been left to soak. Thus, at a single stroke, the Dusuns learned both how to make a fire and how to cook their food.

A number of myths relate how man obtained the first fire from bird or beast. These vary from codfish to adders, from the jaguar to the woodpecker. The Manri of the Malay Peninsula for example will never kill a woodpecker for this reason, while the Buriats of Siberia explain the forked tail of the swallow by saying that it stole fire from Tengri (which is the Sky) and brought it to men, and that Tengri shot at the thief and his arrow cleft its tail. But there is no end to the things one is tempted to quote. The ethnologist will revel in the records, and the Boy Scout delight in the descriptions of fire-saw, fire-drill and other primitive methods of producing fire.

Sir James describes his book as a preliminary survey. We prefer to say he has blazed a wide trail for any who may follow. Doubtless there will be others, for such a task goes far towards explaining some phase in the intellectual evolution of our species. The book may be but a first vintage; it has a bouquet that lingers.

W. R. CALVERT.

MORE MYSTERY.

"Capital Punishment"[1] puts up a capital fight against the chief hardship of mystery-writers: namely, the difficulty of producing any fresh rabbits from the original hat. Its author takes us to a session of the Clue Club, where (after the other members have been doped to sleep) Judge-President and Waiter-Crook sit down to a debate on the ethics of hanging. The theme is carefully worked out, with a neat touch of satire at the end: for the anti-killing waiter murders the pro-killing judge by way of clinching his arguments. It is presented as a novel: but is not so, being (a) a series of Socratic dialogues on capital punishment, which tails off and degenerates into (b) a series of police-news stories. The latter did not always seem to me to have proved their contentions; but the former has certainly a topical interest just now. On the whole, the doped members seemed to have the best of the evening.

Two others of this batch are not novels either. The first and more striking is "The Case Books of X37,"[2] whose author tells us he is merely editing the records of a detective. It is the more convincing for its restraint, its quiet humour, and its avoidance of the sensational; in short, a little treasure-house of real-life studies, more worth a place on crowded shelves than most crime fiction.

[1] "Capital Punishment." By Stuart Martin. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—[2] "The Case Books of X37." By A. J. Dawson. 7s. 6d. (Richards.)—[3] "The Mysterious Mr. Quin." By Agatha Christie. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)—[4] "Murder from Beyond." By R. Francis Foster. 7s. 6d. (Nash & Grayson.)—[5] "The Low Road." By Hugo Morrison. 3s. 6d. (Methuen.)—[6] "The Man of a Hundred Masks." By Gaston Leroux. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)—[7] "The Crystal Beads Murder." By Annie Haynes. 7s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)—[8] "The Noose." By Philip Macdonald. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

"The Mysterious Mr. Quin"[3]—fiction this time, though not crime-fiction exclusively—is also chiefly notable for its shrewd touches of character. The actual incidents of these short stories are a little mechanical and "arranged"; the authoress's strength lies in her delicate insight into her folks' minds. A pleasant touch of fantasy, in the conception of Mr. Quin, links the stories together.

The supernatural element of "Mr. Quin" is pure fantasy, and can be frankly taken so, even by the most sceptical. Of the remaining books—the bona fide novels—two of the better ones are somewhat marred, I think, by the fact that their mystery turns on supernatural agency. An author hits below the intellectual belt who has his murders done by hypnotised or possessed persons. To say that such things are not impossible and are based on hard facts is no answer (a boxer's blow below the belt is a hard fact, and gets more possible daily); they are artistically unsatisfactory because, whether true or not, they take too much believing. A probable impossibility, said Aristotle, is better playwriting than an improbable possibility; and so here. This apart, both "Murder from Beyond"[4] and "The Low Road"[5] are pretty good stories. The latter could have dispensed with quite a number of small episodes that lead nowhere, and even with two or three characters. The former moves more rapidly, and is the more interesting; and if its ultimate unravelment leaves the reader somewhat prostrate, it is too late by then for his prostration to matter.

The point that episodes per se are not the whole duty of the sensation writer, is illustrated in "The Man of a Hundred Masks."[6] This is the sort of mystery story that is all mystery and no story; there is action unlimited, but too little development; a long conundrum in which one loses heart, and ever begins to wonder presently what it is all about. And the last scene—a Highland castle with ghost-prisoners in dungeons—seems oddly out of key with the Arsene-Lupinesque atmosphere of the rest. "The Crystal Beads Murder"[7] holds the attention better, being more a novel and less a procession of episodes. It has a racing interest too; and racing interest in a mystery tale is one of those devices which never seem quite worn out. But the long arm of coincidence is painfully stretched when the detective, dropping by chance into a strange dentist's, finds . . . But I will not give away secrets. At all events this writer tells her tale without frills, supernatural or other; and dentists are frightfully probable.

"The Noose,"[8] which is concluding serially in an evening paper as I write, comes with the recommendation of the Crime Club. I do not know what rivals "The Noose" had for that distinction, but I do know that it is far and away the best of this batch. Its folk are real—they think, act and talk convincingly, though with some irritating abbreviations in the transcription of their dialogue. There are some brilliant strokes in the construction—notably the inclusion of the half-wit eyewitness, who re-enacts in faithful detail what he has seen, though without understanding its significance. And the love interest—that dreadful incubus of detective-tales—is supplied neatly by the beautifully-suggested relationship between the hero and his wife. Moreover the author has been equal to the prime difficulty of construction referred to above—the task of finding, in these latter days, a central situation which is not hopelessly stale; his hero has to tackle the unravelling of a murder, committed six months ago, for which the innocent scapegoat is to hang in five days. There are two tiny flaws in this fine story—two unexplained improbabilities which the reader may set his wits to detect. I shall not betray them. I did not notice them myself till twenty-four hours after finishing the book. The fact that one should be thinking of a murder story at all, twenty-four hours after finishing it, is sufficient proof of its excellence.

I notice an unusual number of misprints in "The Noose." Is this a criticism of the novel? It is not, though it will doubtless be recorded in several reviews. This question of misprints seems to me to need a little criticism all to itself. Authors, as you are probably aware, receive the galley proofs of books for revision; and this revision—trimming and polishing—is an exacting job, especially if the author has by now put the book out of mind, and has his head full of the next. It is made worse, if he must simultaneously look out for every place where "and" had been printed "aud." He should not be expected to. (Printers are not expected to improve authors' stories, though I have known some to try.) But he is expected to. And if some carping fellow later on complains of misprints, the onus falls on him. It is both unfair and ridiculous.

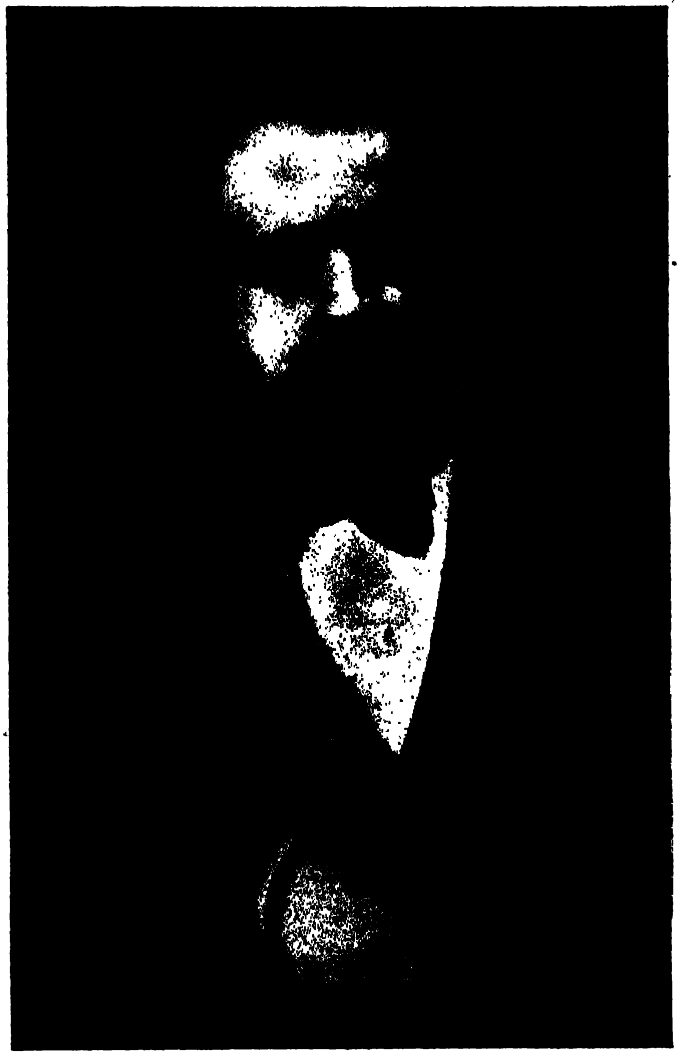
GRAHAM SUTTON.

FIGHTERS ALL!*



Twelve years out of a lifetime of over ninety—a short space of time in which to build up a life history. Yet these twelve years contain the very essence of the tragic history of the Empress Eugénie. Through them, like a black dividing line, runs the year 1870, separating the brightness of Empire from the darkness of exile. The contrast between the brilliant scenes of the Empress's journey to the Suez Canal in 1869, and the hurried ignominy of her flight to England only a few months later, is startling and painful. Nor were her misfortunes ended when she lost place and power. These were but the prelude to more crushing blows, the death of her husband, worn out by illness and disappointment, and of her son, destroyed by a mischance of war.

The Comtesse des Garets, faithful maid of honour in the days of the Empress's prosperity, and intimate friend through the years of her exile, has drawn a moving picture of the ill-fated family.

The Emperor Napoleon III is, from the beginning of the narrative, a rather sombre figure, overshadowed by the threatening cloud of political discord, but, though worried and taciturn, seeming to "carry the whole world on his bent shoulders," he had always a pleasant and kindly word for those around him. For the Prince Imperial the Comtesse evidently had a sincere affection and admiration, and he appears to have had a remarkable personality. His untimely end at the hands of a band of Zulus was indeed a tragedy, not only for the Empress, but for those faithful adherents who had built high hopes on his strength of mind and firmness of purpose.

The Empress herself remains a somewhat perplexing character, which even her biographer's genuine admiration cannot make entirely lovable or sympathetic. Full of energy, determination, and uprightness of purpose, she yet seems to have lacked something which would have brought her a measure of happiness in spite of misfortune. She certainly showed great forbearance and sympathy in the incident of the unhappy Captain Carey, whom the Comtesse des Garets holds personally responsible for the massacre of the Prince Imperial. Yet the letters of Captain Carey to his wife, reproduced in all their pitiful abandonment, must surely have aroused pity even in those who suffered most from his fatal blunder. "An end to recrimination," wrote the Empress with clear-sighted justice, on the eve of his court-martial, "—my beloved child died a soldier's death. . . . May no one suffer on his account either in reputation or interests."

Another story of royal misfortune, but of a very different character, is that of Leopold Wolfling, one-time Archduke of Tuscany. His descent in the social scale has been meteoric. He might almost be called the Job of modern times, for never was man so oppressed by injustice and misfortune. Nephew of the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, he incurred early in life the displeasure of his august relative, who carried his enmity so far as not only to blight the Archduke's military career, but to have him incarcerated in a lunatic asylum, from which he escaped with difficulty. Certainly the Archduke has crowded into one lifetime adventures which few can boast. His two marriages turned out unfortunately, but it could scarcely have been otherwise, seeing that both were the result of chance encounters with women with whom he could have had nothing in common. His description of his henpecked existence at the hands of his first wife is not without humour. The spectacle of the Archduke, overwhelmed by the loquacity of this woman, shut out of her interminable conclaves with her equally talkative sisters, and dragged at her heels to the Back-to-Nature Camp at Ascona, is laughable, but at the same time rather pitiable.

Emperor Napoleon III.

From "The Tragic Empress," Comtesse Des Garets (Skeffington).

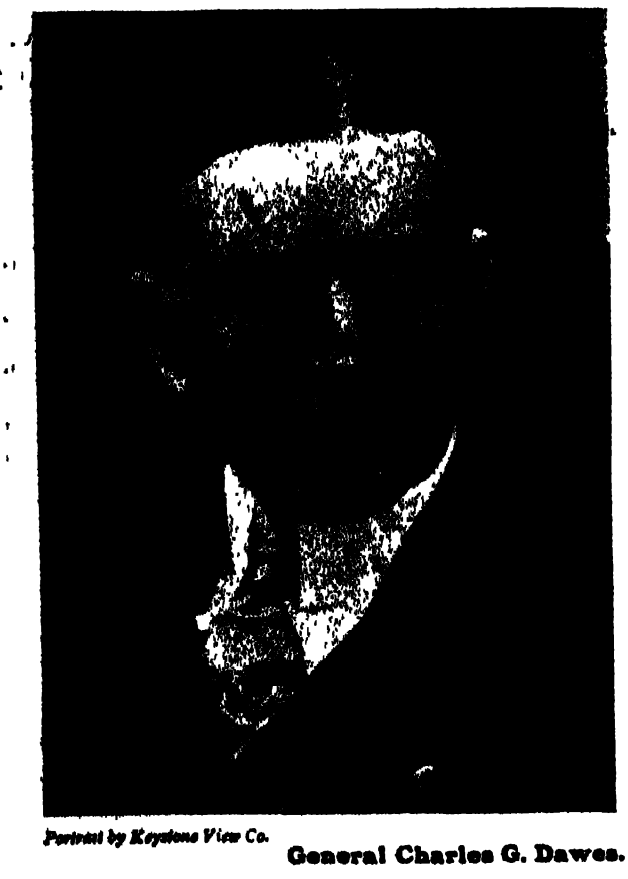
The Ascona episode is one of the most remarkable of his extraordinary career. Having actually lived for a week among the fanatics who insist that clothes are responsible for all evils, the Archduke is in a position to give his opinion of this community and its workings, and he does so with a refreshing candour.

The vicissitudes of his later years would make painful reading, if it were not for the fact that their ultimate effect has not been to leave him crushed and embittered. His gratitude for the help and friendship of Claire, the little working girl, only slightly less down-and-out than himself, proves that misfortune has shown him not only the bad but the good that lives in the lowest strata of society. It is good to know that though sausage hawking and grocery proved impossible undertakings for this denizen of a Royal house, he has been able to find his niche among the people whom he has chosen to call his own.



"A fine spirit, clothed by the flesh." Such is the author's own interpretation of the strange character of Maurice de Saxe, and a perusal of his history serves to strengthen the impression.

* "The Tragic Empress." By Comtesse Des Garets. 21s. (Skeffington.)—"My Life Story: From Archduke to Grocer." By Leopold Wolfling. 21s. (Hutchinson.)—"The Prodigious Marshal." By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. 18s. (Selwyn & Blount.)

It must be admitted that there are many moments in his stormy existence when the spirit seems to have been in imminent danger of complete suffocation, but this soldier of fortune was very much the product of his generation. Born of a father whose prowess among women had stirred Europe to wonder, and of a mother to whose once illustrious family his birth was yet one more cause for discredit, it was necessary for him to be able to fend for himself if he were to overcome the difficulties of his entrance into life.

His youth was a hard apprenticeship to the profession which seems to have been the only possible one for him. Swashbuckling, roystering adventurer as he was, with the instinct for soldiering born in him, it was no wonder that the bastard son of Augustus the Strong should become Marshal of France and conqueror of the British. This latter fact does not appear to have received due recognition until Mr. d'Auvergne's researches into the events of Fontenoy, Laufeld, and Raucoix placed it beyond doubt. "The position" (at Fontenoy) "had been chosen by Maurice de Saxe and to him undoubtedly belongs the distinction of having inflicted defeat upon a British army." His prowess in the field of battle was scarcely greater than his achievements in the courts of love, but he treated his women with less consideration than his soldiers. Even one who loved him deeply, as did Adrienne Lecouvreur, the great tragedienne, learned to expect neither faithfulness nor tenderness from him, while poor little Justine Favart, who could not bring herself to love him better than her actor-manager pastrycook's son, received neither mercy nor justice at his hands. A revealing light is shed upon the complicated tangle of the politics of the period. The prodigious marshal, with his sledge-hammer methods and his eccentric spelling, could not pit himself against the skilful diplomacy of Europe's greatest statesmen, but in some respects his standards of warfare were far in advance of his time. It was his unusual humanity towards his own soldiers and his justice to the conquered which made him recognised as a commander of the first rank. Not a great man, but a hero to his contemporaries, he said on his death-bed that his life had been "a beautiful dream." It makes at any rate a romantic and entertaining, if not altogether edifying, story.

Ethel Browning.

Portrait by Keystone View Co.

General Charles G. Dawes.

A JOURNAL OF THE GREAT WAR.*

The publishers of this volume have weighted it with several handicaps. It has no index—an inexcusable omission in a book dealing with a highly technical subject. It has no maps, and without maps much of the value of the material is lost. It has not even a table of contents, and comment on this drawback is superfluous.

Charles G. Dawes was an Engineer officer in the American Expeditionary Force during the Great War, and his book is written round "the first of many great generalisations," namely that there was a stupendous and unnecessary loss of life and waste of wealth, man-power and material due to the selfish resistance among the Allies to an earlier central control of military and supply operations. About two weeks after the agreement for the Foch command on March 27th, 1918, Dawes proposed a plan to General Pershing for coupling up the rear of the three Allied armies in France as they were coupled up at their front. Pershing adopted the plan in principle, and appointed Dawes as his representative to endeavour to secure its adoption by the Allies. Foch at this time, though technically generalissimo, had no power over any lines of communication except those of his own army. So acutely did he feel this handicap that in August, 1918, he asked that supreme control over the Allied rear should be given to General Payot, of his staff, and this was in effect exactly the same proposition which Dawes had made to the Allies in the inter-Allied conferences in the preceding April.

It is perhaps not quite correct to say that the book is "written round" its subject; rather it "grew" round it, for it is of the nature of a journal or diary beginning with August 21st, 1917, and closing with an entry dated "U.S.S. Leviathan, At Sea, August 2nd, 1919." In the preface we are told that a monograph on "The Principles of Army Supply and Purchase" will be found in the pages, but the absence of an index and the inefficiency of the running captions are likely to discourage the reader from an exhaustive search. We believe however that the memorandum on pages 84–90 is the document alluded to. It is dated April 13th, 1918, and the burden of it is that the organisation of the rear must be military; there must be a man instead of Boards. "The point I make is that it is impossible, with this great multiplicity of civil boards, criss-cross authority between the Allies, and lack of co-ordination in supply effort to properly determine the matter or properly act after its determination." It is of interest to note that under an organisation based upon the principle suggested, there were gathered for the American army (from a Europe supposedly stripped of supplies) over ten million tons of material as against seven million shipped to it from the United States. Apart from the technical question of the rationalisation of supply and transport, General Dawes's journal has much of interest. The "appreciation" on pages 58–60 of date November 30th, 1917, is shrewd and sound.

F. E. Whitton
(Lieut.-Colonel).

ART IN ENGLAND.†

For too many years England has been absurdly and irrationally humble with respect to her achievements in art. Contrary to all the evidence of the past we have allowed ourselves and others to assume that we are an inartistic nation and have bowed down to foreign art with a zeal that approaches obsequiousness. Whenever a

* "A Journal of the Great War." By Brigadier-General Charles G. Dawes, United States Army. 21s. (New York: Houghton Mifflin; and Allen & Unwin.)

† [1] "The Interrelation of the Fine Arts in England in the Early Middle Ages." By M. Dickens Whinney. 10s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)—[2] "English Mediæval Enamels." By M. Chamot. 10s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)—[3] "Art in England, 1821–1837." By W. T. Whitley. 25s. (Cambridge Press.)—[4] "Mural Painting of the Bombay School." By W. E. Gladstone Solomon. (Bombay: Times of India Press.)—[5] "The New Woodcut." By M. C. Salaman. 10s. 6d. (Studio.)

mediæval art treasure has been rediscovered in England, our own scholars and experts have usually strained every effort to prove that it must have been the work of a foreigner. England is never given the benefit of any doubt that exists.

Our national art authorities have been the first to "crab" on every occasion any prestige that might accrue to early English art. Though the "Wilton Diptych" has been pronounced by many high authorities to be most probably English work, no sooner was it acquired from the Earl of Pembroke for the National Gallery than it was labelled officially as a work of the "French School." Patriotism and scholarship might at least have induced the trustees to hedge and describe it as a work of the "English Channel School." But no, if any art treasure can be taken from England and attributed to a foreign source, our art experts are quick to do it. It was a shock to many who wanted them to be French or Flemish work when it was proved by still existing records that the wall-paintings in Eton College Chapel were the work of one William Baker—certainly no foreign name—and it is almost miraculous that no xenophil has yet dared to pretend that the exquisite roundel of the "Madonna and Child" in the Bishop's Palace at Chichester is anything but British work, circa 1300.

Apart from the disputed "Wilton Diptych," our National Gallery—so rich in the primitives of other nations—has no English mediæval painting. Scandinavia is far more appreciative of our past achievements in art, and there are several examples of early English paintings in the museums of Oslo, Bergen, Copenhagen, etc. So, strangely enough it is very largely due to the efforts of a scholar who came here from Finland, namely Dr. Tancred Borenius, that research is being made and new light thrown upon the various art activities of England in the early Middle Ages. Under his able leadership a band of young scholars are engaged in studying and writing monographs about various aspects of English mediæval art, and it is a crowning irony that the publication of at least one of these volumes has been rendered possible by the generous help of Mr. Ossian Donner, late Finnish Minister to the Court of St. James.

These monographs are particularly welcome at the present time, because throughout this month and September there will be open at the Victoria and Albert Museum the most superb exhibition of English mediæval art that has yet been got together. Being merely a British affair it has naturally had very little publicity, not a hundredth part as much as the preceding Italian Exhibition at Burlington House. But it is a collection which, as Mr. Fred Roe, R.I., has said, "can stand up for all that is finest in the art of our forefathers, and bear comparison with the best unscathed." His review of this exhibition in The Connoisseur for July may be commended to the notice of all unable to visit the exhibition itself at South Kensington.

A brief but highly efficient indication of the richness and variety of our early mediæval art is given by Miss M. Dickens Whinney in her fascinating monograph on "The Interrelation of the Fine Arts in England in the Early Middle Ages."[1] Surveying a wide field of art endeavour during the twelfth century, she is able to show the direct translation of the motives of one craft into another as one of the most curious phenomena of the period. Selecting such relics as the Gloucester Candlestick, the Winchester Bible, the ivory tau-heads in the British and Victoria and Albert Museums, the Kennet Ciborium, the sculpture at Malmesbury, and the wall-paintings at Canterbury, she rightly contends that these masterpieces "could only have been produced by a people whose artistic life was of a very high standard."

In another volume of this series of University College (London) Monographs, Miss M. Chamot gives us a brilliant and scholarly study of "English Mediæval Enamels."[2] In a preface she traces the development of this fascinating craft from the time of Philostratus to the end of the fourteenth century, and in the narrow compass of seventy pages she presents an exhaustive bibliography of her subject, a series of concise but most illuminating notes, and reproductions of most of the finest known examples of English enamel work.

What Dr. Borenius and his circle are doing for English mediæval art, Mr. W. T. Whitley is doing for our nineteenth century painting. In his second volume, which deals with "Art in England, 1821–1837,"[3] Mr. Whitley shows that while taste was at a lamentably low ebb in England between the death of George IV and the accession of Queen Victoria, it was nevertheless a period of great artistic splendour; Turner was just getting into his stride, and Constable was producing masterpiece after masterpiece. Their work was not appreciated at the time, neither

The Horse Fair.
(By Kenneth Holmes.)

From "The New Woodcut," by M. C. Salaman (Studio).

by the public nor by their fellow artists. Indeed Mr. Whitley brings forward irrefutable evidence that Turner himself failed to appreciate Constable; he voted against him when he was a candidate for election to the Royal Academy, and spoke contemptuously of the "whitewash-splashing" by which Constable so magically suggested the high lights on dewy grass. Not only does Mr. Whitley give much new and interesting information about Constable, Lawrence and other artists of this period, he also takes into his survey the inner history of the Royal Academy, the National Gallery, and other institutions, and records forgotten events of great interest at Christie's and other sale-rooms. His book is a valuable contribution to the literature of our early nineteenth century art.

Just as England too long lost sight of her own early native artists and was tempted to imitate the art of other lands, so modern India formerly attempted to build up a new art based on Western practices instead of continuing the splendid native tradition of Mogul and other true Indian art. More recently however, led by the sympathetic direction of Mr. Havell at Calcutta, a new India art based on the old Indian traditions has arisen. It is gratifying to learn from Mr. W. E. Gladstone Solomon's book[4] that the Bombay students selected to decorate buildings at New Delhi have carried out work on the wall which is essentially Indian in treatment. The colour reproductions show the results obtained, while Mr. Solomon's text explains the circumstances and methods which preceded these achievements.

An interesting feature of art activity since the Armistice has been the remarkable revival of the woodcut. For this a partial explanation may be found in economic causes. Wood is cheaper than copper for an artist to work upon, and eight or nine years ago publishers in France and England suddenly discovered that a richly illustrated book could be produced far more cheaply by using wood-blocks obtained direct from an artist, than by translating his drawings into illustrations by means of line or half-tone process blocks. The amazing revival of this form of graphic art all over the world, in Japan and in the United States, as well as in all European countries, is revealed in Mr. M. C. Salaman's profusely illustrated volume on "The New Woodcut."[5] According to this eminent authority our contemporary original wood-engravers could almost be "counted on one's fingers" twenty years ago. "Nowadays the name of the wood-engraver is legion in all the countries that have a graphic art tradition." Of the varieties of effect obtained by this legion, the illustrations afford admirable evidence, while Mr. Salaman's scholarly and illuminating text explains the methods by which these various results are obtained and, incidentally, aids the reader materially to appreciate those technical triumphs and subtleties which can be appreciated by all once they have been pointed out by a sympathetic and understanding expert.

Frank Rutter.

Novel Notes.

CASTLE GAY. By John Buchan. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

During the rough-and-tumble of a Rectorial election the students of Glasgow kidnapped the wrong man, and the victim was no other than Mr. Thomas Carlyle Craw, the greatest newspaper magnate of his time. By a happy chance he encountered in his misfortunes two most capable and energetic young men, Jaikie Galt, the famous Rugby international, and his friend, Dougal Crombie, who was an obscure and very critical member of Craw's editorial staff. A story with such a setting and with Mr. John Buchan to write it will, it is needless to say, excite and fulfil the highest expectations. It is an admirable comedy, packed full of dramatic and surprising episodes, and readers will be glad to recognise among the persons of the drama certain old friends from "Huntingtower." In addition to lively comedy and pungent satire, Mr. Buchan tells with his accustomed deftness the love-story of Jaikie and the Honourable Alison Westwater. "Castle Gay" must find a place in the holiday portmanteau.

NOT MENTIONED. By Andrew Soutar. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

As the title at once suggests that this novel is a "war book," it is imperative to say at once that it is entirely free from those faults of sensationalism and exaggeration that have brought the entire genus into disrepute. And it is only in a special sense a war book, since most of its pages are concerned with the old Sussex homestead whence the sons went forth to fight and where the father and daughter gallantly "carried on." John Browne is a typical yeoman of the old school, who stands four square to all the winds of misfortune and bereavement, only to die when the last tension is relaxed. Mr. Soutar is a most accomplished story-teller and quickly captures our interest in the fortunes of all the Browne family. The family annals during the eventful four years are fraught with tragedy and pathos, but Mr. Soutar does not forget the humorous aspects of war-time village life. It is an engrossing narrative very true to life, admirable in its perspective and refreshing by virtue of its sanity and shrewd insight.

THE ISLAND. By Naomi Royde-Smith. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

Pitiful though it be, the theme of Miss Royde-Smith's new book is one that will prove unpleasant to the taste of many of her readers. "The Island" tells the miserable story of Myfanwy Hughes, known as Goosey, whose repressed passions drive her into a morbid and bitter misogamy and a yet more morbid attachment for Flossie Priestman, a vulgar and sensual egotist. The story thereafter is but the record, very cleverly and convincingly written, of Goosey's progressive deterioration and of her enslavement to her horrible friend. This way madness lies, and Miss Royde-Smith does not shirk the implications of her theme. While we regret to see so much ability spent in turning pathology into fiction, we must testify to the author's very evident sincerity of purpose. The book has some slight connections with two of the writer's earlier works, but they scarcely seem worth the making. The sub-title, "a love story," should have been omitted. Unwary readers might be misled by the ghastly irony.

CORDUROY. By Adrian Bell. 7s. 6d. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

The publisher speaks no more than the truth in saying that this is a book alive "for the agriculturist and the Arcadian." Warned by his father against "wasting time" in desultory writing in Chelsea, the young author allowed himself to be apprenticed to a Suffolk farmer, with the happy result that in his first book he has something definite and vital to write about. As a description of the actual work on a farm from day to day, Mr. Bell's pages are uncommonly lucid and interesting. He reveals the gulf which separates the novice's view of nature from that of the initiate, and shows that even Thomas Hardy is proved by his poems to have been but a rural onlooker. At the same time, Mr. Bell demonstrates that an intimate knowledge of the land need not destroy a poetical delight in nature. The homely charm and bracing breadth of the East Anglian landscape are vividly reflected in his narrative, and he has an eye—at once humorous and kindly—for the characters of the country-side. Rural life has found in Mr. Bell a very competent and pleasant interpreter.

THE COMPLETE HUMAN BOY. By Eden Phillpotts. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

This well printed but too loosely bound volume of nearly eight hundred pages represents "The Complete Human Boy" in a double sense. It is an "omnibus" containing the five hitherto separate books in Mr. Phillpotts's " Human Boy " series; and between them those five books—now become one—certainly leave no aspect of boy life unstudied. In these delightfully light yet penetrative stories, the human—very human—boy is here revealed in all his mingled glory and shame. He is presented sympathetically and with fine understanding, but without sentimentality. In an interesting preface written for the present edition, Mr. Phillpotts, pleasantly reminiscent, takes us back to the days when The Idler, under Robert Barr and Jerome, was famous for its band of humorous writers. It was to this magazine that Mr. Phillpotts, a very young man, offered his first " Human Boy " story, which produced from Jerome the request for many more tales of the kind. It was under this encouragement that Mr. Phillpotts returned in memory to his own schooldays; and, " looking back upon them from a man's standpoint," saw " the rich field that realistic treatment of the Human Boy might offer." How fully and admirably Mr. Phillpotts has tilled that field! As the interpreter of the real, flesh-and-blood boy he has had many imitators, but no supplanters.

THE STREET PAVED WITH WATER. By Almey St. John Adcock. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Lot Tudway, the proud owner of the barge Welcome, dreamed of seeing " the name of Tudway & Son blazoned on barges up and down the country." But when the son grew up, he preferred the gentility of a haberdasher's shop, and Lot found his ideal partner in his once-despised daughter, Welcome. This, then, is a novel of barge life, and Welcome is its splendid and unusual heroine. When the brutal Lot is killed in a brawl, Welcome, thrusting her broken romance behind her, develops into a remarkable business woman and becomes a person of importance. But her sex and her success create many enemies, and when she determines to move with the times and substitute steam for horses, all the ugly passions of the " boaties " are aroused, and her life is menaced. When the menace nears realisation, her old lover is there to share it, and poor Welcome's dreams come true in detail. This is a very fine and powerful work, marking the rapid advance of a true novelist. Miss Adcock has given us a haunting book, tender and tragic, and of notable artistry.

THE SMALL DARK MAN. By Maurice Walsh. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

If Mr. Walsh's reputation as a novelist of distinction had not been already definitely established by " The Key About the Door " and " While Rivers Run," this, his third and latest novel, would have been completely successful in doing so. We are glad to see it issued already at a popular price. Like its forerunners the story has for its setting the Scottish Highlands and no reader will deny that the author's descriptions of the passionate beauty of the hills would be difficult to better. The whole book is impregnated with the lure of the mountains, the fragrance of the heather and the music of the wind in the pines. His characters, too, particularly his hero, Hugh Forbes and his friend Charles Grant and Frances Mary, sister of Charles and beloved of Hugh, are all fully and delightfully alive, while a fine philosophy and a quiet humour place us further in the author's debt. We are grateful to Mr. Walsh for a story as refreshing and invigorating as a holiday in his native hills.

The Bookman's Table.

DOMINATION: SOME NAPOLEONIC EPISODES. By Marjorie Johnston. 12s. (Murray.)

Miss Marjorie Johnston, the younger sister of Miss Myrtle Johnston, who at the same age made a sensation a few years ago with her novel, " Hanging Johnny," is only eighteen years old. In this volume she has essayed to demonstrate the dominating influence of Napoleon's Josephine.

(From the design by Isabey.)
From " Domination," by Marjorie Johnston (Murray).

character through a series of episodes in his career or in that of someone closely connected with him. There is an episode for each year in his life, from the time when in 1795 he emerged into the limelight as a young artillery officer, to 1840, when, having been dead nineteen years, he was given his final funeral in Paris. Considering the vast bulk of Napoleonic literature, Miss Johnston has shown originality in treating an old theme from a new angle. It would be too much to pretend that she has achieved the dramatic unity and effect which such a treatment might have attained in maturer hands. But she has thoroughly digested her data, and writes with a restrained picturesqueness that augurs well for her literary future.

FAMOUS SHIPWRECKS. By Captain Frank H. Shaw. 12s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

As a sea-writer, Captain Shaw needs no introduction; as a practical authority on his subject he is incontrovertible. Before he was twenty-two he had been four times round the world on board a windjammer, and had won an extra-master's ticket; then he took to the Atlantic Ferry and to writing. All his skill in graphic narrative, in clear elucidation, in illuminating comment is shown in his latest book. From the sinking of the Royal George in 1782 to the Rye life-boat disaster at the end of 1928, he traces many shipwrecks—by fire, by sea, by torpedo—ships piling themselves on the rocks or foundering in mid-ocean—ships valiantly fighting a losing battle, or quickly engulfed by the waves. But thrilling as are his accounts of the heroism displayed in countless crises, more splendid still is his history of the life-boat and its work of heroic mercy. The matter is apt to be greater than the manner. Nevertheless it is a thousand times worth reading.

PASCAL. By Jacques Chevalier. 15s. (Sheed & Ward.)

Pascal was among the most versatile and remarkable men who ever lived. " At twelve years of age, with a few strokes and circles, he had discovered mathematics; at sixteen he had written the most learned treatise on conic sections since classical times; at nineteen, reduced to machinery a science existing wholly in the intellect; at twenty-three he had demolished one of the greatest errors in the physics of the ancients. At an age when other men are scarcely conscious of themselves, he had completed the circuit of the human sciences, perceived their vacuity and turned his thoughts to religious matters." So wrote Chateaubriand, and M. Chevalier, one of the most distinguished of living French philosophers, takes those now famous words as the text for a new study of Pascal, in which he sees him not merely as the reconciler of the scientific, religious and inter-religious-and-scientific problems of his own age, but as a unique model of intellectual and spiritual wisdom. M. Chevalier writes with authority on Pascal both as scientist and as saint, and his book breathes a fine enthusiasm which at times becomes perhaps a weakness. To many readers, especially non-Catholic readers, it will seem that the writer makes too light of certain difficulties in the interpretation of Pascal. But if it must be read with caution, this is an intensely vital and interesting study, combining intellectual and "human" qualities in a very rare and charming manner.

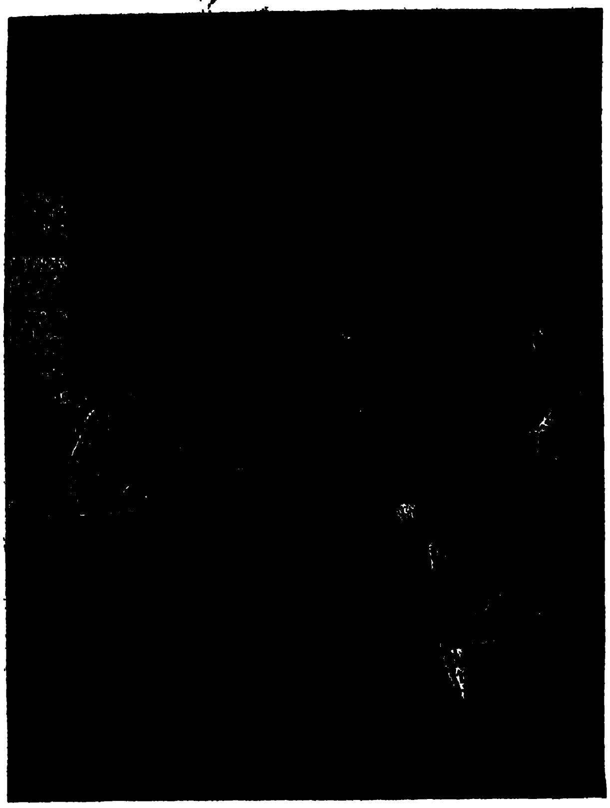
ADJECTIVES AND OTHER WORDS. By Ernest Weekley. 5s. (John Murray.)



As one would expect from its distinguished author, this is one of the most thrilling of books—to one reader at any rate much more so than any detective story. The pursuit of a word, its tracking down, and then as it were the spectacle of Professor Weekley carrying home his spoil in triumph—all this is a most satisfactory affair. Fortunate the country that possesses two such gay professors as Saintsbury and our author. It is difficult to select any one of the fascinating chapters of this book, for every one of them cries aloud for quotation. Lightly, as if it were a feather, does Weekley bear his erudition. Nothing human is alien to Weekley, and he can even find cracks in the armour, which on the whole he very much respects, of the monumental Oxford Dictionary. "Someone," he says, "should write a book on the debt of our language to Scott, an author who, according to a contemporary manufacturer of shockers, is 'unreadable.'" It is extraordinarily interesting to learn that a number of familiar words are found for the first time in Shakespeare: aerial, bump, countless, dwindle, eventful, fitful, gnarled, hurry, ill-starred, lonely, monumental and so forth. On the other side of the picture stands Theodore Roosevelt. "I stand," he said, "by the Ten Commandments. They are bully."

CIVILISATION AND THE CRIPPLE. By Frederick Watson. 10s. 6d. (Bale, Sons & Danielsson.)

Mr. Watson, who for six years has edited The Cripple, an international quarterly, here gives us the first book that has ever been devoted in any country to a survey of "social orthopædics." He discusses the whole problem of the relation of the cripple to society and of society to the cripple. While his main appeal is to the student, his volume will interest the general reader. The historical chapters, in particular, are very fascinating and are written with considerable literary allusiveness and charm. From ancient times, with a few humaner intervals, the cripple, until comparatively recent days, was regarded either as an object of scorn or of ridicule, and unhappily the industrial revolution undid much of the good work started by eighteenth century humanitarianism. The Great War, with its advances in surgery, proved indirectly a blessing to cripples, and the new sunlight treatment is radiant with possibilities. The later chapters, dealing with the modern problem in all its aspects, physical and social, are more technical, but are always commendably lucid.

SO YOU'RE GOING TO GERMANY AND AUSTRIA! By Clara E. Laughlin. 10s. 6d. (Methuen.)

The author of this very attractive guide-book (one of a series that is likely to win great popularity) has had a very definite scheme in view and has carried it out with notable success. Although it is a well-packed volume of more than five hundred pages, the author knows that even that allowance is too meagre for completeness and detail. The book is meant for the holiday tourist whose time is limited, and accordingly includes "only those places to which a majority of travellers go, and a few others to which they may like to go when they know what the attractions of those less-frequented places are." Miss Laughlin is better than her word, and her range will be found to be both wide and discreet. She reveals a genuine talent for this kind of work, and her book is compact, readable, interesting and informative. The format is very handy and attractive and the book has a couple of dozen illustrations, end-paper maps and plans, and an excellent index.

Albrecht Dürer visits Hans Sachs.
(By Richard Gross.)
From "So You're Going to Germany and Austria!" by Clara E. Laughlin (Methuen).

Books of the Month.

From June 15th to July 15th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

To take up FAIR PERTHSHIRE, by Hamish Miles (15s.; Bodley Head), at one's leisure after unforgettable sojourns in the exquisite country depicted, is sheer delight. It is to see again with the mind's eye countless glimpses by the way that enchanted in passing, but were submerged in the wealth that steadily unfolded itself. Mr. Miles has captured, to a remarkable extent, the glamour that belongs not only to the beauty and charm of the present, but to the tradition and history in which it is steeped. A good deal of the ground covered is well known, but there are many adventures into the unfrequented glens and villages, as well as in the company of past and present worthies. Who can forget the magic of the Dochart as it rushes under the bridge at Killin, the commanding grandeur of Schiehallion, or the serene peacefulness of Strathyre? Yet these are few of the many spells cast by this witching shire. We can imagine this book appealing equally to those for whom it is a happy reminder and those for whom it holds such rich promise. Mr. John McGhie has been an excellent collaborator with his eight delightful illustrations in colour and seventy-six in black-and-white.

There is no need to recommend a new P. G. Wodehouse, especially when it is concerned with Jeeves. That cream of gentlemen's gentlemen has made his own niche among the laughter-makers, and a very secure one it is. In VERY GOOD, JEEVES (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins) he carries the reader with his unfailing verve and resourcefulness into, and out of, some of the most amazing predicaments. An ideal holiday book of the vim and sparkle variety.

We have not forgotten the delightfully unconventional tone of Mr. Roy Elston's previous book on Southern France. Now he has turned his attention to TRAVELS IN NORMANDY (7s. 6d.; Bell), and in the same free and easy manner quickly establishes the reader on intimate terms with the country's romantic pageant of history, with its glories of architecture, and with its people at work and at play. Surely Caudebec, where more than ever "one feels the need of roots," will grip the reader as it gripped Mr. Elston, but, strong though the temptation is, it is impossible to particularise amid such profusion. The beauties of town and country-side come in for their full share of appreciation, while ample attention is given to the more material matters of hotels, fares and many other useful hints.

Guide-books of to-day, more than ever, assume elastic proportions, and each holiday season brings its due crop of the light and chatty variety, which serve not only to elucidate one's immediate problems, but to turn a mere visit into a vastly entertaining and profitable adventure. In this connection Messrs. Harrap's Kitbag Series have been remarkably successful. In each instance the books are from the pens of the recognised authorities on their subject, and the two before us at the moment—LONDON TOWN, by Sidney Dark, and THE ENGLISH LAKES, by W. T. Palmer (7s. 6d. each) are no exception. A man who can wrest romance out of an insurance office can be safely trusted with a magic subject like London. Such a man is Sidney Dark, and though he writes primarily for the visitor from a distance, he relates much that will agreeably surprise and interest the Londoner himself, who is notoriously obtuse to his surroundings. Mention must be made of the very choice drawings by Joseph Pike. Mr. Palmer's book is, in his own words, "the result of a lifetime's scrambling, rambling and reading." Both by text and illustrations he has happily conveyed the grandeur of the mountain scenes and solitudes and added to this a wealth of helpful advice on planning walking tours, rock-climbing, etc.

Another excellent series is Bell's Pocket Guides, in which KENT, by S. E. Winbolt (6s.), is just to hand. Brim-full of varied information, the interests of to-day are dexterously blended with those of dim and distant yesterdays. As in previous volumes Miss Winifred Ward has been responsible for the numerous photographs and these play no small part in depicting the quaint villages with their old-world cottages, the inland waterways and coastal beauties, as well as the ageless interest that attaches to Canterbury and many another spot.

Only by virtue of its title can SEEING SUSSEX, by Mabel S. Rudkin (3s. 6d.; Elliot Stock), be linked with the foregoing. In breezy, humorous vein Mrs. Rudkin describes the privileges of entertaining the divers and sundry relatives and friends who descended on their rectory with the idea of "Seeing Sussex." The diversities of viewpoint and the artless subterfuges often indulged give excellent scope for her light-hearted and refreshing chronicles.

ART

Studio.—The Spirit of America: Currier and Ives Prints. 5s.—Master Draughtsmen: Number 1. Michel-Angelo. 5s.

Warne.—Correggio. Corrado Ricci. 31s. 6d.

CRITICISM AND BELLES-LETTRES

Constable.—Novels and Novelists. Katherine Mansfield 7s. 6d.

Mitre Press.—Art and Sex. M. J. Nicolson. 5s.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS.—Above Pompeii. Ernest H. Wilkins. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON PRESS.—Fundamental English. P. B. Ballard. Junior Series. Book Four. 1s. 4d.—Teacher's Book Four. 2s. 3d.

WATTS.—Great Sons of Greece. F. J. Gould.—Temple Bells. E. Royston Pike.—The Origin of the World. R. McMillan. 1s. 6d. each.

FICTION

(Price 7s. 6d. each, except where otherwise indicated.)

ANGLO-AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS (London).—Kondora. Percy Pigott.

GEOFFREY BLES.—Behind the Lines. W. F. Morris.

BODLEY HEAD.—The Price of Victory. J. D. Strange.

JONATHAN CAPE.—Lyndesay. John Connell.

CASSELL.—The Golden Cat. Douglas Newton.

CHAPMAN & HALL.—The Prince From Overseas. Sir Basil Thomson.

COLLINS.—The Shop Window Murders. Vernon Loder.—The Person Called "Z." J. Jefferson Farjeon.—The Story of Leonora. Lady Troubridge.—The Link. Philip Macdonald.—Water Into Wine. Catherine Cotton.

CONSTABLE.—Show Me Death. W. Redvers Dent.

JOHN HAMILTON.—Murder Off Broadway. Leonard Falkner.

HARRAP.—Camouflage. Laurence W. Meynell.—Madder Music. Mildred Cram.

HEINEMANN.—The Wooden Woman. Alexander Townsend.—The Beacon Hill Murders. Roger Scarlett.—Look Homeward, Angel. Thomas Wolfe. 10s. 6d.—When the Melody is Finished. Norman Towar.

HODDER & STOUGHTON.—Trial by Water. Hulbert Footner.—Jane Steps Out. May Christie.—The Vantire Diamonds. Seamark.—Slane's Long Shots. E. Phillips Oppenheim. 3s. 6d.—Giving Him Up. Ruby M. Ayres. 3s. 6d.—Starveacres. Nora Kent.—McLean at the Golden Owl. George Goodchild. 3s. 6d.—Mystery Valley. Max Brand.—White Face. Edgar Wallace.—Fishes All Alive. Madge S. Smith.—Gone North. Charles Alden Seltzer.—Murder at High Tide. Charles G. Booth.—Tremendous Gain. Paddy Sylvanus.—Red. A. M. Chisholm.

HURST & BLACKETT.—When the Tide Runs Out. Edgar Winch.

HUTCHINSON.—Voodoo. John Esteven. The Penance of Brother Alaric. Bruce Græme.—The Woman Ayisha. Talbot Mundy. 6s.—The Spider's Debt. Johnston McCulley.—Italian Adventure. Isabel C. Clarke.—Martin Make-Believe. Gilbert Frankau.—To What Green Altar? W. B. Maxwell.—Chances. A. Hamilton Gibbs.

HERBERT JENKINS.—The House in Tuesday Market. J. S. Fletcher.

HERBERT JOSEPH.—Please Meet Alphonse. Jesse Collings. 2s. 6d.

KNOPF.—The Kramer Girls. Ruth Suckow.

JOHN LANE.—Penny Rose. F. E. Mills Young.

LIPPINCOTT.—Beggar-man. Jane Abbott.—Bubbles. Maximilian Foster.

METHUEN.—Doctor Cockaigne. N. E. Davies. 3s. 6d.—A Double Quest. Douglas Timins.—Garstons. H. C. Bailey.—The Witch of Chelsea. Olga Hartley.

JOHN MURRAY.—Down to the Sea. Alexis Macandrew.—Breakers. N. Brysson Morrison.

NASH & GRAYSON.—Open Till Sunset. D. M. Locke.

PUTNAMS.—When Beggars Ride. George Agnew Chamberlain. $2.00.

SELWYN & BLOUNT.—Aviva. Richard Fisher.

STOCKWELL.—Our Dead Selves. A. Mabel Barker.

WARD, LOCK.—Delicate Fiend. E. Charles Vivian.—The Valiant Jester. Maribel Edwin.—The Vanished Guest. Ottwell Binns.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND TRANSLATIONS

BODLEY HEAD.—Personalities and Powers. Knut Hagberg. 12s. 6d.
DENT.—Martin Luther: A Destiny. Lucien Febore. 10s. 6d.
HARRAP.—Wagner In Exile. Woldemar Lippert. 10s. 6d.
JOHN MURRAY.—The Cloud Messenger. Translated from the original Sanskrit of Kalidasa, by Charles King. 2s. 6d.
RICHARDS PRESS.—The Demon. Michael Lermontov. 1 guinea.
SCHOLARTIS PRESS.—The Country Waif.—The Castle of Pictordu. George Sand. 8s. 6d.
SHEED & WARD.—For Joan of Arc. Marshal Foch and Others. 7s. 6d.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

BATSFORD.—Little Known England. Harold D. Eberlein. 12s. 6d.—Touring London. W. Teignmouth Shore. 4s.
BRAITHWAITE & MILLER.—Oscar Wilde. Patrick Braybrooke. 7s. 6d.
CONSTABLE.—The Conflict. E. E. Kellett. 12s.—Exmoor and Other Days. Arthur O. Fisher. 10s. 6d.—Family Origins and Other Studies. J. Horace Round. 25s.
DENT.—Suffolk and Norfolk. M. R. Jones. 5s.
FOYLES WELSH PRESS.—Snowdonia, Its Scenes, Shrines and Stories. J. Cuming Walters.
HARRAP.—Sudan Sand. Stella Court-Treatt. 15s.—Burgundy. Stephen Gwynn. 7s. 6d.—The Atlantic. Stanley Rogers. 7s. 6d.—Blue Rhine, Black Forest. Louis Untermeyer. 7s. 6d.
HOMELAND ASSOCIATION.—Dear Old Cornwall. Various contributors. 1s.
HUTCHINSON.—Stampede. Stella Court-Treatt. 7s. 6d.
HERBERT JOSEPH.—Love and Sunshine In the East. Janet Aldis. 12s. 6d.
WERNER LAURIE.—Celebrated Musicians, Past and Present. Hubert Whelbourn. 8s. 6d.
METHUEN.—Etruria Past and Present. M. A. Johnstone. 7s. 6d.—Paris. Raymond Escholier. 10s. 6d.
NEWNES.—Afoot in Italy. John Gibbons. 7s. 6d.
ROBERTSON & MULLEN (Melbourne).—Along the Track. Robert H. Croll. 4s.

JUVENILE

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON PRESS.—From David Copperfield to David Blaize. 10 authors. 2s.

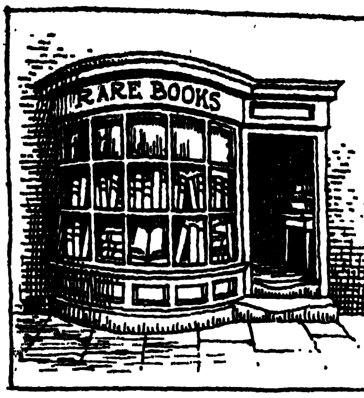
MISCELLANEOUS

EDWARD ARNOLD.—The Discovery of Poetry. P. H. B. Lyon. 2s. 6d.
BODLEY HEAD.—H.M.I.'s Notebook. E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley. 7s. 6d.
PETER DAVIES.—Early Keyboard Instruments. Philip James. 30s.
EFFICIENCY MAGAZINE.—Shaping Your Career. W. J. Caton Norris. 3s. 6d.
HARRAP.—The Ochrana. A. T. Vassilyev. 15s.
JARROLDS.—On the Track of Murder. Arthur Carey. 18s.
KNOPF.—Gardens of This Word. Henry B. Fuller. 7s. 6d.—The Old Book: A Mediæval Anthology. Dorothy Hartley. 32s. 6d.
LIPPINCOTT.—An Hour With the Movies and the Talkies. Gilbert Seldes. 4s. 6d.—The American Novel. Grant Overton. 4s. 6d.—An Hour of American History Samuel Eliot Morison. 4s. 6d.
MITRE PRESS.—A Subaltern in Macedonia and Judea, 1916-17. Rev. R. Skilbeck Smith. 5s.
MORLEY & KENNERLEY.—Behind Both Lines. Hugh Kingsmill. 6s. 6d.
JOHN MURRAY.—The Road Home. Gertrude Ramsay. 6s.
NASH & GRAYSON.—The Wipers Times. 8s. 6d.
NEWNES.—The Conclusions of Modern Science. Walter Grierson. 2s. 6d.
OLIVER & BOYD (Edinburgh).—The Shetland Sketch Book. W. Fordyce Clark. 3s. 6d.
OUSELEY.—No—Badiah. 2s.
CECIL PALMER.—Untold Tales of War-Time London. Mrs. Eustace Miles. 3s. 6d.
ERIC PARTRIDGE.—Songs and Slang of the British Soldier. 7s. 6d.
RIDER.—The New Nuctemeron. Marjorie Livingston. 4s. 6d.—Hands and Faces. Katharine St. Hill. 10s. 6d.
SHEED & WARD.—No Popery. Herbert Thurston. 7s. 6d.
SIMPKINS.—Empire Stock-Taking. L. St. Clare Grondona. 10s. 6d.
STOCKWELL.—The Art of Remembering. Rev. B. J. Wicks. 1s.
TUTTLE (Vermont, U.S.A.).—My Travels in the Spirit World. Caroline D. Larsen.
VALENTINE (Dundee).—Tommy Lorne's Book of Scottish Humour. 1s. 6d.
WILLIAMS & NORGATE.—Poland, Germany and the Corridor. Casimir Smogorzewski. 6s.—Authors' Annual, 1930. 5s.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

SIDGWICK & JACKSON.—The Story of Tobit. Doris Pailthorpe, Zoë Procter and Dorothea Rock. 2s. 6d.

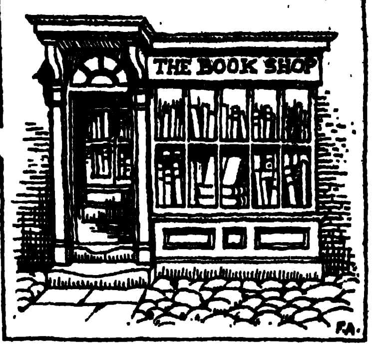
POETRY



AQUILA PRESS.—Poems (Two) 1925. Nancy Cunard. 10s. 6d.
CONSTABLE.—Pass, Stranger. Mrs. Peyton Mackeson. 5s.
PRIVATELY PRINTED BY AUTHOR.—The Passion of Joan of Arc. L. C. Headly.
HEINEMANN.—Light in Six Moods. George Rostrevor Hamilton. 3s. 6d.
ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Queer Little Poems. Laura Russell. 1s. 6d.—These Our Matins. Michael Roberts. 3s. 6d.
NEW ZEALAND PUBLISHING CO. (Wellington, N.Z.).—Verses and Essays. Philip S. E. Hereford. 3s. 6d.
UNIVERSITY OF BIRMINGHAM MEDICAL SCHOOL.—Student Verse, 1921–1930. 2s. 6d.
YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS.—Virtuosa. Louise Owen. 6s. 6d.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.—The Knowledge of Reality. Wincenty Lutoslowski. 7s. 6d.
CAREY PRESS.—The Epistle to the Romans. Henry Cook. 2s. 6d.—The Acts of the Apostles. F. Townley Lord. 2s. 6d.
DENT.—A Free Church Psalter. Edited by Pauline Taylor. 1s. 6d.
ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Psychology and Religion. E. S. Waterhouse. 5s.
PICKERING & INGLIS.—The Inspiration and Accuracy of the Holy Scriptures. John Urquhart. 5s.—The Gospel of the Bible. W. E. Vine. 2s. 6d.—Twenty-one Difficult Texts in the Bible. 1s.—The Believers' Blue Book. Hy. Pickering. 2s.—In Christ. A. J. Gordon. 2s. 6d.—Praying Hyde. E. G. Carré. 2s. 6d.
PURE THOUGHT PRESS (Watford).—A Lamp to the Feet. Frederick H. Haines. 6s.



REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

BLACKWOOD.—Saracinesca. F. Marion Crawford. 3s. 6d.
COBDEN-SANDERSON.—Undertones of War. Edmund Blunden. 5s.
CONSTABLE.—Robert E. Lee. Major-General Sir F. Maurice. 7s. 6d.—Many Cities. Hilaire Belloc. 10s. 6d.
HEINEMANN.—Flying Corps Headquarters. 1914–1918. Maurice Baring. 8s. 6d.
ILIFFE.—Speed. J. E. G. Harwood. 2s. 6d.
JORDAN.—How to Form a Company. Herbert W. Jordan. 2s. 6d.
MACMILLAN.—The Optimist. E. M. Delafield. 3s. 6d.
NASH & GRAYSON.—The West Indies. George Manington. 7s. 6d.
RICHARDS.—Lyrists of the Restoration. John and Constance Masefield. 2s. 6d.—Essays, Moral and Polite. John and Constance Masefield. 2s. 6d.
SCHOLARTIS PRESS.—Lady Julia Mandeville. Frances Brooke. 8s. 6d.

The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

MANUSCRIPT COLLECTING.

THERE is an increasing interest in the collecting of manuscripts, as many readers must realise when they look through the catalogues that are issued by the various antiquarian booksellers. Almost every list that is printed contains some important manuscripts offered for sale to the public, and more than a few are both costly and rare. It is the same in the auction-rooms. With nearly every sale of books, there is usually put up for auction a manuscript or two of varying importance, which are sold for sums that range from a few pounds to many hundreds.

Time was when an author, even a notable author, took no interest in the manuscript that he had written. Now every writer, of any importance whatsoever, realises that his original manuscript may be worth a considerable amount, and like a wise man, he carefully preserves it against the time when someone suggests that he may be ready to dispose of it. I don't think that anyone can cavil at such an attitude, because, after all, a manuscript is like any other piece of property. It has a market value, and the author is in no wise to be criticised for selling what is his own, and what he knows is bound to appeal to the collector who is interested, and who has enough money to make the purchase. Of course it is not every author who can look at his manuscript and say that the chances are he may, in due season, sell it for so much. But many can indeed do this, as we have seen from catalogues and auction sales.

Not so many years since, a number of Conrad manuscripts were sold in New York for some thirty-odd thousand pounds. I don't suppose for one moment, that when Conrad wrote those fine stories of his, that he ever thought they would, after his death, be sold for so large a sum. But the remarkable thing is that the original manuscripts of comparatively recent books bring their owners amounts that run into a hundred or more pounds. It takes many years, and many virtues, of course, for a manuscript to realise the £15,000 odd that was paid for the famous "Alice in Wonderland" manuscript.

Photo by Will Cadby. Joseph Conrad.

As in the case of first editions, the intelligent collector of manuscripts, unless he be a rich man, and can afford to buy those rare and valuable ones at prices which do not make his pocket too light, goes after the manuscripts of those authors whose fame is not yet great, or who has only just begun to push his way forward in the race for success. Now this class of manuscript is not easy to come by; for, as a rule, such an author does not trouble much about such things. Although, here and there, you will find him holding on to them against a possible demand—a demand that he hopes will become an actuality.

But one can get hold of some manuscripts by the more promising of younger writers, for a pound or so. Not so long since an author gave the original manuscript of a three thousand word story to a friend, which he kept; and all honour to him. That friend had a great belief in the future of the author, although at that time I don't suppose anyone would have given a guinea for it. A similar length of manuscript, written by the same writer, was sold recently for £40. Nowadays he is a considerable power in modern literature. So you see how the values of manuscripts are advancing, as in the case of many first editions.

I have in front of me at the moment of writing,

several lists of manuscripts which contain many dozens of originals offered for sale. I am confident that, before many years have passed, a number of these will be worth very much larger sums than they are priced to-day. First edition collecting, the making of association books, the collecting of manuscripts, belong to each other. Each is an entity in itself, but combined you have a richness in collecting that is hardly surpassed in any other pursuit.

I saw marked at £30, somewhere the other day, a collection of twelve original typescripts of James Stephens. They were poems, containing many corrections by the author. It is my guess that this collection will be worth far more than this in the years to come. Not to-morrow, so to speak, but before many years have gone by. Once on a time, if one could have got hold of them, I suppose Hardy's manuscripts might have been bought for very modest sums. Now they are worth many hundreds of pounds. One could fill many columns with instances of the high prices that are paid for original manuscripts of famous books, which at one time could have been bought at a reasonable figure.

Homesteads.

Item 80. From Harold Hill's "Books, Tracts, Engraved Views and Other Old Prints relative to America."

If anyone is thinking of venturing to enter this domain of collecting, you may be sure that it is not without its troubles and pitfalls. There is need for care in the matter of "faking," concerning which one of these days we shall have something to say. The collecting of manuscripts can be begun in a modest way, and out of that modesty there may come a richness of possession that will have made all the trouble more than worth while. It will need a special sense, and knowledge and understanding will come only by way of experience, spread over, perhaps, a long period. The successful collector of manuscripts will be he, or she, who has something of that inner sense of literary judgment, about which we have so often written. No collecting in the three sections that are mentioned above, can be successful if there is a lack of this understanding. At least, even though we make no remarkable finds, and never have the luck to buy a manuscript at a small price, and sell it for a fabulous sum within a short period, there is a fascination in it; and if we collect carefully and in no stupid unrestrained spirit, the collector will not find a balance on the wrong side of his account.

Since writing the above we have come across two MSS. of C. E. Montague's—"The Morning's War" and "Rough Justice," containing 1,900 sheets —for £350. Montague was a great writer of modern times, and when he died a year or two since, we lost an author and a thinker of eminence.

THE MARKET.

Since our last notes appeared, but a few limited editions have been announced, although not much information finds its way into print concerning such works. There has been issued, between the moment of our writing and the publication of this issue of The Bookman, a new book by A. A. Milne, entitled "When I Was Very Young," of which there is a limited signed edition, the whole of which was subscribed for before publication. Another limited signed edition, issued last month, was a new play by George Moore, entitled "The Passing of the Essenes." This is a play based upon an incident from Mr. Moore's famous book, "The Brook Kerith." We should like to call attention to "Sienese Painting of the Trecento," by Curt H. Weigelt, assistant director of the Instituto di Storia dell' Arte in Florence, and "Venetian Painting of the Seicento and Settecento," by Guiseppe Fiocco, Professor of the History of Art in the University of Florence. Both of these latter books are published by the Pegasus Press of Paris.

Those most entertaining and delightful books which Mr. A. Edward Newton, the famous American book-collector, writes, are all beginning to command fine prices, and we dare say that as the years go by they will appreciate very much indeed. That very attractive book, "The Amenities of Book Collecting," in its first printing is not easy to find now at $50–$80, and before the year is out it ought to reach $100.00. The English first edition of this work has little value. It was the American edition, with an English title page and a different binding. It is the American first edition that is scarce and going up in value. Probably Mr. Newton has as fine a collection of Johnsonian material as any private collector in U.S.A., and it is being added to every year. We see that a privately printed little item, "A Johnson Book-plate," which is illustrated by an impression of Mr. Newton's Johnsonian book-plate, engraved by Sidney L. Smith, costs about $40–$50, when a copy turns up.

We have added two things to our shelf devoted to H. M. Tomlinson's writings. One is "Between the Lines," which is something of a confession of literary faith. This was the subject of a lecture given at the Harvard Union. The limited edition is very difficult to come across. The other is a wonderful volume of "Great Stories of the Sea"—the best collection and the cheapest ever published—to which Mr. Tomlinson has contributed an introduction. Mr. Tomlinson is, we understand, at work upon another novel, as well as a volume of essays. Be sure to go on collecting all of this author's books. He is in the way of becoming our greatest living writer, and his earlier books and limited editions will fetch very large sums one of these days. That first book of his, "Sea and the Jungle"—very scarce, anyhow in a first-class condition—is enhancing in price. Not so long since you could buy it for £1, now you would probably have to pay £50 to £60 for a really mint copy.

In spite of the alleged slump in first editions, and books in general, the buying and selling of old and rare and modern books continues, and although there has been, perhaps, somewhat less business during the past few months, the interest is almost as great as ever, as our postbag shows. Before long we shall be back to normal again, and prices will go up to their true values. So now is the time to buy and to hold. This is our advice to those who are commercially disposed. Even so, it is the right time for those who buy for pure literary values, and for permanent possession.

DIVERS CATALOGUES.

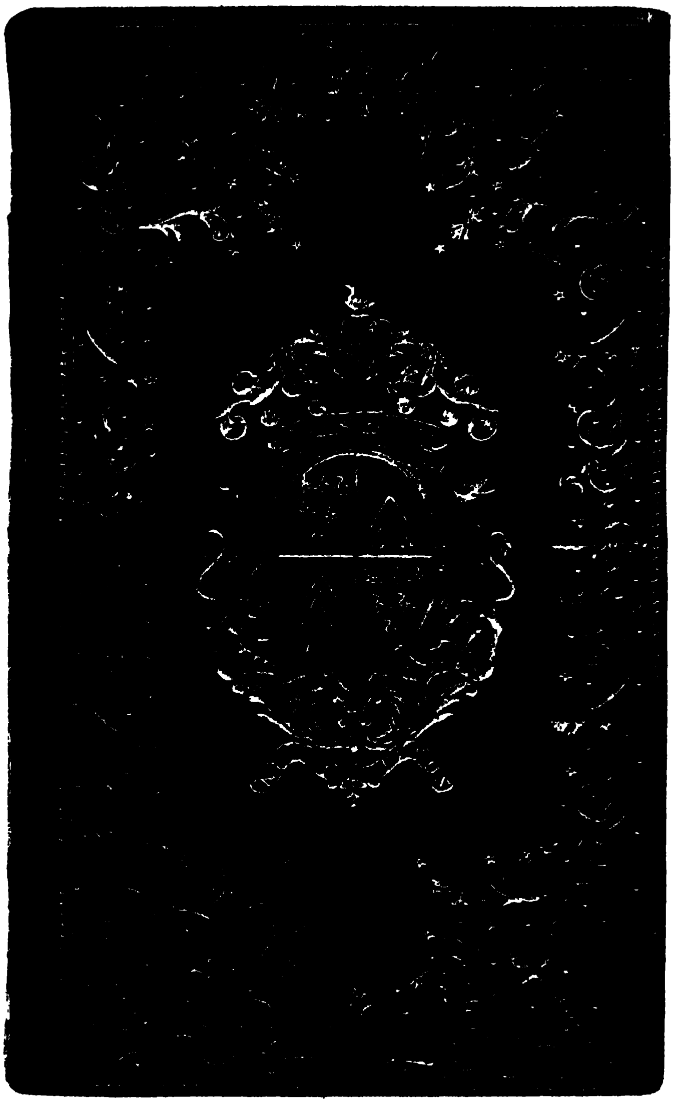
Not a great number of catalogues appear at this time of the year, although I am a little surprised that I have so many to write about this month. At the time these notes appear, hardly any catalogues will be issued, although they will begin to appear again very soon. As a matter of actual fact there are no seasons for antiquarian bookselling as in publishing; but naturally August is not the best kind of month in which to bring out a list, as most of us are holiday making. Even so, wherever we are, there is always the same pleasure to be gathered from looking through a catalogue, whether it is in the summer or winter.

Soon after I wrote my notes last month, many lists came tumbling in and as usual they are full of interest. When I see my pile mounting high, I realise the large amount of business that is done in the selling of old books and first editions, both here and in America. A number in the collection before me has come across the Atlantic, and are very interesting.

Again I want to call attention to a fine catalogue issued by Maggs Bros. It is an extremely valuable publication, dealing with "The Art of Writing," covering the period from 2800 B.C. to A.D. 1930. The entries are in chronological order, which is particularly helpful for reference. This catalogue—No. 542—comprises a wonderful collection of original documents written on vellum, paper, papyrus, silk, linen, bamboo, or inscribed in clay, marble, steatite, jasper, hæmatite, matrix of emerald, and chalcedony. The items exhibit no less than forty styles of scripts in the languages of Europe, Asia and Africa. There are two indices: one of the materials on which the transcripts are written, and the other of the languages. Some of the manuscripts are extraordinarily precious, and are priced at several hundred pounds. There is a fifteenth century illuminated Book of Hours for English use, written by an English scribe on 144 leaves of vellum in Gothic letters. In this MS. there are twenty-four finely painted full-page miniatures, done in gold and colours, and initial letters painted in red, blue and white on a gold ground. The price of this rare item is £550. This catalogue is full of the most interesting illustrations, and it is a most important list.

The Foyles' latest list did not reach me in time to mention it last month. There is a large number of attractive books and MSS. in it, notably a special American limited edition of Colonel Lawrence's "Seven Pillars of Wisdom," sixty guineas; a collection of original manuscripts of James Stephens, and many others, £30; quite a number of association books, besides books of all other departments of literature. A very well produced catalogue.

Readers of THE BOOKMAN may like to know that Messrs. Sotheran have issued a catalogue (No. 818) which they call "Arabistan." It is a list of the various editions of "The Arabian Nights," as well as works on the countries and peoples of the nights. The catalogue has been out some time, but a copy has only just found its way into my hands. I have so often spoken of the wisdom of keeping many of the fine catalogues that are made by the antiquarian booksellers, and this and the Maggs one, referred to above, are indeed worth adding to our shelves.



I always find myself looking forward to an hour of pleasure when a catalogue comes to me from Francis Edwards, and I was not disappointed when I turned over the pages of their "Early English Literature" of the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries. There are nearly seven hundred books in this. They range in prices that will suit the rich collector, as well as the man of modest means. And some of the lower priced books are not the least important. It is illustrated with a number of full-page plates. I see one of the items is a Fourth Folio Shakespeare, price £1,200. It is a fine tall copy, with original end-papers and blanks. Another Edwards list, No. 524, that came along at the same time, is devoted to library sets of standard works in English literature, history, etc. A good list indeed, and one, I should think, in which many book-lovers will find just that set of books, by a standard author, which they want.

A very good catalogue comes from Frank Hollings' Bookshop; or rather a part of the catalogue. The part covers A-L, and contains a number of worthy items. In going through this I found myself marking no end of the books; for it is a most comprehensive catalogue, covering association volumes, chiefly from the Gosse, Shorter and Colvin libraries; a greater number of modern first editions, modern fine printing, eighteenth century plays, Thomas Hardy, juvenile literature, etc. This first part includes no less than 1,284 items, and when it is completed it will make a very comprehensive catalogue.

There are two lists to be noted from Cambridge. One is issued by that notable house of Bowes & Bowes. Something over 700 entries are to be found in the list, arranged under private presses and special editions, first editions, literature in general, with a selection of books about books—always a desirable section—as well as a number of old prints and maps. The second list is from Galloway & Porter—they send out frequent interim catalogues—covering a miscellany of works in all branches of literature. I was attracted by a complete set of the "Story of the Nations" series, priced at £6 10s.; sixty-five volumes in all.

If there were enough space available it would be so easy to meander happily among the catalogues, taking more time over them, and writing at greater length about the many delectable books mentioned in the pages. For instance, it irks us not to be able to give a more lengthy consideration to the excellent catalogue (No. 175) which was posted to me the other day by Dulau & Company. It is crowded with interesting books and autographs, and there are so many alluring first editions of the works of modern authors. There is a Dover Bible for £180; and some of Ronald Firbank's books. There is Lionel Johnson's Poems for £10 and George Moore's "Avowals" for £2 5s. (there are thirty-nine Moore items). Also a number of Arthur Machen's books—but you had better write for the list. The prices are very moderate.

A Derome Binding.
French Red Morocco, with an elaborate border of floral sprays, stars and dots surrounding the arms of Baron Arundell of Trerice, all richly gold tooled by Derome Le Jeune.
From Messrs. Ellis's Catalogue of Old, Rare and Choice Books, No. 272.

Mr. Bertram Rota's No. 16 catalogue is as good reading as his earlier ones, containing close upon a thousand items of first editions, association copies and autograph letters of modern authors. I note several books illustrated by Hugh Thomson. People are collecting books illustrated by this artist nowadays. Included also in the list is a good collection of D. H. Lawrence's books, as well as, among others, many of John Galsworthy's works. I see that among the autograph letters and MSS. are two or three letters from Edmund Blunden costing £2 2s. to £3 3s.

I have received a capital catalogue from Mr. E. Hartley, one that is devoted to first editions of modern authors, including some unique items and presentation copies; two lists from Reginald Atkinson, Nos. 84 and 85 of a general character; a most interesting catalogue of "A Collection of Novels of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century," recently issued by Mr. Greville Worthington; and Basil Hyman's "Scarce Books" of the seventeenth and twentieth century. The latter is a short but excellent catalogue. I see that Mr. Worthington is offering those fine books by Henry Williamson—"Tarka the Otter," £1 2s. 6d; "The Old Stag," £1 15s.; and "The Pathway" for 15s. All of these will surely go up in price. Mr. J. D. Miller's 41st catalogue comprises a variety of old modern books, many of which are first and scarce editions. In this latter list are a number of broadsides.

There is a second edition, 1866, of "Alice in Wonderland," original cloth, £85; some original editions of Barrie's writings; "The Vicar of Wakefield," with twenty-four aquatints by Rowlandson, £35; and many books by Conrad, Coppard, Kipling, etc., in an intriguing list that I received a few days since from Mrs. K. M. Lyall.

I should like to call attention to the following lists from Low's Bookstalls—a miscellaneous catalogue containing a variety of old and modern works; Herbert Tremayne—modern first edition: many by Abercrombie, Bennett, De la Mare, Robert Graves and so forth; Gilbert Jamieson—a short one of modern and nineteenth century authors; Andrew Baxendine & Sons—miscellaneous modern books; Chas. E. H. Carrington—all modern first editions, including some authors whom many people will want to collect before long: Martin Armstrong, H. E. Bates, Helen Beauclerk, T. F. Powys; Martin A. McGoff, E. Guntrip; The Sign of the Huntsman—these last three lists make good reading. Mr. McGoff sends us two lists, 20 and 21. Seven hundred first editions, and the other of a varied character, while the short, but none the less valuable list of Mr. Hunt's, includes a number of rare and valuable collectors' items of the sixteenth to the twentieth century.

Some other catalogues worth the most careful examination have arrived from Messrs. Maggs—No. 543—of moderns and other books; a Caxton Head catalogue of works on economics, political science, etc, and a shorter list of old and rare books from Messrs Ellis This contains many precious association books of a most unusual kind For instance there is an association copy of Walker's "The Virtuous Woman Found," which has a long sub-title, and which was Horace Walpole's own copy with his book-plate and press mark inside the front cover It is a catalogue worth procuring The Dublin Book Agency sends out two lists books from the library of Maria Edgeworth, and a further selection from her library Interesting lists these I must also note here a catalogue that has only just come to hand It is a catalogue of interesting and important books in two parts—General Literature and Antiquarian and British Topography, from Murrays Limited an old established house

American catalogues have reached us from Gotham Book Mart, Dauber & Pine Bookshop, Scultes Book Store, Gryphon Book Service Goodspeed's Book Shop, John Howell, and E S White Rare Book Co I am glad to receive these lists, for it proves that The Collector's" notes about current antiquarian catalogues are being appreciated in America

— —

THE ART OF EXTRA ILLUSTRATING

I have had considerable experience in the art of Extra Illustrating books and up to the present time have used upon innumerable volumes the total of 160 000 plates I suppose this is a record for one person

I remember an old bookseller once refused to sell me a copy of the Vicar of Wakefield when he discovered that I was going to take out the illustrations he told me it was a sin to destroy such a book Many people look upon the extra illustrator as a great vandal for they think of the books destroyed to obtain the plates But they seem to forget the books made of greater interest and preserved from destruction by the fact of being of greater commercial value when so treated

With regard to the books I have worked upon Boswell's Johnson heads the list Of this famous classic I have extra illustrated 118 sets of various editions, ranging from ten volumes to two volumes The next most popular book is Walton and Cotton's Angler, of which I have done scores of copies It is a book which, I think although extra illustrated, should be kept a handy size, for old Walton is always entertaining To me it seems a mistake to extra illustrate Walton into thirty volumes folio, for example It then becomes only a picture-book I remember having seen a copy of this gigantic size once offered for sale by a bookseller Was it not Lamb who said that Walton almost made the fishes themselves talk ?

The 'Pickwick Papers' makes another favourite I once made a copy with 1,000 plates including 100 water colour drawings of various 'pubs, etc, patronised by the famous Pickwick I doubt whether there was ever another character in fiction who has fixed his indentity upon so many localities as Mr Pickwick

Books upon Napoleon have a ready sale, but those on the Duke of Wellington are on the slow side and I have done very few of them It is a curious fact that our enemy at Waterloo should be the favourite, while the victor is just the reverse I wonder if the future will make President Kruger more popular than Lord Roberts ?

Disraeli's "Curiosities of Literature" is a most interesting, though sadly neglected, book, and many hundreds of plates can be put into it I have done many sets of this book.

Of books of American interest those upon General

Washington head the list. Then come the works of Washington Irving and O. W. Holmes.

For Londoners, J. T. Smith's " Book for a Rainy Day " never fails to find a customer, being full of anecdotes of famous Londoners and London of a past age. The famous Pepys' " Diary " lends itself to extensive treatment; I have sold dozens of sets of this perfect picture of London life from 1660 to 1669. What a pity Pepys did not keep the record for a longer period.

Goldsmith's " Vicar of Wakefield " comes first in popularity in the fiction class. There must be, I think, more illustrated copies of this novel than of any other work of fiction, exceeding even " Robinson Crusoe." I once did the edition illustrated by Hugh Thomson (on large paper) and when finished it formed a perfect history of book illustration for above a hundred years, including as it did examples of copper-plate work of the eighteenth century right down to the modern three-colour process illustration. There were thirty-five various editions used upon it, and it goes without saying that it is now in a fine library in the United States of America.

The Letters of Walpole, and the Diaries of Evelyn, Greville, Crabb Robinson, etc., are all good sellers. Books on Nelson and Lady Hamilton come under similar heading. The " Essays " of Elia provide big scope for plates: there are many people who like to see pictures in the " Essays," and it seems to me most interesting to be able to look, for example, at a portrait of Miss Kelly, the actress, when one reads " Barbara S——" again. I say " again," for there can be but few people who have not already read it once. But alas, of some of the most famous characters in the " Essays," there are no portraits known. How I should like to see a portrait of the very much travelled and confidential gent upon the Margate Hoy who had sailed through the legs of the Colossus at Rhodes, and, when cornered, had to admit " the figure was indeed a little damaged." Yes, you can get a print of the Colossus, but not of the gent!

Photo by Roe MacMahon.

Mr. James Stephens.

Now we come to another sadly neglected book, the Howell " Familiar Letters." They are most entertaining and instructive, and what does it matter if Professor Dryasdust of —— University condemns them as not being reliable history? With this book we can travel England, Scotland, Ireland and Western Europe, and be entertained for hours together. Howell presents life as it was before the days of Pepys and Evelyn. With him we go to Spain with Charles I, when Prince of Wales, in search of a lady to make him a suitable wife, and on many another similar episode. Howell was a personal friend of Ben Jonson, but it is curious that he never mentions Jonson's greater contemporary, Shakespeare. This book when extra illustrated makes a most entertaining work. Just one final hint—get the Howell " Letters " edited by J. Jacobs if possible, but if not, any of the old editions will equally repay the buyer. This book was Thackeray's bedside companion.

Arthur W. Waters.

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT.*

In many ways this is a remarkable publication, and there are a great number of people who would hardly know what to do if, for any reason, they were unable to refer to it in the course of their work. It not only has considerable value for those whose business it is to read books, but it is of inestimable value to the editor and to the layman. Especially for those book-collectors for whom " The Collector " of The Bookman now so admirably caters. " Book Prices Current " is an important complement to the advice which " The Collector " gives us every month. We hear so much nowadays about the price that is paid for this and that book, and there are so many books sold at auction each year, as well as in a hundred other ways, that it is impossible for anyone, be he expert or amateur, to carry the prices in his head. Even if he tried to record them in some way, he would find his time completely taken up by the work involved. " Book Prices Current " is a reliable record of the prices at which books have been sold at auction from October, 1928 to August, 1929. Naturally a work of this kind, if it is to be reliable, takes a long time to compile, and the new volume has only recently appeared. One of the merits of " Book Prices Current " is that the thousands of entries are arranged in one alphabet. It can be seen quite well how important this is. But this is a virtue of compilation that must take time to carry out. There must be many readers of " The Collector " section of The Bookman who are mindful of the suggestion that is given us from time to time—that the collector of old and rare and modern books should make for himself a shelf of handbooks to which he can refer when he is in need of information. Here is one volume at least that should find a place on that shelf, and if the buyer is one who seeks for profit out of his collecting, he may even reimburse himself with the initial outlay for " Book Prices Current " before many weeks are passed. The editor, to whom the collector owes much gratitude for his painstaking task of putting the volume together, contributes a very interesting introduction. He draws attention to certain distinguished happenings in the auction sales of last year, and in the section that immediately follows we have a consecutive list of those dates. Of course no reader must think that a list of this kind, however valuable—as this surely is—records the price of every book! That is impossible. There are thousands of other books, the current value of which can be determined only by the expert. But for most people " Book Prices Current " is a reliable and sufficient reference book. It is invaluable to the present reviewer, and he does not know what he would do without it.

* Volume XLIII. 1929. £1 12s. 6d. (Elliot Stock.)

GARCILASO DE LA VEGA.*

Garcilaso de la Vega, the Spanish poet whose brief career coincided with the first third of the sixteenth century, was a typical figure of the Renaissance, touching life at many points and crowding much experience into a few years. There is indeed a striking resemblance between his story and that of our own Sir Philip Sidney. Like Sidney, he was soldier and diplomatist, courtier and romantic lover, and died young on the field of battle; and as a poet he came much under the influence of the Italians. No more than the Englishman's however are his odes and sonnets mere literary exercises: they too have the intensely personal note which sounds through the elegant formality of " Astrophel and Stella." " His feeling," as Mr. Cleugh says, " is always intensely and unconsciously passionate and subtle, his insight penetrating." And again:

> " When he speaks of persons, of rivers, of trees, of meadows or of mountains, these objects live in his verse with that vitality of art, which seems so much more real than that of Nature herself and utterly different from the unconvincing imitation of it in the stock abstractions of much of what still passes for literature."

* " The Odes and Sonnets of Garcilaso de la Vega: An English verse rendering by James Cleugh. £3 3s. (Aquila Press.)

The strength and sincerity of the poet's feeling might be equally well illustrated by almost any of the five odes or the thirty-eight sonnets; but the following may be given as earnest of the quality of the rest:

> "Thinking my road lay clear and straight—O blind !—
> Halted I was by such calamity
> I cannot dream, though mad the dream should be,
> Of aught that may awhile content my mind.
> The broadest field too narrow I do find,
> The starriest night but dark appears to me,
> Bitter and hard the sweetest company,
> Hard as the field of war my couch once kind.
>
> "Of sleep, if sleep doth come, but that strange part
> That is the image of Death's self alone,
> My soul embraceth, wearied by this care.
> The sum of all is that fate sets my heart
> Hourly to judge less dread the hour just gone,
> Though seen my grief therein, than this I bear."

Garcilaso's poems were translated more than a hundred years ago by Jeremiah Holmes Wiffen, translator of Tasso and obsequious historian of the house of Russell, in the sun of whose patronage he basked. But Mr. Cleugh's skilful renderings, in this handsome edition of two hundred and fifty copies, are greatly to be preferred.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

THE DEVONSHIRE GIPSY.

I have often reproached Swift for the cruel realism of that scene in Brobdingnag where Gulliver recounts a visit to the metropolis of the giants. No one hesitates to believe that Swift is describing the lepers and crawling vermin which swarmed the slums of Dublin as he knew it.

Begging is indeed a disenchanting theme when stripped of its variety and adventure, and Swift lived only at the beginning of an age which witnessed the high watermark of mendicancy and all its allied professions. In the first half of the eighteenth century mayors and sheriffs were at their wits' ends to terrorise and penalise the "mumping cadger." One contemporary writes of "the trade of begging" that "every street, every alley, presents some miserable object covered with loathsome sores, blind, mutilated, or exposed almost naked to the keen wintry blast." This hideous stock-in-trade was the gauge of merit among the begging community. Alexander Grose writes in his curious "Olio": "A man who has lost one leg yields the pas to him that wants both; and he, who has neither legs nor arms, is nearly at the head of his profession, very extraordinary deficiencies excepted."

However the life of the begging community had a livelier side than that. Gay found ready material for the happiest of plays; and later on Burns scarcely over-tinted the frolic of his cronies.

Monsieur Archenholz gives us the sober truth. Writing about 1780, he says, "The beggars have their club in the parish of St. Giles's, where they meet to carouse, read the gazettes, and talk about politics. No one dares to attend their assemblies unless he is a beggar himself or introduced by one."

The fact that such a state of things did really exist is also vindicated by the life and adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, who lived in the time of Swift, and who was so pre-eminent in his profession that his fame was bruited through England and Wales and many parts of Europe and America. He is not known now though his epic career was recounted for fifty years after his death. Sometimes, if you search through a bookseller's lists of curiosa you will see his book—"The Life and Adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, the noted Devonshire stroller and Dog-Stealer." And for a shilling or two you will secure some of the raciest reading and rollicking entertainment that time, unfortunately, has hidden except for the searcher in odd literary corners. I must have seen a dozen different versions of Carew's story. The 1745 edition is the one to get, or failing that, the edition by Thomas Price in 1768.

Carew endowed begging with the spirit of high adventure. He was in fact, by right and title, the king of beggars. And as becomes a king his birth was gentle. He was a true heir of the Devon Carews who sailed and fought with the Drakes and Fortescues and Howards. Perhaps that explains the rover in him. For while still a boy he left his home, his friends and his school and joined a company of gipsies.

Carew never seriously looked back, though from time to time the lords and ladies who were his friends and relations pleaded and offered their "kind intervention." He was sealed of the "vagabond and useless tribe," as Cowper calls the gipsies, and he lived and died in their calling. The life was hard, but its codes were based on fidelity; uncertain, but rotating with adventure; and profitable withal. Numbers of persons came to the gipsies to know their destiny, and paid well in return.

After several years Carew determined to carve his own fortune and we find him moving from place to place in England and Wales, generally the southern counties, cheating his old friends, imposing on the gullible, outwitting the suspicious, but never regretting the lot he had cast His narrative is packed with episodes from page to page, picaresque and gay, and often daring He was known well all over the south of England, he made a voyage to Newfoundland, another to Europe, and was twice shipped to the slave states of America, but succeeded in escaping each time He moved rapidly from place to place. His method was almost invariable He would search the papers for news of a wreck or fire, or other local disaster, mug up the facts of the case, and then pass himself off as one of its unfortunate victims He was often a soldier for a day—deserting with the enlistment money.

When not begging or exercising his plausible tale, he picked up a living by rat-catching, vetting sick dogs and cows, and dog-stealing. On the outside of his coat, we are told, he always wore a large buff girdle, stuck thick with the largest and most terrible rats he destroyed, which served as a badge of his profession He had a strange fascination over dogs and could lure the most surly mastiff from its master's doorstep—as indeed he often did.

While on a flying visit to Newcastle he fell in love with the daughter of an apothecary, who was nothing loath to settle his daughter on the mate of a respectable trading vessel. Only when the bride was got to sea was this masquerading mate unmasked. But the good girl admired her roving lover no less, and dwelt at Bath while Carew pursued his profitable itineraries For many years he led this roving life, till his name became a household word. He was the happiest of adventurers By day, it is related, he wore a mask of poverty and distress; but by night throwing off that disguise he gave himself wholly up to riot, mirth and jollity, frequently calling upon his fat landlord or landlady for the other pint. Here is a typical instance of his irresponsible life, which illustrates his extraordinary self-assurance and his ability to get away with the most awkward situations. He had been impersonating a certain Aaron Cock of St John's, Newfoundland, who he pretended had arrived in England after a disastrous sea voyage and was travelling now from place to place, supported by charity. At last he arrives at Bridgwater. The narrative runs:

"The inhabitants of Bridgewater were very kind to him, and this poor Foreigner pass'd unmolested from Door to Door, everyone compassionating his deplorable Circumstances; at last rushes forth a Barber from his Shop and Work, a huge two-handed Fellow, and an irreconcilable Enemy to Vagabonds, who calling poor Mr. Cock many scurrilous and abusive Names, as Vagabond, Rogue, Rascal, &c and Mr. Cock like a Man of Honour and Spirit, highly resenting the Affront and Injury, to it they go forthwith in the publick Street like two furious and enraged Bulldogs, sometimes upon their Legs, sometimes in the Kennel rolling over and over, and most heartily belabouring one another; this tough Battle soon attracted a great Mob about the miry Combatants, who all took Part with the poor Newfoundland-Man, for the Barber thro' the whole Town had the Character of a very ill-natur'd litigious Fellow, and Mr. Aaron plying his Fists very smartly, and obtaining some Advantage over the quarrelsome Tonsor, the universal Outcry was, Well done Mr. Cock, well said Mr. Cock, pay him, bang him heartily, and other such Expressions, which tended to the encouragement of Mr. Cock and the Confusion of his Antagonist: in the End up comes Capt. Morris, who, with his Cane, most heartily belaboured the Barber over his Head and Back, who finding the whole Town against him, and Mr Aaron rather too hard for him too, sneaked into his shop, and washing his Cloaths settled himself to his Work again."

Carew was apprehended as a "vagrom man" several times, but one no more conceives of him as a common mendicant, than of W. H. Davies as anything but a super-tramp. In later years he was elected as the king of the gipsies when Clause Patch, their old leader, died. His new tasks involved the interpretation of gipsy law and recording the annals of their community. But all this must be gathered from his narrative, where also much other entertainment waits the curious reader. You will learn, for instance, how he swam three miles across the Delaware river on horseback, how he lived a fugitive life for many days in the tree-tops, coming down at night to milk the cows in the scattered farms; how he upset a supercilious quack doctor; his marvellous escape from a military guard-house, his evasions from the press-gang, sheriffs, and customs officers, his many devices for turning a dishonest penny, his captures, trials and escapes, in America and Europe.

Tradition records that he reached a benignant old age; though I have seen a statement that "this vagabond died in July, 1759, in the fiftieth year of his travels."

But if Carew's livelihood was despicable his life was far from being so. He was roguish but no rogue; and, as his epic concludes—"he only stole dogs, and did no harm to man."

PHILIP PARKER.

The following is another reply to Mr. Kirby's article in our June issue. Mr. Kirby will reply in our September issue.

We send catalogues to anyone interested; if we definitely know that they are interested, we continue to send them whether they order or not. If people about whom we know nothing do not order for four or five years, we remove their names. JAMES THIN (Edinburgh).

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 468. Vol. LXXVIII. SEPTEMBER, 1930. Price One Shilling net.

1/- net monthly, except Special Numbers.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS (Post free including all Special Issues): British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, £1 3s. 6d. per annum Foreign, £1 4s. per annum.

Editorial and Publishing Offices: St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

Registered at the G.P.O., London, for transmission to Canada and Newfoundland by Magazine Post.

Entered as Second Class Matter, March 15, 1929, at the Post Office at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879 (Sec. 397, P.L. and R.).

WILLIAM HAZLITT.

By Gilbert Thomas.

I.

It will be a hundred years on September 18th since Hazlitt, the most vigorous and eloquent of English essayists, died in a Soho lodging-house. He was born at Maidstone on April 10th, 1778. It has been suggested that his family was of Dutch origin, but his genealogy cannot actually be traced farther back than to his grandparents, who lie buried in a lonely Tipperary churchyard. His father was a Unitarian minister, whose studious gifts and fine character deeply impressed themselves upon him. Hazlitt was to become one of the greatest of Londoners. But his early years were spent itinerantly in England, Ireland and America, where his father held various charges before settling, in 1787, at Wem, in Shropshire. The New World, though he lived in it during several of the most plastic years of childhood, seems to have made no impression upon Hazlitt, the whole bias of whose mind was temperamentally in favour of the Old. After years of youthful browsing in his father's library and of explorations through the Shropshire country-side, he left Wem, in 1793, for London, where he became a student at Hackney Theological College. His life there fostered his inherited passion for metaphysics. But philosophy attracted him more than theology, and within a year he had decided against the ministry as a career.

William Hazlitt (Age 30).
From the miniature by his brother John.

It is surprising that Hazlitt did not immediately turn to art; for, during his residence at Hackney, he had often visited his brother John's studio in London, and painting was already a rival to philosophy in his ambition. At any rate, he returned to Wem, and spent most of the next eight years there in "doing nothing," as the world dubs that desultory walking, reading and meditation which are an indispensable part of an essayist's education. It was during this period that he met Coleridge and Wordsworth, in circumstances immortally described in his essay, "On My First Acquaintance with Poets." Coleridge and Wordsworth were still aglow with revolutionary fervour, and Coleridge in particular seemed to Hazlitt like a god. It was one of the disappointments that helped to sour him that he lived to see not merely the dissipation of Coleridge's fine powers but the "betrayal" by both collaboraters in the "Lyrical Ballads" of their early political faith. Hazlitt tells us that he "started life with the French Revolution," and, unlike most of his contemporaries, he never outgrew it. The aftermath of the Revolution left him unmoved, and the restoration of the Bourbons goaded him to a frenzied anger with "the hag, Legitimacy" which obtrudes itself—a veritable King Charles's head—through all his work. The fact is that Hazlitt was a sentimentalist at heart. If his Republicanism has been founded in genuine humanitarianism, his own ideas of the Revolution would doubtless have undergone change. But he remained till the end a theorist, who hated kings more than he loved peoples.

In 1802 Hazlitt decided to become an artist. He served apprenticeship under his brother, and later at Paris, on returning from which city he became for a time an itinerant portrait painter. His "Charles Lamb" is familiar to visitors to the National Portrait Gallery. Being dissatisfied with his progress in art, though no less a person than Northcote encouraged him to continue, Hazlitt, now married and the father of a son, settled in London in 1812 with the laudable aim of making an adequate living for himself. He had already published his first book, which had vexed his thought for some years. In later life he still owned his "Essay on the Principles of Human Action" to be his favourite child. But the public remained unimpressed by this attempt "to remove a stumbling block in the metaphysical doctrine of the innate and necessary selfishness of man." The book had no readers, and a similar fate befell his two subsequent attempts to build himself a literary monument after his own heart. In "Characteristics," which appeared in 1823, he sought to epitomise his philosophy in a series of maxims. The volume contains some admirably pithy writing, but it lapses too often into didacticism, while the writer's love of Bonaparte and hatred of Pitt too flagrantly assert themselves. The Life of Napoleon in four volumes which he published three years later is held by some critics to be a sounder and more readable work than Scott's. But material for an adequate biography was lacking in 1826; nor, in any case, would Hazlitt's hero-worship of Bonaparte have been acceptable to British readers. Hazlitt is among those authors whose best work, as they conceived it, is forgotten. He lives to-day by virtue of his journalistic writings, which he himself regarded with much less affection. The failure of the public to take him at his own valuation added to his bitterness of temper.

William Hazlitt.

From a bust by Joseph Durham.

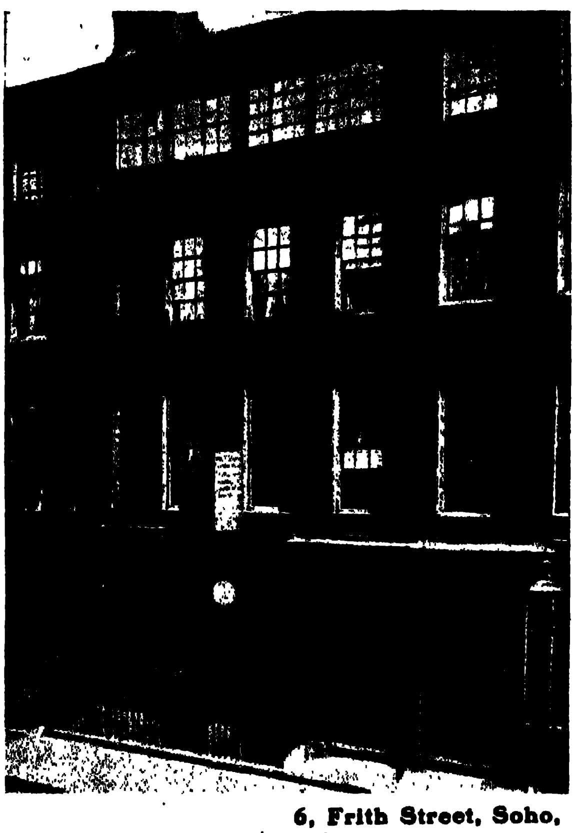
II.

Hazlitt, as we have seen, settled in London in 1812, at the age of thirty-four. The rest of his life was a period of intensive journalistic activity. He began as Parliamentary reporter for the Morning Chronicle, and soon became its art and dramatic critic. Before long he was ranging over the whole field of "miscellaneous" writing. He was associated with Leigh Hunt's Examiner, and became one of the most regular and brilliant of Edinburgh contributors before Macaulay. Considerable interludes were spent at Winterslow, the Wiltshire village to which he continued to resort long after the divorce from his first wife who had introduced him to it. That Hazlitt was equally at home in town and country is but one reflection of the balance and variety of interest which, along with other qualities, make him among the two or three best "miscellaneous" writers in our tongue. No essayist has surpassed him in range of theme. His passion for metaphysics gave his work a philosophical background, and, if he never reached sublimity, he attained very often an inspired, or spiritualised, common sense, as in his noble chapter on "The Fear of Death." His equally keen objectivity, however, kept the philosopher in him from being dull.

Hazlitt may have had no profound love for humanity in the flesh; but he was intensely interested in his fellow men, and insatiably curious about the little as well as the big things of life. He possessed, moreover, an inexhaustible fund of animal spirits, and his exuberant gusto makes such essays as the famous "On Going a Journey" the jolliest things of their kind in the language. His vitality was unquenchable and all embracing. He was equally absorbed in reading Chaucer or in playing fives, in speculating on some abtruse question in metaphysics or discussing some problem of actual conduct, in looking at a picture or witnessing a play, in browsing in a field or watching "the noblest sight in the metropolis"—the mail-coaches setting out from Piccadilly. His style was as vigorous as his spirit; it was always simple, natural and forthright. When really moved, he rose to heights of eloquence untouched by any other English essayist. But he never strove after effect. A writer with his virility had no need to do so. "Style," in his case, could afford to look after itself; so much so, indeed, that journalism in his hands turned spontaneously to literature. His most familiar books—"Sketches and Essays," "Table Talk," "Winterslow," and the rest—were all compiled from his hasty journeyman's work. Many people say that an author cannot write his best for money. Some authors certainly cannot. But Hazlitt is one of a noble company, including Shakespeare, Johnson and Dickens, who demonstrate the folly of generalisation.

III.

As a critic Hazlitt has been variously assessed. He was, in this capacity, an inspired amateur. He was no academician; there were large gaps in his reading; and he cared little about æsthetic niceties. His credentials have, in consequence, been disputed by many of the more professional and conventional among his fellow critics, even by some who have subconsciously appropriated his opinions. Hazlitt's lack of scholarship and his impatience with technicalities imposed certain limitations upon him. But more than ample compensation lay in his verve, his native shrewdness, and his sturdy independence. He had the first quality of every good critic—the power of rousing enthusiasm. No other critic is better calculated to awaken the interest of ordinary readers in art or poetry, and his taste—as evidenced, for example, by his studies of "The English Comic Writers"—was admirably catholic without being shallow. He was least successful, perhaps, as a dramatic critic. He was more interested in dramatic literature than in the actual drama, and certain defects in his book on the "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays" are traceable to the fact that whole passages of that work consist of his theatrical criticism "lifted" bodily from old newspaper files. Here Hazlitt fell, as it were, between two stools. As an actual dramatic critic, he was too literary; but, as literary criticism, the "Characters" smacks too much of the theatre.



When dealing with poetry, as with everything else, Hazlitt sometimes allowed his pet prejudices to dominate him. Though he was soaked in their poetry and at least paid it the tribute of intimate knowledge, he was savagely unfair, now and then, to Coleridge and Wordsworth, whose changed attitude to the French Revolution bitterly riled him. But, when he held prejudice in check, his judgments were usually as sound as they were bold and individual. The verdicts contained in his "Lectures on the English Poets" have unconsciously been absorbed by succeeding generations of commentators, and those verdicts now seem impugnable. It should however be remembered that Hazlitt was a pioneer. It needed vision and courage in 1818 to prefer Chaucer and Spenser to Dryden and Pope, and to rate Cowper and Burns above Darwin and Hayley.

On the whole, Hazlitt was the sounder critic of poetry for being what might be called an "outsider." He never pretended that poetry was his sole or main concern. "Poetry," he says in his essay on "People with One Idea," "is a very fine thing, but there are other fine things beside." There was no pontifical nonsense in him. He saw that poetry existed for life, and not life for poetry. As a judge of men, Hazlitt—when, again, prejudice was kept at bay—was seldom at fault, and he wrote nothing better than "The Spirit of the Age," which, reflecting the mellowed and kindlier outlook of his later years, is a fascinating and indispensable portrait gallery of nis period.

IV.

"What a companion," says Mr. Augustine Birrell, "Hazlitt would have made on a mail-coach!" The phrase may serve to suggest Hazlitt's merits and limitations. The people who make the best travelling companions are not, very often, the people with whom we should most care to live. We welcome vigour and variety of talk in a chance acquaintance, and if it be spiced with bold independence and a touch of malice, so much the better. But of the friends of our hearth and bosoms we crave unity of spirit and repose. Hazlitt lacked unity of spirit. He was at odds with himself and with the world. His nature, as we have seen, was torn by conflicting impulses, by disappointments that sometimes turned him (a sentimentalist at heart) into a cynic, and by his inability to expel certain obsessions from his mind. That is why, in spite of the fact that few writers have ever been more self-analytical or franker in confessing their own faults and foibles, we do not feel that we really know Hazlitt. We forget him when we are not actually reading him; he has no permanent abode in our hearts; we do not love him as we love Charles Lamb or even Leigh Hunt. Lamb is the intimate friend with whom we can be silent, and whom we still possess when he is absent. We never establish real intimacy with Hazlitt. He is the engaging stranger, whose conversation beguiles for us the hours of a journey. But what conversation it is! How wide in range, how vital, how stimulating! We are certainly the better for having met him.

6, Frith Street, Soho, where Hazlitt died in 1830.

Hazlitt, like many people who make good chance companions, was lonely at heart. He lived mostly in lodging-houses; he had many acquaintances, distinguished and otherwise, but few friends—and with those few he quarrelled. His two marriages were miserable failures, and the best that can be said for them is that at least they were not due to mercenary motives, from which no writer was ever more exempt. By his first wife, it is true, he had a son, who, it is good to know, reciprocated his affection. For Hazlitt was affectionate at bottom, and pathetically failed to understand why people did not like him. There were, of course, too many monstrous bees in his bonnet.

There were, unfortunately, some darker corners in Hazlitt's life. What are we to make of the man who could publish in the same year his "Characteristics" and his "Liber Amoris," that record of a squalid Edinburgh episode which is said to have cost him a biography by Stevenson? Hazlitt must remain for us an enigma, but certain substantial items can at least be placed to his credit. He was not, as we have said, mercenary. He had the strength of will to forswear alcohol when it threatened to ruin him, and to become, with one brief lapse, a total abstainer. And if, as he himself argued, "sincerity has to do with the connection between our words and our thoughts, and not between our beliefs and actions," then, at any rate, Hazlitt was sincere.

Finally, there must have been solid worth in one who could win so moving a tribute from Lamb, and who "closed his earthly pilgrimage with an utterance of sublime faith in the Blessings he had never enjoyed, the Meaning he had never discovered." For when, after fifty-two years of strife and loneliness, he "lay ghastly, shrunk, and helpless on the bed from which he never afterwards arose," he could yet say: "Well, I've had a happy life." It is his own immortal epitaph. "Somewhere," as Mr. Brimley Johnson remarks, "in visions he never found language to utter, William Hazlitt had seen God and knew that He was good."

HENRY WILLIAMSON.*

By C. Henry Warren.

THANKS be, that Mr. Henry Williamson has so completely avoided the pitfalls of success! It does not need a cynic to say that many a writer, quite as good, has been ruined by such a reception as was given to "The Pathway" when it appeared. But then Mr. Williamson has a country heart; and what can keep a man sane and balanced like a good country heart? There was perhaps little need, therefore, to have feared the effect of the success that blazed down on him: his heart was too certainly made of the right stuff. All the same, it is with real relief that one is able to say of his latest book, "See, he goes from good to better!" I am not implying that "The Village Book" will have anything like the success of his famous novel: I am implying, however, that it may quite possibly live longer. "The Pathway" appeared (to use the jargon of the day) at the right psychological moment. It was not, as every great novel must in some way be, a study of Everyman; but it was a study, vivid and sympathetic, of a type common in the aftermath of the War. As such it created a vast impression. But will the readers of a couple of generations hence get as much from it?

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. Henry Williamson.

"The Village Book," on the other hand, seems to me likely to give to future generations an even greater joy than it can give to us. Sophistication (and by sophistication I here mean artificiality) is pushing its tentacles into the last of the rural fastnesses of England. The day is coming when no place will remain intact from the ravages of so-called Progress; and when that day comes, whatever its considerable compensations, that sweet but unaccountable sanity which is the fruit of a country heart will be found no more. Only from certain books of earlier days will they be able to gather that precious harvest. And of those books "The Village Book" will certainly be one. For any writer, therefore, who can give us to-day a rural view that is neither cynical nor sentimental let us be glad: such writers are indeed few; yet it is to them alone that the honour will fall of handing on our particular gift to the ages yet unborn.

It is Mr. Williamson's special qualification for the right to be included among this honoured few that he possesses the power always to remain in some degree detached, however ardently he feels about it, from the thing which he is describing. In that of course he shows himself as a true artist. Up to a point he has always possessed this power (therein finely differing from the many who, to-day, "take an interest in Nature") but never has it been so splendidly in evidence as in "The Village Book." At the very beginning of the volume there is a sketch admirably indicative of this power. For a modern writer, with all his inherited sensitivenesses, few themes could be more difficult to handle without revealing a fierce partisanship than that of the drama of a badger dig. Here is a moment in rural life when tendencies of an almost mediæval brutality flare up in the countryman; yet Mr. Williamson, in describing this Devonian badger dig, neither extenuates anything nor sets down aught in malice. The result, needless to say, is a piece of dramatic writing so vivid, intense, and poignant, that no propaganda could ever hope to achieve one hundredth part of the sympathy here evoked for a betrayed and beautiful beast. Seldom has Mr. Williamson written anything to match this terrible sketch. It is, indeed, exactly his ability to understand men so clearly that gives him his passport to that country where even Hudson and Jefferies are sometimes viewed askance: he knows his countrymen so well that, even in their most degrading moments, he can hardly find it in him to condemn them. For the same reason, a sentimental view of those countrymen would seem to him equally sacrilegious. Therefore he can and does describe scenes which in any lesser hands would make the wise reader cringe.

Who else for instance could have dared, and succeeded, in the description of the village funeral that makes "The Ackymals" so gravely beautiful? Who could have kept the sob out of his voice, as he does, in telling of the pathetic sale of sticks of furniture up at "the old Cob cottage"? And who knows better how to convey the unmatchable atmosphere of an English village inn as conveyed here in the chapters descriptive of the "Higher" and the "Lower" houses at Ham? But perhaps the best of all the tests of Mr. Williamson's sureness is the avoidance of sentimentality in his handling of the characterisation of dogs. The dogs that companion Maddison in "The Pathway" are amongst the realest creations in that book; and here, in "The

* "The Village Book." By Henry Williamson. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)—"Dandelion Days." By Henry Williamson. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

Village Book," there is a brief but inimitable chapter devoted to a certain lousy mongrel

"The Village Book," so its author says, has been nine years a-making: it covers the writing period 1921-30 Some of it was written immediately after the incidents of which it tells, some long after other portions, again, are mere jottings set down exactly as they were made at the time—on the backs of envelopes, on match-boxes, on odd bits of paper To them all a unity has been given by setting the incidents in the fictitious Devonian village of Ham They tell, however, not so much of Ham or any particular village, as of all those strongholds of rural England that are so rapidly disappearing They are a lasting and most valuable monument to a dead or dying England

And while this monument has been in the process of making, other works from Mr Williamson's pen have appeared Of these, one that came out earlier in the year must here be noticed "Dandelion Days" "Dandelion Days" is the second of four novels which altogether make up "The Flax of Dream" Of them "The Beautiful Years," which appeared last year, is the first, the last being the widely read and deservedly popular "The Pathway" It is a revised edition—"only seventeen sentences remaining of the first published version", and it tells of young Maddison's schoolboy days That when it was first published it should, apparently, have received little else than abuse (one reviewer begged the author to 'bury Maddison and forget him the sooner the better') is astonishing, for "Dandelion Days" in its simple pathos, its amazingly convincing picture of school life, its humour and its finely descriptive writing, would seem to be calculated to win the reader's pleasure straight away I confess I turned it to with misgiving. There seemed something crass and unnecessary in raking up the earlier life of one whose character I had already deeply probed in a book dealing with his later days But I had not got far when any objection faded completely away It was not so much, perhaps, that I felt I was learning to know Maddison even better it was simply that "Dandelion Days" satisfied me of itself, giving me, as it did, a most touching characterisation of adolescence

Here again Mr Williamson's sure hand has enabled him to do the impossible The study of sensitive adolescence is all very well when it is a prelude to further adventure, but it is likely to prove nauseating when it is made a theme in itself "Dandelion Days," however, is a good book it rings true on every page, and whether you have read "The Pathway" or not, you should get it The same lovely writing that made "Tarka the Otter" a collector's book directly it came out is to be found here, illuminating the simple narrative as hedges of white hawthorn will illuminate a country walk in March If there is more than a hint of caricature in the drawing of the various schoolmasters (including old Mr Rore, with his vague moralisings and constant denunciation of 'pauper souls') that, anyway, is how boys do see their masters, and if the sensitiveness of young Maddison seems sometimes in danger of becoming enervating, it is soon offset by the impudent waggery of Effish, type of the fool that inhabits every '5b' in every school And throughout the book there is constantly occurring some acute observation of nature that startles the reader into awareness Nor, since I have already mentioned Mr Williamson's genius in the characterisation of dogs, must I forget the tousled mongrel pet of poor Bill Nye whose brief story is one of the fine moments of the book

A PERSONAL TRIBUTE TO THE LATE PERCIVAL GIBBON AND EDWARD THOMAS.

By Mrs Joseph Conrad

EVER since the death of Percival Gibbon some few years ago I have had it in my mind to write these few words of affectionate remembrance and appreciation I met him for the first time, twenty years ago, when he came to our house "The Someries" with his wife for lunch. My husband had made his acquaintance some little time before and I recall his remark made to me with quiet conviction "I am sure you will like him Jess, but be careful. He is well known for his repartee, he will give you as good as you send every time"

Thus I was in a measure prepared, although not quite, for the man whose quick mentality and brilliant wit called forth all my powers and exerted at the first moment all my intelligence He was the kind of man whose presence made itself felt the moment he entered the room, and I owe many hours of intense pleasure to the mere listening while he and Joseph Conrad exchanged yarns The intense virility and albeit unconscious brutality of the man made him the most fascinating personality I have seen him tender as the most soft-hearted woman, and again within the shortest space of the fighting male, asking and giving no quarter

Photo by Ward Muir Percival Gibbon.

Here was a man who died at the early age of forty seven, who has left behind him quite a considerable amount of work, enough to keep a firm place in the world's literature As a very young man he must have had many queer experiences in Africa during the Boer War, where he was held prisoner—his thrilling escape provided him with enough material for much that stands recorded to his name Few men ran greater risks as war correspondent than he, during the Turkish War and the ghastly four years of the World War.

There was so much in the spoken word and I have listened enthralled to his forceful voice detailing to my husband the plot and the final twist to a new short story. He would always produce the complete creation with every incident in detail before he would begin to write it. There was also much enjoyment and many thrills for those privileged to hear him recount his own hairbreadth escapes and complicated adventures. He had the power to bring to his listeners a mental picture, complete in even the smallest circumstance. I was never tired of watching the play of his sensitive mouth and admiring his wonderful head of blue-black hair. To see him with his children was a real delight. One remark passed by his elder daughter caused him much amusement. The child caught him up quickly with an indignant protest when he said one day, " out of the mouths of babes and sucklings." " Daddy, we're not little pigs ! "

His sense of fun and fund of anecdote, which he had the rare power of presenting in such simple language (when he chose, a small child could easily understand him) made him excellent company. I have also seen people quite apprehensive of some rather malicious attack, which they evidently doubted their power of defending themselves against. He used to tell one tale with a show of grim appreciation as against himself. It appeared that one Sunday morning, his father, the Rev. Morgan Gibbon, had justly or unjustly placed the boy under restraint. He stood for some time watching his father pace the length of the garden perfecting himself in his sermon, and dressed immaculately for the purpose of conducting the service. An obscure impulse prompted Percival Gibbon to run quickly into the garden and turn the hose full upon his revered parent. Retribution was apparently swift and sure.

Photo by E. O. Hoppé.

Edward Thomas.

Edward Thomas, in contrast to his fellow-countryman, appeared to me always as the quintessence of gentleness. Without a doubt the fact that I met the two together, and that most of the times I met Edward Thomas, Percival Gibbon was present, served to impress E. T.'s most characteristic peculiarity upon me. In his wife's admirable little book, published some time ago, " As it Was," that very trait stands forth. He stands portrayed in the most convincing manner because the most simple words are used. The second time I met him he was paying us a visit while his third child arrived in the world. Although preceded by a son and daughter the advent of this third little stranger appeared to E. T. to lose none of the wonder and tender awe that his wife describes as attending the birth of his first-born. He spoke to me in gentle, anxious tones and needed much to reassure him from time to time. All that afternoon he sat quietly with our two boys, fishing in the moat that still remained on one side of the house. I can see him now with his fair head uncovered and his pinkish-red tie fluttering in the breeze. From time to time he would turn his mildly anxious gaze in my direction. " Had a telegram arrived, and what did it contain in the way of news ? " He seemed to take comfort from my maternal manner and sat contentedly with the boys till such time as I was able to assure him that his anxiety was over and another little daughter awaited his return.

The next time I saw him his great distress was that this daughter was nearly blind. He appeared the next time faultlessly attired in khaki, only a few days before his death. There was something in his quiet resignation to his fate, that fate which seemed to both Conrad and myself to be sealed in some strange fashion, that impressed us all. Three of the men who sat that night in my husband's study have crossed over, but not one of them seemed at the time to have that tragic air of fate and finality, as the man whose very gentleness seemed the strongest protest against the senseless taking of life. One felt his uncomplaining acceptance of the inevitable, and yet by mutual consent no word of the War was uttered, even although our own boy was on the French front. I recall the sinister fact that no one spoke of the future, of an end to those years of nightmare.

It was only a few days later that Joseph Conrad made one of his rare and brief visits to town. He had secured one corner seat, two old friends quite by chance occupied two other corners, and just as the train pulled out of the station, the door flew open and the fourth man sprang into the carriage. My husband turned his head to see E. T. sink into the seat opposite. " We meet, then, my dear Conrad, once more." The words struck upon the ears of the three men like a knell and a shudder ran down my husband's back. He told me on his return his impression then was that it was indeed the last "once again."

H. G. WELLS: OLD AND NEW.*

By W. R. Titterton.

It is possible that even some of those who believe in Spiritualism will admit that the late Sir Arthur Conan Doyle was not at his best as a writer on that misty science. And it is probable that many who rejoice in Mr. Wells's powerful advocacy of universal peace will yet lament that he is not nowadays pure story-teller.

Far be it from me to suggest that a great writer of fiction should not wage his genius to the service of a great idea. "Art for Art's sake" is a foul heresy. But it seems to me that, while Mr. Wells is incomparably our best story-teller, he is by no means as effective as a propagandist. And his story-telling does not blend well with his advocacy.

At the beginning of "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham" I thought that this latest book of his would force me to a new conclusion. This was a great social satire, and the protagonists of the argument—Mr. Parham and Sir Bussy Woodcock—were drawn to a marvel.

Portrait by Russell. Mr. H. G. Wells.

But alas! Mr. Wells's mission overcomes him, and much of the book is sheer pamphleteering against war, which for certain reasons I do not find convincing. But in any case I should be annoyed to have a most excellent satire so completely lose its temper and its tempo.

Mr. Wells is one of the most likeable of writers—not merely as a man, I mean, but as a writer. If you meet him you know how keenly, joyously, comradely, he is interested in human beings—in you, and the man who drives his car, and the persons of his household, and his neighbours, and everybody. Of course he can say nasty things about people he doesn't like—with ordinary sinners like you and me and Wells, living in a small community, love and hate are equal and opposite. And, though intellectually Wells is a cosmopolitan, humanly speaking he lives in a small community. And don't we all? I say: live.

In that small community he lives with a rare intensity; the man is terrifically alive. These are not paste-board figures in his story-books, but people you can put your hands on, and shake hands with, or fists at. Mr. Polly, and the Uncle, and Kipps, and Chitterlow, and Ponderevo. Tremendous fellows.

There was always the other side of him. Or is it another side? Wells is a great playfellow, a great boy. And he once wrote what are entered in the catalogue of his works as: "Two little books about Children's Play, called: 'Floor Games'; 'Little Wars.'"

I think that really he took up science in that spirit. He liked to see the wheels go round, and he liked to make them go round in funny ways. And he had more than any man, more than Jules Verne, the power to use these funny ways, which he and other people were discovering, imaginatively—as the paraphernalia of fairy tales. A unique quality and breadth of imagination—he had to have that. But what made his visions so vivid was that you saw them through the eyes of a keenly realised and everyday contemporary. Usually it was somebody that Wells had made you like very much.

I except that apocalyptic thing, "The Invisible Man," which compels your pity, your compassion, for a quite unlikeable man. There Wells's usual (though perhaps unconscious) moral—that there is a narrow line of sanity and ordinariness in life, and on either side of it horror, is developed through the invasion by a superman of an ordinary neighbourhood.

A typical example of his other and more usual method is Smallways in "The War in the Air."

Well, there is no Smallways in "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham." Though Mr. Parham is as foolish as the most lovable of Wells's heroes, the insistence is now almost altogether on the folly. Mr. Parham is a traditionalist, but a quite modern—in fact, Victorian, Church-of-England traditionalist, to whom patriotism and culture are sublimated respectability. There is little in Mr Parham more ancient than the Prince Consort.

But in the earlier part of the book Mr. Wells does use him with great skill to poke fun at those of us whose somewhat finicking sensibilities are outraged by the American vulgarities of to-day. And how delicious is the impressment of Mr. Parham as Sir Bussy's Cook's courier through the Art Galleries, Mr. Parham's dip into Sir Bussy's champagne receptions of the gayer rich, and—most exquisite of all—Mr. Parham's one-night's romance with Gaby Greuze. No man alive could write a better social satire than is boxed up in Book I. And the pity of it is that afterwards the satire evaporates.

Mr. Parham has met, or rather collided with this typical vulgarian: Sir Bussy Woodcock—very rich, and more vulgar. I think you are not told how Sir Bussy had made his money; anyhow that is not insisted on. He has power—the power of token wealth, and the power of an insistent, explosive, voracious temperament. But no culture and apparently no aim! If Mr. Parham had Sir Bussy's power, what might he not do with it!

* "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham." By H. G. Wells. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

The story of the book is of Mr. Parham's ineffectual attempt to harness that power, and of his dream that he is in fact Lord Paramount, with Sir Bussy as a rebel.

He never captures Sir Bussy, and in the end Sir Bussy and science defeat him.

Now Wells convinces me quite soon that a Mr. Parham, or a Lord Brentford, in absolute command of England would be a catastrophe, and would soon land us in another and far more lamentable world-war. But he does not in the least convince me that Sir Bussy is or is likely to be on the right side.

It is not true that the typical self-made man is in himself powerful. He has his pockets full of dynamite. But that is different. And it is not true that such of the millionaires as are powerful may be depended upon to love their fellowmen and to desire freedom in the pursuit of happiness for them all.

Then there is Camelford, the chemist, who controls the essential ingredients for the most devastating of poison gases. I think Wells is unwise to trust Camelford. I think that a combination of Internationalists like Sir Bussy and Camelford might be a more dreadful danger to the liberty and happiness of simple folk than the nationalism of Mr. Parham and Mussolini and the Internationalism of the Reds put together.

I think so. Mr. Wells thinks otherwise. His book proves nothing—except that an old weakness of his—a weakness for mere bigness, which threatened at one time to turn him into a common or garden imperialist—has taken him in a new way.

In fact he seems to have deserted Mr. Smallways altogether. Although superficially there was a shadow of contempt for Kipps-Polly-Smallway's ignorance, deep down you felt that the young fellow was the true hero. If he could not kill the giant, he would at least die—bewildered, but grumbling and fighting.

But now the Food of the Gods has got into Mr. Wells's veins. And the big fellows, the fellows with power, are to be the saviours of the world.

Even if Wells were justified in his Giantism, it would be wrong to intrude it into this book. The Sir Bussy of Book 1 is a real person, so is Mr. P., so is Gaby Greuze, and so are a dozen persons more lightly sketched. The introduction of the spiritualist theme need not have shattered the structure of the satire. But the adoration at the shrine of Big Business has spoiled a masterpiece.

EMILY DICKINSON.*

By Gilbert Thomas.

It is a hundred years since Emily Dickinson, the American poetess, was born at Amherst, Mass., New England. She has always been something of an enigma to her own countrymen, and a still greater one to readers on this side of the Atlantic. Even during her own lifetime—her "fifty-six years of sweet fastidious nothingness"—legends grew up around this secluded and "eccentric" spinster; and when, after her death in 1886, it was discovered that she had written about two thousand poems, only four of which had been printed, the mystery was intensified. The "Poems," published in 1890, made a sensation, and the biographers have since been busy—not, however, in elucidating the "legend," but rather, by their contradictions, in adding to it. Now Miss Genevieve Taggard, herself a poet, has produced a new and very full Life, in which she claims to present the probable, if not the proven, truth. Some readers may feel that certain episodes in Emily Dickinson's career are hardly worth the exhaustive investigation to which they are here subjected: her poetry itself is, after all, the main matter of importance. At all events, if it is over elaborated and disputatious at times, Miss Taggard's book offers a very lively and, on the whole, a very convincing portrait of the American Brontë, as well as a vivid, if not always flattering, picture of nineteenth century social life in New England.

An early portrait. Emily Dickinson, 1830-1886.

We have called Emily Dickinson the American Brontë. The comparison must not be pressed too far. Emily Dickinson, the daughter of the lawyer and leading citizen of Amherst, never knew the poverty and physical discomfort that the daughters at Haworth Parsonage had to face. But she had an intellectual and spiritual intensity akin to that of the Brontë sisters, and it is traceable to the same prime cause of physical and emotional repression. In Emily Dickinson's case, her father was responsible for her "complex." Edward

* "The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson." By Genevieve Taggard. 15s. (Knopf.)

Dickinson was a man of substance, dignity and strict integrity. Of solid East Anglian ancestry, he was a squire—such was his nickname—upon New England soil. Alike by reason of his qualities and his manner, he dominated the society of Amherst, as he dominated his wife and three children. Of her mother, though she outlived her husband for eight years, during seven of which she was an invalid nursed by the poetess herself, Emily was never known to say more than that she was "oppressively tidy." Her father, both for good and evil, ruled the home. He had, unhappily, the defects of his Puritan virtues. His simplicity and austerity masked an underlying thirst for power and a jealousy that would brook no rival to himself. He frowned not merely upon gaiety and innocent amusement, but he scowled upon Emily's lovers, when they arrived, and metaphorically, if not literally—even Miss Taggard cannot discover the truth on this point—drove them from his door.

That Emily had a disappointment in love, and that it was due to her father's jealousy, seems, at all events, beyond dispute. Two young men appear to have entered vitally into her life, and Miss Taggard is at great pains to show that, while Leonard Humphrey, the brilliant scholar who died at the age of twenty-six, and whom she first met as her master at school, greatly influenced her mind, Emily's real lover was George Gould, who lived to become an eminent Puritan divine. Be that as it may, it was inhibited love that made Emily a poet. She renounced the outward world, only to live more intensely an inward life of the imagination. To her Amherst contemporaries she appeared snobbish and a little mad, as, dressed always in white, she cultivated the flowers in her father's garden. Her fellow-townspeople could not see the inner life she was leading, and Emily at first tried to keep it secret even from herself: for father did not approve of poetry. It was the Civil War that at once stimulated her powers and gave her confidence in their exercise.

Thus Emily, withdrawn into herself, probed with imaginative sensibility the mysteries of time, death, and eternity. Upon the two last she meditated especially, for, robbed of earthly joy, she could not but wonder whether death might redress the balance of this world:

> "My life closed twice before its close;
> It yet remains to see
> If immortality unveil
> A third event to me,
>
> "So huge, so hopeless to conceive,
> As these that twice befel.
> Parting is all we know of heaven
> And all we need of hell."

Emily never attained the fine abandon and assurance of the mystic: she had, perhaps, enough lawyer blood to give her caution:

> "Faith is a fine invention
> For gentlemen who see:
> But microscopes are prudent
> In an emergency!"

She was, moreover, too honest to proclaim possibilities as certitudes. She realised, as Mr. E. M. Forster puts it, that "daily life, whatever it may be really, is practically composed of two lives—the life in time, and life by values," and that, consequently, "our own conduct reveals a double allegiance." At the end of a subtle and searching analysis of her poetry, Miss Taggard says: "Emily's life in time kept her other life poised. One life was theme, the other counterpoint. Emily borrowed intensity from one life to pay back the other. Often they seemed to run parallel; but more often one was what the other was not. They might not be severed, at the peril of double death. Emily kept them both going." And so her poetry, with its "edge as shining sharp as a scythe," ranged over the whole field of human experience and speculation. But ever at the back of her mind was the conviction that death would take the two parted threads of existence and unite them through the eye of a single needle. She herself passed on at last, not knowing that she was leaving fame behind her.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

SEPTEMBER, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 12th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I, II, VI and VII will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

IMPORTANT.—Please note change of date.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best short description from prose, of the sounds of Nature, rain, wind, and sea, giving sources.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best note, in not more than one hundred words, of any curious or interesting fact discovered by the writer in the course of his or her holiday wanderings.

V.—HALF A GUINEA for a short passage from any well-known novel showing the author's insight into the psychology of a child, giving source.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

Old Square, Lincoln's Inn.
Drawn by Roland W. Paul, F.S.A.
From "Touring London," by W. Teignmouth Shore (Batsford).
See page 364.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR AUGUST.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to L. C. Lesley House, Christchurch, N.Z., for the following:

DOLES.

The loveliest things on the earth are free,
A tulip abloom or a bursting tree,
The grass on the hill-tops at set of sun
Like a Turkish carpet with the patterns run.
The grace of the willows bending to look
For the pale face of Narcissus hid in the brook.
The dance of the poppies in the wind at noon
With faces a-scarlet for the joy of the tune.
A bird's mottled breast as it swoops to the earth
And the flight of its song in its crazy mirth.
The dragonflies' whirr, like the music of strings,
And the cool touch of water from forest-deep springs.
And fleet-footed things in the hush of some wood
In the joy of moss beds and its leafy hood.
The jewel in the dark from the lightning's lap,
And the fugue of the thunder in its clap upon clap.
O, God, do You know when You gave beauty free
You put a strange cry in the heart of me,
And may I be dead at the newling of Spring
If I fail to respond to each beauteous thing.

We also select for printing:

STORM IN THE WEALD.

First wind, then distant thunder,
Threaten the sleeping plain,
Stilled with a dreadful wonder,
And black with coming rain;
No longer blue and quiet
Like dawn on Easter Day,—
Soon breaks the crash and riot,
And the fierce storm holds sway.

O Weald, that was so holy,
Where is lost Beauty laid?
In some grey church and lowly,
Which godly men have made?
Is she at peace, and praying,
While you to Anger bow?
What is lost Beauty saying,
Where is she hiding now?

Is she in house or garden
Among the sheltered flowers,
Until the storm shall pardon
Summer's too idle hours?
Perhaps she lingers sleeping
In a green forest's joy,
Only to come forth weeping
For all that storms destroy?

But my soul answers proudly—
Though mortal eyes are blind,
Though storm on storm breaks loudly
Through hours that were too kind.
Beauty is not in hiding;
No coward soul has she:
Full on the strong storm riding,
So shall she come to me!

(Vera I. Arlett, Beechwood, Poulter's Lane, Worthing.)

We also commend the lyrics by George S. Astins (Hove), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), Olive F. Crowe (Hanwell), May Herschel Clarke (Woolwich), Alice E. Collinge (Bolton), B. J. Goldsmith Jones (Shrewsbury), Melfin W. Jones (Cardiff), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Mrs. Dulcie Hodgson (Bishop Auckland), Doris Major (Hendon), I. Petch (Kirbymoorside), E. F. Christie (Hampstead), Madge Ellis (Scarborough), Harry Broadberry Scaman (Bayswater), G. M. Starkey (Folkestone), Jeanne Harrison (Canterbury), A. Howarth (Parkstone), Freda Isobel Noble (Long Melford), M. Whitehouse (Birmingham), G. Pitt (London, N.) Ella Rivers Noble (Long Melford), Eleanor Pinnington (Norwich), Edith M. Walker (Bournemouth), Enid D. Woollright (Basingstoke), H. M. Boydell (Lancashire), Geo. G. Tutt (Wombwell), Margarita Yates (Haute Savoie), Emily Davis (Ranelagh), Archer Russell (New South Wales), John E. Woods (Earlsdon), Margaret F. Woodzell (Mannamead), Edith M. Glaister (Hampstead), L. I. Seaton (Leatherhead), A. E. Empson (South Chingford), F. C. Bell (Ipswich), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Margaret Fountain (Upton), Jehangir R. P. Mody (Bombay), Janet Reid (South Croydon), Mrs. Elwyn James (Cardiff), M. T. Heyes (Widnes), E. Lewis (Mansfield), Rosalie Wilson (New South Wales), S. G. August (New Zealand), Doreen Levy (South Africa), J. E. A. Gedge (Bagborough), Mrs. E. E. Weston (Bangalore), N. M. Bowman (South Australia), Phyllis Kerr (Banbridge), John A. Bellchambers (London, N.).

II.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to A. Eleanor Pinnington, 70, Pitt Street, Norwich, for the following:

THE MAN WITHOUT A NECKTIE. BY ARBIB-LAUSER. (Stanley Paul.)

"Artistry's haunting curse, the Incomplete."
BROWNING, The Ring and the Book.

We also select for printing:

GOOD COMPANIONS. BY J. B. PRIESTLEY.

"Wherever I am there's always Pooh,
There's always Pooh and me."
A. A. MILNE, "Now we are Six."

(William B. Davey, 5, Oakwood Street, Sunderland, Co. Durham.)

THE CONFLICT. BY E. E. KELLETT. (Constable.)

"So they fought and they spit,
And they scratched and they bit,
Till instead of two cats there warn't any!" ANON.

(Teresa B. Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Long Melford, Suffolk.)

THE PRICE OF VICTORY. By J. D. STRANGE. (Bodley Head.)

" He went to bed and plastered his head
With vinegar and brown paper."

Nursery Rhyme.

(A. M. L. Parker, Gladstone House, Mitcham.)

THE GOLDEN CAT. By DOUGLAS NEWTON. (Cassell.)

" The enemy is loud ; you hear him all night."

SHAKESPEARE, Henry V, Act IV, Sc. 1.

(Mary T. Forth, 10, Belle Vue Terrace, Whitby, Yorks.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best description of the literary associations of any place visited during the holiday season is awarded to Sir Duncan Grey, Windgarth, Weston-super-Mare, Somerset, for the following :

Yesterday I halted at Nether-Stowey, that little old village picturesquely perched astride a slope of the Quantocks, in a country of warm red soil and kindly steadfast folk—a land of honey-scented and bravely tinted hills, scored deeply by swift streams and riven by wooded coombes, a haunt which lured Southey, Wordsworth and Coleridge, already familiar with the beauty of Lakeland, and inspired interpreters of Nature's moods and mysteries, peace and splendour.

The smoke of Southey's birthplace—Bristol—where he and Coleridge married two sisters, can be faintly descried from the Quantock heights. Clevedon, too, where Coleridge once sojourned, and Arthur Hallam was to die untimely, and Thackeray's Castlewood nestles embowered in trees, is also visible. At Bridgwater, eight miles off, our poets met de Quincey, but it was at Nether-Stowey, an enchanted parish, where Coleridge– thrall to pain, and, alas ! to drugs—pitched another of his moving tents, that our immortal three forgathered.

We also select for printing :

LILLEHAMMER : THE HOME OF SIGRID UNDSET.

Lillehammer, a little town in Norway, where I spent my holidays, lies above Lake Myosen, in Gudbrandsdalen.

Sigrid Undset's house faces the lake and her windows look up Gudbrandsdalen. On a clear day you can see far up the valley towards Dovrefjeld, the home of trolls and pixies. It is a large, simply-built two-storied wooden house, with an unspoilt garden full of flowers stretching down to the dusty road.

The authoress of " Christine Lavransdatter " has known poverty ; she worked ten years in a city office before her first book was published. She does not care for society, but is much loved by the poor. There is a saying in Lillehammer : " If you are poor or in trouble, go to Sigrid Undset," and that is true of that great woman.

(Miss Grace Raine, 5, Regent Square, London, W.C.1.)

THE BROADSTAIRS OF DICKENS.

The little town of Broadstairs is rich in literary association, for here are both Bleak House and Miss Betsy Trotwood's cottage. Bleak House, originally known as " Fort House," stands boldly on the headland overlooking the tiny jetty. Here may be seen Dickens's dining-room, library, and bedroom, but the house has been considerably added to since the great novelist lived and worked there. The cottage on the front, once the home of old Miss Strong, the real " Betsy Trotwood," is well worth a visit. In the window of the quaint little parlour still stands the green fan which David Copperfield noticed on his arrival. The cupboard whence Miss Betsy produced the salad oil and vinegar, which in her excitement she administered to David in mistake for restoratives, is still in a corner. Upstairs are four bedrooms still known as " Miss Trotwood's," " Mr. Dick's," " Janet's," and " David's."

(Margaret Owen, Cherryvale, Whitstable.)

We also select for special commendation the replies by Edith M. Birch (Luton), E. M. Glaister (London, N.W.), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), John E. Woods (Coventry), E. Sweatman (Reading), Mrs. Rhoda Gowers Hellyar (Croydon), Olive F. Crowe (Hanwell), Rev. J. A. Hamilton (Dalkeith), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden), G. E. Buckingham (Burton-on-Trent), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho !), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Norwich).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best commentary in not more than one hundred and fifty words, of Gœthe's remark : " The dear good people don't know how long it takes to learn to read. I've been at it eighty years, and can't say yet that I've reached the goal," is awarded to L. F. Goldsmid, 30, Crockerton Road, S.W.17, for the following :

Because the dear good people whom Goethe was entitled to patronise, but we others recognise as ourselves, are accustomed to read passively. As surfaces that absorb all light are black, so minds that absorb all reading matter remain blank. Colour can come only by reflection. It has been well said that, so far from being a passive impression, reading is a creative process of collaboration with the writer, calling for a supple, alert and imaginative response to the stimulus of the written word. Reading is an exercise in increasing our stores of experience, and in drawing on those stores to discover the relationship between the life within us and the life without, by attempting constructively and critically to translate the written message into the terms of our own experience and imagination.

We also select for printing :

We may read for information, instruction or amusement ; for our own benefit, or with the view to impart knowledge so acquired ; we may read as a relief from worry or the boredom of external affairs ; but, to read imaginatively, comprehensively—to feel that we have extracted the maximum of truth, the quintessence of delight, from our reading—to know at once the completeness and harmony of the written whole—this is to have established for ourselves at last kinship with another soul, to have drawn ourselves nearer—if ever so imperceptibly to the inner heart of humanity. Goethe knew how hard Parham Old Hall, Suffolk.

Drawn by Sydney R. Jones.

From " Little Known England," by Harold D. Eberlein (Batsford).

Reviewed on page 364.

of realisation such true reading ever must be. Just as the multifarious aspects of existence handicap the finite mind in its search after Ultimate Reality, so is it difficult in our vital reading to arrive at full knowledge, there being so many "diverse component" qualities which demand comprehensive assimilation.

(A. Davidson, c/o Mrs. Smith, 49, Lilybank Gardens, Glasgow, W.2.)

We print the following interesting quotation from Goethe embodied in Mrs. Belben's entry:

I read recently that: "Culture . . . is not something that stays in the head, it is something that lives in the life; it is not an accumulation of learning, but an application of experience and education . . . enhancing the sensitivity, deepening the significance . . . it is the growth of knowledge and understanding . . ."

(Mrs. May Belben, Forest Hill Lodge, Wimborne.)

We also highly commend the replies from B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Emily Davis (Ranelagh), S. Barrington McClean (Newlands), H. Gordon French (Godalming), John E. Woods (Earlsdon), N. Ray (Belfast), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Captain Wm. Jaggard (Stratford-on-Avon), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), W. Mockford (Biggleswade), M. Luckham (Poole), Mabel Rourke (Manchester), Aileen P. G. Hone (Mitcham), M. E. Arthy (Esher), Sybil G. Gillett (London, S.W.), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Mrs. Dulcie Hodgson (Bishop Auckland), Edith M. Glaister (Hampstead), B. A. Billings (Withington), M. K. Whitefield (Cirencester), Janet Reid (South Croydon).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best example of a five-word jewel phrase is awarded to Clifford Bower-Shore, Ramillies, Offerton Lane, Stockport, Cheshire, for the following:

" . . . tiger-moth's deep-damasked wings."
KEATS, Eve of St. Agnes.

We also select for printing:

"Shivering seas of blinding blue."
WILFRID WILSON GIBSON, The Ice-Cart.

(D. Parsons, Hillsboro', Ware, Herts.)

"Blackthorn petals pearl the breeze."
("Green Rain.")
MARY WEBB, Poems and The Spring of Joy.

(Mrs. May Belben, Forest Hill Lodge, Wimborne.)

"Nightshade, ruby grape of Proserpine."
KEATS, Ode on Melancholy.

(Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson, 26, Chatham Grove, Withington, Manchester.)

"The swinging spider's silver line."
R. W. EMERSON, Ode to Beauty.

(Winifred Simmons, "Sherenden," Parkstone, Dorset.)

We also select for special commendation the replies by J. E. A. Gedge (Bagborough), Gertrude Hancox (New Malden), S. Homfray (Colchester), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Dulcie Jaekel (Radlett), E. G. Elton (Norbury), G. Pitt (London, N.), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Catherine R. Noble (Long Melford), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Norwich), John A. Bellchambers (London, N.), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Margaret Burcham (Winscombe), K. M. Sanders (Bridport), Geo. G. Tutt (Barnsley), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Louise Harborne (Ludlow), Janet Reid (South Croydon), Beatrice Thomas (Caerphilly), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Evelyn Bamber (Wilpshire), K. M. Wright (Hull), A. C. Marshall (Corstorphine).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book, is awarded to Dulcie Jaekel, The Avenue, Radlett, Herts, for the following:

"SIR, SHE SAID." BY ALEC WAUGH.
(Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Alec Waugh has given us, in "Sir, She Said," a clever story of 1930 manners and morals. His three heroines—Julia who falls, Jean who slips, and Melanie who retains her balance more by luck than anything else—are interesting characters who afford the author plenty of scope for philosophising over latch-keys, Menjou-like men, and the ways of women with shops. Mr. Waugh knows his world and knows too how to write about it, but one sometimes wishes he would forget that he has a reputation for understanding women to preserve, and give us another "Coloured Countries."

We also select for printing:

ROGUE HERRIES. BY HUGH WALPOLE.
(Heinemann.)

To link up the characters of a story with the "time-sense" of a given period must be one of the most difficult tasks a writer can set himself, but so skilfully does Hugh Walpole interweave period and people that "Rogue Herries" is as unostentatiously historical as one of our national edifices. "Rogue" Herries, Margaret, the passionate Alice Press, whom he sold at the Fair, the son he loved till the end of his life, the unfriendly Herries family—these, against their eighteenth-century background are as vital as the dark hills which shadow the crumbling, beloved house.

(Margaret F. Woodzell, 11, Hill Crest, Mannamead, Plymouth.)

MISS MOLE. BY G. H. YOUNG.
(Jonathan Cape.)

For background we see Bristol as a city of wondrous lights and shadows, of floating mists above the ships at the foot of the hill—and whether at dawn, when pigeons flutter above a dormer window, or at night, when the city lights pierce the gloom, we meet the brave figure of Miss Mole, just an elderly housekeeper with no prospects, who shows us the lights and shadows of life. Strong and tender when helping others, but perhaps more lovable in her own sorrows and weaknesses, in her absurd ulster she lives, the central figure among other interesting personalities.

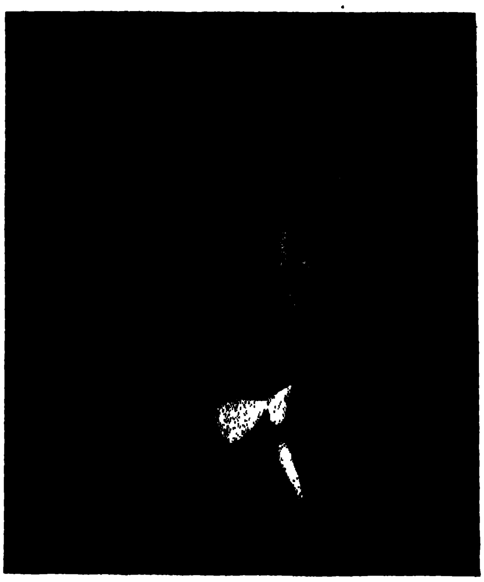
(Agatha Honnywill, 5, Adelaide Terrace, Portishead, near Bristol.)

BELLS OF THYME. BY CATHERINE I. DODD.
(Jarrolds.)

The picturesque charm of this fascinating book lies in the beauty of forest scenery surrounding a German university town, where the heroine finds healing for life's hurts. Miranda, an Oxford student, in the era before woman's emancipation, gives a ready sympathy to the cosmopolitan gathering around the kindly frau's board. In their joys and sorrows, whimsicalities and failings, she solves her own problems. They radiate a rich atmosphere of humour, which their creator has woven into reality with the touch of a master-hand. The penetrating reader will discern the philosophy and the vivid portraiture of nationalities that the book reveals.

(B. M. Beard, 214, Broadway, Bexleyheath, Kent.)

We also select for special commendation the reviews by Louise Harbourne (Ludlow), M. Wyatt Stayt (Natal), Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), Barbara Hughes-Stanton (Kensington), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), Gertrude Hancox (New Malden), A. M. Count (King's Lynn), A. Howarth (Parkstone), Sybil G. Gillett (S.W.1), Dorothy C. Ensor (Hampstead), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), E. G. Elton (Norbury).



VII.—A PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to E. Sweatman, 15, Blenheim Road, Caversham, Reading.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

J. B. PRIESTLEY.

THE publication of a new book by an established writer should focus attention not only upon itself but to a certain extent upon the previous work as well; otherwise the point of view of the critic is in danger of limitation owing to his not perceiving, or not troubling to perceive, the development, or non-development, of that particular writer's tendencies for good or ill. The issue, then, of Mr. J. B. Priestley's new novel, "Angel Pavement,"* is an occasion for a backward, though cursory glance at his other books.

He has to be considered in two aspects: as a critic and as a novelist, and since his qualities as critic to some extent colour his qualities as novelist, I propose to touch briefly upon one aspect of his work as critic before coming to his more creative work. Two of his volumes of criticism are full length studies, others are more in the category of literary essays, where the charm of his English is perhaps more insistent than the originality of his opinions; but the case is different when we turn to his biographies, in "The English Men of Letters" series, of Thomas Love Peacock and George Meredith. These, from the very conditions of their scope and the necessity for authoritativeness in the collection in which they occur, are careful judgments of more serious weight and more reasoned design. They are both admirable volumes; that on Peacock has perhaps the greater charm, but the study of Meredith the greater incisiveness and penetration; and it is because his analysis of Meredith as novelist is so pertinent to his own tendencies as a writer of fiction that I wish to quote from the Meredith volume rather than from any of the others among his critical work, and moreover—limited as I am in the matter of space—to turn at once, and even exclusively, to those passages in which he studies Meredith as an exponent of plot-movement.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Mr. J. B. Priestley.

"The general conduct of the narrative," he says, "is nothing to him; not for him the necessary exposition, the marshalling of significant facts, the shuffling of characters; but he will single out certain moments . . . the whole movement, then, of this fiction must be towards scenes." And again: "He is a faulty narrator because narrative does not interest him. What he wishes to do is not to present us with an arresting and convincing chronicle of events, but to move from one scene to another as quickly and easily as possible." And yet once again: "His manner and style, especially in the later novels, refuse to undertake what might be called the donkey-work of narration."

These extracts—by no means wide of the mark as criticism of Meredith—may be taken, by implication, as giving us Mr. Priestley's theory of the proper conduct of the novel, and it is upon that theory that we do, in fact, find that he has built the structures of his own novels, "The Good Companions" and "Angel Pavement."

His method seems to me the exact opposite to Meredith's, and the key to it is contained in the three passages I have just quoted. He shows himself infinitely concerned with "the donkey-work of narration"; sometimes it seems as if the mere procession of the trivialities that go to make up the exposition of a story interest him more than the getting to grips with the single moments that are the successive peaks in the design of the plot—which is but to say that his sense of values is not a dramatic one. His work has frequently been called Dickensian, but this lack of the dramatic really makes such a comparison curiously inapt.

In "The Good Companions," for instance, I found no fluctuation of climax, no interwoven crescendo and diminuendo, but only a travelling forward on a very level road at a similar pace throughout the route. In "Angel Pavement" however I find the pace varies, and there is a greater sense of the contrivance of a scene; to that extent I think it is a book superior to its predecessor. It is also more human. In "The Good Companions" there is a passage in which Miss Thong, the dressmaker, says, "Give me a bit of life, I say," but I never felt, in that book, that we were given life so much as the simulation of life; the whole thing was seen too rosily, too pleasantly. That may have added to the charm of the book, and to its success, but it detracted from its completeness. Dickens gave even the most humorous of his novels a darker seam, and was that much the nearer truth.

In "Angel Pavement" Mr. Priestley assuredly does give us something of the darker seam, and the fear of Mr. Smeeth, the cashier, that he will lose his job and have to stand in the pitiful queue at some labour exchange—a fear which the climax of the book shows to be only too well founded—comes near to the heart of real tragedy, and is finely done. There is indeed far more real humanity in this book than in "The Good Companions." The study of City office life is not only accurate but full of insight, and a word of special praise must be given to the portrait of the young, pimply, hopelessly ordinary but hopelessly romantic clerk named Turgis. The chapter describing his evening in the West End upon the trail of the impossible She who might dawn upon his sight any minute, or be placed next to him by benevolent Chance in the cinema, but who never appears at all, mingles comedy with pathos almost in the grand manner.

* 10s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

The book indeed is filled with admirable things; so admirable is it in its details that it comes as a surprise when, upon cooler reflection, it is found not to be entirely admirable as a whole. The fault lies in its inordinate length, for its subject-matter will not of itself carry so many pages. "The donkey-work of narration" has obsessed Mr. Priestley so much—and he has obviously found so much delight in it—that it has come to be an end in itself instead of being only the means to an end. The plot of "Angel Pavement" has little more in it than would go to make a short story; it has the simplicity, almost the unity, of the perfect short story. Yet it is filled out with unnecessary details to the *n*th degree. It is as though he has deliberately reversed Meredith's method and instead of seeking "to move from one scene to another as quickly as possible" has sought to move between scenes as lingeringly as possible. Granted that the lingering is always in itself, from the mere literary standpoint, extremely well done, the plot is too thin to bear so continual an insistence upon the inessential. Only a book with the varied and full-bodied contents of a "Peace and War," or a "Wilhelm Meister," or a "Don Quixote," or a "Tom Jones," or a "Les Misérables," or a "David Copperfield" can ever really afford to be so long, and "Angel Pavement" has nothing in its matter to place it anywhere near their range. There is observation in it, there is humour, there are separate studies of real insight, there is an equable flow of very good writing, but there is no real drama, because no proper concentration, no depth of philosophy, no admixture of human darkness and light that alone would fill such bulk with artistic adequacy.

For all that, I would not leave the impression that "Angel Pavement" is a failure; I have only sought to test it by the severest canons, and even when considered by those it contains passages beyond the reach of most of the contemporary school, certainly of any of the younger novelists dazzled by the wonderfulness and originality of cocktails and adultery. The description of life in the Burpenfield Club for Women, for instance, is extraordinarily well done, and contains more psychology than any pseudo-Freudian novel of them all; and the portraits throughout the whole book, without exception, are alive and directly observed and painted. "Angel Pavement" in fact might be considered as a portrait-gallery, and that the portraits appear to me better in themselves and as separate works of art than in their grouping and cumulative effect is chiefly, I think, because of the book's length and lack of sufficient plot to warrant such intense absorption in side-issues. To build up so vast a façade seems to me only permissible when the interior beyond, in the full terror of verve and power, is positively Balzacian.

WALLACE B. NICHOLS.

THE RELIGION OF JANE AUSTEN.

By ROWLAND GREY.

THE close reserve Jane Austen always maintained concerning her inner life is universally known. It is therefore singular the most brilliant of her biographers, Mademoiselle Villard, should have been led into a double-dyed error, because she either disregarded it or failed to understand it as indicative of Jane Austen's whole character, for it is now notorious that Mademoiselle Villard has levelled the surprising charge of irreligion against her. She grounds her false accusation upon the rarity of her allusions to things spiritual whether in her books or her letters. Mademoiselle Villard has seemingly no knowledge of the national habit of reticence, which as recently as "The End of the House of Alard," made Lady Alard describe Father Luce as "a dreadful man who spoke of God in the drawing-room." Religion apart, Jane Austen owed two precious things to her close connexion with churchmen—her education and it may be her humour—for believers in heredity please themselves with the fancy that this golden gift came to her from her great uncle, the Rev. Theophislis Leigh, for fifty-nine years most autocratic of Masters of Balliol. If his contemporaries spoke spitefully of the neglect of education of the "sons of Belial" as they were then called, he enjoyed the reputation of Charles the Second for never saying a foolish thing.

When we arrive at the question of the education of the genius, we leave a pleasant hypothesis for fact. The Rev. George Austen, Jane's father, aforetime "the handsome proctor" of St. John's College, Oxford, is made the subject of a discerning note of admiration by Signora Emilia Bassi. She points out that Jane was educated by a parent who was much more than a popular university coach—a man wise enough to let his daughter develop into an absolutely natural woman. He understood with rare wisdom the value of a little wholesome neglect. He was a Christian gentleman of the best type, doing his duty to God and his neighbour and winning universal liking as well as respect. His cheering contrast with the heavy fathers who have handicapped too many of our women of letters is pleasing. There were no prunes and prisms at Steventon, and Jane was a joyous outdoor maid who played cricket with her brothers. One of these, James, was her second tutor and he took orders as did also Henry in later life. Those who only think of Jane Austen's father as applauding the famous theatricals in the barn, or as the centre of a happy family party, should remember that one of his sons who rose to eminence in the Navy was described as "the officer who knelt in church." This one anecdote gives certainty that religion was the basis of the education of the Austens. It needed courage for a young captain to make himself thus conspicuous in the navy of a godless time. Nor did his devoutness prevent him from being a general favourite, which says something for his comrades.

It was a privilege to discuss this matter of Jane's religion with her relation, the bright, intelligent Mrs. Austen-Leigh, scarcely a week before her sudden death. She sat in her sunny drawing-room holding the tiny time-yellowed baby's cap embroidered with Jane's own famous satin stitch, and spoke earnestly of the plentiful evidence that the first of women novelists was not merely a genius but a Christian. That she was a communicant, the recent sale of a small "Altar Book" with her signature for over a hundred pounds is proof positive. Mr. Brimley Johnson, in his able foreword to an abridged translation from Mademoiselle Villard, was quite of the opinion of Mrs. Austen-Leigh, whose connection with the Perrots linked her doubly with the family, for he says:

"To her important critical estimate, Mademoiselle Villard added (in her thesis when standing for her doctorial degree) a record of Jane Austen's life which nearly doubled the length of her work. The late Mr. Austen-Leigh was 'gravely dissatisfied with several misjudgments in the life, though pleased with its minute analysis.' The erroneous charge of irreligion has been omitted in the translations as being too dogmatically and sweepingly expressed."

Mr. Brimley Johnson need not have been afraid to have stood sponsor for a complete translation. For if a champion of her own sex is needed for Jane Austen, Signora Emilia Bassi is at hand armed at all points, and deserves attention when she writes:

"The profoundly moral character of the Austen novels is plain on every page. In them we find no pedantry, no intentions of posing as a preacher in petticoats, but we breathe an atmosphere of wholesome piety and common sense. She represents the sense of duty as the guiding principle of life and all her heroines are more or less influenced by it. . . . In all Miss Austen's novels the effect of strictly Biblical religion is felt. There are neither disquisitions nor ascetic inspirations and they are entirely devoid of the narrowness and bitterness which disfigure the work of some Protestant sectarians."

Jane Austen.

It has been pointed out elsewhere* as a curious coincidence, that two Lives of Jane Austen that count should have come from our allies, France and Italy, in momentous 1914. "Giovanna," continues Signora Bassi, "was no superwoman. . . . Her life was a joy to herself and a joy to others. She understood the true philosophy of life and her happiness consisted in loving and making happy all who were around her, and was never dissatisfied with the restricted society in which she was forced to live, never clamorous for wider horizons or unrealisable ideals."

The constantly misunderstood letters show the truth of these words. Leslie Stephen in his rather tepid notice in the dictionary of National Biography sneers at them as trivial. Surely Jane is not trivial when she says sweetly and gravely, "I hope I shall never ridicule what is wise and good." Was she not a world's wonder as being at once a genius and contented? and was not Christianity the bedrock of this contentment? It would account for the gracious serenity of temperament shining out in possibly the last letter she ever wrote from Chawton, recently published in The Times and addressed to her "dearest Anne," a Miss Sharp. She had suffered greatly for months and was just leaving for further treatment in Winchester. Believing herself recovering she utters this thanksgiving. "The Providence of God has restored me and may I be more fit to appear before Him when I am summoned." The summons was near at hand. In those final weeks she was all patience and gratitude to those tending her with comprehensible devotion. "I pray God to bless them more and more." Do the faithless pray thus when their bodies are wracked with pain?

Her own nephew tells us, if a little stiltedly, "Two of her brothers who were clergymen lived near enough to Winchester to be in frequent attendance, and to administer the consolations suitable for a Christian deathbed. She was fully aware of her danger but not appalled. . . . She had always sought as it were by instinct to promote the happiness of those who came within her influence, and doubtless she had her reward in the peace of mind granted to her. Her sweetness of temper never failed."

Mademoiselle Villard taunts her with ignoring the Evangelical Movement in its ardent dawn, yet she wrote to her favourite niece, Fanny Knight, in doubt as to the acceptance of a lover, "I am by no means certain we ought not all to be Evangelicals. Don't be frightened by his acting up more strictly to the purpose of the New Testament narrative."

Dame Ethel Smyth in her candid Autobiography, gives us unexpectedly information proving that Jane Austen could feel, and feel strongly, upon a religious question, for she says "My father used to tell an odd little story about Jane Austen and his uncle who were close friends. It appears that the authoress wishing to get his real opinion about one of her novels put on a friend to pump him, concealing herself meanwhile behind a curtain. The verdict was luckily all that could be desired till the professor remarked that he was not quite sure of her orthodoxy, having detected a slightly unitarian (!) leaning in her later work, upon which Jane Austen burst forth from her hiding place indignantly crying "That's not true."

We should all like to know where in sparkling "Emma" or fragrant "Persuasion" unitarianism was to be discovered. Was it when Emma found church "impossible" one Christmas Day, or was it James who would not consent to bring out his horses upon roads slippery with half-thawed snow? It really does seem the lonely scrap of excuse for this extraordinary accusation.

Mademoiselle Villard insists that in society according to Jane Austen, Puritan morality still existed with the flame of Puritan faith burnt to ashes. She paints a sarcastic picture of Jane's own performance of her duties in her father's parish. "Elle se rend dans les chaumières, porte du bouillon aux malades, parle gentiment aux paysannes écoute patiemment leurs doléances, mais sans oublier un instant que Miss Jane Austen appartient à une autre race." All this is based on what many a girl who was not a genius has felt about visiting the poor as part of a routine. Jane was bound to be at her ease in writing to Cassandra when absent that "The people cry out for t'other Miss Austen."

* "Jane Austen Abroad." By Rowland Grey. "Nineteenth century and after," November, 1925.

Mary Mitford, who was most unjust to Jane and hopelessly inaccurate as when she reported her a "pretty husband-hunting butterfly" at a date when she was hardly six years old, concedes that "there was none of the hardness and selfishness of Miss Edgeworth in her." She clearly knew nothing of either, for Maria Edgeworth was as kindly and generous a soul as ever breathed—the one plain woman of whom Byron spoke cordially.

Jane Austen's brother Henry in his brief, touching preface to "Northanger Abbey" and "Persuasion"—published as all know after her merry brown eyes had closed in death—forgot family reserve for a welcome moment, and concludes "One trait only remains to be touched upon. It makes all the others unimportant. She was thoroughly religious and devout, fearful of giving offence to God, incapable of feeling it towards any fellow creature." Madame de Ferrière, one of her enthusiastically admiring translators, describes Jane Austen's life as "remplie par la religion et la littérature," a misquotation from Henry's "Memoirs," where he gives his sister the third attribute "usefulness," which quite alters the impression, for Jane was no dweller in the clouds—rather that delicious thing a home-maker.

If there be any to-day so out of the mode as to dare to admit they are not Austenites, they may be more concerned with this matter of her religion on the evidence of her works—or her critics. Her first "Quarterly Reviewer," long preposterously supposed to be Sir Walter Scott, was silent on the subject. It took this dull fellow five turgid pages to find excuses for reviewing such flimsy nothings as novels. He should have asked pardon instead, for daring it thus wretchedly. After attempting to damn Emma with faint praise he condescendingly remarks that "with Miss Austen we do not miss excitation," and proves himself unable even to write English. The rest of his space is devoted to showing his complete inability to comprehend her humour far less her irony. She was speedily avenged, for in 1821 a worthy knight combatant, Whateley, the future Archbishop, went to the root of the matter and swept away worn-out conventions with a high hand.

"'The time is past," he says, "when an apology is requisite from a reviewer for condescending to notice a novel. . . . We have lived to hear the merits of the best of this class of writing earnestly discussed by some of the ablest scholars of the day. We are inclined to attribute this change not so much to an alteration in public taste, as to the character of the productions in question. Novels may not display more genius than formerly but they display more sense."

He had no use for "Algerian banditti landing on the coast of England," though he would assuredly have welcomed "The Pirates of Penzance." Yet like Mr. Pollock he was grateful to Mrs. Radcliffe, because without her there could have been no "Northanger Abbey." Sickly sentimentality was his abhorrence; he wants a novel that "makes good its pretensions to be a perfectly correct picture of common life." He too compares Jane Austen with Maria Edgeworth, contrasting "Ennui" with "Mansfield Park," greatly to Jane's advantage. Either the Archbishop or the printer contrive to misspell Austen throughout the article—it is a venial error for one who first made the illuminating discovery that she was a Christian genius. Dismissing Miss Edgeworth cavalierly as a "mere moralist," he continues:

"Miss Austen has the merit in our opinion of being evidently a Christian writer, a merit which is much enhanced both on the score of good taste and practicability by her religion not being at all obtrusive. . . . She has not been forgetful of the important maxim long ago illustrated by Homer and afterwards by Aristotle, of saying as little as possible in her own person."

He awards pride of place to "Mansfield Park" as containing Jane Austen's "best humour and best moral lesson." He sees that a false system of so-called education has been the ruin of the Miss Bertrams—early versed in "the Roman emperors as low as Severus, besides a good deal of heathen mythology and all the metals, semi-metals, planets, etc" This sound critic condemns them rightly as "entirely deficient in the less common acquirements of self-knowledge, generosity and humility." The existence of the novelist with a purpose is handsomely justified if we agree with the Archbishop in ranking "Pride and Prejudice" and those other dear companions among them. This ideal reviewer was only uncertain whether most to admire the "undercurrent of serious meaning," usually unperceived, or the sparkle of the wit glittering on the surface of the work he delighted to honour. "Let other pens dwell on guilt and misery," exclaims Jane Austen, and the very fact that she regards them as synonymous is eloquent. She has been accused of dealing lightly with Lydia's disgraceful elopement. Riper judgment made her mete out severe punishment to Maria Bertram if she indulges us with no details of her fall. Searchlights upon the Seventh Commandment were not Jane Austen's idea of fiction. Edmund's love for Mary Crawford is struck dead when he realises her still fashionable morals. Misery in some form was to Jane Austen at her apogee of literary perfection, the inevitable ally of guilt. She saw sin ugly as it is.

The verdict as to Jane Austen's supremacy in her art given by Archbishop Whateley was endorsed in 1843 in Macaulay's panegyric, for this is the only term for the brief tribute taking the place of the intended essay he never wrote. His fervent note of admiration for the characterisation of her young clergy revealing intimate knowledge of their duties, does not speak of her personal religion except indirectly, and thus almost the last word is with the Archbishop, who says "she partook largely in all the best gifts of the comic Muse," that "her fables were nearly faultless," and "above all that she was a Christian writer."

Almost the last word, for has not Mr. Kipling recently enrolled himself in the army of "Janeites." His charming verses show his belief that his liege lady was good as she was witty, for it is in Paradise he saw her looking for her lover, and finding Captain Wentworth reading "Persuasion."

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

One of the "literary events" of the moment is that the Collected Edition of the works of G. Bernard Shaw is in process of publication, and that the Preface to the first volume, his hitherto unpublished first novel, "Immaturity," is another instalment of autobiography. I once asked Bernard Shaw to write his autobiography and he gave me to understand that he was always doing it—in his Plays and Prefaces. One Free Church leader has fallen foul of G. B. S. for the latter's references to his father in this Preface, but I think the honours and the humour lie with Shaw. If the fathers eat sour grapes the children's teeth will be set on edge and they will probably have something to say about it—as is most certainly their right. It is more a question of facts and their consequences, which cannot be hidden in this world, than of ethics. I think you will be interested in the article which R. Ellis Roberts has written for our October issue. "The Inhibitions of G. Bernard Shaw." He has a few and they have important effects.

Incidentally, in the recent Observer interview, Shaw considerably relieved the minds of "collectors" by announcing that "everything published in the collected edition will be published separately afterwards." Presumably, also, uniform in production with his other works. All the same, these will not rank as "first editions" in the strict sense, only as first editions in that format.

We have just received from Mr. Cale Young Rice, the American poet, these lines in farewell to his old friend, St. John Adcock.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

The seaweed that has lain long
On the rocks stands up in the tide.
More than a moon and a half ago,
They tell me, you died.
I did not know ; I did not hear
The spade in earth.
I, too, since, have lain long
On the rocks, in dearth.

Twenty years are a brief while
To have a friend,
For need, longing and loneliness in us
Never end.
If there are any words better
To say now
Than that I loved you, take them with you Somehow.

Mr. Cale Young Rice.

I gave away my first edition of "Memoirs of a Fox-hunting Man," bought a second and a third copy and gave them away. So you may judge my enthusiasm for the book and that I share the eager anticipation of my friends for the "Memoirs of an Infantry Officer," by Siegfried Sassoon, which will be ready when this note appears. This book will have to stand the test of being a sequel to a popular book and the added test of being "yet another war book." I believe it will successfully withstand both tests. The public is only tired of a certain kind of war book, the book which is lazy and lurid photography and neither art nor life. Given a Sherston as central character and the descriptive and interpretative power of Siegfried Sassoon, and we shall read war books for the duration. In our October issue we shall deal with both author and book at greater length.

Two other books from the same publishers, Faber & Faber, will be waited for by their different publics. Walter De la Mare has gathered together a volume of his stories under the title, " On the Edge." Is the title meant to suggest that the stories are " on the edge " of the credible and the bearable ? for I understand they deal with those borderland experiences of horror and oddity which nevertheless may wait for any of us round the next corner.

The other book is George Blake's new novel, " The Seas Between." Walter De la Mare had found himself long before he " arrived " with the public, in that he knew what manner of man he was as a writer and what he wanted to do. I have the feeling that George Blake is sailing under sealed orders, that he is keeping to the immediate course but is not sure of his port. Partly this is due to his youth and partly to a clash of power and interest within. You have only to see his face or read a page to know he has drive and varied power.

By the way, Miss Stoddart shows the other side of the shield in her new book which Hodder & Stoughton's are publishing on September 11th. In " Great Lives Divinely Planned " she traces the influence of parents, the home-life, friends, etc., on the making of men.

Miss Henry Handel Richardson.

From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

Miss Marjorie Bowen made a good suggestion for holiday reading in the Morning Post recently. " To many the ideal holiday reading will be that most different from their usual choice. No doubt there are some who prefer the ' busman's holiday '—a continuation of indulgence in their own peculiar taste, but probably the real recreation lies in a complete change of mental, as well as of material, country." There is a good deal to be said for such drastic surgery on our prejudices, not the least that many discoveries would be made both amongst books and in ourselves. We should find that our reach was very much beyond our grasp and would decide to extend our range of reading. Even where our reading confirmed our previous pre-judgment it would be an altogether healthful exercise and diversion. The insight and judgment of one who has to school himself to read and to discipline his instinctive reactions is often more valuable than that of the devotee. Supposing we compromise—half our holiday reading shall be among books and authors we do not like, half shall be spent in reading the books we have been waiting for time to read. You have plenty of choice.

Omnibus volumes certainly solve the question for those who want a " busman's holiday," for they can take a library of their favourite author within the covers of one book and the compass of two And there is a very wide choice, too, for in addition to Omnibus volumes already published, including the Pullman " Ethel Dell " (Benn), there are many new volumes promised—" The Fortunes of Richard Mahony," by Henry Handel Richardson, particularly interesting for many of us, and from the same House (Heinemann Ltd.) we are promised the Second Omnibus which will carry J. B. Priestley, Somerset Maugham, Maurice Baring, Robert Graves, and others. This mixed company will serve for the other kind of holiday reading suggested by Miss Marjorie Bowen.

Two publishers have lately made interesting public confessions of the faith that is in them. Horace Liveright of New York sends out with his autumn list a foreword which seeks to answer the question : " Why more Books ? " But surely his test is too narrow—that no book should be published which serves no purpose of artistry or enlightenment unless you pack a varied meaning into both terms. In a word to the general reader which introduces the general catalogue of Ernest Benn Ltd., they indicate four " marks " of Benn books with which they think all their readers will agree. The first is, " Whether you like it or not, whether it interests you or not, you will agree that it ought to be published." At any rate, this is a fine tribute to the intelligence of readers and the sturdy faith of at least one publisher. Alpublishers try to find the public taste with some of their books and to educate it through others. On the big, simple issues, the public generally knows what it wants, if only after it has found it. Every long-established publishing firm has on its list one or more books which sell steadily through a generation or more. As an article in the American Publishers' Weekly of July 19th reminds us, "if people want a book neither its price nor the financial depression of the country seems to affect its sale." This applies both to old and new books. "Longfellow is still the largest seller in America and Tennyson comes next in point of popularity." Among poets, that is.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell,
Author of "To What Green Altar" (Hutchinson).

A book that provides a strong contrast to "The Resurrection of Rome" will also be published by Hodder & Stoughton in September—"Christian Ethics and Modern Problems," by Dean Inge. Almost violently contrasted though they seem to be, it is amazing how many things Dean Inge and G. K. C. have in common after all—their sincerity, courage, versatility, wide knowledge—and yet they differ on almost every major issue of life. Interesting!

Looking through the new books promised from Longmans Green for October, I am reminded of Dean Inge's article of early August in the Evening Standard, on "History without Tears." He there most strongly recommended Professor G. M. Trevelyan's well-known books on Italian history and the History of England for holiday reading, and "for reading aloud, which is the test of good literature." It is interesting good news indeed that on September 18th, Longmans will issue Professor Trevelyan's "Blenheim: England under Queen Anne," and on the same day they will publish "William III and the Defence of Holland, 1672–4," by Caroline Trevelyan, daughter of Professor Trevelyan, and a great-grand-niece of Lord Macaulay. On September 11th they hope to publish E. F. Benson's reminiscences under the title, "As We Were."

Portrait by Elliott & Fry. Dean Inge.

The Clarendon Press hope to have ready during the autumn the third volume of the official history of the Royal Air Force—"The War in the Air," by H. A. Jones. It will range from the campaigns of German East and South-West Africa to the air raids in Great Britain and the fighting on the Western Front.

I was speaking on the telephone yesterday with G. K. Chesterton and he was as merry and as energetic as a schoolboy—on holiday. We have long accepted the miracle of G. K. C. and ceased to ask how he does it. This is what he is doing or has done, for already he is full of new projects and in September he is off to America for a three months' lecture tour. Cassell's issued in late August a new novel, "Four Faultless Felons," in which G. K. C. introduces "the club of men misunderstood," four of whose members committed murder, fraud, theft, and the Unpardonable Sin—and yet were guiltless. Arrowsmith's announce for September a new Chester-Belloc, "The Man Who Made Gold," by Hilaire Belloc, with drawings by G. K. Chesterton. Hodder & Stoughton's will also have ready his new book, "The Resurrection of Rome," an amazing seven-league-boot stride through European history since the birth of the Christian Church. Chesterton tells me that by the time he has passed his proofs he has forgotten the book—not because he has a bad memory but because his mind is already full of new work.

Photo by Central News. Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

On the first of September, Putnams are publishing "Sorrowstones," by W. R. Calvert, of the Daily Dispatch. Seeing that publishers are now confessing, their reason for issuing this book is their frank belief that it is a jolly good story, well told, which lives up to its unextravagant and honest aim. A good reason, too.

John Murray is publishing immediately "Imperial Air Routes," by Major A. E. W. Salt, a timely and valuable book. In October they hope to publish volume I of the third and final series of "The Letters of Queen Victoria," edited by George Earle Buckle. This book will bring to a glow the embers of many an old camp-fire. There are three other very different books indeed from this firm that I am waiting for: "The Philosophy of the Good Life," the Gifford Lectures, by Bishop Gore; "Wanderer's End," by Dennis Cleugh—because of his colourful life and because he was the husband of Sophia Cleugh; and "Mysterious Waye," the new novel by P. C. Wren, which is explanation enough.

Photo by Debenham & Gould, Bournemouth.

Major P. C. Wren.

Humour, like the spirit, bloweth where it listeth. Only the purblind could mistake "Ol' Man Adam an' His Chillun," by Roark Bradford (Heinemann) for blasphemy. At the worst it is only a poor joke. For me there was a lack of spontaneity and depth—I felt the author's eye was on the surface humour and not on the spiritual depth and simple sincerity which alone could justify this "translation" of Biblical truth.

In this issue we review Professor Stephen Leacock's book on "Economic Prosperity in the British Empire," reviewed by a trained economist, too, as was meet. Late in August, the Bodley Head issued "The Leacock Book"—the best passages selected from all his works by Ben Travers, who also contributes a delightful introduction in just the right key.

I remember that thirty years ago I picked up a book by Frank Harris. I could not make much of it at the time but I remember I went about for a month at least with a feeling that a lot of mistakes had been made about Shakespeare, and it was a good thing for me that I had not been born more than fifteen or so years before, as now I had the chance to learn the truth. I never dreamt that the man who could write with such conviction about the Shakespeare hidden in his plays had started life as a cowboy, and knew Buffalo Bill and Wild Bill Hickok. Life's great fun, not the least of which is coming across a book like "On the Trail," being the reminiscences as a cowboy of Frank Harris (Bodley Head).

By the end of August, Gollancz Ltd. hoped to publish "War Letters of Fallen Englishmen," edited by Laurence Housman, a book that will provoke both thought and tears; and a new novel, "Trio," by Phyllis Bentley, author of "Spinner of the Years;" and one of their new omnibus volumes, "Famous Novels of To-day," which breaks away from a collection of novels by the same author, and comprises "Red Wagon," by Lady Eleanor Smith, "Dewar Rides," by L. A. G. Strong, "Frolic Wind," by Richard Oke, and "St. Christopher's Day," by Martin Armstrong. A very good idea indeed which deserves encouragement.

BOOKMAN.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

In striking contrast to the crowded canvas of "Fulfilling," Mr. George Stevenson's new book, THE SWIFT YEARS (7s. 6d.; Bodley Head), tells the almost placid story of a boy from the day of his birth until the comfortable age when he can quietly review the passing of the years in a spirit of calm detachment. That humble little home, at the end of a court, the father a self-centred, dreamy poet, the mother pretty, docile, delicate, affectionate, an aunt, proud of her poet brother and happily blest with independent means, all these come vividly to life at the call of memory, interwoven with the miscellany of neighbours and relations. Simple and quiet as it is, there is a sensitiveness and understanding underlying it all which captures and holds our interest, in fact in these two rare qualities lie its undoubted charm, we are held irresistibly by its delicate realism.

In OUTPOST OF ARDEN, by Diana Patrick (7s. 6d.; Hutchinson), you have the story of how Sir Philip Checyl, a dominating man, who, preventing his son's marriage to a housemaid, lived to repent of his folly and to try to bring about a marriage between the child of that tragic romance and her cousin—his legitimate grandson. But Fate, which allowed him to spoil the happiness of two young people, does not allow him to make amends to the younger generation, and Sir Philip learns that as you cannot kill love, neither can you force it. Miss Patrick's book has a deep sentimental interest.

The Bookshelf.

THE OTHER STEPHEN LEACOCK.*

To the man in the street economics is always the dismal science. He may not be quite sure what this means, but he regards it as a warning and avoids economics like the plague. On occasion however he can be tricked into reading a book on economics. Stephen Leacock—and who would suspect him ?—has made an ingenious attempt to capture his attention with his latest book, " Economic Prosperity in the British Empire."

Of his thousands of admirers very few are aware that Stephen Leacock is an economist, yet the man in the street may take heart, for the Leacock he knows as the author of " Nonsense Novels," " Frenzied Fiction," etc., is little different in the " Economic Prosperity of the British Empire."

In no case is the man and his style very far apart, and in Stephen Leacock they are essentially and unmistakably one. He may write on economics or on any subject under the sun, but he can no more conceal himself than the ostrich that buries its head in the sand. As a result, few books discussing an economic problem make easier reading than Stephen Leacock's, for here is swift narrative, felicitous phrase and characteristic humour. In short, he has a story and knows how to tell it.

Mr. Stephen Leacock.
From a drawing by Kathleen Shackleton.

The subject matter of the book is best indicated by the title first chosen for it—" The Economic Integration of the British Empire." Thus the book is of some topical interest, for even if politics be excluded, no observer of contemporary affairs can fail to be impressed by the thought which is being given to the economic future of the Empire. Incidentally it is no new-found enthusiasm for Stephen Leacock, for as long ago as 1907–8 he toured the Empire and lectured on Imperial Organisation. By the economic integration of the Empire he means " the establishment of a system of mutual co-operation for the development of the vast potential wealth of the Empire and for the expansion of its present limited population." He believes that " as towards the outside world a uniformity of economic policy may still be achieved ; and the now separated parts of the Empire may co-operate with one another in the use of capital, the movement of population and the development of national resources, with results as yet scarcely imagined." He favours a general tariff protecting the markets of the Empire, though he admits that much can be done without it ; he also advocates the creation of a Consolidated Empire Debt.

It is a bold scheme boldly conceived. At the same time, one wonders sometimes whether the man of letters, with his lively imagination, has not got the better of the economist. Indeed as a practical contribution to economics, it would have been more valuable had the author paid more regard to those half-tones which a famous economist has said are the realities of economic life. In regard to raising the capital for his vast project, for instance, he writes with an unqualified optimism which would not, one imagines, be shared by such competent judges as Sir Josiah Stamp and Sir Walter Layton. None the less, the book will doubtless serve as a stimulant.

HAROLD BELLMAN.

* " Economic Prosperity in the British Empire." By Stephen Leacock. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

TWO WORLDS AT A TIME.*

Mr. Hereward Carrington treats exhaustively a subject which for many years has been steadily claiming increasing attention from intelligent minds.

The book is written with a detachment and a critical analysis of the evidence available that can hardly fail to impress any impartial reader. The range of his investigation covers every form of psychic phenomenon, both from the scientific and the historical point of view. He presents the facts, claiming no more than that they are facts, established by unimpeachable evidence, leaving his reader to draw his own conclusions.

Not so long ago the critics would have sprung to arms at the word science used in connection with so nebulous a line of investigation as psychic phenomena. But every form of physical science has been evolved gradually from what in the first instance was mere guesswork, and developed through what scientists call an inductive methodology into a certain stabilisation of phenomena. From the vast range of facts now at the command of the psychic investigator an inductive methodology has likewise gradually emerged, and what may be claimed as a " true " science dealing with the supernormal is becoming established. The psychic researcher may still be groping in the dark, but can so very much more be said of the physical scientist, at all events when concerned with the constitution of matter ?

In dealing with the historical side of experimental investigation the writer starts from the inauguration of the Society for Psychical Research as far back as 1882. This was the first attempt of serious minds to bring something like law and order into the chaotic array of facts and rumours prevalent in all parts of the globe. Three years later a society of a similar nature was founded in America, and rising from a medley of " ghost-stories " psychical research became a subject worthy of investigation by some of the finest intellects in England and elsewhere.

Every type of phenomenon, physical and mental, has a place in Mr. Carrington's book, from water-divination to ectoplasmic experiment under the first heading ; from automatic writing to clairvoyance under the other. He describes in detail séances with such celebrated mediums as Eusapia Palladino and Daniel Home, when the manifestations took place under circumstances that excluded all possibility of fraud ; at the same time making no claim that such phenomena, although undoubtedly having taken place, necessarily furnish proofs of survival. In nine cases out of ten these physical experiments merely prove an intelligence lying behind the operation of supernormal laws. There are exceptions, as in the case of the well-known "Margery" sittings whose control professes to be her brother once in earth life, and who has justified that claim to any open mind. The "direct-voice" phenomenon, although strictly speaking included in the physical, depends for proof of identity not on the nature of the manifestation but on the subject-matter of the messages received.

* " The Story of Psychic Science." 24s. (Rider.)

The book is a fine addition to the literature of psychic science, although here and there opinions may be expressed with which every student of the subject might not entirely agree. To read it is to realise the immense advance made during the last twenty to thirty years. No one, however sceptical he may be on the question of survival, can fail to be impressed by the manner and matter of Mr. Carrington's work; no one, however frivolously he may be inclined to regard the subject of psychic research, can refuse to take this book seriously. The meticulous care and patience shown with regard to the records of séances, and the knowledge displayed acquired by long study and experiment may well open the eyes of the self-constituted critics who without either study or experiment consider themselves capable of expressing opinions on this difficult and abstruse line of research.

ROSE CH. DE CRESPIGNY.

A HUMAN HARMONY.*

My fingers have pianistically marched to the "Grand March in the Romance of Blue Beard," and I have sought a crepuscular melancholy in "When Pensive I thought of my love." The march, humdrum as a retired soldier's "constitutional," the song, gentle and "refined," are among the numerous compositions of Michael Kelly whose fame is again audible, thanks to Mr. Ellis's lovable industry.

It is hardly rash to assert that Kelly was of the tribe of musicians whose works in bulk promise nothing but ennui to posterity. Their artistic luck depends on catchiness.

* "The Life of Michael Kelly." By S. M. Ellis. 25s. net. (Gollancz.)

Michael Kelly, at the age of sixty-two.
From the portrait by A. Wivell.

From "The Life of Michael Kelly," by S. M. Ellis (Gollancz). Reproduced by permission of the author.

Though Mozart composed variations on one of Kelly's airs and though Kelly is still eligible for a song-album, he merely serves as a fill-up. Thanks to catchiness the life in art of even Haynes Bayly is far less intermittent than Kelly's, while, as for Mrs. Jordan, alleged composer of "The Blue Bells of Scotland," Kelly might have all the prestige of the FitzClarences and still leave her richer than he in musical fame owing to that one air.

Fortunately for Kelly he left a volume of reminiscences, edited to Kelly's dissatisfaction by Theodore Hook, and he has found in Mr. Ellis a biographer peculiarly fitted to reanimate the past in which he lived. For Mr. Ellis has not only great knowledge of, but affinity with, the social and artistic life of England from the time of the Prince Regent till the time when the shadow of over-population chilled the flowers that grow on the primrose path. His well-illustrated Life of Kelly is, in addition to its titular achievement (complete in itself), an instalment of a survey which should people our imaginations with Kelly's contemporaries.

Kelly makes an admirable centre for a circular survey. Vocally educated on the Continent, he knew Mozart, Gluck and Paisiello, was applauded by the Emperor Joseph II, saw the first Napoleon. As Sheridan's chief musical coadjutor and an intimate friend of that procrastinating genius, he contacted with talents innumerable. As the lover of the singer, Mrs. Crouch (an ex-mistress of George IV), he innocently evokes a procession of lovely venal creatures who seem to tell us that Charles II was born again in the House of Hanover.

Kelly, with his loyalty in friendship and love, his smooth efficiency, his wide-awake appreciativeness, is a human harmony, wrought apparently by nature for he does not reveal any throes or scars of self-conquest. A rascal brought him to financial grief, and Gout—that imp of the bottle—crippled him; but Gout, which was cruel to at least two Victorian prime ministers, at any rate did not incapacitate him from "lifting the rummer" to his lips. When he was a youth, "wearing a Sicilian capote over which flowed his long fair hair," the singer, Nancy Storace, pointed him out as a "girl dressed in boy's clothes," whereupon Kelly corrected her thus: "You are mistaken, miss; I am a very proper he animal, and quite at your service." 'Tis thus that a budding rake might have answered, but Kelly gave his one mistress a devotion worthy of marriage, and in the year of his death added "a large funereal urn" to the tomb of Mrs. Crouch who predeceased him in 1805.

It was probably Kelly's good fortune to enjoy spectacle and atmosphere without experiencing that longing to possess and explore which is fatal to many reputations. He must have been charming, for the fourth Lord Guilford offered to build him a cottage-home, saying "We will be neighbours, Mic; my wife shall sing with you, my chaplain shall drink with you, and I will talk to you." But the cosmopolitan was not tempted to such a retreat. The Sunday Times for October 15th, 1826, informs us that Michael Kelly's death "will be severely felt in theatrical circles, for his house in Tavistock Row was a rendezvous for managers, poets, authors and composers." One does not fancy him rusticated, chewing the cud; but it is easy to imagine the pleasure of hearing him anecdotalise. He was not great, but he was uncommonly quick and clever. He actually persuaded Mozart to allow him to alter a vocal effect in "Le Nozze di Figaro." His swift intelligence in musical direction must have been a godsend to Sheridan. If his musical labours created nothing immortally exquisite or inspiring, his life was nevertheless a far-reaching success since it offers us who read Mr. Ellis's excellent book a feast of companionship with people whose métier was to charm.

W. H. CHESSON.

EARLY VICTORIAN READERS.*

In a former book Mrs. Amy Cruse told the story of English literature, from the reader's rather than the writer's point of view, up to the close of the eighteenth century. Her latest volume takes up the tale and carries it on to the accession of Victoria. The earlier work covered a period of thirteen hundred years; the present one, starting with the year 1790, surveys only half a century. But what a half-century it was! Not only did it see the rise of many brilliant new literary stars, but it witnessed a great expansion in the ranks of the reading public and a vast revolution—or evolution—in the methods of book publishing and distribution.

* "The Englishman and His Books in the Early Nineteenth Century." By Amy Cruse. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)

It is difficult in a brief notice to pay adequate tribute to Mrs. Cruse's very uncommon and very delightful work. It represents an immense amount of research among the by-ways as well as the highways of the literature of her period, and shows an ingenuity in the dovetailing of evidence that is the more remarkable for being apparently so effortless. So lightly indeed does Mrs. Cruse carry her learning, and so sensitively does her own imagination give vitality to the facts, that her book will be enjoyed as much by the intelligent sixth-form schoolboy or schoolgirl as by the mature literary student. It is a volume, again, equally adapted for consecutive reading and for "browsing." It is a book at once for the public library, the private study, and the bedside shelf.

Clapham Common in 1802.
(J. M. W. Turner.)
From "The Englishman and His Books," by Amy Cruse (Harrap).

Mrs. Cruse's method may be indicated by a glance at one or two of her chapters. After an introduction admirably surveying the main features of her period, she opens with an essay on Miss Burney's "Camilla"—a "best-seller" of the closing years of the eighteenth century. To what type of reader did "Camilla" appeal? The question is answered by an examination of the original subscription list of that novel. The names of various patrons provide Mrs. Cruse with pegs for biographical references or for extracts from contemporary diaries and letters, as well as with matter for her own commentary and reflection. Thus, by a fact here, a quotation there, and throughout by the linking and unifying agency of her own fancy, Mrs. Cruse gives us a charming and convincing picture of the social world in which "Camilla," now hopelessly "old-fashioned," was avidly read as a sensational and daring innovation.

Turning next to the "Lyrical Ballads" of Wordsworth and Coleridge, she shows us how the first edition of 1798, if it fell flat so far as the wider public was concerned, at least found a few scattered readers of such future influence that the ultimate success of the poems was actually, though not visibly, assured from the start. And thus Mrs. Cruse wanders at large and at leisure over the whole field of early nineteenth century literary and social history, throwing innumerable fresh sidelights upon it, and bringing back the very atmosphere of bygone days.

G. T.

MARTIN LUTHER.*

A fresh study of Luther is welcome, especially when it is made by a Frenchman and a professor at Strasburg. Not that Gallican sympathies bias the historian's survey; its impartiality befits the science of history. M. Febure does not attempt a biography or give an estimate of Luther, but rather his aim is "to plot the curve of a destiny which was simple but tragic" (p. vii. 171). With psychological penetration the varying complex moods of Luther are analysed during the three stages of his career; his training in isolation as a monk till his flowering period at the outbreak over the sale of indulgences in 1517, and the recoil in the last twenty years of his life. Attention is chiefly centred on the "young Luther" during the period 1517–1525, when he burst forth as a "prophet" than on the failure, so M. Febure thinks, of his later years.

* "Martin Luther: A Destiny." By Lucien Febure. Translated by Roberts Tapley. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

The focus of interest is Luther the man rather than the theologian, though the meaning of justification by faith, and the significance of indulgences, are presented with French lucidity and precision. We see Luther at the period of sturm und drang in the monastic cell, full of daring at Worms, moody in the Wartburg, preaching against the Peasants' Rising and Anabaptists at Wittenberg, marrying a nun, free and easy at his table, resisting Erasmus, uniting Germany—a very human figure indeed. All the immense literature, from both friends and foes, is at the author's command, and use is made of the discoveries within this century by the Roman Catholic, Grisar, and others, which throw light on the inner conflicts and growth of the Reformer's ideas prior to 1517. "Destiny" is left somewhat vague: the psychological method of the author gives no standard by which to appraise Luther. "Let us not judge Luther," says M. Febure: "for which Luther is it to be? Or by what code—his or ours?" (p. 313). The style is vigorous, but the translation somewhat annoys by its Americanisms and the proof-reading, especially of Latin quotations, has been slovenly done. The bibliography is confined to German and French works. Now, in English, we have a book every book-lover will read and read again.

R. B. H.

SIX POETS.*

It is one of the functions of poetry to awaken the mind's attention from what Coleridge would have called "the lethargy of custom" and to direct it to the loveliness and the wonders of the world around. Differing widely in style and method, each of the six poets whose work is before us would be willing to admit some such definition of his aim and purpose.

The most considerable of the six is Mr. F. L. Lucas. Mr. Lucas defeats the lethargy of custom by the extreme clarity of his writing. His thoughts and feelings are expressed with the perfection of clearness. He has the gift, seen very markedly in his skill with epigrams, of a fine preciseness. Take this two-line epigram:

> "Here lies—and yet what matters now my name,
> When all my life's forgot? 'Tis all the same."

* "Marionettes." By F. L. Lucas. 5s. (Cambridge University Press.)—"First Poems." By Philip Henderson. 3s. 6d. (Dent.)—"Collected Songs and Lyrics." By the Hon. Stephen Coleridge. 5s. (Bodley Head.)—"Collected Poems." By Millicent Wedmore. 7s. 6d. (Ingpen & Grant.)—"Eve and Other Poems." By Teresa Hooley. 3s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)—"Light in Six Moods." By George Rostrevor Hamilton. 3s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

or these lines from " Pygmalion and Galatea " :

" Sleep on ; the lifeless face is loveliest,
Whose blind eyes show no soul, bid no heart ache.
. . . There are harder loves than stone.
It is insentient loveliness alone
That leaves no pang."

In one of his verses Mr. Lucas bemoans the lack of clearness that is found in poetry to-day. Our age, he says :

" Thinks all verse beautiful that is not plain ;
Building, like Daedalus, labyrinths to contain
Each an abortion and a Minotaur."

In his tilt against the Modernists and Vers Libre, would Mr. Lucas include Mr. Philip Henderson ? These " First Poems "—mostly in vers libre—are unusually interesting. Verses like " Wind " and " Rhapsody on a Windy Night " contain in themselves the proof that the method is part of the effect. Were the thought set into rhyme or bound up in a patterned rhythm, the inner unity of the poem would have gone. Already in " First Poems " Mr. Henderson has his material in good control. His future work may take him far.

Miss Millicent Wedmore and the Hon. Stephen Coleridge are much more content to keep to the beaten pathway. Mr. Coleridge, indeed, in his songs to Gloria and the fair Desideria, is conventional to the point of weariness. The phrasing runs smoothly and the lines have a singing note, yet nothing very vital comes through. Miss Wedmore has a sense of style that gives distinction to her verse. She is best in her rendering of the old tales and legends of Provence, a land which she knows well. " Jarjaille of Arles " and the sonnet in praise of the poet Frédéric Mistral are typical of her work in this field. To other verses she gives a Cornish setting, and she has a good deal of facility in the type of verse known to the eighteenth century as " occasional."

Teresa Hooley is a true lover of nature, but the lethargy of the customary phrase at times envelops her. She sings of birds and flowers and twilight, of—

" A cottage grey
On a misty mountain-side,"

and—

" A little shell upon the sand
Too beautiful to understand."

The verses are sincere and simple and musical, but had the emotion undergone a little hardening, the effect would have been heightened.

It is, on the other hand, our complaint against Mr. Hamilton that his verse is too intellectualised. He is by nature a philosophic poet: his approach to beauty is through thought. In part-consequence of this, he is attracted to occasional archaisms of language, words and phrases like " flame-light " and " helmed with courage." His writing, notably in such poems as " Psalmist " and " The Log," contains the material rather than the final essence of poetry.

M. A. S.

THE SOLDIER'S MIRROR—HIS SONGS AND HIS HUMOUR.*

If a writer, a born writer, found himself in a lonely cottage on Dartmoor, having with him for literature only a Bradshaw and no friend within fifty miles, in a week, even if the writer made no conscious effort, that cottage would have books on every shelf and window-seat. The same apparent miracle took place in the middle of the hardest fought war in history. What more unlikely place than the Front could have been imagined in which to find a printing-press, compositors, copy, authors, artists, block-makers !

The longing for news, for reading matter, and the desire for expression in a way natural to the race has resulted in newspapers becoming part of our daily life ; but the production of this bit of rag-time was due to more and other than what gave us the ordinary newspaper. The Wipers Times was an outlet. Those who were happy enough to be employed on it escaped for the moment from the grim realities by which they were surrounded—and the same with those who read.

Portrait by Raphael.

Miss Millicent Wedmore, daughter of Sir Fredk. Wedmore.

As a paper the Wipers Times cannot be judged by the usual standards, any more than can the Feathered World or the Tailor and Cutter. It is a paper by experts for experts and much is lost on those who were not playing the game of War. Such gems as the short stories :

" It was Xmas morning in the trenches !
M-m-m-m-m-"

and :

" There was once a teetotal Q.M. . . ."

or the limericks :

" There was once a young man of Avesnes
Took a stroll down a long shady lesnes,
He trod on a dud,
Half buried in mud . . . !
He never will do it agesnes."

or :

" quick rise for a smart young man,"

reach us all ; but most of the Wipers Times is for those who, being in the neighbourhood at that time, could recognise the allusions. To the ordinary reader the War paper suffers from two drawbacks. It is written too much on one note and it is a solid and well-bound book. If one number, grubby and dog-eared, had been fished out of the twopenny tray of a bookstall—what a glorious find !—but this is too much of a good thing.

The paper is interesting as a specimen of British humour, a humour very different from that of the French. They must have turned the pages of the Wipers Times with a sardonic wonder as to whether our cheerfulness would have been so marked if the War had started in Norfolk or Kent. It is difficult for a Frenchman to grasp the British point of view. An English regiment adopted Lissauer's " Hymn of Hate " as a marching song and as they swung along sang " Gott strafe England " with tremendous effect but somewhat to the bewilderment of their allies.

Other songs of soldiers and regiments have been

* The Wipers Times. Published by Nash & Grayson. 8s. 6d.—" Songs and Slang of the British Soldier." (Eric Partridge.)

collected by John Brophy and Eric Partridge, but only about seventy pages out of two hundred are given to the verse, the rest being used for essays on it and a glossary.* The soldier does not appear to have a sense of the beauty of words. Hardly a line in the collection is poetry. Occasionally there is an unexpected twist, as in:

> "Old soldiers never die,
> Never die,
> Never die,
> Old soldiers never die—
> Young ones wish they would."

Many of these marching ditties are of course legacies from the past. They have been adapted from the songs of the men who fought under Wellington, Marlborough and farther back. Undoubtedly "Madame, have you . . . ?" was once "Inky Dinky Derby Ram."

In these two books we have mirrored for us the mind of the officer and the soldier—simple men doing a hard job with cheerfulness and good will and an indomitable courage.

C. A. DAWSON SCOTT.

MEMOIRS OF MARIE CORELLI.†

That Marie Corelli was a product of her own time, even if many of her ideas were ahead of it, is clearly shown in Miss Vyver's very ably written story of the novelist's life. For this reason, apart from any other consideration, one doubts whether her books will be read very much in future, despite their immense popularity during her life. Nobody has stepped into her place; the fashion in fiction has so changed that nobody could do so; it changed before her last books were published, and her reputation lives on those earlier works, "The Romance of Two Worlds," "The Sorrows of Satan," "The Mighty Atom," "The Master Christian," and others that in their day were torn to shreds by the critics and enthusiastically applauded by a very large section of the reading public.

Even her enemies would have been willing to admit that she won success entirely on her own merit and in defiance of a hostile press such success as brought her homage from many celebrities, including royalty. To the end she looked upon reviewers as her deadliest foes, and after the attacks made on her earlier publications, refused to allow any review copies of her books to be sent out. Her childhood was spent under the shadow of Box Hill, in a house long since burnt to the ground, close to the ivy-covered house where Meredith used to live. She was a happy though a lonely child, and, even after she and her father and Miss Vyver had moved to London, intended to devote her life to music. Later, however, she turned to writing, and with her first book, "The Romance of Two Worlds," created something of a sensation. Her own life, in its sudden fame and leap from comparative poverty to riches earned by her own pen, was itself not unlike the story of a novel. Not until after her father's death did she and Miss Vyver remove to Stratford-on-Avon, where she remained, rendering services to the town for Shakespeare's sake, so long as she lived.

Miss Vyver is an excellent biographer, sympathetic, unobtrusive, animated by a love for her friend which, though not put into words, reveals itself on every page and is a magnificent tribute to Marie Corelli's character. "With the heart of a child," she says, "she also possessed unconquerable spirit and determination." But the summing up is shrewd: "Also it may be that, though a sense of fun she had in plenty, she was somewhat deficient in a sense of humour." Perhaps in this deficiency lay Marie Corelli's strength; it enabled her to say in her youth, "I'll be as unlike anybody else as I can!" and to try to live up to that maxim throughout her life. Without it her books might never have attained such enormous popularity. For the art of making other people take you seriously, is to take yourself seriously first.

A. A.

* A revised and enlarged edition will shortly appear.

† "Memoirs of Marie Corelli." By Bertha Vyver. 21s. net. (Alston Rivers.)

The Music Room, Manor Croft.
Painted by W. W. Quatremaine.
From "The Memoirs of Marie Corelli," by Bertha Vyver (Alston Rivers).

FROM ACROSS THE SEA.*

To read a translation is always a mental adventure. The stranger does not look at life from our angle, and consequently may open for us fresh avenues of thought. We know to weariness what our folk believe with regard to history, but does the European accept our point of view? Probably not. Well, then, let us hear what he has to say.

Here are three books, books from Spain, Denmark and Russia, and two are historical novels. Ivan Lukash takes us from 1790 to 1825, while Karen Bramson occupies herself with wars later than the Napoleonic—indeed with that which is known to us as the Great War. We can learn from them what Russia thought of the man her flames and her winter broke, and how a Danish mind regards the later outbreak of mass hatred. The third book can be dismissed in a few words, for it is a well written but not particularly interesting account of a woman's life from childhood to age. Esclava is the daughter of a sailor who for insufficient reasons quarrels with his wife and drives her from his house. The child eventually marries, without her father's consent, a young officer. The couple have their ups and downs, the man being incompetent and the woman rather spineless. Children are born to them and it becomes increasingly difficult to make both ends meet. In the end the woman's relatives make her a small allowance, and with that and a granddaughter she returns to the house in which she was born, and settles down to write the simple story of her life.

* "The Handmaid of the Lord." By R. M. Tenreiro. 7s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)—"Men." By Karen Bramson. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)—"The Flames of Moscow." By Ivan Lukash. Translated by N. Duddington. 7s. 6d. (Martin Secker.)

Karen Bramson, the author of "Men," is better known in England as a dramatist than by her novels. "Tiger Cats," with its force, its violence, could not fail to arrest attention, but owing to its hysterical unreality it did not command success. Behind the work was a mind filled explosively with ideas, and people were willing to consider these. The crudity with which they were developed, however, prevented anyone from taking them seriously. Such a writer stimulates but does not convince.

"Men" is interesting as a Scandinavian view of the European upheaval of 1914. Though written in the form of a novel, the story is slight. Karen Bramson has used her hero as a peg on which to hang her views. She takes him travelling and gives her opinions of the countries through which he passes. The War comes and she—this time without the help of her hero, reveals to us the mind of Kaiser William and the reactions of his people. When she attempts to draw English life she does it so badly that the book becomes farcical. The hero, who is a Dane, is naturalised and becomes a Member of Parliament—all in what his friend Lord Stanleigh rightly terms "a dizzy jump." His maiden speech is so laughably absurd that the reader begins to wonder whether anything in such a carelessly written book can be of value.

But if "Men" is disappointing, "The Flames of Moscow" makes up by its reality for the shortcomings of the other. The translator has been kind enough to give on the first page a useful historical note. From this we turn to a story so intently felt and observed that it is difficult to believe that Ivan Lukash was not present at the scenes he has described. The main character in the book is Napoleon. The main incidents are the march on Moscow after Borodino, the strange lingering in that city of the Corsican, and his disastrous retreat. Why did Napoleon linger in Moscow after its burning? He had arrived on September 2nd, 1812. Certainly he obtained a truce from Alexander, but that led nowhere. What was he doing between his arrival and that edge of winter on which he left?

Ivan Lukash has the gift of vivid writing. He begins his book with an unforgettable picture of the last days of the Tsar Paul. He ends it with as fine and convincing an account of the abortive revolution of 1825. It is to be hoped more of Mr. Ivan Lukash's Russian historical novels will be translated, that he will take us with him across the century that has intervened since Constantine abdicated to make way for Nicholas. "The Flames of Moscow" is a proof that not only is a fine literature growing up under the Soviets, but that the exiled sons of Russia have also in them "the root of the matter."

C. A. D. S.

SIX FOREIGN NOVELS.*

The charge of insularity can no longer be legitimately made against us, if the proportion of foreign books published in England bears any relation to our interest in the literature of other nations and is not merely an indication of publishers' enterprise. Here before me are six novels, representing six languages—French, German, Danish, Spanish, Norwegian and Russian. Three of these books are the work of well-known writers, and it would not be unreasonable to expect a certain measure of success to attend their publication. André Gide, for instance, whose influence on his own generation was scarcely as great as it is on the young writers who are only on the threshold of modern French literature, is a writer who, since the publication in English of "The Counterfeiters," may look to an English public. Sigrid Undset too, since the Nobel Prize was conferred upon her and her long novel, "Kristin Lavransdatter," was proclaimed to be one of the greatest novels of our time, has established her claim to our suffrage.

Hugo Wast, the Argentine writer, less well known in England, has already achieved success in North and South America, and his works have circulated to the tune of three million copies all over the world. The perusal of "The Strength of Lovers" makes the reason for this popularity evident. The author is a born story-teller; his narrative, dealing with the love of the Indian King Mangoré for the Spanish Lucia Miranda, moves surely; it is exciting, full of colour, passion, and what is called "the human note." A good story, told without subtlety, but unsentimental.

In the cases given, then, publishing was no more than an average business risk. But in the case of the other three books, hazard played a greater part. Who is Gustav Frenssen that Messrs. Harrap should venture to bring out a closely printed book of nearly 600 pages by him? An author esteemed in Germany among the older generation for a couple of books which find honourable mention in literary histories—"Jörn Uhl" and "Hilligenlei"; an excellent teller of stories, with a breadth of style and power to evoke interest in the apparently trivial which recalls Dickens. "Otto Babendiek" is written in the leisurely manner common to autobiographical novels, but it is in no sense tedious. It is a book for long, mind-free winter nights. The translator, Mr. Huntley Paterson, has done his work well, if his version is as faithful as it is fluent.

The ideal translation has three predominant qualities: it is faithful, it is fluent, it preserves the characteristics of the original. I have no hesitation in dismissing the first of these as the least important, important though it be. Fluency seems to me essential; the reader ought not to be reminded every now and then that he is reading a translation. The preservation of the style of the original is scarcely less important and much more difficult to achieve, demanding from the translator not only a keen sense of the original author's style, but the power to transmute it into another language. André Gide's style, clarity itself, smooth, subtle and ingratiating, is not easily conveyed by an English version; but Dorothy Bussy, who translated his deliciously ironical "L'Ecole des Femmes," has caught a good deal of its flavour. One or two details puzzle me. Why has the name of Eveline's friend Rosita been changed to Ariella? Why were the Italian primitives in the Spanish Chapel turned into Pre-Raphaelites, and why has the date (page 12), April 7th, 1908, been substituted for April 9th, 1894, thus making the second part, which ought to be "twenty years after," a bare six?

The translation of J. Anker Larsen's "A Stranger in Paradise" is not so satisfactory. No doubt it was a difficult task to render this strange, poetical, rather cloudy work into convincing English, but there is a certain slovenliness in the formation of the sentences which reveals the unpractised hand, e.g. 'It is very difficult to define between friendship and love" and "The sunchild smiled, and there were two cherries—that was good then he would give them both away." But those who derive pleasure from a fanciful story in which more is suggested than is revealed will enjoy this account of the life and death of Hans Larsen, a mystic whose charm and power are not inadequately portrayed. I see that Messrs. Knopf, in this and other books, have adopted the suggestion made by the P.E.N. Club that the original title should be given as well as the title of the English version—a procedure which obviates misunderstandings. Wilde's "The Importance of Being Earnest" is rechristened "Bunbury" in Germany, and Shaw's "Arms and the Man," "Helden" (Heroes), while we call Sudermann's "Heimat" (Home) "Magda" and in many other cases use titles for foreign works which give no clue to the originals.

"The Fiery Angel" is the work of Valeri Briussov, a Russian author who died in 1924. He is the "accepted head of the symbolist school of Russian poetry," we are told, and therefore, we may assume, not much in favour with the present young Russians to whom the couple of

* "The School For Wives." By André Gide. 6s. (Knopf.)—"Jenny." By Sigrid Undset. 3s. 6d. (Knopf.)—"The Strength of Lovers." By Hugo Wast. 7s. 6d. (Longmans.)—"Otto Babendiek." By Gustav Frenssen. 10s. (Harrap.)—"A Stranger in Paradise." By J. Anker Larsen. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)—"The Fiery Angel." By Valeri Briussov. 7s. 6d. (Humphrey Toulmin.)

decades which preceded the War are anathema. In truth, "The Fiery Angel" rather falls between two stools. If it is a work of profound philosophical import, its significance is so veiled by unintelligible symbolism that it misses fire; whereas, taken as a story of mediæval Germany dealing with demon possession, witchcraft and devilry of all kinds, it is curiously unexciting. Dreadful deeds and amazing happenings are described in detail, but with so much verbiage and apparently with so little point that a certain sense of tedium comes over the reader. And yet the book is well written and the translation smooth; the author is patently sincere and convinced of his message. It is the message which fails to get through.

HERMON OULD.

CORREGGIO AND THE TATE GALLERY.*

Correggio, one of the Italian masters of the late Renaissance who was most admired by our forefathers, is to-day in danger of being classed with Guido Reni and Carlo Dolci as a painter too unspeakably sentimental to be genuinely admired by any self-respecting art-student. His great wall-painting in the Dome of Parma Cathedral, praised by Mengs in the eighteenth century as "more beautiful than all the cupolas that have been painted before or since," is now looked upon coldly by the sophisticated spectator, who regards its technical feats of foreshortening, perspective and the like as a clever but rather superficial piece of trickery worthier of an "illusionist" or conjurer than of a great artist.

The tourist, obedient to the directions of his guide, may be impressed by the spectacle of legs seeming to dangle out of the roof of a sacred edifice, but the art-scholar turns away in something nearly approaching disgust and escapes from Correggio's Cathedral into the adjoining Baptistery, where he can admire a wonderful series of Byzantine paintings, missed by ninety-nine out of every hundred visitors to Parma.

If Correggio is to be admired at all to-day, it is for reasons very different to those which made him the darling of our great-grandfathers. As in the case of the Eclectics who succeeded him, Correggio's sentimentality is something we have to put up with as best we can; but, again like the Eclectics, we can often find something that gives us real joy if we disregard his figures and concentrate on his landscape backgrounds. In his famous "Noli Me Tangere" we must admire the tremendously expert pose and placing of the two figures, which form so soundly constructed and ingenious a pyramidical design; but having paid tribute to the engineering skill shown in the structure, our eyes gladly wander away from the figures to dwell on the delightfully wooded hill and river scene which the artist has painted so tenderly in the background. It is the same with many of his other religious pictures and generally speaking it may be said that his smaller paintings are those most enjoyable to modern tastes.

If anybody could revive interest in Correggio it would be that able and accomplished Italian critic, Signor Corrado Ricci, whose exhaustive book on the life and work of the master has now been translated into English. Accompanied by 296 reproductions in collotype, this gives the fullest revelation of Correggio's art that any student could desire. The only thing it cannot do is to reveal Correggio's colour to those who do not know his originals; but Signor Ricci explains his methods and technique so well that an intelligent reader can pretty well follow the master's brushwork.

There was a time not so many years ago when the Tate Gallery as a whole was also considered to be far too full of sentimental pictures of small æsthetic appeal. All that is changed now, and in the Tate Gallery of to-day we have a collection which not only displays representative examples of all that is best in British contemporary art, but also includes an important section of works by the most distinguished modern painters of France and other countries.

Mr. James B. Manson, the new Director of the Tate Gallery, has recently written a very admirable volume about the gallery over which he now presides. His text gives an authoritative account of the formation of the gallery and the development of the collection. His review of its contents begins with Hogarth and the Early British School and ends with an illuminating chapter on "Gauguin and Van Gogh." Among the intervening chapters two of very special interest and value are those about the New English Art Club and "The Modern Spirit," both of which will be very helpful to all who wish to gain a more intimate understanding of the art of such admirable painters as Sickert, Steer, Lucien Pissarro, Stanley Spencer, etc. Many readers will wish that more of the Victorian pictures had been left out and more paintings by modern artists like Harold Gilman and Spencer Gore had been included—for unquestionably the latter are far more worthy of colour reproduction than the former. An unfortunate omission is the lack of an index to the illustrations in monochrome, which are often more important and more interesting than Punch, or May Day! (Haydon).

From "The Tate Gallery," by J. B. Manson (Edinburgh: Jack).

* "Correggio." By Corrado Ricci. 31s. 6d. (Warne.)—"The Tate Gallery." By J. B. Manson. 42s. (Jack.)

the colour plates. Mr. Manson sets so high a standard in his scholarly yet most readable text that one cannot help feeling he deserved more and better illustrations.

FRANK RUTTER.

THE ART OF FLYING.*

Lieutenant-Colonel Henderson, the pilot of the passenger-carrying Junker's monoplane that crashed at Meopham on its way from Le Touquet, was acknowledged to be one of the most cautious and skilled pilots in the world. He learned to fly at Hendon in 1915 and served afterwards with distinction in the Royal Flying Corps and Royal Air Force. He relinquished his commission in 1919 and joined the Daimler Airways. He was a supreme individualist, of tenacious loyalties, and when the Imperial Airways was formed he refused to transfer his services to the new company. Instead, he broke away and set up his own flying school at Brooklands.

When he wrote this book, not long before he died, he had behind him over five thousand hours of flying experience. He has produced a complete course for aviators, concisely written, packed with knowledge, and rich in wisdom. He quickly gains the confidence of his readers, as he did of his pupils. His manner is quiet, patient and instinct with sympathy. Instruction, he held, should be slow, but sure. "The pupil," he says, "who wishes to loop, roll and spin on his first solo, may, as far as I am concerned, look elsewhere for his training." He was not one of those pilots whom long experience afflicts with over-confidence. He never failed to remember that a moment of carelessness in the air may bring disaster, and that, in flying, "once is enough for most people."

He took a keen interest in each of his pupils, not from curiosity, but because he judged that the more he knew about their peculiarities, the better he could shape his methods of instruction. To everyone who aspires to pilot an aeroplane, or who wishes to take an intelligent interest in an activity of increasing importance, this book can be recommended with complete confidence.

H. A. JONES.

THE GAME OF GAMES.†

Sooner or later in their careers tennis stars write their reminiscences or become the authors of handbooks on "How to Improve your Game." For the tennis enthusiast these volumes—by Mlle. Lenglen, Señorita de Alvarez, W. T. Tilden—cannot be too numerous. At their best they contain useful hints that may be turned to practical account, and at their lowest they provide attractive photographs of the player in play. H. W. Austin's book is unusually interesting—partly for its photographs (he himself is good material for any camera) but, more lastingly, for its easy, vivacious style. Austin was already coming into prominence as a player when he went up to Cambridge in the autumn of 1925. His first "Wimbledon" was in 1926. From that time he has steadily advanced into the front rank and has raised hopes that, if he can stay the pace of a five set match, he may retrieve from France or America the world-titles which they have taken from England and divided between themselves during the past few years. As a member of the Cambridge team Austin has visited Holland and Germany, and in the Davis Cup team he has played in France, Poland, Hungary and America. Interesting anecdotes from these travels and from a world tour which took him to Australia and New Zealand are to be found in this book.

Mr. Wallis Myers is the founder of the International Lawn Tennis Club of Great Britain, and in this handsome volume which he has written for the Lonsdale Library he emphasises the international vogue of the game. "'Hands across the net' has come to mean 'hands across the ocean.'" A good part of the book is devoted to the theory and practice of stroke production. There are chapters on footwork, the service, volleying and lobbing, and a useful section discusses tactics in doubles. Some seventy photographs of the leading players in play complete the volume.

M. A. S.

An Icelandic lady in national dress.
From "Across Iceland," by Olive Chapman (Bodley Head).

FROM THE NORTH.*

There is not much gaiety about this—the first of Falkberget's books to be translated into English. It is an elemental story of Norwegian life, wherein some of the characters long to live among the mountains, while others prefer the plains. Unfortunately Lisbeth of the mountains has, in order to do the dramatic thing and thus work upon Sivert the pastor, with whom she is in love, married a valley man, one Björn. And throughout the book we follow the struggle between mountain and valley, which are represented by various persons who act in a somewhat uncompromising, not to say brutal fashion. We become almost as accustomed to blows as they must have been; the pages have little that is light or cheerful. Indeed if this is a true picture of Norwegian life, then we have very little desire to learn more about it. There are books whose characters become our friends, so that we grieve when we turn the last page, but this cannot be said of Falkberget's gloomy novel.

One is more attracted by "Peace," another novel translated from the Norwegian. So much fame has been won in his own country by Arne Garborg, the author, that he was awarded a subscription prize surpassing the Nobel Prize. When one remembers the value of a Nobel Prize and the smallness of the population of Norway, we cannot but admire the enthusiasm that takes such a practical form and that devotes itself to such a lofty object. In fact the rarefied atmosphere that plays over a great part of this particular novel may be too lofty for a good many of us. Garborg makes no concessions. Like Meredith, who put in front of his "Egoist" a first chapter as impenetrable as the Woods of Westermain, a chapter which has proved too great an obstacle to many—so does Garborg fill a considerable portion of the first half of this novel with intensive searchings for heaven and hell. The religious scruples of Enok, his central figure, may not move us as they are intended to do; but if we persevere we shall be rewarded. Gradually the narrow mountain stream widens as it travels towards the plains; tributary streams fall into it, other characters appear and we become more and more absorbed. Enok even becomes so human that he speculates as to murdering his wife, the worthy Anna. It is a coincidence that this rather unusual theme should have been dealt with in two novels simultaneously, for we find it—much more thoroughly worked out, it is true—in Alec Brown's "A Time to Kill." And it is very interesting to compare the treatment of Brown, who is so profoundly influenced by the spirit of Russian literature, with Garborg, who stands outside it. There is much in this novel of Garborg's that remains in the memory. The translation has been flawlessly done

* "A Complete Course of Practical Flying." By Lieutenant-Colonel G. L. P. Henderson. 7s. 6d. (John Hamilton.)

† "Lawn Tennis: Bits and Pieces." By H. W. Austin. 5s. net. (Sampson Low.)—"Lawn Tennis: Its Principles and Practice." By A. Wallis Myers. 12s. 6d. net. (Seeley, Service.)

* "Lisbeth of Jarnfjeld." By Johan Falkberget. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)—"Peace." By Arne Garborg. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)—"Across Iceland." By Olive Murray Chapman. 15s. (Bodley Head.)

A timely book is Miss Chapman's account of her ten weeks in Iceland, during which she experienced much that would have caused a less sturdy traveller to give up the quest. Iceland, the land of fire and ice, as she picturesquely calls it, is now celebrating the thousandth anniversary of her Parliament, and deputations have gone there from Great Britain and other countries. In this age of dictatorships we do well to pay all possible honour to the Grandmother of Parliaments, and it is far easier to pay our devotions by a perusal of Miss Chapman's pages than by taking ship across the tempestuous Northern Atlantic. Miss Chapman's account of the voyage does not, despite the kindliness of her fellow-travellers, make us yearn to follow in her track; and after you have finally landed you do not find yourself in a place where life flows very easily. On the other hand the hardships are mitigated by the general amiability of the Icelanders. In Miss Chapman's pages we do not discover more than a simple kind of humour and a straightforwardness that is not very alluring. The literary graces are not in her. As a compensation of a sort we feel that the dialogues with the natives are truthfully reproduced. She certainly had a good deal to occupy her time, what with the perils and dreariness of the road; and she was also busy with painting Icelandic scenes, some of which are here reproduced. Perhaps the photographs give a better idea of the wonders she saw, the magnificent waterfalls, the precipices and the grandeur of the mountains of eternal snow. This unassuming book is a short contribution to the story of a very estimable people.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

INCIDENT AND CHARACTER.*

The modest little girl, taught that the elephant had a massive trunk but no tail to speak of, rewrote her knowledge thus: "The Elliphant has a tail, but we do not mention it." In which sense, the crook-story has likewise no character-analysis to speak of. It is built on psychology of course; but it will fall in ruin if its foundations are allowed to be seen.

Miss Mildred Cram,
Author of "Madder Music" (Harrap).

I allude to first-rate work. There is a lower type of crook-story writing, much commoner, which solves the problem of psychology by ignoring it; and it is fairly easy to concoct such a puppet-show—a mere objective list of physical incidents: matter without mind, as one might say: shocks et praeterea nihil. It is less easy to create real flesh-and-blood characters; and less easy still to embroil these convincingly in some sensational plot—a murder story, say—and thereafter to handle and develop them without impeding such a plot's swift action.

In fact, this always seems to me the touchstone of your crook-story writer. Can he imagine real characters, and then develop them with no machinery of explanation save their own acts and comments? In brief, can he make character implicit in incident? Two murder-stories of the present batch pass this test, built as they are on credible and normal-seeming folk of the English country-side. "Camouflage" is the more ingenious; it opens brightly with rape, death and arrest, and yet contrives to maintain this high level of thrill without descent into crudity. "The Link" is more rich in clue and detail, more involved in its plot; it is no better than "Camouflage" however, for both are first-rate. Readers who recently enjoyed "The Noose" may amuse themselves tracing a resemblance between that and "The Link." Thus, A is to be murdered: B (again a publican, as in "The Noose") knows too much: so it is engineered that B shall appear A's killer: and I suppose the critics will tell Mr. Macdonald that he has repeated himself. It does not strike me like that. The scope of "real" murder-tales, as defined above, is remarkably limited; and if an author can extract two such from one plausible situation, he has achieved more (surely?) than the thrill-botcher who yarks up a dozen fresh situations, without enough plausibility in the lot to serve one.

The two remaining crook-tales are of a lower type, and are also much more uneven in quality. "The Beacon Hill Murders" makes thin reading, because the author never gets his characters beyond the sketching-in stage; one feels he knows what they are like, but has missed imparting his knowledge. In "Garstons," contrariwise, the narrative is somewhat choked by an attempt to make it carry more characters than it needs, by over-elaboration of these characters, and by the curious fact that they are nearly all (including hero and heroine) so unlikeable; in the end "Garstons" turns into a pretty good yarn; but its first seven-eighths want rewriting.

The next two of this most various batch are character-studies—pure and simple, one might say, were not the cliché so particularly and severally erroneous. "Madder Music" deals with American stage-life: centring in Elena Bateman, a popular star, and in her adopted daughter Nancy, who has no artistic ambition, and who in Elena's temperamental circle feels like a fish in the wrong tank. Within its narrow scope the book is cleverly written, the fiasco of Nancy's debut being particularly well done. "Look Homeward, Angel" has a wider sweep, and is altogether more ambitious. It aims at covering a full generation of that kind of small-town family which Sinclair Lewis has revealed to us; and like Lewis, its author is appalled, shocked, wounded by the debility and spiritual impotence of his folk. But he lacks Lewis's equipment, in humour particularly. His discontent is peevish and querulous, where Lewis's is bitter-keen as a sword. He attacks less amusingly, and at far too great length. The book needs drastic cutting; it is a riot of words—especially of adjectives, which march three-deep through its pages; and it shows none of that selection of ideas which is the beginning of craftsmanship; it hardly can so much as mention a smell, without going on to catalogue all the smells in America. It is too preoccupied with dull lechery. . . . After which, let me say bluntly that if Mr. Wolfe fails through inexperience to make the most of his theme, he has at least made of it something which outweighs many shelves-full of slick, competent mediocrity. At his rare best he is magnificent: and is worth reading—all the mass of him—for that best's sake. When he has learned self-discipline, he should produce three or four fine books at least, from the material and observation which he squanders in this.

* "Camouflage." By Laurence W. Meynell. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)—"The Link." By Philip Macdonald. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)—"The Beacon Hill Murders." By Roger Scarlett. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)—"Garstons." By H. C. Bailey. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)—"Madder Music." By Mildred Cram. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)—"Look Homeward, Angel." By Thomas Wolfe. 10s. 6d. (Heinemann.)—"Iron Man." By W. R. Burnett. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

I end with " Iron Man "—the greatest possible contrast. At first this inside story of a professional " pug " seems mere crudity : curt, snappy speech, set in a minimum of curt, jerky narrative : a record, a transcript merely, from which the author's personality seems never to emerge : with no description nor analysis of either appearance or character. Then gradually, as one settles to the book, its stark reality gets hold of one and justifies the author's design. For one perceives that everything—not merely dialogue and specified thoughts, but the whole " feel " of the story—is given as his people think it : and they think as he writes of them ; curtly, crudely, directly. Call his world tiny if you like, it is a microcosm none the less, and he takes you right to the heart of it ; so that within the limits he has set himself, he makes " Iron Man " the cleverest and most convincing story of this group.

GRAHAM SUTTON.

A NATION AXED.*

Many of us have very pleasant recollections of the Tyrol in the days before the Great War. It was one of the happiest, most prosperous and most delightful parts of the Austrian Empire. Cities like Meran and Botzen attracted thousands of visitors yearly, because of their sunshine and radiant surroundings. The Tyrolese, still cherishing memories of Andreas Höfer in their peasant plays, were a sturdy, liberty loving, merry folk.

Italy demanded from England, as part of the price of her adhesion to our side in the Great War, that she should be allowed to annexe the southern Tyrol, thus giving her the Alpine ridge as a protection against invasion from the north.

The southern Tyrol was overwhelmingly Teutonic in tradition, institutions, speech and sympathy. Its population numbered, for every one person of Italian descent, thirteen of German stock. During the peace negotiations the Tyrolese strove hard to prevent incorporation with Italy, but they were powerless. When in November, 1918, General Pecori-Giraldi announced the Italian annexation, he declared that Italy put aside all thoughts of force or oppression towards these people of another race and speech ; the German-speaking districts would retain their German schools and German tongue, and there was to be entire freedom of thought and speech for the administrative officers.

The people of the southern Tyrol met the Italians with sullen, passive opposition. When Mussolini established himself, the Tyrolese found themselves face to face with a more ominous prospect. Their land was to be Italianised, its very name swept away, its language as quickly as possible suppressed, and its institutions destroyed. To this task the Fascisti have set themselves with enthusiasm.

Dr. Reut-Nicolussi, who in " Tyrol Under the Axe " describes the process of transformation, is a lawyer who was for long leader of the Peoples' Party in the Tyrol. He carried on his opposition to the Italian domination until in 1927, arrest imminent, he escaped over the mountain frontier. His story is heart-moving. The once free Tyrol is now a land of political servitude, and its inhabitants exposed to a persecution which extends from forbidding priests to hear confessions in German to terroristic dragooning by the police of the common people. I should like to read the Italian defence, for as it stands Dr. Reut-Nicolussi's indictment shows that defence is very much needed, if judgment is not to go by default.

F. A. M.

THE TEACHER'S MANY PARTS.†

" Probably it will prove impossible for me to write as free from academic restraints as I should like," says Professor Adams in the introduction to his latest book. " But having permanently thrown off my gown and trencher . . . I am in hopes of having reached that Aristotelian state which makes a happy compromise between the stiffness of honoured tradition and the looseness that academics are all too apt to call licence."

The author has succeeded perfectly in his ambition. The two outstanding impressions of the book are the enormous range and variety of the writer's knowledge, and the ease with which he carries his learning. He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow—to a point ; but one cannot help realising that a strong man continually develops new strength and bears the weight of erudition in triumph, with jest and song.

Professor Adams's book deals with the teacher from twenty different points of view, e.g. " The Teacher as Psychologist," " The Teacher as Citizen," " The Teacher as Humorist " and so on. Some of it is critical, naturally, but all the criticisms are friendly and disarming. The author never for one moment allows himself to become angry or indignant ; he has a benignant, almost paternal attitude toward human folly, weakness, and professional bellicosity.

He discusses for example the reasons for the schoolmaster's unpopularity outside his school :

> " We are regarded as a sort of feeble people, who confine ourselves to talking, while other people do things. . . . Being the big man among a race of pygmies [within the school], he is said to become pompous and tyrannical, and to carry this attitude to some degree into his dealings with outside people. . . . A third cause of the low esteem in which teachers are held is the popular belief that there is nothing in the profession. The popular belief is that anybody can teach. . . ."

He quotes from Lord Hugh Cecil, Professor Laurie, Dr. Alington, Mr. Hugh Walpole, Mr. S. P. B. Mais, Mr. H. G. Wells and several other writers who have made pertinent criticisms of the profession, and then sums up. Schoolmasters have themselves to blame for the public under-estimation of their craft.

A teacher who has an exaggerated idea of his importance will find the book distinctly sobering, but the teacher who suffers from excessive humility will find it a healthy stimulant. It has " kick " of both kinds.

R. W.

MORE SURTEES.*

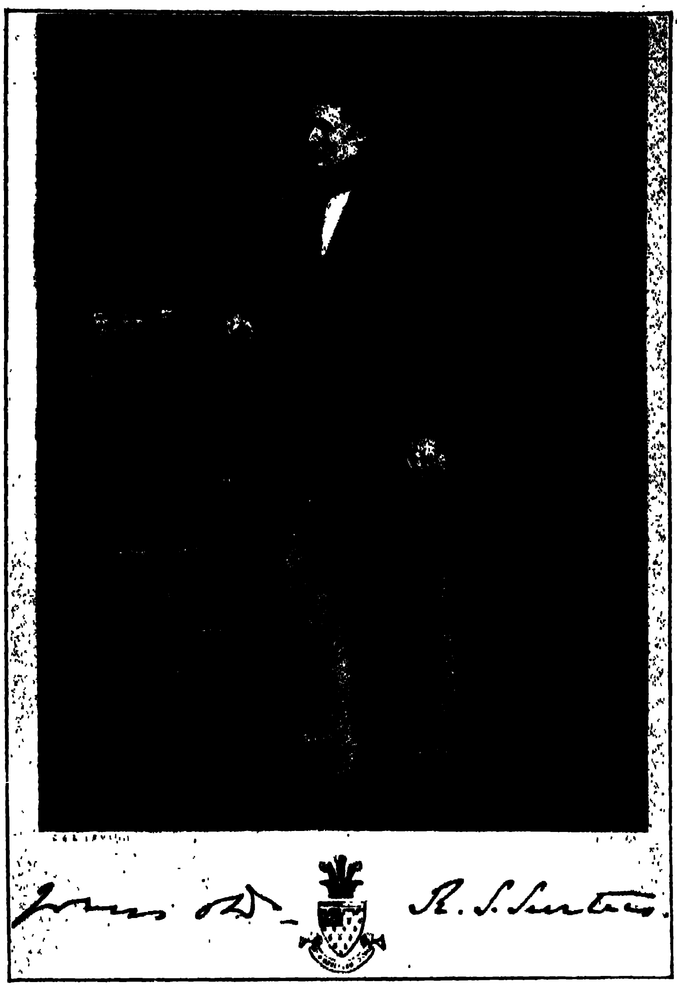
I am glad to find after all that " Hillingdon Hall, or the Cockney Squire," is included in Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode's splendid edition of the novels of Surtees ; for this is the third volume of the odyssey of the immortal Jorrocks, and is necessary for achieving a complete view of him in his last phase as a country squire, when he had travelled far from his early days in Great Coram Street as a grocer, taking then his sporting pleasure as a humble member of the Surrey Hunt, riding to the meet through the Strand, the while the street boys called out : " Crikey, a hunter ! . . . Vere do you turn out to-day ? Vere's the stag ? Vot a vip the gemman's got "—those v's for w's which have so unaccountably disappeared from the phonetics of Cockney language in the course of less than a century. " Hillingdon Hall," originally published in three volumes, also had a serial appearance during 1843–44 in The New Sporting Magazine, where it was illustrated with charming coloured designs by George Tattersall (" Wildrake ") and H. Heath ; the present edition has five additional illustrations in the same style by John Jellicoe. " Hillingdon Hall " has some personal touches, for it airs the author's Protectionist views in the days of the Corn Laws, while the Duke of Donkeyton is said to have been drawn from an all-powerful ducal neighbour in the county of Northumberland.

Next we come to Surtees's greatest work, " Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour," which, as so often has been the case with literary masterpieces, was not at the outset easily placed with a publisher. It was declined by Ackermann and Longman ; but it was accepted by Harrison Ainsworth for serial issue in The New Monthly Magazine (1849–51),

* " Tyrol Under the Axe of Italian Fascism." By Dr. Eduard Reut-Nicolussi. 12s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

† " The Teacher's Many Parts." By Sir John Adams, B.Sc., M.A., LL.D. 6s. (University of London Press.)

* " The Novels of R. S. Surtees." The second 5 volumes, completing the set. £17 10s. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)



for he, with his usual bookish perspicacity, observed of " Mr. Sponge " : " He is a glorious fellow. . . . I have no doubt whatever of the success of the story when brought out with illustrations. It is unquestionably the best sporting novel ever written, and beats ' Nimrod ' all to sticks." Surtees took the hint to look out for a suitable illustrator, and at first he applied to Thackeray, whose designs for " Vanity Fair " he much liked. But Thackeray modestly replied :

> " I was very much flattered by your proposal to illustrate your tale, but I only draw for my own books, and indeed am not strong enough as an artist to make designs for anybody else's stories. You would find my pictures anything but comical, and I have not the slightest idea how to draw a horse, a dog, or a sporting scene of any sort. My friend Leech, I should think, would by your man—he is of a sporting turn, and to my mind draws a horse excellently."

Thackeray's suggestion to employ John Leech bore fruit, and so it came about that the right artist was found for " Mr. Sponge " and Surtees's subsequent novels, for never before or since have sporting stories allied with supreme humour been adorned with such artistic interpretation. Thus at last " Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour " achieved success and enduring fame in 1851. In this work Surtees again challenged Thackeray in the field of his " On Some Country Snobs " with his amusing account of Sponge's visit to Jawleyford Court, while Lord Scamperdale was drawn from the same model as Thackeray used for his Sir Pitt Crawley—Sir William Chaytor, of Witton Castle, Co. Durham. As for Sponge himself, Surtees told Lord Elcho that the shifty gentleman's " modesty " was borrowed from " a certain free-and-easy acquaintance of ours." His object in the story was to decry the steeplechase betting system and " to put the rising generation on their guard against specious promiscuous acquaintances " like Sponge, " whose dexterity in getting into people's houses was only equalled by the difficulty of getting him out again."

" Plain or Ringlets " (1860) also shows some suggestions of Thackeray's influence, for it is as much a social satire as a sporting novel, and a satire of the period when Society wore the most bizarre clothes, both male and female, of all the Victorian era. The immense size and rotundity of the crinoline is a recurring symbol in the narrative and in Leech's delightful illustrations. The early part of " Plain or Ringlets " describes life at Brighton at the acme of the town's prosperity in the late fifties. Surtees generally passed the winter here, and it was at Brighton he died, in his lodgings at Mutton's famous confectionery establishment in the King's Road, on March 16th, 1864, at the age of sixty-one. He had written to the end, and his last work, undimmed in merit and power, " Mr. Facey Romford's Hounds," commenced to appear in monthly parts just as his death occurred. In his illustrations for this work Leech also was again at his best, yet he too died in October this same year (1864), which thus witnessed the sad passing of two of the most humorous delineators of life in the mid nineteenth century. " Phiz " ably supplied the remaining illustrations that were necessary for the completion of " Mr. Facey Romford's Hounds," one of the most vivid presentations of the English country-side.

S. M. ELLIS.

Robert Smith Surtees.
From a portrait sent by his daughter, Eleanor Viscountess Gort.

VITAL HISTORY.*

The common gibe against the critic that he is an unsuccessful creator—" he who can write, does ; he who can't, criticises "—certainly does not hold good of Mr. Kellett. During the last few years Mr. Kellett has become recognised as one of the most scholarly of literary commentators, combining remarkable erudition with an always vital sense of human values. In his latest book he has given full scope to his imagination as well as his intellect, and appears before us in the dual rôle of critic and creator.

" The Conflict " is something distinctive in modern literature. It is not a novel, though it is far more fascinating than most novels. Still less it is formal history, though it contains nothing which in the belief of the author is not substantially true. Mr. Kellett himself describes the book as " saga " ; but, even so, it is saga " with a difference," as the modern advertiser says. The author presents history in the form of a vigorous narrative, using dialogue and other fictional devices as occasional aids. He has achieved the simplicity, without lapsing into the baldness, of the old sagas, and his writing is at once strong and beautiful.

The setting is Northumbria in the seventh century. The ancient kingdom is in its hey-day, prior to its decline before the invasion of Picts and Danes. The Court at Bamburgh and the whole life of the common people, with their mingled heathenism and Christianity, are vividly sketched in ; and, against a background strangely compounded of civilisation and superstition, the first struggle in England between king and priest is staged. The combatants are Egfrith, King of Northumbria, and Wilfrid, Bishop of York—the latter a more dominating figure than Becket five centuries later. The conflict indeed is a dual one. There is the outward struggle between Egfrith and Wilfrid, who is ambitious to attain wealth and prestige for the Church and (through the Church) for himself ; and and there is the inner conflict between two different forms of Christianity. Wilfrid's allegiance is to Rome, while the faith of Egfrith—inasmuch as it has displaced the Thor-worship which still struggles in his bosom against the new religion—is derived from the Lindisfarne school. Cuthbert, the last representative of that gentle, simple, holy but too unpractical tradition, is among the host of minor figures who live for us in Mr. Kellett's pages.

Mr. Kellett gives us a vital glimpse of the past. His book is rich in characterisation, in drama, and in unforgettable scenes. But it is also full of significance for to-day. Mr. Kellett realises that, however much externals may change, human nature remains fundamentally the same. Upon a seventh century stage he presents a problem that is old but perennially new. How are we to evolve a Christianity that is neither too worldly nor too cloistered? The question has yet to be answered. G. T.

* " The Conflict : A Saga of the Seventh Century." By E. E. Kellett. 12s. (Constable.)

GREEKS, ROMANS AND OTHERS.*

In the course of his attractive essays Mr. Sargeaunt more than once finds occasion to mention Walter Pater, but even without such reminders his readers would be likely often to remember the "Renaissance." Not that there is any particular similarity in the styles of the two books. In Mr. Sargeaunt's straightforward and pleasant writing there is none of Pater's brooding elaboration. It is that in looking back towards the times called classical the younger writer, like the older, is always conscious of what lies between then and now, and especially of the Italian Renaissance. Also, like Pater, he is as much interested in the plastic and pictorial arts as in literature; and perhaps in the art of life above all.

Among his subjects therefore, side by side with studies of Plato's "Laws," Cicero's correspondence, and the "substance of Greek tragedy," we find "The Classic Pastoral and Giorgione" and "Classical Myths in the National Gallery." In the first-named, taking Giorgione's Fête Champêtre—surely more usually called the Concert?—as his starting-point, and quoting Rossetti's sonnet on it, he discusses the nature of pastoral in poetry and painting, as illustrated by Theocritus, Virgil and the Venetian painter. His differentiation between the Sicilian and the Mantuan is an admirable example of the comparative method in criticism:

"The passages in the pastoral life which Theocritus selects are for the most part only true to nature or life in a secondary degree; they interpret, not the country life over which trouble and toil and uncertainty are always imminent, but a certain aspect of the consciousness of the city dweller, not wholly satisfied with his own mode of existence and seeking distraction in the choice moments of a different life, where the emotions are shown as fanciful and novel characters and in musical surroundings. . . .

"The pastoral poetry of Theocritus is not an interpretation of life, not even of pastoral life. . . . His poetry is rather a refuge from life, something that holds the attention and charms the thoughts, without stirring the emotions, realistic in detail without touching the deeper reality of the country and life in it."

On the other hand Virgil's

"relationship to the country is personal, and carries with it a force of emotion that Theocritus never achieves; the more humble and permanent facts of country life, the varied pageantry of cloud and shadow on hill and plain, make the beauty of song in the midst of nature more real and lasting. . . .

"The Eclogues of Virgil present, not the pastoral life as a moment of amusement or distraction, but as a certain ideal of civilised life, the passionate enjoyment, with others, in a favoured spot on a summer day, when men, fatigued with the endless series of practical affairs, hope to realise all the possibilities of life, of which they are now conscious, the harmony of inner and outer beauty in the happy union of art and nature."

Giorgione Mr. Sargeaunt finds more akin to Virgil than to Theocritus.

"The pastoral in general lacks what Matthew Arnold called 'high seriousness.' Theocritus never strikes such a note, while it is the presence of this seriousness which makes the pastoral spirit of Giorgione akin to that of Virgil. It is a quality of his colour felt in the whole and in the individual figures and forms of nature, just as it pervades the Virgilian hexameter, passing from these formal or structural elements into the subject represented and endowing it with a deep significance. . . . There is a sense of sadness in the comment which both these artists make upon the beauty to be realised in such a life, coming from the same quality of artistic temperament, worked upon by the same local influences, and warmed by the same racial blood."

I have quoted somewhat at length from a single essay because it seemed that thus might Mr. Sargeaunt's special quality best be illustrated. But it is not suggested that that particular paper is better than its fellows. Equally good for example are "The Greek View of Life," a discussion of the Athenian "Gospel of the Finite" and, what is essentially a kindred piece, "The Eternal Wanderer," a happy vindication of Ulysses against the romantic yearnings imputed to him by Tennyson. One may differ from Mr. Sargeaunt on points of detail—for instance, I do not believe that Poussin's nymphs and satyrs are "joyless"—but he is an extremely stimulating writer.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

* "Classical Studies." By G. M. Sargeaunt. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE JESUITS.*

The great mistake most people have made about the Jesuits is one that many people make about women, or about the inhabitants of foreign countries. Such idle generalisations as "Isn't that like a woman, or an Irishman, or a Jesuit," are by no means redeemed by the fact that occasionally the action animadverted on may, in truth, be very typical of the people so scorned. For the occasional existence of a purely typical woman, Jesuit or Irishman, should warn an intelligent critic to take care to draw no deductions from so rare an example: typical persons are as uncommon as normal people, and much more dangerous for purposes of deduction.

The great merit of Fülop-Miller's rather distracted and desultory volume is that he recognises that two men may be Jesuits and have nothing in common except their membership of that amazing Companionship. Indeed, by and large, two Jesuits are much less likely to be similar than two Freemasons, or two Masters of Foxhounds. It should not be hard for Englishmen to remember this. If Robert Parsons, politician, intriguer, practical, shrewd, diplomatic, was a Jesuit, so was Edmund Campion, saint, poet, hero, and martyr. In very recent days the Order in England has had as its sons men so exceedingly unlike as Gerard Hopkins, Geo ge Tyrrell, Bernard Vaughan, and Fr. Thurston. In fact, the attempt to make all Jesuits of one complexion is scarcely less absurd than the attempt to make all Roman Catholics of the same colour, a task only attempted by those who can see nothing in Rome but the red of wickedness or the purple of pride.

To the student of humanity the Society of Jesus will always be remarkable for two things—the success with which the Jesuits restored obedience to a world that was more and more inclining to think it a slave's virtue, if indeed a virtue at all; and the way in which their missionaries carried to savage peoples the natural virtue of heroic courage. Indeed it will be hard for any Christian, even one most remote from the creed that the children of St. Ignatius prefer, not to hail their missionaries' courage as supernatural. The result is told not only in the blood-stained, tear-watered pages of the Society's own books; but in the books of many writers who have small love for Jesuitry. The most moving sections of Parkman's great history of Canada are concerned with the doings of the Jesuit priests; and no man can write a history of China or Japan, since those countries came into contact with European peoples, without testifying to the amazing beauty of the lives of the Jesuit martyrs. Those men who obeyed perhaps too closely the Dominical injunction to imitate the serpent, were ready to die like maimed doves.

M. René Fülop-Miller.

"Whilst they were hanging on the cross, or, head downwards, were awaiting their end, or were being led to the executioner's block, they continued to preach, up to their last breath, that the Christian faith was the true faith. After all the many victories which they had gained in Japan by their skill and ingenuity, the manner in which they met death for the honour of God would not fail to have lasting effects. Indeed when, many years later, Catholic missionaries were once again permitted to enter Japan, they discovered large communities who secretly confessed Christianity: they were the descendants of those Japanese who had once witnessed the martyrdom of the Jesuits."

* "The Power and Secret of the Jesuits." By R. Fülop-Miller. 21s. (Putnams.)

Jesuit victories in the field of learning, especially of theology, have also been notable, even if their value has been more questioned. It is unfortunate that comparatively early in the history of the Order, the efforts to regularise and codify moral theology should have led to such excesses in thought that the society was challenged by the devastating wit and Christian common sense of Blaise Pascal. Yet subsequent theologians, Protestant no less than Catholic, would admit that Port Royal was wrong in principle when the Jesuits were right. It is sound Christian doctrine, and in evident accord with our Lord's own teaching as shown in the Gospels, that each sinner must be judged separately: every case, in the forum of the confessional, must be a special case. By fixing this the Jesuits did an inestimable service to the general ethical thought of the modern world; and some of us have watched with no little entertainment the laborious efforts of Dr. Freud and his followers to plod on a weary voyage of pedestrian discovery through a country which has been thoroughly mapped, years ago, by the moral theologian.

R. ELLIS ROBERTS.

A GREAT GENERAL.*

It is undeniable that the biographies of famous soldiers, no less than the histories of famous armies and campaigns, have sometimes made tedious and indigestible reading, even for students and enthusiasts. General Weygand's concise and illuminating record of the life, character and achievements of the famous seventeenth century Marshal of France is, apart from its technical merit and historical value, so genuinely readable that it may well be found to appeal strongly, even to readers not usually interested either in biography or the accomplishments of great military leaders. For the brilliant present-day French soldier has here achieved what should be the objective of all biographers, as it is the end reached by relatively few, of making his subject known to us, not simply as a great figure in history, but as a human being, a real person, a fellow man, albeit one of an age three centuries earlier than our own. This is a notable, even a brilliant achievement, and one for which English readers may feel some gratitude, too, to Mr. George B. Ives, whose translation of the masterly French original is competent and satisfying. We may also be grateful for the fact that, big and many-sided though his subject was, General Weygand has shewn soldierly continence and self-discipline in his handling of it.

It is not necessary to enlarge upon the author's qualifications for his task. The greatest of France's modern military leaders, who was so finely served throughout the Great War by General Weygand, his Chief of Staff, would have been warm in welcome for this illuminating tribute to that other great Marshal of France, of whom Napoleon said (in characteristically Napoleonic vein), "Of all the generals who have gone before me, and perhaps will come after me, the greatest is Turenne." The author clearly cherishes for his subject that touch of almost reverential enthusiasm which is so eminently desirable in the biographer; but nowhere does he permit hero-worship to run away with his pen or to dim the shrewd clearness of his vision. Any reader inclined to doubt this, or to hold him partial, should perpend carefully Chapter II of the present volume, with its coolly informing record of the Fronde, and such passages as that beginning: "In our day, when one must not admit any sort of weakness in the face of the enemy . . . Turenne's action would be a crime for which nothing could atone," and concluding, justifiably and finely, as even the purist will admit: ". . . if Turenne has been more severely reprobated than others, it is because his glory has always been so pure that we cannot bear to see it tarnished."

"Turenne died poor. . . . This is explained by the fact that he had not received pay in proportion to his deserts, and by his very great generosity. 'I have never been able to understand,' he said, 'what pleasure one can take in keeping strong boxes filled with gold and silver. If I had a considerable sum left at the end of the year, it would make me sick at my stomach, as if I had to leave the table after over-eating.' If he took an officer's worn-out mount in exchange for a horse from his own stable, he pretended to think that he was making a good bargain."

In a hundred such flashes, the author makes Turenne visible to us, not simply as the great general, but as the man, the comrade, and be it said, the great gentleman. Space does not permit the quotation of striking examples of such features (which make the narrative absorbing), or inclination would prompt borrowing from every chapter of a fascinating book.

A. J. DAWSON.

* "Turenne: Marshal of France." By General Max Weygand. 10s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

A MASTER OF DESTINY.*

Dr. Tilney's interesting volume touches on problems of sociology, and of philosophy as well as of biology; but it is essentially a comprehensive collation and lucid exposition of the facts of phylogeny as viewed and interpreted by orthodox evolutionists and, as such a collation and exposition, is full of interest and instruction. Beginning in the ordinary orthodox way, at the tiny colloid blob, the amœba, he proceeds to trace in the ordinary orthodox way the evolution of man, and especially the evolution of his cerebrum.

According to evolutionary theory, as expounded by Dr. Tilney, the brain was presaged by the scattered nerve cells in the tissue of the sea-anemone—the cells in action there to-day. But the nerve-cells in the sea-anemone do not work in co-operative unity; each works independently, at its own sweet will; and the brain, as a co-ordinated system of cells and fibres working together to fulfil common functions, may be said to be first represented by the nerve-cells and fibres which form a sort of necklace round the rim of the ball of the jelly-fish, and by rhythmical co-ordinated impulses initiate and control its movements. In the jelly-fish too, according to the evolutionary view, we find rudimentary eyes in the form of specks of pigment (ocelli) sensitive to light, which are placed at the base of the tentacles.

The jelly-fish, then, began the brain; but the flat-worm "went one better": it elongated its body, and concentrated a bunch of nerve-cells at its anterior end, and thus invented the round ball of concentrated cells and fibres known in the higher animals as a "brain." In this invention there were all kinds of potentialities; in the insects and crustaceans the complex increased in complexity, enabling bees, and ants and crabs to enjoy a great variety of functions. Organs of taste and smell also developed, and the spot of pigment grew, in some mysterious way, into an eye. At this point, however, difficulties arose, for the evolutionary process had inadvertently arranged the brain-cells round the gullet, and as the brain grew it pressed on the gullet and obstructed it. Hence, according to Dr. Tilney, the bloodthirsty habits of the mosquito. The miserable creature, burdened with too much brains, finds it difficult to swallow and so chooses the richest, most concentrated food it can find.

The fish however (descended from molluscs) adopted a wiser plan: it kept its superior brain in a special brain-box, and passed the idea on to the amphibians and reptiles, each of whom effected improvements.

According to Dr. Tilney, it took seven or eight hundred million years—we are not surprised—for the nerve-cells in the sea-anemone to evolve into the brain of a fish. Wisely he does not say why or how they evolved, but apparently he has no doubt at all about the fact of the amazing transformation.

* "A Master of Destiny." By Frederick Tilney, M.D. (Heinemann.)

After another three hundred million years of evolution in theriodonts and cynodonts, and ant-eaters and lemurs, and tarsioids and simians, there finally came forth the brain of primal man.

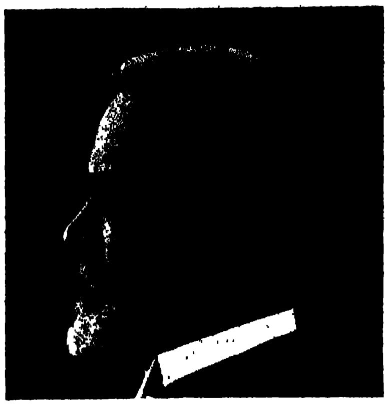
That briefly is the author's biography of the human brain.

The difference between the few scattered nerve-cells in the tissues of a sea-anemone and the millions of co-ordinated cells in the brain of a man, can have been produced only by innumerable permutations and combinations en route; and when we consider that the functions of the human brain include the writing of Shakespearean plays and the composition of Wagnerian operas, we are forced to realise that the distance between the two nerve systems is almost infinite. But Dr. Tilney is a fearless orthodox thinker, and in spite of the fact that Darwinism, and Lamarckism and Weismannism have all been subjected to destructive criticism, and that there is less to be said for genetic evolution now than might have been said a hundred years ago—in spite of that fact, he still tells as gospel the plausible and fascinating tale of the evolution of man and man's brain from an amœba via jelly-fish and monkey. So true is it that " there is something very dear to the human heart in sticking to venerable traditions."

Personally we do not for a single moment agree that any theory of general genetic evolution has been proven, but it is certainly most interesting to note how various organs and functions are represented at different stages in successive groups of animals, and one cannot but admire the accurate and masterly way in which Dr. Tilney has collected, marshalled and presented his facts, even if one disagrees with his interpretations.

The last chapter makes a powerful plea for the development to their full capacity of the intellectual potentialities of the human brain.

Very rarely can one find fault with the wording of the author's statements; but the statement on page four, that the spirochæte " produces changes which destroy the human brain in consequence of a disease known as paresis," is surely open to criticism. There is no disease " paresis." Paresis is one of the symptoms of syphilis, as of some other diseases.



" The Master of Destiny " may be the outcome of the fortuitous transformation of the nerve-cells of a jelly-fish or flat-worm, but the excellent work it has done in the cranium of Dr. Frederick Tilney makes us rather sceptical of the humble origin he claims for it.

RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE.

WAGNER IN EXILE.*

In May, 1849, Richard Wagner, then Kapellmeister to the Court of Saxony, was involved in a Republican uprising which took place in Dresden and led to many arrests and convictions. Wagner fled, by way of Weimar, to Switzerland, evading arrest and thereby avoiding a trial. The author of this book, Dr. Woldemar Lippert, is the Keeper of the Principal Public Archives of Saxony, and was fortunate enough to discover a number of letters and other documents which had not been published, throwing a good deal of light on Wagner's behaviour in exile. For ten years the most Teutonic composer who ever lived was forbidden to enter his native land. King John of Saxony, " the jurist among kings, the king among jurists," with a consistency which in itself cannot be condemned, refused to listen to the appeals which reached him from time to time, and would not even consider the possibility of allowing Wagner to re-enter Saxony until he had stood his trial. It is not easy to estimate to what extent the composer was a serious politician; his flamboyant disposition found expression in immoderate language which probably overstated his true opinions; but the law is no respecter of persons, and when a citizen writes of Revolution as a " sublime goddess," and rhapsodises about her in words like these: and so forth, the law can only regard that citizen as a dangerous person and not stop to consider whether he is a musician of genius. Nine years later, when still fretting in exile and almost despairing of an amnesty, he refers to his political agitation as his " foolish escapades," making light of what had once seemed a serious matter to him. To us the wild-worded Wagner is a more attractive figure than the eater of humble pie who wrote letter after letter to persons in high places, beseeching them to concern themselves with his restitution. But the more we know about Wagner the more difficult it is to construct a convincing picture of him. This lucidly written and well translated book was well worth publishing; but it does little honour to Wagner's memory.

> " The lightning plays round her majestic brow; in her right hand she holds a sword and in her left a torch . . ."

Dr. Woldemar Lippert.

H. O.

* " Wagner in Exile." By Woldemar Lippert. 10s. (Harrap.)

DIVERSIONS IN THE DESERT.*

Mr. Owen Tweedy's " By Way of the Sahara " begins doubtfully, makes good early on, and stays very good till the end. The hardened connoisseur of travel books will be a little uncertain about settling down to a narrative which starts—familiar gambit—with a professional journalist cogitating in his club as to which of the world's wide, open spaces he shall write up next, there encountering a " safari " expert of the type familiar in agony column advertisements, and deciding to throw in his lot with this sporting gentleman in a motor trip from the Sudan to Algiers. A chain of circumstances of this character has provided the genesis of more jejune demy octavos than one cares to think about. However the reader need have no fear in this instance. In the company of Mr. Tweedy, Mr. Crofton and Mohamed Boon the gun-bearer, whose cognomen was no misnomer, he will not be bored.

Already, it seems, a regular motor-omnibus service traverses the wastes of the Sahara in " the season " (which means, simply, the time when there are not so many sand storms as at other times). Where Messrs. Tweedy and Crofton showed their originality was in choosing as the vehicle of their transit not that species of land-liner with balloon tyres and immensely powerful engines evolved by the requirements of this mode of travel, but a common or garden 10-cwt. Chevrolet van—" the stock horror of commercial traffic." There was no single constructional feature of this conveyance that was not utterly unsuited to the conditions of the journey, except that the puny engine had " the heart of a lion." Though everything else was wrong, nothing was more wrong than the tyres, and there, in every sense of the word, lay the rub. " Mais avec des pneus comme ca ! Quelle toupee ! " as the Frenchman said on encountering our travellers in mid-desert, adding for their guidance the golden motto, " Il ne faut jamais batailler avec le sable. On s'enfonce."

This then was the cavalcade that set out from Rejaf on March 13th, 1929 (to the secret dismay of the author, afraid to remind his friend that such a date was not usually considered lucky). They crossed the Nile-Congo watershed, ran north-west 2,000 miles through the

* " By Way of the Sahara." By Owen Tweedy. 12s. 6d. (Duckworth.)—" Sudan Sand." By Stella Court Treatt. 15s. (Harrap.)—" Stampede." By Stella Court Treatt. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Belgian Congo and French Equatoria to Lake Chad, turned west for 1,500 miles through British and French Nigeria to Gao, thence striking due north to tackle the 875 miles of the Saharan sector, ending at Reggan, from which the 1,000 miles still to be covered to Algiers made relatively plane sailing. The trip, of 5,533 miles, occupied exactly seven weeks. An "African Odyssey" indeed, during many episodes of which the reader will follow these adventurers with his heart constantly in his mouth, in sympathy with the bumps and buffetings so vividly recorded by Mr. Tweedy. Cast largely in the form of a journal, his book deserves tribute as a record of unfailing gallantry and good humour, maintained throughout a series of unusual adventures, most of them physically uncomfortable and not a few, as one may read between the lines, extremely perilous.

Mrs. Court Treatt's "Sudan Sand" is in a different category. The business that tool· her and her husband to Africa was, as formerly, the very practical one of producing a new film. There was no need in their case to think out some very difficult adventure and then embark upon it merely because it was difficult and nobody had previously accomplished a precisely similar feat. Making a big film in the wilder parts of Africa is always an arduous adventure, terribly expensive, and sometimes dangerous too, as is here demonstrated. The writer's agony of mind, for instance, can be pictured when Major Court Treatt and two of his workers blew themselves up with the magnesium lighting apparatus, and without any skilled assistance Mrs. Court Treatt had to nurse a husband suffering excruciating pain and in danger of permanent blindness, a peril happily avoided through her instinctive adoption of the right treatment.

Burmese Coolie Women.

From "Love and Sunshine in the East," by Janet Aldis (Herbert Joseph).

The production on an ambitious scale of a film depicting the life and environment of a primitive people demands complicated staff work and considerable enterprise and resource. This is especially the case as regards the human factor, and even Bedouin "stars," it seems, are apt to develop temperaments. On these and a host of other matters interesting to a wider public then the noble army of film-fans Mrs. Court Treatt writes lightly and brightly, though sometimes—"we were the absolute and utter cat's pyjamas"—she is just a little too bright. "Sudan Sand," whatever its defects, is a book easy and pleasant to read.

All that need be said of "Stampede" is to record its advent as "the novel of the film." Both volumes are adorned by a sequence of photographs comprising landscape, animal and figure studies illustrative of the Sudan scene. Excellent photographs too, as might be expected.

Ashley Gibson.

CENTRAL EUROPE.*

One of the most fascinating figures in modern European history was Elizabeth, the wife of Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary. Her tale has often been told, but never more interestingly than in these pages. She had, as is well known, no desire to be popular. "The people do not know," she said resignedly, "what to make of me. I don't suit their idea of an Empress, and they don't like me to upset their notions. So it is better for both sides that we should not meet." Perhaps she might have made a greater effort to fulfil the obligations of her position, especially as she derived from it considerable advantages; had she been born in less affluent circumstances she could, for example, not have acquired that lovely estate on the island of Corfu, which was subsequently to fall into the hands of the last German Emperor, whereupon he immediately threw out the statue which Elizabeth had erected to Heine. We hear of many interesting details. Thus of Ludwig, the mad King of Bavaria (Elizabeth's cousin), we are told that, towards the end, he issued his orders through closed doors, at which the lackeys had to scratch gently in token of their presence; they were not allowed to knock. Those whom he chose to punish had to kneel before him naked or lie upon their bellies. But we need not go to Bavaria for conduct comparable with part of this; there is at this moment an English duke with whom his butler communicates by means of written messages: an answer is scrawled upon them and they are sent back.

On the morning of August 22nd, 1858, a hundred and one guns announced that on the previous evening an heir had been born to the Austrian throne. The delighted father laid the Order of the Golden Fleece in his baby's cradle. But the gravest misunderstandings were to arise between Francis Joseph and Rudolph. Of these and of Rudolph's tragic end the world has already heard a great deal. In this book the Baron von Mitis, a close and lifelong friend, we are told, of the Prince, has certainly given us a human document. Unfortunately it has no index, and thus we are constrained to seek our luck by turning a chance page. Many of those in the Appendix are of great interest; there for example we find the reprehensible King Milan of Serbia writing to Rudolph from Belgrade in

* "The Empress Elizabeth of Austria. By Karl Tschuppik. Translated by Eric Sutton. 12s. (Constable.)—"Crown Prince Rudolph." By Baron von Mitis. 21s. (Skeffington.)—"Fragments of a Political Diary." By Joseph M. Baernreither. 16s. (Macmillan.)—"The Future of the German Empire." By General von Seeckt. 8s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)—"Flood." By Robert Neumann. 7s. 6d. (Putnams.)

1885. Milan, of course, was notoriously pro-Austrian (the Austrian Emperor erected his tombstone, which can to this day be seen in one of the monasteries of the Banat, a district at that time Hungarian and now in Yugoslavia). "Yesterday," says Milan, "I had occasion to see the Russian Minister, who is going to leave. As, on the whole, personal relations with him have always been good . . ." Is it not curious that a king, the King of a Slav country which looked with filial respect at Russia, should be writing in such a strain to the Austrian Heir? In 1879 Prince Rudolph, on the eve of a long journey, made his will, being then twenty-one years of age: "My island Lacroma [now a gem of Yugoslavia] I lay at my father's feet. May he graciously accept it, grant it his protection and allow it to fall into no other hands. . . . I forgive my enemies, all those who, particularly in recent times, have angered me. I have trodden a different path from that of most of my relations. Our age calls for new viewpoints. Everywhere, particularly in Austria, there is reaction, the first step towards downfall. Those who preach reaction are the most dangerous enemies. I warn you against them. . . . A last farewell kiss in spirit to all the beautiful women of Vienna, whom I have so dearly loved!"

The next book on our list is the most absorbing, and it is provided with a most admirable index. Famous names jostle each other in its columns; nor are they included in a vainglorious ambition—of all of them Baernreither has something of interest to tell us. He himself was for many years an Austrian official, a man of exceptional parts. We are taken behind the scenes of Central European affairs. His knowledge of Bosnian affairs was extremely thorough; every year he was accustomed to betake himself not only to Sarajevo and Mostar, but also to Ragusa, Agram (Zagreb) and Spalato, where he came into contact with all sections of the population. When Bosnia and Herzegovina were annexed in 1908 a storm broke out all over Europe. Germany stood by her Austrian ally and the Emperor William, we learn, "displayed great delight over the wrath of his uncle across the channel." It is of the greatest interest in this book to follow the author in his peregrinations; everywhere he meets the leading men, with whom he may or may not agree. In a brief review it is impossible to give anything like an adequate account of these crowded and very important pages. Even for non-experts they are of the utmost interest.

General von Seeckt gives us a rather heavy political essay which is entitled "The Future of the German Empire." We were under the impression that the word "empire" connotes an emperor. Von Seeckt is known as an able person who has served the Republic very well; and his portrait on the jacket, though rather uncompromising and with a monocle in his eye, represents him in mufti. The book is not a very inspired performance, but as a professional disquisition on the machinery of a modern State it has some merit.

The last book on our list is one of the most exciting. It deals with Vienna during the inflation period after the War, when fortunes were easily won and lost, when you reckoned in millions and billions of crowns. It is a very long book—476 pages—but we read on and on; it is as thrilling as the most sensational newspaper. "Birkmeier was arrested for food adulteration and fraud. The sentence specified for two weeks in jail. A labourer named Balaun received four hundred kronen [crowns], reported in Birkmeier's stead and served out the sentence." Throughout this book there are the most flashing vignettes; as in "The Pit" we are placed in possession of all that proceeds in the shadows of big business. Birkmeier in a law court, when the judge and the prosecuting attorney have departed, roars at the eagerly listening spectators. He asserted that he knew where he could get his rights—even in this Jewish Republic [meaning thereby post-war Austria, where as a matter of fact the Jews have less interest than they once had in the Austrian Empire, a more flourishing concern]. All these alien races, he shouted, ought to emigrate to Palestine and a wall should be built around it, patrolled by sharpshooters. "The attendant took him placatingly by the arm. In the rear of the hall De Lettin was eating cheese sandwiches." We obtain an unforgettable picture of Vienna in those distracted years.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

CONTRASTS IN CURRENT POETRY.*

Doubts are being expressed everywhere about the prosperity of current poetry, and they are not wholly unjustified. But none can doubt its vitality. Within recent weeks at least half a dozen new volumes have been issued which are simply teeming with enthusiasm, confidence, enterprise and true poetic feeling. Several of these have been included in the present list, and the fact that their authors have already given us sufficient warranty as poets makes our reading not only delightful but uncommonly interesting, because we are able to observe how different is the outcome of the aforesaid enthusiasm, confidence and enterprise in practitioners working side by side at the same art.

Mr. Edwin Arlington Robinson's and Mr. Richard Aldington's, for example. Those readers who are acquainted with the predecessors of "Cavender's House" in Mr. Robinson's bibliography will know exactly what to anticipate. A long, smoothly flowing narrative in blank verse, full of fine flashes and characterised all through by an absolute lack of anxiety in the poet lest he is accused of writing blank prose; and yet all the while the work is gathering in cumulative effect of high drama and profound emotion which, whenever Mr. Robinson is at his best, establish him anew as one of the finest poets of contemporary America.

The contrast of Mr. Aldington is remarkable. Here is a poet who has also a tale to tell in "A Dream of the Luxembourg." But—

> "Now am I so much moved as I write this > That my hand shakes with excitement," he informs us, and the excitement sweeps him along at a speed which, if we happen to recall "Cavender's House" during our perusal, leaves Mr. Robinson's narrative standing still, so to say. To seek for definitions is to describe "Cavender's House" as the narrative of meditation, and "A Dream in the Luxembourg" as the narrative of impulse. And how sparklingly "A Dream" ripples along! A wideawake dream; a dream of youth and youthful ardour, yet splendidly controlled in both technique and feeling. Mr. Aldington is to be especially congratulated on having overcome the main peril which attends this kind of poetry. He has sublimated what otherwise might have been a very flashy story of fevered passion whose consciousness precludes the innocent springtime raptures; and we speak of this exclusion in spite of a passage that may be quoted as illustrating the author's method, and in which he claims that—

> "Nothing like it has ever happened in the world before—
> That two lovers should meet in a small house in France,
> Alone together between sea and land and sky,
> And the heart of at least one of them
> Pouring out tenderness and devotion and desire
> Like the tall fountain in the Luxembourg,
> Perpetually pouring and never failing . . ."

The "plot" in each of the two poems is of course vastly dissimilar. To "Cavender's House" comes one who, a dozen years earlier, lived there with his wife. He is drawn there in his loneliness by the feeling that she, though dead, will be awaiting him in her chair "in the room as he remembered it." The ironic exchange of thoughts and feelings as, with "twelve years between them," man and ghost talk together, is exquisitely recorded. Mr. Robinson's gravity of style is perfectly suited to his theme. So is Mr. Aldington's pell-mell outpouring suited to his. He tells

* "Cavender's House." By Edwin Arlington Robinson. 4s. 6d. (Hogarth Living Poets: Hogarth Press.)—"A Dream in the Luxembourg." By Richard Aldington. 3s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)—"Ash Wednesday: Six Poems." By T. S. Eliot. 3s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)—"Anabasis." By St.-J. Perse. Translated by T. S. Eliot. 10s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

of a young man who is called abroad by one who becomes his mistress when he reaches the end of his long journey. But the parting is not long delayed, and—

> "I remember how I loved her and she loved me;
> I remember how so many nights she lay in my arms
> In the mysterious communion of love . . ."

Critics of Mr. Aldington will say that he is indebted to Mr. T. S. Eliot for his manner. He was once, but now no longer. Mr. Eliot has influenced more than one writer of to-day's poetry, but he cannot really be imitated. This we may perceive in two remaining books on our list—a collection of six poems entitled (enigmatically) "Ash Wednesday," and a translation of a poem from the French which he considers "one of the most remarkable poems of this generation." About "Ash Wednesday" we need say little except that those who seek to find plain meanings in it do so at their peril. Mr. Eliot has not published the book for the plain man. It is for those who are willing to follow the drift of a cultured, uncommonly sensitive philosopher's thoughts in poetry. A scientist's thoughts too; for poetry is not so much an art to him as an expression of communal interest in verse:

> "Because these wings are no longer wings to fly,
> But merely vanes to beat the air
> The air which is now thoroughly small and dry,
> Smaller and dryer than the will.
> Teach us to care and not to care—
> Teach us to sit still."

Mr. Eliot has returned from his quest of new discoveries to reflect in his subtly intellectual and spiritual fashion on the need of faith in human existence—and it must be faith dressed in austere colours, as the fourth of his six poems intimates quite plainly.

It is foolish to speculate, but we cannot help feeling that the parched, tropical colouring of "Anabasis" was one of the chief factors in its attraction for Mr. Eliot, and a stimulus to his desire to translate it. No description of St.-J. Perse's oratorical poem would be valid, any more than a description of the "Song of Solomon" has ever been valid. All that may usefully be said is that it reads like an Old Testament book, sublime and arid, lofty and harsh:

> "Men, creatures of dust and folk of divers devices, people of business and of leisure, folk of the frontiers and foreign men, O men of little weight in the memory of these lands; people from the valleys and the uplands and the highest slopes of this world to the shore's end; Seers of signs and seeds, and confessors of the western winds, trackers of beasts and of seasons, breakers of camp in the little dawn wind, seekers of water-courses over the wrinkled rind of the world, O seekers, O finders of seasons to be up and be gone. . . ."

The best way to approach this remarkably well translated piece of "script" (which the publishers took care to have remarkably well produced), is to wipe away in our thought as many centuries as divide civilised man from the rude crude life of limitless and timeless deserts of scalding heats and unspeakable cruelties which have never yet been absorbed and lost in the utilitarian activities of the modern world. Then in a gold-hot flash we know at once what the poet means when he writes: "I have seen the earth, parcelled out in vast spaces, and my thought is not estranged from the navigator." He is at one with Eternity yawning on the sands."

THOMAS MOULT.

HORACE WALPOLE'S ENGLAND.*

Even Macaulay, who so bitterly attacked him, could not but admit in the main the excellence of the letters of Horace Walpole, though it gave him a mighty jar to do so, for, the kindest of men in private life, anything savouring of affectation irked him sorely. He had his own affectations; but that is another matter. Walpole is a man of mystery to the extent that he worked at his correspondence like the galley-slave of old at his oar. Nothing was allowed to interfere with it—and for this we cannot be sufficiently grateful, for there is nothing else that brings back so clearly to the student of to-day the life and times of the eighteenth century. Life, for many, would be more dull were it not that Walpole gave up his leisure for the entertainment of his friends, and, so, for the delight of posterity. And who shall blame him if he had posterity in his mind? And what if he did make clear copies of the letters he wrote? Is it not at least as creditable to be one of the greatest letter-writers that the world has known, even if there was something of vanity behind the composition of them, as an historian who was mighty proud of his history? And there is this in Walpole's favour, that he wrote of his day and of the people that he knew. Macaulay wrote that Walpole was "a Gentleman-Usher at heart"; but he also says: "What then is the charm, the irresistible charm, of Walpole's writings? It consists, we think, in the art of amusing without exciting. . . . No man who has written so much is so seldom tiresome." So, setting out to damn, Macaulay, being an honourable gentleman, remained to praise.

It was an excellent idea of Mr. Mason's to compile "Horace Walpole's England as his letters picture it," for though

* "Horace Walpole's England, as His Letters picture It." Edited by Alfred Bishop Mason. 21s. (Constable.)

The Ladies Elizabeth Laura, Charlotte Maria, and Anne Horatia Waldegrave.

From a mezzotint after Sir Joshua Reynolds.

From "Horace Walpole's England," by Alfred Bishop Mason (Constable).

most who read it will be familiar with the admirable Toynbee edition of the correspondence from which it is drawn, it is pleasant indeed to gaze upon the pictures of eighteenth century England through the eyes of "Horry" Walpole. And how wise Mr. Mason has been not to annotate the letters, for obviously this is a book intended for the cultured reader. Nothing irritates the latter more than to be told who was Madame du Deffand, or George Augustus Selwyn, or Lady Mary Coke, or Sir Horace Mann, or Mrs. Abingdon; and as for the rest, what will the foot-notes benefit them.

Katherine Mansfield.

And, having written the above, I find: "How happy must she (Lady Coventry) be with Billy and Bully," with appropriate information by the editor. And very essential it is to tell "the gentle reader" that "Billy was 'Billy the Butcher,' the Duke of Cumberland, the hero of Culloden; Bully was young Lord Bolingbroke." The price of an editor so discerning as Mr. Mason is above rubies and foot-notes.

Walpole, as the son of a Prime Minister, knew everyone and went everywhere. He certainly owed much to the situation in which he was born, and he took the fullest advantage of it—to the great delight of posterity. He had his prejudices, of course; but he was rarely malicious—whereby we get back to where we were a little while ago—as was Macaulay. Walpole was not a hater: it is extraordinary how little of spite there is in his correspondence, though he loved not those who hated his father.

The volume opens at page 72, on which is a letter to Horace Mann, and there is a passage which must be quoted:

> "The Mirepoix have brought a cousin of his, a Monsieur de Levi, who has a tantino of what I wanted to see. You know they figure themselves much upon their Jewish name, and call cousins with the Virgin Mary. They have a picture in the family, where she is made to say to the founder of the house, 'Couvrez vous, mon cousin?' He replies, 'Non pas, ma très sainté cousine, je sçai, trop bien le respect qui je vous dois.' Could anything be more happy?"

Wherever "Horry" goes—and where did he not go?—he puts down his impressions of places and people—and who ever has done it better? "Horace Walpole's England" is not so much for the shelves as for use as what used to be called a "bed-book." And if this is not a tribute to Horace Walpole and to Mr. Mason, I should like to know what is?

LEWIS MELVILLE.

A FINE CRITIC.*

Only one qualification for the writing of criticism of fiction did Katherine Mansfield lack: she did not really care for stories. She will speak of the entertainment novel as if it were a low form of art, instead of being what it is, the original form of all great fiction. Indeed, the novel which abandons the task of entertainment has, if any novel has, abandoned the specific quality of the novel. It is not that Dostoievsky is less entertaining than Dumas: it is that he entertains us differently. People who believe that the entertainment which they extract from art is different altogether in its nature from the entertainment derived by the vulgar are guilty of one of the cardinal æsthetic sins: they are attaching a mood, a spiritual value to a purely æsthetic emotion. Now, Katherine Mansfield was never a prig, and so when she comes to deal with novelists who are not only "entertaining" in the low sense, but who also entertained her—Rose Macaulay and "Elizabeth" are capital instances—she is as generous with her praise as one can wish. Yet she remains suspicious of this quality, this alas! rarer and rarer quality of entertainment. How else can one explain the shy complaint with which she qualifies her praise of Miss Stella Benson's "Living Alone"?

To read through these pages—reprinted reviews from The Athenæum—is enough to make any critic of fiction despair. How exquisitely Katherine Mansfield seized the very life of a book that she liked—how equally exquisitely could she kill, with a sentence, a just analogy, a picture, the books she disliked, or the books to which she was, I think, a little unjust. Here she is, for instance, on the "pastime novel," the novel of entertainment:

> "By far the greater number of them aim at nothing more positive than a kind of mental knitting—the mind of the reader is grown so familiar with the pattern that the least possible effort is demanded of it, and yet this ravel of wool is just enough to keep one from facing those grim uncomfortable creatures who are only too ready to stare one out of countenance. O Life! why is it that so many of thy children are homeless, for ever doomed to have a little time to spare between the stages of the tedious journey? What can they do? They cannot spend the time staring out of windows. Is there nothing to go to see or hear or buy? Are there no books? Up and down the miles and miles of bookstalls range the uneasy travellers. There are so many books that the cities are darkened, the country is buried, the sky is blotted out by them."

By an unfortunate accident some of the more important modern novelists either published nothing during the period of Miss Mansfield's criticism, or she did not have their books. There is nothing of hers here about Mr. Wells, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Charles Marriott, Mr. D. H. Lawrence, H. H. Richardson, or Ford Madox Hueffer. We find here, however, a greeting for the rare genius of Stephen Hudson—on the publication of "Richard Kurt"—and a recognition of the brilliance and truth of Mr. O'Riordan's "Adam of Dublin." There is a beautiful notice of R. O. Prowse's wonderful "A Gift of the Dusk," the novel about life in a Swiss sanatorium for tuberculosis, a book so much better, more delicate, more appropriate than Thomas Mann's vastly overpraised "Magic Mountain." Once at least Katherine Mansfield deals with an author who has done much to make the English language transitional—though transitional to what has never been apparent. She reviewed Miss Gertrude Stein's "Three Lives." She did not have much patience with it, though those stories are clearness itself compared with Miss Stein's later work.

> "Miss Gertrude Stein has discovered a new way of writing stories. It is just to keep on writing them. Do not mind how often you go back to the beginning, do not hesitate to say the same thing over and over again—people are always repeating themselves—don't be put off if the words sound funny at times: just keep right on, and by the time you've done writing you'll have produced your effect."

* "Novels and Novelists." By Katherine Mansfield. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

There are some notices in which Katherine Mansfield considers the nature of the novel; but on the whole I got the impression that the technique of story-telling, to which all novels must in the end pay obeisance, did not interest her. She was, we know, preoccupied with questions of religion and the ultimate significance of art and this rather hampered her examination of the most typical instances of English fiction that came her way. I am not sure what would have happened to a novel of Scott's or Thackeray's had it been sent at that time for her appraisement. She is extraordinarily lacking in perception when she writes of "Esther Waters," on which she passes the strictly absurd judgment that "it has not, from first to last, the faintest stirring of the breath of life," a typical confusion between life and the ways in which it can be expressed. Katherine Mansfield disliked the way in which George Moore expressed his version of Esther Waters's life; that she had a right to do, but to call her dead is as stupid as it would be for an Italian or American to call a reserved Irish or English person unemotional. She leans, in fact, as a critic rather too much to the heresy that demonstrativeness is what it professes to be—it is an error which explains, I fancy, much of the tragedy of her life as well as the slighter disasters of her criticism.

R. ELLIS ROBERTS.

BY ORDER OF THE TSAR!*

A complete account of the work of the Ochrana (the Tsarist secret police) would be of great value and interest. No organisation had a greater reputation for subtlety, thoroughness and lack of scruple. Its agents, official and unofficial, ranged from princesses to beggars, and its work has been the subject of romances untold. I can testify that on one occasion, when it specially interested itself in my affairs as a foreign correspondent, I found its agents more difficult to detect and to deflect than any others.

Hence the hopeful expectation with which one opened Mr. A. T. Vassilyev's handsome volume, "The Ochrana." The author is announced on the cover as the last Tsarist Chief of Police—a description liable to create misunderstanding. Vassilyev's position during the closing year of the Tsar's reign more closely resembled that of the Home Office head of the police department of state—admittedly a very high bureaucratic post—than of the active chief of police. The immediate duties were carried out under the direction of the Prefect of Police and General Globatshov, head of the Petrograd Ochrana.

This explains many things in this volume. It excuses what would otherwise be wholly inexcusable—the fact that Vassilyev remained in his private apartment on the day of the revolution, listening to reports by telephone of the murders of police and the burning of stations, in place of fighting with the police. It explains also why the Bolshevists, when they found him under arrest, released him and allowed him to go outside their territory. Vassilyev's description of the secret agents of the Ochrana, of the "black cabinets" and the tricks of espionage, contain little that is new. Time after time one pauses in astonishment to realise how little he really discovered of the revolutionary organisations, and how little he apparently was acquainted with the weapons employed by his own subordinates in fighting them.

Vassilyev pictures the political police as humane and legal in their methods; he dwells on the comforts of the upper floor cells of the terrible redoubt prison in the fortress of Petropalvski, in Tsarist days. He pictures exile in Siberia as a minor evil, and he shows us Rasputin as a much more amiable character than the world has understood.

Unfortunately it is too late for such pleading. Those of us who knew Petropalvski, with its deadly silence, its tomb-like cells and its outlook on the ditch that was also execution ground, find it hard to believe that even the official mind thought it a humane home. The memoirs of many political prisoners and the reports of numerous state trials give too many details of horrors for us to credit the Ochrana with scrupulous exactitude in extracting information. The great value of Mr. Vassilyev's book is that it gives an admirable example of the mind of the obtuse bureaucracy which brought Tsarism to destruction.

Major W. F. Morris,
Author of "Behind The Lines" (Geoffrey Bles).

If another edition is called for, the spelling needs revision. For instance "Loublyanka" should be "Loubyanka," and to write "Tsheka" for the more familiar "Tche-ka" is affectation.

F. A. MACKENZIE.

* "The Ochrana—the Russian Secret Police." By A. T. Vassilyev. 15s. (Harrap.)

AS OTHERS SAW IT.*

"Behind the Lines" is an excellent War novel, original in plot and admirable in style, but handicapped by an unsuitable title. "Behind the Lines" has achieved an almost technical signification, as descriptive of "War from Behind a Typewriter," and the last word in this kind of thing was given in "Wine, Women and War." In the book now under review the words refer to the devastated area yielded up by the Germans in their retreat to the Hindenberg Line; and according to Mr. Morris this territory was inhabited by small bands of British deserters who had escaped from the line—not necessarily on account of cold feet, but for some mischance, such as that the refugee had killed his man, and the man concerned was not a Hun.

Such was the case with Peter Rawley, a young subaltern of gunners who, infuriated by the conduct of a skrimshanking vulgarian who had succeeded to temporary command of the battery, fell upon the rotter and after a fierce fight accidentally killed him. Then followed flight and the meeting with "Alf," who escorted the runaway to his lair. The description of the life which follows is admirable and is on the same high plane as the battle scenes which precede the main incident of the story. For about two-thirds of the narrative the attention of the reviewer was held fast, but then came the "Swiss Family Robinson" period when shaving materials, a field cashier book, and a chaplain's uniform conveniently came to hand. The subsequent adventures of Rawley as a chaplain at a loose end, and undetected, at Amiens are the class of thing which show that fiction can often be much stranger than truth. There is a pretty love story woven into the plot and one finds with relief—in these days of "best-smellers" in War books—that a subaltern of artillery can be an English gentleman and a WAAC can be an English lady. How Rawley and Alf became involved in the Big Push of 1918, and how the former " clicked " into his old battery and " got away with it " is well and plausibly told. This is a book which might have resulted in devastating rubbish, but Mr. Morris has such immense skill that he carries the reader with him on a kind of magic carpet of excitement. It can be, and hereby is, very highly recommended.

* "Behind the Lines." By. W. F. Morris. 7s. 6d. (Geoffrey Bles.)—"Scotland Yet." By H. Drummond Gauld. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—"Behind Both Lines." By Hugh Kingsmill. 6s. 6d. (Kennerley.)

To read " Scotland Yet " after the above book is to realise pretty clearly what a " cushy " time gunners had compared with the old P.B.I. This indeed is the motif of Mr. Gauld's book. His object is to " tell in simple, straightforward language how the men of the British infantry lived from day to day," and later in the text he asks, " After all, what could match the glorious infantry ? If there was any romance in war surely it clung to them." The book begins with the period immediately following the first Battle of the Somme in 1916. The first four chapters are " Mud "—mud in profundis. They are well done, but will somebody please tell these naïve New Army authors that the remnants of the Old Army had their share of mud in the awful winter of 1914–15, and that they had to stick it with no trench material and with practically no support from their own artillery owing to the dreadful shortage of shells. " Scotland Yet " has some fine writing in it, but there is a " Dismal Jimmy " air about the book which is also marred by some sour comments upon the slightly lower standard of discomfort achieved by officers as compared with their men.

There must be some lure in the words " Behind the Lines " and Mr. Hugh Kingsmill goes one better with " Behind Both Lines," a title of which Elia would probably have said, " It arrides me not." Mr. Kingsmill was captured during an attack by the Royal Naval Division and spent the remainder of the War in German prison camps. The book is a little thin, rather " superior," and contains some things which the present reviewer strongly resents, e.g. " Staff officers, belonging to the regular army, disliked the temporary officer for using the War as a pretext to get into uniform, thus placing himself technically on a social equality with officers of the regular army." This sentence is typical of the whole book.

F. E. WHITTON
(Lieut.-Colonel).

BIOGRAPHICAL ART.*

Mr. Knut Hagberg, in the form of a most excellent translation by Miss Elizabeth Sprigge and Mr. Claude Napier, has made us wiser and happier by another very clever and wise book of biographical essays. They appear to be character studies written round longer biographies. Whether it is that the foreigner can see more of the game than those of the same nation, or whether Mr. Hagberg is much more thoughtful than most other writers, certain it is that this is quite a distinguished book.

The author never seems to be trying to say something sparkling at the expense of his subject, though he does write many bright thoughts. Delightful though his work is to read, the chief fact that one thinks of is that Mr. Hagberg has something really worth saying. There is no feeling of book-making. One finishes each essay feeling that it has contributed something new and important to the history of the person examined. It is so easy for a writer to say flashy things about such a man as Melbourne or Disraeli, or cynical things about Mr. Gladstone and Parnell ; but to treat them all with a delicate respect is another thing altogether.

The biographer sometimes forgets that even when his subject is dead, he has no right to trespass rudely into the historical house and say what he thinks will make a good joke. There are good manners in the biographical world just as much as at afternoon tea parties or dinner tables.

* " Personalities and Powers." By Knut Hagberg. 12s. 6d. (John Lane.)

It required the best manners, for example, to be tenderly sympathetic with the elderly Melbourne and the aged Disraeli trying to play the youthful gallant—and doing it—certainly in Melbourne's case—with great success.

Mr. Hagberg reveals his deep thinking in little by-sentences which very few would have knowledge enough to write. For example he says : " It was John Morley, a man somewhat overrated, both intellectually and morally, by his contemporaries, who like most atheists made up in pharisaism for his lack of religion, who prevailed on the aged Gladstone to break with Parnell " after the O'Shea scandal. Now that is a just valuation, which would not have occurred to nine out of ten biographers who, on such points, accept the obvious verdict. A crowd of commonplace persons repeated so often that Morley was a great thinker that it has become a commonplace, as is, perhaps, the case of half the men and women who have made a noise on the surface of the world.

G. R. STIRLING TAYLOR.

THAT GREAT CITY.*

New York's greatness cannot be measured. That is not to say it is greater than any other city ; but other cities are comparable to their great peers or their own half-forgotten pasts. They grow, almost as if in imitation of natural growth ; New York bursts into new and irrelevant self-expression so often that its old friends cannot recognise it. The sky-scraper is its challenge to older civilisation, yet the sky-scraper is not peculiar to New York, for the same strange glory is in Chicago, and was there—a Mr. Holabird was the architect—when New York still looked like a polite English provincial town.

Indeed, I suppose New York's greatness, its own particular individual stamp, consists in this : that it manages to make things—especially extravagant things—so much its own that it gets credited with the birth of a wealth it has only borrowed. Everything that other cities have —except quiet—New York has to excess ; everything that other cities abandon New York abandons more ferociously. It is no melting-pot, whatever may be said of the continent whose threshold it is ; for in New York dissonant elements become more dissonant. Nowhere is the Negro so Negro as in Harlem ; nowhere is the policeman such a policeman ; nowhere the theatre so much a theatre, or the glare so killing a glare as in New York. It is the city of extremes, a city whose cry is loud enough to the heavens, but somehow is a cry of little meaning, of less meaning perhaps than the cry of any great city in the history of the world.

Of the extremes in this city Mr. Dreiser writes. He went to it first in 1894 ; but these sketches are mainly of the New York that flourished between 1900 and 1914. It is already dead, his New York, stormed away, trodden under by a more fantastic and extravagant city. He writes of poverty, of crime, of the passion in the foreign quarters—(is there any unforeign quarter of New York now except, perhaps, Mrs. Wharton's house in Paris, France ?)—of the strange, hard lives of the casual workers, of the crowded existence in the tenements and the fierce fighting born of heat and too close quarters. At times, too, Mr. Dreiser wanders into a church in New York ; and there, in contact with the faith he has forsaken, he is perhaps at his most moving :

> " Man is a hopeful animal. He lives by the belief that some good must accrue to him or that his life is not worth the living. It is this faith, then, that in disaster or hours of all but unendurable misery causes him to turn in supplication to a higher power, and unless these prayers are in some measure answered, that faith can and will be destroyed, and life will and does become a shambles indeed. Hence, if one would balance peace against danger and death, it becomes necessary for each to act as though the ideals of the world are in some sense real and that he in person is sponsor for them."

It is the old Victorian agnosticism that trusted in the appeal of truth, when it was no longer regarded as true, and of pity and beauty when their sanctions are removed. There perhaps Mr. Dreiser is like New York—is it, too, a power divorced from sanctions, living too quickly and too confidently on the strength of traditions that have really been long ago abandoned ?

* " Colour of a Great City." By Theodore Dreiser. 10s. (Constable.)

R. E. R.

Novel Notes.

THE WINGS OF ADVENTURE AND OTHER STORIES. By Philip Gibbs. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

In his new book of short stories Sir Philip Gibbs is essentially and unfailingly Sir Philip Gibbs at his best. The stories, though mostly post-war, are steeped in war atmosphere, and war's after effects is the theme of most of them. Nobody is more expert than Sir Philip at presenting modern life as a whole, with its unforgettable background of 1914–18. Those four years are responsible for so much in the world of to-day, more than the younger generation realises. No member of the younger generation could so adeptly have traced to its source the reckless craving for adventure of a young society woman as Sir Philip does in the story that gives its title to the book; nor have described so vividly the mental torture of a conscientious man whose past rises up to wreck his post-war happiness, as in "The Soul of Honour." The last words of "A Prisoner of War" are the key-note, we feel, to the whole book: "I know, because I happened to be there." As a consequence the stories possess strength, vitality and a profound human interest.

Sir Philip Gibbs.

TUCK OF DRUM AND OTHER STORIES. By Alfred Tresidder Sheppard. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Good it is to read these tales on an idle afternoon of early autumn, as they completely fulfil the first aim of the short stories—they beguile the mind! We are just a little sad perhaps at the picture of the gallant old veteran of Austerlitz who supplies the title for the first tale. But what a delightful anxiety we feel in reading of the Devon-born Crump who has to help a selfish son, and who determines to retire to his beloved county somehow or other. He goes there, with his last penny spent, to offer himself to the workhouse. But a happy chance intervenes! There is going after all to be a little cottage and some work for dear old Crump in the Devon air. Happy ending also comes as a burst of radiance at the close of the interesting and cleverly phrased study called "The Tube," in which a wife, suddenly discovering that she is going to have a long-desired child, goes back to her husband in the nick of time. We find tremendous variety of theme in these eighteen attractive tales. They were selected by Mr. St. John Adcock, and he chose admirably.

THE PRINCE FROM OVERSEAS. By Sir Basil Thomson. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

This is a story of the island of Martinique and of life on the high seas during the war between the English and the French in the middle of the eighteenth century. Prince Hercules d'Este, exiled from the French Court, takes ship to Martinique. He lands under a humbler name, but his identity is discovered and royal honours are paid to him. Attempting later to return to France, he is landed, owing to a food shortage on board, at Faro in Portugal and, crossing the frontier into Spain, he is seized and condemned to serve a life sentence in the galleys. His ship however is captured by an African frigate, and the Prince eventually becomes the captain of an Algerian pirate vessel, at war with the France that has treated him so badly. Founded upon fact, Sir Basil Thomson's tale is a careful, conscientious and picturesque essay in historical fiction.

MARTIN MAKE BELIEVE. By Gilbert Frankau. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Gilbert Frankau is always interesting. He is built that way. He can't, as a novelist, help turning out good copy. And his latest book is as good copy as ever he has turned. Interesting people, interesting situations, a novel twist in the structure and the plot. The beginning is better than that. The way he lets the delirium of a wounded man tell you all that has happened to Major Martin Kenterton up to the moment when he lies in hospital is masterly, it is as good as "Tom Fool." Martin has been hit by a shell. The moment before the explosion he was about to kill his best friend. But had he killed him ? (His best friend had been his wife's lover.) When he came back home there was the problem : would he tell his wife ? He found he could not. And, what is unusual in such a case, he found he could still cohabit with her. Well, all that, and the weakening to breaking point of the link between them is well told. And very charmingly a new character—that of a young girl, Sylvia, who falls in love with Martin, is brought into the story. It is a pleasure to meet in a modern novel a real clean young woman and a man who declines to take advantage of her. Martin's wife—Jill—goes after other men, and in the end, when for some years she and Martin have ceased to cohabit, she asks him to let her divorce him. He consents. And comes home to find himself landed in a predicament similar to that of one of the men who figured in a recent famous trial. This is good, brisk, dramatic stuff. But the real interest of the book, apart from that great opening, is in the well-drawn characters of Martin, Jill and Sylvia, and their mutual reaction.

THE WIRELESS CALL. By Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. 2s. (Epworth Press.)

An old priory, inhabited by the widowed Lady Mountmarris, her companion, Jane Robotham, and her household staff, is the scene of what may be called "a simple story." But this simple story contains all the ingredients for real romance. It has secret chambers, nightly visitants; servants with secrets, good and bad; a rich and generous châtelaine; a penniless stepson; a heroine with a sad love story; a rifled safe, stolen papers; and, ultimately, good streaks to be found even in the worst characters. Mrs. Kernahan has given us here many thrills, not a few misunderstandings, and false clues, but she does not allow us to be without hope at any time. A wireless S.O.S. leads to an explanation of the final mystery, and the story ends with happy hearts, peace and prosperity. The volume is a marvel of cheapness, and the working out of the love story of Jane Robotham in the midst of her capable managing of difficult situations is very satisfactory.

SOLDIERS' PAY. By William Faulkner. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

The blurb begins by telling us that William Faulkner is young. We have no difficulty in believing this. And if Mr. Faulkner is wise he will not believe anything else so rapturously told about him in either preface or flap. He has his trade yet to learn. He has talent and cleverness, but if Whistler was able to "get away with it" after flinging a pot of paint in the face of the public that was because Whistler had genius; and it takes something more than mere talent (especially talent buttressed up by a literary style so strongly reminiscent of "Appassionata") to make a thorough success of a staccato and jerky tale in the perusal of which the average reader is likely to be bored stiff and the conscientious reviewer is driven to righteous wrath. The story is "not a War book," but deals with the return of some American soldiers and airmen to Georgia who find that the War is démodé and that the "war-hero" business is of the past. Actually, however, the tale is concerned rather with the portraiture of tiresome young America—chronically intoxicated and perpetually pornographic young persons. Luckily Mr. Faulkner is young.

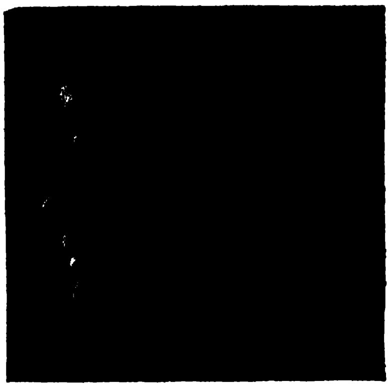
THE INHERITOR. By E. F. Benson. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Blended in Mr. Benson's new novel with characteristically natural descriptions of life at Cambridge and in Cornwall is a macabre and melodramatic vein. The early scenes, in which the ragging of undergraduates is described with sympathetic gusto and the common-room conversation of the dons with perhaps too broad a touch of caricature, hardly prepare the reader for what follows. Maurice Crofts, a young classical tutor, is shy and reserved, and has made no real friendship in his life until he comes under the spell of Steven Gervase, an undergraduate who, for some apparently inexplicable reason, has suddenly broken off his intimacy with the Babe, that "large, stupid boy with just perception enough to guess that his schoolboy friendship with Steven was outworn, and that another friendship, just as absorbing, but far more mature, had arisen." Little by little the subtle influence of Steven over Maurice is unfolded, but it is not until the two are holiday-making at his lonely home in Cornwall that Steven is fully revealed as a strange kind of modern pagan, with the hereditary curse of his family overshadowing him. The reader must discover the climax for himself. Mr. Benson is too vigorous and adroit a story-teller not to give the semblance of reality to a somewhat unpleasant fantasy. But for ourselves we prefer him as the unalloyed chronicler of ordinary lives.

THE GOLDEN CAT. By Douglas Newton. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)



"I read only detective fiction nowadays," said a lady to the reviewer the other day. "I find the ordinary novel is either gloomy or grubby, and I take refuge in a good, clean tale." "The Golden Cat" might have been confidently recommended to her. A most exciting panorama unfolds itself in Mr. Newton's uncommonly well written book. What could be more mysterious than those fingers thrust boldly through a certain letter-box in the West End, bearing a golden cat trinket? What more intriguing than the beauty of the young suspected girl, Olga the Russian refugee? We hear of millionaire after millionaire's death; and the murderous confraternity of the Golden Cat is constantly at work. The fact that Olga has a twin, and that there is a drug which can make criminals yield up secrets against their will comes out at the very end of a most absorbing mystery that will certainly pass from hand to eager hand.

THE KRAMER GIRLS. By Ruth Suckow. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)

Life in a small town is faithfully portrayed in this clever study of three sisters. Georgie and Annie Kramer, sharing the secret of their mother's shame, had always watched over their younger sister, Rose, striving to guard her from the dangerous allurements of the boys of the neighbourhood. Georgie hoped to see her own thwarted ambitions realised in Rose, and to this end contrived to send her to college. But Rose had to live her own life. As Georgie realised at last, "Folks can't do much for other folks." At last too Georgie was able to enjoy some part of the career she had longed for, while Rose went her way and found the sort of happiness she desired. The lives of the three sisters blend in a capably written and realistic story, with the small American town as a vivid and living background.

BREAKERS. By N. Brysson Morrison. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

Miss Morrison's first novel is chiefly notable as a study of Scottish life and character. Although her story takes us away from its bleakness and back to it again, the grim old manse, "a mile from any other habitation and situated on the edge of a Highland loch," is the background and the cause of all the strange, tragic happenings. But for such isolation, such detachment from the world, such poverty and monotony, would Euphemia ever have sought her wild adventure, and so brought into being the dour, uncouth son she refused to own? It is to Callum Lamont, her unwanted son, the book is principally devoted, his early struggles, the discovery of his identity, his pilgrimage to his mother's home, his taking up work in the neighbourhood where, unrecognised by her, he performs his part in the queer repetition of family history. Evil haunts him, but in the end he finds a way out. A grim story, full of atmosphere and showing considerable skill in the delineation of character.

Miss N. Brysson Morrison.

HAVANA BOUND. By Cecil Roberts. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Roberts records the amazing adventures of Gerald Brodie when he went to visit his maternal uncle, Prince Bernardo Cravelli, at Havana. The voyage out was tense with excitement; for one of the passengers was the world-famous dancer, La Cubana, and there was the mysterious murder of Herr von Müller. On his arrival Gerald quickly was made to realise that he was something of a pawn in a political game and that his uncle was menaced by a deadly conspiracy. Time and again Gerald was saved by the loyalty of a youth who mysteriously attached himself to him, and who ultimately laid down his life for his friend. Mr. Roberts is so generous a contriver that it is not possible to give an idea of the manifold interest of his plot. But it is permissible to say that after Gerald had escaped from the siren charms of La Cubana, he was very pleasantly rewarded by his cousin, Nanette. This is an admirably written story, packed with interest from cover to cover. Mr. Roberts already has his assured friends, but this capital story should bring a greater accession to their number.

THE CHANK SHELL. By H. de Vere Stacpoole. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Stacpoole has gone back to the tropical seas, but though he is once again amongst his own colourful haunts, he is far too concerned with the plot to spend any time weaving decorative touches. Perhaps we can understand this, even if we regret it, for the plot, which circles round hidden treasure, develops with an amazing rapidity and carries the reader along at a breathless pace. A chank shell with the twist to the left instead of to the right is supposed to bring luck to its owner. This was what Cray found at Sandabar on the coast of Sumatra, but the luck it brought was rather a doubtful commodity. Certainly it brought about an introduction to Carnahan and his daughter Maya, and was the reason for their joining forces. True too the treasure was found, but the chain of tragedies connected with its safeguarding and ultimate disposal was surely weighty enough to crush the stoutest heart. It was almost with a sense of relief that we saw Cray emerging happily from the enveloping catastrophes. For those who enjoy adventure liberally spiced with intrigue and danger, Mr. Stacpoole has written an excellent yarn.

The Bookman's Table.

AFOOT IN ITALY. By John Gibbons. 7s. 6d. (Newnes.)

The real Italy, we know, is not the Italy the tourist is shown, but the Italy of common daily life. And this was the Italy Mr. Gibbons set out to discover, mostly on foot. His book is a joy from start to finish, not only because the simple, personal account of his wanderings is rich in humour, but because the picture he gives is intensely alive, and reveals a country and its people more vividly and more significantly than all the conventional guide-books put together. His opinions on Fascism are unbiased and obviously the result of keen observation; he sums up its cumulative effect in the words "callous efficiency." It will surprise many of us, as it surprised him, to find what a go-ahead, materialistic country the artistic Italy has become; but it will probably leave most readers with the feeling that if Italy is in the van of progress, there is something seriously wrong with civilisation.

CELEBRATED MUSICIANS: PAST AND PRESENT. By Hubert Whelbourn. 8s. 6d. (Werner Laurie.)

Mr. Whelbourn has compiled a large number of very brief biographies of all kinds of musicians, past and present. His choice of subjects is arbitrary and seems to have been governed by no special rule or plan. Little known and comparatively unimportant composers like Carl Heinrich Graun and André Ernest Modeste Grétry find a place and are accorded more space than a really important musician like Rimsky-Korsakoff, while some very significant composers are left out altogether—notably Sibelius, John Field (the English inventor of the nocturne, inspirer of Chopin and Liszt), Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Anton Bruckner, and Max Reger. A handbook of this kind, containing the information likely to be sought for by listeners-in, gramophone enthusiasts and others, ought to serve a useful purpose; but it should have been compiled with a surer sense of proportion than Mr. Whelbourn reveals. Harold Samuel, excellent pianist, gets half a page; Moiseiwitsch, Schnabel and a dozen equally distinguished pianists are not even mentioned. Peter Warlock, Balfour Gardiner, York Bowen and other youngish Englishmen find hospitality; but Rutland Boughton, Constant Lambert, Martin Shaw, Armstrong Gibbs and many others are left out in the cold. The selection of conductors is equally strange. If Furtwängler, why not Toscannini? If Sir Henry Wood, why not Pablo Casals? And if violinists and other executant artists are included, why should singers be left out? It is all very puzzling.

BURGUNDY. By Stephen Gwynn. 7s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

One does not expect oneself to be conducted about this venerable part of France by Mr. Gwynn, but his success in doing it shows that a literary man of his capacity can turn his hand to any sort of writing. He is a guide after our own heart, for he acknowledges that here and there a place did not come up to his expectations, while the treasures of architecture are not allowed to swamp the human and the gastronomic interest. Naturally a visit to Burgundy causes us to anticipate the quaffing of many an historic wine; but evidently the local cooks are very much in the tradition of Brillat-Savarin. "Two of us," says Mr. Gwynn, "were new to France, and thought it amazing that simply because we had ordered a sparkling wine the hotel-keeper should dash out to his garden and make a hasty gathering of strawberries. They were no good, he told us, with Seyssel Mousseux; but next day we should have fromage à la crème with our strawberries, which will be ideal—and it was." This region of France is comparatively unfrequented, and one hopes that the flocks of travellers who will go there with Mr. Gwynn's book in their hand will not spoil the most worthy natives. There is a great deal of interest for the intelligent traveller—Bourg with its marvellous tombs, the towns on the Saône—and Mr. Gwynn is very informative in his hints as to how to move from one place to another—Cluny, Savoy, the Jura; we shall add enormously to our happy memories if we follow Mr. Gwynn even to half the places, world-famous and obscure ones, that he tells us of. And the world-famous, such as Aix-les-Bains, do not detain him for very long.

Photograph by Museum.

François Puget: Group of Court Musicians (two contrabasses, violin, theorbo, guitar), and Choristers of Louis XIV—second half of 17th Century. Paris Louvre.

From "A History of Music in Pictures." Edited by Georg Kinsky (Dent).

EARLY KEYBOARD INSTRUMENTS. By Philip James. 30s. (Peter Davies.)

Mr. James traces, as exactly as existing records permit, the development of keyboard instruments from the clavichord to the spinet, to the virginals, the harpsichord, and finally to the pianoforte as it was in 1820. His work is not only a beautiful specimen of modern book-making, but is a careful piece of research which will prove invaluable to students and collectors. Moreover although there is no special pleading, and each development of the instrument is given its due, one effect of his book is to encourage the reader to regard old instruments, and particularly the harpsichord, not merely as museum pieces, but as instruments with a charm of their own which has not been superseded by the grand piano of our time. Arnold Dolmetsch, profiting by modern knowledge, has built some delightful harpsichords and virginals upon which old music recaptures its appropriate flavour. The many illustrations—one of Mrs. Woodhouse playing a Dolmetsch harpsichord—are finely reproduced; the list of makers and sellers of keyboard instruments working in the British Isles up to 1820 will be welcomed by specialists; and a bibliography adds to the usefulness of a valuable work.

MACHIAVELLI. By Ettore Janni. Translated by Marion Enthoven. 12s. 6d. (Harrap.)

A reading of Signor Janni's study gives a new meaning to the term "Machiavellian." To this writer the author of "The Prince" is not only a clear-sighted realist notable alike for courage and sincerity, but "a liberty-loving republican." He very rightly insists that the doctrines advocated in "The Prince" should be studied alongside the other political writings, in particular "The Discourses on the First Decade of Livy," because the Roman study defines Machiavelli's attitude when the people governed are more worthy than those of his own day. Post-war political philosophy in its reaction against nineteenth century idealism—a reaction which has substituted dictatorship for democracy over much of Europe—has boldly quoted Machiavelli in justification. The time is opportune therefore for this searching analysis of those principles. Those of us who still retain our faith in more democratic methods of government will not easily accept Signor Janni's hero worship of Niccolo either as a man or as political thinker. In England at least Cesare Borgia is not our ideal ruler. If one may urge anything against this book other than dissent from its theses it is the author's assumption of our knowledge of Machiavelli's writings and the events of his time. These latter are referred to in such wide terms that we need some such book as Burckhardt's "History of the Italian Renaissance" to remind us of the actual facts. Not the least interesting portion of the book is the author's introduction to the English edition, wherein he considers discreetly the implications of the Machiavelli doctrines in current Italian politics.

THE DEMON. By Lermontov. Translated from the Russian by Gerard Shelley, with an Introduction by Prince Mirsky. Limited edition. 21s. (Richards Press.)

There has been curiously little interest taken in England in the poetry of Lermontov who, with Pushkin, shares the peaks of the Russian Parnassus. Perhaps he has suffered from being a post-Byron romantic, and the Romantic School has long been out of fashion; also in Byron we have ourselves the best example of the type. Nevertheless, a good translation of selections from both Pushkin and Lermontov is needed for those whose taste in poetry is not too insular, and perhaps Mr. Gerard Shelley—or Mr. Maurice Baring—will one day give it to us. Mr. Shelley's translation of "The Demon" shows what he can do, for it is not only excellent as a version from the Russian, but it is also in readable verse that is limpid, coloured and not devoid of music. I have read other translations of this poem, and have no hesitation in saying that this is superior to any of them.

BLUE RHINE—BLACK FOREST. By Louis Untermeyer. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)

Mr. Untermeyer's book is more than an invitation to go and explore the Black Forest and the magnificent country bordering the Rhine—it is a companion to take with you on the journey. A lively, amusing, informative companion ready to stimulate your appetite for gorgeous scenery, to guide you to miracles of architecture, lead you into obscure corners of ancient cities, give you hints respecting drink and food, and to bring to life the great ones who have passed on, leaving their work to enrich the world. A couple of appendices provide a glossary of useful words, and an anthology of Black Forest verse, full of peasant wisdom and humour.

Books of the Month.

From July 15th to August 14th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

The true wayfarer turns aside to pay homage to whatever claims his admiration and attention, and blithely passes by the more familiar, however famous it may be. This is the presiding spirit of the Wayfarer Series, under which heading now comes A WAYFARER IN WALES, by W. Watkin Davies (7s. 6d.; Methuen). Whilst taking into consideration the genuine needs of the visitor by train, car or on foot, Mr. Davies, who is a distinguished historian of his native land, has enmeshed an abundant miscellany of interests. Strenuous days and days of leisure are equally catered for, and rewarded with a rich harvest of natural beauty and interesting facts.

Not intended as a chronicle of military exactitudes, these interesting records and impressions of travel in war time —A SUBALTERN IN MACEDONIA AND JUDEA (5s.; Mitre Press)—were written by the Rev. R. Skilbeck Smith more to fix them in his own mind than with the idea of publication. The author held at first a temporary commission, and later joined the Indian Army as a regular. After the recent spate of highly seasoned War books, this may at first appear too quiet and temperate to hold our interest; but let the reader persevere and he will find them full of the most varied interest, humour, personality and sincerity. Perhaps the most important part is that dealing with Salonika; too little has yet been written about that Cinderella of the fronts and the hardships our men underwent there. Mr. Skilbeck Smith's book helps admirably to fill that gap.

Mr. Mackail might almost be called a master-mixer of literary cocktails; no other ingredient or ingredients in the material world can be better compared with the effervescent, bubbling, vivacious qualities with which he endows his erstwhile victims in THE YOUNG LIVINGSTONES (7s. 6d.; Hodder & Stoughton). Rex and Barbara Livingstone, moderns of the modern, form an alliance as irresistible as it is binding, and keep not only their faithful bevy of friends, but the vastly entertained reader closely to heel at the call of their merest whim and caprice. Mr. Mackail is a past master too in the art of bewilderingly flippant and ambiguous conversation, but his inventive pen is more than equal to the quaint situations which often arise.

In the opinion of many, despite the wide publicity following Mr. Stanley Baldwin's eulogistic reference a year or two ago, the late Mary Webb has yet to reach her full literary stature. Following the Collected Edition of her works in its neat and handy format, Messrs. Jonathan Cape have now issued a second of these embellished with numerous illustrations. In GONE TO EARTH (7s. 6d.), just to hand, Mr. Norman Hepple has been responsible for the coloured frontispiece and many black-and-white drawings which happily suggest those elusive qualities so baffling in their delicate fusion.

It was with the object of investigating the spirit of occultism and black magic as practised by a little known sect in Zanzibar, allied to his duties in Government service, that Gerald Wingate set out for that island of witchcraft. In FULL MOON (7s. 6d.; Ward, Lock), Mrs. Jay Marston has drawn a vivid picture, not only of the life in general, but of the underlying temptations and treacheries and the cruelties that follow the slightest interference. When Diana joins Gerald and marries him, she is soon plunged into a whirl of mystery and intrigue, but Mrs. Marston has an excellent sense of balance and fitness, and does not allow either to override the delightful element of romance that weaves its way steadily through.

Peculiar interest—here for once one might be permitted use of the word "unique"—attaches to the handsome volume just published under the title of FOR JOAN OF ARC: AN ACT OF HOMAGE FROM MARSHAL FOCH AND EIGHT OTHER MEMBERS OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY (7s. 6d.; Sheed & Ward). As no mention is made of translation we may assume these nine illuminating essays to have been written in English. Upon that count alone the book is admirable, for as English prose it is throughout excellently clear, dignified, worthy alike its theme and its high intention. The intention clearly is, not alone to pay tribute to the Maid whose recent canonisation embodies modern France's view of her marvellous achievement and character, but—and this very notably—to place before an allied race, the people of the modern British Empire, a succinct crystallisation of this present day vision of the French nation. This it is, no less than the high quality of the essays and the brilliant standing of their authors, which gives the book specific historical value and interest. Bishops, statesmen, lawyers, masters of letters, the authors whose names follow that of France's greatest modern soldier may truly be said to represent the flower of twentieth century French culture, united here in homage to the French Maid who, five centuries ago, wrought a miracle which has come to embody for all time and for all peoples the spirit of patriotism. Foch, that illustrious soldier and truly pious patriot, would have rejoiced to see this book in the hands of English readers for, devout son of France that he was, his understanding affection for our race was an integral part of his personality. It is no exaggeration to say that every page of this book is worth reading—and re-reading.

In EXMOOR AND OTHER DAYS: HUNTING AND SHOOTING MEMORIES, by Arthur O. Fisher (10s. 6d.; Constable), the sketches are well written, the descriptions racy and full of vigour, but the accounts of chasing and slaughtering deer and foxes, shooting partridges and sticking pigs are somewhat repellent to the ordinary sensitive, humane person who prefers a more civilised form of amusement. It is interesting to be shown the point of view of those who take pleasure in such pursuits, and though one imagines the author does not intend his book to serve as propaganda in favour of the abolition of hunting, it is likely to have that effect on readers whose sympathies are with the defenceless, the hunted, the outnumbered.

A really useful guide-book both for the visitor to London and the native who wants to know his own city—as few natives do know it—is TOURING LONDON, by W. Teignmouth Shore (5s.; Batsford). Mr. Shore is one of the exceptions; he has loved and studied London for many years, so is able to take you on intimate tours of its many streets and buildings. The introduction contains much helpful advice as regards getting about, shopping, amusements, money, where to eat and drink, and other details, particularly valuable to the visitor from overseas. Then starting his series of tours from Trafalgar Square, he gives brief descriptions and a summary of the history of those places to which he takes you—the churches, old inns, ancient alleys and broad, busy thoroughfares. Altogether a very competent, interesting little volume, generously illustrated.

"The tide of touring sweeps past much that is most beguiling," says Mr. Harold D. Eberlein in LITTLE KNOWN ENGLAND (12s. 6d., Batsford), and let us be thankful for it, since it leaves us still some really rural corners of England. One could almost wish that he would not write so enticingly of our lovely Welsh borderland, of little frequented spots in the Cotswolds and the Chilterns and of the fascinations of East Anglia, lest the tourist gets on their tracks! Yet we are grateful to him too, as all true lovers of England must be, for he gives us delightful descriptions of villages and landscapes as well as a host of photographs and several useful maps. It is these undiscovered places that yield one a sudden glimpse of England as it used to be, an England that we can never quite discover but is not yet quite lost to us.

ART

TARAPOREVALA (Bombay).—Mirror of Indian Art. G. Venkatachalam. 2 rupees.

CRITICISM AND BELLES-LETTRES

HARRAP.—Queensland Poets. Henry Arthur Kellow. 12s. 6d.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.—Studies in Keats. J. Middleton Murry. 7s. 6d.

FICTION

(Price 7s. 6d. each, except where otherwise indicated.)

APPLETON.—Exit. Harold Bell Wright.—The Big Ben Alibi. Neil Gordon.

ERNEST BENN.—Ethel M. Dell. "Pullman."

BODLEY HEAD.—The Chaste Mistress. Constance Hagberg Wright.—Shades of Albany. J. M. Parsons. 3s. 6d.—The Pavilion by the Lake. Arthur J. Rees.

CASSELL.—Four Faultless Felons. G. K. Chesterton.—The Treasure of Big Waters. Ridgwell Cullum.—Lady of Daylight. G. M. Attenboruogh.

CHAPMAN & HALL.—Lad of Sunnybank. Albert Payson Terhune.—The Voice of One. John Lindsey.—Hymn to the Sun. Malcolm Ross.

CHATTO & WINDUS.—A Note in Music. Rosamond Lehmann.

CONSTABLE.—Years of Grace. Margaret Ayer Barnes.—The Dying Alderman. Henry Wade.—Vallejo Kitty. Ann Knox.

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE.—Great Short Stories of the War. Various Authors. 8s. 6d.

HEINEMANN.—Backwater. T. S. Stribling.—Dead Man Twice. Christopher Bush.—Huntsman in the Sky. Granville Toogood.

HODDER & STOUGHTON.—The Missionary. Edison Marshall.—Golden Dawn. Peter B. Kyne.—Below Zero. Harold Titus.—Tiny Carteret. "Sapper."—Fair Stood the Wind. C. Lenanton.—In the Day's March. Ruby M. Ayres.

HURST & BLACKETT.—When the Tide Runs Out. Edgar Winch.—The Door Between. E. W. Savi.

HUTCHINSON.—Gilderthorn. Emmeline Morrison.—Flight Without End. Joseph Roth.—Sanderson: Master Rogue. John Jay Chichester.—Lover's Luck. Mrs. Horace Tremlett.—The Obole of Paradise. Agnes Miller.—Pirdale Island. Captain A. O. Pollard V.C.

KNOPF.—The Maltese Falcon. Dashiell Hammett.—Green Ice. Raoul Whitfield.

WERNER LAURIE.—W A A C Demobilized. By the Author of W A A C.—The Unconscious Sinner. Victoria Cross.—Come with Me a Little Way. Julian Swift.

LONGMANS.—Comrades at Arms. Paul Feval.—Ordeal by Air. J. Scott Hughes.—Apples be Ripe. Llewelyn Powys.

METHUEN.—The Man with the Squeaky Voice. R. A. J. Walling.—The Avenging Ikon. Charles Barry.—The Cauldron Bubbles. N. A. Temple-Ellis.—The Gold and Copper Delamonds. Agnes Autumn. 3s. 6d.—The Golden Ape. Herbert Adams.

JOHN MURRAY.—The Body on the Bus. Leonard Hollingworth.—Adios! L. and V. S. Bartlett.

STANLEY PAUL.—Shadowland. Cecil Adair.—The Mark of the Rat. Arnold Fredericks.

SECKER.—S.O.S. Arnold Bronnen.—The Feathered Nest. Margaret Leech.—Mario and the Magician. Thomas Mann. 5s.

HAROLD SHAYLOR.—The Brown Murder Case. Roland Daniel.

STOCKWELL.—Timothy Lynch, the Blue Dragoon. Edwin Parry. 6s.

WARD, LOCK.—The Meteren Road. Vernon Thomas.—Her Wild Oats. Paul Trent.—Sunlight Beyond. Effie A. Rowlands.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND TRANSLATIONS

ALLEN & UNWIN.—With the Italia to the North Pole. Umberto Nobile. 15s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

BODLEY HEAD.—On the Trail. Frank Harris. 7s. 6d.—The Harz Mountains. Christopher Marlowe. 8s. 6d.—Korea of the Japanese. H. B. Drake. 12s. 6d.

CONSTABLE.—Horace Walpole's England. Alfred Bishop Mason. 21s.

JARROLDS.—An Introduction to the Rolls of Norwich Cathedral Priory. H. W. Saunders. 10s. 6d.

LIPPINCOTT.—Meet the Germans. Henry Albert Phillips. 15s.

METHUEN.—The Tracks of Our Forefathers. A. F. C. Bourdillon. 5s.—A Wayfarer in Wales. W. Watkin Davies. 7s. 6d.—The Life of Christopher Marlowe, and Dido Queen of Carthage. C. F. Tucker Brooke. 8s. 6d.

JUVENILE

HEINEMANN.—Alice and Thomas and Jane. Enid Bagnold. 7s. 6d.

PICKERING & INGLIS.—Briny's Boy. Lily Watson. 1s. 6d.—Ursula. L. A. Barter-Snow. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS

ALLAN.—An Unrecorded Miracle of St. Columba. Harold Boulton. 3s. 6d.

ALLEN & UNWIN.—The Heavens and the Universe. Dr. Oswald Thomas. 7s. 6d.—Soviet Union Year-Book. Santalov and Segal. 7s. 6d.

ARNOLD.—Modern Prose. Edited by Elizabeth D'Oyley. 2s. 6d.

BODLEY HEAD.—The Leacock Book. Ben Travers. 5s.

CAREY PRESS.—The Very Heart of China. Jessie Payne. 2s. 6d.

CARREFOUR EDITIONS—Anonymous.

CHAPMAN & HALL.—The Outdoor Meeting. J. F. Finn. 5s.

CONSTABLE.—English Monasteries in the Middle Ages. R. Liddesdale Palmer. 24s.

HEATH CRANTON.—The America's Cup. Nigel Lindsay. 6s

DODD, MEADE (New York).—Astrology: Your Place Among the Stars. Evangeline Adams. $5.

FOREST PRESS.—Simple Colour Block Print Making. Hesketh Hubbard. 5s.

HEINEMANN.—My Cricketing Days. C. G. Macartney. 6s.

WERNER LAURIE.—Lays from Lancashire. Nelson Jackson and Arthur Moreland. 1s.

METHUEN.—Cricket Memories. A Country Vicar. 7s. 6d.

NEWNES.—Second Shots. Bernard Darwin. 2s.

PICKERING & INGLIS.—Through Brazilian Junglelands with the Book. F. C. Glass. 3s. 6d.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON PRESS.—Tales of the Sea. Various writers. 2s.

WARNE.—Athletics of To-day for Women. F. A. M. Webster. 10s. 6d.

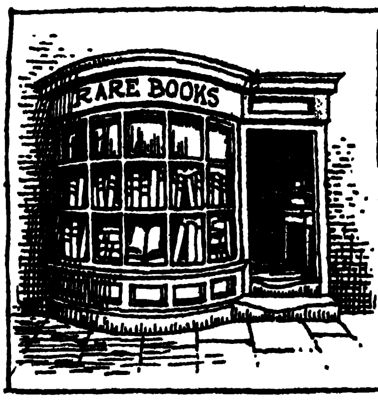
MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

LES PRESSES MODERNES (Paris).—Ivey de Castro. Annette Meakin. 2s. 6d.

REEVES.—Historical Facts for the Arabian Musical Influence. H. G. Farmer. 12s. 6d.

POETRY

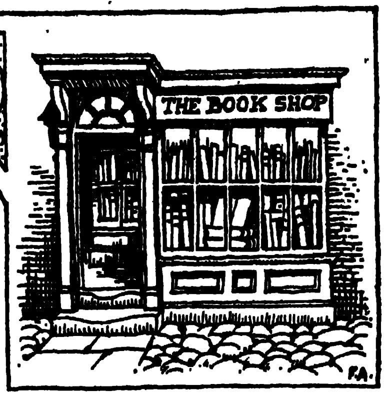
BODLEY HEAD.—Collected Songs and Lyrics. Hon. Stephen Coleridge. 5s.



PUGH & PUGH.—Jessie Rose. H. Cooper Pugh.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

CONSTABLE.—Pushed. Quex. 3s. 6d.



JOHN MURRAY.—Memories and Adventures. A. Conan Doyle. 7s. 6d.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON PRESS.—The Uses of Libraries. Ernest A. Baker. 10s. 6d.

The COLLECTOR

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

WHAT IS A FIRST EDITION?

SO many correspondents write inquiring what is a first edition, that it seems worth while trying to answer the question. To be perfectly honest, it is not so simple a question as it sounds. The general idea is that it can be answered in a few words. That is possible, but the answer would not go far enough. It is surrounded with all kinds of subsidiary explanations, extensions and abbreviations. Even experts, who have both the knowledge of, and the instinct for first editions, have to consider no end of points when they are appraising a valuable item. And it is even possible that there is one vital point about the book which they do not know. So you see how very difficult it is, in some cases, to be absolutely sure about a first edition.

It is but natural therefore that the lay-collector, and especially he who has only just entered the pleasant fields of book-collecting, should find himself in a morass of doubts and anxieties concerning this and that volume. Of one thing I am sure: we must achieve our success in book-collecting through the knowledge and appreciation of literary values. Persistent reading, concentrated study, intelligent effort to analyse what we have done—these are the only ways by which we may become real and true book-collectors. The economic side is of importance; but it must be regarded with balance, and in proportion to its relative value to the whole matter. Knowledge of facts is important; literary knowledge and understanding is more important. And my argument is that the latter must be accomplished first. When we reach such a stage in our literary development, then, I think, we shall be justified in reckoning that we know what are the first two principles in book-collecting. And we shall be truly astonished how immediately reactive our instinct is to the matter of the "business" of book-collecting.

There are a dozen and one things to remember when looking for a first edition. These things are often called "points." Obviously there are certain general matters surrounding a first edition that are common to all; but there are numerous special details that are different in a great number of books. It always strikes me as a little odd that so few people know the obvious indication of a first edition, or rather the lack of indication. A first edition, or impression as the publishers correctly describe it, will have no wording on the reverse of a title page showing that it has been reprinted. The usual custom is for this wording on the back of a title page to read "First printed," followed by the month and year. In the case of a reprint, this is definitely shown. Another important thing to remember is that some publishers make their first edition a limited, signed one, and on looking at the ordinary edition, this is not always stated. Here again then is a pitfall. We must not forget, too, that there has been a good deal of talk lately as to whether the American or the English issue of a book is the first, when the former has been published before the latter. These are the things that vex a book-collector, concerning which we shall have more to say.

THE MARKET.

The note that we printed in an earlier number about "The Anatomy of Bibliomania," by Holbrook Jackson, brought us many inquiries from various correspondents. We repeat that it is to be in two volumes, and will be published by the Soncino Press. The first volume is expected in November. The work will be the most important of its kind that has ever been published. Mr. Jackson is a littérateur of great distinction, and his understanding of literary values is as sound as it is sure. He has a mind that is so equipped with the right sense of intellectual balance as to make his pronouncements most valuable. We always regret that his professional editorial duties prevent our having more literary works from him. But we are glad that he has found time to write "The Anatomy of Bibliomania." We are looking forward to its publication with the greatest anticipation. Let us quote the first paragraph in the prospectus describing this work. "The publication of 'The Anatomy of Bibliomania' will be a literary event of considerable importance. In this remarkable work Mr. Holbrook Jackson, the well-known essayist and literary historian, author of 'The Eighteen Nineties,' has accomplished the gigantic task of tracing the significance of books in the lives of men through all the curious and varied ramifications of their influence." We shall deal with this important work for collectors and book-lovers at some length when the first volume appears.

There is another book which collectors may well add to their shelf of books about books—one of these days we must devote a special article to this subject—and that is "English Collectors of Books and Manuscripts, 1550–1900." The chapters comprise the Sandars Lectures for 1929, delivered by Mr. Seymour de Ricci.

A number of people bought that remarkable collection of "Seventy-five Drawings," by Epstein, and paid the full published price of fifteen guineas for it. Each copy was signed by Epstein, and it is a very fine piece of topography. At present it can be bought at a very much lower price. We saw an advertisement the other day of a copy for sale, and offers were invited for it. There is no doubt that it will enhance in price in due course.

There has been published in America a very useful work entitled "Modern British Authors: Their First Editions." It has been compiled by B. D. Cutler and Villa Stiles. Only 1,050 copies have been made. It is a very comprehensive work, and is published at $10. A special edition, signed by the compiler, at $25.

A few weeks since, a very full list of the works of John Masefield appeared in the American book-trade organ, The Publisher's Weekly. It is a bibliographical check list of the first editions of Masefield's books, compiled by H. S. Boutell. Underneath many of the entries are some valuable notes.

As these notes are written some weeks before the autumn publishing season commences, it is not practicable to give as full information about forthcoming limited editions as we should like, but we hope to get some further titles into the proof before we go to press. There is some indication that the number of limited editions will be smaller this season than last. Here are a few titles:

"Tartarin of Tarascon." By Alphonse Daudet. 2 vols. Translated by Jacques le Clercq. Illustrated by W. A. Dwiggins.

"Birds, Beasts and Flowers." By D. H. Lawrence. Illustrated by Blair Hughes Stanton.

"The School for Scandal." By R. B. Sheridan. Illustrated by Thomas Lowinsky.

"Enchantment." By Æ.

"Benia Krik, King of the Bandits." By Babel. Translated by the Hon. Ivor Montagu, and decorated in colour by E. McKnight Kauffer.

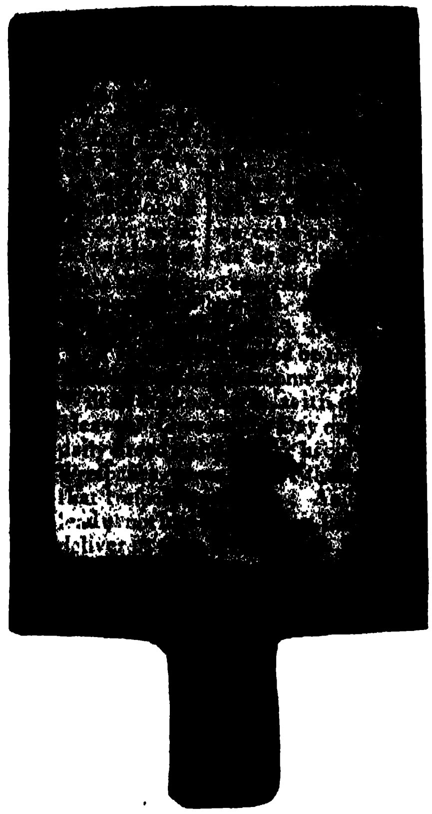
"Nine Poems." By T. Sturge Moore. Type designed by J. Van Krimpen.

The Cromer Prayer Book.
Written and decorated throughout by Dr. Cromer in 1526.
From Messrs. Myers' Catalogue of Fine Books and Manuscripts, No. 270.

We were writing the other day about Mr. A. Edward Newton, the books that he so well and charmingly writes, and the many wonderful ones that he has collected. The sale of his best known work, "The Amenities of Book-Collecting," first published in 1918, has by this reached a total of more than 25,000 copies. This is a remarkable record. It is a fascinating and a useful book, and no collector ought to be without a copy. It is the best book of its kind. But, as someone wrote the other day, "Mr. Newton is not a professional author—he is a manufacturer of electrical machinery."

We have just received an interesting book from Monsieur H. le Savoureux. It is on "Chateaubriand," and appears in the "Maîtres des Littérateures," published by Rieder. There is a valuable bibliography at the end of the volume, and some beautifully produced photogravures—sixty in all.

Some more limited editions worth buying:—



"Letters to A. C. Benson, from Henry James." Introduction by E. F. Benson.

"A War Story." By Richard Aldington.

"Capri." By Norman Douglas.

"On the Edge: Short Stories." By Walter De la Mare.
"Memories of an Infantry Officer." By Siegfried Sassoon.
"On Tennyson." By Humbert Woolf.

Here are some notes of recent sales of extraordinary interest: a three-page letter from Thackeray, with one of his typical drawings in it, of Thackeray drinking out of a glass at a banquet, £270; twenty-four Dickens letters, £430; a presentation copy of "Sketches by Boz," £175; twelve Tennyson MSS., nearly £5,000, including "The Princess," £1,750; first edition of Hardy's "Jude the Obscure," £112; Scott's "Tales of My Landlord," £1,420.

A Horn Book.

From Messrs. Bernard Quaritch's Catalogue of Books in English History and Literature from the Earliest Times to the end of the Seventeenth Century, No. 876.

The following collectors' books have been published recently:

"Hamlet," edited from the text of the Second Quarto by J. Dover Wilson, Litt.D., illustrated by 80 wood engravings designed and cut by Edward Gordon Craig. There are five editions—£14, £20, 40 guineas, 50 guineas, 105 guineas.

"John Austen and the Inseparables: A short study of his Art as a Book Illustrator." By Dorothy Richardson.

"Celeste, and Other Sketches." By Stephen Hudson. Illustrated by John Nash. Limited signed edition of 50 copies containing an additional set of engravings. 650 copies on all-rag paper.

"The Apes of God." A novel of 625 pages. By Wyndham Lewis. 3 guineas. Limited to 750 copies.

"The Fall of the House of Usher." By Edgar Allan Poe. With 100 original aquatints by Alexander Alexeiff. 7 copies on antique Japanese vellum, containing three additional sets of the engravings, 10 guineas; 25 copies, Japanese vellum, with one additional set of the engravings, 6 guineas; 300 on Pannekock paper, 2 guineas.

"The Village Book." By Henry Williamson. There is an edition at 7s. 6d., and also a limited edition. Of the latter only 504 copies, signed by the author, have been made, and published at 2 guineas. This is a fine piece of book-making, and a superb piece of writing, and every collector should secure a copy of it if possible. Here is an instance where we should have one of each edition. We had gone to press with our last issue, in which we had intended to have mentioned this book by Mr. Williamson.

A FINE BATCH OF CATALOGUES.

If I had many pages allowed me I could fill them with notes about the catalogues that reach me each month from my antiquarian book-selling friends. Since I wrote my last notes I have received at leasty eighty lists. Who among us, having a love of books, and a delight in the gathering of those for which we search, would look unresistingly upon the catalogues of old and rare books, and first editions?

There was that list from Broadhurst. It held me for a much longer time than it should. Its wrapper appealed at once. It read: Rare Books—First Editions. That was all. And then the address. By the way, the addresses of the firms whose lists I write about, ought to be found elsewhere in these pages. If I added all that information, these notes would have to be greatly curtailed. The Broadhurst catalogue is a nicely produced affair, and is crowded with rare and important books, including a first edition of Charles Reade's "The Cloister and the Hearth," £225; and Sheridan's "The Rivals," £315. Besides the original MS. of Edward Lear's "The Nonsense Alphabet," £125, there is a host of other good and delectable things in this list.

A nice little list comes from "The Little Bookshop." It is numbered 6, and contains many excellent first editions in the first section. Part II concerns itself with general books, among which are some attractive ones. But I discovered a few books in Part I that I am sure some readers would like to have, including very good and moderately priced copies of works by A. C. Benson, John Galsworthy, Robert Graves, Aldous Huxley, C. E. Montague, T. F. Powys, G. B. Shaw, Sacheverell Sitwell, H. M. Tomlinson and Hugh Walpole. I like the careful way Mr. Cruden describes his wares.

Mr. Harold Harewood's list, No. 52, makes good reading. I have mentioned his catalogues before, and this new one keeps up the standard. That is a feature which I find persistent among antiquarian booksellers—the care that is taken over the production; and the books that are offered us are always of the best kind. I felt this, too, when I went through a well arranged list, of most convenient size, that came to me from Capell. A very good list this, containing 250 first editions of modern authors. There is much intelligence and understanding in the arrangement of this catalogue, and the note at the beginning of it must be helpful to collectors. A list worth getting.

Two important catalogues have just arrived. One comes from Mr. Tregaskis, and the other from Pickering & Chatto. The latter list comprises a collection of old and rare books of, with a few exceptions, English Literature. There are many most valuable items in this. The other—the one from Tregaskis—describes nearly 250 books of geography, voyages and travel.

A fine, big catalogue of books on the Fine Arts comes from Mr. Quaritch. It must have taken a long time to prepare this, for the bibliographical information is most valuable and detailed. There are no less than 3,164 entries in this catalogue. There are books in it to be had for a shilling or so; and there are some that are priced at several hundred pounds. I notice, for instance, a copy of La Fontaine's "Contes et Nouvelles En Vers," published at Amsterdam in 1762, £300.

The Maggs catalogues calling for a note this month are: Modern First Editions, containing also some books on history, literature and biography, as well as some important books on printing and bibliography; and a most alluring List of Autograph Letters and Historical Documents. In the former there are collections of the works of A. E. Coppard, a presentation copy of "Adam and Eve" for £24; Sir Walter Scott, Thomas Campbell, Political Works in 2 volumes for £42; and many Shakespeare items. The catalogue of Autograph Letters is truly wonderful. It is of course beautifully printed, and contains 1,243 items.

Photo by W. Illingworth, Northampton. Mr. H. E. Bates.

Mr. Kyrle Fletcher has just sent me a list that is unusual in character. It is called "Theatre"—that and nothing more. It is a catalogue of theatrical books, as you might suppose. A list to have by one. And I should think that Mr. Fletcher has found the list commercially worth while. Another special catalogue comes from John Smith & Son. Here again the list should be of very great help to collectors. It is a most comprehensive piece of catalogue making, as it includes almost 2,000 works from modern presses, and books on the Fine Arts and Collecting, as well as a number of choice miscellaneous books.

An entry in R. Fletcher's latest list intrigues me. It is a collection of newspapers, autograph letters, portraits and views illustrative of the events from 1666 to 1690, including the revolution of 1688, for £25. What a wealth of interesting historical data there must be in this collection. This is in Catalogue 48, which also includes some fine examples of modern French illustration, and a great number of modern first editions. The latter particularly dominate the latest list from J. D. Miller. In this (No. 42) there are also many association copies and chap-books which are always so interesting, although not a great number of people collect the latter nowadays. Once there was a considerable rage for them, and I think there will be a revival of interest in them before long. Mr. Miller's catalogue also includes an association copy of Mr. Phillpotts's "The Folk Afield," and a number of original letters, for £50. It is a good list.

Numbers 67 and 68 Catalogues from Harold Hill concern books, tracts, engraved views, and other old prints relative to America; and books and old prints, including remarkable copies of Barrie's "The Little Minister," Blackmore's "Lorna Doone," as well as some finely bound eighteenth century sets from an old Northumbrian library which Mr. Hill recently purchased. And there is a valuable list (No. 819) recently issued by Sotheran. It is illustrated and gives, in much detail, particulars of an important library, formed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, for the most part in contemporary bindings. This list, No. 819, is Part II, dealing with works of history and archæology, theology and allied subjects. There is an addenda of scarce and interesting books from various sources. Altogether there are 1,670 items in this catalogue. A useful little list has been sent out by Mr. E. Guntrip covering a number of Alpine works, as well as others in exploration and travels in many countries.

An extremely important catalogue of books in English history and literature from the earliest times to the seventeenth century has just arrived from Quaritch. I always like this firm's lists because they usually contain books that are scarce and valuable. This present one, which is really only Part I (A–J), is priced at 7s. 6d., but they ask me to say that this amount will be refunded on the receipt of an order, which is not unreasonable, seeing that the catalogue must have taken a great deal of time and money to produce.

When I studied a certain side of music, I bought many books and pieces from Harold Reeves. I had not seen his list for some time; so I was more especially interested in his 89th, which has just come to hand. It contains many old and rare and interesting musical works, too numerous to mention. If there is any old musical book you want I'm sure you will find it in Mr. Reeves's shop. I see he has a copy of "The Compleat Violist, or An Introduction to ye Art of Playing on ye Bass Viol," £75. There is, Mr. Reeves says, and I accept his expert knowledge on this point, only one other copy.

Mr. Herbert Tremayne regularly sends along his interesting lists, and I should like to call attention to those issued by D. Webster, a selection of first editions mostly; Murphy & Sons, covering all kinds of books—a very interesting catalogue this is; Arthur Dean, for the general reader as well as the collector, including a possibly unique collection in fine condition of the first editions of Thomas Hardy; a catalogue of over 800 books from Preston & Co.; and short lists from C. E. Hewitt and Thomas Jenkins.

In the Bowes & Bowes 451st catalogue there are a number of books, dealing principally with the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Every now and then this house issues a list of Old-Time Literature, and this is the latest. The first was published in 1928. I like the Bowes method of printing, at the front of their list, twelve specially important works. Michael Williams has issued his second catalogue. A nice affair it is, too. It comprises the library of the late William Archer, and there is an interesting foreword about him.

H. E. BATES.

The collection of modern "firsts" is a puzzling one. To me an early Hardy or Kipling can never have the same appeal as, say, a Kronheim illustrated "Vicar of Wakefield" or a Pickering "Compleat Angler." The garish plates of the first-named book helped to fix the sad story of the "Mad Dog" indelibly on my infant mind, whilst the second brings back a vivid recollection of the tiny book so treasured by my grandfather.

In assessing the value of modern first editions the factors are (a) comparative rarity and (b) intrinsic worth. It is regrettable to note that (b) invariably comes a long way after (a). Accepting this working rule, there is one modern author who bids fair to rise steadily in value. None of his works have run into many editions, whilst all bear the marks of skilled and loving craftsmanship. The writer I have in mind is Mr. H. E. Bates. No doubt the editor of the "Collector" also shares my opinion, for it was not long since, in the columns of that section, we were advised that Mr. Bates was a man to "watch."

Mr. Bates hails from the Midlands, his home being at Rushden. Considering that his age is only twenty-five years, his output has been remarkable. After leaving school Mr. Bates—fired with the Grub Street spirit—tried journalism, and was for a time on the staff of a local paper. No doubt finding that provincial journalism and literature are not necessarily synonymous, the engagement soon terminated. During the next employment (in a leather warehouse) all spare time was taken up by writing; indeed since Mr. Bates found time to write (and burn) one novel, and to write another one, the days lived must have been truly laborious. At the age of nineteen the first novel was written. Before the twentieth birthday was reached it had found acceptance, fortunately coming under the review of Mr. Edward Garnett, in his capacity of reader for Messrs. Jonathan Cape. From that date there has been no looking back. The years following 1926 (the date the first novel was published) bear witness to the steady flow of published work. Not the least remarkable feature in connection with the work of Mr. Bates has been the high level of the review notices in the literary weeklies, and the estimation in which Mr. Bates is held by his more famous literary contemporaries, amongst the latter counting such names as Hugh Walpole, A. N. Monkhouse and Mr. Edward Garnett.

For the collector I have gathered the following bibliographical notes. It should be stated that now is the time to secure the items. Already the books are appearing in the better class of catalogue; already too a steady rise in price can be noted. What can now be bought for shillings will before long cost pounds.

The first work to be sought for is " The Last Bread." This, a slim octavo, in paper wrappers, was published in March, 1926. It was put forth by the Labour Publishing Co., London. There was no limited issue. Although the work is necessarily immature it must be secured, as it forms the basis of any collection of the author's work.

In June of the same year (1926) came the first novel. This, under the title of " The Two Sisters," was published by Messrs. Jonathan Cape. It contains a foreword by Mr. Edward Garnett. Bound in maroon cloth, it should be complete in designed paper wrappers. The dedication is to " My Father and Mother." Also an American edition.

In 1926 also was published " The Seekers: a Children's Tale." This was published by Messrs. Bumpus, and was (I think I am right in stating) adopted as a gift-book for Christmas distribution by this firm. Though slight, the item is a delightful one.

" Spring Song " was the work of 1927. It consists of two stories, and was published by Archer, London. In size it was a slim quarto, and the edition was limited to one hundred signed copies (of which ten were for America). An item that makes this book interesting was the inclusion of a portrait by Wm. Roberts. This artist will be remembered by his work in " Revolt in the Desert."

In 1928 was published " Day's End," a volume of collected stories. This work was published by Jonathan Cape. The dedication was to " George William Lucas—also a story-teller." There was also an American edition.

An important work came in 1929. This was the novel, " Catherine Foster," published by Jonathan Cape. It ran into two editions. Collectors however should be careful to note that there are two issues of the first edition. These are distinguished by their bindings: one in green, the other in grey. There was a limited edition of fifty signed copies. Two " de luxe " bindings—(1) dark green buckram; (2) royal blue buckram. The work was dedicated to Edward Garnett. In addition to the second edition, there was also an American edition.

" Seven Tales and Alexander " was published by the Scholartis Press in 1929. It was dedicated to Constance Garnett. The edition comprised 1,000 copies (950 only for sale), of which the first fifty were numbered and signed. Typographically the work is interesting: it is printed in twelve-point Baskerville, and the paper is Spalding & Hodge's " Antique de luxe." Cloth boards, complete in paper wrappers.

During the present year was published " The Hessian Prisoner." It came from the house of W. Jackson, London, and formed one of the delightful " Furnival Books." It has an illustration by John Austen, and an introduction by Edward Garnett. This book was the subject of a most appreciative review by The Times Literary Supplement.

Also 1930 has included the publication of a small work, " The Tree: a Tale." This work is limited to seventy-five copies and is published by Archer, London. Although not published till 1930, this is actually a very early work.

The above list comprises all items issued in book form up to date. No doubt the keen collector will also be anxious to secure the author's contributions to periodical literature. True, most of such contributions have been included in one or another of the later books, but there is a charm in securing such work in its original form. For obtaining such material the collector is referred to back numbers of the Nation, the New Statesman, the Bermondsey Book, the New Adelphi, Everyman, the London Mercury, the Criterion and the Manchester Guardian.

H. T. KIRBY.

[With the following reply from Mr. Kirby we close a very interesting correspondence. This ventilation of views is all to the good for publisher and reader. I think the net result of the correspondence is a moral for the reader to help the publisher as much as possible by indicating his needs and acknowledging service. The moral for the publisher is, sow your seed in as wide a field as possible and for a longer period than your crop seems at times to justify.—EDITOR.]

In connection with my recent article on " Catalogues " and the letters from booksellers commenting on a material extract therefrom, I have been invited to reply to the communications already published in the June, July and August numbers. I accept the invitation gladly.

Perhaps the first thing that struck me was that few of the writers attempted to dispute my division of their kind into three orders. On the contrary, most displayed an eagerness to attach label one, two or three (as the case might be) to their own particular business. The writer who stated that there were also three classes of collectors was burking the discussion; there may quite possibly be fifty-three, but the classification of collectors was not the point at issue. The letters were interesting, though, singularly enough, they seemed to vary in wisdom inversely with their length. Most of the shorter ones were admirable, and reflected the business-like attitude of the booksellers concerned. Many of the longer ones laboured the point and brought in irrelevant matter.

MUSIC.

My point that it ought to be good business to send catalogues regularly, quite irrespective of orders received, but simply to carry out the invitation printed on the cover of most lists, was confirmed by one firm. This firm not only carries out the practice but finds, strangely enough, that it pays! Another dealer suggests that although some pseudo-collectors use lists only for gathering information, their good service outweighs even this disadvantage. Personally I have never met the "pseudo-collector" (who sounds an awful fellow!), but am well acquainted with the "poor" collector, who belongs to quite another class. One letter states definitely that a member of class one cannot be a business man. Yet I have received catalogues, for quite ten years, from a firm who have built up probably the largest second-hand business in England.

In my opinion far too many dealers stress the question of the heavy cost involved in the production of lists. This seems beside the point. Catalogues, as one firm points out, are the tools of the trade, and good tools cost money. But the average booksellers' lists are negligible productions beside, say, the cloth-bound quarto of Harrods which reaches me free. I am aware the parallel is not exact, but the principle stands. Few booksellers indulge in three-colour work, yet I regularly receive catalogues from furniture, china, typewriter and other firms which are so beautifully produced that the cost must be a nightmare. Yet these all reach me free, nor am I asked to contribute towards the mailing cost—as one naïve letter suggests the catalogue-receiver should do. Catalogues—even the lordliest ones—are simply advertisement. Distributed amongst the public, they have at least a potential appeal. Unposted, they are but lumber. In any case there is no other link between the firm and the distant reader.

But one writer does not even seem pleased when orders ensue. Some of the orders, it appears, are classed as (a) insignificant or (b) isolated. Shades of gentle Elia saving up his hard-earned "insignificant" shillings for the "isolated" Beaumont and Fletcher! This classification, from a presumably business-like firm, so amazed me that I took the query to a large firm and asked them if they had orders so designated. "My dear sir," was the reply, "an order is an order with us; the great and the small are dealt with in exactly the same way. We are only too glad to get orders of any type." This set my mind at rest and assured me that there were still booksellers with sound commercial instincts.

Class three (payment for catalogues) found, I was glad to note, no defenders even amongst the trade. Paying for advertisements is so peculiarly un-English that I expected few advocates of the practice. Another point of mine was confirmed by the letter which points out that it is quite possible for a sequence of catalogues to be received before the collector may see an item that interests him. No single writer dwelt on the possibility of the list travelling farther, and often profitably, beyond the addressee. Yet this fact must be recognised, or the request, "When you have finished with this list please pass on to some book-loving friend," would not be seen so frequently.

To conclude, I can only submit that the question of catalogues is one which concerns an ever increasing public. Even if (and this is putting the lowest possible construction on the matter) catalogues only serve to get books talked about, much good is done. Intelligent discussion and understanding will, sooner or later, lead to intelligent buying.

H. T. Kirby.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

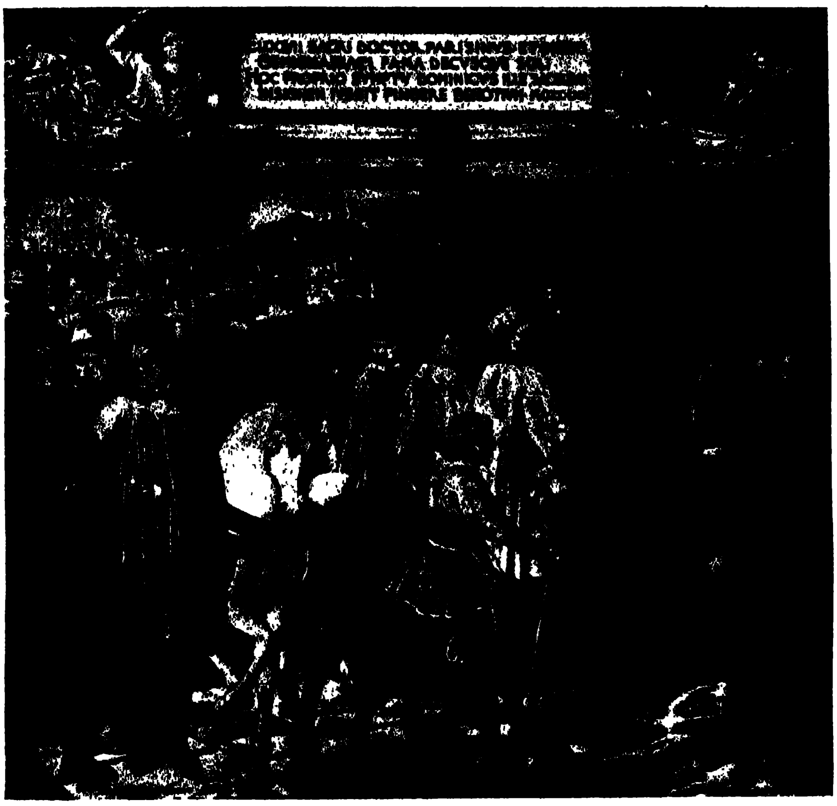
No. 469. Vol. LXXIX. OCTOBER, 1930. Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

1/- net monthly, except Special Numbers.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS (Post free including all Special Issues): British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, £1 3s. 6d. per annum. Foreign, £1 4s. per annum.

Editorial and Publishing Offices: St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

Registered at the G.P.O., London, for transmission to Canada and Newfoundland by Magazine Post.



Entered as Second Class Matter, March 15, 1929, at the Post Office at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879 (Sec. 397, P.L. and R.).

SAINT AUGUSTINE.

By Alfred Noyes.

THE fifteenth centenary of the death of St. Augustine of Hippo has brought indisputable evidence, from all over the world, of his living power upon the minds and hearts of men, and has revealed him as one of the few great figures that the mists of time are unable to drown or even to obscure. Origen and Tertullian are known as great distant luminaries are known to astronomers; but the power of St. Augustine is known and felt as the influence of the sun is known and felt by a man walking through the fields in spring-time. That marvellous book, the "Confessions," enables us to know him more intimately than we know most of our contemporaries. It is not only the fountain-head of all the subsequent attempts at self-revelation in literature, but it is the supreme example. It is by far the subtlest and also by far the most honest of them all, because it is inspired throughout by the most passionate and profound desire of human nature—the desire for truth and the search for God. The great saying in the opening paragraph—"Thou hast made us for Thyself: our hearts are restless till they rest in Thee."—was supremely true of Augustine himself, both as sinner and saint, as pleasure-seeker and athlete of the intellect; and the "Confessions" hold our attention as a great piece of music holds them—because this tremendous motif throbs through the whole, as the Pilgrim's March throbs through the fever of the Venusberg in Wagner's "Tannhauser."

It is the same motif that (applied to the lives of nations instead of to his own life) inspired that first real attempt at a philosophy of history—"The City of God." There are few more moving moments in the annals of the world than that in which St. Augustine, when the pagan civilisation of the Roman Empire was going down in ruins all around him, took up his pen and wrote of that other City, eternal in the heavens, and its outposts, militant here on earth.

Saint Augustine Leaves Rome for Milan.
From the painting by Benozzo Gozzoli, in the Church of Saint Augustine, San Gimignano. Photo: Alinari.
From "Saint Augustine," by Giovanni Papini (Hodder & Stoughton).

The volume of essays entitled "A Monument to St. Augustine," which Messrs. Sheed & Ward have now published to celebrate his fifteen centuries, deals with many aspects of his life and thought. The opening essay on St. Augustine and his age is by Mr. Christopher Dawson, the author of that remarkable book, "Progress and Religion." Mr. Dawson divides his essay into two sections, the "Dying World" and the "City of God," and (while he never departs from his subject, and is content to illuminate the period with which he is dealing) no intelligent reader can fail to catch the many reflections which touch the danger-points in our own age. The ancient signs are here—a material progress that has outstripped the ethical and the spiritual; a population that to a great extent has lost the most elementary ideas of religion, and is kept from chaos chiefly by customs that are merely survivals of a faith that has been lost, and by the modern equivalents of "bread and circuses."

"The democratic principle of the right of the citizen to be fed and amused at the expense of the State had been carried to its extreme conclusion. The corn dole involved a vast organisation . . . the free distribution of other articles such as oil, rice and bacon were added to the corn dole. Distributions (of money) were made to between 200,000 and 320,000 persons. No less important was the amusement of the people. The games of the circus involved enormous expenditure. . . . The Colosseum was created to serve the brutal amusements of the Roman populace. But the most characteristic amusements are the thermæ. . . . They were not mere public baths, but true palaces for the people. But from the moral and spiritual point of view it was less satisfactory. . . . Its ultimate end was the satisfaction of corporate selfishness. The religious element in ancient culture had almost disappeared." And with that disappearance, as St. Cyprian wrote, "uprightness in the forum, skill in the arts, discipline in morals" were disappearing also. Amidst this universal disintegration, St. Augustine, for whom "the existing order of things had no finality," was rapt in the consideration of another State. Mr. Dawson's subtle and profound essay should form an admirable antidote to the shallow irony of those chapters from Gibbon which have recently been detached from their context and published separately at the price of one shilling, for the benefit of "thinkers" on railway journeys, and in the hope of speeding the parting Guest—the Christ that has so long inhabited the deeper regions of the soul of man.

Saint Augustine.

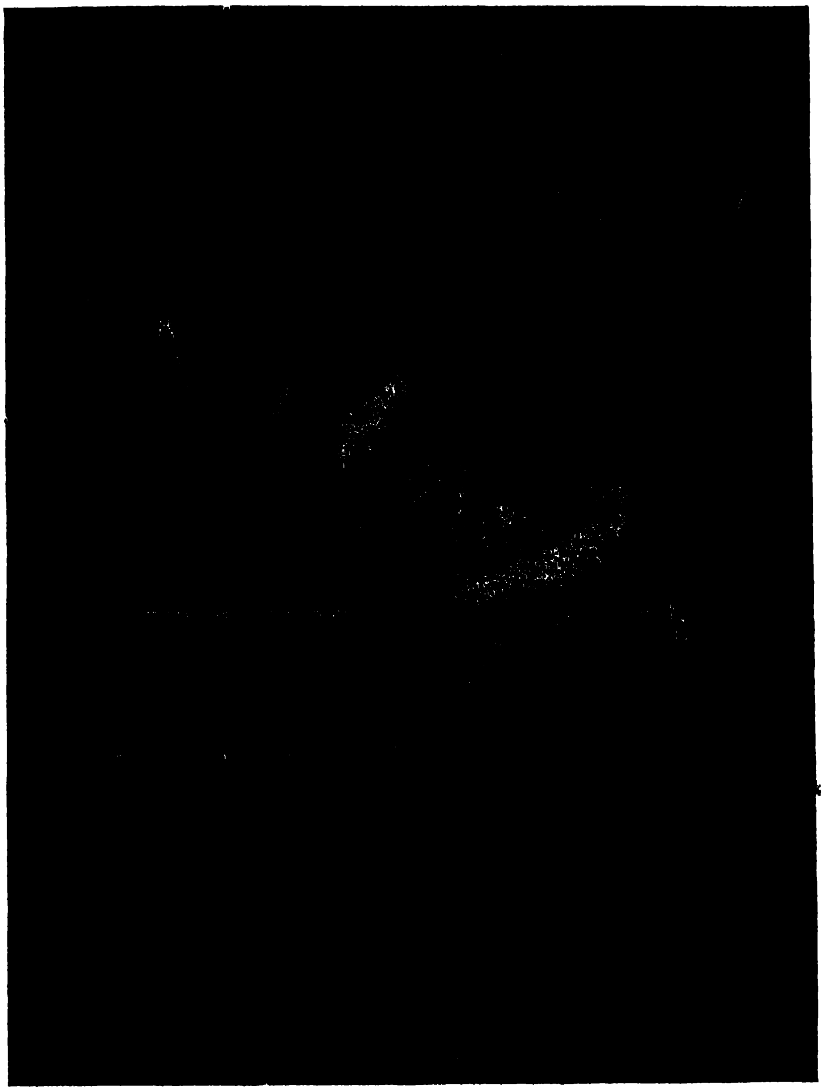
From "The Romance of the British Voluntary Hospital Movement." By A. Delbert Evans and L. G. Redmond Howard (Hutchinson).

Among the other essays there is an extremely interesting discussion of the relation of St. Augustine to St. Thomas Aquinas, by M. Jacques Maritain; a notable exposition of St. Augustine's Life and Character, by C. C. Martindale; and a beautiful and profound exposition of St. Augustine's philosophy by M. C. D'Arcy, S.J. The philosophy of St. Augustine has been overshadowed by other aspects of his life. But if it be the business of philosophy to discover the ultimate realities, and to illuminate man's destiny, the little volume of the "Confessions" is of greater value than all the Dialogues of Plato; and the whole of Plato's Republic has less significance than a single chapter in St. Augustine's "City of God." It is true that St. Augustine "took what he found" in the philosophy of Neo-Platonism; but in his use of it he develops it to ends beyond the reach of paganism. It assumes a new meaning, as the facts of nature assumed a new meaning in the light of Newton's discovery; and again it was the "gift of the Spirit in the might of love" that "renewed the whole expanse of knowledge." His lack of system is more than compensated by the fact that in the "Confessions" he is giving us the record of his own difficulties and his conquest of them; for this method has its own unity, and there is a strange likeness between his gropings and those of the intellectual world of to-day. "The Higher Pantheism" for instance is often little more than that early error of St. Augustine himself, of which he says: "Thee, O Lord, I imagined environing and penetrating Thy creation, as if there were a boundless sea through unmeasured space, and it contained within it some sponge, huge, but bounded; and that sponge, in all its parts, filled from the boundless sea. . . ."

St. Augustine's own examination of that vague conception (which was not too elementary however for Wordsworth and Shelley at times) might be illuminating to the present generation, especially in conjunction with the great passages on Time and Memory and Thought, which has "no parts or magnitude."

"And I entered into my inward self (Thou being my Guide), and beheld with the eye of my soul, above my mind, the Light Unchangeable. Not this ordinary light, which all flesh may look upon, nor as it were a greater of the same kind. Not such was this light, but other, far other from all these. Nor was It above my soul, as oil is above water, or the sky above the earth; but it was above my soul because It made me. He that knows the truth, knows what that Light is, and he that knows It knows eternity. Love knows that Light."

THE CONFESSIONS OF SAINT AUGUSTINE.*



We welcome this new edition from the Medici Press. Though fifteen centuries stand between us and the death of St. Augustine, the Confessions are as modern as the seventh chapter of Romans or the fifty-first Psalm. One comes to Augustine with all manner of purposes in mind, sometimes seeking the lover of words and a master craftsman in their use, or we come to these Confessions as the supreme diagnosis of the soul's diseases. Very soon however this great interpreter of the soul has his own way with us and bends us to his imperious will. Gradually we descend with him into the inferno of darkness and tumult and fire, and walk the dolorous way to light appointed for his feet; or we can take another line in this rich country and follow the keen, flashing curiosity of this master mind as it tested this philosophy and that creed, battling through the years to find that light and truth which only came as a revelation from the Father.

* "The Confessions of St. Augustine." 8 coloured Illustrations. 5s. (Medici Society.)

SAINT AUGUSTINE: SINNER, SAVANT AND SAINT.*

BY R. BIRCH HOYLE.

THE great saint of Hippo seldom figures in English literature. Newman, in his novel "Callista," preferred the North Africa of Cyprian's time—a century before Augustine flourished. In "Hypatia" Charles Kingsley gave a delightful sketch of the saint in his old age, and whetted the appetite for more by his hint at early struggles to subdue the flesh, which make "The Confessions of St. Augustine" one of the great works of the world, and the first in time of a large library of "intimate journals." In this year which witnesses the fifteenth centenary of Augustine's death (August 28th), several books have appeared on Augustine in English: one, by Miss Eleanor McDougall, deals with the bhakti, devotion to God, and seeks to interpret the fiery North African to the Indian mind; this, on our table, by Papini, depicts the very human being, with all his failings, struggles, toils and ultimate victory.

Saint Augustine.
From the painting by Botticelli, in the Chiesa d'Ognisante, Florence. Photo: Alinari.
From "Saint Augustine," by Giovanni Papini (Hodder & Stoughton).

Signor Papini has many qualifications for the task of writing what we venture to predict will be the standard life of St. Augustine. His own warm, passionate nature is akin to that of the Numidian; he has gone through a similar experience, as his autobiography witnesses, in his ascent from an Inferno of passion, through a Purgatory to a "second birth." He has the gift of style and glowing enthusiasm for his hero. "At first I admired him as a writer; I now love him as a son loves a father, and venerate him as every Christian venerates a saint." His full-length portrait of Augustine is not an idealised, imaginary romance; it is based on facts, documented throughout; the "Confessions" are cited literally, and Papini has rendered great service by extracting from that "Epistle to God," as he happily styles the "Confessions," the dramatic career of one equally great as a sinner, savant, saint, mystic and theologian. And yet there is romance enough in this life passed between North Africa and Italy in the generation which saw Rome fall before the hordes of Goths. Papini's aim has been "to write the story of a soul," and he has done it superbly. His book is as fascinating as a novel, as accurate as any historian could wish; it probes the inner mind with the skill of a psychoanalyst, and touches the springs of the deepest feelings.

Signor Papini makes no claim to be a theologian, though the theologian will find safe guidance to and through the vast tomes which embody the titanic output of the greatest of Latin fathers. Skilful use has been made of Freud's studies in psychoanalysis to elucidate Augustine's sexual perversions. Perhaps enough use has not been made of the influence of Tertullian's ascetic Montanistic views in shaping Augustine's Christian survey of his pagan past. It is interesting to see that Dean Inge, in his latest book, takes a different view from Papini ("Christian Ethics and Modern Problems," p. 99*f*). And on the question whether Augustine the Christian still retained his Neo-platonist doctrines as a basis and preparation for Christian theology, Papini and Dean Inge differ considerably.

This book is more than a biography. It is a vivid picture on a large canvas of a great epoch in history. Great characters, like St. Ambrose, Victorinus Afer, Faustus and especially Augustine's equally famous mother, St. Monica, are etched to the life. Great systems of thought—Manichæism, Neo-platonism, the New Academy and nascent Christian theology—are presented clearly in their actions and reactions upon one another as they clash in the soul of the man who is the meeting-point of all the forces at work in a stirring age. The closing chapter which describes the greatness of Augustine is very striking. It will stand alongside of Harnack's famous tribute in the "History of Dogma" as the Roman Catholic view painted with the brush of genius. Even the dour Protestant, like Dean Inge, will enjoy the reading of this life of a "whole man, a universal man," one who "is first a sinner and then a saint; first a professor and then a pastor; afterwards at the same time a cenobite and an executive (as bishop), a poet and a rationalist, a dialectician and a romantic, a traditionalist and a revolutionary, an eloquent rhetorician and a popular orator." We add, a great lover of woman and God.

* "Saint Augustine." By Giovanni Papini. Translated by Mary Prichard Agnetti. 12s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

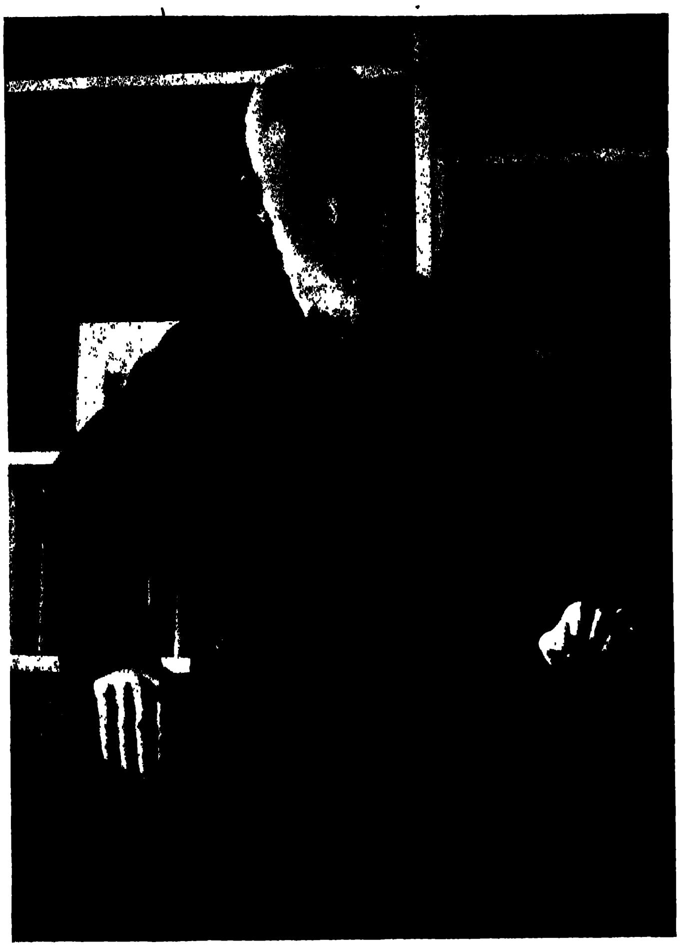
Death of Saint Monica.
From the painting by Benozzo Gozzoli, in the Church of Saint Augustine, San Gimignano. Photo: Alinari.
From "Saint Augustine," by Giovanni Papini (Hodder & Stoughton).

The translator has done her work well, though at times the Latinisms are found hard to translate into simple English. The bibliography, as was to be expected, is almost confined to Roman Catholic works, French and Italian; little use has been made of German research or of Anglican patristic study. Most helpful is the detailed chronology of the life and times of Augustine, and the index is full—an excellent guide into a vast treasure-house. The illustrations also add charm to a delightful book.

THE INHIBITIONS OF BERNARD SHAW.*

By R. Ellis Roberts.

I.



It would puzzle, I think, the most determined of psychologists if he were asked to classify Mr. Bernard Shaw, using for that purpose the fashionable categories of extravert and introvert. He is obviously interested in himself; he has never written a book, not even a Fabian tract, into which he does not enter; yet no one would call him an introspective, in the sense that epithet can be applied to Montaigne or Rousseau. He is the object rather than the subject of his books; and few authors have written so much about themselves and yet left so slight an impression of genuine self-analysis. Here he meets for a moment a very different Irishman, Mr. George Moore, for whom George Moore has always been one of the most remarkable events in modern history. The resemblance closes though very quickly; the Moore which interests George Moore is the Moore of gossip, of amorous adventure or invention, of friendliness, of small-talk, of places, plain or preposterous. The Shaw which interests Bernard Shaw is the intellectual Shaw, the thinker, the reformer, the economist—a Shaw almost it might seem without any distinct position in place and time, a Shaw with scarcely any merely friendly relationships. We know of course that he is a vegetarian, that he has views on doctors, married life, children, Ireland, phonetics, printing, world-politics and half a hundred other things. He has views—but has he any habits? He has convictions, and can transform a prejudice into a principle with a swiftness and dexterity that an ecclesiastic might envy. If he is capricious, one suspects that he is generally aware of it; and even chaos takes on a formal pattern when Mr. Shaw observes it.

Yet one knows perfectly well that, as Mr. Shaw is human, is a great dramatist and especially a great comic writer, he cannot always be entirely reasonable; not all his views can be traced to a purely intellectual origin. There are traces in some earlier essays that Shaw knows how he has made out of an accident, a mere circumstance, something which assumes a sort of organic connection with his personality; all men do this, but in the self-defence of forgetfulness most men are unaware. The little habits of thought which have grown in them, because when in infancy or childhood they gave hospitality to some purely nervous reaction, become so much a part of them that they forget altogether the first beginnings. Men as a rule desire nothing less than a continued freedom of choice, and so will pretend that some trait, long ago encouraged and adopted, is a part of their make-up, something as natural as the colour of the eyes or the shape of the head. Mr. Shaw generally thinks of himself as one clear unity, a Prince Rupert's drop of the human race, that can have nothing taken from it, but must be received or shattered as a whole. Yet there are as I say faint indications—in the preface to "Getting Married," in the preface to "Misalliance"—that after all once there was a time when, although the son of George and Catherine Shaw was in existence, George Bernard Shaw was not. The hints in these earlier prefaces are now confirmed and enlarged in the long autobiographical fragment which Mr. Shaw has published as an introduction to his first novel, "Immaturity," now issued in the limited collected edition of his works.

* "The Works of Bernard Shaw." 31 vols. £31 10s. (Constable.)

This essay is one of the finest pieces of writing that Mr. Shaw has achieved. It has all his directness and force, it has humour, rare descriptive power, and it has as well a tenderness and a mellow wisdom which are not always thought of as characteristic of him, in spite of their not infrequent recurrence in his later work. Among the few points of resemblance between Shakespeare and Mr. Shaw, one is evident. A friend of mine once complained sadly that the play of "Henry VIII" had a great deal of rubble and brickbats in it; there are few plays of Mr. Shaw's of which that is not true; and if for rubble and brickbats we read red herrings and cats'-cradles, there is a good deal in the essays. This autobiographical piece has none.

Bernard Shaw.

II.

"My able and flourishing friend A. tells me that he knows what poverty is and what drink is: was he not brought up in the Borough by a drunken mother? B., rolling in wealth, tells me that when he was a boy he had meat only twice a year. C., wallowing in fame, calls me a snob, after gleefully narrating his experiences in the kitchen of his father's small shop, and how he was enabled to study country house society by a childish privilege of visiting the servants' hall. How easily I cap these zests to success by the simple statement that my father was second cousin to a baronet, and my mother the daughter of a country gentleman whose rule was, when in difficulties, mortgage. That was my sort of poverty. The Shaws were younger sons from the beginning as I shall show when I reveal my full pedigree. Even the baronetcy was founded on the fortune of a fifth son who came to Dublin and made that city his oyster. Let who will preen himself on his Mother Hubbard's bare cupboard and play for sympathy as an upstart: I was a downstart and the son of a downstart. But for the accident of a lucrative talent I should to-day be poorer than Spinoza; for he at least knew how to grind lenses, whereas I could not afford to learn any art. Luckily Nature taught me one.

"This social dégringolade never stops in these islands. It produces a class which deserves a history all to itself. Do not talk of the middle class; the expression is meaningless except when it is used by an economist to denote the man of business who stands in the middle between land and capital on the one hand, and labour on the other, and organises business for both. I sing my own class: the Shabby Genteel, the Poor Relation, the Gentlemen who are no Gentlemen."

Those who can read that extract with imaginative intelligence will immediately get a new light on the plays and the character of its author. Has it ever been noticed that except for a few adventurers, such as Undershaft in "Major Barbara" and John Tarleton in "Misalliance" there are no business men in Shaw's plays? There is the tragi-comic sketch of the wretched clerk in "Misalliance," with his class-consciousness, his bitter desire for revenge, his pitiable incompetence, a figure that has no parallel in the rest of Shaw's theatre. If we would realise how vast a change has occurred in the thought of revolutionists in the last hundred years, compare this miserable, farcical little fellow with the drab melodrama of Godwin's "Caleb Williams" or the flashy melodrama of Lytton's "Eugene Aram." Of course Mr. Shaw's avoidance of the English middle class does not spring from snobbishness, however deeply unconscious; it springs partly from his early Irish environment and partly from this other fact, however little importance he may have attached to it, that he was a downstart. The world, society, had nothing to give him; for everything that could be given was his by right, only, by misfortune and for the moment, insufficiently realised. Mr. Shaw's real dislike of that great bulk of the English people is not then purely economic; it has its roots in more obscure sources, and is something beyond the control even of Mr. Shaw.

For one learns from this preface that, controlled and controlling as Mr. Shaw is, there are certain things outside even his power of regularising. One of the most evident characteristics of his theatre is the fear and absence of every emotion, and the extraordinary unsentimental and untruthful attitude to the family and even to friendship. Where most novelists and playwrights make a story out of a growing attachment, Mr. Shaw tends to give the history of a detachment. In "Mrs. Warren's Profession," in "You Never Can Tell," in "Man and Superman," in "The Doctor's Dilemma," in "Heartbreak House" the drama consists largely in the successful escape from or avoidance of personal relationships. The violent, almost biological progress of the love-affairs is no contradiction of this, for to Mr. Shaw—even as to D. H. Lawrence—a love-affair need be little except an appetite, a habit and the hope of fidelity. It is true in "Getting Married" Mrs. George is given to speak a passage which might be interpreted as a confession of belief in some mystical view of love—but Mrs. George is almost as doubtful an oracle as Father Keegan. Even Joan, whose history is the record of the triumph of personality, wins in Mr. Shaw's play less by personal contact than by the soundness of her instinct. She is a clubwoman rather than comrade. In many places, in the essays and in the plays, Mr. Shaw enormously exaggerates the difficulty of personal contact, of intimacy. No doubt for some neurasthenics the minor details of married life—the heat of a room, the degree a window should be open, the colour of the walls, the style of the furniture, the kind of pictures—may be mountains of almost insuperable conflict; but most people find the clashes that occur when people are married occasions for learning, for concession and even for instruction. Now in this introduction Mr. Shaw has solved the problem of why he so over-emphasises the troubles that come when a family lives together. He writes with simplicity and dignity, and he writes what only he has a right to tell us. It should be emphasised that he has that right, and that he has exercised it decently and humanely; there is much in the other passages about his father that show him not at all incapable of appreciating in him many traits which to the youthful, Puritan Shaw could not atone for the one grave fault and for its consequences in the home:

> "Unfortunately or fortunately (it all depends on how you look at it) my father had a habit which eventually closed all doors to him, and consequently to my mother, who could not very well be invited without him. If you asked him to dinner or to a party, he was not always quite sober when he arrived; and he was invariably scandalously drunk when he left. Now a convivial drunkard may be exhilarating in convivial company. Even a quarrelsome or boastful drunkard may be found entertaining by people who are not particular. But a miserable drunkard—and my father, in theory a teetotaller, was racked with shame and remorse even in his cups—is unbearable. We were finally dropped socially. After my early childhood I cannot remember ever paying a visit to a relative's house. If my mother and father had dined out, or gone to a party, their children would have been much more astonished than if the house had caught fire."

Some exceptionally stupid people, whose eye for sensation is so trained that they can see nothing really sensational—like people who light a magnesium flare to look at a picture-gallery of masterpieces—missed altogether the passion behind these quiet sentences. There is a sensation here; but it is not that Mr. Shaw's father was a drunkard; it is that Mr. Shaw owes to that unhappy fact many of his most conspicuous traits. His pride, his sensitiveness, his quickness, his sympathy for women, his hatred of obligatory intimacy, his deep distrust of emotionalism, his horror of exaggeration, and perhaps his firm belief in conversion (as seen in "The Devil's Disciple" and "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet")—all these may, I think, be traced to his efforts as a boy to cope with a domestic situation than which none can be more difficult, more poignant, more heartbreaking.

III.

As I re-read passages from the early novels, and looked through those of the plays which have been issued in this series, I was once again struck with the truth of Mr. Chesterton's diagnosis of Mr. Shaw as a Puritan. Neither he nor I, in spite of our grave dissensions from that religion, could use the word Puritanism as a term of abuse or contempt. It is a philosophy found equally among Catholics as among Protestants, and found before the days of Christendom, in the thought of Plato. It consists fundamentally, if we do not consider its minor accretions, in a belief that many natural things are so dangerous as to be better avoided. Occasionally it slips over, and its advocates are betrayed into the Manichæan heresy; but often Puritanism stops short of that, though too often it stops short only by loading human nature with that vileness which the Manichees ascribed to the natural order altogether, whether in men or other created things. Puritanism at its best is merely a form of asceticism, a way of life, but is based on the indubitable fact that one cannot have one thing in life, or follow one road, without avoiding some contrary thing or some opposite road. The real trouble with a great deal of modern literature, especially modern fiction, is that the authors assume that certain incompatible things are incompatible only because their grumpy elders say they are; they refuse to believe in the genuine incompatibility imposed on us by natural conditions. To take a simple instance: It is not possible to swim for an hour in the open sea and keep dry; yet out of the novels published to-day about modern young people, I should say quite half refuse to recognise this quite elementary fact. Then it is too often assumed that there is only one kind of positive experience, experience that entails obvious and rather sudden changes. Many novelists write as though the loss of virginity by a young man or a young woman must always be an astounding and valuable experience, while the preservation of virginity is treated as if it were a mere deprivation. The truth is of course that both experiences may be thrilling to those who are capable of really intense emotion. Christina Rossetti experiences as much as Elizabeth Browning, and Gerard Hopkins as much as Coventry Patmore. Indeed, if one takes the history of the great artists, one will always find a strong element of asceticism, a recognition of the truth that what one has, one has to buy. "Take what you want, says God; and pay for it." So wrote Emerson; and there is something in Shaw's philosophy—its self-reliance, its belief in a Cosmic power, that makes him akin to the transcendental philosopher. His work stands as a grave reminder in an age which is more flippant and less entertaining

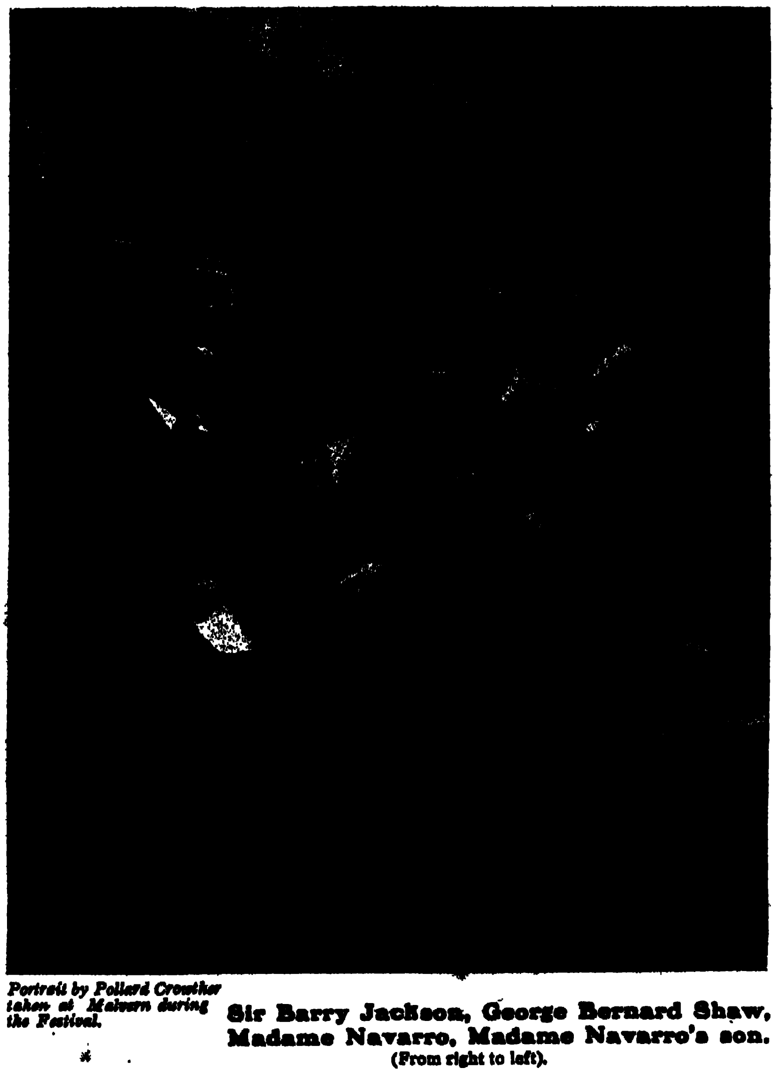
SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
OCTOBER, 1930.

From a drawing by PEGGY SMITH.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN," OCTOBER, 1930.

THE DESIGN FOR ELIZABETH BARRETT IN "THE BARRETTS OF WIMPOLE STREET." BY PAUL SHELVING.



than he, that without discipline, without deliberate intellectual purpose no great art can have that noble astringent quality which will enable it to defy the destructive work of the ages. In the future some critics may find Shaw's work dry, perverse, eccentric, opinionated—but they will never find it corrupt; it will preserve that high quality of immarcesibility that is the reward of those who have never betrayed the reason, who have followed dialectic brilliantly and with patience.

WITH BERNARD SHAW AT MALVERN.

By HORACE SHIPP.

"WHY Malvern?" queries the confirmed Pelmanist, seeking some association of idea between the little spa town and the dramatist whose Festival has become an annual event there. Nobody seems to know. One may surmise the enterprise of a municipality with enough enthusiasm for the township to lay themselves out to encourage the scheme, and the enterprise of a group with enough enthusiasm for the theatre to acquire a fine modern playhouse and to use it for worth-while drama. There may have been links with Sir Barry Jackson, or even with Shaw himself; but how and why the Festival happened matters little beside the main fact that for some precious weeks this August Malvern was the centre of modern English dramatic life, with Shaw in the flesh as one of the happy spectacles of its streets, and a well-produced repertoire of his plays as the chief spectacle of its theatre.

It is a happy idea. Here in England we have far too little of that Festival spirit which draws us in thousands to Salzburg, Bayreuth or Oberammergau. Stratford has a certain vogue, but it is chiefly with American, Continental and Colonial visitors. Next year, when its new theatre is ready, it may make a new bid for support, and it may work in well with its near, new rival. Malvern from the beginning has attracted the "right" people—a term which does not connote the élite plutocracy of the Riviera, but the more conspicuous intelligentsia whose opinions somehow percolate to the great mass of thinking people and ensure lasting success for such a venture. The schoolgirls who haunt the doors of the theatre armed with autograph albums must get a surprising "bag," especially as they have been heard to ask, "Is that one of them?" as they swooped down upon potential prey. Since among "them" however could be numbered such folk as Phyllis Neilson-Terry, Gwen Ffrangcon-Davies, Cedric Hardwicke, Rudolf Besier, Rutland Boughton, and Lilian Bayliss (to take names at random), the wide-net method of collecting was probably justified.

Portrait by Pollard Crowther taken at Malvern during the Festival. Sir Barry Jackson, George Bernard Shaw, Madame Navarro, Madame Navarro's son. (From right to left).

Presiding spirit over all this, Shaw himself continues to demonstrate his abundant and protracted youth. One sees him laughingly playing hide-and-seek with Pollard Crowther's invincible camera as he dodges it round the pillar of the portico; or striding down to the jolly bathing pool for a morning dip; dashing round from his hotel to a rehearsal; or enjoying the plays, clad in that wonderful ancient-mariner costume with its surmounting cloth cap which he has decreed for himself as correct evening wear. His laugh and presence fills the lobby in the intervals, and only the giant person of his fellow-dramatist, Rudolf Besier, seems able to stand along with that upright figure. All of which personalia would rightly belong only to the febrile mentality of the popular gossip columns were it not that Shaw's seventy-four-years-old youth is the triumphant vindication of his theories—those theories of vegetarianism, abstinence and general direction towards He-ancientry which are regarded with such repugnance by the average even mildly sensuous man.

If one were asked for one word which would give the key-note to both the man and his work it would be the word health. He sees civilisation, as we have allowed it to happen, as a sick thing; and almost everything he writes is directed to its healing. At Malvern we were able to sense something of the totality of that work because the plays chosen were spread over the whole of his career, from "Widowers' Houses," his first tilt at the rottenness, the ignorance and shams of economic life, to "The Apple Cart," his last tilt at the rottenness, ignorance and shams of political life. "Candida," "Getting Married," "The Admirable Bashville," "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets" and "Heartbreak House" were the other Shaw productions during this remarkable fortnight, and during their passage the process of sham-baiting continued without interruption. Excellently suited to the Shavian atmosphere, Rudolf Besier's play, "The Barretts of Wimpole Street," earns the high praise of being worthy to be the novelty of this year's Festival. We went to it expecting to be charmed by the sentimental idyll of the Browning love romance; we left it realising that we had witnessed the indictment of an era. It took its spiritual place in the midst of the cycle of Shaw's plays inasmuch as here too we saw the triumph of mental and bodily health over an existence warped and wasted by sham thinking and living.

Three things stand out from any broad consideration of Shaw's work. One is his extraordinary consistency; the next is his terrifying sincerity; the third is his constructiveness as a thinker. By an irony worthy of his own pen he has become in the popular imagination the symbol of exactly the reverse qualities. Amusing enough, but destructive and inconsequent as is the privilege of jesters; thus the popular press have presented him. Sentences of typical Irish wit, taken from their significant context in his writing and in his lectures, have contributed to that portrait; inability to understand the meaning of the plays and hasty criticism of first performances; the very fundamentalism of his ideas; acceptance of the least important and neglect of the greater works: these things have all played their part in creating the popular press view of the dramatist and his work.

That view is not only wrong—it is the reverse of the truth. Yet the truth does not prevent him being the finest comedy writer living, with a fund of wit and humour which keeps an audience shaking with laughter. Nor does it deny that the laughter is that of an iconoclast toppling over the gods of this world and revealing their feet of clay. We shall miss much of the quality of Shaw if we miss that humour; we shall miss even more if we allow our minds to stop at it. For beyond stands the constructive thinker anxious to create real things in place of those he has overthrown.

In economics, equality of income; in religion and philosophy, evolution along the lines of the doctrines of Lamarck; in social life, the belief which Emerson expressed when he said, "An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man"; in personal life, control and direction: these things Shaw has never ceased to believe nor omitted to advocate. They are great things which would shake society to its foundations, and demand an austerity in our personal lives such as few of us are willing to adopt; that is why it is so much easier to reject them and take refuge in the false idea that he is a sentimentalist, self-publicist, paradox-monger and the world's best jester. Which is the dishonest way of rejecting his ideas. But be warned—they are as dynamic as the explosive hoard which Shotover of "Heartbreak House," kept in the pit and which blew up the capitalist and the charlatan-burglar when the crash came.

It was one of the thrills of Malvern that we were able to renew acquaintance with that particular play—Shaw's greatest excursion into symbolism and, in its picture by metaphor of England and the War, one of the most significant of his dramas. When it came to London it went badly and ran for only six weeks. To-day . . . I wonder. There is a dash too much of the earnest Shaw in it for us to accept, even though we have followed the world in acknowledging his genius.

Alongside enthusiasm for G. B. S. one often feels that he lacks a sense of beauty; perhaps one should rather say he lacks an immediate sense of beauty. He sees it greatly, austerely, as Lilith's speech at the end of the Methuselah Cycle proves. He seems a little impatient with it in its lesser manifestations; and, ultra-Puritan that he is, regards it as yet another of the snares of the flesh which must be excluded from that ideal "seventh degree of concentration." For me the matter is aggravated by his treatment of poets, and in this connection I pray earnestly that his witnessing of the Browning play at Malvern will cure him of the vain imagination that the creation of poetry carries with it the last degree of neurosis. There may be poets like Eugene Marchbanks, but many of us have happier experiences of the race. At Malvern Marchbanks was made particularly tiresome, and although Derrick de Marney, who played the part, worked carefully the growing strength of the character, the first impression of weakness of the knees was impossible to throw off. If I may air another grumble, it is against Phyllis Neilson-Terry's fashionable Candida. It may have been more her clothes than her acting, for a stage gown should express the character and not the dressmaker's art. It was interesting that the stage setting and the costumes were in the modes of to-day, and save for slight minor references the thirty-five-years-old play did not date at all.

"Heartbreak House" is timeless while England stands where it did. Cedric Hardwicke's performance as Shotover is masterly, and happily Sir Barry Jackson plans to give London playgoers another chance to appreciate this great play. The demand in it for directed effort, instead of prejudice and muddle, might be a leaf out of Mr. Wells's book. The Malvern production of the play was one of the best things there, and as we get farther away from the circumstances which called this work into being, we are better able to realise the sweep of its views. Settled comfortably back again in our chairs in Heartbreak House or Horseback Hall, Shaw's 1906 tract for the times becomes a dire prophecy.

It is not the purpose of this article however to give individual consideration to the plays. To the literary minded the opportunity of seeing both "The Admirable Bashville" and "The Dark Lady" awakened old controversies about Elizabethan drama, but neither piece seems to lose anything in the passage of years. The National Theatre, for which the latter was an ingenious plea, remains a dream unfulfilled. Indeed it is one of the tragic facts about Shaw's special pleadings that they have had so little apparent effect. Widowers'

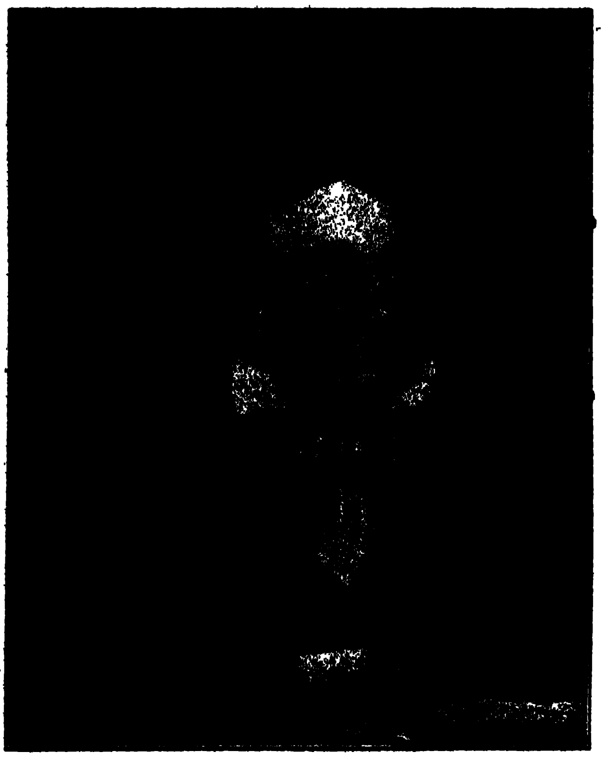
Houses still produce their rack rents; the marriage laws still stand where they did when the inimitable Mrs. George first went into her inspired trance in 1908; and the walls of Heartbreak House remain unshaken by passing bombs, whatever may have happened to the foundations. Shaw was only faintly right in thinking that the vicarage was blown up.

In this matter of progress Rudolf Besier's play was much more heartening, for, dealing with a period less than a century since, it showed a condition of things now passed away. We marvelled that nobody before Mr. Besier had seen the dramatic possibilities of the tempestuous advent of Robert Browning into the household where Edward Moulton Barrett tyrannised over his children in such amazing style. As the play developed we realised that it might stand almost for a symbol of the coming of the new spirit into the gloom of Victorianism; it seemed miraculous that such clear symbols could be taken straight from literary history.

Martin Harvey as Blanco in "The Showing up of Blanco Posnet."
By George Bernard Shaw.
From "The Book of Martin Harvey" (Henry Walker).

In the five episodes staged in Elizabeth Barrett's room we saw the whole tragedy of that repressive era: the father himself, whose Puritanism had become an obsession akin to madness; the six sons from whom independence and individuality had been long since crushed; the daughter, Henrietta, with her passionate outbursts of revolt beaten back until she took refuge in the clandestine and in lying; the other daughter who had accepted her father's will at his own valuation; the cousin, that Victorian minx trading upon her baby face and simulated stupidity to secure a rich husband and get her own way in everything; and finally Elizabeth, exquisitely played by Gwen Ffrangcon-Davies, with the quiet determination of the essentially free spirit. It may be that the play was at fault in its portrait of Robert Browning, for we were only shown the knight-errant breaking through all the inhibitions of that home, and the difficulties which stood between himself and his lady. There was little suggestion of the fineness of mentality which made the poet. On the other hand, every touch given to Elizabeth revealed the nuances of her character. It was impossible to tell which were put in by the author and which were the contribution of the actress, but the completeness of the conception was a truly noteworthy creation.

Watching the play, it seemed incredible to our modern generation that Edward Moulton Barrett could have existed. Had the author, with his awful hint of dark sex obsessions and repressed passions for the pretty niece and even for Elizabeth herself, made him too much the ogre? The authentic biographies paint an ugly picture, but it is more charitable to think of Besier's portrait as the quintessence of a type. Thus we can justifiably expand the romance of the poetess into its wider dimension as the expression of the very spirit of true freedom; and see her delivery from the darkened sick-room into the sunlight of Italy as the triumph of that spirit. And thus—as a phase of the institution of the family, as a picture of a social era, as a study of the evolution of the human spirit towards health and enlightenment—"The Barretts of Wimpole Street" has its rightful place in this Shaw Festival. That it succeeds in being an idyll with more than one beautifully written love scene must also be recorded. It entered the Festival handicapped, for it had been hoped that Shaw himself would write another play; but it won its way immediately even against these odds, and remains an outstanding memory.



With this venture at Malvern the whole idea of the dramatic Festival in England must stand or fall. It should both help and be helped by the presence of nearby Stratford-on-Avon. Certainly no pleasanter places could be found than these two. The situation of Malvern at the foot of its noble hills; its beautiful abbey; its fine group of theatre, cinema, concert hall and pump-room on the terraces above the Priory Park; the jolly alfresco life of the park itself—all these make an ideal setting for a Festival. Add Sir Barry Jackson's enthusiasm, Shaw's own interest, the intellectual give and take of his drama, and the presence of the Shavian audience and theatre-lovers, and the future of the Malvern Festival is one of the optimistic auguries in the world of the theatre.

STUDIES IN KEATS.*

BY HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

THE six essays contained in this book do something more than fill gaps, as they were designed to do, in Mr. Murry's previous book, "Keats and Shakespeare." Three of them at least take us further into the creative depths of Keats' being than any other essays which we have read. The secret of all profound interpretation lies in the critic's capacity to feel his way to his subject's creative centre. Only when he has achieved this (and how seldom it is achieved!) can he really understand the events which lie as it were on the circumference, because he recognises each as the necessary radiation of a unique spiritual force. And it is only by thus divining a life from within, instead of imposing in some degree our own order upon it from outside, that we can really come to experience it as a rounded whole, as a manifestation of being divinely inevitable no less in its tragedy than in its triumph.

John Keats

From the water colour miniature by Joseph Severn.

In his essay on Keats' declaration that "Beauty is Truth," Mr. Murry discusses once again, with a concentrated depth of understanding, this faculty of entering into life with a passionless passion and an inspired disinterestedness, untainted by the slightest quiver of personal prejudice. "What words," he writes, "can there be to describe this seeing of the world and of ourselves with a vision from which all passion has been dissolved away; with a vision which is unclouded by any desire or any regret; by any belief or any anxiety: this moment of untroubled lucidity in which we are unmoved spectators of the great drama of human destiny."

And if occasionally in his "Keats and Shakespeare" a certain feverish subjectivity clouded the purity of his vision, in these essays he has humbled himself so sensitively to Keats, has exercised that imaginative insight which, as he says, is in its purity a love of the mind, that he comes as near being the poet whom he interprets as any critic could. In short he has not merely studied the life and poetry of Keats. He has lived it and in such living there is agony as well as ecstasy. For the Beauty which is Truth must be paid for in suffering and in renunciation.

The essay in which he ponders the significance of the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" provides perhaps the most notable evidence in this volume that he has proved on his own pulses the relation between Beauty and Truth which, as he writes, "exercised the mind and heart of Keats throughout his life, and was the chief form into which his search for a purpose in life was cast." But because he has experienced the central mystery, the creative purpose which underlay and dictated, however obscurely, his subject's every act and word, he can really enter into his life at any point in its development and recreate it from within. The moments which he chooses to concentrate on in other essays are the sonnet "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer," the fourth book of "Endymion" and the sonnet "On Visiting the Tomb of Burns," which Keats copied into a letter to his brother Tom during his disastrous walking tour in Scotland with Charles Brown. In each of these poems Keats' experience culminated in an expressive act and each act is distinctive. It represents a certain point of achievement and self-knowledge in that exploration of the meaning of life, that complete submission to experience to which Keats so heroically dedicated himself. At the same time each is bound to each by the ties of an organic continuity. They have their necessary place and can only be fully appreciated as "the conscious last of a whole series of unconscious acts of poetic creation." And the most convincing evidence of Mr. Murry's true identification of himself with his subject lies in his really remarkable power of at once analysing Keats' condition in a certain month and year of his life, while at the same time relating his analysis not only to conditions which immediately preceded or succeeded that which he is considering, but to the full synthesis of Keats' whole organic growth through that vale of soul-making which he recognised life to be.

And this uncanny depth of divination which perceives the unfolding of a life like the unfolding of a flower

* "Studies in Keats." By J. Middleton Murry. 7s. 6d. (Oxford Press.)

From a drawing by KATE EDWARD.

WALTER DE LA MARE.

appears even in his first essay, which deals with a comparatively unimportant event in Keats' career—his brief youthful association with George Felton Mathew and his female cousins, while in a final note on Keats' use of the word "speculation," to mean imaginative contemplation, he shows once again his sure intimacy equally with the rich depths and the significant idiosyncrasies of the poet's mind.

THE POETRY OF VIOLET JACOB.

By CHARLES GRAVES.

THE appeal of the vernacular literature of Scotland may be limited, yet within its limits it is still a powerful engine of expression. There are reasons other than sentimental why the verse of a poet like Mrs. Violet Jacob should have so strong an appeal. One of them—though in her case hardly the chief—is also one of the main reasons advanced for the continued encouragement of the Scots vernacular. It is that the Scots tongue possesses words which have no equivalent in English, outside a few purely local dialect words which have never found a sure foothold in the literature of England. These are words which are too vital to be lost, and which, in a few cases, are actually creeping into English speech. But many words of equal value with those which have been retained have been allowed to become obsolete, and those who would revive them run the risk of being accused of pedantry. Hence it follows, despite the recent attempt by certain writers to reinstate many of the older words, that there are few modern users of the Doric who play the instrument as it was once played.

This attitude to linguistic revivalism in Scotland is just, in so far as it is aimed at a false archaism; but it is, in another sense, part of a stupid conventionality which would deny the poet the artist's privilege of selection. English poets have always considered themselves free to revive obsolete words, and in some cases have actually restored them to the common stock of speech. The denial of selection to writers in the Scottish vernacular has had the disastrous effect of standardising Scottish verse. Until quite recently a vernacular poet was prohibited by an unwritten law from using Scots imaginatively. Even now, when he is foolhardy enough to do so, someone is sure to tell him that he never heard such or such an expression used in this or that particular district.

The written Scots tongue has in fact been pauperised by both conscious and unconscious restriction, and the process in its results is comparable to that which modern educationists in China have employed in the matter of their own vernacular tongue. In that country from the pai-hua or common, spoken language a thousand "easy" characters have been chosen, with a view to simplifying the knowledge of Chinese among the illiterate population. In Scots, the stock of words in use has been so reduced that until recently nearly all modern poets writing in the vernacular underwent a severe initial handicap in the race for distinction. Burns, even allowing for the purely local words he used, is no longer understood to the full by many Scotsmen, though even with Burns the language was already disintegrating.

When an approach is made to the work of Violet Jacob, the transition becomes plain. In that writer's "Songs of Angus" there are perhaps no words to be found over which any Scotsman will hesitate and few which it is not possible for the Englishman with the merest acquaintance with Scots to understand. Mrs. Jacob does, it is true, supply us with a glossary of sixty-six words, but among these are such common terms as "wean," "tint" (lost), "syne," "lum" and "loon." Most of her Scots poems made their first appearance in English journals, and this is a fact which in itself is significant. One cannot charge her with watering down the Scots in which she writes, for she is writing in a living language, and the spontaneity of her Scots poems results from her choice of so natural a method of expression. The fact remains however that it is little more than a dialect in which she writes.

In point of fact it is the Angus dialect on which Mrs. Jacob's verse is based, and Mr. John Buchan, when writing a preface to "Songs of Angus," felt under an obligation to defend this use of the vernacular and to point out that Mrs. Jacob wrote in "good Scots, quite free from misspelt English or that perverted slang which too often nowadays is vulgarising the old tongue." That may be so—and Mr. Buchan no doubt expresses in this phrase something very vital—but at the same time the language of these poems is significantly free from Scots substantives:

> "The land is white, an' far awa'
> Abune ae bush an' tree,
> Nae fit is movin' i' the snaw
> On the hills I canna see;
> For the sun may shine an' the darkness fa'
> But aye it's nicht to me."

That is the opening stanza of "The Blind Shepherd" which, by including it in "Northern Numbers," Mr. C. M. Grieve evidently thought representative of Mrs. Jacob's work. Connectives and the common verbal contractions figure largely in such language as is here employed, and as these must be more or less stereotyped, it follows that the pattern is not a rich one and that, though it be expressive, it is not individually expressive. This is the great fault from which Scots verse has been and still is suffering, for, if the poet does not attain individuality, he had perhaps better not write at all.

It may be taken—and this is particularly true of her work in Scots—that it is not Mrs. Jacob's primary intention to exploit her individuality in her own person. Mrs. Jacob is also a novelist, and those who hold with Mr. John Galsworthy the canon that all great art is impersonal will not quarrel with her for the sake of the attitude she adopts. When her own personality does break through, it is chiefly in her English verse, but even there the occasions are rare.

In a section of a collection of poems, which she published in 1905, which is probably the most interesting section in that collection and which, save for one or two isolated instances, contains the more characteristic work in the book, Mrs Jacob concludes a poem entitled "The Resting-Place" with the following stanza:

"Mayhap, thy spirit loved what mine loves best;
The tread of horses and the pride of life,
The jungle's magic and the joy of strife,
The long nights spent beneath the spangled sky—
O dead Mahommedan! Thy passing guest
By these accepts from thee this meed of rest;
Salaam, O Bhai!"

This passage is an excellent example of Mrs. Jacob's facility—a virtue not to be despised—and passages such as this are welcome for their own sake, for the objective mood in lyric poetry is apt to become a little tiresome, unless the mind which shapes the mood be as masterful, let us say, as Milton's. I do not deny that good objective lyrics have been written, but I do maintain that they are few. Perhaps this opinion, which I think, upon reflection, would be found to be fairly widely held, is the result of a prejudice which has come down to us from the Romantic Movement at the end of the Eighteenth Century. Happily, Mrs. Jacob is free from echoic conceits, and the poets of the Romantic Revival hardly suggest themselves in her poetry, unless it be by way of the later Victorians of the pre-Raphaelite tradition.

Nevertheless the love of the romantic, which to some extent is implicit in the line quoted in the passage above, "The tread of horses and the pride of life," and which is revealed in such lines as:

"I will lie down upon my mother earth, Heart to her heart and soul upon her soul . . ."

finds fuller expression in one of the poems in her Porpoise Press broadsheet, which focuses the two distinct methods which she uses. "The Little Dragon" is the leering emblem on the helmet of the knight, which represents to the nun, who watches the knight pass by, the mockery of the world. The other poem, "Rohallion," is one of Mrs. Jacob's best vernacular poems, and though it has not the broad humour of "Hogmanay" or of "Jeemsie Miller" or of "The Beadle o' Drumlee" of "Songs of Angus":

("Me an' the meenister, ye ken,
Are no the same as a' thae men
We hae for neebours i' the glen.") or of "The Twa Weelums" of "More Songs of Angus" or of "Adam" in "Bonnie Joann," it is in many ways typical of Mrs. Jacob's work in Scots. It exhibits the peculiar lilt which Mrs. Jacob has mastered so emphatically:

"There's snaw i' the wind an' the weepies
Hang deid on the shaw,
And pale the leaves left on the rowan,
I'm soothward awa;
But a voice like a wraith blaws ahint me
And sings as I'm liftin' my pack
'I am waitin'—Rohallion—Rohallion—
My lad, ye'll be back!'"

Photo by Bruckman. Ganymede
(By Correggio—Vienna: Pinakothek).
From "Italian Artists as Men," by Norman Hill (Marriott).

In passages like this, Mrs. Jacob's ear serves her more truly than the ears of many writers of the Scots vernacular to-day, but her verse is not free, as in the last phrase of this stanza, from a suggestion of the trick line. This method is more apparent when Mrs. Jacob simulates pity, as she does in what is probably her best known poem, "Tam i' the Kirk." The second stanza of that poem concludes "He canna pray" (the italics are mine and indicate the rhythmical stress), and a similar accent occurs in "The Gowk," where we find the lines, "He winna tell!" and "He winna say!" both used by way of climax. So too in "The Whustlin' Lad," another well known poem, the last line, "Canna dae mair!" demands the drawn out, emphatic stress if it is to be appreciated fully. Even the English verse of this author joins hands here with her Scots verse. The poem entitled "Possession" is probably one of the best of Mrs. Jacob's English poems, and in the second verse of it she writes:

"She has set her feet
In a path where roses blow,
She plays with your heart, the sea
Plays thus with its dead below,
And the game is sweet;
But your soul is here with me,
O Man; it is yours and free—
But it cannot go."

In these lines may be heard the same accent, though it is modified by the use of a softer material.

Mrs. Jacob's English and Scottish poems also have in common with one another the employment of the ballad metre in certain cases. "The Lowland Ploughman" is a ballad in English, but it is not so successful as the Scots poem, "The Doo'cot up the Braes," in which Mrs. Jacob attains something of the beauty of the old ballad metre. This note has been more or less banished from Scottish poetry for many years, and in comparing the older ballads with those written in the present day, Mr. John Geddie, in his book on the Scottish Balladists, finds cause to complain of the artificiality of the modern ballad productions. Mrs. Jacob does not set out to write a full ballad in the ancient manner, but that she can trap something of the old spirit and cadence these lines from "The Doo'cot up the Brae" prove:

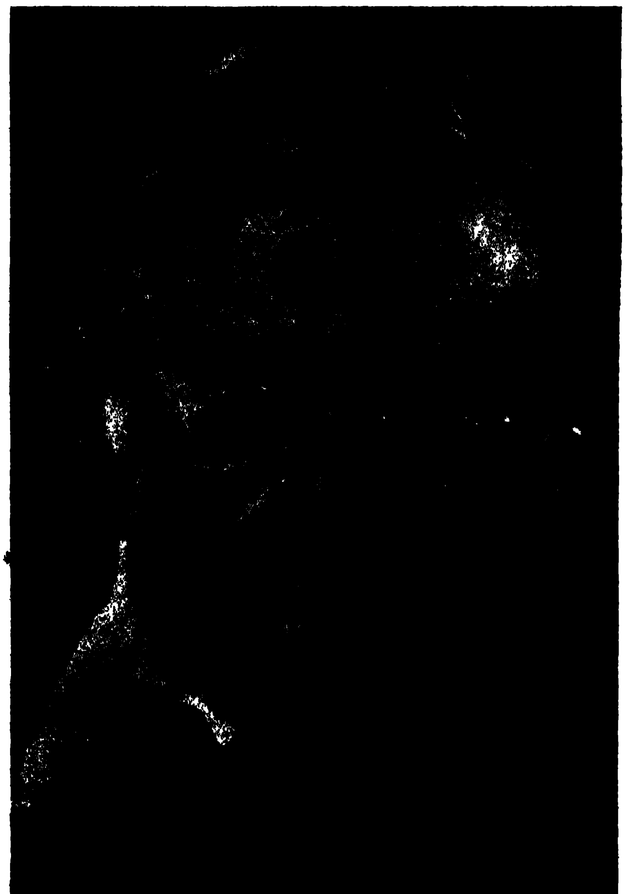
> "The brigs ride out past Ferryden
> Ahint the girnin' tugs,
> And the lasses wave to the Baltic men
> Wi' the gowd rings i' their lugs."

In reading the line, "Wi' the gowd rings i' their lugs," one cannot help remembering "Wi' the gowd kaims i' their hair," and the distinction which is obvious between the two lines is a measure of the compromise between pure beauty and the matter of fact, "hamely" sense of colloquial Scots which Mrs. Jacob allows herself. If she does not reach the spiritual heights which the greater poets know, she does not become so utterly uncouth in choice of diction and subject as to be merely commonplace, though there is no doubt that some of the poems in "More Songs of Angus"—a volume which reflects the years of the war—go perilously near the borderline of the commonplace and perhaps have sometimes one foot on the wrong side of it.



Mrs. Jacob's most recent collection of verse, "The Northern Lights and Other Poems," was published between two and three years ago. It shows no advance upon, or departure from, her previous method. It has the rough, humorous and slightly coarse intimacy of the tradition of Scottish verse in which Allan Ramsay stands. To the spirit of pure poetry—to the magically remote, which is the essence of a few of the finest Scottish ballads—it never strives to attain. Yet there is in these poems that faculty for concentrating in a few stanzas the whole life of a country-side. Mrs. Jacob, in her own way, puts full length figures into her canvas—such figures as may be met with in any Perthshire or Angus village. She does this without flattering the life of provincial Scotland, but if she does not hide its idiosyncrasies, she makes some of its solider virtues apparent. She writes in a language which is modern and recognisable and nearly always musical, and which sometimes possesses a glimmer of the rarer spirit of imagination, as in "Inverquharity." She has heard the rhythms which lay dormant in the private speech of a district, and made them her servants.

THE RESURRECTION OF ROME.*

By Collin Brooks.

THE essential tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet" was once reduced by Jerome K. Jerome to a twelve-word quatrain. This book could, in the same technique, be reduced to a twenty-word sentence: "Mr. Gilbert Keith Chesterton, the distinguished journalist and author, went to Rome, was blessed by the Pope and interviewed Mussolini." But like the expansion of the quatrain to the tragedy, the expansion of this memorable visit into this memorable book changes the mental condition of him who reads it. "Before the Roman came to Rye, or out to Severn strode," England with its individuality existed. Before this writer came to Rome and seven hills bestrode, Rome with its individuality existed. But the two visitations were designed to change the English mind—the legions literally by changing the landscape and the author by changing the outlook.

It would be too flattering to Mr. Chesterton's imposing physique to suppose that the Pope said when he received his English guest, "Not an angle, but an angel," but Mr. Chesterton has certainly returned saying, "Not devils, but deliverers," for he looked on all Rome and saw that it was good, the Church restoring again the truth that Europe is the Faith and the Faith is Europe, and the Fascists restoring again the idea of Government—Government which commands both rich and poor, and administers an even-handed justice or, at the worst, an even-handed injustice.

Portrait by Howard Coster. Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

Mr. Chesterton is not concerned that his readers shall like Rome; he is concerned that they shall understand Rome.

"The book" (he writes, in one of those Micawber-like bursts of candour which characterise him), "which will I fear seem very sprawling and shapeless in any case, will be quite unintelligible unless it is understood that I am throughout addressing that sort of fair-minded outsider, only hoping to persuade him that the thing is great even from the outside, by telling him some things he may not have realised, about the greatness to be found in the inside. I am not asking him to come inside. Whatever he may think, I am not now trying to make him a convert; I am only trying to make him a happy and successful tourist."

Never, it may safely be said, was a tourist taken to

* "The Resurrection of Rome." By G. K. Chesterton. 12s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

his goal by so winding and wonderful a route. To explain the Baroque architecture of the Papal town, Mr. Chesterton explains the age-long vicissitudes of the Papal Office. To expound the significance of the incline and rise of physical Rome, he expounds the decline and fall of political Rome. He almost inverts the last line of one of his famous verses, and might with all reverence sing:

> " When you and I went hand in hand about the streets of Rome,
> And took a trip through Paradise to reach St. Peter's dome," for not until he has justified God's ways to man does he justify man's ways to God as they have found expression in the statued streets and many-churched squares of the Eternal City.

Mr. Chesterton's title, let it be understood, has no ostensible theological significance, but it is wilfully ambiguous. Those zealots who read or avoided Mr. Belloc's " Path to Rome," thinking it a Catholic tract, deceived themselves; but those zealots who avoid or read Mr. Chesterton's " Resurrection of Rome " in the same belief will have grounds for their hope or fear. To a man of his passionate spiritual sincerity it is not possible to tell without a natural religious purpose the tale of how the Cæsars went eastwards, leaving Rome and the Pope to sink into insignificance while Byzantium rose to domination, only to find Byzantium doomed and Rome rising again from the death they had decreed for her; of how the Papacy was dragged to Avignon, only to return to the Seven Hills; of how the iconoclasts threatened the images, triumphed and were at last defeated; of how the very litter of the past in Rome is the tangible sign that Rome moves always in the van of modernity; of how, when the World War came, it came to release Rome from the thrall of Prussianised Paganism and to restore to Europe the spiritual and cultural leadership to which as a civilisation Europe had in its beginnings owed its very being.

The book, it will be seen, covers a wide ground. The history of the Papacy, the history of Catholic Europe, the history of international thought, the significances of recent emergencies, men and events—all these fill Mr. Chesterton's pageant of purpled and emblazoned pages. Image after towering verbal image, paradox acclaimed and paradox propounded as simple truisms, metaphors that drag the heavens down to adorn the earth or snatch the earth up to enhance the majesty of heaven; and, running beside it all, like gamins turning cart-wheels besides an emperor's coach, those little puns and jokes of which he is so fond, which come from him with a spontaneity that disarms irritation—all these make again that flamboyant fabric which we call the Chesterton prose style.

But the book is more than Catholic: it is catholic. For those who refuse to find in Mr. Chesterton's guidance a way to the heart of Rome's mystery there is much that should please them. The analysis of the causes of the World War, the talk with Mussolini and the reasoned defence of Fascism, the attack on English psuedo-liberalism and the cry for uncorrupt politics—these must hold and grip even a reader to whom the very name of Rome in any but the cartographer's use is anathema, even if they hold and grip in the irritating way in which the Ancient Mariner held the wedding guest, or in the menacing way in which the elder Weller held and gripped another protesting auditor.

It is not that Mr. Chesterton loves the regimentation of Fascism more, but that he loves the concealed and camouflaged tyrannies of non-Fascist States less. If liberty is lost to Italy, where is she saved? America may not drink wine at all, and England may only drink wine at certain hours. Italian journalists may not say those things displeasing to the State, but English journalists may not say those things displeasing to the Press lords. Italians are bound by the cords of bureaucracy under dictatorship, but Britons are bound by the cords of bureaucracy under plutocracy. Fascism has its weakness—the theory of the rule of an active minority must at last invite the anarchism it is designed to avoid—but Fascism has at least restored law, order and the primal loyalties to Rome. It has done more; it has restored the temporal State to the Papacy, a resurrection the meaning of which is too little understood and too lightly pondered.

Of those who read this book, few may go to Rome. Those who go will look upon its stones with a new comprehension. Those who do not go will not again misconceive the city's significance, although they may fear it and dislike it. It is possible—though Mr. Chesterton will writhe to think so—that many may read this book who care not a roman fig for the significance of Rome, but who care much for the craftsmanship and artistry of Mr. Chesterton. They will find here all its infinite variety: he writes of Rome in every mood. But let the merely casual purchaser beware. This gorgeous fabric of prose has not been spun without a purpose: it is a web.

SIR RONALD ROSS AS FICTION WRITER.

By R. L. Mégroz.

One must, I think, go back to the Renaissance, and in our own country to the great Elizabethans to find such prodigality of versatile genius as that of Sir Ronald Ross. Thirty-three years after it was made, his discovery of the secret of malaria infection through mosquitoes is at last being appreciated in its true perspective as one of the epoch marking discoveries in human history. In the words of the Poet Laureate, Mr. John Masefield, it " has made a third of the world habitable." But the obscure surgeon in the Indian Medical Service, who after heroic and solitary labours earned undying fame as a medical scientist, had begun as a poet and remained essentially a poet. He was also an enthusiastic though inadequately trained mathematician. Then he began to try his hand at prose fiction, and during many years of medical research work, poetry and novel writing were treated as leisure occupations, the truth being of course that for a man of Ross's creative energy leisure means a change of work and a fresh medium of expression.

But the consequence of the division of interests was a great curtailment of his possible literary work and a long postponement of recognition first as a poet and then as a novelist. He is not yet recognised as a novelist, and few people indeed are even aware of the existence of his prose romances. This is not surprising, since only three have ever been published, and two of them have been out of print since long before the War. The remaining one, "The Revels of Orsera" (7s. 6d.; John Murray), was reissued a few weeks ago. This weird romance is dated near the end of the fifteenth century, and has for an appropriately wild setting the Bernese Oberland. A not uncalled for preface by the author in the reissued volume warns the reader that the "historical notes" at the end of the book, and most of the seemingly historical characters are entirely fictitious. Nevertheless the atmosphere of pageantry and intrigue at the Alpine castle of Count Reichenfels, vital with a variety of vivid characters, is convincing enough. Not Scott himself ever gave us such colour and animation, and such exciting jousts and tourneys. But behind this ornamental tapestry of romance a spiritual drama of good and evil is being played out in the soul of Zozimo, a weakling little hunchback who acquires a beautiful physical exterior to correspond with his inner self. The device used here by the author is one which was taken seriously in the Middle Ages, that of metempsychosis by which a soul takes possession of another person's body. The poetic aim of the author is made clearer by his own confession that the story originated in a reading of Byron's fragment, "The Deformed Transformed," which he determined to rewrite and make symmetrical by adding another character. This is Zozimo's sister, Astrella, who has the beauty and strength of body denied to her brother; as well as a fineness of spirit which enables her to triumph with her brother through death, for Satan is wooing her on the mountains. The treatment of the Spirit of Evil, who like Lermontov's Demon seeks human love, would have been possible only to a poet. The contact of the sublime divinity with a mortal mind instead of causing the collapse of the story, as it well might, is actually a beautiful climax. But Ross's conception was long maturing, and was indeed written first in the 1880's as a verse drama, and privately printed. There are many noble verses in this, but I do not think it could ever be staged successfully, at least not without severe cutting. So "The Revels of Orsera" was written in prose during the nineties, and first published in 1920. It should be an excellent influence in modern fiction, and so would the out-of-print earlier novels, "Child of Ocean" and "Spirit of Storm."

Photo by Maull & Fox. Sir Ronald Ross.

At the time of writing these are still out of print, but I cannot believe that they will long remain so. They are conceived in the spirit of stormy grandeur which informed the "Revels," but the author's power of magnificent description is lavished on tropical landscapes and seascapes. The tropical storm at sea described in "Spirit of Storm" is superb: it stirs the soul like an elemental drama. Ross's use of the pathetic fallacy by which nature is chorus to the passions of the human heart is quite unrivalled by any living fiction writer, and not even Hardy's excelled it. The emotional theme of the story is the unreasoning jealousy of his wife by a Major Chesham who is stationed in the West Indies. Resemblance to the Othello theme is carried further by the designs of a cousin whom Chesham has befriended, and who plays very effectually the part of an Iago until near the end of the story. The ensuing conflict of emotions is punctuated by furious fighting between white and black slave traffickers. Gory scenes in the harbour of San Domingo are but the fringe of the terrible uprising of the blacks against the white planters ashore. As if the heavens are revolting against human insanities, a tornado descends on the harbour and sweeps away the ships. On one of these, loaded with corpses and dying men, is Percy Chesham, who has been brought from school in England expressly to effect a reconciliation between his father and mother. He does not know it, but his madly enraged father is also on board the derelict vessel which drives helplessly into the night of storm. Chesham has determined to kill his son and then die, and a ghastly chase of the terrified boy over the corpse-strewn decks goes on with the wild diapason of sea and sky for chorus. No quotation sufficiently brief for an article like this can convey to the reader the terrific effect of Ross's description.

While splendid description and intensely dramatic scenes occur in "Spirit of Storm," the style of the prose is not consistently "right" and the plot is mere melodrama which is only redeemed by the author's imaginative power. In my own opinion "Child of Ocean," published in 1889 by a firm which soon afterwards went bankrupt, is the greatest of Ross's novels. He was nearly thirty when he began writing it, while stationed on the Andaman Islands, the beautiful descriptions of the tropical flora, the abounding life of the coralled sea and the monsoons all being first-hand experience. The bare plot is again rather far-fetched and depends more than once on the arm of coincidence possessing an exceptionally long reach. But the essential vision and the expression of mighty powers in nature and the human soul overwhelm the reader's imagination. The author called " Child of Ocean " a romance, but admitted in his " Memoirs " that his purpose was rather to write " a book which should be not what I called a journalistic-novel but an art-novel or epic-drama; that is, an attempt to figure the scenery of these islands in a sonata of words." First he thought of putting a cynical Robinson Crusoe on one of the islands, whose bitter musings would be gradually influenced by the beauty of nature all around him. But he happened to read Charles Reade's " Foul Play," in which a silly story is buttressed up by some fine descriptions of a life on an unknown island, where a man and a woman are left after the foundering of their ship in mid-ocean. So, just as he changed Byron's " Deformed Transformed," he remoulded the theme of " Foul Play," with a wonderful result. He puts a child, an English child, on an Andaman island, to grow up wild and solitary, a monster who scares the native cannibal islanders away from his sea-girt domain. The Monster grows into a tawny-red, naked creature with a big mane of hair over head and face, human only in the shape of his powerful body, the embryo soul remaining asleep. Another shipwreck puts a fashionable young lady of Anglo-India " society " on the island, which now becomes a setting for the Monster's emergence into the condition of a human being. It is a hard course of education for him, and he dies in the end of love and grief, but before this climax is reached there are scenes which stir the emotions like a rich romance, and others which rouse all the faculties of the imagination like that poetic drama which Aristotle said purged us by pity and terror. Certainly readers of fiction to-day can ill afford to miss Sir Ronald Ross's contributions to English literature.

CECIL ROBERTS AS POET.

By Wallace B. Nichols.

THE reviewing of poetry at the present time is in a most unsatisfactory state. Less consideration is given to it in the Press than ever before, and the little which is given is generally inadequate. Before the War a volume of verse of any pretensions to merit could at least be sure of some twenty notices—certainly of a sufficient number to help on a reputation and to make a poet known to anthologists. Nowadays it is no infrequent occurrence for a new book of poems to receive fewer than ten. Two volumes published recently, distributed to some fifty journals or so, received respectively seven and three notices.

Poetry has never been taken as seriously in this country as abroad. I was speaking not long since to a distinguished foreign critic upon this very matter, and his amazement was profound. " But have you no literary journals ? " he asked. I named those we had—and convinced him of their sluggish reaction to the claims of the poet unless he is unusually fortunate in his introductions and sponsorship. Also the reviewing of poetry is too frequently done either by the over-young critic, too concerned with being brilliant himself to be fair to the author at whose expense he is scintillating; or by the over-old critic, for whom poetry died with Matthew Arnold and was barely recognisable as living in him.

Is it any wonder then that so many of our younger poets turn novelist in sheer desperation?

The case of Mr. Cecil Roberts can be taken as typical. For fifteen years, he tells me, he has ceased to publish any of his verse, and has taken to novel-writing instead. That he has succeeded in his newer medium needs no affirmation for readers of " Sails of Sunset " and " Havana Bound," and I am only concerned here with pointing out that a gap of fifteen years in any poet's life is dulling to his lyrical impulse. But I cannot blame this poet. The path is harder than it ever was before.

That we have lost a great poet in Cecil Roberts I would not say; but that we have lost one as good as many of those in Mr. Harold Monro's recent anthology—in which he is not represented—I am prepared to submit. Moreover during the fallow years he would no doubt have strengthened his technique and developed his poetic grip.

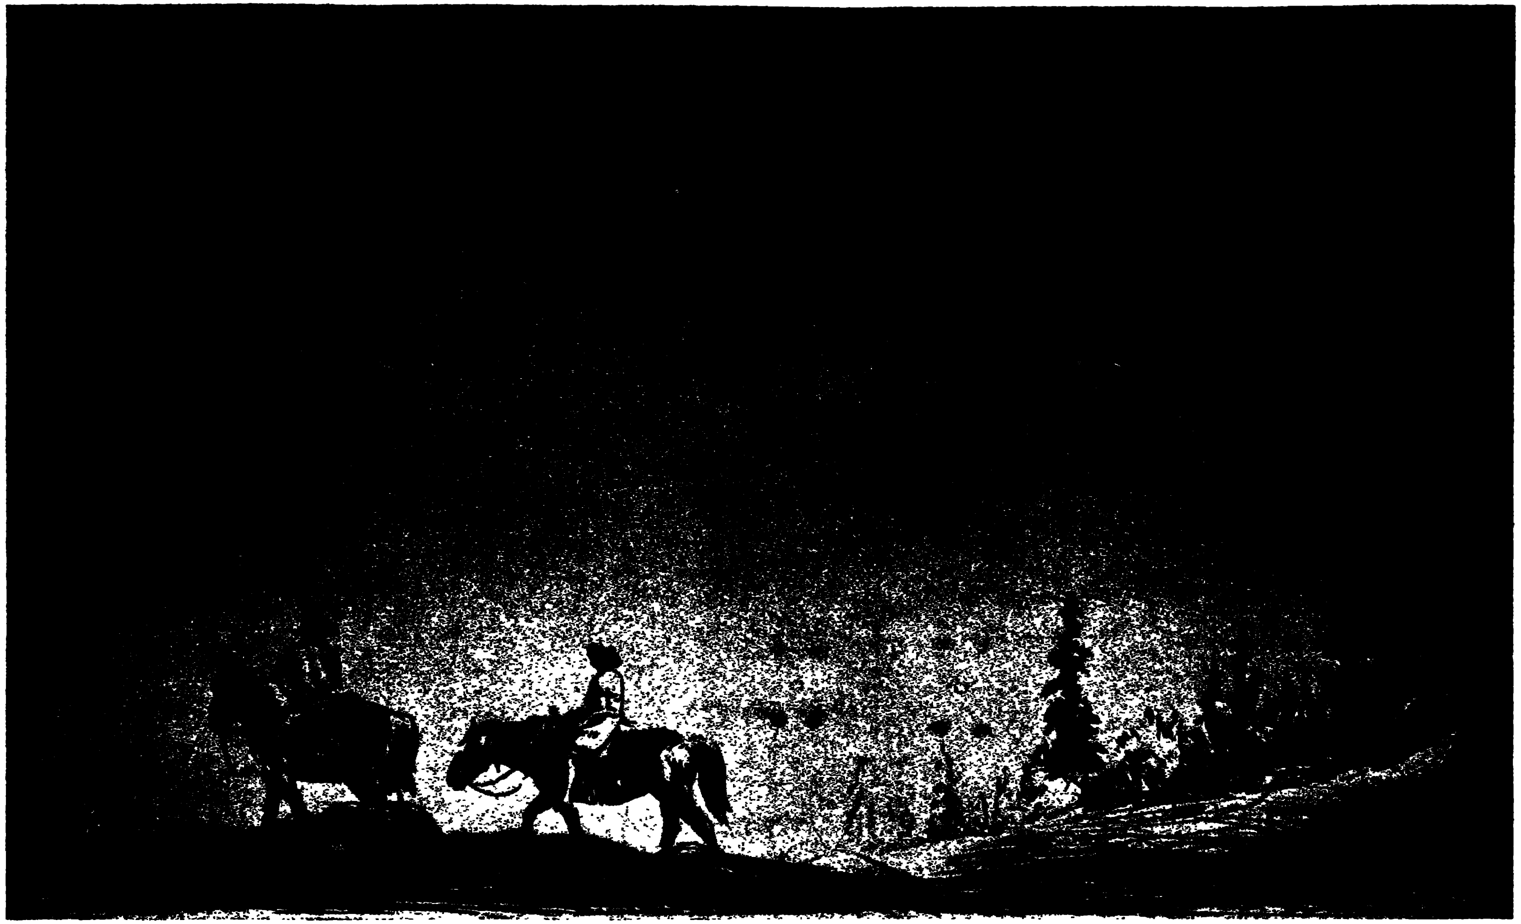
He is both a lyric poet and a dramatic poet. As a dramatic poet he has had the unusual felicity of being produced. And indeed " A Tale of Young Lovers " is worthy of production. It has what few poetic tragedies have, a sense of the stage. The plot is worked out with a minimum of verbiage, and each line is related to the movement of the plot. Dramatically it has very considerable merits; poetically I feel that it suffers here and there from too swift a composition. This may add to a certain naturalness of presentation, but there is some loss of poetic fibre, of nervous power in rhythm and vocabulary. Few lines stand out as separately ablaze with beauty, though many have a singular sweetness and a vivid dramatic aptness. Above all, this play is never dull, never too wordy and is always actable.

As a lyric poet he has a delicate sense for limpid colour. " Springtime in Cookham Dean " is perhaps his best example in this vein, and is a poem of shimmering English beauty; and I find something of the same beauty, but with perhaps a deeper note, in " Absence," from which I quote one stanza of incisive truth:

> " O friend, there is a time when speech
> Is frozen with the breath of awe;
> When all the little truths we preach
> Seem fragments of a vaster law."

And another poem which has, for me at least, a caress of true rhythm is one beginning:

> " When I walked out from Grasmere Vale,
> One hour after eventide,
> The Moon had risen weirdly pale,
> And the wind blew far and wide
> The withered leaves, all blown and sere,
> That told me of the mellowing year."



There is a quantity of work of this character in Mr. Cecil Roberts's poetry, work of limpid brooding and observed colour; but in criticising it one must remember that it is the work of a poet still to some extent in the

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN," OCTOBER, 1930.

From a drawing by FRANK E. SLATER.

MR. CECIL ROBERTS.

From "MASTERS OF ETCHING: LEVON WEST" (Studio).

THE EAGLE.

experimental mood. He had not achieved the fullness of a complete technique. His poems seem never to have been long enough on the anvil, and while they gain in freshness and ease they lose in controlled simplicity and in the solidity of imaginative concentration. A narrative poem such as " Phyllistraton " for instance would have gained inestimably from cutting; and cutting is not one of the virtues of the young writer! We must not forget that we are reading early work—work written when its author was busy finding his road.

How near he was to opening the true vein can be judged from his war-poetry. The War touched him to some purpose, and in " Charing Cross " he wrote perhaps the most directly human of all his poems, one of the best poems too which the War inspired—a poem which shows how his development as a poet might have gone along lines of strength and a deepening feeling for the struggle of existence—and its bathetic irony. Such phrases and lines as—

> " . . . while I stand
> Watching this slow processional of pain,
> . . . this human refuse
> Left by extravagant war " ; and the ironic close :

> " I watch with dumb anguish the endless procession of men,
> The remnants picked up from the waste in the fields ; they who died
> Flow no more in the stream, they can rest ; and only it matters
> That Science should skilfully mend what it skilfully shatters," show the deepened power of the true poet touched to his argument by his feeling for his kind.

But at that point the poet ceased! His best verse seems therefore rather transitional than perfect, rather a prelude than an achievement ; but it was a transition of the right kind, a prelude that makes us regret the unachieved sequel.

When Mr. Cecil Roberts does at long last give us the volume of poems which he can write, and which perhaps is half written, I hope that the reviewing of poetry will be in less evil case, and that he will receive due and adequate notice. He will at least have his reputation as one of the best of our younger novelists to stand him in good stead.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

OCTOBER, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 12th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the six Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope :

" The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS. ; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best note, of not more than one hundred and fifty words, as to what heroine of fiction you would like to entertain at your table, and giving your reasons for your choice.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English literature applicable to the leaders of the three political parties.

V.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VI.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to Ierne Ormsby, 20, Havelock Road, Addiscombe, Surrey, for the following :

LOVE'S ARMOUR.

> Through every day I weave with diligence,
> And bind about the woof all beauty known
> To heart and hands ; I work with every sense,
> And in each stitch a tiny prayer is sewn.
> The gift I weave for love may not be bought
> With gold or life, or dreams of paradise ;
> It shall be free for one within my thought
> Who may achieve it for no mortal price.
> It has no value save for me, unless
> The one who takes at last should hold it rare ;
> I weave by night and day, and fold, and press,
> And lay it by in lavender with care.
> Belovèd, 'tis a simple gift, indeed ;
> Chain-mail or silk, according to your need!

We also select for printing :

THROUGH THE RAIN.

> Now are the little leaves again washed clean ;
> The tiger-lilies wear an amber sheen ;
> The purple pansies gleam ; how fair the grass
> That thrills to feel each pearly raindrop pass
> Its tensive length along ; the song of rain
> Is sweet to buds that far too long have lain
> In darkness ; dreaming through the days of drought,
> The nights of heat, they hear the distant shout
> Of laden clouds assembling ; see with glee
> The tall delphiniums sway voluptuously—
> A lovely mass that shades from palest blue
> To clearest sapphirine, and that deeper hue
> That was the colour of young Mary's cloak
> When through the purple dusk, from alien folk
> She bore the holy babe to Egypt's land ;
> —So shining through the rain delphiniums stand.

(Florence M. Ward, 18, Abbots Road, King's Heath, Birmingham.)

ON A MAY AFTERNOON.

I saw a may tree blooming close beside the dusty street,
A prodigally lovely, joyous thing,
While sunshine swept the pavements, lit the houses, and the sky
Arched above me, wide and cloudless, blue with spring.

Yet my heart was strangely weary as I wandered in the sun,
And poignant seemed the beauty of the may,
Until—I saw you standing in an attitude I knew,
Unheeding and unconscious o'er the way—

. . . . .

I passed unseen, unnoticed, with a stillness in my heart,
And a loveliness had come upon the day.

(J. Morton George, 4, Glebe Avenue, Woodford Green, Essex.)

THISTLEDOWN.

Thistledown, thistledown, Summertime's snowflake,
Winged with bright beauty, fairy-like, free;
Messenger, dancing to the wind's music,
Bringing the glory of moorlands to me.

Deep in your heart is a secret abiding—
Where will you hide it, when tired of your play?
Seemingly useless—blown hither and thither—
God has a mission for you to obey.

There where you fall, and unhonoured are buried,
The stars will look down and the moonlight will bless;
And soon in the splendour of some grand new morning,
A King in royal purple the Dawn will caress.

(George S. Astins, Lynton Lodge, Fourth Avenue, Hove, Sussex.)

We also select for special commendation the lyrics by M. G. Tillett (Cosham), Evelyn D. Bangay (Chesham), Stuart Ayers (Sydenham), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), M. G. Hughes (Hemel Hempstead), Gertrude Pitt (London, N.), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), Nell Musgrave (London, W.), Vera I. Arlett (Worthing), Sylvia Hooke (London, E.C.), Marguerite Allday (Birmingham), Ella Rivers Noble (Long Melford), Phyllis Lake (London, S.W.), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Mabel Herdman Porter (Faversham), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), R. Allen (Liverpool), D. Wilson (Clapham), E. Mary Scott (Tunbridge Wells), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), Mrs. Elwyn James (Cardiff), Freda Isobel Noble (Long Melford), Margaret Burcham (Winscombe), Irene Hubbard (Steeple Claydon), Mrs. H. Tetley (Bristol), D. F. Larkin (Brighton), Jeanne Harrison (Canterbury), H. E. Turner (Chorlton-cum-Hardy), Esther Samms (Luton), Mrs. Margaret L. Smith (Natal, South Africa), Archer Russell (New South Wales), W. E. Coulson (Hurlingham), G. M. Starkey (Folkestone), Isabel S. N. Smyth (Belfast), Kathleen Blyth (West Hartlepool), B. Kenneth Wesander (Hampstead), K. F. Phelps (Turville), Margaret Fountain (Huntingdon), P. M. Freeston (London, N.W.), Margaret F. Woodzell (Plymouth), George G. Tutt (Barnsley), Enid D. Woollright (Basingstoke), John E. Woods (Coventry), May Challam (Bath), Edith M. Walker (Bournemouth), Winifred Simmons (Parkstone), Margarita Yates (Haute Savoie, France), D. Lille (Deal).

II.—The Prize of Half a Guinea for the best quotation is awarded to Enid D. Woollright, Wootton House, Wootton St. Lawrence, Basingstoke, for the following:

MARTIN MAKE-BELIEVE. By Gilbert Frankau. (Hutchinson.)

"And, round about December,
The cards upon his shelf
Which wished him lots of Christmas cheer,
And fortune in the coming year,
Were never from his near and dear,
But only from himself."

A. A. Milne, King John's Christmas.

We also select for printing:

HIS DIFFICULT DAUGHTER. By Winifred Carter. (Alston Rivers.)

"'The youth,' he cried, 'whom I exiled, Shall be restored to woo her.'"

T. Campbell.

(Marjorie W. Stayt, c/o Athlone High School, Bezuidenhout Avenue, Johannesburg, Transvaal, South Africa.)

THE WIRELESS CALL. By Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. (Epworth Press.)

"I grieve to say, I've winked at him,
And he has winked at me."

Bab Ballads ("Gentle Alice Brown").

(J. N. Banister, "Rollestone," Malden Street, Leyland, Lancs.)

MADDER MUSIC. By Mildred Cram. (Harrap.)

"In fifty different sharps and flats."

Browning, The Pied Piper of Hamelin.

(Ethel M. Kennedy, "Heeneholme," Rowlands Road, Worthing.)

ORDEAL BY AIR. By J. Scott Hughes. (Longmans.)

"Will no one tell me what she sings?"

Wordsworth, The Solitary Reaper.

(John A. Bellchambers, 40, Highgate Hill, N.19.)

COME WITH ME A LITTLE WAY. By Julian Swift. (Werner Laurie.)

"'Will you walk a little faster?' said a whiting to a snail;
'There's a porpoise close behind us, and he's treading on my tail.'"

Lewis Carroll, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland.

(Ernest A. Fuller, 10, The Circus, Greenwich, S.E.10.)

III.—The Prize of Three New Books for the best short description from prose of the sounds of Nature—rain, wind and sea—is awarded to Norah M. Butterfield, "Etain," Golf Links Road, Westward Ho!, Devon, for the following:

(1) RAIN.

"Rain was universal; a thick robe of it swept from hill to hill; thunder rumbled remote, and between the ruffled roars the downpour pressed on the land with a great noise of eager gobbling, much like that of the swine's trough fresh filled, as though a vast assembly of the hungered had seated themselves clamorously and fallen to on meats and drinks in a silence, save of the chaps."

George Meredith, The Egoist.

(2) WIND.

"The mutter of the winds drew near apace. In the forefront could be distinguished a drowsy waking plaint passing on, and far off the growth of a multiple clamour, marching and expanding. There was the throb as of many drums in it, a vicious, rushing note, and like the chant of a tramping multitude."

Joseph Conrad, Typhoon.

(3) SEA.

"The sea came on like cavalry, and when it touched the shore it opened the blazing eyes and deafening tongues of the artillery. I saw the worst assault at night on a seaside parade, where the sea smote on the doors of England with the hammers of earthquake, and a white smoke went up into the black heavens."

G. K. Chesterton, Essays.

We also highly commend the replies by Annie P. Pearson (Halifax), Commander F. G. Cooper (Edgware), W. E. Coulson (Hurlingham), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), T. W. Griffiths (Swansea), C. E. J. Capern (Brighton), B. Mitchell (Fortrose), Mrs. M. C. Scarth (Leeds), Robert K. Spedding (Liverpool), P. Page (London, S.W.), John E. Woods (Coventry), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Isobel Simpson (Dundee), Iërne Ormsby (Addiscombe), Margaret W. Simpson (Dundee), Joyce Nankivell (Bournemouth), J. E. A. Gedge (Bagborough).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best note, in not more than one hundred words, of any curious or interesting fact discovered by the writer in the course of his or her holiday wanderings, is awarded to Sybil G. Gillett, 33, South Eaton Place, S.W.1, for the following :

Wandering through Hampshire, I came upon the village of Abbott's Ann. I discovered the church to be of great interest, as it possesses a custom unique of its kind. Along the north wall, suspended from the ceiling, are about thirty chaplets of cardboard, to each of which are attached four white paper gloves; actually not all the gloves are there, as some have crumbled away with age. The custom is that when any bachelor or unmarried woman is buried there, these gloves are hung up and the names of the deceased inscribed above them. The earliest dates back to 1740.

We also select for printing :

In my wanderings in Suffolk I visited the churches of Sudbury. The parish church of St. Gregory is claimed to be the most ancient church in East Anglia, the present one being built before 1100 on the site of a yet earlier one. But what especially attracted my attention was a little iron ring on the beautifully carved door, which the verger told me was called the Sanctuary Ring, and in bygone days, when many of the peasants were too poor to buy a ring, was used to bind the man and woman together in the sacrament of marriage.

(Ella Rivers Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Long Melford, Suffolk.)

In Chichester Cathedral we found two of the oldest specimens of bas-relief carving existing in this country. These represent Biblical scenes, and the figures are carved of a size in ratio to their importance. Thus, in the Raising of Lazarus, Christ is the full height of the plaque, Lazarus, the second most important figure, is a little shorter, the apostles shorter still, and so on, down to the grave-diggers. who, being negligible, are like dwarfs, not much bigger than Christ's feet. These plaques were originally in the parish church of Selsey, now three miles under the sea.

(Sylvia Hooke, 39, Paternoster Row, E.C.4.)

I broke the glass face of my two watches at the seaside. I had them repaired, and shortly after I got them back from the jeweller, I bumped into a man. This man missed his watch and accused me of stealing it. He described it as a gold hunter with " S. B. M." on the back of it. I had two watches with me, one of them a gold hunter with my initials, " S. B. M." Very fortunately for me however the man found his own watch in his hip-pocket where he had absent-mindedly put it. I never carry two watches now !

(S. Barrington McClean, 21, Greenknowe Road, Newlands, Glasgow, S.3.)

We also highly commend the replies by J. N. Banister (Leyland), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), John E. Woods (Coventry), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Norwich), E. Sweatman (Reading), B. A. Billings (Manchester), Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson (Manchester), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Teresa Bellamy Noble (Long Melford), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), Rev. Edwin J. Matthews (Calne), Captain Wm. Jaggard (Stratford-on-Avon), Mrs. Cecilia Naumann (Cranleigh), Evelyn D. Bangay (Chesham), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Joyce Dugdale (Wellington), J. E. A. Gedge (Bagborough).

Drawing by Aubrey Hammond. Mr. Henry Savage.

Author of " How to Manage Our Women " (Toulmin). See page 93.

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for a short passage from any well-known novel showing the author's insight into the psychology of a child, is awarded to Mrs. E. G. Elton, 4, Forrest Gardens, Norbury, S.W.16, for the following :

" Then when he stood clothed and of a cheerful mind once more in front of the fire, a shyness stole over him. He knew that the moment for presents was approaching ; he knew that very shortly he would have to kiss and be kissed by a multitude of persons ; that he would have to say again and again, ' Oh, thank you, thank you so much ! ' that he would have his usual consciousness of his inability to thank anybody at all in the way that they expected to be thanked. Helen and Mary never worried about such things. They delighted in kissing and hugging and multitudes of words. If only he might have had his presents to himself and then stolen out and said, 'Thank you' to the lot of them and have done with it. What happened to Jeremy at that moment? Did he recollect that only a few hours before he had been hating Aunt Amy with a fine frenzy of hatred? For nearly a week he had been chafing under her restraint, combating her commands, defying her orders. He had been seeing her as everything that the Dean's Ernest had but now been calling her. Now he only saw her as someone to be defended, someone who was his, someone even who depended on him for support. He would have challenged a whole world of Deans in her defence. He said something, but no one could hear his words; then he sprang upon the startled Ernest."

HUGH WALPOLE, Jeremy.

We also select for printing:

"It was a strange craze certainly; but Harold, who invented his own games and played them without assistance, always stuck staunchly to a new fad, till he had worn it quite out. Just at present he was a muffin man, and day and night he went through passages and up and down staircases, ringing a noiseless bell and offering phantom muffins to invisible wayfarers. It sounds a poor sort of sport; and yet—to pass along busy streets of your own building, for ever ringing an imaginary bell and offering airy muffins of your own make to a bustling, thronging crowd of your own creation—there were points about the game, it cannot be denied.

KENNETH GRAHAME, The Golden Age.

(C. S. Stamper, 54, St. Augustine Avenue, Grimsby, Lincs.)

We also highly commend the replies by Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), A. C. Marshall (Edinburgh), Agatha Honnywill (Bristol), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), John E. Woods (Coventry), Melfin W. Jones (Cardiff), T. W. Griffiths (Swansea), W. L. Dudley (Halifax), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), L. F. Goldsmid

A. Wm. Ellis,

Author of "Ascetic" (Hutchinson).

Mr. Dudley Harbron,

Author of "Amphion" (Dent).

(London, S.W.), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), R. S. Mitchell (Fortrose), Iërne Ormsby (Addiscombe), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), E. Sweatman (Reading), P. Page (London, S.W.), G. Pitt (London, N.), R. Allen (Liverpool), S. Homfray (Colchester), P. M. Freeston (London, N.), B. A. Billings (Manchester), Winifred Simmons (Parkstone), Margery Young (Spondon), Sylvia Hooke (London, E.C.).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book, is awarded to B. Noël Saxelby, at/2, Belvedere Terrace, West Road, Buxton, Derbyshire, for the following:

CIMARRON. BY EDNA FERBER. (Heinemann.)

Yancey Cravat, with his romantic figure, golden voice, skill with the gun; his championship of the downtrodden —Indian, Negro, Jew, woman; his scorn of security and his restless instability, is typical of the buoyant (often flamboyant) pioneer-adventurer in the raw days of the opening-up of Oklahoma. But, as he himself says, it is the sun-bonnet, not the sombrero, that settles the new lands. His gently-bred wife and the other women go doggedly about the business of bringing civilisation into the wilderness. The author gives us a moving panorama of colour and life—a great achievement.

We also select for printing:

THE DOOR. BY MARY ROBERTS RINEHART.

(Hodder & Stoughton.)

The intriguing nature of this mystery novel baffles the most astute clue-hunters. A series of crimes follow in swift succession, for no apparent reason, until circumstantial evidence gathers around an innocent man, who is condemned. The thrills of the story are maintained by means of seemingly trivial details, discovered by various members of the families concerned, which have vital bearings on the solution of the crimes committed. But neither the persistence of Judy, nor the wiles of Inspector Harrison, prepare the reader for the final explanation. The secrecy, the tense atmosphere, convey the right psychological effect throughout the mystery.

(B. M. Beard, 214, Broadway, Bexleyheath, Kent.)

GENERALLY SPEAKING. BY G. K. CHESTERTON. (Methuen.)

Although the titles of the essays in this book suggest the scope of Mr. Chesterton's subject-matter, only careful reading reveals the versatile originality of his thoughts. In a small volume he strides to the outposts of history and delves beneath the surfaces of civilisation. As always, he is a new-comer startling us with a forceful placing of words, luring us by some unusual simile to see new comparisons. His commanding epigrams present new themes for meditation. The complete collection forms a fascinating commentary on life and art woven together with deft irony.

(C. S. Stamper, 54, St. Augustine Avenue, Grimsby, Lincs.)

NOTHING TO PAY. BY CARADOC EVANS. (Faber & Faber.)

There is nothing beautiful in this life-story of a man whose one aim was the making of money. The methods of its fulfilment are sordid beyond all telling, yet Caradoc Evans by sheer genius compels our interest, our entire attention from beginning to end. He is powerful in his very simplicity; his prose in dealing with this Welsh miser is the prose of the Bible; and his fierce ruthlessness characterising this first novel, doubtless lessens in no degree the hatred which his short stories, "My People" and "My Neighbours," have earned for him already among his native people.

(A. Eleanor Pinnington, 70, Pitt Street, Norwich.)

We also highly commend the replies by T. W. Griffiths (Swansea), Gertrude Pitt (London, N.), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), G. M. Starkey (Folkestone), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Arbel M. Aldous (Colchester), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), B. Noël Saxelby (Buxton), Agatha Honnywill (Bristol), Winifred Simmons (Parkstone), Margery Young (Spondon), A. Maurice Hancock (South Shields), Sylvia Hooke (London, E.C.), Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), B. Kenneth Wesander (Hampstead), Barbara Hughes-Stanton (London, W.), Ethel M. Kennedy (Worthing), Dallas Kenmare (Barnt Green), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), E. M. O'Brien (Drogheda), Esther Samms (Luton), P. Baker (King's Langley).

VII.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to A. Eleanor Pinnington, 70, Pitt Street, Norwich.

IN VARIOUS LANDS.*

Dr. Berry's book is a curious production and is perhaps not to be judged as other books, for it is composed of a series of travel talks with which the doctor regaled the listeners-in of Australia. So anxious was he to admit no inaccuracy that he submitted his original MS., before the delivery of the talks, to the American Consul-General in Australia. Unfortunately that gentleman does not appear to have received his office, as did Nathaniel Hawthorne, J. R. Lowell and others, on account of his literary merits. At any rate he has not been critical with regard to those of Dr. Berry, for in this volume are an exasperating number of tags and facetious remarks. Twice at least we came across the curate and egg story, and the information is kindly added that the egg was good in parts. Well, there are some parts of this book which please us, when the author is not walking like Agag—the tag habit is infectious!—but lets himself go, as for example on the negro question when he reaches Nashville, Tennessee. We wish Dr. Berry had not found it necessary to add "dee-po" every time he writes "station"; and after telling us that the dollar and cent system is a very simple one, as indeed it is, he gives an incredible tale of an incredibly stupid visitor to the States who became so muddled over his bill that he paid the waiter five dollars instead of one dollar seventy-five cents. Dr. Berry should take a little trip across Europe, preferably in the Orient Express, when he will, all in the space of three or four days, be called upon to pay for his meals in French francs, Swiss francs, Italian lire, Yugoslav dinars, Bulgarian and Turkish money.

There is no doubt about it that Mr. Beckles Willson is a Canadian. He does not let us forget that interesting fact;

* "Through the States with a Seeing Eye." By Richard J. A. Berry, M.D., etc. 5s. (Simpkin Marshall.) "From Quebec to Piccadilly." By Beckles Willson. 12s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.) "Malta of the Knights." By E. W. Schermerhorn. 25s. (Heinemann.)

Rhododendron patulum ("Rock Rose").
On the cliffs at 11,000 feet, Mishmi Hills, Assam Frontier. Flowers rosy purple. June-July.

From "Plant Hunting on the Edge of the World," by F. Kingdon Ward (Gollancz). Reviewed on page 55.

and the publicity which he has been giving to Canada for the best part of his life has probably been accomplished in a more artistic manner than that which Dr. Berry encountered at St. Louis, Mo., and several other American cities. Mr. Willson was the official biographer of the late Lord Strathcona, but he was far from being his idolater. Similarly we find that many portraits in this book of memoirs have the shadows that make them more lifelike. We read on and on. What an interesting life has been that of Mr. Beckles Willson, and how well he has told us of it. The number of celebrities who are referred to is very great. Some of them appear to the general reader in a novel light. Who would have thought that Lord Alverstone, the Lord Chief Justice, could behave in this fashion? The part most probably played by a well-known London editor in the appointment of Lord Byng to the command of the Canadians in France is told, I believe, for the first time. Byng and this editor were close neighbours in Essex, where also we are entertained by a glimpse of a very famous novelist in his rôle as a country gentleman. Talking of the country, Mr. Willson relates the fruitless efforts made by his wife and himself to retain their English and their local servants at a rather lonely and reputedly haunted house in Nova Scotia. They had in all no fewer than fifty-three servants, whose period of service ranged from six hours to three months—the latter being the maximum. It is impossible to touch in a brief review on more than a very small proportion of the vivid sketches we find in this book. There is that of Wyndham Deedes in his tent on the edge of the Plain of Sharon, where he was buried all day in Turkish and Arabic documents, one of which—for an excellent reason—he reduced to ashes. This occurs in the course of our author's war experiences, when he became Major Beckles Willson and was, with his usual good fortune, entrusted with a job that lends itself to brilliant description.

The two last words can very well be applied to Miss Schermerhorn's book about the Knights of Malta. In fact it is, especially at the beginning, a little too brilliant. We are rather blinded at our first view of the island, as the sun goes up and "Valetta's far-famed stronghold looms up into the tender morning sky—a monstrous mountain of golden bastions—Ossa piled on Pelion in huge elemental chaos!" Yet this book is fascinating, and for anyone contemplating a visit to Malta it is indispensable. We are told a great deal about the arrival of the Knights after they had rather reluctantly availed themselves of the offer of Charles V. The relations between the Knights, with all their retainers, and the native Maltese is very well depicted. "And if a Maltese guard, who presumed to arrest a certain Chevalier de Pins for 'all sorts of vile excesses and disturbances in the streets,' was condemned to be stripped and bound upon an ass with his face toward the tail, and driven through the streets of Valetta where men, posted at every corner, beat him so lustily with long canes as he passed, that he died from the effect, it is only fair to note that the offending knight received a no less vigorous meteing out of justice, for he was sentenced to life imprisonment and died a maniac in his dungeon." Grand Master after Grand Master passes before our eyes. Some of them deserve the highest admiration, some deserve contempt—such as he who fled from before Napoleon—and some deserve pity. There was for instance the French Grand Master, an aged gentleman called Le Cassière, who was superseded by his Knights, though they allowed him to keep a suite of four knights, two butlers, two carriers, nine pages, four waiters, four chaplains, three doctors and several palace domestics. This was a much more magnificent retinue than the one that followed Charles V, after his abdication, to the monastery of Yuste in the Spanish province of Estremadura, and Charles was by no means unattended. But magnificence reigned in the Malta of the Knights, just as much as valour and other virtues. On the other hand we are given an account of the horrors suffered by the chained galley-slaves, who sometimes were compelled to remain at the oars for two days and nights at a stretch, with food pushed into their mouths, like fuel into a furnace. There is a great deal in this book that is of the highest interest.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

HILAIRE BELLOC AS POET.

BY RICHARD PENNINGTON.

A CRITIC has recently reminded us that Mr. Belloc has just turned sixty. A good age, and well employed, when we consider the fruits of Mr. Belloc's thirty-five years of writing. For no man surely can look back with more pride upon work that has always been honest and well done, loyal to a constant ideal, courageous and sincere, and not infrequently of a high degree of beauty. This was a happy reminder of an anniversary if it sends a few more readers to a good writer and a clear thinker, and a man who, though in a few things wide of the mark and partisan, is yet worth a dozen of his more popular contemporaries.

To speak of Mr. Belloc here as a poet simply may seem strange to some to whom he is memorable chiefly for the excellent prose of his essays or for such exhilarating books as "The Four Men" and "The Path to Rome." There have moreover been other manifestations of his protean spirit; there are the political novels, the biographical studies, the military histories—and how well Mr. Belloc can describe a campaign in its essentials, and what a suggestive book is "Warfare in England"!—there are the children's books, and finally a most entertaining History of England, though it strays to dubious conclusions at times. But these things are more or less of the present day and ephemeral. What is more certain of enduring fame and likely to carry Mr. Belloc's name to posterity is the poetry; yet it is probably true that this has received the least recognition of all his work.

Why this should be so it is difficult to say. His poetry is not obscure or esoteric or "new" in any unpopular way. It has on the contrary the happy characteristics of closeness to tradition and a firm basis upon logical thought. It has also a certainty of utterance and a clarity of form that are admirable, and with these, a lovely rhythm all its own, and that power of intense suggestion that great poetry alone possesses. Some, remembering his partly French descent, have found foreign influences in his work. It may be that the frequent perfection of form—too often not an English trait—suggests the French clarity of mind. But his poetry, the best of it, is essentially English.

Of the immortality of some of the poems there is no doubt. Again and again, scanning one's shelves of modern poets, one takes down the tall blue volume of "Poems and Sonnets" to find the beauty of some of these pieces assuring, in this age when so much in poetry is unsatisfying. The epigrams for example have the perfection of Landor's finest work; some of the sonnets have a lovely vehemence that Brooke momentarily captured and Wordsworth at his best achieved; while there are lyrics as pure in melody and exquisite in execution as those of the Elizabethan and the Caroline poets. And there is too a satiric humour that plays over some of the pages and gives us a kind of verse too rare in England, yet poetry in spite of the fierce intent.

Several of the poems have become too well known in anthologies to need quotation, such as "The South Country," "The Birds," "Ha'nacker Mill." But the fine sonnets are generally not anthologised and go the more widely unknown therefore; for as Mr. Graves complained in his sparkling petard with which he sought to destroy the popular anthology ("A Pamphlet against Anthologies"), when a little of a man's work is put into an anthology the reading public generally content themselves with that and do not search out his other writings. Here however is one sonnet that has not to my knowledge been bagged by the compilers:

"But oh! not lovely Helen, nor the pride
Of that most ancient Ilium matched with doom.
Men murdered Priam in his royal room
And Troy was burned with fire and Hector died.
For even Hector's dreadful day was more
Than all his breathing courage dared defend.
The armourèd light and bulwark of the war
Trailed his great glory to the accustomed end.

"He was the city's buttress, Priam's son,
The soldier born in bivouac praises great
And horns in double front of battle won.
Yet down he went: when unremembering fate
Felled him at last with all his armour on.
Hector: the horseman: in the Scæan Gate."

There are other lovely ones: the sonnet on frozen winter; on Rome; that one on Sleep, with its lulling sestet:

"Above the surf-line, into the night breeze;
Eastward above the ever-whispering seas;
Through the warm airs with no more watch to keep.
My day's run out and all its dooms are graven.
O dear forerunner of Death and promise of Haven.
O my companion, O my sister Sleep."

Simple; perhaps not pleasing to those strict fanatics of the sonnet to whom anything not Miltonic is not worthy of the name; but how lovely, how accomplished! Of this graceful and finished verse Mr. Belloc is a master. There are those stanzas in the Dedicatory Ode that begin, in an abrupt change from the humour of

"And One (myself I mean—no less),
Ah!—will Posterity believe it—
Not only don't deserve success,
But hasn't managed to achieve it,"

with the lines:

"I will not try the reach again,
I will not set my sail alone,
To moor a boat bereft of men
At Yarnton's tiny docks of stone. . . ."

Mr. Hilaire Belloc.
From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

Finally there are the epigrams, that may prove the most enduring of all his work. Landor wrote much, but "Gebir" is forgotten and few read the "Imaginary Conversations"; but his epigrams have lasted and are remembered by men the world over. So it may be Posterity will forget the political novels, the history and much of the essays—though some of these are worthy of preservation—and cherish a few lyrics and such epigrams as these:

ON A SLEEPING FRIEND.

Lady, when your lovely head
Droops to sink among the Dead,
And the quiet places keep
You that so divinely sleep;
Then the dead shall blessed be
With a new solemnity,
For such Beauty, so descending,
Pledges them that Death is ending.
Sleep your fill—but when you wake Dawn shall over Lethe break."

THE STATUE.

"When we are dead, some Hunting-boy will pass
And find a stone half-hidden in tall grass
And grey with age; but having seen that stone
(Which was your image), ride more slowly on."

We may end with another:

When I am dead, I hope it may be said:
"His sins were scarlet, but his books were read."

He need have no fear for his poems: they always will be.

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

The autumn publishing season is now in full swing. It is a heartening experience to spend an hour with the publishers' autumn lists, for either publishers are incurable optimists heading for bankruptcy or we have many reasons for thinking the heart of the nation is sound, its mind alert and interest varied and quick, and its pocket not quite empty. I am not concerned to calculate whether the number of books published this autumn will exceed other records, being only too ready to rejoice in the range and quality of what is offered.

September has been a busy month—indeed one firm indicates that it hopes to finish its respectably long list of autumn publications by the end of October. We are all so inevitably aware of the large number of novels published that it is well to be reminded of the splendid enterprise of British publishers in providing for other needs. Quite casually I noted the number of books on historical subjects either ready or soon to be published. In addition to " Blenheim " by Professor G. M. Trevelyan (reviewed in this issue), Longmans have just issued " William III and the Defence of Holland," by Mary Caroline Trevelyan, and in October are to publish " The Age of the Chartists, 1832–1854," by J. L. and Barbara Hammond. What a fruitful collaboration theirs has been! Macmillans have just published " Sidelights on Queen Victoria," by the Rt. Hon. Sir Frederick Ponsonby and promise for October, " A History of Persia," by Brig.-General Sir Percy Sykes, and have many other fine historical books on their list. The Bodley Head have just issued " The Diaries of Colonel the Hon. Robert Fulke Greville," which promise us an inside view of the life and times of George III. Ernest Benn, Ltd., continue their excellent " The Modern World " series, edited by the Rt. Hon. H. A. L. Fisher, and Elkin Mathews & Marrot, Ltd., have just put out " Makers of Modern Europe," by Count Carlo Sforza. For recent history, by common consent the most significant and important book, and one which will lie close to the hand of student and historian for a long time is " Lord D'Abernon's Diary," the third and completing volume of which Hodder & Stoughton have just published. I note with keen interest that Cassells promise for very early October, " Chapters of Autobiography," by the late Earl of Balfour. This volume covers the period from his childhood to the year 1885. What a story—had he lived to tell the whole.

Miss Mary C. Trevelyan.

J. M. Dent & Son have chosen to-day as the date of simultaneous publication in England, and in America by Longmans, of Gordon Craig's " Henry Irving." The design on the wrapper of the English edition contains the initials of everyone who acted or worked with Irving at the Lyceum, including even the stage carpenter. The publishers propose to give a prize for the most complete list of the people indicated by the initials. Here is a chance for the " old school " of theatregoers who will enjoy rummaging in the " glory-box " of rich memories whether they get the prize or not. In any case they are sure of their reward, but the one with inside information straight from behind the scenes seems to stand a good chance of the offered prize.

The same publishers promise us quickly a second and enlarged edition of " The Stuffed Owl "—that Anthology of Bad Verse, selected by D. B. Wyndham Lewis and Charles Lee, which went straight to its mark and made us realise there are bright ideas all around us—if only we could see them. What " stuffing " for Christmas! The indefatigable R. Brimley Johnson is bringing together in his " Jane Austen " all that we know or need to know about one of whom some of us cannot know too

From a drawing by KRAMER.

MR. HUGH ROSS WILLIAMSON.

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
OCTOBER 1920.

From a drawing by FRANK E. SLATER.

MR. H. G. WELLS.

much. This book is listed for October publication by Dent. By the way, I need not remind you to keep your eye on the world-famous Everyman's Library to which have just been added Goethe's Conversations with Eckermann; Fielding's "Amelia"; and "Middlemarch," by George Eliot. Also we are not likely to overlook the World's Classics to which Oxford University Press have just added two Jane Austen volumes.

Arnold Bennett's new novel, "Imperial Palace," is 672 pages, small demy 8vo, cloth boards, 10s. 6d. net, and will be published October 9th, at a time when we have over two million unemployed. The latter fact will not prevent adequate sales, however, for the final and dominating fact about a book is not its price, not even its author, but the book itself. He has chosen a big canvas—quite other than writing a lot of words—and if he has succeeded in his aim to interpret the hurried life of modern days, the romance of big business, the book will sell. Recent best-sellers like "Good Companions" and "Angel Pavement" have put new heart into the trade. Some people talk as though the millennium would come if all books were to be sold at 6d., whereas, even in these days, people pay 10s. 6d. for a novel and are glad. The really significant feature of to-day is not the number of the unemployed but the amount of money spent for amusement—that is the river which will make glad authors, publishers, booksellers, and the public themselves if we can get the right books.

Mr. Arnold Bennett.

From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

With cheap books in mind, surely two of the best "omnibus" volumes which this or any other year can offer are—the one volume edition of "A History of English Literature," by Emile Legouis and Louis Cazamian (18s.; Dent); and "The Outline of History," by H. G. Wells, containing the full material of the two volume revised edition, together with all the Horrabin maps, charts and drawings (8s. 6d.; Cassell). Surely all that is required to-day for a liberal education is not money, but time and an ordinary amount of intelligence. This second Renaissance will surpass the first in the new worlds offered to the mind and for the sheer romance of learning. We are in the midst of a new age of discovery, of the discovery of truth and the way to impart and share it.

T. M. M. wrote in the Manchester Guardian a few weeks ago: "The next best-seller will probably be religious in a general sort of way—not of course theological, but written by someone who bears the same relation to theology that Mr. Wells bears to science. It will either be a very fat book or a very thin book, something precious or something straight from the heart. Above all, it will be wholesome. Yes, the next best-seller will carry us back to the good old pre-psychoanalysis days." Well, I think I can put my hand on a certain best-seller and it is religious without being theological, it is a thin book in that it is about 40,000 words, it is precious just because it comes straight from the heart. It is "God in the Slums," pictures of the work the Salvation Army is doing in the slums, told by Hugh Redwood, the assistant managing editor of the News Chronicle, and just published by Hodder & Stoughton at 1s. paper, and 2s. 6d. cloth. One of those books whose every reader becomes a bookseller. The only question is as to how soon it will pass the hundred thousand mark—my guess is, before Christmas.

I have just read with interest an article in the Autumn Number of Artwork on "A Century of Book Illustration, 1830-1930," by Douglas Percy Bliss. We hope in the near future to publish a valuable contribution on the subject. The camera and other inventions of method and process are driving the old style of illustrator hard. Yet because truth and beauty have been joined together by God man can not put them asunder. Ordinary illustrations will continue to come from the mechanic hand or the various mechanical inventions, but the artist-interpreter will have his place in the service of truth as long as man and women take pen in hand. It looks to me that this is going to be rather a lean season for really good illustrated books of the better sort, but the Bodley Head, Ltd., have started well with three books: Fielding's "Tom Jones," with 20 full page illustrations in photogravure and numerous drawings in black-and-white by G. Spencer Pryse; "The Red Lily," by Anatole France, translated by Winifred Stephens, with illustrations and decorations by Donia Nachshen; and "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," illustrated by S. G. Hulme Beaman.

Mr. Robert Hichens.

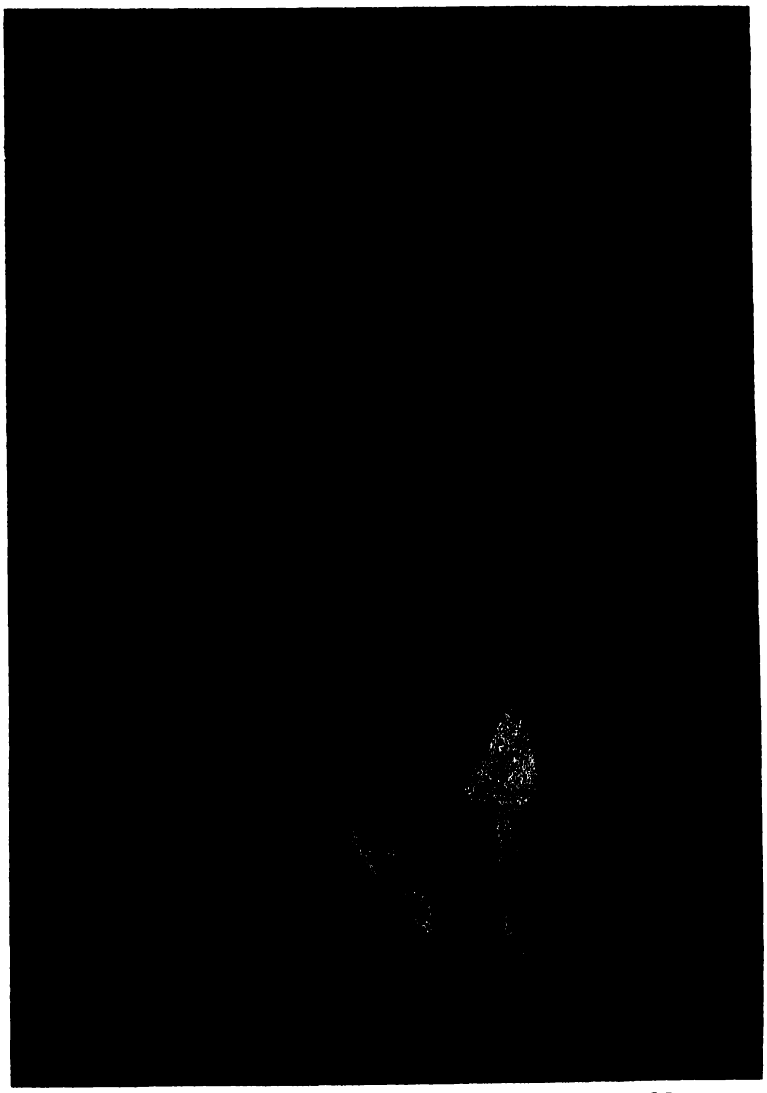
It reminds some of us of the passing of the years that Cassells have just published Robert Hichens' new novel, "The Bracelet." He belongs to another generation, but is no interloper in this. Ah me, with what riches we dower the writers that first win us! It's a long day since I first read him and I am in his debt.

I read recently a savage article on how Australia stones its prophets—in this case writers—by not lifting a hand to help them This caused me to read with more than usual interest an article by Vance Palmer in The New Statesman for August 30th, where he asks why Australia has produced so little literature. Part of his answer is that there is more good native product than the "outsider" thinks unless he has made a reasonable study of the subject—but the implied charge holds. Partly it is the inevitable influence of the "old country" in a wider sense than just England; but more it is due to the sparse population and its distribution in the country. The virility of the Australian, the varied nature of his country, the inevitable development which cannot fail such a people and land in view of world conditions make it certain that Australia has a literary future. For the second time, Vance Palmer has won the Sydney Bulletin prize, and the winning novel, "The Passage," is just published in this country by Stanley Paul. I was particularly interested in the last two sentences of Mr. Palmer's article: "Good novels do not spring out of nothing; they depend on audiences, publishers, a tradition of the importance of writing." Literature is neither the affair nor the product of publisher and author—in the long run, the law of supply and demand determines not only the quantity but the quality of books. In the meantime, and from Australia, we have also "The Fortunes of Richard Mahony."

Mr. Vance Palmer.

Bruce Graeme,
Author of "The Penance of Brother Alaric" (Hutchinson).



I am glad to know that T. & T. Clark will soon have ready Ronald Campbell Macfie's Thomson Lectures, which they are publishing under the title "Science Rediscovers God." I have read the manuscript and fully appreciate its worth. It is a poet's interpretation of science in its many fields, the scientific approach to truth and results achieved. It calls for a poet adequately to feel and record the revelations of modern science.

Not so very long ago I told Marcus Woodward that I would gladly give a handful of years to have his knowledge of earth and sea and sky. He smiled, but I meant it nor should I live the less. He sees and knows—and I am glad to see in Humphrey Toulmin's list, "Old Man of the Woods," where Marcus Woodward talks to scouts and cubs.

The Cambridge University Press are publishing early in October a book that will give us back "the years that the locusts have eaten"—"The Eighteen Eighties," edited by Mr. Walter de la Mare. Separate essays give us different aspects of those opulent days, though they were in the heart of Victoria's reign: T. E. Brown, by F. S. Boas; Newman and Manning, by C. C. Martindale; Pater, by T. S. Eliot; Fiction, by Forrest Reid; Gilbert and Sullivan, by G. K. Chesterton; Ibsen, by H. Granville-Barker; Martin Tupper, by John Drinkwater; Lewis Carroll, by Walter de la Mare—there you are, Victorianism, and neither plain nor flat. After all we had more than a question mark in those dark days, and now that all the railings are down there is not more park —only a larger and dustier stamping ground.

A truly gorgeous book, showing what the camera can do in the hands of an artist with unique material to work on, a book where the camera gives eyes to the reader and lights up every page of an heroic tale, is "The Home of the Blizzard," just published by Hodder & Stoughton. This is the popular edition, abridged, of the epic story of the Australasian Antarctic Expedition of 1911–1914, led by Sir Douglas Mawson. There are pages in this thrilling book which make you lift your head with pride that you are a man, and these eighty pages of marvellous photographs give you the romance and glamour of the Antarctic, and the other side of the shield, for those with eyes to see. Sir Douglas is too strong to boast, but he looked up from his littered desk in an improvised office as he was preparing for the expedition on which he is at present engaged, and with a smile said to me: "A real authority on Antarctic literature has said this is the best that has been written—and I think there is that in it which ought to live." This will be a magnificent gift-book for Christmas, alike for the story it has to tell and the pictures which so gloriously help to tell it.

Sir Douglas Mawson.

"The Diary of a Provincial Lady," by E. M. Delafield, has been appearing in Time and Tide, and Macmillans will have the book ready for early October. They make an interesting claim—that it is a humble feminine version of the famous "Diary of a Nobody." Whether this claim is established or no, a book from E. M. Delafield is always welcome.

It does not look as though we are to have a large number of theological books this autumn, but there are several of more than ordinary value and importance. There is "The Faith of a Moralist," the Gifford Lectures of 1926–1928, by Professor A. E. Taylor, coming from Macmillans. Professor Taylor has one of the most acute and interesting minds of our day and every word he writes is carefully weighed by those who count in philosophy and theology. John Murray is publishing immediately "The Philosophy of the Good Life," the Gifford Lectures, by Bishop Gore, 1929 – 1930. Also, at the end of October, they will have ready the first volume of the Third and Final Series of "The Letters of Queen Victoria," edited by George Earle Buckle.

I heard on good authority recently that the New Novels at One Dollar in America is an experiment that has already more than justified itself —at least so far as sales up to the present are concerned. There are other factors than present sales in this matter but it may well be that, as my friend put it, economic conditions have forced the American publishers into a course of action which will prove one of the very best steps the trade has ever taken. I think my friend meant two things at least—that America now sees the immense, almost immeasurable, possibilities of the cheap market which up to the present she has not appreciated and developed as British publishers have; secondly, the dollar book is increasing the number of bookshops out of all calculation. Every drug-store is now a potential bookshop, and many of them, actually. This second point, of course, can and must be looked at from many other points of view, not least from the standpoint of the straight bookseller who does not stock other wares. Anything that stimulates the bookseller to business enterprise is good : a policy which leads to his funeral involves others in the long run. Still, like so much more in America, it is all very interesting.

I recall the many times when my friend, the late St. John Adcock, spoke in quiet appreciation of the poetry of John Freeman. The last occasion was soon after Freeman's death. I am very glad to know that Macmillans will have ready in October "Last Poems of John Freeman," with an Introduction by J. C. Squire. Also a new book by Wilfrid Gibson: "Hazards: Poems, 1928–1930."

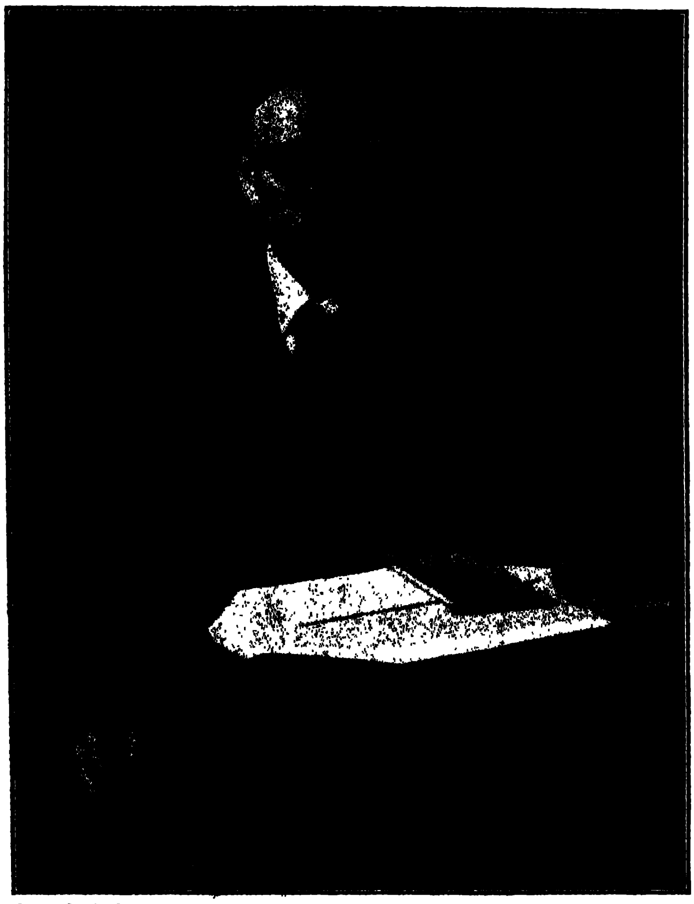

Photo by F. E. Grattan.

John Freeman

A London daily newspaper has inaugurated an interesting competition in connection with its serialisation of "Memoirs of My Early Life," by the Rt. Hon. Winston S. Churchill. They are rightly using this vivid autobiography to help some other young man or woman to find themselves and their life work. Mr. Churchill can make us see life and events as he saw them when he had to make decisions or suffer life's pressures and discipline. The book will be ready through Thornton Butterworth, Ltd., during October. The author of "The 'W' Plan," Mr. Graham Seton, has written another spy novel, this time with a Polish setting, "The Governor of Kattowitz," which the same house announces for October, a very cheering announcement indeed.

One of the coming books on my own reading list is Helen Ashton's "Mackerel Sky" (Gollancz), which will be published not later than early October. Her "Dr. Serocold" is repeating its British success in America. Also I must have "The Omnibus J. J. Connington," which contains four full-length stories: The Two Tickets Puzzle; Mystery at Lynden Sands; The Case with Nine Solutions; Nemesis at Raynham Parva.

I notice that several publishers are announcing limited and signed editions, some of which make us think that the "commercial" collector has brought it on his own head, as this seems the only explanation for their appearance. After all, the publisher and the author have a clear right to share in the spoils, to exploit the exploiters. Real collectors will know when to hold their hand—and keep both their hands in their pockets.

I am very glad to see that the Oxford University Press are definitely announcing for the autumn, "A Life of Jesus," by Basil Mathews, whose "Clash of Colour" is so well known. He has been at work for many years on this Life for young people, having to lay it down again and again for other work. It ought to be very good.

In the middle of September, Cassells published Miss Storm Jameson's interpretation of the Puritan Revolution—"The Decline of Merry England." She takes the line that Puritanism was really the enemy of religion and liberty. Not seldom, of course, we are indebted to our enemies for many good things. It will certainly be a sincere and a provocative book.

A most interesting book is promised from Gollancz for the late autumn—"St. Loe Strachey: His Life and Paper," by Amy Strachey. His wife tells the story of his life from twenty-seven to sixty-seven. By force of circumstances he was a great journalist and friend of great men, but by nature he was a great lover of men, of England, and a great organiser. This will be a most interesting and enlightening book in many ways.

I have marked the following from Heinemann's list, and though I have to put them as in a catalogue for reasons of space, yet there is a lyric quality about the names and suggestions which title or author awaken in the mind: "The Life and Letters of James Elroy Flecker," with an Introduction by J. C. Squire and a Memoir by Hellé Flecker

(September); "The Life and Letters of Sir Edmund Gosse," edited by the Hon. Evan Charteris (September); "The Greville Diary," edited by Lytton Strachey; "The 'Wanderer' of Liverpool," by John Masefield (September); and "Come Away Death," the new novel by Lorna Rea, whose "Six Mrs. Greenes" I remember so well. BOOKMAN.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS

Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn has a great affection for short sentences and a rather jerky style which somehow helps to confirm the reader's impression that he has a profound understanding of the psychological processes of his characters. His latest novel, ROMAN SUMMER (7s. 6d.; Thornton Butterworth), is chiefly concerned with John Austin, a young American of slow resolves, given to writing verses in the classical manner, and employed by the Columbus Sentinel. With current American writers he is as dissatisfied as with himself, and concluding that what is the matter with them all is the American atmosphere, he makes for Rome, where, beyond a peradventure, it will be easy to be articulate in the proper manner There he begins a play about Catullus, but while inspiration lingers love comes to him. She was a Jewess, born in Morocco, Esther Azancot by name, cultured and lovely and with a highly developed race consciousness that made the thought of marriage with a man of different race impossible. She persuades John, as much by her refusal of his offer and her reasons for it as by her words, that all déracinés, all rootless people, are doomed to sterility; and so John turns homewards again, to live in Sandusky as a hundred-per-cent. American, marry his landlady's daughter, father hundred-per-cent. American children, and write the simple annals of true Americans who ape no alien folk, but are content to be themselves. So he is resolving when the book ends, a book which Mr. Lewisohn has written so adroitly that it holds the reader to the end.

The Lorams lived on Ludgate Hill, above the shop where Richard Loram, with the skilful assistance of Hiram Sterne, bought and sold prints. By that you know that the tale Mrs. Fred Reynolds has to tell in THE LORAM PICTURE (7s. 6d.; Bodley Head) is a tale of other days. Tradesmen still lived above their shops in the forties and fifties of the last century, when Queen Victoria primly sat upon her throne and primness ruled her subjects' lives. Marriage was still the only career open to women. To submit and to settle down, to be cared for and sheltered —what more could a woman wish? There were days ahead when it would not be considered indelicate for a woman to give proof that she possessed the power to think for herself and be independent, but those as yet were days undreamed of, save occasionally by such as Amelia Loram, who knew their dreams ridiculous and fulfilment of them impossible. Pushfulness had not yet begun to mar the dignity of business, and all was leisurely done both in the shop below and the house above. Of such days is the story, and in a leisurely manner suitable to the telling of it Mrs. Reynolds tells of the lives of the Lorams, male and female, making us love them all and incidentally arousing thanksgivings, especially in the breasts of her fair readers, that the dead days in which they lived are happily beyond recall.

Another victory for the amateur sleuth, and a very creditable one at that is THE MURDER OF CECILY THANE, by H. Ashbrook (5s. net; Eyre & Spottiswoode). The discovery of the body of Cecily Thane presented a desperate problem because it was so obvious who had committed the crime! The deceased lady went to night clubs with paid escorts, and everything pointed very neatly to her boy friend, who had, unluckily, been mixed up in a thing of this sort before. However, the amateur sleuth, none other than the district attorney's "silly ass" brother, began to butt in and ask apparently fool questions. This started the fun. Mr. Ashbrook tells a good story and creates a situation at once credible and intelligent, but his style suffers from over-emphasis, especially in the dialogue. The "silly ass" is a bit too silly for such a capable thinker, and the district attorney as heavy as a Presbyterian elder.

We see scores of open-air yarns, but only on very rare occasions can we now read one. We supped our fill years ago. We fell however for MOUNTAIN MAN, a first novel by Harold C. Wire (7s. 6d.; Skeffington). From the first page the reader has a feeling of actuality—this man has footed the country he writes about, mountain and plain; has fought forest fires and faced the hot jealousy, greed and hate of living men and women. The ordinariness of the plot does not spoil this story, and we shall certainly anticipate with interest the next book by this author.

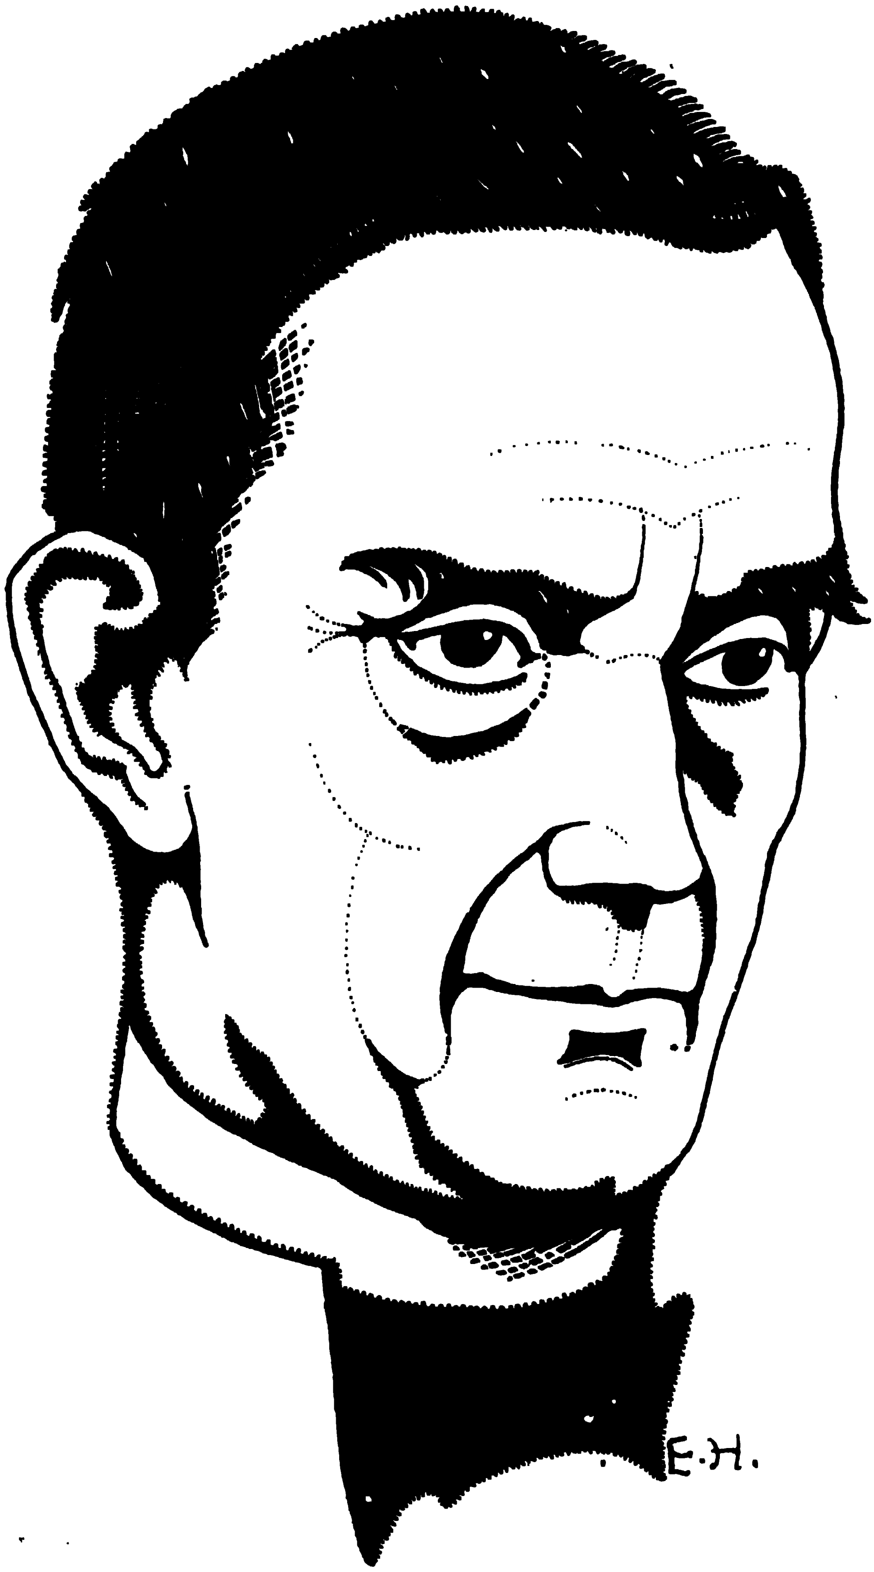
After Mr. Cecil Freeman Gregg's success with his detective novel, "The Murder On the Bus," we looked forward to his next book, THE BRAZEN CONFESSION (7s. 6d. net; Hutchinson). The treatment, though not entirely unfamiliar, is unusual because in the first chapter the criminal admits the crime, confident that there is no possibility of detection. Curiously enough, this criminal is not the central figure in the story. Following on the confession we are introduced to the events which led up to this admission of guilt. This latter involves the adventures of the good Inspector Higgins of Scotland Yard, and he is certainly up against it. I was always under the impression that the cheerful bonhomie of Scotland Yard officials with their suspects existed only between the covers of Mr. Edgar Wallace's books, but Inspector Higgins is also a friendly soul, which brightens matters up considerably. On the whole this is good work, but there is a tendency to confusion in the first half, which is dispelled as one proceeds. Higgins's intelligence functions much better towards the end of the job, and he is less obviously chasing his tail. The incidental gentry from the underworld are of the genuine "thug" brand.

The scene of GUERRA, by Alfred Neumann (8s. 6d.; Knopf), is laid amid the Revolution in Italy at the middle of last century. Guerra is the chief figure involved, and the reader is led through over three hundred pages of stirring incidents. There are intrigues and counter intrigues, and beautiful women. Madda, Guerra's sister, stands out as a loyal sister, anxious above everything for her brother's progress and safety. Then there is little Maria Pia, whom the revolutionary loves with all the fervour of his strong and dominant nature. The scene in the bedroom, with the brisk, capable doctor as Guerra, at the practitioner's request, gives his blood to save the life of the frail and delicate girl, is very well described, as are also some of the interviews between Guerra and the Grand Duke. Those who already are interested in the stirring history of Southern Europe during this period, namely 1848, will find the many details given by Mr. Neumann well worth a careful perusal.

The Bookshelf.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS AND MODERN PROBLEMS.*

Plato described the philosopher as "the spectator of all time and eternity." Dean Inge fits that description, for in his books on Christian Mysticism and Plotinus he has surveyed the eternal world of values and now, in what he thinks will be his last considerable book to write, he "leaves the templa serena of divine philosophy to take part in the turmoil of the street and the market-place" to-day, when "nothing is now taken for granted or accepted on authority" and "the relation of the Gospel of Christ to problems of conduct is the storm-centre of religious controversy in post-war Europe and America." Truly this is "a considerable book," whether we study its author in his characteristic moods, preferences and prejudices, or its literary charm, with its flashes of mordant wit, brilliant phrasing, judicial weighings of the pros and cons on most of the debatable subjects engaging thinkers to-day, its searching surveys and summaries of the past history of moral questions and practice, and wistful peeps into the files of time yet to come. "Considerable" too is the immense mass of material packed into this book: whole libraries have been ransacked for facts, statistics from Blue-books on vital themes of life and death, trade, divorce and what-not are ranged alongside of the extracts from the best thought on moral questions from Plato down to Bertrand Russell and Santayana, which the learned Dean has amassed in half a century of hard reading and study.

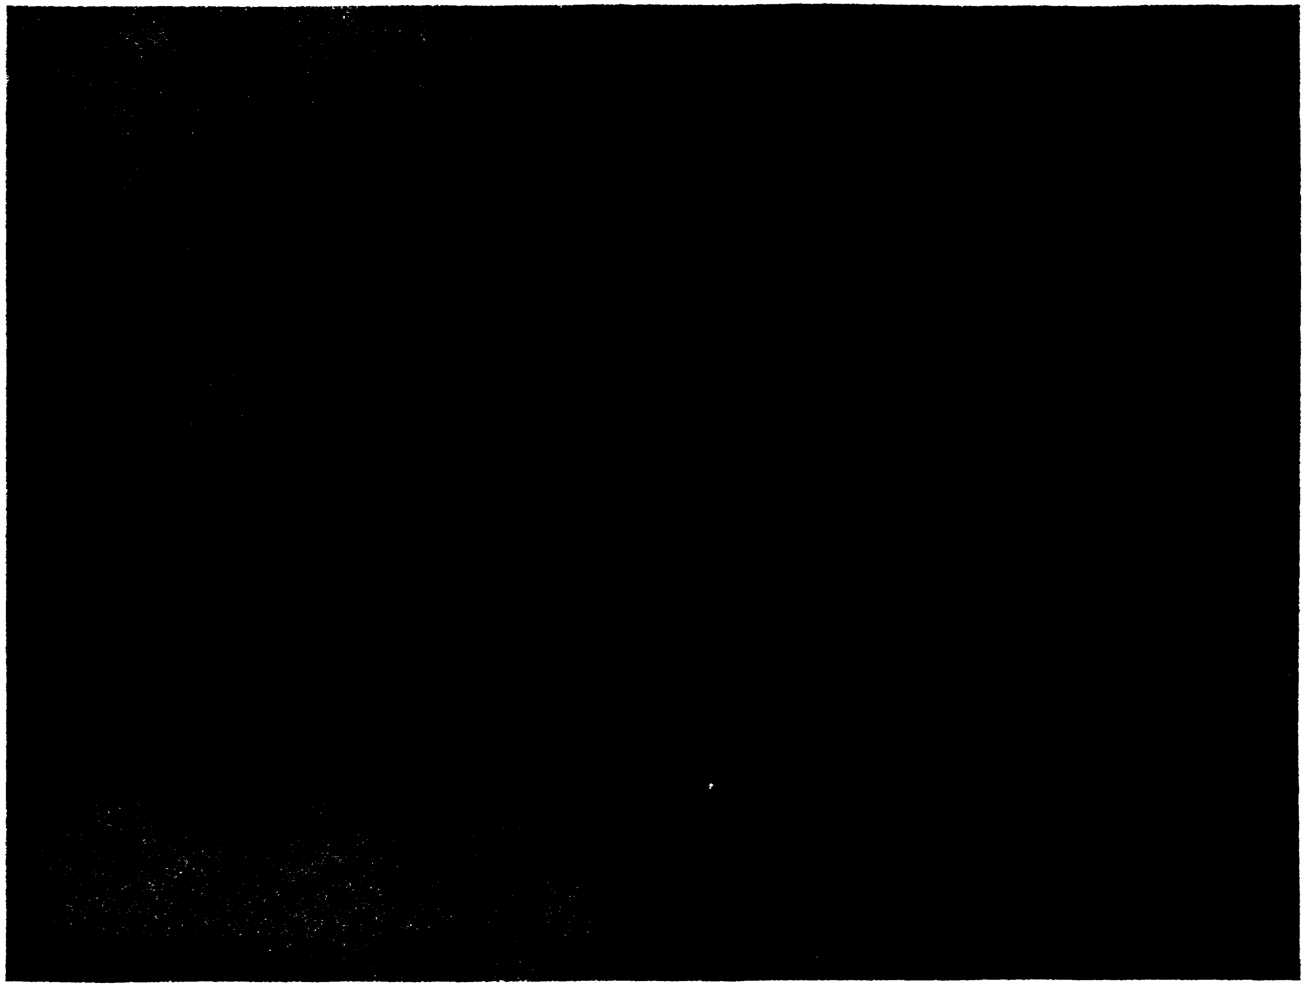


In the first eighty pages the Dean sets forth what he conceives to be "the essence of New Testament Ethics," proceeding thence to discuss at length "the distortions of the Christian religion, (a) Asceticism, a one-sided exaggeration of a genuine element in Christianity, a world-renouncing and self-denying aspect," and (b) "the aberration . . . the monstrous growth of a theocratic Empire in Europe," by which "the Ethics of the Gospel have been at every point poisoned and distorted." This presentation takes up the first half of the book: the second half gives detailed discussion of (a) the Problems of Social Ethics, and (b) Personal Ethics. Under Social Ethics are grouped what may be regarded as essays on The Ages of Science and Industrialism (which did not come into view in the New Testament), The Social Teaching in the Early, Medieval, Reformation and Modern Periods of Church History, The Population Question, Humanitarianism, Woman's Position and War. In the section on Personal Ethics we face the burning questions of Sex, Divorce, Suicide, and the Place of Beauty in life. A closing chapter gives a résumé of the volume and fruitful suggestions concerning the spirit in which the Church should face "the new hopes and duties the secular progress of humanity has brought" now that "civilisation is entering upon a new phase."

The method of treatment followed is "to take the Ethics of the New Testament, as embodying the Christian revelation, and to bring them in comparison with the principles which seem to underlie the theory and practice of the white races to-day." The standards of contemporary ethical practice, in the Dean's view, seem to be "the greatest pleasure for oneself: the happiness of the greatest number, or progress towards some ideal state of society"; and "the strongest appeal now seems to be to a kind of emotional utilitarianism with a calculus of pleasure and pain." Christian Ethics thus confront hedonism, utilitarianism, and secularism based on scientific views of man and the universe. The standard by which Christian Ethics are to be ascertained is the character and teaching of Jesus Christ as given in the first three Gospels, and as expounded and applied by St. Paul and St. John. As the Dean puts it, "the only external, authoritative rule is given in the life and teaching of Christ as recorded in the New Testament. And this is hardly external, for it is accepted and interpreted by the testimonium Spiritus Sancti declaring itself in the Christian society and in the individual conscience" (p. 27). A penetrating study of the Gospels as sources leads to the conviction that we have in them "a revelation through a character which so far as fallible men can judge was perfect and consistent." That character was one of a "profoundly religious and spiritual nature" marked by "deep wisdom, balance and breadth of mind, even irony and humour." As regards Christ's precepts, Dr. Inge says, "we find no system of Ethics, no code of rules for conduct, but an outlook, a manner of thinking and acting, a standard of values, which necessarily penetrate every corner of the personality" of man. Hence Christ "did not burden His Church with a code, or confine posterity to the crude beliefs of an unscientific age." Consequently, "we have a right, in virtue of our knowledge of the mind of Christ and belief in His continued spiritual presence, to condemn and repudiate immoral doctrines and irrational taboos, even when these come to us supported by ecclesiasticism" (p. 25). What these doctrines and taboos are within the Church, how far the scientific view of the worlds of nature man and society square with the New Testament views of demons and spirits, miracles and eschatology, the reader must seek in the book itself: our space will not avail.

Dean Inge is alive to the criticisms levelled against Christian Ethics as seen in the life and teachings of Jesus. The scant place for art and æsthetics, the seeming slight on family life, the stress on passive virtues, Nietzsche's "slave morality," scorn of democratic ideals, the impracticability of the Sermon on the Mount, the stress on rewards for virtue and pains for vice as conflicting with pure morality—all these modern criticisms are weighed up and appraised. He agrees that there has been a painful lack of feeling, indeed blindness, as to the future of man on earth, owing to the early Christian absorption in the hope of Christ's speedy return. There will be some furious discussion of the freedom with which the Dean eliminates the passages on the Second Coming, the references to Christ's founding of a Church, in the Gospels, and the frequent allusions to "spurious passages" in Paul's letters and other parts of the New Testament. His reading of Church history as showing "that traditional Christian Ethics has wandered a long way from the original Gospel" will be contested, and his frequent insistence on "mysticism as being the crown of religion" he may find it hard to substantiate from the Gospel records of Christ's teachings. Bultmann, in Germany, is nearer the facts when he says that Jesus always assumed that the plain average man, and not the mystic, was aware, by conscience, of the actuality and claim of God, and Dr. Gore rightly emphasises that simple goodness and not mystic thrills is the staple of true religious life. Others may think that Dr. Inge frequently forgets to apply Christian Ethics when detailing modern views on sex, war and divorce. But he will rejoin that you cannot apply a spirit, "a fountain of life and not a system," "an outlook," like a yardstick to measure practice by. Others may think that the historical method of treatment requires a deeper preliminary philosophical discussion than the Dean has given. It would be worth while in another edition if the Dean filled out the hints as to the absoluteness of the Christian Ethic, the finality of its standard of values, and the way he conceives how the "super-historical in ethics can hold the historical together." But "ars longa, vita brevis." He has done a great service to the world of thought by presenting his views of what constitutes the essence of Christian practice in our workaday world. He has a serene

* "Christian Ethics and Modern Problems." By the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, K.C.V.O., Dean of St. Paul's. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)



SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
OCTOBER, 1930.

An impression by EUGÈNE HASTAIN.

DEAN INGE.

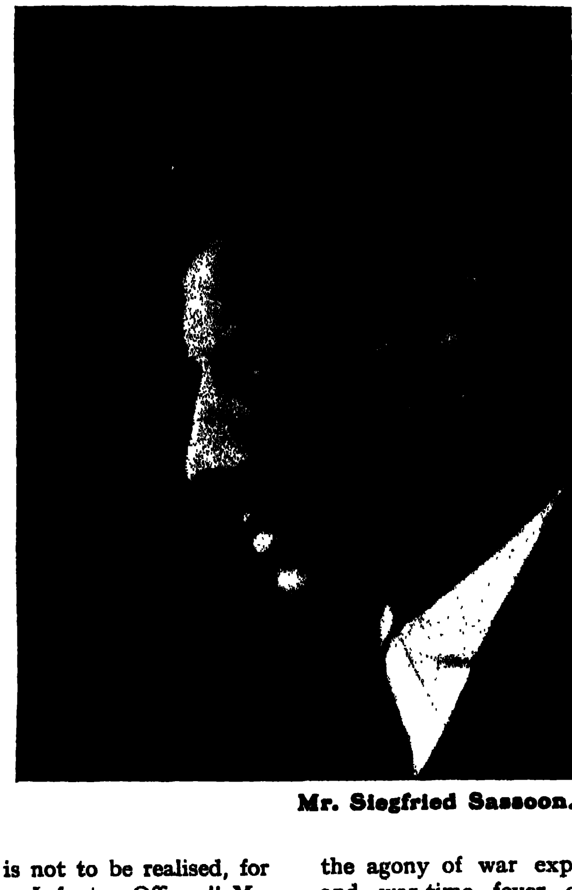
SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
OCTOBER, 1930.

From a drawing made in Cairo by HILDA TREFUSIS.

See page 66.

MR. ARTHUR RANSOME.

outlook for the future. "A thousand years hence mankind will still be sitting at the feet of Jesus Christ. . . . Beyond Jesus of Nazareth the moral stature of humanity can never go."



Minor slips to correct are, that not Schweitzer but Johannes Weiss coined the term Interimsethik; Whittier and not Emerson wrote the lines on p. 384. Lowell's lines (p. 388) are incorrectly quoted, and the German (p. 40, n.l.) needs attention.

R. BIRCH HOYLE.

SIEGFRIED SASSOON.*

Mr. Siegfried Sassoon won much praise and fame for his unusual book, "Memoirs of a Fox-hunting Man," but in the main he will be remembered in future years as a poet who was preoccupied with his memories of the horrors and the sadness of the Great War. He was a young man when those scarifying experiences were indelibly etched on his mind, and he has never ceased to protest against the cruelty, the uselessness and unreasonableness of it all—the waste of youth and beauty both physical and natural. Thus he cried:

"Do you remember the rats; and the stench
Of corpses rotting in front of the front-line trench—
And dawn coming, dirty-white, and chill with a hopeless rain?
Do you ever stop and ask: 'Is it all going to happen again?'
Do you remember that hour of din before the attack—
And the anger, the blind compassion that seized and shook you then
As you peered at the doomed and haggard faces of your men?
Do you remember the stretcher-cases lurching back
With dying eyes and lolling heads—those ashen-grey Masks of the lads who once were keen and kind and gay?"

Mr. Siegfried Sassoon.

His war poetry appeared soon after the dire cataclysm ceased. Ten years later, in "The Heart's Journey," he seemed to envisage a literary future wherein he could rise above the old wan memories of horror and death, and reach that land of pure delight where his soul would have been a happy wanderer from the beginning had he not been born out of time and engulfed in the excoriating abyss of the War:

"Soul, be my song; return arrayed in white;
Lead home the loves that I have wronged and slain;
Bring back the summer dawns that banished night
With distant-warbling bird-notes after rain.
Time's war-worn traveller I.
And you, O song,
O soul, my Paradise laid waste so long."

But apparently the aspiration is not to be realised, for in his new book, "Memoirs of an Infantry Officer," Mr. Sassoon once more voices—this time in prose, but often lyrical prose—his disgust at the brutality and horror of the War. Twelve years have not softened the hard impressions of that hideous period as they struck "rather a solitary-minded young man." Again he pictures the terrors and the pain of it all:

"There were high-booted German bodies too, and in the blear beginning of daylight they seemed as much the victims of a catastrophe as the men who had attacked them. As I stepped over one of the Germans an impulse made me lift him up from the miserable ditch. Propped against the bank, his blond face was undisfigured, except by the mud which I wiped from his eyes and mouth with my coat-sleeve. He'd evidently been killed while digging, for his tunic was knotted loosely about his shoulders. He didn't look to be more than eighteen. Hoisting him a little higher, I thought what a gentle face he had, and remembered that this was the first time I'd ever touched one of our enemies with my hands. Perhaps I had some dim sense of the futility which had put an end to this good-looking youth. Anyhow I hadn't expected the Battle of the Somme to be quite like this. . . . Kendle was half kneeling against some broken ground; I remember seeing him push his tin hat back from his forehead and then raise himself a few inches to take aim. After firing once he looked at us with a lively smile; a second later he fell sideways. A blotchy mark showed where the bullet had hit him just above the eyes. . . . Alternately crouching and crawling, I worked my way back. I passed the young German whose body I had rescued from disfigurement a couple of hours before. He was down in the mud again, and someone had trodden on his face. It disheartened me to see him, though his body had now lost all touch with life, and was part of the wastage of the War. He and Kendle had cancelled one another out in the process called 'attrition of man-power.' Farther along I found one of our men dying slowly with a hole in his forehead. His eyes were open and he breathed with a horrible snoring sound . . ."

And he vividly conveys the sensations generated by intensive bombardment and a shot wound:

"Down in our frowsty cellar we breakfasted at six, unwashed and apprehensive. Our table, appropriately enough, was an empty ammunition box. At six-forty-five the final bombardment began, and there was nothing for us to do except sit round our candle until the tornado ended. For more than forty minutes the air vibrated and the earth rocked and shuddered. . . . Barton and I sat speechless, deafened and stupefied by the seismic state of affairs, and when he lit a cigarette the match flame staggered crazily. . . .

"High up in the fresh blue sky an aeroplane droned and glinted. I thought what a queer state of things it all was, and then decided to take a peep at the surrounding country. This was a mistake which ought to have put an end to my terrestrial adventures, for no sooner had I popped my silly head out of the sap than I felt a stupendous blow in the back between my shoulders. My first notion was that a bomb had hit me from behind, but what had really happened was that I had been sniped from in front."

Mr. Sassoon returned, wounded, to England for hospital and convalescence; and on entering his ambulance at Charing Cross "a woman handed me a bunch of flowers and a leaflet by the Bishop of London, who earnestly advised me to lead a clean life and attend Holy Communion."

There follows the most interesting part of the book, when the author, the victim of introspection, describes the reactions of an acutely sensitive nature—the nature of a man who had suffered physically and, even more, mentally all the agony of war experience—to the cheap patriotism and war-time fever of people at home: the busybody women filling temporary posts, the arm-chair critics, the expedient clerics who bestowed their blandest smiles on the returned heroes who had killed the most Germans, the journalists who wrote of the "Healing of Nations," and "Ordeal by Battle"—of whom Mr. Sassoon pungently observes, "Such people needed to have their noses rubbed in a few rank physical facts, such as what a company of men smelt like after they'd been in action for a week. . . ."

In time he felt he must let the doped public know what the War really was like, and how little it resembled the propaganda of the "patriotic press" and publicists safely at home. This, he realised, would mean military ruin for himself; and how the matter developed and how it incongruously ended must be read in his own entertaining words.

* "Memoirs of an Infantry Officer." By the author of "Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man." 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

Although this book is written as the further history of George Sherston from the point at which it was broken off in "Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man," I gather it relates the actual experiences and opinions of Mr. Sassoon, for he makes Sherston say: "It is my own story I am trying to tell, and as such it must be received."

For myself, personally, the most attractive portions of this accomplished book are the little vignettes inspired by some glimpse of scenic or natural beauty in sharp contrast to the facts of war:

"Afterwards I went up the hill to my favourite sanctuary—a wood of hazels and beeches. The evening air smelt of wet mould and wet leaves; the trees were misty green; the church bell was tolling in the town, and smoke rose from the roofs. But the lecturer's voice still battered on my brain: 'If you don't kill him, he'll kill you. Stick him between the eyes, in the throat, in the chest. Don't waste good steel. . . . Three inches will do for him; when he coughs, go and look for another.'

"Next evening, just before stand-to, I was watching a smouldering sunset and thinking that the sky was one of the redeeming features of the War. Behind the support line where I stood, the shell-pitted ground sloped sombrely on to the dusk; the distances were blue and solemn, with a few trees grouped on a ridge, dark against the deep-glowing embers of another day endured. I was looking westward, away from the War, and the evening star twinkled serenely. Guns were grumbling miles away. Cart-wheels could be heard on the roads behind Fricourt; it still made me feel strange when I remembered that they were German cart-wheels."

Only a poet could clothe in such exquisite phrasing the impressions of things seen and felt in conditions far alien to beauty.

S. M. Ellis.

KING ARTHUR IN ITALY.*

It was in Bruges, where I am writing, that William Caxton and Collard Mansion printed the first book ever printed in our tongue—the "Tales of Troy." This was in 1475. Ten years later, Caxton printed the Morte D'Arthur which Malory had written "for to passe the time." To all but Arthurian experts and enthusiasts, King Arthur and his Knights are known chiefly through Malory's glorious pages, and few realise or even know that the legend, centuries before Malory lived, and many centuries before Tennyson and Stephen Hawker drew inspiration from what has been called "our national prose epic," had found its way into the literature of France, Italy and Spain, and had influenced the work of innumerable writers in prose and verse. Dr. Gardner quotes on his title page Caxton's Preface to the Morte D'Arthur:

"In him that should say or think that there was never such a king called Arthur might well be aretted great folly and blindness. For . . . ye shall see also in the history of Bochas, in his book, 'De Casu Principum,' part of his noble acts and also of his fall."

Bochas is of course Boccaccio; and, as Dr. Gardner points out, Boccaccio felt the allurement of the story, and dealt with it freely in his own fashion. In his "Amorosa Visione" we are shown a castle hall painted with heroes of ancient Rome, who are followed by the cavalcade of the Knights of the Round Table, with Arthur at their head, and Bors, Percevel and Galahad following him. Lancelot rides with Guinevere; Tristan and Iseult ride hand in hand. In the "Corbaccio," a satire against women, Boccaccio writes of a woman whose prayer-books and rosaries were French romances, "in which she reads of Lancelot and of Guinevere, of Tristan and of Iseult, and their feats and their loves, and the jousts and tournaments and assemblies. She is all thrilled when she reads of Lancelot or Tristan or someone else forgathering secretly and alone in the chambers with their ladies."

* "The Arthurian Legend in Italian Literature." By Edmund G. Gardner, Litt.D. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

The work to which Caxton refers in his Preface—but he knew it only at third hand—supplies a quaint illustration; in a pavilion, beyond which are armed knights in combat, we see King Arthur, bearded, and in crown and ermine mantle, seated at the Round Table with six companions; bread, salt, a chicken, and other edibles suggest the "grant chere" they made. Of the occasional echoes of the legend in the "Decameron" by far the most important and significant is the sub-title: "Il libro chiamato Decameron, cognominato Principe Galeotto." This appears to be Prince Galehaut, Lord of the Distant Isles, referred to not only by Malory but by Dante, and in romances earlier than Dante with which the "Principe" shows Boccaccio to have been acquainted. "Arthur" and other names in the legend were common in Italy in the Middle Ages, a fact which serves to show how popular the story of Arthur and his Knights was even then. Their exploits and adventures were sung by wandering minstrels long before the time of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and perhaps from these songs and stories of Italian troubadours the most interesting bas-relief over the north door of Modena Cathedral, of which admirable photographs are given, was composed. Dr. Gardner speaks of it as "an Arthurian document in stone"—an apt description, for it shows, and even names, King Arthur, Gawain, Sir Kay, Mordred, and other characters of the epic. Probably the bas-relief dates from the beginning of the twelfth century. Towards the end of this century we find the earliest literary references to the Arthurian legend in Italy; written then of course in Latin. In the thirteenth century we find the first Italian romance—or the first romance written in Italian—introducing the "Matter of Britain"—"matteria di Brettagna," as opposed to the "matteria di Francia," which dealt with the Carolingian cycle. The same century saw what is probably the first example of blank verse in Italian literature, and in it is found the name of Lancelot. The earliest Arthurian romance written by an Italian—but in French—is probably the "Meliadus" of Rusticano da Pisa, the man who, when a prisoner with Marco Polo at Genoa, took down from his lips the narrative of some of his adventures.

Dr. Gardner seems to have left no path unexplored while writing this able, scholarly, and very interesting book. We learn of twelfth century "fellowships of the Round Table" in twelfth century Italy, and are reminded that St. Francis called his first followers "my brethren, the Knights of the Round Table." The Angevin Kings of England, we are told, claimed to possess the sword of Tristan, which is still said to be kept among the regalia at the Tower of London, but Tristan's sword, "with which he killed the Morholt of Ireland," is also said to have been found at a tomb at Seprio, near Milan, in or before the fourteenth century. Among Italian writers whom Dr. Gardner mentions as having referred to, or been influenced by, the Arthurian Cycle are Guittone d'Arezzo, Chiara Davanzati, the earliest Florentine poet of any importance, Folgore de San Gimignano (who tells the young Sienese nobles of his day that they were more valiant and courteous than Lancelot, and, if need be, would make tournaments at Camelot) and, very much later, Ariosto, who, like Boiardo, attempted the fusion of the Arthurian and Carolingian Cycles. An extremely interesting chapter is headed "Dante and the Arthurian Legend." Dante was undoubtedly familiar with the French romances, and wove the stories of Tristan and of Lancelot into his tale of Paolo and Francesca. Among quite recent Italian dramatists who have taken our British epic as example or theme are Ettore Moschino and Domenico Tumiati.

There are some curious differences between Arthurian romance as we know it, and the epic in its Italian form. Some are very slight; as for instance red samite instead of white. In Italian literature the Holy Grael seems to assume less importance, and in the story of Tristan and Iseult the very dramatic episode of the ship with black or white sails seems to have vanished. Morgan le Fay is beautiful without malevolence, and Merlin is altered almost out of knowledge. But lovers of the old epic of Britain will find all this discussed at length in Dr. Gardner's book, which has the merit, among many others, of being written for the ordinary reader as well as for those who already have expert knowledge.

ALFRED TRESIDDER SHEPPARD.

THE VOICE OF THE DEAD.*

The letters which Mr. Laurence Housman has brought together in this volume provide perhaps the most veracious and intimate register, which has yet appeared, of what the War meant to a great variety of combatants and of the manner in which they met its terrible demands. They are at once heart-rending and heartening — heart-rending because it is almost unbearable to contemplate a civilisation which could destroy men so splendidly human, so simple and selfless as speak from almost every page of this book; heartening because a great emergency once again attests the innate decency and integrity of the individual man. Heaven knows, it exposed the innate savagery of man as well, and those who deplore the raw realism of recent war-novels will find little support in these letters for their contention that the picture has been too darkly drawn. That there are less horrors recorded here than might be expected is chiefly due to the fact that the writers plainly wished to spare parents, relations and friends the suffering of realising the ghastly ordeal to which they were exposed. Indeed some of the most affecting letters are those in which the writer tries to prepare and strengthen father or mother against the news of his own death in action. And admittedly we find in these letters (what many war novels have failed to convey) not a justification of war, but the sad truth that for many it offered for the first time a gateway into a larger life, that in a maelstrom of destruction they realised with a shock of delighted surprise what it was to live "with hand made sure, clear eye, and sharpened power," with a devotion of the whole being to life and death. As Mr. Housman writes, there are two voices in these letters—" the voice of a majority, the voice of a minority. The vast majority, though firmly convinced that what they do is right—or right in the sense that it is inevitable—show their detestation of war in its operation. Yet some of these express the keen satisfaction it gives them as an individual experience—mainly as a part of themselves, of their power to conquer fear, to live at the full push of their energies, mental and physical. To them, individually, active warfare gives life a fuller expression—for it is a life lived daily in the power to face death."

This enjoyment of war, as a means to disciplined and devoted self-expression, is in a few simply a spontaneous love of adventure. "This is all a great game," wrote one of these, and Julian Grenfell could say, "It is all the best fun. I have never, never felt so well, or so happy, or enjoyed anything so much. It just suits my stolid health and stolid nerves, and barbaric disposition." But it is significant that such "fighting excitement" is not found "vitalising everything" in the later years of the War. So far as any satisfaction is expressed then, it is because "one is brought face to face with realities. The follies, selfishness, luxury and general pettiness of the vile commercial sort of existence led by nine-tenths of the people of the world in peace time are replaced in war by a savagery that is at least more honest and outspoken."

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Mr. Laurence Housman.

And perhaps the greatest exposure of the falsity of our modern civilisation is to be found, not merely in the destructiveness of the late War, but in the fact that it offered to masses of men the first opportunity of living creatively, of fulfilling the deepest needs of the self by serving a cause that was greater than self. Ultimately that cause was the cause of a new life and a new consciousness. And a few at least of these writers were desperately aware of it. To quote one of them: "It really does not in the least matter how many people are killed, who wins, whether we starve or anything else of a transitory nature, provided that in the process human nature is transformed in some way or another. . . . How can there be a united nation without the passion for truth above all else? We are hypnotised by an unscrupulous press. We are always being taught to hate the Germans, and to refuse to think or speak of peace. We are told about our glorious cause till it simply stinks in the nostrils of the average man. We all know we have got to fight as long as we wear the uniform, and have thereby committed ourselves to slaughter as many Germans as possible. But I, for one, and I tell the men exactly the same, utterly refuse to hate the Kaiser or any of them, or to believe that I am fighting for a glorious cause or anything that the papers tell me. But if man learns to live a little more on the words coming out of God's, and not Northcliffe's, ecclesiastics', politicians', or anyone else's mouths—the war does not really matter."

Such a quotation as this is sufficient to show that we have here not only a vivid record, both objective and subjective, of war experiences, and one which constantly proves that intense living inevitably dictates good writing. We meet too a challenge, an unspoken appeal to find the same selfless inspiration in life which such men as these found in death.

HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

* "War Letters of Fallen Englishmen." Edited by Laurence Housman. 7s. 6d. (Gollancz.)

COLERIDGE AS PHILOSOPHER.*

This book, as the name of its distinguished author suggests, is for the student of philosophy, and not for the more general reader interested either in the poetry or personality of its subject.

"Coleridge suffers when any attempt is made to extract a philosophical system from his works. His admirers must limit themselves to claims for what he undoubtedly deserves, the honour of having done much to stimulate thought, and abandon any claim to the construction of a definite system." So wrote Leslie Stephen: but Professor Muirhead holds that this commonly accepted estimate is condemned by a study of the unpublished and largely neglected Coleridgean manuscripts. These are scattered and alas! fragmentary, but their importance, and in particular the importance of the various parts of the

* "Coleridge as Philosopher." By Professor J. H Muirhead. 12s. 6d. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

"Opus Maximum," are of paramount importance in any attempt to estimate Coleridge as a systematic thinker. A necessary and interesting account of the manuscripts is given in the appendix. It is by using this neglected material that Professor Muirhead seeks to prove that Coleridge made a far more serious attempt to work out his ideas into clear and consistent form than is commonly supposed.

Experiencing even during his schooldays "a rage for metaphysics," Coleridge at Cambridge passed under the influence of David Hartley, a Necessitarian, and the leading representative of the Lockean tradition. Finding some years later that "his metaphysical theories lay before him in the hour of anguish as toys by the bedside of a child deadly sick," he conceived an enthusiasm first for Berkeley and then for Spinoza. Each in their turn also proved inadequate. His criticism of Berkeley's form of idealism is particularly worthy of study, and leads him to conclude that "Berkeley ought to say, not I see a chair, but I see myself in the form of a chair." Equally arresting is his comment on Spinoza: "Did philosophy start with an 'it is' instead of an 'I am' Spinoza would be altogether true." As it was he turned from the soulless pantheism of Spinoza, and after the visit to Germany made in 1798, when he was accompanied by the Wordsworths, he began a systematic examination of German philosophy. That he should gain much from this was to be expected, but his supposed plagiarism from Kant and Schelling is unjust to his independence, both in his criticism of their systems, and in the construction of his own. He finally returned to the older platonic tradition which he thought Kant had erred in forsaking, and sought to prove, "first that it is possible to form an idea, consistent with all other truths, respecting the Supreme Reality; secondly, that such an idea is found in that of an Absolute Will; and thirdly, that we have here something from which we are free to advance and to show, if we can, the sufficiency of the account to satisfy the demands made on it in the name of reason and experience." It is his recognition that we know of nothing that is causative of reality except self-conscious will, and of the "presence and priority of will in the human and universal consciousness" that gives to his work its chief philosophical value.

The implications of this are traced in his philosophy of nature, morals, politics, religion, and in his theory of fine art. At the end of each section, as well as in the Conclusion, Professor Muirhead seeks to distinguish what was due to Coleridge's own insight, from the weight of tradition that pressed upon him, and seeks to estimate the significance of the former for English philosophy. The author thinks that the English contribution to Idealistic Philosophy will be found no less important and no less characteristic of the English genius then the Empiricism which is usually accepted as its main contribution; and it is in his anticipation of the trend of present day Idealism that the importance of Coleridge is to be found.

Such brilliant aphorisms as "Whatever is organised from without is a product of mechanism; whatever is mechanised from within is a product of organisation" are characteristic and familiar enough; but to most students, the far way that Coleridge went to fulfil the promise of his profound genius will come as a revelation. This work repays study. The book is graced with a striking portrait of Coleridge in later life. F. E. Christmas.

NEW DE LA MARE STORIES.*

The title of this welcome new volume of stories by Mr. de la Mare is inspired by the first one of the eight which compose its contents. Five of them are considerably longer than we have been used to have our stories since Conrad and James ceased their tale spinning. Occasionally—until his lamentable death this year—D. H. Lawrence made a contribution to a literary genre which few writers have the brains (or is it the patience?) to succeed with. Not only must the writing be well knit, but so must the thought, and that implies resources which cannot be counterfeited by accumulating details which seem to have been found in a notebook. Nor will brilliance of phrasemongering or dare-devil frankness prevent your long short-story sagging into the aimless or the incredible.

Just because the form which most unfortunately we have come to term "short story" and "long short story" demands this concentration and richness of mental texture, a master of it may actually be at a disadvantage in the more adaptable form of the novel. In the light of his later work, Mr. de la Mare's novel, "The Memoirs of a Midget"—perhaps the most distinctive, though I would not say the greatest, English novel of this century—seems to be congested with its own richness of material.

If I had to give a person ignorant of his work an idea of Mr. de la Mare's new book, I should murmur, "if you know Henry James—not so much the long-winded works, but 'The Aspern Papers' and 'White Magic' and 'The Turn of the Screw,' you can form some idea of de la Mare's capacity for keeping you in suspended interest while subtle shades of emotion, character and appearances are disclosed." Those who know his earlier volumes, from "The Riddle" to "The Connoisseur," will realise that occasionally the turn and relapse of a sentence, brimming with reflections like a thoughtful monologue, will carry the mind back to James. Admitting so much however, it is at once necessary to add that Mr. de la Mare has his own world for exploration, and that he has already explored it poetically. The strains of his poetry indeed used to creep into the earlier stories so clearly that one would delightedly repeat some lyrical passages for their own sake. In this volume he has become more completely the prose fictionist, using a rich and sensitive imagination to serve this distinct art without inconsistent waywardness. Only in one tale, "The Green Room," is the earlier de la Mare obviously in evidence, and in this, with extraordinary skill, he writes the verses of a young woman who has died long since, the manuscript of which is discovered in an old lumber-room adjoining a book-shop by an idealistic young man who sees her ghost there. When Mr. de la Mare's characters see a ghost, his readers share the experience, and the ghost of "E. F." who signed those faded little poems will be joyously added to the store of de la Mare ghosts by his admirers.

At least two other stories, "A Recluse" and "Crewe," in this new collection can be described as ghostly, though in a different atmosphere, for the uncanny element is evil. The subtlety of perception which enables him to create ghostly atmospheres in words also sets free his horrified recognition of the powers of evil. He can do this too without the ordinary aids of characters like a sinister recluse or an undiscovered murderer over-brimming with a confession. That terrible old woman, "Seaton's Aunt," whom we encountered long ago in "The Riddle" volume, has a near relative in Cecil's "grummumma" in "At First Sight," which seems to be the longest and certainly is the finest of the eight stories in "On the Edge." "At First Sight" in one sense is a fable, just as that masterly trifle, "A Nose," in "Broomsticks" was a fable. That is to say, the circumstances controlling the actions of the chief character, the mollicoddled young man, have a symbolic value apart from their plot value in the narrative. He is under the thumb of his step-grandmother because of a defect of eyesight which makes it painful to look up. He looks down, from under a deep green eye-shield, all his life and sees floors and pavements, legs and feet. And one memorable day the routine of his life is upset. By a chance contact, he falls in love with a poor shop-girl. Mr. de la Mare's tenderness and power in bringing the tragic Miss Simcox into palpitating life is such that the end of the story is her end, and Cecil has faded again from humanity to a symbol. But limitations of space forbid a description of the varied contents of "On the Edge." The importance of the rich humour in some of them however forbids that it should not at least be mentioned as an element of Mr. de la Mare's mature work.

R. L. Mégroz.

* "On the Edge, and Other Stories." By Walter de la Mare. 10s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

TALENT IN DOUBLE EXILE.*

The arts of life are easier to master than the science of life, or the Dutch hidalgo who called himself "Maarten Maartens" might have been a happier man. He ranks with Conrad as one of our first-class writers who was only an alien by accident of birth, and who showed the ardour of a convert in identifying himself with English life and letters. Possibly if Joost van der Poorten Schwartz had had to forge his way to success against harder conditions, the process would have cured him of the fastidiousness of his tastes, and nerved him against the odium he incurred among his countrymen for cultivating our tongue in preference to his own.

Like Bret Harte and Henry James, he had to pay the penalty exacted by a proud and sensitive race for what it regarded as desertion. But the two Americans had the excuse that they were coming to the fountain-head of our common speech; and Maartens had no such plea. He might have made himself the leader of a new era in Dutch literature, as "Q" says in his graceful preface to the present collection: but this would have meant uphill work and limited returns; and far less international repute. There was no half-way course, and Maartens had to suffer a galling fire of comment from his own people, just at a time when the relations of the two countries were strained to the breaking point. He said himself that the Boer War would be his ruin; for apart from the effect it had upon the circulation of his novels, it created a gulf of racial misunderstanding that no explanations could possibly heal. Fortunately or otherwise, he never had to depend upon his pen for income, and he called in the element of time to redress the balance of blame. Then came the Great War, and he died under the strain of it.

Mr. Maarten Maartens at Home.
By "Max," 1912.
From "The Letters of Maarten Maartens." Edited by his daughter. (Constable.)

Destiny had afflicted him with double exile: from his own countrymen, who never understood him or appreciated his work, and from the many English friends whom he was debarred from joining. It is a melancholy finish to a most engrossing record, but it is hard to see how the circumstances and the juxtaposition of events could have led to any other result. The pity of it is that a blight of neglect has since befallen his novels, even those that were marked by a vein of genius and admired by the best judges of his generation. This wave of neglect will pass inevitably, but in the meantime we are losing contact with a fine spirit, a sterling link between civilised peoples, and a man who was rich in faculties, especially the "gift of tongues."

He had a genius for friendship, and this book is full of confidences exchanged with Barrie, Gosse, Hardy, "Q" and others. Perhaps the best of these letters is a passage in which the creator of "Peter Pan" hailed the discovery that Maartens had a wee daughter, now the lady who has edited this book. This is the strain:

> "Took me quite aback to hear of Ada. So strange to think that I never knew of her and that she is getting on all right without knowing of me. This must be put a stop to at the earliest opportunity. I consider myself rather good at girls (before they get into their teens), and having surveyed Ada's photograph anxiously at Nicoll's, I beg to assure her that I can't get on without her much longer. Please, Ada, lay aside your doll and tell me seriously will you be mine?"

Maartens's own letters are rich in wit and humour, the cream of good travel and conversation, and the emanation of a nature saturated with goodwill. He scolds war and bull-fights, "Trilby," Wagner, Browning and Mrs. Humphry Ward. He reels off characteristic anecdotes, and hits off many a vivid picture of scenery and experience. He scoffs at the alleged restraint of the Grant Allen group in regard to "the British matron"—the Dora of the day. He hints that as no author ever had great thoughts he dared not utter, so it was a fair presumption that the great thoughts were absent and the talents overrated. He recounts what a narrow shave he had of being inveigled into politics and public life; and his handling of British public questions is frank and excellent. Thirty years ago he gave an indication of what he would have said of the European War if he had lived:

> "I see no hope against this accursed militarism through which we are all moving towards slavery until those who, in all nations, believe in spiritual things, organise themselves to make this belief felt. The Church tried it once, and the old Papal policy at the time of the Crusades was one of the finest things in history . . . but I doubt if any Church will rise to any such idea again."

Maartens's gods were Keats and Heine, and they figure on many a page here. Even in the depths of a dull home life—with an invalid wife so ill as to turn their Dutch château into a hospital—he is never long without some flick or gleam of compensation in the way of amusement. He mentions all sorts of encounters during his trips to this country, and one may serve as a sample:

> "At Lord Reay's I met an interesting old man, famous over here, Lord Wemyss (aged eighty-seven), most energetic and 'spry.' He abused the Government vigorously, and told me that one of the chief consolations of life was saying 'Damn!'"

There is an allusion, with topical value at this moment, to Sir Edmund Gosse attending the Sugar Bounties Convention of 1887–88, and playing "tiddley-winks" during the sitting. Thinking this over, we almost decry reasons why Geneva and Locarno and other tourneys of argument prove so barren in the end. But Gosse launches out murderously in one of his letters about the hopeless decadence of society and thought, a generation ago, and it might easily be quoted to-day. Fortunately this note of condemnation is never of long endurance, and the tone regnant through the book is one of optimism based upon a sound belief in humanity. This is as it should be in a book which sets up a cairn to the memory of a fine spirit in cosmopolitan affairs, and the reader is prepared to enjoy it after he has read the excellent introductory material by "Q" and Mr. Norreys O'Connor.

* "The Letters of Maarten Maartens." Edited by his Daughter. 22s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

J. P. COLLINS.

AN AMBASSADOR OF PEACE.*

This is the Locarno volume, completing the Diary and dealing with the period from the beginning of 1924 to October, 1926. In those thirty-four months Europe in general, and Germany in particular, underwent a transformation. On January 1st, 1924, the outlook as seen by German observers was dispiriting and bleak. A large portion of the Rhineland was still occupied by foreign troops. A richer and even more vital province had been held by French and Belgian soldiers for more than a year. German finances were in a state of unbelievable chaos—the national currency had fallen to one eighteen thousand millionth part of its original value. Separatism had raised its head—risings, demonstrations, "putsches" all betrayed a disintegrating process. Within twelve months an improvement had taken place that made the contrast between the January of 1924 and that of 1925 dramatic in its intensity. German currency had been placed on a firm basis. Reparation had been settled. The Ruhr had been restored. But the most essential question of all, that of Security, had been untouched. The dawn of 1925 was however of splendid promise. On January 20th the German Government communicated to London the first sketch of a Pact of Mutual Security. Less than nine months later came the official initialling of the Treaty of Locarno. Of the three major events recorded in the Diary—the Dawes settlement in 1924, the Locarno Agreement in 1925 and the entry of Germany into the League of Nations in 1926—the greatest was Locarno. As Lord D'Abernon puts it: "Dawes laid the foundation, Geneva crowned the edifice, but the essential building was carried through in October, 1925, in that now historic village on the Italian lakes. Imagination has been stirred by Locarno—Locarno is the central theme of the present volume."

The interest which such a period, treated by a writer with the knowledge and literary skill of Lord D'Abernon, possesses for the general reader, and the fascination it holds out for the student of twentieth century European history, need no stressing. The Diary proper is preceded by four brilliant character sketches. We see how the late Dr. Stresemann began life as a pugnacious student of the full-blooded type, a militant and aggressive Nationalist. During the War he was an advocate of the strongest and most bellicose measures; an opponent of any pledge to restore Belgium, an advocate of submarine warfare and a bitter critic of all negotiations which would, in his opinion, lead to a premature peace. We see him later striving for a policy that would bring about such a moderation of hostility between France and Germany as would permit European pacification. We see him in his family, with his wide knowledge of German literature, quoting Shakespeare in German and English, and with an intense appreciation of all the good things of life and a wonderful capacity for the enjoyment of them. Of his character Lord D'Abernon says that he had not the qualities of his defects, but that his qualities—clearness, rapidity and decision—earned him a reputation for defects from which he was entirely free—recklessness and lack of conviction.

The signal service rendered to Europe by Sir Austen Chamberlain lay in the fact that although the basis of his policy during the first months of his tenure of the Foreign Office was the closest alliance with France, such basis was changed for one of reciprocity—a reciprocal guarantee of frontiers between France and Germany. His very partiality for France aroused in the French such a confidence in him that when he told the French representatives that no other course was possible than the signature of a bilateral treaty, they accepted his word, as they would not have accepted that of a less friendly statesman. "France regarded Austen as a trusted lover." Carl von Schubert is shown as wisdom, caution and reliability massed within the bulk of a heavy cavalry physique. As for Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Lord D'Abernon tries to imagine the outraged feelings of Canning and Castlereagh, of Palmerston and Granville, when they ascertained in the Elysian fields that their Downing Street mantle had passed to a Labour successor; and makes us smile at their astonishment to see the finely modelled head, the well-cut features, the tired reflective air suggestive of an exhausted aristocratic strain.

The major political issues, three in number, mentioned in the opening paragraph of this article, must be studied in their entirety, and references and quotations will here be made merely to subsidiary and minor features. Stresemann was an enthusiast about the Crown Prince, and declared—in February, 1926—that "on several occasions lately he has shown great wisdom and moderation," and exercised a big influence in politics. But an informant who had served in the Crown Prince's army had some curious stories to tell Lord D'Abernon. When his army was losing heavily in the Argonne, and immediately before an attack in which it had 2,000 killed and wounded, the Crown Prince, dressed in tennis flannels, saw his soldiers off and waved his racquet at them. On another occasion when ambulances were working day and night bringing in wounded, the Crown Prince peremptorily commandeered two of them to be in attendance at a gymkhana behind the lines, in case of accident to the riders in some pony races. There are some new stories about the ex-Kaiser. On page 255 there is a curious conversation between Lord D'Abernon and Mr. Winston Churchill in which the former deprecated the reversion to the gold standard, and asserted that "experience in Germany had shown that, while repudiation caused severe suffering to certain important sections of the middle class, it does not lead to any wide social disturbance. Nor does it lead, as might be expected, to the permanent destruction of the desire to save. On the contrary in Germany the classes who have just lost their total investments in German Rentes are not a bit less disposed to save than they were before." The suggestion implicit in this remark is enough to make "Plectunur Achivi" the motto, and a toad couchant, under a harrow barbed and pointé, the crest of "certain important sections of the middle class" in this country It is refreshing to note that Mr. Churchill was horrified. There is a delightfully artless German appreciation of British Free Trade on page 113. But it would take columns to give merely a tithe of the interesting things in this splendid contribution to European history.

F. E. WHITTON
(Lieut.-Colonel).

* "An Ambassador of Peace." Lord D'Abernon's Diary. Vol. III. With historical notes by Maurice Alfred Gerothwohl, Litt.D. 21s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

BLENHEIM.*

The first volume of Professor Trevelyan's projected series, "England Under Queen Anne," has for its title "Blenheim." If the volumes to follow reach the excellence of this, the completed history of the reign of Anne will be one of the most important contributions towards the study of England's past that we have had for a very long while.

In the first place he has not forgotten the general reader—an omission far too frequent among professional historians. He says in his preface: "For my part, I cannot abandon the older ideal of History that was once popular in England—that the same book should make its appeal both to the general reader and to the historical student. In these latter days there tends to be division. It is right there should be division in some cases but it is right that in other cases the older unity should be attempted." It is right also that it should once more be demonstrated that history can be made interesting without the intrusion of the methods of the novelist, as has been so often the case both with Mr. Lytton Strachey in England and with Herr Ludwig in Germany. It is a temptation for the lesser exponents of that school sometimes to forget that an undramatic truth is of equal importance to a truth told dramatically. In Professor Trevelyan we have the historian proper, and are able to see the superiority of the older conception of history over the new. New methods are not better because of their newness.

* "England Under Queen Anne" Series. Vol. I: "Blenheim." By Professor Trevelyan. 21s. net. (Longmans.)

Though the Battle of Blenheim forms the title—and the climax—of the book, it is not perhaps the most important subject-matter contained in it. The study of the conditions, social and political, leading to the renewal of England's military and naval prestige throughout Europe is of even deeper significance to the student; and the exposition of the state of party problems at home, and that of dynastic and national problems abroad, with their reactions and interactions, is most skilfully and lucidly done. The ecclesiastical position especially is well presented and analysed; in fact the chapter dealing with this—chapter III—is one of the most interesting of all.

But it is not of course the most dramatic. The Capture of Gibraltar and the Battle of Blenheim must always hold the glamour of drama. Few events have had greater results, and it is right that their importance should not receive diminution. For all that, I sometimes feel that the quiet life of a people is of more importance than the public events indulged in by an ambitious few working upon the lack of imagination in the mass. That is why I think this book is so valuable an addition to our historical library, for it gives, not merely as a background but as a due part of the foreground, the conditions of the time.

Nevertheless when Professor Trevelyan reaches a point of military or naval drama his words catch something of the excitement in the deeds. He does not paint his pictures with the false verve of Emil Ludwig; but suddenly a paragraph will take on a glow and a sense of action which prove that he writes "with his eye on the subject." I quote as instance a brief passage from his description of the actual battle at Blenheim:

"The morning hours slipped by, and still with impassive countenance he [Marlborough] watched the men he treasured fall under the cannon shots. Messenger after messenger galloped off to hasten Eugene, struggling through marsh and woodland far away. But till his colleague was ready to attack, the Duke would not give the word. What were his thoughts as he lunched among his staff in the open field, perhaps for the last time? He well knew it was the day that either made him or undid him quite; his fortunes could not survive defeat. And with his own ambitions, the liberties of England and of Europe had come to the last hazard, to be decided, not in any famous city or crowded meeting-place of men, but here in a naked plain of reaped stubble, between villages and farms of names unknown—that spire was called Blindheim, the guides said—places where unlettered peasants had for ages tilled the soil and for ages more would till it, caring nothing what the great world in its madness had come there to do that day—save only that their poor houses and barns would assuredly be burned. Yet in this uncouth, rustic spot the texture of eighteenth century civilisation and thought was to take its colour for good or ill. Hasten, Eugene! Flesh and blood can no longer stand still under this carnage of a cannonade, and the very gods are impatient to see the invisible event. Here at last comes his messenger galloping from the north. He is ready; and we are more than ready. It is past noon, but August days are long. Cutts, the Salamander, is to lead the British and Dutch against Blindheim. And everywhere, along four miles of the Nebel's course, the regiments and squadrons shake themselves and move down towards the marshy edges of the brook."

Professor George Macaulay Trevelyan, O.M.

If that is not in the grand manner of historical prose, I know not where to find it. Professor Trevelyan has written a very fine and human book.

W. B. N.

THE LIFE OF MADAME ROLAND.*

What will the biographers of to-morrow make of to-day's dearth of letters? Perhaps only those who write their own memoirs will go down to posterity in print, for the voluminous letters which have been the happy hunting-ground of the biographers of the eighteenth century are no more. It would indeed be difficult for the most inveterate letter-writer of to-day to accomplish even a small proportion of the correspondence which was apparently a part of the daily routine two hundred years ago. The exigencies of modern life make it as impossible as the conveniences of communication make it unnecessary.

Yet Madame Roland, one of the most prolific writers of an epistolary age, was a woman of amazing activity. How she found time to accomplish all that she did, and at the same time to record in writing every detail of her mental and physical life must for ever remain a mystery.

At the age of eleven she remarked, with that peculiar sententiousness characteristic of her early utterances, "As for pens, they are tools that I am never without." At a later period Saint-Beuve said of her: "We have a Sévigné of the bourgeoisie and, better still, a Sévigné-Georges-Sand." All through her life, as a young girl, welcoming the rather unwilling attentions of the surly, elderly Inspector of Manufactures; as a young wife and mother; as a protagonist of the cause of liberty; as the centre of a group of the most famous Republicans of the day; as the Queen of the Girondists; and as a prisoner in the hands of her enemies, she wrote unceasingly.

Every event that could be described, every thought and feeling that could be converted into words, flowed from her pen in a never-ending stream. One feels that she loved writing, gloried in her ability to use that medium of expression, almost that she thought on paper. Her biographer, Madame Clemenceau-Jacquemaire, discredits the story, told by her friend Champagneux, and believed by Carlyle, that she asked for pen and paper at the very foot of the scaffold, but certain it is that she was writing in practically the last moments of her imprisonment. Her facile pen was indeed her undoing. By a letter of stern reproach and protest which she wrote to Robespierre she made an implacable enemy of the man who "lived like a god on his altar." The famous "Letter to the King," of June 10th, 1792, shows a remarkable grasp of politics, an uncompromising audacity and a fluency which were unmistakably Madame Roland's, though the signature was that of her husband.

* "The Life of Madame Roland." By Madeleine Clemenceau-Jacquemaire. 18s. (Longmans.)

She made many errors of judgment—and every one was committed to paper as soon as made. Yet she atoned for all her mistakes, for her egotism, her harshness, her love of domination, by her conduct during the last few months of her life. Never did a woman meet death more finely. Knowing herself doomed, she never failed to help and encourage her fellow-prisoners, weaker and more wretched than herself. On her way to the guillotine "she was fresh, calm and gay; one could see she was attempting to infuse some energy into the poor wretch whose pallor and dejection formed a striking contrast to the high colour and confident bearing of his companion."

The life story of Madame Roland, amazing and full of fascination as it is, does not form the sole interest of this remarkable book. It is the inner history of the Revolution itself which gives it a value beyond that of an ordinary biography. Even a close student of the political and economic situation of the Revolutionary period must sometimes have found it difficult to follow the kaleidoscopic changes of the parties in power, to fathom the causes which turned a movement primarily intended for the liberation of the oppressed into a reign of terror and bloodshed. The "Life of Madame Roland" is a record of personalities rather than events, but the personalities are so real and vivid that the events seem the natural outcome of their baleful influence. Watching their progress through Madame Roland's eyes, many mysteries become clear. We see ambitious, unprincipled young men from an obscure background becoming suddenly the rulers of Paris. Danton, the "miserable little lawyer with no practice," who now "brays aloud in the clubs—and dares confess to a fortune of 1,400,000 livres"; Marat—"another hideous personage"; Robespierre, "who hasn't an idea in his head or a sentiment in his heart"—when such as these held France in the hollow of their hand, was it any wonder that she was being crushed to death? Poor Madame Roland! Her glorious Revolution had become "such a sorry spectacle that it is no hardship to quit this stage." Her last words were addressed to the ideal for which she had sacrificed her life: "Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!"

Ethel Browning.

THE POTTER'S WHEEL.*

In the preface to her new book Miss Jane T. Stoddart tells us that she came to London to take up journalism at the age of twenty-four. She must then have been a pioneer among women in that profession, as she is to-day one of its most efficient and most honoured veterans. It is no secret that her influence upon the British Weekly has for many years been very great, and that she was a tower of strength to Sir William Robertson Nicoll, as she has been to his successor, Dr. John A. Hutton, the "kind friend and chief" to whom her new volume is dedicated. Few journalists have ever served their profession with greater devotion, and few have brought to it such vitality or so wide a range of interest and sympathy. These qualities are abundantly evident in her new book, as they were in its predecessor—"Private Prayer in Christian Story"—published three years ago.

Portrait by Russell. Miss Jane T. Stoddart.

Miss Stoddart traces the origin of the work now before us to her earliest days in London. Her first journalistic task was to outline for a homilectical publication the famous sermon of Horace Bushnell, entitled "Every Man's Life a Plan of God." In this sermon, which is still often quoted, the celebrated American preacher illustrated his subject entirely from great Biblical names. "When re-reading the sermon from time to time," says Miss Stoddart, "I wished for some book in which the idea could be carried into the general field of history and biography; and I made my own small collection, which has grown into the present volume."

The range of quotations from poets and philosophers which faces her introductory chapter suggests that Miss Stoddart does not interpret her title in any narrowly theological sense. The familiar stanzas about the potter's wheel in Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra" best convey, perhaps, the angle of her vision, unless we select instead a quotation from The Times concerning Thomas Hardy. "Few readers," said that newspaper, reviewing Mrs. Hardy's biography of her husband, "will find themselves wholly disinclined to admit that in some lives the course of events looks singularly like design, and that some men are, in plain truth, chosen and dedicated to the doing of certain work." It is to lives that seem clearly to illustrate such "design" that Miss Stoddart directs our attention. Where possible she points to less famous characters, for she rightly contends that obscure men and women do much of the world's best work and are as truly "chosen and dedicated" as their more illustrious fellows. But since the records of humble folk are scanty, it is necessarily from the careers of the great that her examples of "guidance" and "design" have, for the most part, been drawn.

Here then Miss Stoddart, drawing from a very wide survey of history, biography and literature, gives us a study of the influences that have gone to the moulding of men. Those influences are as infinitely varied as the men themselves, and Miss Stoddart groups them under such headings as "Father and Son," "Mother and Son," "Brothers and Sisters," "The Influence of Scenery," "Education at Home," "Schools and Teachers" and "The Friend by the Wayside." A glance at the index will show how comprehensively Miss Stoddart has cast her net, and how many and diverse are the lives whose formative influences are illustrated by admirably selected and arranged passages from familiar or little known records. If Miss Stoddart's book is largely an anthology, her own connecting commentary—wise, human and gracious—gives it a unity and a sustained interest which most anthologies lack. The volume should please, help and inspire as many

* "Great Lives Divinely Planned." By Jane T. Stoddart. 10s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

From a drawing by CYRIL LOWE.

MR. J. B. PRIESTLEY.

From a drawing by HOOPER ROWE.

MISS E. M. DELAFIELD.

A reference to Miss Delafield's new book will be found on page 27.

readers as its predecessor has done, and we hope some day to see it reissued in a handier form for the pocket or the bedside. It is a book that lends itself as delightfully to "browsing" as to consecutive reading.

GILBERT THOMAS.

BLACK AND WHITE.*

Relationship of black and white in the countries ruled by the European—there exist in the wider world to-day few problems more urgent or more difficult than this. Its difficulty must be manifest even to such as have had no practical experience of it; its urgency is established by the most convincing of all proofs that conscience or emotion is stirred—the steady increase of the written word on the subject.

This latest contribution to the literature of the vast question is at least arresting; and for more reasons than one. It deals with the white-and-black problem in South Africa, where it gradually approaches an aspect of crisis. It is written by one who, though an Englishman of long enough residence there to have absorbed—as one absorbs, unconsciously—through the pores—completest unquestioning prejudice against colour—has remained immune. And it is written by a journalist in Johannesburg who, though living in that bright centre of manifold prejudices, many thoughtless, many expediently nourished at the call of vested and political interests, asserts his opinions with a candour at times rhetorical.

Indeed Mr. Barnes's possible fault as an author is a tendency to rhetoric, to over-writing. Nevertheless this book, apart from any mannerism, is one of the most forceful contributions made to the literature of racialism outside the activities of the old-time opponents of slavery. The advent of a South African book of this character would have seemed something outside the normal order of nature but a few years ago. As it is, its appearance now is a portent. It will be fiercely praised. It will be scorned with equal fierceness. In a word, it will arouse feeling: and when a book arouses feeling nothing is more certain than that there is at least a core of genuine emotion in it. At least it will be difficult for anyone to dismiss the author as a mere South African politician masquerading as controversialist at large; for though at outset he seems suspiciously to single out the Dutch as arch-offenders against the native—in itself no surprising thing in an ex-Natalian holding journalistic office in Johannesburg, prime-mover in and centre still of the British-Unionist spirit—he excludes no white race or party in his indictment of treatment of the Bantu.

As all who have undergone the experience well know, nothing is harder to reach or to recover than any measure of intellectual honesty on the colour question after a prolonged sojourn in such a country as Africa, where white is so vastly outnumbered by black. The common atmosphere of fear underlying the attitude of the outnumbered, the abyss sundering two races in outlook and habit almost poles apart, custom hardened to daily habit —these so take hold of the mind that the mere subsequent spectacle of colour on any basis of common privilege elsewhere seems at first an outrage on natural order. Thus it is that only by meditation and detachment—aided possibly by the chance of really prolonged and close single contact with the native mind, as with the present reviewer—can a leavening of all-conquering truth work itself into the mind.

And of course with disturbing results! Mr. Barnes's scene is the South African one alone—that country where a handful of Dutch were among the first white men to establish their hold against the black man as they spread across his country; and the author piles evidence on evidence to show that the aggressor, adventurous, yet with elementary instinct of self-preservation at full stretch from the outset and ever since, has not only taken from the native his heritage, but has also committed the spiritual and economic blunder of giving him nothing in return, till that barren policy, as with all such fruitless works, seems to threaten recoil.

But as in South Africa, so in almost all lands where white has established fortuitous ascendancy over black, the story is largely the same. It is a profoundly melancholy story—melancholy, too, on no mere sentimental and therefore spurious grounds. Waste—waste of humanity, of superb material, of vast reservoirs of fruitful human happiness—waste in a creative scheme where waste is the primal offence: that is the canker that lies at the root of the matter. Only the sentimentalist, temperamentally unfit to judge, would assert that the white man, South African or other, has produced the colour problem of his own wickedness or blind folly alone. White as well as black, being alike human, have been, as is all humanity, the victims of circumstance. Nevertheless, it is for the white man, with whom the initiative now lies in South Africa and elsewhere, to dethrone blind prejudice and to the utmost possible extent shape the future by the simple but sovereign aid of "good sense and good will."

E. MOORE RITCHIE.

* "Caliban in Africa." By Leonard Barnes. 10s. 6d. (Gollancz.)

ALICE AND THOMAS AND JANE.*

"How unfair it is that when a cross person suddenly smiles at you, you feel it's more exciting than when a smiling person goes on smiling all the time." So thought Thomas during his wonderful trip all by himself to Dieppe, while the cross young woman was tying up the presents he had bought, and "made the three parcels be three parcels, and never offered to tie them together." This trip to Dieppe is the last adventure recounted in the book about Alice, Thomas and Jane, and Thomas had it all to himself because Alice and Jane were at home with whooping cough. The three of them lived at Rottingdean in "one of the painted houses, but it was cobbly underneath. When the workmen put a pick into the walls the cobbles were there sticking together like currants."

Never did three children have such freedom and such adventures! The author explains in the preface, "These children are not my children. I had to invent them because my children made such a noise, and when the eldest wanted the coloured inks the second wanted flour and water to mix in a cup, and the third wanted the gramophone and couldn't wind it up. But during the time Alice and Thomas and Jane ran about the house and rushed about the village and did all the things my children would like to have done, my children sat still." And everybody else's children would like to have done the things Alice, Thomas and Jane did too! Alice, Thomas and Jane thought nothing of getting up in the middle of the night and spying on smugglers, being carried out to sea hanging on to a small boat, losing themselves in caves hiding in aeroplanes and stowing away in a steamer going to France and being landed concealed in the dicky of a car. They didn't think such happenings were very much out of the ordinary, because the world was a wonderful place anyhow, and their parents got quite used to them and did not worry overmuch. Thomas, for instance, had quite ceased to stare at steam-rollers. "Thomas was too big for steam-rollers. Alice still stopped and stared, but Thomas hadn't liked steam-rollers since he was four." And they were old enough to know all sorts of things—at least Thomas was—such as whether the moon came up behind where the sun went down or on the other side. His sisters weren't sure, but Thomas knew it must be on the other side because "there'd be an awful fizzling if it had to pass the sun, with the sun going down and the moon coming up . . . the sun's hot and the moon's cold. It would be like spitting on an iron."

This is a joyous book, full of laughter, and both children and grown-ups will enjoy it and envy the three youngsters who crowded such exciting events into their small lives and never came to harm and didn't know what it was to be frightened, only deliciously thrilled. It is like a glorious game of " pretend " from beginning to end, for the wildest and loveliest things occur, exactly as they would in a game of make-believe—not fairy or magic things, but things that might really happen in ordinary life, if one were very fortunate. The author has done most of the drawings, and Miss Laurian Jones (whose portrait appears as a frontispiece) has done the others. There is a picture showing what it feels like to swallow a snail—Thomas did that in France; and a picture of Thomas's idea of Heaven, and another of Alice's thoughts as she lay in the tail of the aeroplane, and others showing what Jane drew on the pavement at Brighton in an effort to raise money—illustrations of " Us being bathed " and other domestic scenes; from which you can gather that the pictures are as original and as amusing as the story itself.

* "Alice and Thomas and Jane." By Enid Bagnold. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

A. A.

MAINLY POETRY.*

Mr. Monk Gibbon is a young poet who has rapidly perfected his art. It was not such an art as comes at first stumbling and incoherent, and arrives at clarity and certainty. He may have discarded of course, but I cannot remember a poem or volume of poems of his which was without his quiet force and distinction. The quietness is a notable quality. He has no crescendos, no trumpets and drums, but a quietness as of evening fields, and a low and pure voice trolling to itself. It is harmonious poetry. Reading aloud the new volume named not altogether happily " For Daws to Peck At,"[1] a competent young critic kept saying at intervals, " He is a poet." She was right. Mr. Gibbon has a real gift of poetry, and there is thought, imagination and feeling in these beautifully modulated songs, always just long and short enough to express and to hold the thought and the image:

FRENCH PEASANTS.

" These going home at dusk
Along the lane,
After the day's warm work,
Do not complain.

" Were you to say to them,
' What does it mean?
What is it all about,
This troubled dream?'

" They would not understand,
They'd go their way,
Or, if they spoke at all,
They'd surely say:

" ' Dawn is the time to rise,
Days are to earn.
Bread and the midday rest,
Dusk to return;

" ' To be content, to pray.
To hear songs sung,
Or to make wayside love,
If one is young.

" ' All from the good God comes,
All then is good;
Sorrow is known to Him,
And understood.'

" One who had questioned all,
And was not wise,
Might be ashamed to meet
Their quiet eyes.

" All is so clear to them,
All is so plain;
These who go home at dusk,
Along the lane."

Mr. Gibbon's ordered poetry is the very antithesis of the disorderly stuff given us by Walter Lowenfels in " Finale of Seem."[2] The eccentric name prepares us for an eccentric book. I can find neither sense, reason nor poetry in this book, and I cannot imagine why anyone else should.

After " Finale of Seem," which I take to be a wantonly absurd title, Miss Maitland Radford's " Pomegranate Flower "[3] comes all delicacy with skies of silver and gold and all the iridescence of jewels and flowers and the moth's wing. The name of Radford comes to me gratefully. There was Ernest Radford in the nineties, and there was Dolly Radford who wrote of the little tender things beautifully. I know not if she is in the body or out of the body, but she was as appealing as her little poetry—like a lamb, a flower, a child. There are two Radfords in my bundle of books—whether relations of each other, or relations of those poets of the nineties, I know not. " The Swift Mind "[4] by D. F. Radford has many of the qualities of poetry. It has its measure of thought and beauty. It is the masculine Muse as compared with " Pomegranate Flower." Out of this bundle I should choose Mr. Gibbon and Margaret Maitland Radford to carry in my pack. They are quite unlike. The quietness of evening fields and sequestered but never gloomy thought is in Mr. Gibbon's poetry, exquisiteness of lucent colour in Miss Radford as I take her to be. Let me give earnest:

" The slope of this great field
Is tawny golden, soon the sun will set:
Among the gilded tufts of the brown grasses
Are little traceried plants, like a pearled net
On clods and hoof-holes:
Here a lark's nest might be;
Here the mewing plover wheeled;
A dry rough field
And yet
How richly it is diapered, wind-down, set
With little strawberry-flowers and the white violet."

For the rest Mr. Bevan's " Russet and Asp "[5] contains good scholarly, often sensitive verse such as a cultivated and poetry loving man finds it a solace to write. His readers will derive pleasure from it. Mr. Robert Crawford's " In Quiet Fields "[6] deserves the commendation of Walter de la Mare, whose praise is dearly worth having. This is simple and strong poetry which reads as though the inspiration of Robert Burns still hung in Ayrshire fields and was broadcasted for his brother poet. He brings the furrows and the larks singing over them, and a ploughman quiet at his task.

" The Singing Lass "[7] by Marion Angus has the ballad inspiration. She is as the natural successor to those old Scottish ballad mongers whose songs are as freshly poignant and sweet as the day they were made. I am sorry to come to this true poet only at the fag-end of a review. Miss Angus should be remembered with the authoress of " Auld Robin Grey." These are very beautiful poems, both English and Scottish. Nothing could be simpler, nothing saner in this strange disordered age. She is a very welcome new arrival.

Katharine Tynan.

[1] " For Daws to Peck At." By Monk Gibbon. 6s. (Gollancz.)—[2] " Finale of Seem." By Walter Lowenfels. (Heinemann.)—[3] " Pomegranate Flower." By Margaret Maitland Radford. 7s. 6d. (Scholartis Press.)—[4] " The Swift Mind." By D. F. Radford. 3s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)—[5] " Russet and Asp." By G. L. Bevan. 8s. 6d. (Duckworth.)—[6] " In Quiet Fields." By Robert Crawford. 3s. 6d. (Porpoise Press.)—[7] " The Singing Lass." By Marion Angus. 3s. 6d. (Porpoise Press.)

A VICTORIAN PEEP-SHOW.*

The tastes of the present generation are so different and so distinct from the tastes of the generation to which their grandfathers belonged that a veritable chasm divides the Georgians and Victorians. Already we have got somewhat into the habit of referring to that not very remote period of the eighties and nineties as if it were pitiably tame and inferior. There is never truth in extremes, and while the Victorians are open to criticism, the simple fact should not be overlooked that they included in their number statesmen, clerics, scientists, novelists, poets, dramatists, artists and critics who happen to be quite justly famed despite their frock-coats, their cravats and their whiskers. And Mr. E. F. Benson, the son of a typical Victorian who became Archbishop of Canterbury, in his early days mingled with Victorians of fine quality and lasting renown, and tells us in his latest volume exactly what they were like.

* " As We Were." Memories of E. F. Benson. 18s. (Longmans.)

He discerns their wisdom and their whimsicality, their firmness and frailty. They are to him alternately admirable and amusing. His pen-pictures are swift and vivid; a few sharp and bright touches, and the portrait is revealed and the character displayed, for the expert craftsman concentrates, and he knows his subject so well that he brings out only the essential traits. Mr. Benson can be tender and pathetic, he can be as delicately ironical as Matthew Arnold himself (for proof of which read his opening sketch of the Victorian age), and he can let his own wit play like lightning round a subject—there are momentary gleams which show the whole truth in a flash and dissipate the obscurities of any lingering doubt. Thus he has told us now, once and for all, intimate facts concerning Swinburne and Watts-Dunton, Oscar Wilde and his last years, Alfred Austin and the Laureateship, Oscar Browning and the cause of his failure.

It was the privilege of the Archbishop's sons to see many celebrities at close quarters, but added to that privilege was their own gift of judgment and sense of humour. Mr. Benson was acutely conscious of the qualities of the famous men and women he encountered, and he has been fortified in his verdicts on them by information gained from others and from wide reading. None but he perhaps could have written so much and so well of Henry James and his wordiness, Whistler and his caustic wit, the Pre-Raphaelites and their aims, or Gladstone and his "huge concentration of force." How well he sums up that mighty dynamic character: "Purpose at white heat roared like a furnace in every action of his life. When once he had convinced himself on any subject, it ceased to be his opinion and became a cosmic truth, which it was the duty of every right-minded person to uphold." Contrast this with his picture of Queen Victoria, whom he describes as "a genius of common sense," a woman with barely a drop of British blood in her veins, but who none the less made herself "the most English of sovereigns. . . . In this immense endowment of common sense unlit by imagination she was the exact opposite of her grandson, William II of Germany, who had a prodigious imagination but no common sense which could be lit up by it; his imagination flared on to an empty void where he beheld only the Brocken spectre of himself clad in shining armour."

A curious fact which impresses us as we examine Mr. Benson's panorama of the Victorian age is that greatness and solidity of character were so often associated with foibles and follies. The age was in fact one of considerable pretence and petty affectation, and the simpering women in their crinolines, and the solemn men in their tall hats, were only too often posing for effect. The long Victorian period, it must be remembered, was experimental and evolutionary; there was steady progress from a none too creditable past, there were violent reactions against potent evils, there were hard-won reforms, and there was an upward toiling in the gloom, a struggle for fitness, strength and light; and all this manifested itself in the numerous "movements" of the times. There were religious, literary, scientific, artistic and political "movements," and pioneers were caught in the whirl and found it sometimes difficult to play a consistent part. But the epoch produced true leaders also, and it is of these Mr. Benson tells—of Ruskin and Rossetti, Meredith, Browning and Tennyson, Darwin and Spencer.

Amid much that is light, playful and airy there are very serious parts in this volume. We can enjoy the delicious humour concerning the oddity of J. E. Nixon, the Oxford Don, or the fatuousness of Alfred Austin and "Immortal Bard," or the ponderous and puerile Oscar Browning, or the learning and sarcasm of Dr. Jowett, or the comic-opera court of the King of Greece, or the subjugation of rebellious Swinburne by a pedantic solicitor—though even on these matters Mr. Benson has some illuminating comments to offer; but what are we to say of his exposure of "the fraud" of Oscar Wilde's "De Profundis"? It is a startling story, and may cause a complete change of opinion concerning the supposed repentance, redemption and reform of a perverted genius.

Mr. E. F. Benson.

The final chapter, which might have been entitled "From Calm to Storm," is not only a beautifully impressive piece of writing but is intensely dramatic. It opens with an idyllic description of the delusive charm of seeming peace at the beginning of 1914. Then, with just a few mutterings and scarcely heeded intimations, came the crash of the thunderbolt. The last link with Victorianism and its traditions had been snapped.

J. CUMING WALTERS.

W. E. HENLEY.*

To the average reader of verse, W. E. Henley is the author of "Invictus," and the phrase which brings that outburst to a dramatic climax:

"I am the captain of my soul," is often quoted by people who are not only unaware of its source, but have never even heard of Henley. The circumstances in which "Invictus" was written ought not to affect an estimate of its worth as literature, but they must not be overlooked when considering the poem as an expression of its author.

Henley, the son of an impecunious and somewhat feckless father, was not brought up in a bed of roses. A chronic shortage of money and almost equally chronic ill-health were his lot from childhood until manhood. When he was twelve he developed tubercular trouble which led to the amputation of the lower part of one of his legs. The other foot was also threatened, and the surgeons would have had their will if Henley had not chanced to hear of Lister, and made up his mind to trek from Gloucester to the Old Infirmary in Edinburgh where the since famous physician was working. Henley, then twenty-four, placed himself unreservedly in the hands of Lister, who was at that time reviled and scorned by his colleagues — and his foot was saved. While in the infirmary he wrote his "Hospital Verses"—and "Invictus." Remembering the pain, the antagonisms and many other difficulties which beset him, this defiant shaking of the fist in the face of Providence cannot be dismissed as bluster or bombast, but must be accepted as the sincere outpouring of a young man who had grounds for asserting that although life had treated him unfairly his head was bloody but unbowed.

* "W. E. Henley: A Memoir." By Kennedy Williamson (Harold Shaylor.)

The poem's popularity has stood unfairly between the public and the bulk of Henley's work, but it is nevertheless as typical of the man as anything he subsequently wrote, and if nothing else survives the winnowing of Time, posterity will not be greatly misled concerning its author.

A Cartoon by "Spy."
From "W. E. Henley: A Biography," by Kennedy Williamson (Harold Shaylor).

Mr. Kennedy Williamson's Memoir, admirably written and carefully compiled, gives a vivid picture of a vivid personality, and puts up a good case for regarding Henley as a great man. If he does not succeed it is because the facts and growing enlightenment are against him. That Henley had many excellent qualities, that he had the power to inspire others, that he was brave in the face of pain and difficulties, that he could be a loyal friend, cannot be denied; but against these virtues must be placed certain less admirable characteristics. He was truculent, quarrelsome and sometimes wantonly unfair in his judgments; and he was not too scrupulous in matters which demand the nicest intellectual honesty. On one occasion he interpolated a passage condemning Wagner in an article by Bernard Shaw, whom he knew as a perfect Wagnerite, and his dislike of W. T. Stead led him into patently perverse statements concerning him couched in peculiarly malicious phrases. And it was reserved for Henley to write the most violent attack on Robert Louis Stevenson when Graham Balfour's "Life of Stevenson" was published in 1901. However just his verdict may have been, however necessary it may have been to counterbalance the sentimentalising of R. L. S. which was then prevalent, Henley's ought not to have been the hand to strike the first blow at the memory of a man who had been his dearest friend. Among more violent charges were these: "He was incessantly and passionately interested in Stevenson. He could not be in the same room with a mirror but he must invite its confidence every time he passed it. . . . No better histrion ever lived. . . . And there are people yet living (I am not one of them) who, knowing him intimately, have not hesitated to describe him in a word of three letters, the suspicion of which might well make him turn in his grave" —cad presumably being the word hinted at.

Henley was an editor of genius, drawing to him a number of writers, then young and in many cases untried, who have since established themselves, among whom Kipling, Gilbert Parker, Katharine Tynan, R. L. S., Maurice Hewlett, Kenneth Grahame, Eden Phillpotts and William Archer may be instanced. These and many others he encouraged and inspired and their loyalty to him remained in most cases unbroken till the end.

Of his own work a final judgment cannot yet be made, but certain things already seem clear. As a critic he was discerning and illuminating and, within the bounds of his range, discriminating; but his range was limited by prejudices which blinded him to many excellences, and complete objectivity was outside his capacity. His prose was always vivid, vigorous and sometimes violent, and was a faithful expression of the man. His verse was almost invariably stimulating, technically interesting, and sometimes almost attained that ultimate magic which would have transformed it into poetry. But even as a poet he was a journalist, aiming at a quick effect, a startling phrase, a graphic description, and occasionally he descended to a facile pathos. The way of poetry is subtler and generally less self-conscious.

HERMON OULD.

A DARING ADVENTURER.*

If there is one place where more than any other an Englishman should feel proud of his nationality, it surely is Plymouth Hoe.

On that historic spot it requires but little imagination to picture the old sailors of Devon and other counties setting sail for distant lands, and so laying the foundation of England's power.

Truly could they say with Kipling:

> "We sailed wherever ship could sail,
> We founded many a mighty state."

Of those daring adventurers there is none to take second place to Sir John Hawkins, though due to his modesty he is perhaps not so well known. The selection of his life and travels for the latest addition to the Golden Hind series is a good one, and Mr. Philip Gosse has provided a story that should thrill every healthy person, old or young.

John Hawkins, who was born within sound of the sea at his father's house near the quay, came of a good Plymouth stock; both his father and grandfather had been great navigators and also held the office of mayor as well as representing Plymouth in Parliament, our hero doing likewise.

Surrounded from his birth by ships, his education was one specially to fit him for the years that followed. It is said he knew how to manage a merchant's office, navigate and sail a ship, and also possessed a good knowledge of shipbuilding.

His first big venture was in 1562, when he fitted out three ships, the Solomon, which he commanded, being but one hundred and twenty tons. The more one reads of the deeds of these men the more one is amazed at their intrepidity in venturing thousands of miles over uncharted waters in such small craft. Hawkins's flagship was just one-eighth the tonnage of that popular river steamer, the Golden Eagle. The main object of this voyage was "blackbirding" which of course cannot be commended to-day, but when it is remembered that slavery then received the benediction of the Church one cannot blame the sailor. This voyage was successful, but the next proved disastrous, for of the four hundred and eight men and boys that left Plymouth in 1567 only fifteen came back with Hawkins. Many had died and a number were left in captivity.

After years of adventure which the author describes in a racy manner, Hawkins was appointed Treasurer to the Navy, a hard task for an honest sailor on account of the jobbery and robbery then rampant.

The part he took in the defeat of the Spanish Armada makes an interesting chapter, and one can well imagine the Admiral's delight at the defeat of his old enemies, though later on he said: "The revenge which I desired long since for the injuries I received of the Spaniards time hath made me forget it and refer it to God, who is the avenger of wrongs."

* "Sir John Hawkins." By Philip Gosse. Golden Hind Series. 12s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

Following the defeat of the Armada, Hawkins and Frobisher were summoned by Lord Howard to his flagship, and there received the honour of knighthood.

Hawkins died at Porto Rico aged sixty-three, on an expedition which ended in dismal failure. He was a great sailor, stern but just, and was one of the few who cared for their men. He was also rather curiously a clever diplomat.

It was Hawkins and Drake who founded what became the Greenwich Hospital Fund and he personally inaugurated the Sir John Hawkins Hospital at Chatham, which still exists, as well as other charities at Deptford and Plymouth.

His differences with Drake, who is stated to have been a kinsman, though some writers express doubt, are to be regretted, but no doubt Mr. Gosse is right in putting the blame mainly on Drake's impetuosity.

W. T. BROWN.

THE HISTORICAL NOVEL.

It has often seemed to me—and my feeling is confirmed after reading Mr. Alfred Tresidder Sheppard's "The Art and Practice of Historical Fiction"*—that the historical novelist is far more deeply learned in the craft of his art, and takes it on the whole more seriously than the novelist of contemporary manners. Perhaps it is because he must be something of a poet, and verse, in spite of the opinions of Mr. Arnold Bennett and Mr. Bernard Shaw, is appreciably a more difficult because more exacting medium than prose, and that not from the necessarily continuous exactitude in verbal felicity only, but from the equally necessary continuity of imaginative control. It is there, I feel, that the historical novelist, even when not himself a poet, has to possess certain of the poet's gifts in addition to those of the novelist proper—which possibly explains Mr. Arnold Bennett's periodic myopia when looking at historical fiction, past and present. Certainly the historical novelist is faced, very much more than any other type of novelist is, with the necessity for continual imaginative control—I mean an imaginative control beyond that needed for just the conduct of a tale and the photography of the actual. He has to be in a state of unbroken awareness of a multitude of things outside the usual ken of the ordinary novelist, and this is a burden akin to the poet's, especially the dramatic poet's. Moreover, as Mr. Tresidder Sheppard points out, many of the greatest historical novelists have in fact been poets. Victor Hugo is a sufficing example.

* 12s. 6d. net. (Toulmin.)

Mr. Alfred Tresidder Sheppard.

The historical novel is no new art: it did not begin, as seems to be the belief of a thousand and one critics of it, with Sir Walter Scott; and Mr. Tresidder Sheppard, in pointing out with such scholarly and enthusiastic accuracy its early origins and honourable examples through the centuries, has surely scotched the lying implication for ever. I should indeed like this book to be read widely, and by three classes of readers in particular: the critics of historical fiction; the would-be writers of it; and last, but not least, those who profess—usually without experiment or trial—that they do not like it. The critic might learn to treat it with a more understanding respect; the would-be writer to write it properly and not go wandering off into the false by-ways of "costume romance"; and the stubborn deriders of it to be brought to see how admirably entertaining and, moreover, true to real life it can be.

This is a book not only for the student, but for everyone interested in the practice of fiction at all, for it seems to me that there is little difference, in the conception and execution of a true work of art, between the handling of one genre and another. I think every writer would subscribe to the lines of Sir William Watson:

> "My chief concern is just to write
> As well as I am able."

But every writer has his own habit of work, and no chapters in Mr. Tresidder Sheppard's book seem to me more absorbing than those in which the differing methods of plot-production of various historical novelists are described. Maurice Hewlett, for instance, approaching everything "as a poet," drenching himself in his subject, and letting it pour out as it will, trusting to inspiration, and never putting "anxious and deliberate brainwork into a book"; and Dumas, rising at six, writing till eleven, breakfasting in company, always the soul of gaiety, and writing again from twelve to six in the evening; and Scott, never able "to address himself to a written and careful plot, but with his mind always on the alert," and leaving a blank to be filled in later if the right phrase was not immediately forthcoming; and Charles Reade, "with three sheets of cardboard, on one of which he set down the plot, on another the characters, and on the third the more important facts to be borne in mind"; and Mr. Sheppard's own method of innumerable notebooks, and cuttings in envelopes, and his indexed book of extracts from authorities. Those interested in the making of literature will find passages such as these illuminating and enthralling.

All roads lead to Rome, and all methods to the same end—to the creation of living beings in a vivid and authentic environment. That, it seems to me, is the aim of historical novelists as well as of all other novelists: to draw living people, whether of to-day or of yesterday—and I have yet to learn that humanity is a leopard continually engaged in changing his spots!—and to set them in their proper surroundings with as great a verisimilitude as possible. And Mr. Tresidder Sheppard's book, if it does nothing else for the would-be historical novelist, will show him the pitfalls awaiting the unwary.

It is indeed a book of real value, one greatly needed, a book which should be made available at once in all public libraries. The historian of fiction will find its perusal a definite simplifier of his task, and certainly no writer desirous of producing an historical novel—an ambition neither easy nor unworthy—should begin upon his task before he has read it. It is a book admirable both in its outline and its details.

WALLACE B. NICHOLS.

THE APES OF GOD.*

Mr. P. Wyndham Lewis is both author and artist. There is another Mr. Wyndham Lewis (initials D. V.). The cognoscenti never confuse the two, and are scornful of those who do confuse them. The two Mr. Lewises have this in common: they are both wits and both brilliant. Here it might be argued the likenesses end. Not so.

For it must be abundantly obvious to the perspicacious that " Healing Minute " Lewis has the same hatred and contempt for fools as " Apes of God " Lewis. But while the one shows it in a light and dexterous satirical way which must often amuse (and bemuse) his unconscious victims, the other comes to the assault with a fierceness and a gall which excites the judicious to exultation and the malicious to unholy joy.

Mr. P. Wyndham Lewis is the author of " Tarr," a novel which in a new and revised edition issued ten years after its first publication is described by its begetter as " the first book of an epoch in England." The present book is in the direct line of descent from " Tarr." Mr. Lewis was also the editor of a magazine charmingly entitled Blast! He now edits another magazine called The Enemy. Titles of other of his books are " The Wild Body," " The Revolutionary Simpleton," " Time and Western Man " and " Childermass." There is a challenge, a fighting spirit, in all these titles. It is the man. For the author is a personality, and he could not write anything without displaying a thought, an energy and a wit which is highly individual.

" The Apes of God " is a long book. It is not a novel for the lazy-minded, nor for the jazz-minded. In mere bulk and weight it is terrifying. It requires a certain athleticism to handle, and resembles a very superior directory when on the bookshelf. There seems no reason for such gargantuan proportions. " The Forsyte Saga," " An American Tragedy " and " War and Peace," to mention three very long books, are all contained in volumes of manageable size. This book is a little dismaying when you first open it. You blench and cry " ha ! " Certainly you settle down to it with a feeling that when it is all over you will have " earned a night's repose." That is not the best approach to literature, and literature it is.

It may reasonably be demanded that the reviewer should give some idea of the story. Here the author is ready to help. In a note on the dust-cover he is quoted as saying that the book reflects " the collapse of English Social Life in the grip of post-war conditions. Its theme is the confusion of intellect and emotion as exhibited in a society beneath the shadow of a revolutionary situation. It shows that society groping back to its childhood; and how, beneath the threat of the future, whose significance it is too exhausted to grasp, it calls loudly for its mamma, and returns to the bibs and bottles of its babyhood." That also is a fair sample of the novel's liveliness.

It is a book which, in spite of an appearance of witty persiflage, cannot be taken lightly, and should not be attempted by the ordinary reader without the consciousness of a high resolution. It is full of vivid characterisation, and there are frequent passages which light up the way with a humour which itself is a substitute for narrative skill. Not that Mr. Lewis lacks that essential of the good novelist, but the way being long and devious and much occupied by intellectual discussion, movement and action seem to halt even in dialogue, and without the passages of vivacious description and mordant humour the reader would tire. Which is to say that the book is cunningly constructed. It is the work of an artist.

Mr. Lewis believes in the importance of art. He attacks the imitators, the apes of God, " those prosperous mountebanks who alternately imitate and mock at and traduce those figures they at once admire and hate." His principal character, one Horace Zagreus, who thinks youth is almost synonymous with genius, accompanies a young follower and admirer on an expedition to study these apes. Character after character is dashed in with extraordinary virility; pages and pages of brilliant dialogue; immense bravura of description!

But in spite of brilliance and bravura, energy and extraordinary intelligence, " The Apes of God " seems when at last, at long last, you reach the end, to be something less (or more) than a novel. It is vehement and angry, but it has very little emotion. It is a bright entertainment for the intellectual. The apes of God will laugh wildly at it and enjoy it. But their withers will be unwrung. They will go on with their apery. Perhaps, save for another audience, fit though few, they will be the principal purchasers of this three guineas worth. Literary apes love limited editions at prodigal prices.

The book is illustrated by the author. Presumably these drawings are Vorticist. They look accomplished and as though they might have a meaning. Whether they are intended merely as a decoration to the book or as an elucidation of the text it is impossible for the present reviewer to say.

FREDERICK MARKHAM.

* " The Apes of God." By P. Wyndham Lewis. £3 3s. (Arthur Press.)

Portrait by G. C. Beresford. Mr. P. Wyndham Lewis.

LORD HASTINGS AND THE INDIAN STATES.*

The political importance of the Indian Princes has increased enormously since 1914. This proud and potent aristocracy rules over about a third of India, and the whole Indian problem is immensely complicated by the treaties and engagements which the British Government made with these rulers in the past.

Mr. Mehta says that he set out to write a book on the Indian States from the impartial standpoint of an unofficial student, and found himself gliding down the centuries until his foot rested " in the small niche of the period of Lord Hastings' Governor-Generalship." Lord Hastings negotiated more treaties than any other Governor-General of

* " Lord Hastings and the Indian States." By M. S. Mehta. Rs. 10. (Bombay: Taraporevala.)

India attempted, either before or after him. His administration marks a turning point in the course of Britain's political relations with the Indian States. The earlier years were spent in wars of no small magnitude. His masterly treatment of the Gurkhas of Nepal, who were raiding beyond the borders into British India, converted aggressive enemies into the staunchest of allies; and by subduing the Mahrattas and Pindaris he released many States from their gruelling oppression.

But Hastings' administration was remarkable chiefly for the treaties he negotiated and the settlements he made. There is a marked difference between his treaties and those of Lord Wellesley, which were concluded as between equals. Hastings discarded the ring fence policy of his predecessors. He had no faith in the dream of Lord Cornwallis that the stronger organisations would incorporate the petty States and become friendly neighbours of the British, and he did not hold, with Dalhousie, that the good of the people required annexations of State territory. Hastings argued that no peace could be permanent without one supreme Power to maintain it. He felt that the true position of the States in the interior of India was one of isolation and subordinate co-operation.

Hastings' treaties provided, in most cases, that the ally should receive a Resident at his court and keep near his capital an army recruited, trained and commanded by English officers. To secure payment of these subsidiary contingents he stipulated for the cession of revenue-bearing lands within the States.

When Hastings left India the principle of subordinate isolation and military co-operation was firmly established. But his proudest boast was not that he had advanced the pomoerium but that he had conferred the blessings of good government and peace upon millions who had groaned under the extortions of the Mahrattas and Pindaris.

The British Government is now faced with a juristic controversy on the sovereignty of States. Mr. Mehta devotes a chapter to the discussion of this subject, and comes to the conclusion the Butler Committee reached—that States were sovereign to the extent and up to the time that they were allowed by the British Government to wield the power of sovereignty, and that in regard to internal government the States could only be considered as semi-sovereign.

Mr. Mehta has provided the student of the origin and development of Indian States with a useful volume based on original sources. It is well written and carefully compiled. The value of the book is considerably enhanced by the fact that it is neither partisan nor controversial. The author shows great discrimination in the use of his material, of which a good deal is not published elsewhere.

ARTHUR MCCLAY.

A WELCOME SIGN.

Even those who look askance at men with guns and keepers who trap, and all who divide the wild into " game " and " vermin," will do themselves disservice if they allow the title of Mr. Patrick R. Chalmers's latest book * to turn them away from it. It is true he writes of killings, from the noble stag to the scurvy rat; but he writes as a great lover of the wind and the rain and the sun, as a man who reads much when he is not out in the open—with a freshness that makes you feel the delight of that open—which is the one great delight of his life, I imagine. And when you come across a book that can bring the sights and the sounds and the scents of the country-side to you as you sit within four walls, you have found something worth while.

Mr. Chalmers won me with his very first chapter, alluringly entitled " To Tir-nan-Og "—alluringly, for it calls up sweet memories of Fiona Macleod, and possibly still sweeter ones of that ideal hill or dale, cottage or lodge which most of us keep enshrined in the heart for " some day." Listen to him telling of quaintly named Tommy Beg in "Tir-nan-Og:

* " At the Sign of the Dog and Gun." By Patrick R. Chalmers. 12s. 6d. (Philip Allan.)

"And with never a trout, never a red grouse, I'd still like the lodge and the garden for a being leisured in. The arm-chairs are the best that ever were, and the beds are better still, and you're always opening doors and finding another bath-room. And you can walk out of the window and into the garden from all the ground-floor rooms. And you can walk out of the garden, with all its strawberries, just come full cycle, and its August roses, and immediately step into the trail of the cloud shadows upon the high hills."

If that does not hold you it may be because you are wedded to that lure of running water which is one sure lure for every child and one sure sign in the later years that you have not been utterly atrophied by the fret and cares of the struggle for existence, or, still worse, the glamour and mirage which men call success. That being so, page five will bring about your capitulation, for it opens:

"Water brown, water bright—
Pearls and swirls that sever;
Running water's my delight
Always and for ever."

One is apt to think chiefly of the fisherman as the truly contemplative observer of nature. His silent patience—his patient silence, if you like—provides him with innumerable opportunities. Having read Mr. Chalmers, few can doubt that many who shoot have also the seeing eye and the understanding heart which the true nature-lover must possess. He writes for example of sounds and noises, and tells of the "whisht" and wonderful crying of the skeins of geese as they come into the estuary, phantom hounds drawing heaven for a phantom fox; of the "roc coc" of the rising or the roosting pheasant; the gossip of loquacious partridge families in the long stubble over the hedge; the little collective voices which some folk seem to hear so much better than others. And then, of an actual shooting day he says:

"The last day on which I shot was so still that you could hear a breech snap a hundred yards away, but the thing I remember best about it all is the sound of wood-pigeons' wings. I remember that, as I waited in an open wood, the upper air was of a sudden very musical and that I looked up into the faint blue, and lo! a great passage of wood-pigeons was there, and the incredibly far-off cadence of its wing-beats came down, down, down."

Coming into the Sanctuary.

From "At the Sign of the Dog and Gun," by Patrick R Chalmers (Philip Allan).

The fare at the sign of the "Dog and Gun" is indeed good and varied. I have hinted at the 'bookiness" of the landlord. It is not that stodgy knowledge which is as dust in the mouth of him who retails and of those who must perforce accept, but the eager, loving touch of the man who reads and delights, and retails with even greater zest because he wants you, too, to delight in such good things. It matters not whether Mr. Chalmers is showing how much Will Shakespeare knew of dogs and deer and falcons, or whether he lingers on the haunting loveliness of Mr Yeats's "Innisfree" and the brutality of Captain Harry Graham's "Inverness" parody; whatever it be, you are sure of the apt quotation, not dragged in for the sake of showing a wide knowledge of books and writers, but used to illustrate a point, and, I repeat, used lovingly, as all quotations must be used to be effective.

There is indeed most excellent fare at the sign of the "Dog and Gun," and mine host, like all true hosts, improves with acquaintance. His is the house of call you will want to visit and revisit. W. R. CALVERT.

A STUDY OF MR. ALFRED NOYES.*

Mr. Alfred Noyes is a copious poet; his verse has flowed for nearly thirty years in a generous stream, obeying the "rhythmical laws of the universe" through all its many and varied modulations. And doubtless to criticise such a poet is a thankless task. It is easier to accept effusively what he has given. That at least is what Mr. Jerrold has done. His book is one long pæan of praise, broken only for moments when he reproves some hapless past reviewer for daring to take his duties as a critic more seriously than he does himself. Unfortunately however just as a degree of scepticism is necessary to true faith, so appreciation to be significant requires the salt of criticism. And for want of it much of Mr. Jerrold's praise has little more meaning in it than indiscriminate applause or, at best, agreeable generalities.

It was such "undiscriminating and hyperbolic" laudation which Francis Thompson deprecated in an appreciative criticism of the first three books of Mr. Noyes's "Drake" (which he left unfinished and which Mr. Jerrold prints here for the first time), while at the same time welcoming "a genuine poet, possessing imagination, feeling, lyric faculty, a rich sense of colour and a melodious metrical gift." Mr. Noyes's qualities are here admirably summarised. Most convincing and determining among them are his sense of melody and movement, and the artistry with which he directs and controls this sense. And such rhythmical power is, as Coleridge said, an imaginative faculty. But too often those who possess it and are possessed by it lack the patience to test and deepen their experience, to resist expressing valueless feeling and to discipline themselves to reality. And Mr. Noyes, in our opinion, is such a poet. He has learnt to order with much grace and individual distinction a strong rhythmical impulse, but in the expansive exercise of this impulse he has failed to deepen his inward being. Hence his rhythmical affirmations, particularly in his shorter lyrics, are too facile, too little tested and purged by thought and suffering, to be rich in reality newly apprehended.

* "The Life of Alfred Noyes." By Walter Jerrold. Modern Writers' Series. 5s. net.

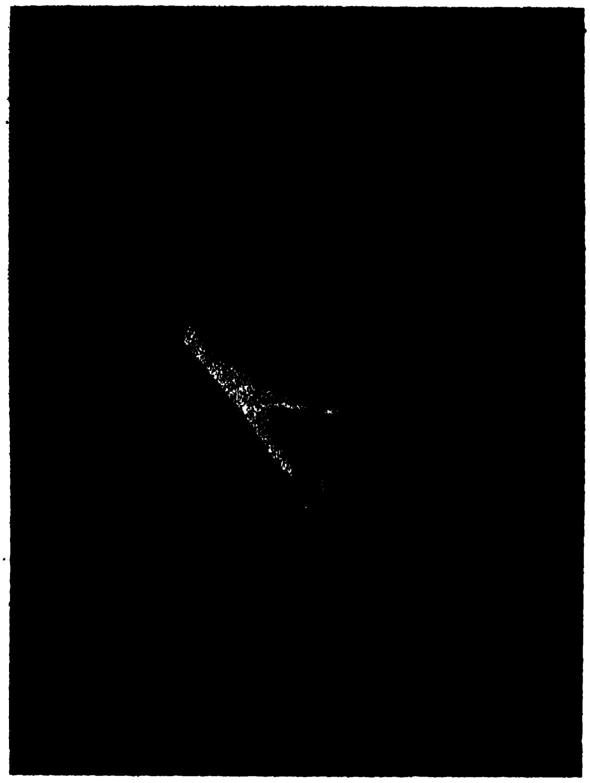
His most notable achievement is significantly that in which his lyrical impulse has most solid material to work upon and to work up. And the chapter which Mr. Jerrold devotes to " The Torch-Bearers " is the best in his book. His description of it as " a great essay in objective poetry in which the poet may be said to give fine expression to the best thought of his time," is for once happily exact. Mr. Noyes's own lack of creative thought is least felt in a poem which summarises and dramatises with much lyrical sympathy the long adventure of scientific thinking.

HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.



A FIGHTING PARSON.*

" Fighting " and " Parson " are two inevitable words in thinking about Alexander Irvine. He was born in Antrim in the uttermost poverty, of the best of mothers, to whom in " My Lady of the Chimney Corner " he paid a tribute worthy in many respects to stand beside Barrie's " Margaret Ogilvie." Reared in the twelve foot by nine Irish mud cottage, he yet had the glorious heritage of being well-born. Knowing hunger before he knew the colour of sky or earth or sea, he had no other choice—he must either fight or die, so by nature and circumstances he became the man we know; he would rather die than not fight in a world like this. His life is one of the undoubted miracles that has come under one's own observation. When I last saw him in London he was weak in body following a sudden illness, but his deep-set, burning eyes were as vivid and as keen as those of a young man.

Life for Alexander Irvine is just one crusade after another, the immediate object of which might change as quickly as his own Irish sky, but the essential aim and spirit of the man remains fixed as the poles—his passionate love of humanity (which for him means individual men, women and children), his instinctive love of justice, his inspired belief in the possibilities of human nature and the grace of God. There surely cannot be a man living who cares less for money and fears less the face of man. His life as told in this book is just a series of glorious fights, even where Irvine was ill-advised to fight, and never one where Irvine did not fling his all into the struggle. He literally does not know the meaning of " safety first " nor of safety except as the complete surrender of himself and all he possesses for the cause in hand. One just envies his power of complete abandonment to idea or course of action. From one point of view he is one of the most self-centred men I know, almost to the point of suffering from " egolomania " and yet it is impossible to link together selfishness and Alexander Irvine. He can only be described by combining opposites. A fighter to his finger-tips, he is a mystic at heart; his athletic body houses the soul of a poet; he has to make new worlds for old just because he dreams so splendidly; instinctively a fighter and of necessity a parson for at least some part of his life, for such a man must proclaim the word God has given him.

Altogether Alexander Irvine is one of the real men we have had the joy of knowing. This story which starts in Antrim and takes us to and fro across America and the continent of Europe, is a story of epic struggles for the right as one man is given to see it and even when he is most palpably wrong according to your judgment your respect and love for the man is undiminished. During the last forty years he has seen most things and known the men and women who counted. For him there was never a scrap that was really a private affair—he never thought of asking permission to join in, being so sure of a divine call to fight on any and every occasion. The world will be poorer when this great crusader has turned the corner.

* " A Fighting Parson." The Autobiography of Alexander Irvine. 12s. 6d. (Williams & Norgate.)

Alexander Irvine.
From "A Fighting Parson," by Alexander Irvine (Williams & Norgate).

A. H.

POETRY AND EXPERIMENT.

Mr. Roy Campbell's first book, "The Flaming Terrapin," proclaimed without a doubt that a poet of considerable individuality and strength had come upon the scene. His fault perhaps was too great a prodigality. He tended to fling words about him like stones. Nevertheless unhesitatingly one knew that here was a poet; what one did not know, and could not guess, was to what purpose he would put his undeniable gifts in the future. Would he discipline his exuberance into real power? His second book, "The Wayzgoose," was thought by some a disappointment; anyway it gave no indication of whither he was going. As a satire it had its merits; but nothing could be guessed from it as to what was happening to the poet hiding beneath the prickly cloak. Now comes his third book, "Adamastor."[1] And (save for a couple of pages of unworthy satirical fragments at the end) we see Mr. Campbell the poet, brave as ever, turbulent as ever, but with a richer harvest in his rhyme. Born a South African, he dedicates one of his poems (not a very good one as it happens) to a fellow poet of South Africa, W. Plomer; and during the course of it he declares:

> "We had no time for make-believe,
> So early each began
> To wear his liver on his sleeve,
> To snarl, and be an angry man;
> Far in the desert we have been
> Where Nature, still to poets kind,
> Admits no vegetable green
> To soften the determined mind,
> But with snarled gold and rumbled blue
> Must disinfect the sight
> Where once the tender maggots grew
> Of faith and beauty and delight."

These lines, with their angry undercurrent, are happily more typical of the earlier Mr. Campbell than of the maturer poet who shines out of the best of this book—out of such poems for instance as "Tristan da Cunha," "The Zulu Girl," "Autumn" and "Mass at Dawn"; nevertheless they serve to reveal at once both his latent strength and weakness. There is still in fact too much venom in the man. It gives his fierce epithets an occasionally fictitious strength. Only when the venom is washed away by an intense sympathy of understanding, leaving the old power of words and the old stupendous imagery, does he achieve the fine quality of which one now knows him to be capable. "The Zulu Girl" has such a quality. It describes a Zulu girl, resting from her work with the sweating gang, nursing and feeding her fly-tormented child in the shadow of the thorn trees:

> "Her body looms above him like a hill
> Within whose shade a village lies at rest;
> Or the first cloud so terrible and still
> That bears the coming harvest in its breast."

That final metaphor is unadulterated poetry. The same tempered strength and clean objectivity makes "Mass at Dawn" (a poem short enough to quote in full) equally sure of a place in the heritage of English lyrical poetry:

> "I dropped my sail and dried my dripping seines
> Where the white quay is chequered by cool planes
> In whose great branches, always out of sight,
> The nightingales are singing day and night.
> Though all was grey beneath the moon's grey beam,
> My boat in her new paint shone like a bride,
> And silver in my baskets shone the bream;
> My arms were tired and I was heavy-eyed,
> But when with food and drink, at morning-light,
> The children met me at the water-side,
> Never was wine so red or bread so white."

Proof enough is in this book then that Mr. Campbell has "arrived." His note is as individual as anyone's now singing. Purged of some unnecessary rancour, he may one day give us really peerless poetry; for he has an intensity of vision that often reaches white heat.

There is intensity too, and a far sterner discipline, in the poetry of Mr. L. A. G. Strong.[2] So severe is the discipline in fact that it sometimes hides the emotional intensity from all but the keenest eye. If Mr. Campbell's poetry is tropical in its fierce prodigality, Mr. Strong's rather resembles the bleak moor with its weeping curlew and wind-bitten trees. "Northern Light," the brief lyric that gives the book its title, will serve to show this sheer austerity:

> "Here under Heaven ringed
> With flickering pale fires
> The soul unpacks to lose
> Her burden of desires.
>
> "Thoughts are the clean gulls,
> Flesh cool as a bone.
> The mind is a wave here
> And the heart a stone."

Here the emotion has been pruned of all save the one living bud of truth. No hint of any leafy redundancy, however lovely in itself, is allowed to mar the chances of the essential fruit: Mr. Strong's poetry stands or falls by its central naked thought. Such austerity is rare in this age of lyric grace, and this poet does well to cultivate his finely individual contribution.

Of Mr. Richard Eberhart, who was until recently in residence at Cambridge, and of the sixteen undergraduates who write in this year's "Cambridge Poetry," it would be unfair to speak in terms of comparison with the maturity of Mr. Campbell or Mr. Strong. The Cambridge of to-day apparently is fast going over to the camp of the experimentalists and cerebralists. We had thought that could only be said of Oxford. Mr. Eberhart's poem[3] (to quote the publisher's "blurb"), "approaches experience through a progression of awareness, being divided into four cycles: early sensory feeling, 'the wilderness hill of art,' 'the mind in the mind,' and finally . . . an objectivity that entails symbolism." The last cycle, which tells vividly of a journey round the world in a tramp-freighter, is by

[1] "Adamastor." By Roy Campbell. 5s. (Faber & Faber.)—[2] "Northern Light." By L. A. G. Strong. (Limited Edition.) (Gollancz.)—[3] "A Bravery of Earth." By Richard Eberhart. 5s. (Jonathan Cape.)—[4] "Cambridge Poetry, 1930." Hogarth Living Poets: Vol. XIII. 3s. 6d. (Hogarth Press.)

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN," OCTOBER, 1930.

From a drawing by FRANK E. SLATER

MR. A. P. HERBERT.

From a drawing by HELEN WILSON.

MRS. BEATRICE KEAN-SEYMOUR.

far the best part of this often crassly involved poem. But Mr. Eberhart has far to go before he finds the clarity and purity of emotion that all true poetry entails. As for the other Cambridge experimentalists,[4] too many of them have studied Mr. Eliot to their undoing, and some have found their ruin in America :

" black BA
B E
L ba bel."

is a kind of puzzle for which we confess we have lost the liking.

C. HENRY WARREN.

THE ENVIRONS OF SHAKESPEARE.*

Writings about Shakespeare come as plentifully as ever, and the three under consideration illustrate how various are the avenues of approach to the great theme. Mr. Barnard deals with matter of fact, and though it cannot be said that his researches add anything to our scanty knowledge of Shakespeare's life, they furnish grounds for some quite plausible theorising as to his movements at a certain period, throw light on the stories of several people who were certainly or probably acquainted with him, and help to give actuality to the surroundings and the time in which he lived. And at all events, to anyone who feels the fascination of documentary studies, they are interesting for their own sake.

Their basis is a small collection of papers preserved at Hanley Court, near Tenbury in Worcestershire, which now belongs to Sir Offley Wakeman, baronet. It is obviously a collection of unusual quality, and Mr. Barnard has made excellent use of it. He is at once a skilled archivist and an enthusiast, and, unlike some workers in similar fields, he does not allow the dreams and desires of the latter to cloud the critical faculties of the former. It is the enthusiast, however, who concludes his introduction :

> " These researches are now brought to a close, at least temporarily. I leave them with a vision of other sources still unexplored, but which I trust may have been suggested to some other willing follower of the lure and lore of Shakespeare. Such research is in a sense a fine adventure, full of the joy of life."

Zeal and optimism like that are infectious.

The first person to whom Mr. Barnard introduces us, and the one about whom he has discovered most of interest, is Henry Condell, editor, with John Heminge, of the First Folio. Two documents, of 1617 and 1619 respectively, the latter bearing the only known example of the actor-editor's signature, bring him into Shakespeare's country, for they show him concerned in the conveyance of some property at Brockhampton near Broadway in Worcestershire, but a very few miles from Stratford. Among the witnesses to the second of these indentures was Anthony Langston, Town Clerk of Stratford.

> " It is possible," Mr. Barnard comments, " that Condell came to Stratford-upon-Avon in that August, 1619—some three years after Shakespeare's death—in order to deal with matters concerning his friend's monument, which must soon afterwards have been erected in the church there, but more probably with his mind occupied with the very early stages of the preparation of the contemplated Folio, which ultimately made its appearance in 1623."

This of course is mere conjecture ; but compared with some of the conjectures which Shakespearean explorers have offered for our acceptance, it is plausibility itself.

Mr. Barnard's chapters on Condell and his family are however interesting in themselves. The actor, it seems, was a man of the highest respectability, a churchwarden and overseer of the poor, and one trusted by his friends to administer their estates after death. But his son William and his son-in-law Herbert Finch were very different characters, and the legal proceedings and other documents which throw light on their unedifying careers are pieced together into an entertaining if fragmentary story.

* " New Links with Shakespeare." By E. A. B. Barnard, F.S.A., F.R.Hist.S. 10s. 6d. (Cambridge Press.)—" Report on the Poet Shakespeare's Identity." By J. Denham Parsons. 2s. 6d. (Published by the author.)—" A Plea for the Liberty of Interpreting." By Lascelles Abercrombie. 1s. 6d. (Milford).

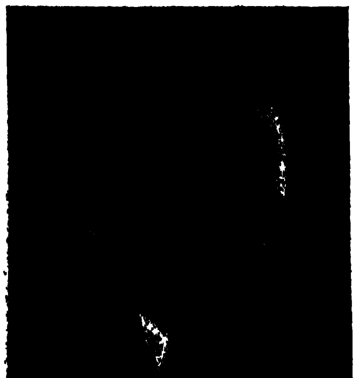
We get back to Shakespeare in the chapter headed "The Broadway Area," in which Mr. Barnard discusses various references which suggest that the poet knew Worcestershire as well as his native Warwickshire. Another chapter on the First Folio and the Poems is an interesting excursion into bibliography.

Only a few of the people and topics considered by Mr. Barnard have been touched on, but his whole book is an admirable example of the humanity which lurks in dusty parchments. It is to be hoped that he will continue his researches and that luck will attend him on his quest for the Shakespearean El Dorado.

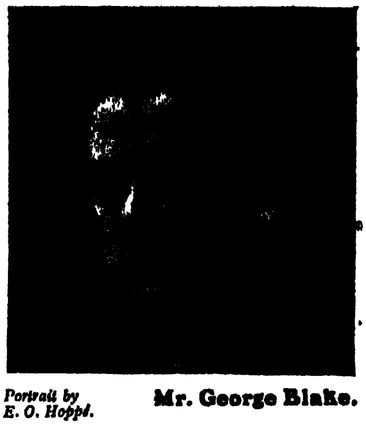


Mr. Parsons's "report," presented to the Trustees of the British Museum, contains a methodical summary of the evidence on which the author, and those who think like him, base their contention that the plays and poems which most of us still believe to be the work of Shakespeare, the actor from Stratford, were really written by Francis Bacon. The numerical "coincidences" are certainly curious, and Mr. Parsons lays great stress on eight "non-cryptographic" clues of his own discovery. It is probable however that he will convince only the already converted.

Professor Abercrombie's British Academy lecture, on the other hand, will interest all lovers of Shakespeare and literature. For Professor Abercrombie, who is probably the most powerful of living English poets, is a critic of rare quality. He pleads for a return "not to romanticism"—with its "adoration of the miraculous poet and the infinite genius"—"but to the ground on which the romantic attitude to Shakespeare stood." That is to say, he champions a purely æsthetic and therefore individual criticism, against the modern scientific method which is apt to lose sight of the plays in its concentration on extraneous considerations. His paper is as penetrating as it is eloquent.

F. B.

MR. W. R. CALVERT'S FIRST NOVEL.*



The Lake Country has inspired many to authorship since the men of the Lake School taught us to see it as something more than a tumbled mass of horrid mountains, but none to the production of a finer novel than Mr. W. R. Calvert's "Sorrowstones." One expected a novel from his pen to be something out of the common, so unusual was the quality of his books of the country-side, "The Secret of the Wild," and "Just Across the Road," and out of the common it is, distinguished above most by the manner of its writing and the tenacity of its grip upon the reader's interest. Sorrowstones was the farm-house of the Tysons, built by a tumbling beck just below the purple heather on the slopes of Hartbarrow, amidst the grimness and the glory of the Lakeland. Adam Tyson called it Sorrowstones when he built it, a hundred years ago, thereby causing the beldames of the nearby village to shake their heads and prophesy "aching hearts—weary bones—till the beck runs dry." They prophesied truly. Tirzah, his wife, dies at the birth of the second Adam, whose son John, killed on the way to market, is brought home dead just as the tale begins, leaving behind him a widow, Janet, who had loved him with the silent passion characteristic of the women of the fells, and one daughter, Beth, with all the freshness of the

Mr. W. R. Calvert.

* "Sorrowstones." By W. R. Calvert. 7s. 6d. (Putnams.)

heather-sweet uplands in her face, and the strength of the hills in her nature. More sorrow comes. Janet is carried more dead than alive from the byre where a cow has gored her, and with Dr. Spedding comes Roy, his son, just home from London after passing his finals, and with Roy love. Anguished days follow for Janet, whose anxiety as to the future of Beth and the farm retards her recovery, and inspires her to a hasty marriage with a distant relative, one Spencer Tyson, given to drink and to women, whose lustful looks awake Beth to a knowledge of her womanhood, and whose detestable pawings and kissings arouse within her a no less hateful desire to respond to his passion. Tragedy, pressed down and running over, comes to save Beth, and a beneficent dementia, out of which she comes to find peace in the love of Roy, and the prospect of naught but happiness at Sorrowstones in future days, with the beck run dry and thus the prophecy fulfilled. A finer girl than Beth never trod the fields of fiction, nor a truer woman of the fells than Janet. Mr. Calvert is successful with all his women, and pictures to the life the man-hungry type in Gladys Featherstone, and the mischief-making village gossip in Betsy Shackleton. The background of the Lakeland, depicted in all its moods, is drawn to admiration, and everywhere there is a beauty in the manner of the story's telling that holds and charms. If Mr. Calvert ever writes for us a second novel, may it be as good as "Sorrowstones."

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. George Blake.

P. A. DAVIS.

THE SEAS BETWEEN.*

Three times Tony Meldrum experienced the rapture of love. First, just as he entered his teens, for Maisie, who ran like a fawn; then, a few years later, for Jean, "the loveliest thing he had ever seen"; and finally, in young manhood, for Averil, an American heiress, to whose beauty was added "something sweet and precious." And each rapture was shattered by the same cause—the sins of the father visited upon the son. For when Tony's mother died in giving him birth, his father left Scotland to cultivate his estate in the West Indies, and the lad little understood the implications of the news that his father had married again and had a daughter. But the truth was revealed in all its horror when Tony's father returned to Scotland with his negress wife and half-caste daughter. Maisie fled at the first vision of Rosalie, "the kid with the yellow face"; Jean turned from him in disgust because he had not told her of the drunken father who had died in an asylum, and that his stepmother was "a dirty old black nigger"; and he hazarded happiness with Averil because he could not tell her that his father was a drunkard and his sister a half-caste.

Such is the theme of George Blake's new novel, the scene of which is equally divided between Scotland and the West Indies. The lyrical quality of the writing may be inferred from this eulogy of the "lovely Scotland of the exile's dream":

> "White, lonely cottages in little bays; the sad moor of Culloden where Scotsmen died in their hundreds for a dream; grey towers of St. Andrews and red cardinals walking under them; the bend of the Tweed that brought tears to the eyes of Walter Scott, and him dying; white beaches of the Hebrides, with thundering rollers from the Atlantic and the oyster-catchers screaming over their desolation; autumn burning in the trees on Loch Lomond's edge; the graves of the Covenanters among the mosses of Ayr and Galloway."

* "The Seas Between." By George Blake. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

But though he pays careful attention to his landscape, Mr. Blake never allows it to divert him from his primary purpose of limning the fine character of Tony Meldrum in his struggle with adverse fate; and there is ever an undertone of the poignancy of that familiar line of "Auld Lang Syne" which has influenced the title of his story. The subsidiary characters are clearly visualised and firmly drawn, but it is always their reaction on Tony which is kept in view. One may feel some slight annoyance with the hero's reluctance to take Averil into his confidence, but there is no escaping the holding power of this notable novel.

HENRY C. SHELLEY.

CROMWELL.*

This is a most valuable book, none the less so because it is in reality a study of the last and most important ten years of Cromwell's life rather than a biography of the whole. It is founded on a study of a number of highly important papers, hitherto mainly unpublished, in the Venetian and Genoese state archives. Of its three hundred and fourteen pages, the last seventy are devoted to an appendix of translated extracts of some of the chief of these documents. The light which they throw on the history of the Protectorate is of the utmost value. For this reason, if for no other, this book should be in the library of every student of the seventeenth century.

In October, 1651, at the very moment when Cromwell was returning in triumph to London after his victory over the last of the internal enemies of the young British Republic, a Ligurian banker, Francesco Bernardi, took up his duties as Genoese agent in England. In the course of his task he formed an intimate friendship with Cromwell, then rapidly rising to supreme authority in the state, and it seems probable that the obvious capacity, directness and sincerity of Bernardi, apparent in every line of his letters, appealed to something innately simple in the intricate heart of the great soldier. The friendship so formed stood the little Genoese republic in good stead, and provides the main interest of the letters which Bernardi continued to send home till 1657. On these letters this new study of Cromwell is largely and very wisely based.

While a Genoese agent was writing shrewd, gossiping letters on the daily life of the Commonwealth to his employers, the diplomats of Venice were continuing that great series of commentaries on our national life and history which, preserved with intimate and loving care, lie hidden in the archives of the Secret Chancery of the ancient Venetian Republic, to the loss and, be it said, the shame of the historians of the whole world. "Most of the Venetian diplomatic papers," as the author states in his foreword, "are still inedited." One can only venture a hope in passing that Signor Mussolini may find it possible to set in train a work which would add one more meritorious achievement to the great services he has already rendered to the science of the past, and which would confer an inestimable benefit on every student of history.

In addition to their ordinary diplomatic correspondence, it was the practice of Venetian ambassadors on their return home to read before a solemn gathering of the Doge and Senate a report or "Relation" of their mission, and of the social and political condition of the country they had visited. One of these reports, that of Giovanni Sagredo, Extraordinary Ambassador at the Court of the Protector, is translated and printed at the end of this book. Inaccurate as it is in its earlier and introductory paragraphs (containing for instance the extraordinary information that Charles I had captured all the Parliamentary chiefs at the first battle of the Civil War, and subsequently released them) when it abandons hearsay and describes events within the personal observation of the ambassador it is of the most vital interest and importance. Indeed it is almost impossible to form a complete and accurate picture of Cromwell and his governance of England in 1656 without reading it.

* "Cromwell." By Eucardio Momigliano. Translated from the Italian by L. E. Marshall. 10s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

It is this study of Italian diplomatic documents, all too much neglected by English historians, that makes this new study of Cromwell and the Protectorate fascinating and valuable. To the earlier history of Cromwell's life, the constitutional struggle between King and Parliament, and the Civil Wars, it necessarily adds but little. Indeed in this earlier period the author appears at times to be somewhat at sea; and when, writing of the period of Charles's "personal government," he refers to English noblemen, confined in their castles, thrilling with indignation as their fellow noblemen ascended the scaffold in the cause of liberty, one is forced to ask oneself the unanswerable question: what noblemen in this country ascended the scaffold between 1630 and 1640? And as a matter of strict historical fact, Cromwell was educated at Huntingdon, not at Lincoln, and the Dutch War was not "at its height" in 1655 but over. The reference to Mr. Drinkwater as "the most authoritative of living Cromwellians" and the complete absence of any mention of Professor Firth, will also surprise many English historians.

Psychologically the author's estimate of Cromwell as one who, up to his triumphant return in 1651, was the greatest and least interested of public servants, and fell thereafter, like Macbeth, to a disease of ambition, and was thus driven by inevitable steps to a course of tyranny, is probably correct and is borne out by the almost universal testimony of his contemporaries. Yet Cromwell was something more. Half Fenman, half Welshman, he possessed that extraordinary and self-deceptive quality of mysticism, which appears from time to time in the greatest of our race and which no foreigner can perhaps fully understand. It is this which still leaves Milton's judgment of his master the last and the best: "While you are left amongst us, that man has no proper trust in God who fears for the security of England"; and explains his own vision of the Empire he founded: "You cannot plant an oak in a flower-pot; she must have earth for her roots and heaven for her branches."

Arthur Bryant.

NOTHING TO PAY.*

Amos Morgan's chief object in life was to get something for nothing and to hold on to what he had got. Once "he went to school with nothing in his pockets and returned with the blade of a pocket-knife. How came he by it? He raced a boy for it, and when he saw that the other was winning he shouted after him: 'You are losing your marbles glass.' The boy stopped and Amos passed him. Amos was cute and his ways were a joy to his father." When he grew older he was apprenticed to the drapery trade, went to Carmarthen, studied the trade and practised a stringent economy. He considered it senseless to pay money to go to a theatre when one could go to a prayer-meeting for nothing. He would have liked to be a preacher, but "one cannot be shopman and preacher; one cannot close one's eyes in prayer when there is money about." So he made himself proficient in his work, was promoted from the Carmarthen shop to a Cardiff one, where he was "put in the flannelettes," initiated into the system of fining which impressed upon the assistants the importance of keeping some seventy-odd rules; and eventually he came to London, to "live in" at the Bon Marché. "Thrift and wisdom were joined in him; thrift enabling him to gather money and wisdom to keep money." The War and the misfortunes of a German enabled him to achieve his ambition and establish his own business, whereupon he decided to marry: "a wife needs no salary, she does not defraud her husband, she is always at her husband's call; for a wife there is nothing to pay." He married a woman as close as himself, they "separated the grain from the chaff, but they did not throw away the chaff."

Mr. Caradoc Evans traces his Welshman throughout his sordid, grasping life to his sordid, grasping death, drawing his miserly character and the characters of his shopmates and companions with masterly skill and sardonic humour. And yet one feels that though the author appears to attack his own countrymen so bitterly, his attack is not really upon the Welsh as a nation so much as upon all the humbug and avarice in human nature. He uses the Welsh because he knows them, just as he uses the drapery trade, to show up the trickery and meanness of commerce, because he knows it and has lived under the shadow of such trickery and meanness and suffered under it. If he had been English, Scottish or Irish, perhaps he would have come up against parsimony and hypocrisy just the same, and been moved to anger just the same, and spent his irony on the English, Scottish or Irish in consequence. An artist must colour his work with his own experience; Mr. Evans has had his experience with the sordid side of human nature in Wales, and he is an artist who lays on his colours boldly. His background is oddly foreign to the ordinary English reader; his style of writing has a Biblical touch, spiced with his ruthless wit; but his characters, grimly real, though in the main stamped Welsh, belong to any or all nations; since avarice, like vice and virtue in general, is inevitably cosmopolitan.

Mr. Caradoc Evans.

Almey St. John Adcock.

* "Nothing to Pay." By Caradoc Evans. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

THE ENCIRCLING OF EUROPE.*

It is stated on the cover of this volume that it is a "brilliantly readable contribution to the philosophy of history." That's as may be, but it is a distinctly difficult book to review. There is no summary given by way of flap or foreword; there is no table of contents; there are no chapter headings. The reviewer has to swim out quite a long way before he discerns the farther shore. If Mr. Mantalini had tried to read this book he would soon have asked, "What's the demnition point?"

Speaking briefly, the aim of the author is to show that there is a common denominator—and a surprisingly big one—to the history and development of Russia on the one hand, and those of the United States of America on the other; or to use another mathematical metaphor, to demonstrate that an unsuspected, nevertheless clearly marked, parallelism exists between the two nations. Geographically situated between these two parallels is

* "Europe's Two Frontiers." By John Gould Fletcher. 15s. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Europe (minus Russia), and the task of this " Europe " to-day is to achieve the spiritual and intellectual conquest of Russia and America, or to be conquered by one of the other.

Mr. Fletcher goes back a long way—to Babylonia and Ancient Egypt in fact—and we are early introduced to Ea, the fish-shaped god of the water, Sin, Shamash and a host of other divinities. Soon we slide into a kind of synoptic presentment of the histories of Russia and the United States, and we find that, from 1688, the " two countries were to run their course of development side by side." At this juncture Mr. Fletcher puts up as a ninepin the " kind of reader " who may object that " There is really no parallel between a few insignificant English-speaking colonies planted on the far side of the Atlantic . . . and the older, more populous, if largely unformed, realm of Muscovy." The ninepin disappears in an explosive paragraph lit up by flashes of the Roman Empire, Ancient Greece and Judea. But the writer of this review will say that the ninepin had a good deal of reason on its side.

Ten pages later we are back in Egypt and Babylonia again. " As in Babylonia the state-religion was at the outset composed of a series of regional cults, only welded later by military force into the universal worship of the central Babylonian sun-and-war-god Marduk, so in Russia the force of dissenting regional sentiment contended against the deliberate state-policy of making the Tsar central autocrat of all the Russias and sole head of the Church. As in Egypt the religious struggle was between the sun-god, Ra of the North, whose symbol was a golden disk, and the vegetation-god, Osiris of the South, whose symbol was the tree of life, so in America there was always tension between the agricultural South and the industrial, gold-worshipping North. Russia could only keep going so long as the Tsar was victorious: America could only keep going so long as the two divergent sections fused into one."

Candidly we think there is a serious non sequitur here, and we are more impressed than ever by Lord Bryce's dictum, " History never repeats itself." Mr. Fletcher then spends several chapters in proving the parallelism in such matters as religion, literature, politics and so forth, and is eventually led to make the statement, " The parallel lines we have drawn between the two great frontier nations are now complete, and the whole world finds itself in the dilemma of having to make either a choice or a compromise between the ideals of America and Russia." For the life of us we cannot understand why such dilemma should exist, but Mr. Fletcher is seriously concerned about it. This is a very curious book, but as honesty is the noblest characteristic of a reviewer we here definitely record our opinion that the so-called parallelism between Russia and the United States is enormously exaggerated.

F. E. WHITTON (Lieut.-Colonel).

GLORIOUS ADVENTURES.*

Many years ago a lad in a country village, enthralled by a serial in the Boy's Own Paper which told of orchid hunters and head-hunters in the wilds of Borneo, decided that when he grew up he would go out into the wild places to collect orchids and other rare plants. Like most such aspirations, this one had to give way to a more prosaic programme; but during the past few days the reading of another and more authoritative record—" Plant Hunting on the Edge of the World "—has shown it to have been but smouldering during those thirty-odd years. When a book does that, it is a good book: and Captain Kingdon Ward's story of his adventures in the remote and inhospitable fastnesses of the North-Eastern Indian Frontier has done it for at least one reader.

Of course the man on whom the Royal Geographical Society bestows its Founder's Gold Medal must be a man with a story to tell. It is curious, but it often happens that these adventurers into the "back of beyond" can tell their story amazingly well. Think of Scott and Shackleton, to mention but two. Captain Ward must be added to the list. He can describe scenery so that it stands up before your eyes; and he can write of a flower no bigger than a pea with an enthusiasm that makes you want to attempt the impossible and grow it in your own garden. During his first expedition, to the Burmese Oberland, he came across the tea rose primula, and this is his telling of the experience:

*" Plant Hunting on the Edge of the World." By F. Kingdon Ward. 21s. (Gollancz.)

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Captain Frank Kingdon Ward,

Author of "Plant Hunting on the Edge of the World."

"With half an hour's daylight to go—for the cloud rack swaddled the hills, and the twilight in these latitudes is of short duration—I ran across the snow bridge and up the steep cone towards a high bank of earth, which sloped up to the cliffs; but I had scarcely reached the bank when I stopped suddenly in amazement. Was I dreaming? I rubbed my eyes, and looked again. No! Just above the edge of the snow a vivid blush-pink flower stood out of the cold grey earth. . . . But what could it be? Yet so fascinating was it to stand there and gaze on this marvel in an aching pain of wonder, that I felt no desire to step forward and break the spell. Indeed for a minute I was paralysed with an emotion which perhaps only those who have come across some beloved alpine prize in Switzerland can faintly appreciate.

"I can recall several flowers which at first sight have knocked the breath out of me, but only two or three which have taken me by storm as did this one. The sudden vision is like a physical blow, a blow in the pit of the stomach; one can only gasp and stare. In the face of such unsurpassed loveliness one is afraid to move, as with bated breath one mutters the single word 'God!'—a prayer rather than an exclamation. And when at last with fluttering heart one does venture to step forward, it is on tiptoe, and hat in hand, to wonder and to worship.

"And so it was now. I just stood there transfixed on the snow-cone, in a honeymoon of bliss, feasting my eyes on a masterpiece."

Just before this he has been telling of the silver barberry, which may be compared remotely to English holly. "But one must picture these holly leaves rather long and narrow, set jauntily on sealing-wax red stems without thorns, the upper surface not polished but of a translucent malachite green, with a delicate network of jade veins traced on it, and the under surface softly whitened as though a flocculent film of silver had been freshly precipitated on it."

The thrill of adventure and dread keeps close company with this thrill of discovery and beauty. It is that which makes the record so gripping to the general reader. There is for example the story of the flight of the coolies on the heights above Burma and Tibet. "An awful feeling of despair came over me," confesses the author. Then—to pass the time!—he set about looking for a certain dwarf rhododendron. He found it; and interpolates the remark, in the middle of a graphic account of how he got himself and six remaining coolies out of a very nasty situation, that it occurred to him later that "but for all this upset" he would never have got seeds of it at all.

There should be a version of these glowing adventures into Burma and Tibet and Assam specially written for boys and girls. There is in fact a wide literary field waiting to be tilled in the records of English explorers of the type of Captain Kingdon Ward. The growing generation has little idea of the existence of what we may term the Elizabethan spirit in this seemingly prosaic, materialistic and mechanistic age. It would thrill it to know the details locked up in the records of the R. G. S. and in published volumes of a scientific nature. The Americans do not miss an opportunity to tell their youngsters all about Roy Chapman Andrews, Peary, Bob Bartlett, William Beebe, Lindberg. Let us do the same with our pioneers and explorers.

One word of complaint. I found the maps poor, unsatisfying and difficult to follow. Possibly the publishers realised this weak spot, for there is no mention of a map in the lists of contents, illustrations or index. The illustrations are interesting enough; but how one sighs for a Ponting or a Hurley to have been with Captain Ward on these glorious adventures.

W. R. Calvert.

THE JESTING ARMY.*

After perusing "The Jesting Army" no reader will need the author's assurance that the novel "was planned and sketched in outline long before the present fashion for war literature began," and that "its writing has been quite unaffected by the controversies which that fashion has fathered." Mr. Ernest Raymond's book bears the impress of spontaneity and sincerity on every page, and his own attitude towards the War is certainly far enough removed from that of Remarque and his followers to exonerate him from any possible charge of pandering to current taste. For ourselves, we prefer Remarque's attitude to Mr. Raymond's: but this is no place for debate. However much readers may share or dislike Mr. Raymond's view of the War, they will be compelled to recognise that it is at all events a passionately honest one.

"The Jesting Army" is the second instalment of a trilogy, begun last year by "A Family That Was" and to be completed by a novel of post-war England. The present book describes Tony O'Crogan's adventures during the War itself. Readers of "A Family That Was" will remember Tony as a youth of fine sensibility and potentiality, but a little self-centred, wayward and dissatisfied. His childhood in an Anglican vicarage and his life at a day school had offered insufficient scope for his adventurous and artistic instincts. To Tony the War comes as a liberation. Not only does it give him an aim, but, while his reason argues against such a view, he finds an æsthetic satisfaction in war. He discourses at length to his comrades on this subject, and that his attitude reflects Mr. Raymond's own may be judged by the fact that one of Tony's conversations is, if we are not mistaken, almost a verbatim reprint of an article which his creator published some time ago, as representing his own ideas, in the Sunday Times. There Mr. Raymond admitted that the romantic conception of war had its dangers, but he frankly confessed that, for himself, he found an æsthetic beauty in fighting.

Tony, then, is the romantic public schoolboy who loves thrills more than he dreads danger and whose genuine patriotism is not unalloyed by the egotistical desire to win glory for himself. He does distinguish himself at last at Passchendaele, but only after he has passed two years of comparative inactivity at Gallipoli and in Palestine. There is an excellent plot, which we cannot pause to follow, and the development of Tony's character in the crucible of his varied war experiences is a masterly and convincing study. Not less fine and subtle, within certain limitations, are the host of minor figures with whom Mr. Raymond's canvas of four hundred and fifty closely printed pages are filled. The author realises that Tony's attitude was not the universal one, and the temperamental reactions of his fellow soldiers are as different as their ultimate fates. Some of the characters—such as the unconventional padre or Tony's Cockney batman—are so real and lovable that the disasters which befall them rend the reader's heart. If Mr. Raymond sees the glamour of war, he certainly does not spare us its horror and tragedy, even though he seems to imply that the horror and tragedy are in some measure redeemed by the heroism and the self-sacrifice which they evoke.

Mr. Ernest Raymond.

* "The Jesting Army." By Ernest Raymond. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

As a novel " The Jesting Army " is extraordinarily good. Mr. Raymond's powers as a story-writer have here come to a fine maturity. As a scenic background of the War, moreover, the book, with its vast panorama of pictures of Gallipoli, Palestine and France, is second to none that we have read. Mr. Raymond's main limitation is that he is as much predisposed to see the best in human nature under adversity as other war novelists are to see the worst. Well differentiated as his characters are in other respects, they are all much alike in their ability to jest in the face of death. The jesting is remarkably good and life-like, and the patter and repartee of the Lancashire privates is specially delightful and natural. But we doubt if the British Army was quite so uniformly a jesting army as Mr. Raymond represents it. No single writer can give us " the truth about the War." Of certain aspects of it, at any rate, Mr. Raymond presents a very vital and, for all the incidental gaiety, a very poignant impression.

G. T.

GOD: IN CHRISTIAN THOUGHT AND EXPERIENCE.*

This volume of the " Library of Constructive Theology " is the work of an Anglican divine conscious that the question now pondered in the world is " whether or not the majority of men shall continue to believe in God." The subject plainly is not only of perennial interest but of great immediate importance. Dr. Matthews, with a conspicuous sincerity, a clearness of style all too rare in theological writings and a persuasiveness that is singularly attractive, sets out the faith of a Church of England scholar; and many who are not of his communion will enjoy the achievement. The arguments and obiter dicta of contemporary writers and pseudo-philosophers who assail the Christian religion and, ruling out all Divine revelation, would substitute an ethic of human device, are discussed frankly and courteously. Man's experience of God is not to be dismissed, as certain psychologists dismiss it, as a case of " projection." For " psychology, no less than any other science, when it pronounces finally on philosophical problems, becomes ridiculous." And " if to be a projection of the mind is to be condemned we must resign ourselves to the conclusion that no mental or spiritual activity of ours has any objective validity." No concept of science, no idea of the reason but can be turned down as a " mere projection." It won't do! " It is in any case important to remember that the human race does not consist of professors."

The difficulties, doubts and perplexities of the average religiously minded man are the author's chief concern. The problem of God's transcendence and immanence for example. " A purely immanent deity turns out in the last resort to be undistinguishable from ourselves and hence to be no possible object of adoration and aspiration, while conversely a purely transcendent Deity is one with whom communion would be impossible." It must not be inferred because of this apparent paradox that religion is illusory or mistaken. The full comprehension of God is beyond the utmost capacity of man. " We know in part." Again the necessity of anthropomorphism (distinguishing carefully its lower and higher types) must be recognised in the development of man's concept of God. Denying the attributes of personality, mankind tends to pantheism or the belief in fate or destiny. We are invited to note the historical fact " that pantheistic theology has everywhere proved to be perfectly compatible with polytheistic worship." Monotheism, with all tincture of the anthropomorphic expunged from it, will decline into a notion of deity "for whom no human values are real, into an unknowable ground of the universe or an order of nature." Therefore, pleads Dr. Matthews, "let us not be afraid of the plain implications of our faith. The Christian doctrine of God depends more than any other on the legitimacy of the anthropomorphic approach," since "the two pivotal dogmas of developed Christianity are that man is made in the image of God and that God is made manifest fully in the man Christ Jesus." This is not to question the validity of the intellectual approach to God, the Hellenic contribution to the common stock. And the very attempt at synthesis, "which is a glory of Christianity and one of the marks of its position as the supreme and absolute religion, has been at the same time the source of its internal tension and unrest. The two elements within its experience of God have never been completely harmonised; the personal, 'psychological,' living God of Hebrew tradition and piety has never been successfully identified with the God of metaphysics whose ancestry derives from Greece."

* " God: In Christian Thought and Experience." By W. R. Matthews, M.A., D.D., Dean of King's College, London. 10s. 6d. net. (Nisbet.)

In the chapters on the Christian experience of God the author dwells on the importance of the "sinlessness" of Christ. "There is no hint in the recorded sayings of Christ that He was conscious of any moral failure or had any need for personal repentance and forgiveness. . . . The experience of Jesus included the knowledge of the mystery and the force of evil, though not participation in it." The "inevitability" of the crucifixion is rejected; for "the ultimate dependence of all things upon God's creative will does not abrogate the freedom of men or the possibility of rebellion. . . . Clearly Jesus admitted the existence of evil spirits and attributed to them illness and disease which are contrary to the will of God. . . . The inevitable cross was not made necessary by an inexorable fate nor by a fixed and unalterable plan, but by the deeds of men which were not inevitable and the conditions which those deeds had brought into being."

Photo by Raphael. Dr. W. R. Matthews.

But the reader must turn to the chapters that deal more fully with the problems of Love and Evil, of Time and Providence. There are other chapters too, not to be omitted, discussing the transition in philosophy and the types of philosophical tendency and the meaning of transcendence and the Divine immanence in creation. More strictly theological are the chapters concerned with the distinction between religion and theology, the religious experience that witnesses to a Living and Personal God, and the affirmation of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The freshness of expression, wealth of reading and quite obvious desire to serve the truth make these portions most valuable to the general reader. The immensity of the subject has produced neither dryness nor dullness.

Joseph Clayton.

I MEAN TO SAY——.*

"I mean to say——" "If you know what I mean." How often such phrases besprinkle the conversation even of educated people, and how indiscriminately they are used! A man will begin a pronouncement with "I mean to say," when he really has not the foggiest notion of what he does mean to say; or a woman will append "if you know what I mean" to a statement so simple and obvious that a child of two could understand it. Such irritating expressions are the reflection of our dilatory and muddled habits of thought, and consequently of speech, which too often betray an utter lack of logic, precision and clarity.

Speech should perfectly fit thought, and thought should be an exact science. We should mean what we say, and say what we mean. This of course is not an easy task. How difficult it is—yet how necessary to accomplish—is shown by Dr. Thouless in his new book. Dr. Thouless is the lecturer in psychology at Glasgow University, and fortunate indeed must be the students who sit at his feet. He brings an engagingly light manner to the elucidation of abstruse points, and at the same time demonstrates that the abstruse vitally affects the concrete. It may seem a trifling matter that we should say, "the dog is a mongrel" instead of "the dog is of mixed breed." But the writer shows us that upon such trivial and thoughtless errors the destinies of nations hang.

To say that a dog is "of mixed breed" is to state a scientific and objective fact. To say that the same dog is "a mongrel" is no less true; but the word "mongrel" has emotional associations and at once suggests disparagement. That perhaps is not a very serious matter. But the use of emotionally-charged words may, in less simple cases, have dire consequences. It is, for instance, the popular slavery to words with emotional meanings that makes it possible for wars to be carried on. What is heroism in our own troops is foolhardiness in those of our enemies. What are atrocities on one side are wise severity on the other, when the objective facts underlying both phrases are probably much the same:

> "Such words as 'Bolshevik,' 'reactionary,' 'constitutional,' 'national honour,' etc., are all words used in national and international political thinking which carry more of emotional than of any other meaning. So long as such words are the ordinary terms of politicians, how can we hope to think straight in national and international affairs? If a chemist doing an experiment depended on such thought processes as a nation uses in selecting its rulers or in deciding on peace or war with other nations, he would blow up his laboratory. This however would be a trivial disaster in comparison with what may result from emotional thinking in politics. Better have a hundred chemical laboratories blown up than the whole of civilisation!"

But the use of words with emotional meanings is only one of many temptations that lure us from the narrow path of straight thinking along which alone social and international harmony may be reached. Most of us are not merely slaves to prejudice, but are guilty (consciously or unconsciously) of all kinds of dishonest tricks in argument. Dr. Thouless examines in detail no less than thirty-four such dishonest tricks, and appends a delightfully humorous and caustic chapter in which, by means of an imaginary conversation between a clergyman, a professor and a business magnate, he shows those tricks actually at work. Other chapters deal with "Some Logical Fallacies," "Tricks of Suggestion," "Pitfalls in Analogy" and "Vagueness and Related Evils."

* "Straight and Crooked Thinking." By Robert H. Thouless. 5s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Dr. Thouless does not of course deny emotional thinking its proper place in poetry, and he concedes to rhetoric its legitimate uses. What he contends is that, when we are dealing with disputable points of fact or with questions of actual conduct, thought and speech should be scientifically exact and impartial. It is not necessary for us always to think and to speak scientifically. But the whole future—even the very existence—of civilisation may depend upon our acquiring the ability so to think and to speak. GILBERT THOMAS.

ESSAYS OF THE YEAR.*

"The essay," wrote the late Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, must always be a somewhat repellent form of literature unless it is handled with the lightest and deftest touch. It is too reminiscent of the practice of our boyhood—to put a heading and then to show what you can get under it." A list of the contributors to this delightful collection of vagrant themes is sufficient guarantee of their complete freedom from any suggestion of pedantry, and of the pleasantness and variety of their pages. Such names, say, as Robert Lynd, E. V. Knox, Hilaire Belloc, A. G. Gardiner, Gerald Gould, J. B. Priestley, and A. A. Milne (to mention no others) are sufficient indication of the type and charm of the "essays" that have been selected as representative of the year 1929-30. Most of these papers have been written for periodicals in the ordinary course of journalism, and they are a remarkable testimony to the high literary standard of current journalism. Readers will be grateful to the publishers for rescuing them from the files.

One or two of the writers devote themselves to a discussion of literature—John Drinkwater and Arthur Symons both write of the novels of Dickens, and there are one or two biographical sketches, including one of the late Earl Balfour by Augustine Birrell. For the most part however the authors are discursive, and write of everything and nothing with self-revealing intimacy, their productions resembling "the tangled herbacious border rather than the trim parterre. Humour is not excluded from them, and although they may be instructive, their principal object is to delight." Delight they certainly do, and instructive they certainly are. Their wit and whimsicality may easily hide from the reader how much shrewd observation and criticism of contemporary life and manners he is absorbing.

There are thirty-two essays in all, and it will be seen that there is a certain logical order in their arrangement. Selection can always be made a matter of dispute, but we cannot do other than wonder at certain omissions. Has the fount of Mr. Chesterton's genius run dry, or did Mr. E. V. Lucas lay down his pen in 1929?

Mr. J. C. Squire, who contributes an introductory essay, written before the actual selection was made, says: "If only I had a copy of the book I should take it up to bed with me and read it." It is a book that could certainly be read in bed—or almost anywhere else; and to which the reader will be able to return with delight again and again. F. E. C.

HORACE SHIPP'S POETRY.†

Readers of Horace Shipp's "Palimpsest" may find the verse a little elusive on a first reading, although they cannot but be struck by one feature of excellence—its rhythms

* "Essays of the Year." 5s. net. (Argonaut Press.)
† "Palimpsest." By Horace Shipp. 5s. (Sampson Low.)

and verbal technique. Whatever note or group of strings Horace Shipp strikes, whether it be "free verse," blank verse, mixed verse or orthodox rhymed verse, he bears witness to unusual mastery. His poems are rich with soft, gentle music. There is scarcely a dissonance anywhere; line and word are admirably poised; nearly every accent, assonance and alliteration are in their right place and at their right time. The fault which disturbs is rather a fault of content than of form (at any rate in this book it seems to belong only to semi-form). That is his too frequent use of repetition, a mannerism which jars on the ear of the spirit rather than the ear of the brain, suggesting at times an aim beyond the range of the eye, and bestowing a ring of sentimentality or specious reality on passages which already tread a little too near that quagmire, as in—

> "Eyes are too blind to see the slow > sun-quickened sea of blueness flow;
> but fingers know, but fingers know."

But the book is full of the real stuff of poetry, passages which have all the illuminating activity which comes from fine phrasing without the violent aggressiveness which often goes with the phrase, as in—

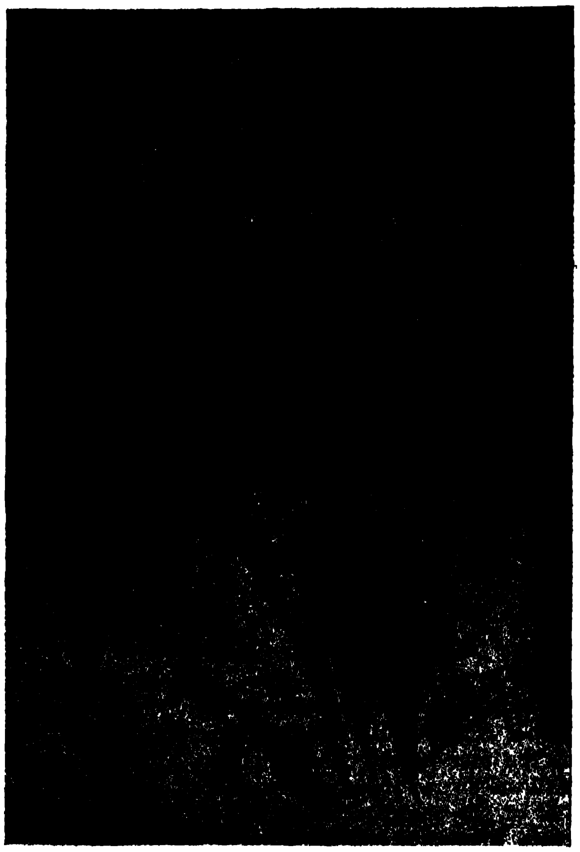
> "It is written in iron upon the sky, > iron of the pitshaft, dark in a drizzle of rain;
> hieroglyph of man's will against high heaven
> it is written."

Yet few poems are perfect in themselves, with that satisfying unity of thought, feeling and form which makes of criticism an insolent intrusion. Perhaps indeed "Tenement" is the only exception, despite the slight deterrent that it embroiders a comparison which is by no means new.



Intellectualism, sensitiveness in perception, and unusual impulse of feeling (not always too firmly held in check) make up the driving forces of Horace Shipp's poetry. And if at times, detrimental to his own originality, he is in manner somewhat too reminiscent of Humbert Wolfe, it is little more than saying that he belongs to a certain school in the same way that Coleridge belonged to the same school as Wordsworth or D. G. Rossetti to the same school as William Morris.

Herbert E. Palmer.

THE GLORY THAT WAS GREECE.

The American invasion is not confined to tourists and the films; books now cross the Atlantic, and Messrs. J. M. Dent have a flair for the significant. To their excellent library of Greek Thought they have added this book by Miss Edith Hamilton,* which might well serve as a general introduction to Greek modes of thought, speech and art, literary, sculptural, theatrical and architectural. Such themes of themselves attract the book-lover, but when presented, as by Miss Hamilton, in a style of great charm, albeit at times redolent of American idiom (e.g. "jumps to the eye," "a political pull," etc.), they gain a new allure. Her knowledge of Greek literature is ample and accurate and her renderings of the passages from the classics are bright and fresh, clipped at times for a world in a hurry, but never smelling of the lamp.

Big subjects are handled deftly and with a sparkle. Greek architecture is contrasted with that of Egypt and India, as a key to the Greek spirit: the clear, crisp, balanced speech of Attica is compared with the more flowery and ornate diction of a Shakespeare and a Milton: the daring questing spirit, free as a bird, of the Greek is expressive of his liberty of speech and the parent of the modern scientific mentality with its search for fact. Plato is drawn upon for his pictures of the life, leisured and intellectual, of the Athenian citizen, in a time of glory. Comedy, ancient, modern, French, Gilbertian, is put alongside of Aristophanes, and much fun is found as well as keen insight by ranging Savoy operas with Shakespeare and the ribald Aristophanes. The three tragedians, Æschylus, Sophocles and Euripides, are dealt with, and the essence of "the joy at the heart of pain" which is the life-blood of tragedy is distilled, with extracts from Aristotle's Poetics, Hegel and Schopenhauer—and W. M. Dixon. A higher flight is sought when Miss Hamilton essays to define the distinction between mind and spirit: we keep nearer the ground when she takes Euripides as typical of the modern mind and, with American boldness, ventures to contrast the ancient way of thought, with its eye for "beauty, absolute, simple and everlasting" (Plotinus), with our foggier views of relativity.

Mr. Horace Shipp.

From a drawing by Flora Kendrick.

Such a book will compel one to open afresh the old world's literature, and many a book besides, and it is none the worse for coming from the land of scare head-lines, skyscrapers and Fords. Would that the American printers kept "the Greek way" of spelling koina instead of koiua, Theætetus for Thealetus, and quoted Browning properly (vide p. 85).

R. B. H.

* "The Greek Way." By Edith Hamilton. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

DOWN THE SKY.*

Another "entertainment" from Mr. E. V. Lucas! What could be more delightful and exhilarating than the gossipy story of everyday life and people that flows from his ever amusing, ever tolerant pen?

> ". . . how often you and I > Had tired the sun with talking and sent him down the sky," he quotes from William Cory; but if the sun tires, the reader won't, for here is Jenny Candover again, with her adoring Richard, and an undesirable and undesired husband well in the background. Of Jenny, of incidents and people associated with her, Richard can and does talk unwearyingly; but he is always ready to branch off on to something else: cricket, or the next world, or novels and novelists; any subject aroused by a wandering thought or, more usually, by somebody he happens to meet or sit next to at dinner. "What fun, I have often thought," he says, "to have an hotel and tell the truth! How it would spike the guns of the angry guests to agree with their

* "Down the Sky." By E. V. Lucas. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)

indictments! 'Yes, you are right about the meat. We never buy anything but the cheapest varieties. We are out entirely for profit. The butter is as indifferent as you allege. That notice about it coming from our own farms is bunkum; it comes from the Waste Deposits Co.'"

And then the story of the argument in the train: "I remember once, in the days when I lived in London and had a season ticket, being in a carriage full of argumentative and speculative men. Something in the papers had started them discussing the future state, and each one expressed an opinion as to what and where that would be—adding that naturally it was a subject where only hope and vagueness could prevail. Then came the turn of a little silent man in the corner, hiding behind his pipe—and I always think his answer was model—' And what do you say, Johnson,' he was asked, 'where are you going?' 'I'm going to Paddington,' he said."

Richard's conversations with the modern young woman who was writing a novel about Life, and the modern young man who was engaged on "an exposure of some of the worst shams and rottennesses we subscribe to," have sparkling cynicism; likewise the conversation with the man who was separated from his wife because she liked fresh air and he didn't—"incompatibility of temperature was their only trouble." Incidentally this man proved to be Jenny's husband, but he only comes into the entertainment once again to obligingly die out of it, after Jenny has been ill and has gone to Ceylon to recuperate, attended by her faithful Richard. If you have read "Windfall's Eve" you will not need to be urged to read "Down the Sky," because it is a sequel and all that a sequel should be.

A. A.

A POETIC ROLL-CALL.*

Mr. Henry Arthur Kellow is head master of Rockhampton Grammar School, Queensland. He is a kindly critic and patient historian. He needs both kindliness and patience because his material ranges from middling to deplorable. He surveys the seventy years of song which is the poetic lifetime of Queensland, and like a good modern schoolmaster seldom does more than shake an admonishing forefinger at the worst of them. Perhaps his unkindest cut of all is to quote such gems as the following:

> "Twas money built the cottage walls, but mother made the home.'
>
> "The nurse were a-lyin' sideways—
> half on, half off the bed;
> they had left her legs and body > and had took away her head."

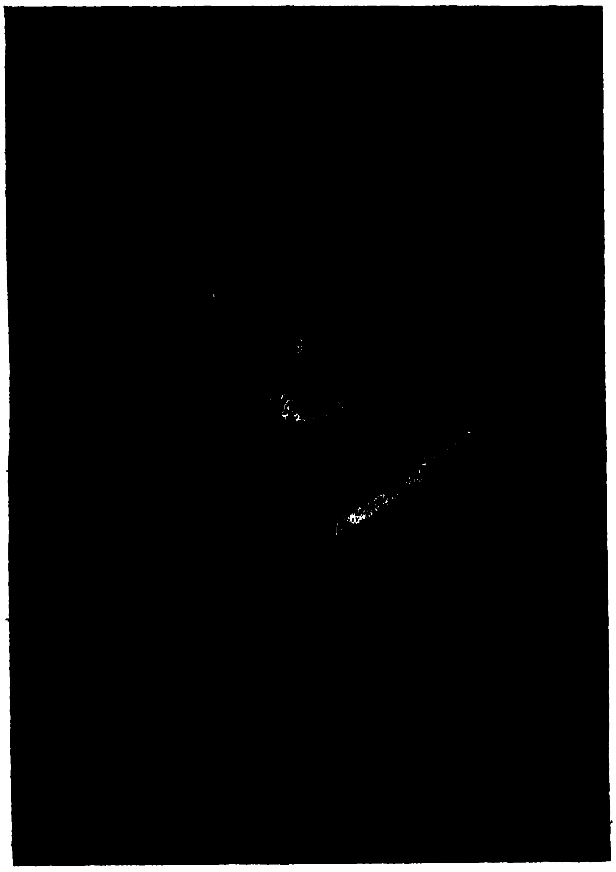
It is only fair to add that Mr. Kellow does not quote these as good examples of Queensland's poetic art. But he quotes them. And he does not laugh. Now quite half of the book discusses seriously the work of poets who have contributed things only a little better than this to the negligible sum of Queensland verse. Obviously therefore this book is a labour of love inspired by the same kind of local patriotism which produces privately-subscribed-for histories, biographies and sketches of persons and places of more or less importance in their day. Nevertheless the job has been well done. It is doubtful if it needed doing, but if it did then, like a certain darker deed, "t'were well it were done quickly." Mr. Kellow has not done it quickly enough. We could have spared three-quarters of his book—because of the poor quality of his material.

Mr. Kellow says that the three great names in Queensland verse are Brunton Stephens, Essex Evans and William Baylebridge. The quoted work of the first two is interesting, but scarcely interesting enough to make us wish for more. The greatest of these is William Baylebridge, the only one of the three still living. Judging from the extracts which Mr. Kellow gives he is also the only Queensland poet whose work may have a life beyond his own.



* "Queensland Poets." By Henry Arthur Kellow. 12s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

He has a definite point of view and copiousness. He is vigorous and musical. There is fundamental brainwork in his poetry. Almost the quotations from Baylebridge's work justify the addition of "poet" to the title of Mr. Kellow's book. Truly, as says the Talmud, "a single just man suffices to save the world, and were there but one just man the universe would deserve to have been created for his sake." Mr. Baylebridge is Queensland's saviour poetically.

Frederick Markham.

ENGLISH MONASTERIES IN THE MIDDLE AGES.*

Mr. Palmer's inquiry into the English mediæval monasteries approaches the subject from a fresh—an architectural angle. It outlines the origins, characteristics and customs of the Monastic Orders, and indicates how between them they offered an appropriate environment to all temperaments and talents. If a man were a student or an artist, he would be attracted to the Benedictines or the Cluniacs, if his interests were in farming he would incline to the Cistercians (though even a Benedictine flock like the ten thousand sheep at Gloucester in 1306 would gladden his shepherd's heart), if he were a recluse or a mystic there was the cell and the silence of the Carthusians. The monastery was an organism, and in these pages is sketched its constitution under abbot or prior, and the various officers, the "obedientiarii," who presided over the different departments. All this however is only preliminary to Mr. Palmer's main purpose. It is not how the monks spent their daily life, but where, that is his chief concern. He approaches the subject as an architect whose business is with the monastic buildings, and especially with their development under pressure of monastic custom.

General von Seeckt.

From 'Thoughts of a Soldier,' by General von Seeckt (Ernest Benn).

There was first of all the church which the monks were to serve. The primary requisite here was the quire, the germ of the monastic church. The quire provided a place wherein the members of the monastery might perform without disturbance their first duty of the recitation of the Canonical Hours. But of scarcely less importance was the arranging accommodation for the altars of the almost innumerable Saints who, to the mediæval mind, represented in a more personal and approachable form the various aspects of Deity. The cruciform plan provided in its eastern limb a place for a quire devoted to the monks, with a presbytery at whose extremity was enthroned in solitary splendour the High Altar. The nave provided the laity or the lay brethren with a church containing its own altar before the rood. The transepts offered facilities for additional chapels. The long circuit of presbytery, transept, cloister and nave in procession on Sundays and Feast Days afforded the mediæval love of ceremonial full opportunity for its display. In the development of a plan to satisfy these requirements, sound construction, sentiment and convenience were allied, and the idea that the sentimental or symbolic consideration prevailed cannot be entertained. Mr. Palmer traces this development under the influence of special needs and in accordance with the ideals and circumstances of the various Orders. In Pilgrim churches, as at Canterbury, the plan was affected by the enormous numbers of devotees visiting the shrine of a popular saint, which made considerations of control imperative. Of particular interest is Mr. Palmer's chapter on the Cistercian Church, the early plan of which was the natural outcome of a regime which emphasised simplicity of life. The Cistercians were to fall into line later, but in their new extended quires they adhered to the square east end, by their persistent and energetic use of which they exercised their definite influence upon English building.

In the same way is treated the Cloister, with again a special reference to the points of departure from the normal of the Cistercian plan. Next we come to the extra claustral buildings. Finally, there are interesting chapters on "The Master Mason" and "The Building of a Monastery," in the latter of which we note what Mr. Palmer has to say about Craft Gilds. "Much," he remarks, "has been written, even recently, about the 'ancient gild idea,' assuming that all the work on a great building was done in workshops and studios grouped about the sites by enthusiastic gilds who worked as a body, whose sole aim was to vie with each other in beauty of work, and whose members participated in a profit-sharing scheme; that 'unemployment was unknown,' and that the craft gilds worked with 'unabated delight' for years at a time. Such a theory cannot for a moment be sustained if facts are referred to. No gild undertook work as a corporate body, any more than a trade union as a whole could execute a contract to-day. But for the absence of the 'general contractor' and his organisation, work was carried out much as it would be now. Work on the fabric was organised and supervised by the authorities of the abbey or cathedral, who paid the cost of materials and the wages of their workpeople."

Mr. Palmer's fascinating volume, it ought to be added, is well and copiously illustrated.

D. S. Meldrum.

* "English Monasteries in the Middle Ages: An Outline of Monastic Architecture and Custom from the Conquest to the Suppression." By R. Liddesdale Palmer. 24s. (Constable.)

Novel Notes.

STAYING WITH RELATIONS. By Rose Macaulay. 7s. 6d. net. (Collins.)

Once give Miss Rose Macaulay the idea of sending her heroine to stay with relations at their hacienda in remote Guatemala, and her ready mind becomes busy with the possibilities and the details of the plot. The grouping together of people in a family provides just that setting for amusing situations and satirical comedy in which her

BOOKS TO BUY IN OCTOBER

Specially selected by the respective Publishers

genius as a novelist finds scope. The first chapter contains the invitation from Aunt Belle to her niece. Certainly, thought Catherine, after reading it, she would visit her aunt and her new uncle by marriage, and her step-cousins, at the Hacienda del Capitan, Perdido, Guat., C.A. She loved her little Philadelphian aunt, and she was fascinated by the idea of the old Spanish monastery built after the Conquest out of a Maya palace in a tropical jungle. The old Spanish monastery and the tropical jungle live up to our expectations of them. One of the cousins, Isie, is kidnapped by Indians, and there is a treasure hunt for jewels to secure her ransom. If this book is not going to make anyone forget " Dangerous Ages " and " Told by an Idiot," it yet is authentic Rose Macaulay. Where it does not greatly succeed is in its presentation of character. None of the people, with the exception of Aunt Belle, become very real. They are adequate enough as mouthpieces for their author's ideas, and they provide her with good situations, but they do not succeed in acquiring a personality of their own. Indeed in one case, that of Mr. Phipps and Mr. Piper, we are in some confusion as to which is which. Still, with these indicated shortcomings, the book is a new Rose Macaulay, and that is enough for most people who are making up library lists.

THE GREEN VALLEY. By Norman Giles. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

This comedy of Dutch life in South Africa is a well constructed and interesting study of two farmers, their families and their black servants. The farmers—Servaas de Roubaix and Melt van Taak—are fine, efficiently drawn examples of a powerful class which slowly and unwillingly is giving place to men—generally their sons—with more up-to-date ideas. Servaas has grown the green grape for country wine; his son Vaas would travel and see how vineyards are managed in Australia and in Europe. The old man is much opposed to this opening out; what was good enough for him should be good enough for Vaas, and it shows the excellence of Mr. Norman Giles' psychology that although after a good deal of trouble the young man is allowed to go, his father's attitude to things new remains the same. Of less importance are the humorous scenes which show the relations between black and white. Bekkje, the black woman, who is worshipped by all her kind because she is so fat, has a possession unusual among these people—a bed! The bed, she being in debt, is forfeit to her employer, and very amusing are the intrigues of husband and brother to regain possession of this desirable piece of furniture. These intrigues subtly affect the unconscious whites, who find themselves quarrelling without sufficient cause, and who innocently blame themselves for troubles their servants have brought about. It has been a pleasure to read this competently written story.

KEITH OF KINELLAN. By Agnes Mure Mackenzie. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

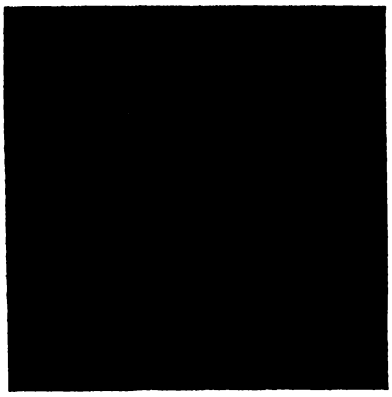
This is the fullest and most satisfying novel that Dr. Agnes Mackenzie has given us, and we venture to think that it will prove the turning-point in her literary career. Discerning readers already know her quality, but in this book she makes a wider and bolder appeal without sacrificing any of the attractions of her earlier work—the subtle characterisation, the delicate description and the scholarly choice and manipulation of words. " Keith of Kinellan " is a story of absorbing interest, the record of a great passion finely and understandingly written. Too late Gilbert Keith realised the mistake of his early marriage, and was swept off his feet by his love for his cousin, Anne Ogilvie. Such a theme has necessarily its tragic issues, but Dr. Mackenzie has skilfully steered it into a quiet haven at last. Much of the pleasure of the book however resides in the lesser happenings by the way, and in the skilful portrayal of many sides of Scottish life. The description of the house of Kinellan is a magnificent setting for a tale of turbulent and full-blooded passion.

THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS. By O. Douglas. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Nobody can excel Miss Douglas in discovering the maximum amount of interest and humour that belongs to the commonplace. The people in her stories are the ordinary, pleasant people one is likely to meet anywhere; she has little use for the dramatic, none at all for melodrama, yet her story holds one by the naturalness of its characters and the importance of their inconspicuous lives. The Fife village of Kirkmeikle, with its staid old houses and beautiful harbour, has a community of friends who meet and take tea in each other's drawing-rooms, and gossip, although not maliciously, about their neighbours and local events. And it is surprising how engrossing the details of their everyday affairs become, how intimately we know each one long before the end of the story: Mrs. Heggie, Mrs. Jameson, Joan, Lady Jane Rutherford and her daughter Nicole, and Althea, the hard and cold, at war with life because her youth has been spoilt by the divorce of her father and mother. It is all told as only Miss Douglas can tell it, with a lively sense of comedy and a large-hearted charity toward mankind.

A LITTLE FLUTTER. By Ernest Bramah. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

A misanthropic and sardonic uncle liberated Peter Coppinger from office drudgery by leaving him a fortune on the condition that he undertook the oversight of his aviaries and conducted ornithological research. This was hard on Peter, whose only knowledge of birds was when they appeared on the table. However he bluffed his way bravely until the arrival was announced of the unique Patagonian Groo-Groo. Happily it had died on the voyage and Peter did wonders with its skin, in which an escaped convict found a home from home. The fun waxes fast and furious when scientists began to arrive to see the marvellous bird, and Peter and the convict had marvellous escapes from detection. From beginning to end it is an excellently devised farce and Mr. Bramah has contrived to graft on it a very happy love-story. Peter's convict, a model of gratitude, was able by his professional skill to free his benefactor from the trammels of the embarrassing will, and the remains of the Groo-Groo disappeared in a timely fire.



BLACK SOIL. By Josephine Donovan. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)

This charming and colourful novel deals with the simple lives of American pioneers in Idaho, fighting amidst tragedies and disappointments to wrest a fortune from the desolate and sparsely populated land. The story is built around Tim and Nell Connor and their family, who make good after a severe struggle when the railroad brings success and civilisation nearer. There is also a romantic sub-plot of Sheila, a girl adopted by the Connors and, unknown to herself, of Indian blood. The strength of " Black Soil " is in its quiet realism and its convincing gallery of living, humble, human folk against the stark prairie atmosphere. Nell Connor stands out a hopeful and determined woman, a contrast to the more placid wives of the German settlers and her own impracticable but sturdy Tim. The novel has another interest. The Stratford Company of Boston, Mass., awarded " Black Soil " a first prize of $2,000 in their competition for the best novel dealing with Catholic life. The religious note in the book is not forced or controversial, but descriptive: the reader sees and feels religion was a force in the lives of these plucky and stubborn men and women.

WINDIER SKIES. By Mary Howard. 7s. 6d. (John Long.)

Pat Burns was afraid of what life might bring her; afraid she might have to grow old working in a city office; that was why, in spite of her dreams and her longings, she sacrificed romance for security and became engaged to a man she did not really love. She knew that one cannot have both safety and adventure, and while her instinct sought safety, her spirit thirsted for adventure. The story shows how she tried to compromise —and failed. As a first novel, "Windier Skies" has outstanding qualities; Pat, working in a city office, going home to her mother, sisters and brother, is a real person, vital, intelligent, alarmingly modern. The background of home and office are done with extraordinary skill; the people with whom she comes in contact are as real as herself, and the story has a rich vein of humour running through it. So wholesome and likeable is Pat in the earlier part of the book that we regret her moral lapses later on, and it is because of its realistic and amusing pictures of the everyday life of a London office girl that the book stands out as vivid, lively and delightfully spontaneous.

Miss Mary Howard.

The Bookman's Table.

SWALLOWS AND AMAZONS. By Arthur Ransome 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape)

Was there ever a child who did not yearn for a desert island and a ship in which to sail to it? And were there ever such lucky children as John, Susan, Titty and Roger, who had both island and ship and the whole delicious adventure of camping out and cooking their own food, without any real danger or discomfort? The island was in a lake close to where they lived, so that mother (who was just the sort of mother everyone would like to have) could come across now and then and see for herself that they were safe and sound. The excitement began in earnest when two girls came along in another boat and claimed the camp as theirs; and then there was Captain Flint and his parrot, and other exciting things. This is a book of most gorgeous make-believe; though it is quite different, it reminds one of Richard Jefferies' "Bevis," and both grown-ups and children will thoroughly enjoy it.

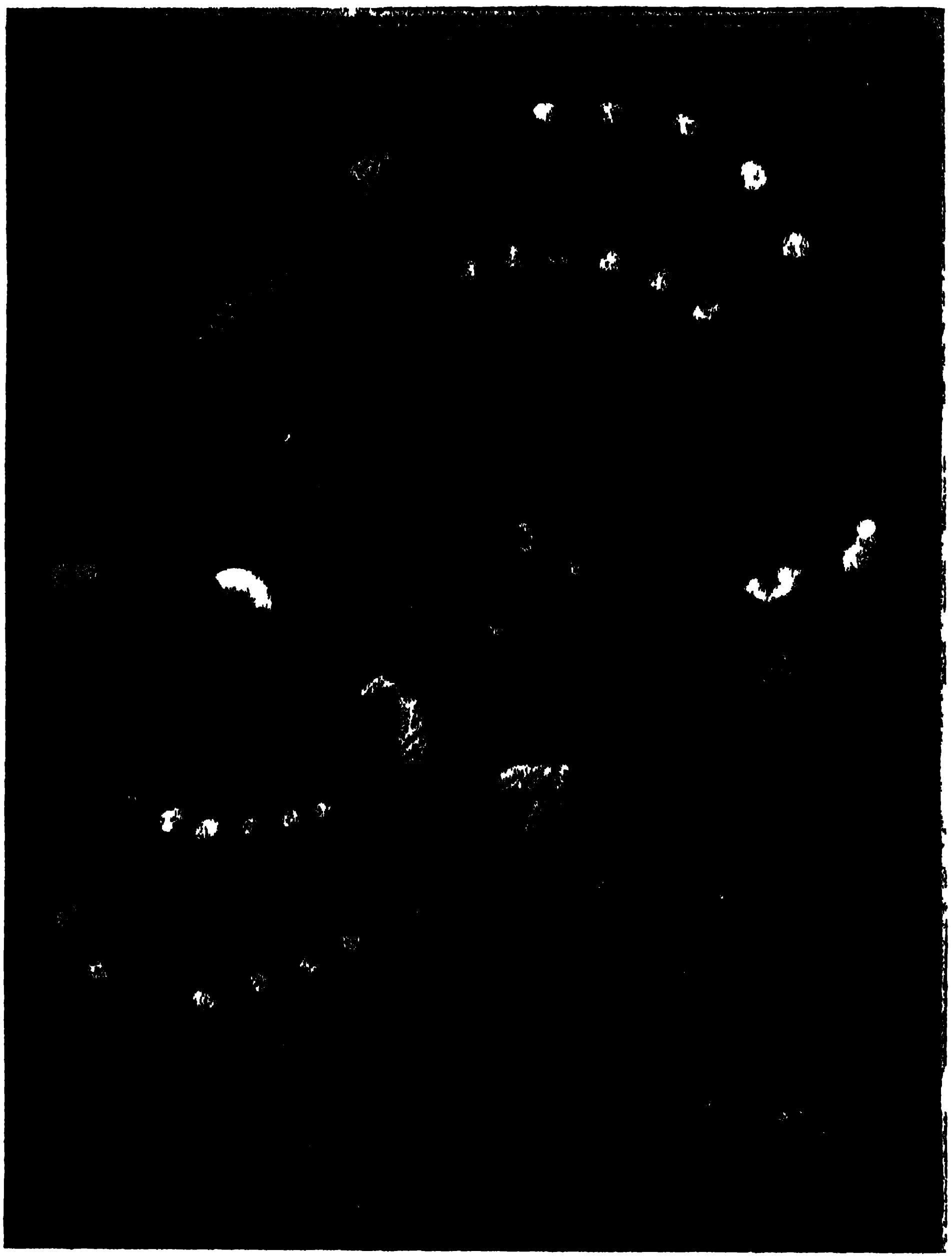
THE APOLOGY OF SOCRATES: THE GREEK TEXT OF PLATO. Edited and translated by Edward Henry Blakeney. 30s. (Scholartis Press)

Mr Blakeney is very modest about his edition of the great speech which Plato put into the mouth of his master. "Scholars and advanced students," he says, "will find little or nothing in this book to compel attention." But the most advanced of scholars, if he be also a man of taste, will delight in it, if only for the beauty of the Greek type in which the text has been printed at the University Press of Glasgow. From cover to cover indeed the whole volume is a fine piece of book production. Nor are its contents unworthy of its appearance. Praise of the famous original would be superfluous, but Mr. Blakeney's translation calls for commendation. The nervous force, simplicity and dignity of the Greek have been reproduced in English which is always true to the native idiom. Mr. Blakeney's introductory and elucidatory notes are also excellent. At once informative and suggestive, they furnish the reader who, while not altogether ignorant of Greek philosophy and Greek history, has no specialised knowledge of them, with just what he needs to enable him to appreciate the finer points of the oration, whether he read it in Plato's own words or in Mr. Blakeney's version of them. Above all, they are the work of one who is no pedant but a true humanist. They display a wide range of reading in modern as well as in ancient literature, among the poets as well as among the philosophers. Thus in the few lucid pages which are devoted to the course of Greek thought from Thales down to Socrates himself, we find Tennyson, William Watson, Mrs. Browning, Shakespeare, Sir Thomas Browne, Wordsworth and Milton aptly quoted; so that, however small our Greek, we do not feel that we are wholly barbarians.

MY EXPERIENCE AS A MINER. By Count Alexander Stenbock-Fermor. Translated by Frances, Countess of Warwick. 5s. net. (Putnams.)

In a short foreword Mr. James Maxton, M.P., writes hopefully of the "educational value" of this vivid and moving book. The point need not be stressed; all good writing has its educational value. Count Stenbock-Fermor belonged to a Livonian family, ruined in the Russian revolution and settled in Germany. For a year—1922-3—he worked as a miner in the Ruhr district, under French occupation, and in these pages are set down the "personal impressions, the occurrences and experiences of this time." It is a singularly clear record of an exceedingly unpleasant time. The author neither exaggerates the misery nor idealises the company. He writes with sympathy and understanding of his fellow miners, who very soon know him as "Alex" or "the count" or "the little count"; he explains with no waste of words, and with no tiresome elaboration of detailed scientific jargon, the nature of the work in its various branches. Portraits of his comrades of the mine are drawn skilfully, so that we get to know the communist Jacob, the hunchback engine-driver, who called "old fat swine" at his father Martin because the latter hated all politics and agitations, (for him only one world existed, that of his stomach); and above all Heinrich, the revolutionary idealist. Jacob "in spite of his bloodthirsty views was kind-heartedness personified," but Heinrich—with his wife and family, Heinrich who lived for "the cause," the cause of the proletariat, and was as generous as he was fanatical—is the conspicuous figure. Many and long are the discussions between Heinrich and the count on art, religion, and the communism that is to supersede the present era, but the talk is never tedious. It was Heinrich's wife who "all of a sudden in the middle of a sentence" got up and putting her hands on the count's shoulders said softly, "Can we really understand one another? You come from an altogether different world." Strike and lock-out occur in that twelve month at the Ruhr, hardships and good companionship, savagery and hunger, quarrels, drunkenness, brutality, tyranny, accidents, riots—all have their place in Count Stenbock-Fermor's story. But by the author's goodwill and the resolute determination to stick to the truth the horrors are not piled up and, without blinking the facts, the taste for the obscene is not gratified. Lady Warwick's translation is admirably done.

SUFFOLK AND NORFOLK. By M. R. James, O.M., Litt.D., F.B.A., F.S.A., Provost of Eton. Illustrated with 100 drawings by G. E. Chambers, F.S.A., and 24 photographs. 5s. (Dent.)



Here is a comprehensive study of Suffolk and Norfolk from the time of primitive man, who is said to have dwelt in these regions half a million years before Christ. In few parts of England does the past survive so potently as in East Anglia, and Dr. James has explored the many parishes and collected an astounding quantity of little known information which will appeal not only to the student, but to all interested in England and English history. Besides Mr. Chambers's beautiful drawings there are many fine photographs and some excellent maps, and the book

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
OCTOBER, 1930.

From a drawing by LEO BATES.

JOSEPH SIMPSON

From "CHINESE ART"
By WILLIAM COHN
(Studio).

See page 94

LID OF A BOX. PHŒNIXES (FÊNG HUANG).
Lacquer painting, gold, mother of pearl inlay—Ming Period. State Museum, Berlin (Department of Far Eastern Art).

is a treasury of knowledge that must have required much research as well as an intimate acquaintance with the two counties. It will undoubtedly be a standard work and as such deserves, and will receive, the warmest appreciation.

THE STORY OF A SURGEON. By Sir John Bland-Sutton. 12s. 6d. (Methuen.)

The eminent surgeon who here gives us his reminiscences is nothing if not thorough in any task he assumes, and here provides us with the comprehensive, precise and absorbingly interesting survey of a career any Englishman might be proud of. His father was "what is commonly called in villages a Naturalist." Himself, "the smallest and weakliest" of seven children, was left much to his own devices in his early days, but "the surroundings in which I lived were such as to make a boy interested in natural history." His father "had a local reputation for grafting fruit trees and rose trees, extracted children's teeth, stitched wounds and charmed warts from the hands and fingers of boys and girls. All sorts of curious natural history specimens were brought to him, such as leverets with two heads, rats and rabbits with overgrown incisor teeth, chicks and ducklings with extra wings or legs, albino birds and moles." He watched his father skinning a partridge, and inquired what the hole in the skull was through which the spinal cord passed to the brain. "The great occipital hole or foramen" was the answer that supplied the future surgeon's first lesson in anatomy, quickly to be followed by similar acquaintance with the elements of physiology, toxicology and even euthanasia, and before this earnest student's schooldays were over his vocation was an idée fixe. There were practical difficulties in the way, but dogged determination enabled him to save the requisite fees from meagre earnings as a school teacher, and in 1878, at the age of twenty-three, he was admitted a student of the Middlesex Hospital Medical School. With that great institution his career was to be bound up in the most intimate way for fifty years, a period synchronising with the transformation of surgery from conditions almost of mediævalism (the account of operating methods in vogue in the seventies is quite horrifying) to the perfection of modern practice. For a quarter of a century now Sir John has been at the top of his professional tree, his reputation and industry earning for him the wherewithal to gratify tastes that range from tropical travel to the construction of Persian dining courts in his town house. Whether discussing "shop" or his varied intellectual hobbies, he writes entertainingly. His book is suitably and plentifully illustrated with his own photographs.

THE CHASTE MISTRESS. By Constance Hagberg Wright. 7s. 6d. (John Lane.)

"On Friday, April 10, 1779, I had been present at the trial of the unfortunate Mr. Hackman, who, in a fit of frantic jealous love, had shot Miss Ray, the mistress of a nobleman." Thus James Boswell, in the spring of 1779. This novel, a trifle of just over two hundred pages, is vividly written, and recaptures the atmosphere of the period with the utmost fidelity. The story upon which the book is based is well known, of course, to readers of the social history of the eighteenth century, and to those who dabble in the annals of crime. A young ensign, James Hackman, fell in love with Martha Ray, the youthful daughter of a London stay-maker, who became the mistress of John Montagu, fourth Earl of Sandwich. Hackman fell in love with the girl, abandoned the army for the Church, hoping to better his financial position, begged her again and again to marry him. Finally, in a fit of jealous rage, he shot her as she was leaving Covent Garden Theatre. It is a simple story, but admirably cast into the form of fiction by Mrs. Hagberg Wright, who turns what was in fact a sordid business into a very interesting romance.

Books of the Month.

From August 12th to September 12th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

What a different reception this book would have had ten or eleven years ago! Twelve years ago MRS. FISCHER'S WAR, by Henrietta Leslie (7s. 6d.; Jarrolds), would have been censored for daring to portray a German gentle and affectionate, but with so genuine an attachment to his own country that in stress of war it overrides his love for the country of his adoption—England—and forces him into the tragic position of fighting for Germany while his wife is in England and his own son in the British ranks. The story is told from the standpoint of that gallant, unfortunate wife, English by birth, yet treated as an alien in her own land; loving her husband, yet having to hear him spoken of as an enemy, and reviled by their son. Humiliated, suspected, debarred from working and from social intercourse, Janet Fischer comes valiantly through her ordeal, and we are sane enough in these days to realise the folly and cruelty and injustice of those times. The atmosphere of the war period is cleverly reproduced, and the story told simply, straightforwardly, without straining after effect.

Upon the life of John the Baptist, such as we know it in the New Testament, Mr. John Lindsey in THE VOICE OF ONE (7s. 6d.; Chapman & Hall) sheds the light of imagination, showing the character of the man, etching into the background of his great mission details of a life which, when not actually authentic, are probable enough to carry conviction, and give movement and colour to the life of the period. John's doubts concerning his own teaching, his fear lest Christ may after all not be the true Messias, the conflicts with his natural desires, lend strength to the story and are intensely moving. John tortures himself with doubt, distressed because Christ's followers are all poor people. "He had all the very poor man's fear and respect for the rich, knowing how wealth can move the mountains which stand firm against the onslaughts of faith." Mr. Lindsey may have written the book in some seven weeks, as he states at the end, but it must have been the result of long and careful study, as well as shrewd psychological insight and a sympathetic understanding of human weakness and human strength.

A rousing story of Jacobite times, Miss Winifred Duke's new book, THE DROVE ROAD (7s. 6d.; Jarrolds), has for heroine a simple, honest little Scots girl who, in attempting to thwart her uncle's plots against the Pretender, finds herself married by a fluke to the man she loves and cruelly misunderstood by him. During Prince Charlie's perilous march southward and bitter retreat the affairs of the young couple get into a pretty tangle; they are beset with dangers and misunderstandings, and, being far apart and living in troublous days, are victims of rumours that put their faith in each other to a hard test. Miss Duke follows the old school of romance which so many writers of historical novels have abandoned nowadays, and in "The Drove Road" you may find all the usual elements of love and exciting adventure, with a happy ending to atone for the lovers' misfortunes.

Readers of Mr. John Oxenham's "God's Candle" will remember that its last chapter was a letter from the rich young Roman, Cornelius Pudens Flaccus, to his friend at Rome, Sergius Paulus Græcinus, in which he tells how he threw a stone at Jesus as He struggled along the Via Dolorosa and received from Him a look that shot right through him, deep into his very heart. Something of what he had learned of Jesus from John Mark and his mother Mary he tells his friend in that letter, which is reprinted as the first chapter of Mr. Oxenham's new book, THE SPLENDOUR OF THE DAWN (5s.; Longmans), which tells the story of the early days of Christianity in further letters of Cornelius to his friend. Through his friendship with John Mark he comes into the closest contact with the Nazarene's disciples, visits His home at Nazaret, and was there on the shore of Galilee when the Risen Master waited by the fire for the coming of His disciples to land. At all the events recorded by Luke in "Acts" he was present, a moved observer; finally telling of the day when, from a workshop in Nazaret, he and John Mark saw a weary man limping up the hill-path, and recognised him with fear clutching at their hearts, for it was Saul—Saul who can persuade some that he was now indeed the slave of Him whom once he had persecuted, but cannot persuade Cornelius or John Mark who, though he ultimately forgave, could never forget what Saul had been. There the book ends, save for an epilogue that tells how at last Cornelius Flaccus came to Britain as Legate for the unruly province of Flavia Cæcariensis, dying at last at Camalodunum, loved for his Christlike ways even by the wild and obstinate ones among whom his lot was cast. Mr. Oxenham's use of the stories of "Acts" is entirely uncritical—he even describes the happening at Pentecost as an actual gift of the power to speak in other languages—but though the reader may wonder at his naïveté, it is impossible to be other than charmed by the simplicity and reverent restraint with which he has done his work. It deserves the popularity it is sure to have.

ART

STUDIO.—Modern Masters of Etching: Robert Austin, R.E. Malcolm C. Salaman.—Thirty Years of British Art. Sir Joseph Duveen. 7s. 6d.

CRITICISM AND BELLES-LETTRES

DENT.—History of English Literature, A.D. 650–1914. E. Legouis and L. Cazamian. 18s.—The Greek Way. Edith Hamilton. 10s. 6d.—The Aldine Chapbooks. 6 vols. 1s. each.

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE.—Brown Studies. Ivor Brown. 7s. 6d.

HEINEMANN.—Loeb Classical Library. 5 vols. 10s. each.

HUTCHINSON.—The Diary and Correspondence of Henry Wellesley, First Lord Cowley: 1790–1846. 21s.

HERBERT JENKINS.—The Golden Phœnix. Mrs. Alfred Wingate. 7s. 6d.

METHUEN.—Traveller's Luck. E. V. Lucas. 6s.

FICTION

(Price 7s. 6d. each, except where otherwise indicated.)

ALLENSON—Caspar. Bertha L. Bowhay.

APPLETON.—The Rake and the Hussy. Robert W. Chambers.

GEOFFREY BLES.—The Museum Murder. John T. McIntyre.

BODLEY HEAD.—Quite Contrary. Paul Bloomfield. 6s.

THORNTON BUTTERWORTH.—Second Storm. Morris Sutherland.—A Hair Divides. Claude Houghton.

CASSELL.—A Little Flutter. Ernest Bramah.—Leave It to Susan. K. R. G. Browne.—One Flesh. Rosita Forbes.—The Day the World Ended. Sax Rohmer.

CHATTO & WINDUS.—The Back-To-Backs. J. C. Grant.—Roads to Glory. Richard Aldington.

COLLINS.—Masquerade. Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick.—The Calendar. Edgar Wallace.—Lamplight. May Edginton.—When Men A-Wooing Go. Katharine Haviland-Taylor.—The Folded Paper Mystery. Hulbert Footner.—The Body on the Floor. Nancy Barr Mavity.

CONSTABLE.—Old Ship. Lennox Kerr.

DENT.—The Lily of Fort Garry. Jane Rolyat.

NOEL DOUGLAS.—Syringa Street. Catherine Christian.—The Port of Fragrance. Putnam Weale.—Joe Pete. Florence E. McClinchey.

DUCKWORTH.—The Uncertain Traveller. John Fisher.

GOLLANCZ.—A Voyage to Purilia. Elmer Rice.—Trio. Phyllis Bentley.

JOHN HAMILTON.—Snow Blind. Albert M. Treynor.

HARRAP.—Elfwin. Fowler Wright.—The Pretender. Clifford Hosken.—Wife to Hugo. Joy Baines.

HODDER & STOUGHTON.—The Tenant of Smugglers' Rock. Harold Kent.—The Dark Stranger. Mrs. Victor Rickard.—Danger's Bright Eyes. Sydney Horler.—Late Spring. Peter Donovan.—The English Paragon. Marjorie Bowen.—The Trail to Paradise. Jackson Gregory—Naomi Godstone. Richmal Crompton.—Jimmy Dale and the Blue Envelope Murder. Frank L. Packard.—Heirs. Cornelia Cannon.

HURST & BLACKETT.—Siren Song. Robert Carse.

HUTCHINSON.—The Guillotine. M. J. Reynolds.—The Last Laugh. Winifred Graham.—The Brazen Confession. Cecil Freeman Gregg.—The Main Chance. H. Herman Chilton.—The Gossamer Dream. Ursula Bloom. 2s. 6d.—The Golden Plague. Wilfred C. Busse.—Quarrelsome Corner. "Rita."—The Mystery of Sett. Joan A. Cowdroy.—May and December. Sydney Walter Powell.—The Minion. Rafael Sabatini.

JARROLDS.—Souvenir. Floyd Dell.—Intimate Relations. Frederick Jackson.—Stained Radiance. J. Leslie Mitchell.—The Actor's Knife. Howel Evans. — Both Of This Parish. J. S. Fletcher.—Spleen. Olive Moore.—One Of Us is a Murderer. Alan Le May.

HERBERT JENKINS.—The Ordeal of Mark Bannister. Arthur Compton Rickett and Patrick Leyton.—Invicta. Melita Grayne.—The Happy Windmill. A. A. Thomson.—The Master of Fear. Charles Rushton. —The Weir Boyd Mystery. Sid. G. Hedges.—The Tides of Enchantment. Hector Hawton.—The Lusty Pal. Marion Cran.—The Romance of a Very Young Man. Winifred Boggs.—Winterton Hotel Mystery. James Corbett.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman.

Miss Ivy M. Clayton,

Author of "Outside Heaven's Gates."

See page 89.

KNOPF.—Not Without Laughter. Langston Hughes.

WERNER LAURIE.—A Soviet Marriage. Paul Trent.

JOHN LONG.—On the Night Express. Fred M. White. 6s.

LONGMANS.—Diamonds of Death. Hilda Willett.

SAMPSON LOW.—When the Gods Laughed. Leslie Roberts. —The Millionaire Tramp. Henry St. John Cooper.—The Office Wife. Faith Baldwin.—Man Hunt. L. A. Knight.

ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—The Power of Command. F. H. Shaw.—October's Child. Donald Joseph.

METHUEN.—Sea Loot. A. D. Divine.—High Fences. Grace S. Richmond.—Breakfast For Three. M. Bryant and G. H. McAnally. 3s. 6d.—The Furnace. Franz Schauwecker. 8s. 6d.

NASH & GRAYSON.—Evil Enchantment. M. Robertson.

NISBET.—The Story of Maryam. John Anthony.—There Is a Tide. Agnes Logan.

STANLEY PAUL.—The Terror of Torlands. T. C. H. Jacobs. —The Secret Attic. Frank R. Adams.—The Duke Steps Out. Lucian Cary.—The Executioner's Axe. Paul Lancaster.—Touchstone. Ben Ames Williams.

SKEFFINGTON.—Seven Suspects. Florence Ryerson and Colin Clements.—Chinese Blake. James W. Bennett. —Trackless Death. Armstrong Livingston.

STOCKWELL.—The House of Bread. Esther Roberts.—Pat. Donald Garthe.—Oh, Dearest Boy. Clare Binns.—Huon Belle. Charlotte I. Dick. 6s.

WATTS.—Roses and Kippers. W. Margrie.

WRIGHT & BROWN.—Adventure For Two. Arthur Applin. 6s.—Rain Before Wind. Frank Stafford.—Days of '50. Charles H. Snow.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND TRANSLATIONS

ALLEN & UNWIN.—The Forest of the Hanged. Siviu Rebreanu. 7s. 6d.

GEOFFREY BLES.—Grand Hotel. Vicki Baum. 7s. 6d.

BODLEY HEAD.—Red Lily. Anatole France.

THORNTON BUTTERWORTH.—Don Juan and Other Psychological Studies. Gonzalo R. Lafora.

DENT.—The Collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Edmund von Glaise-Horstenau. 25s.

KNOPF.—The Immoralist. André Gide. 7s. 6d.

WERNER LAURIE.—The Queens of Kungahälla. Selma Lagerlöf. 3s. 6d.

ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Christ Legends. Selma Lagerlöf. 8s. 6d.

MARTIN SECKER.—Philip Eulenburg: The Kaiser's Friend. 2 vols. Johannes Haller. 30s. each.—Claudia. Arnold Zweig. 7s. 6d.

SHEED & WARD.—The Thundering Abbot. Henri Bremond.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

PHILIP ALLAN.—Blenden Hall. J. G. Lockhart. 10s. 6d.

ERNEST BENN.—Lord James of Hereford. Lord Askwith. 21s.

CASSELL. — Joseph Fouché. Stefan Zweig. 15s. — The Decline of Merry England. Storm Jameson. 10s. 6d.—Saladin, Prince of Chivalry. Charles J. Rosebault. 12s. 6d.

CHAPMAN & HALL.—Procession of Lovers. Lloyd Morris. 15s.—Kow Tow. Princess Der Ling. 15s.

CONSTABLE.—Green Fields of England. Clare Cameron. 12s. 6d.—Arabian Peak and Desert. Ameen Rihani. 15s.

HEATH CRANTON.—An Englishman at Home and Abroad: 1792–1828. J. B. Scott. 10s. 6d.

PETER DAVIES. The Kitchener Armies. V. W. Germains. 7s. 6d.

DENT.—Vaino: A Boy of New Finland. Julia Davis Adams. 6s.—Amplion: or The Nineteenth Century. Dudley Harbron. 6s.

HARRAP.—France. Henry Dwight Sedgwick. 10s. 6d.

HEINEMANN.—King Spider. D. B. Wyndham Lewis. 21s.

HUTCHINSON.—Briand, Man of Peace. Valentine Thomson. 18s.—Women at Arms. Reginald Hargreaves. 12s. 6d.—Dominant Women. Philip W. Sergeant. 18s.

JARROLDS.—Through Unknown Africa. Willem Jaspert. 12s. 6d.—King Henry the Rake. Clement Wood. 12s. 6d.

HERBERT JENKINS.—Isles of Adventure. Beatrice Grimshaw. 15s.

KNOPF.—Black Manhattan. James Weldon Johnson. $2.50.

LONGMANS.—Sketches in Nineteenth Century Biography. Keith Feiling. 7s. 6d.—The Making of William Penn. M. R. Brailsford. 12s. 6d.

LUYAC.—Egyptian Civilisation. L. A. Waddell. 12s. 6d.

ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Makers of Modern Europe. Count Sforza. 21s.

SCRIBNERS.—Lone Cowboy. Will James. 8s. 6d.

SEELEY, SERVICE.—The Red Men of Nigeria. Captain Wilson-Hoffenden. 21s.

SELWYN & BLOUNT.—Nearing the End in Imperial Russia. George T. Marye. 18s.

SKEFFINGTON.—Danger River. Clyde Eddy. 18s.

WORLD DOMINION PRESS.—West Coast Republics of South America. Webster E. Browning. John Ritchie. Kenneth G. Grubb. 5s.

MISCELLANEOUS

PHILIP ALLAN.—The All Saints Almanack. 3s. 6d.

BALDING & MANSELL.—Ars Typographica.

ERNEST BENN.—Unorthodox Dialogues on Art and Education. C. E. M. Joad. 6s.

CHRISTOPHERS.—The Handbook of Cyprus. Sir Ronald Storrs and Bryan Justin O'Brien. 7s. 6d.

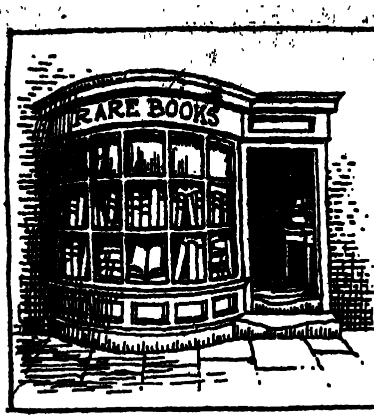
HEATH CRANTON.—A Year of Good Luck. Edith Brampton. 2s. 6d.

DENT.—A Handbook of the Latin Language. Walter Ripman. 10s. 6d.—Speech Craft. Elsie Fogerty. 3s. 6d.
NOEL DOUGLAS.—Divorce. Various Authors. 3s. 6d.
HARRAP.—Myths and Legends of the Australian Aboriginals. W. Ramsay Smith. 21s.
HUTCHINSON.—Can You Solve It? 2s. 6d.
SAMPSON LOW.—The Origins of Some Naval Terms and Customs. Lieut.-Comdr. R. G. Lowry. 3s. 6d.—Parachuting. Charles Dixon. 12s. 6d.
ELKIN MATHEWS & MARROT.—Business or Bankruptcy. Norman Tiptaft. 2s. 6d.—Careers for Women. Leonora Eyles. 5s.
MEDICI SOCIETY.—English Tapestries of the Eighteenth Century. H. C. Marillier. 12s. 6d.
DE LA MORE PRESS.—Ships and Shipping. E. P. Harnack. 7s. 6d.—A Trilogy of Victorian Saints. Isa J. Postgate. 3s. 6d.
CECIL PALMER.—Shakespeare Authorship. Gilbert Standen. 1s.
PITMANS.—Journalism As a Career. W. T. Cranfield. 5s.
RIDER.—The Modern Way to Health. Victor S. Davidson. 2s. 6d.
HAROLD SHAYLOR.—The Mystery and Lore of Apparitions. C. J. S. Thompson. 12s. 6d.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

DE LA MORE PRESS.—Gold Mohur Time. Cornelia Sorabje. 1s. 6d.
HENRY WALKER.—The Book of Martin Harvey. 10s.

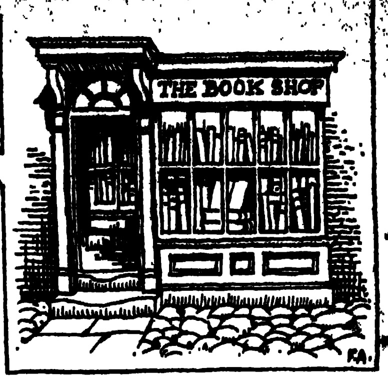
POETRY



ANGLO-AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS.—"A-Hunting" and Other Poems. Peter Williams. 1s.
JONATHAN CAPE.—The Best Poems of 1930. Thomas Moult. 6s.—Jewels of Song. W. H. Davies. 6s.
DE LA MORE PRESS.—Songs from the Compleat Angler. 2s.
DUCKWORTH.—Collected Poems, 1920–30. Alfred Gordon Bennett. 8s. 6d.
FOLK PRESS.—Songs of Salcombe and the West Country. R. J. Partridge.
HARRAP.—Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. 15s.
HATCHARDS.—The Moon For Company. Phyllis Howell. 2s. 6d.
MAYER (Calcutta).—Flashes. Colin E. Mayer.
MOWBRAYS.—The Divine Compassion. Father Andrew, S.D.C. 1s. 6d.
POETRY PUBLISHING CO.—The Dreamer and the Clay. Elizabeth A. Beilby. 6d.—Travel-Songs and Ballads. Margaret Ormiston. 2s. 6d.
STOCKWELL.—Wild Orchids. Leonora Brooke.—Thistledown. Jahtri. 1s.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

BURNS, OATES & WASHBOURNE.—Glimpses of Catholic England. T. S. Westbrook. 4s. 6d.
MOWBRAYS.—Parables and Precepts. Rev. James Wareham. 3s. 6d.—Evolution and Redemption. Walter J. Carey, D.D., Bishop of Bloemfontein. 1s. 6d.
PICKERING & INGLIS.—The Keswick Convention Report. 2s. 6d.—Concise Critical Comments. Robert Young. 6s.
PRIVATELY PRINTED BY AUTHOR.—Aids to the Study of the Historical Narratives of the Old Testament and Apocrypha. J. W. Povah. 6d.
SIMPKIN, MARSHALL.—So Send I You. Oswald Chambers. 2s. 6d.

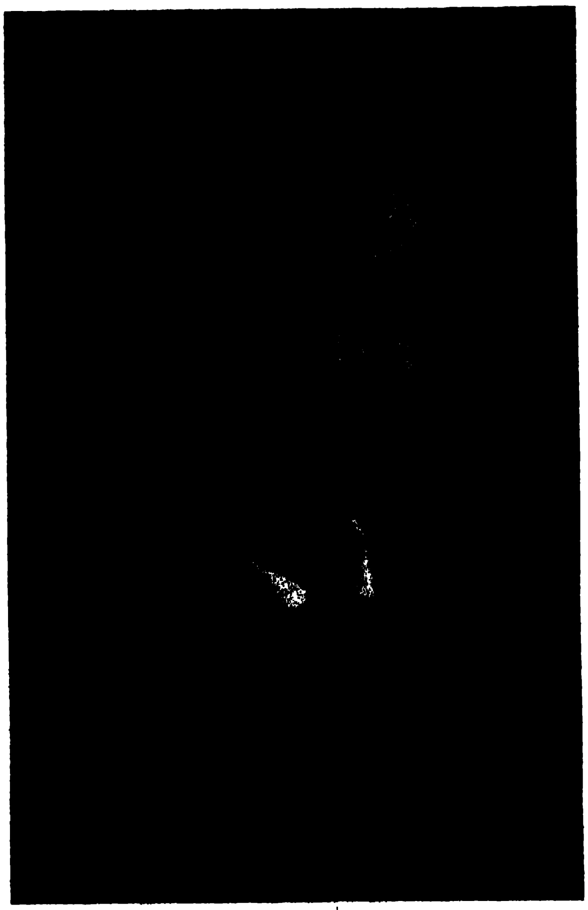


REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

BELL.—The Mechanism of Nature. E. N. da C. Andrade. 6s.
MEDICI SOCIETY.—Of the Imitation of Christ. Thomas à Kempis. 5s.—The Little Flowers of Saint Francis. 5s.—The Odyssey of Homer. S. H. Butcher and Andrew Lang. 25s.
NASH & GRAYSON.—The Empty House. Algernon Blackwood. 7s. 6d.

The COLLECTOR

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON



WHAT IS A FIRST EDITION?

SECOND ARTICLE.

LAST month I made some modest effort to tell of the simple things that distinguish a first edition. As I said, the ordinary first edition is indicated usually by the wording on the back of a title page, although in many cases there are other details to consider before actually coming to the conclusion that a book is or is not a first edition.

These are what we call "points." I do not like the word; but it covers the situation fairly well. You may possibly memorise these points if you are sufficiently busy in the matter of collecting, but even those of us who are concerned with the business for the greater part of our lives may well forget something of the utmost importance. A good memory is of course a most excellent thing. But I do not advise relying upon it. These articles which appear in "The Collector" section are expressly written for the genuine book collector, and therefore I strongly suggest that all the points connected with book-collecting should be noted, not only in the mind, but on a card. We may well come to know, without reference to any help, the general matters surrounding a first edition, but a particular point may escape us. Therefore an aid to memory is essential and desirable. I do not rely upon my memory; I have a carefully planned system which has always proved effective, and in some later article I will give the reader particulars of it.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Mr. Robert Graves.

And what are some of the much talked of "points" belonging to a first edition? I will deal with a few of them. Yet many books may each have some particular point about the first edition quite different from other works. Hence you will see how really important it is that you should have some method by which the special details may be recorded.

For instance (I am speaking generally), a first edition may be only a first edition if it is the first edition of the first issue. I do not quite see eye to eye with all these special considerations, but they seem to be the fashion, and we must I suppose accept them. Possibly the so-called first edition, the real first issue, may contain something, a very minute difference that was corrected in the printing. It may be just a single word on one of the pages. It might even be a trivial correction on the title page, or an alteration in the wrapper, purely unimportant. And yet that little change may make a difference of pounds between the prices of both. I have, in earlier issues of THE BOOKMAN, given some instances of this. And however much we may disagree with the custom, there it is, and we have got to accept it. Of course, when there is a real difference we may not cavil at it. There is the more or less recent case of Mr. Graves's noteworthy work, "Good-bye To All That," of which I have before spoken. The first issue of the first edition contains a poem which is omitted in subsequent editions. This is worth three or four times as much as the later "first edition." Why call it the first issue of the first edition I do not understand. Either it is or it is not the actual first edition. One might well carry this method to the extreme, and say that the only real first edition is that copy that was actually completed first! There you have the farcical side of first editions. However, in searching for the first editions of the books that are wanted, we must very carefully bear in mind these facts, among the many dozens that the collector must have before him before he makes his purchase.

There will not be room to deal with all the points in this article. I shall cover all the others in later articles. Before finishing this article I would like to emphasise another matter that is not always realised by the collector. The first edition of a book in its ordinary form—that is the regular, or what is sometimes called the library edition—is not necessarily the first edition, or at least that first edition which commands the highest price. The actual first edition may be in a limited form, published at possibly two or three guineas, in a larger form, on finer paper, and signed by the author. It may command a higher price, and probably does in most instances, than the ordinary edition. But even the latter may be of considerable value. Putting these points on one side, both the limited and the first ordinary edition may each be high-priced. A striking instance of this is to be found in Mr. Milne's " When We Were Very Young." A very small edition, you may remember, was printed of this in a limited form and signed by the author. It was priced at about, I think, a couple of guineas. A copy nowadays fetches anything between £50 or £60. During the high price period last year one had to pay £75 for it, when a copy was available. The first ordinary edition was then fetching £20 or so. It was published at but a few shillings.

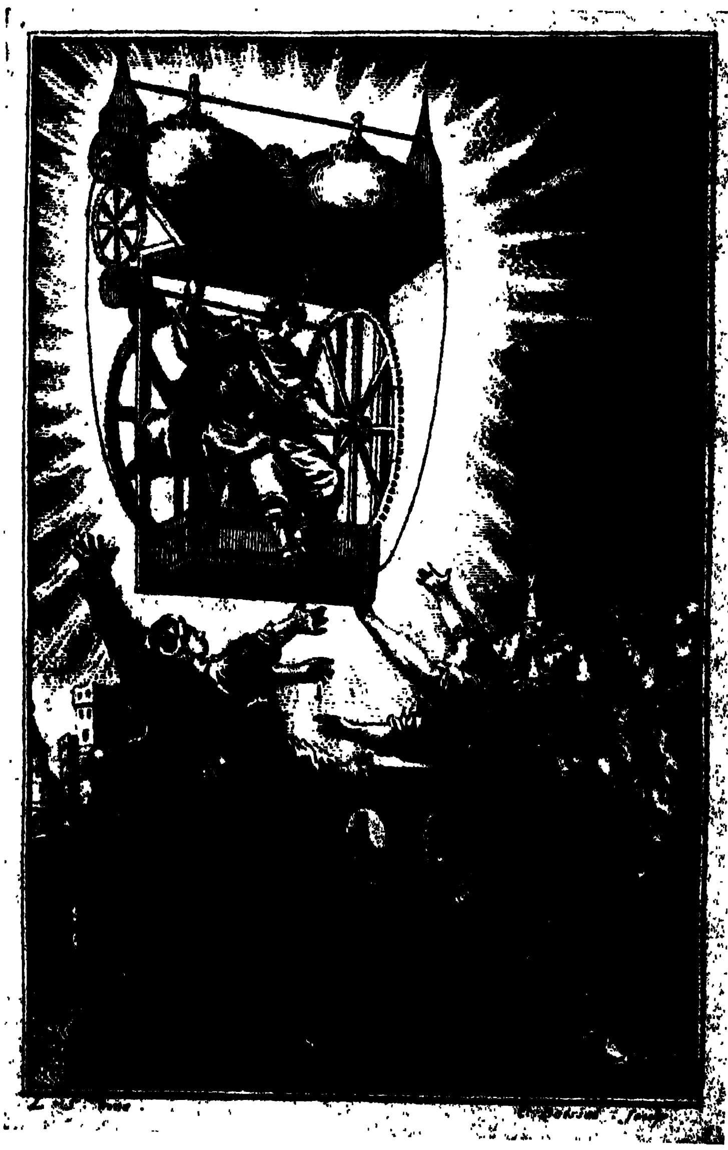
But all limited signed editions are not likely to enhance in price. In fact there have been so many of late that many of them have depreciated in price. It is well to consider carefully, in our peregrinations for first editions, whether we are buying a purely limited edition as such, or whether it is the actual first edition. If it is the latter, then it may well have a greater value than if it is merely a limited edition. I could give you many instances of where the ordinary edition of a book is the real first edition, the limited edition being a later issue. There is the case of Mr. Sassoon's " Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man," the limited edition of which was published much later than the first edition of the ordinary issue. In the case of some of Lord Dunsany's books, the first editions were the limited ones, and this is clearly shown on the back of the title pages of the ordinary editions. Here I might mention that both the editions of Mr. Galsworthy's " Forsyte Saga " have considerable value. The present market price of the limited signed one is still in the neighbourhood of £50, and the ordinary £12 to £15. This latter edition once reached £25, and will do so again, I think, and will go even higher as the market recovers itself.

A REMARKABLE CATALOGUE.



It is a most distinguished publication ; there is no other word for it. The publishers are Messrs. Gumuchian & Cie, of 112, Rue de Richelieu, Paris, and it is described as the " Catalogue de Reliures du XV au XIX Siècle." It is doubtful if so handsome a catalogue has been published in France for many years, and it is a production, both as to typography and bibliographic worth, of which both printers and publishers may be justly proud. This twelfth catalogue of Fine Bindings is most beautifully illustrated with a great number of reproductions of some of the finest examples of bindings extant. Several are in colour, and the preparation of the catalogue must indeed have taken a long time. A very helpful index has been included. Some of the books that are offered for sale run to thousands of francs. There is a 1543 item, for instance, priced at 75,000 francs. It is "Julii Solini Polyhistor," by Julius C. Solinus ; a very rare edition of the works of Pomponius Mela and Julius Solinus. There are close upon four hundred entries in this truly remarkable catalogue. Particulars of the binding in each case are given both in French and English. Only a thousand copies have been made of the ordinary edition, and one hundred on very special paper. I am sure the claim that it is one of the finest catalogues on the subject ever issued, is justified. Another feature that I shall find very helpful, from time to time, are the bibliographical notes on the subject of bindings.

VARIOUS CATALOGUES.

Writing at the end of the summer, I find not a few catalogues awaiting attention on my desk. One of my most pleasing experiences is the number of letters that come during the month expressing interest, to say the least, in the lists of those firms of whom correspondents had not previously known. This is exactly the kind of service that "The Collector" had planned to give. The book collector is increasing in numbers, and these catalogue notes are intended to give the fullest information on the matter, and to make known to the reader the names of those houses of whom heretofore the genuine book collector had not heard.

Readers might do well to ask Mr. Gilbert Jamieson to send his lists. There is always something good in them. I was very much attracted by a short list of works, by modern and nineteenth century authors, which reached me a day or two since. There were titles in this list that I wanted. The Jamieson list is a varied one. I was particularly attracted by such works as an interesting collection of many books by Mr. Brett Young, whom I have mentioned several times as decidedly worth collecting. In view of his increasing importance as a novelist, the prices at which his books are offered are moderate. Then there are a number of books by H. M. Tomlinson, Hugh Walpole, J. M. Barrie, Henry Williamson, A. E. Coppard, John Galsworthy and many others among the moderns. Among the authors of other days, I might mention Carlyle, Wilde, Lytton, Ruskin, Byron (several editions of his works), Wilkie Collins and George Eliot. A list worth getting, and the books are all guaranteed as in fine condition.

Frontispiece from La Follie (L. G. de)
Le Philosophe sans Prétention ou l'homme rare. Paris, 1775.
From Messrs. Maggs Bros.' Catalogue. No. 545.
Illustrating "The Evolution of the Airship and the Aeroplane."

Last month I referred to a very interesting catalogue that had been issued by Capell. More thought than ever before is being given to the preparation of catalogues relating in general to old and new books in what one might call the antiquarian class, and one of the most intelligent lists may be always found in the shop of Capell. A day or two since I received from this firm quite an excellent catalogue. Not a very long one, but an exceedingly good one: good in two ways. It contains a few hundred very choice items, and—this is always a fascination for me—it is very nicely produced. I am always a little disappointed with a list that contains a lot of good things offered us in a poor manner. This does not often happen, and certainly Mr. Capell has excellent taste in list production. In this recent one of his he includes the first editions of many of those authors who have arrived, or are about to arrive or who will arrive, as the saying goes, in the near future, and of whom I have been writing in the past issues of The Bookman. If you have not seen the list, do get one.

It is, alas! never possible to write at as great length about the antiquarian catalogues that reach me as I would wish. Many readers have asked me to devote more attention to the catalogues. Almost I am persuaded, but the hard problem of space forces me to abandon my desire. At the moment of writing, two copies of Mr. Herbert Tremayne's capital catalogue have reached me: one at the office and one at my flat. They are not wasted. Never throw a catalogue away when you have finished with it. Pass it on. You may discover a great book-lover this way. Many of the lists that come to me are kept for reference. The Tremayne list is a really valuable one. It includes all first editions; "First and Second Jungle Books," "Just-So Stories," the "Crock of Gold"—a wonderful story—some D. H. Lawrence books and a crowd of others really too numerous to mention. One thing I notice always about Mr. Tremayne's lists are the modest prices. And bear in mind, the market is low these days, and now is the time to buy. But be wise in your selection. If you have any doubts, write "The Collector" a line, and every help possible will be given.

A new catalogue has arrived from Quaritch. You know how highly I regard these lists. The one before me is devoted to rare and valuable books of all sorts. Being something of an association book maker for my own delectation, rather than for the pleasure of others—which is really very selfish,—I revelled in the section devoted to association books. No less than thirteen pages are given to such works. It is a worthy list, and most desirable for every kind of book collector. Plenty of books of a bibliographical nature are to be found in it, besides books on bookbinding, political economy and sports and pastimes, all very scarce and valuable, many at prices that are well within the means of most of us. Quite a lot of books in English literature, works from famous English presses, Oriental literature and no end of other kinds of volumes.

I am not much of a flying man myself. I'm more happy among my books. But I have been up in the R 100! So, naturally enough, the Maggs descriptive catalogue of books and engravings and medals illustrating the evolution of the airship and the aeroplane have appealed to me greatly. It is not only a useful list; it is a most valuable one. And in a manner it is unique. Anyhow it is the most comprehensive of its kind that has come my way. Even to non-flying people—of whom I am one—it is vastly interesting. I shall not let this copy out of my hands. We reproduce an illustration from this catalogue.

Many kind readers of this section write and say no end of nice things about it, which makes me feel that it is serving a good purpose. Often they ask me from what direction they may look for information about forthcoming fine editions. In a general and modest way we try to give this information, or rather the cream of it, in these desultory notes about catalogues, or in "The Market" column. You might well however ask Miller & Gill to send you regularly their list, which is always full of the most up-to-date information. I always use their catalogues; they are so reliable. Here I am looking at their recent list entitled "Fine Editions" issued by modern private presses and other publishers. A well printed list; and I wish I could write more about it.

Not all the entertaining catalogues arrive by way of the office. Often they come to my home. Sometimes I wonder whether the postman thinks I am gathering as many lists as I can for the rag-and-bone man, or if I have some other nefarious scheme up my sleeve. I try to receive all the antiquarian catalogues, so that I may make these notes as comprehensive as possible. The Export Book Co. are ever ready to send their catalogues to those who are interested, and naturally, when I asked them to send them to me, they came by return. And I hope they will continue to do so. I have two on my desk. One is called "Rareties," containing a number of very valuable rare books of the past, and a considerable number of modern first editions; the other gives in detail the contents of a valuable library, purchased privately. This latter list comprises a number of Dickens first editions. I like the note on the front page of this list (which is perfectly true): "Notwithstanding the repeated American crashes, Dickens first editions have actually advanced in value during this critical period."

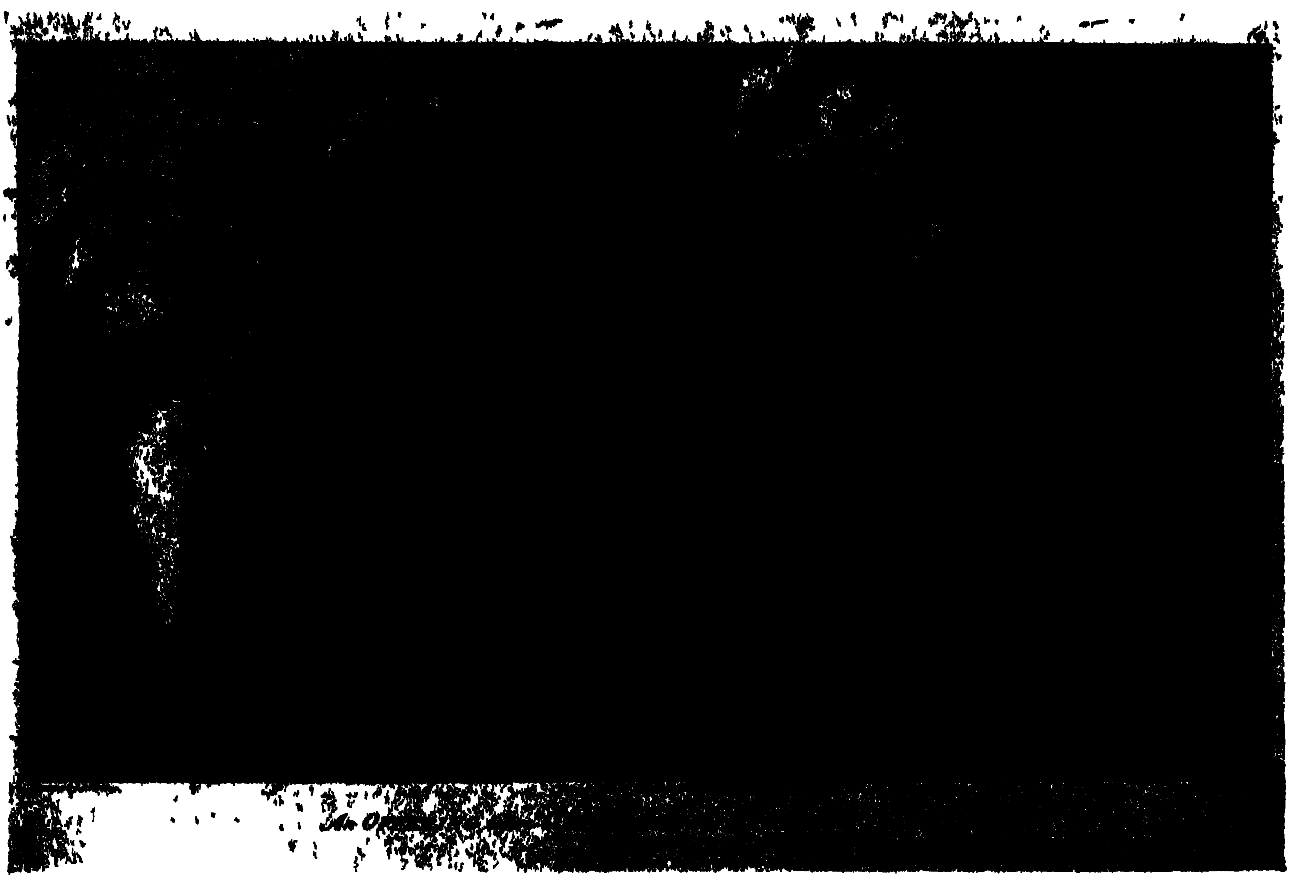
Francis Edwards Ltd. have issued a catalogue of books, pamphlets, engravings and other things relating to South and Central America; J. S. Billingham, a short catalogue, No. 149, of books of a varied and interesting character; William H. Robinson, List No. 30 of English and Foreign Literature, containing a great number—something over a thousand items of a most attractive kind, and is as good a miscellaneous collection as I have seen for some weeks; another very readable catalogue from J. D Miller, comprising an interesting collection of modern first editions, association copies, autograph letters, etc., including a really nice copy of Arnold Bennett's "Old Wives' Tale" for £75; and short lists from G. T. Lines and Reginald Atkinson—many firsts and a number of excellent autographs; besides some longish lists from Smith & Son of Southport, Messrs Baxendine and Low's Bookstalls.



All of the catalogues I have mentioned above are worth the most careful perusal, even though some may be short ones. It does not follow of course that these are not interesting; often they are very readable and generally contain books that are scarce

THE MARKET.

In spite of the fact that prices in the English market continue low for first editions, it is not always the case in America. Those early books by Mr. Galsworthy, "Jocelyn," "A Man of Devon" and "From the Four Winds," are all maintaining their high figures on the other side of the Atlantic. His first book, "From the Four Winds," published in 1897, of which only five hundred copies were printed, sold at auction last year for £154, and a copy was offered to me the other day for £70. I saw a copy in an American list recently, marked at $1,000—roughly £200. Similarly I suppose it would be possible to buy a first edition of "Jocelyn," which was Mr. Galsworthy's second work, for $1,000 in New York. Here the current price is considerably less than £100. Not so long since a copy was auctioned for £50, while a couple of years ago it sold for something like £210 No less than $1,200 is being asked for "A Man from Devon." I dare say you could buy a copy for something less than £100 these days, although one was sold a year or so since for £155

Messrs. Gumuchian & Cie, of Paris, whose fine catalogue of bindings we have mentioned elsewhere, are issuing next month a catalogue of Children's Books of all ages and languages We shall look forward to this. It will be in two volumes; the text will carefully describe something like 4,000 books in English and French, while the second volume will contain many illustrations, some of which will be coloured. In due course we shall give a detailed review of this catalogue.

"The Georgian Confession Book," which Mr. Gilbert

From Captain James Cook's "Three Voyages Round the World."

From Messrs. Francis Edwards's Catalogue of Early Navigators and Their Voyages, Shipbuilding, Log Books, Pictures, etc.

H. Fabes has compiled, is worth getting. It is published by Foyles at 7s. 6d. net. Mr. Fabes writes an introduction, and there are confessions from Mary Agnes Hamilton, M.P., A. E. Coppard, Rhys Davies, "A Victorian Girl," "A Georgian Girl," Gilbert H. Fabes and many others.

Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast" costs about $200 nowadays in America; the limited "Forsyte Saga," $125; Graves's "Good-bye To All That," $25—which suggests that prices are not so low on the other side of the Atlantic. In the same catalogue were included: "Echoes," by Two Writers—a Kipling item—$3,000; "This Book-Collecting Game," a delightful work, by A. Edward Newton, $40; Shaw's "Androcles," $60; Stephens's "Crock of Gold," $125; the first edition of Stevenson's "Father Damien," privately printed for R. L. S. at Sydney for private circulation among his friends, $750. We feel convinced that there is a great likelihood of distinct improvement in the market for rare books and modern first editions before long; in fact we already see a tendency towards an improvement in prices. Incidentally the latest entry in a catalogue of "Jocelyn" that we have seen, was marked at £85, and this was not a particularly good copy. We have every faith in the market improving.

A revised edition of "The Sea and the Jungle," by H. M. Tomlinson, is being published, with a foreword by the author. Clare Leighton has illustrated it with nineteen woodcuts. There will be five hundred copies signed by the author. This is Mr. Tomlinson's earliest book, first editions of which are scarce, and the price sometimes reaches to £50 and more for a good copy. A signed copy is even rarer, and commands very much more. Duckworths are publishing the new edition, and also limited signed editions of Mr. Galsworthy's "Loyalties" · Mr. Osbert Sitwell's "Dumb-Animal Stories," and Mr. Evelyn Waugh's "Labels."

Here are some limited editions for the careful attention of collectors. Some are signed, but all are limited in numbers. Here and there one or two are already out:

- "French Romanesque Sculpture (Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries)." By Paul Deschamps.
- "Elegy." By Rebecca West.
- "Early Indian Sculpture." Two vols. By L. Bachhofer.
- "Moby Dick." Three vols. By Herman Melville. Illustrated by Rockwell Kent.
- "Undine." By F. H. K. de la Motte-Fouque. Illustrated by Allen Lewis.
- "Dostoievsky's Legend of the Grand Inquisitor." With an introduction by the late D. H. Lawrence. Translated by S. S. Koteliansky.
- "One Hundred Lyrics." By Eden Phillpotts.
- "Mackerel Sky." By Helen Ashton.
- "Blind Man's Mark" (previously announced as "Adrian Glynde"). By Martin Armstrong.
- "St. Christopher's Day." By Martin Armstrong.
- "Dewer Rides." By L. A. G. Strong.
- "The Flying Horse." Illustrated by Ceri Richards.

"Chelsea Way." By André Maurois.
"Two Stories." By Richard Aldington.
"My First Play." By Lady Gregory.
"English Sculpture from 1530 to 1800." By Katherine Esdaile.
"Angel Pavement." By J. B. Priestley.

CLEGG'S INTERNATIONAL DIRECTORY.*

We have been waiting for this new issue of the famous "Clegg's Directory" for a long time, and we are glad that at last it has come. It is doubtful if there is anything more complete. In the old days it was an indispensable reference book; and to-day the new issue will be equally useful. Of course it has a first appeal to those who are engaged in the making and distribution of books in some form or another; but the general interest in books has expanded so much in late years that there must be many people, outside those specially interested, who will find this volume of much help to them. The work provides us with lists of booksellers in all parts of the world, and all those other firms who have so much to do with the making of a book. There is also a list of literary agents, and a longish list of book-collectors in the volume, as well as a list of antiquarian booksellers from whom the collector may secure a catalogue.

THE MODERN FIRST EDITION MARKET—ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

By Gilbert H. Fabes.

By the end of the year 1929 we had reached the finish of a definite period in English Literature which will become known as the "twenties," and this year of grace has seen an undoubted change in the attitudes of the collectors of modern first editions.

The English collectors who had tried to compete against the high prices paid by the American speculators have found themselves in possession of first editions of modern authors which have dropped to one half of the prices paid, and the American speculators, or rather the speculative type of book collector has lost a little of his faith in the cash securities of his rare modern books. The English booksellers who catered for the speculators did not have time to free themselves of their burdens of high priced auction-room purchases of 1929, and many have vainly sought to obtain the averages obtainable before the Wall Street crash. It will take a few months yet for them to have the courage to alter their opinions and adjust prices to the new standards, but I foresee by the middle of next year a steady revival and demand for the best modern first editions. Since the beginning of the demand for moderns, which came two years or so after the War, and actively continued during the "twenties," the English modern book trade has flourished, and America possesses an enormous number of the best first editions of our great contemporaries.

For many of these, judging them by present day standards, they have paid heavily, and the reactions are likely to make themselves felt by a comparative mistrust of the soundness of our books as investments. There is evidence of this in the stronger demand at present for the American "high spots," being the first editions of their own best authors.

However, there will not be too many of these to go round, and it is safe to predict a long delayed rise in the prices of these books.

* "Clegg's International Directory of Booksellers, Publishers, Binders, Paper Makers, Printers, Agents, Book Collectors, etc.: 1930-31." New Series: No. 2. £1 15s. net. (Gravesend: The Librarian, Windmill Street.)

Now it is certain that the average American book collector has an undoubted preference for the English modern first edition for, peculiarly, America has few modern authors of merit, and England has a very long list.

We have in Shaw, Barrie, Galsworthy, Kipling, Wells and Bennett, six authors who form the backbone of the modern book market, and there are probably twenty others who can be reckoned worthy of serious consideration. At random I would mention Siegfried Sassoon, H. M. Tomlinson, A. E. Coppard, J. B. Priestley, Aldous Huxley, the Sitwells, Hugh Walpole, R. H. Mottram, John Masefield and Henry Williamson.

This is a fine list, and each writer has produced one or more books which are likely to be read and sought after in twenty years time.

The strength of English literature depends a great deal upon the support of the English reading public, and in this present year there have been too many pessimists among the ranks of the collectors, booksellers, publishers and authors.

I do not believe that there is any real reason for pessimism, for my faith is in the work which is being produced by the authors and publishers, and in the appreciative qualities of the English bookbuying public, collectors and readers both, and in the sound common sense of the booksellers. That is why I believe that during 1931, the staggering effects of the fall in prices will have worn off, and more sanity will be introduced into the fine hobby of book-collecting.

This can be done by a firm co-operation on the part of all interested in our literature. I would suggest first that those authors who now realise themselves to be among the "collected" should refrain from forcing themselves to write as many books as possible in order to satisfy the craze for their first editions, and from lending their names to signed and limited productions of presumed masterpieces on hand-made paper.

I suggest that publishers should become alive to the needs of the first edition market, but that they do not attempt to exploit it by manufacturing "rarities."

The booksellers, coming into direct contact with the collectors, may advise the purchase of the best new books by authors of merit, eliminating the fantastic high-priced volumes made for the exhausted "collectors' market," and introducing more sanity into the valuations of older first editions to meet the new standard of price which is arriving. The collectors, being last but not least, may be relied upon to appreciate the opportunities which now present themselves for obtaining good and reasonably rare, or important, books at prices freed from the overwhelming and damaging influence of the power of the dollar.

Beyond this point of criticism and suggestion I do not wish to go further at present, but this article is written for the purpose of supporting one branch of the English book trade in particular, for the benefit of all who may be interested in it.

Undoubtedly one of the outstanding features of the present year's publishing has been the evident increase in the demand for the new first editions of our best writers. Advance orders for such books as Priestley's "Angel Pavement" and Masefield's and Sassoon's new books have been very heavy. The over-subscription of one thousand sets of Shaw at thirty guineas is a sign of good health, for it is evident that the number of book collectors has increased, and that they are not perturbed by the fact that a rare Shaw or Barrie has brought thirty or forty pounds less than the highest auction-room price of this time last year.

It is interesting to note, too, the steady rise in the values of the first editions of such books as Priestley's "Good Companions," Sassoon's "Memoirs of a Fox Hunting Man," Blunden's "Undertones of War" and other comparatively recent books.

These books are being bought by collectors who have gained much wisdom by their experiences through the years, and I believe that the works of the Poet Laureate will rise steadily and calmly, an evidence of the new sanity of book collecting.

MODERN BRITISH AUTHORS.*

Every now and then someone tries his hand at making a bibliography that will serve as some sort of guide to those modern authors whom people should collect; but it is almost a hopeless task at the outset. For the simple reason no such bibliography can be complete. Some author, of more or less importance, is bound to be left out. And that author is sure to be the very one in which we are particularly interested. But we would not decry the efforts that are made to give us some sort of a guide in the peregrinations of our collecting. The wise collector will always decide to add these helps-by-the-way to his shelf of books about books.

The book before us is an extremely helpful volume for all collectors, and the authors—B. D. Cutler and Villa Stiles—have done their work well. They knew at the beginning of their task that it could in no sense ever be complete, and are honest about it: " We make no explanation for the authors included. Except that most of them were chosen because of their importance to the furtherance of English literature and because of their commanding place in the collector's esteem. And we admit quite candidly that a certain few names point to the creeping in of our own fancy . . . " So, with such words before us, how can we cavil because of the volume's incompleteness? But we do not want to. Book collectors are people of friendly minds, and to the authors of this valuable work —for it is valuable—we give thanks for so willingly attempting a piece of work that is, as they so happily put it, " the result of a hobby."

There are many English authors of whom " The Collector " has written since his section started and has advised us to collect, who are missing from this compilation. All the same, you will agree that it is a most useful volume, and I advise collectors to get a copy. The list of authors is too long to give here, but it includes a list of the writings, up to the present year, of no less than forty authors. The compilers disclaim that it is in no sense " a perfect contribution to bibliographic lore," and I much like their readiness to receive suggestions from " booksellers and collectors in regard to points and omissions," as most assuredly they will!

In this work there are included more than two thousand titles of famous books by dead and living authors. The list of the Kipling items contains some editions not before described in book form; a list of Conan Doyle books includes some not generally known; and there is a long list of H. G. Wells's books. These are special features among many others. The compilers are well known American collectors. At one time they were actively engaged in the rare book business; so in no way may we look on their excellent work as an amateur effort. Some two years were spent in the preparation of it. In their lists of Barrie and Kipling apparently the compilers were fortunate in having access to important collections of these authors' works. The Kipling list extends to twenty-five pages, which will give some idea how thoroughly the work of this bibliography has been done. The Wells list runs to eight pages. At the end of the volume is a two-page reference list of biographies.

I wish that so useful a volume had had some blank pages inserted, so that the collector might be in a position to add later publications. My copy is going to the bookbinder for this purpose. That is a small detail. The volume is largely intended for the layman, although I suspect that even the expert will find it well worth using. " In many places we have disregarded the technique of the bibliographer in order to attain to the simplest method of explanatory description. The book is intended to be a 'tool' which will make clear the features and points of first editions and other collected items."

* " Modern British Authors: Their First Editions." Compiled by B. D. Cutler and Villa Stiles. 21s. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

Perspective View of the City of Bath, in Somersetshire, 1760.
Engraved for the Modern Universal British Traveller.

THE NEW BATH GUIDE.

This is a delightful little book to secure, and not too scarce for a modest purse. Although it was first published in 1766, five or six editions rapidly appeared, and each is materially as good as the other, though the editions of 1804 and 1807 have charming illustrations as well. "So much wit, so much humour, fun and poetry, so much originality never met together before," said Horace Walpole in commending it to George Montagu. And we might well ask why the author, Christopher Anstey, and his book found such immediate popularity.

The Guide declares in his Preface that this is "a Collection of Letters written by a Family during their Residence at Bath." And in fact each letter is an exquisite and finished piece of writing, depicting with playful irony the many distractions and conventions of sophisticated society at Bath during the "season." The leisured classes of London, flaccid with the demands of a round of gaiety which grew more and more reckless each year, fled each autumn to Tunbridge Wells, or to Harrogate, or Bath, to "take the waters" and generally to rusticate and recuperate. At least that was the intention. Ostensibly these lively folk listened to the wise doctors like Guidott and Bayne, who spoke of the wonderful cures of the gout, vapours, and "English malady" effected by the chalybeate waters. But in reality they brought all their wicked little diversions along with them and opened a "small season" at their chosen "spaw."

Bath was luckily favoured early in the century, in the first place by the royal visit of Queen Anne in 1703, and in the second by the appearance of Beau Nash some years later. In his "Life of Richard Nash of Bath" Oliver Goldsmith relates how this erstwhile broken gamester raised the humdrum city of Bath into "the capital and most publick and gay Place in Europe."

Nash was the first "King of Bath," master of the public ceremonies, and generally responsible for arranging the entertainments and convenience of visitors to the city:

> "But alas! he is gone and the City can tell
> How in Years and in Glory lamented he fell; . . .
> In Reward of his Labours, his Virtue and Pains,
> He is footing it now in th'Elysian Plains."

It is with Bath after the time of Beau Nash that Anstey deals, while the city still revelled in the afterglow of his scintillating comet. Let us meet his family (the Blunderheads) on their arrival from London. They have jolted for a day and a half in the stage-coach along the great Bath Road. As they enter the streets of Bath the steeple bells are set pealing. This was a custom introduced by Nash, an instance of the ostentatious civility which Anstey pitilessly derides:

> "I thought, like a Fool, that they only would ring
> For a Wedding, or Judge, or the Birth of a King;
> But I found 'twas for Me, that the good-natur'd People
> Rung so hard that I thought they would pull down the Steeple;
> So I took out my Purse, as I hate to be shabby,
> And paid all the men when they came from the Abbey."

The last lines incidentally strike at the system of exorbitant tips and subscriptions which every visitor was expected, nay often required to pay, before entering the social circle of Bath.

The travellers having settled themselves at the Bear Hostel are serenaded early the following morning by the Town Band (another of Nash's institutions, and a further call on the visitor's purse). They are quickly surrounded by touts of all kinds, but especially by the quack-doctors and their accessories, the nurses.

> "The Doctor advis'd me to send for a Nurse;
> And the Nurse was so willing my Health to restore,
> She beg'd me to send for a few Doctors more."

The Blunderheads soon find themselves involved in a regular weekly programme of diversions, each item of which, together with the fops, beaux, belles, gamesters and canting ministers who made up the assembly, feels the tingle of Anstey's lively pen.

So the parading and masquerading begins:

> "For persons of Taste and true Spirit, I find,
> Are fond of attracting the Eyes of Mankind;
> What Numbers one sees, who, for that very Reason
> Come to make such a Figure at Bath every Season!"

Each morning the visitor wrapped himself in a blanket and was carried by "chair" to take a dip in one of the four different baths. He or she then visited the Pump-room to drink the waters and indulge in the morning's tattle. As we can well imagine, the baths soon became the pretext for the gossiping-club.

Anstey knew their foible:

"I take every Morning a Sup at the Water
Just to hear what is passing, and see what they're a'ter."

Of the scene in the bath he also has a comical picture:

"How the Ladies did giggle and set up their Clacks
All the While an old Woman was rubbing their Backs!
Oh, 'twas pretty to see them all put on their Flannels,
And then take the Water like so many Spaniels.
And tho' all the while it grew hotter and hotter,
They swam just as if they were hunting an Otter;
'Twas a glorious Sight to behold the fair Sex
All wading with Gentlemen up to their Necks,
And view them so prettily tumble and sprawl
In a great smoaking Kettle as big as our Hall."

So they disported while the orchestra blared away noisily in the gallery above. After the baths, the company formally paraded the town:

"O the charming parties made!
Some to walk the South Parade,
Some to Lincomb's shady Groves
Or to Simpson's proud Alcoves."

And after an early tea everyone prepared for the playhouse, or the public ball which was held twice a week, or the inevitable card-parties and tea-tables. Gaming ran high in Bath. Anstey's Captain Cormorant is typical of the many sharpers who came here in scores to fleece the brainless young fops of fashion:

"All eminent Men who no Trade ever knew
But Gaming, the only good Trade to pursue."

Beau Nash himself had set the pace; in fact, his own fortune was taken at the gaming tables. The rigorous anti-gaming laws passed in 1745 were disregarded by these pleasure-seekers. It is in fact the strain of the tables which causes Anstey's dupe to quit Bath:

"How wretched am I! what a fine Declamation
Might be made on the Subject of my Situation, . . .
For my Means are so small, and my Bills are so large,
I ne'er can come Home till you send a Discharge."

Upon the devotees of "loo" and "lansquenet" Anstey is particularly severe. Equally full of jaunty satire is his picture of one of the public balls, and of a public riverside breakfast given by one of the local celebrities, when, as Anstey laughingly comments:

"I never as yet could his Reason explain
Why we all sallied forth in the Wind and the Rain!
For sure such Confusion was never yet known;
Here a Cap and a Hat, there a Cardinal blown;
While his Lordship, embroider'd and powder'd all o'er,
Was bowing, and handing the Ladies ashore;
How the Misses did huddle, and scuddle and run;
One would think to be wet must be very good Fun;
For by waggling their Tails, they all seem'd to take Pains
To moisten their Pinions like Ducks when it rains."

We should like much to dilate further upon his many sly innuendoes, his picture of the ladies at hazard, of the conversation in the Pump-room, his unmasking of the hypocrisy of the clerical parasites of Bath, the whimsical effusions of dressing, of dancing, and eating at the famous bakery of Mr. Gill, of the sharp tongues ever at work:

"One would hope, my dear Mother, that Scandal would spare
The tender, and helpless, and delicate Fair;
But alas! the sweet Creatures all find it the Case
That Bath is a very censorious Place."

Although Anstey claims that his men and women are universal, and that—

"Sir Boreas Blubber and such stupid Faces,
Are at London, at Bath and all public Places";

yet he writes so spontaneously and acutely that many of his characters, in spite of their names, must have come under his special observation. Many of the names themselves are triumphant strokes of invention. Who can forget Mrs. Shenkin-ap-Leek, the Duchess of Truffles, Tabitha Runt or Miss Fubby Fatarmin. And although the book is essentially a "period piece" in its matter, it is so shot through with the weft of human laughter that it will never cease to entertain lovers of piquant verse and freakish humour.

PHILIP PARKER.

MARLOWE'S LIFE AND WORKS.*

The appearance of this new edition, in which both scholarship and popular appeal are attempted, of Christopher Marlowe's works is sure to be welcomed by those who read the Elizabethans for intelligent pleasure as well as by the students who will find an up-to-date edition helpful. There are to be six volumes, and the whole set, under the experienced editorship of Professor R. H. Case, is modelled on the excellent Arden Shakespeare.

The Life, which precedes "The Tragedy of Dido Queen of Carthage" in Volume I, is the only up-to-date complete biography of the brilliant and impetuous poet available to the general reader. While it is fully—almost too fully—annotated, Mr. Tucker Brooke's version is intensely interesting. Marlowe's Life is indeed the most interesting one of any of the Elizabethan writers, for there is much documented material, and the poet's vivid career, untimely ended in a stabbing affray, has always been a fruitful theme of literary historians. And, unfortunately, of the old puritanical moralists. Mr. Brooke is able to expose the growth of the legend of the good-for-nothing ruffian and blasphemer overtaken by divine justice, by quoting from a sequence of theological pamphleteers, many of whose brutal outpourings he gives in appendices. Quite recently, of course, the American Dr. Hotson threw fresh light on Marlowe's death by unearthing the court documents referring to the trial of Marlowe's slayer for murder. Some of these documents are quoted in Mr. Brooke's appendices, including the pardon in Latin of the murderer, Ingram Frizer, signed by Queen Elizabeth.

Mr. Tucker Brooke is not inclined to adopt the more "sensational" theories about Marlowe's death, as that he was assassinated for political reasons, by the instructions of Sir Walter Ralegh or of somebody else in the sovereign's confidence. Only a student equally well informed could venture to express any opinion on the conclusions reached in this biography, though they seem to the present writer reasonable enough. Mr. Tucker Brooke examines all the contemporary documents, and the references to Marlowe's death by his fellow poets, and he concludes that the fatal stabbing was more or less accidental, during a scuffle with Frizer which, according to Frizer, began by Marlowe jabbing the back of his head with a poniard. It appears that Marlowe was holding Frizer's dagger, Frizer grabbed at the dagger, and during the struggle Marlowe received a wound over the right eye which proved fatal. Really more important than all this are the details about Marlowe's family, his education and his intellectual interests, for after all his superb poetry is what matters to us, and that could not have come from a shallow or a dishonourable man.

"Dido," which Mr. Brooke thinks is an early work, is certainly an attractive one for the first volume. Its eloquent and unsubtle blank verse is full of a wild beauty, though lacking the full splendour of the mighty (rhetorical) Tamburlaine. In this fine edition of the drama by which (apart from "Doctor Faustus" and the lyrical narrative of Hero and Leander, which the bold Chapman completed to his own satisfaction) Marlowe is best known to readers generally, the value of up-to-date scholarship is very evident. Not a little difficulty in reading Elizabethan metrical dramas correctly has been due to the horrible state of the punctuation. This is one of the problems which Mr. Ellis-Fermor has painstakingly tackled, so that what with the thorough introduction, the ample notes, and (for this relief, much thanks!) large, clear type, the reading of Marlowe should now be an untroubled delight.

Ease in reading has been increased, also by the wise decision of the general editor that this edition of the Works should be printed in modernised spelling. As he says in the general preface in Volume I, Marlowe's thought "will no less reveal and inspire, and the appeal of his music will be undiminished, whether he is animating us with high-sounding terms or bewitching us with unfamiliar harmonies or—strange mystery—moving pity and terror with the squalid detail of a foul dungeon."

R. L. M.

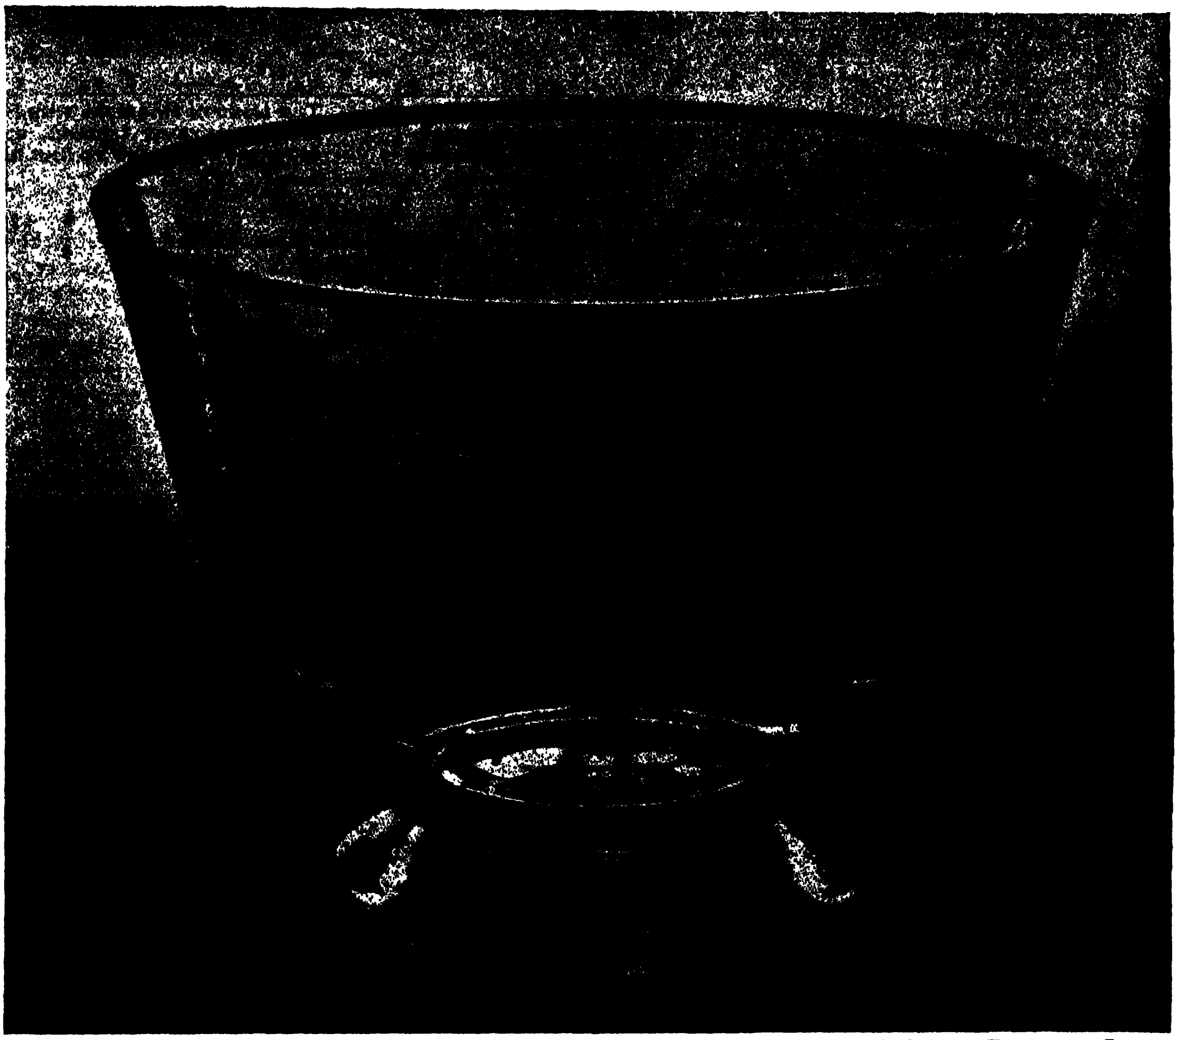
* "The Works and Life of Christopher Marlowe." Vol. I: "The Life" and "Dido, Queen of Carthage." Edited by C. F. Tucker Brooke. 8s. 6d. Vol. II: "Tamburlaine the Great." Edited by U. S. Ellis-Fermor. 10s. 6d. (Methuen.)

NOVELS OF THREE CENTURIES.*

Of these three books, all of which may be commended on the grounds of comely typography, the Verona edition of Thomas Nash's best-known novel should appeal particularly both to collectors and to students of Elizabethan literature. The text is a reproduction of the earliest edition of "The Unfortunate Traveller" in the British Museum. Both type and paper are fine and the illustrations, chapter headings, tail-pieces and initial letters from blocks designed and cut by Mr. Hayden Mackey have a particular distinction. In addition there is an admirable critical and biographical introduction by Mr. Philip Henderson. Thomas Nash is chiefly remembered perhaps as a combative pamphleteer and a collaborator with Marlowe. But Mr. Henderson has done well to remind us that he holds a unique and solitary place among the early progenitors of the novel. Unlike his contemporary, Robert Greene, there was nothing of the euphuist in his make-up. He had a considerable inventive talent, but he put it to the service of real life and in describing the boisterous adventures of his scoundrel-hero, Jack Wilton, he originated in England a style of fiction which is generally attributed to Defoe.

"Lady Julia Mandeville" is a novel of a very different order. It appeared in 1763, when an appreciative reviewer wrote of its author that "she is as sentimental as Rousseau and as interesting as Richardson, without the caprice of the one, or the tediousness of the other." Like Richardson's "Pamela" it is in letter-form, and the following description of its heroine will suggest the quality of its sentiment—"Her whole form is delicate and feminine to the utmost degree; her complexion is fair, enlivened by the bloom of youth, and often diversified by blushes more beautiful than those of the morning; her features are regular; her mouth and teeth particularly lovely; her hair light brown; her eyes blue, full of softness, and strongly expressive of the exquisite sensibility of her soul. Her countenance, the beauteous abode of the Loves and the Smiles, has a mixture of sweetness and spirit, which gives life and expression to her charms." Nevertheless, like so much eighteenth century writing, its excesses of sensibility are balanced by a considerable degree of sense and sententiousness, and its artificiality by a satisfying artistic unity, while the final fate of the "angelic pair," whose love is the story's central theme, displays a ruthlessness of which only a sentimental writer would be capable.

The two tales by George Sand, both of which are well translated, were written respectively in 1847 and 1873. Yet though they belong to different phases in her tempestuous life, they are alike in the simplicity and charm of their sentiment. "The Country Waif" was the second of an originally planned series of rustic tales. "The Castle of Pictordu" was one of thirteen tales written for and read to her grandchildren. The hero of the first story, like the heroine of the second, embodies all the Christian virtues at some sacrifice to character and probability. But both stories are better regarded as fables, intended at once to entertain and edify. As such they make very pleasant reading, and particularly "The Castle of Pictordu," in which fact and fantasy are very graciously interwoven and goodness invested with the charms of poetry.



HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

* "The Unfortunate Traveller." By Thomas Nash. Edited by Philip Henderson. Illustrated by Hayden Mackey. 18s. (Verona Society.)—"Lady Julia Mandeville." By Frances Brooke. Edited by E. Phillips Poole. 8s. 6d. (Scholartis Press.)—"The Country Waif." By George Sand. Translated by Eirene Collis. "The Castle of Pictordu." By George Sand. Translated by Philippa H. Watson. Introductory Note by Hamish Miles. 8s. 6d. (Scholartis Press.)

THE ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW.

5s. net. (Architectural Press.)

The Architectural Review for August is a special Number dealing with the present Exhibition of the Arts and Crafts at Stockholm. It is lavishly illustrated, apart from its eleven plates, and Mr. P. Morton Shand's reflections on Swedish art and culture deserve special mention. Incidentally there is in the Number an extremely interesting article, the last he wrote, by the late Mr. D. H. Lawrence on the English Contribution to Progress, entitled " Then Disaster Looms Ahead." It is not cheerful reading.

From The Architectural Review, Stockholm, 1930 (Architectural Press).

A VASE IN EMBOSSED GLASS. (Designed by Edward Hald and made by Orrefors.)

GREAT SHORT STORIES OF THE WAR:

England, France, Germany, America.

With an Introduction by EDMUND BLUNDEN. 8s. 6d. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

This is a remarkable book, and in spite of the passing interest in stories and books in general about the War, it should have a wide circulation. Almost the publication of this collection of " Great Short Stories of the War " seems to be a summing up of the vast concourse of novels and other books about the War that have been appearing during the past few years. The publishers had an inspiration when they decided upon the venture, and deserve every praise in their gathering between two covers no less than sixty-six stories. While the stories, in some instances, may not quite come up to the real meaning of the word great, they are all distinctive and well worth perpetuating. Moreover, when you realise that the editor of the volume is Edmund Blunden, whose book, " Undertones of War," stands right in the front rank of books of its kind and will, we venture to say, ever do so, each of the stories in the collection had to pass the rigid test of a mind that is highly critical, exceptionally human, and at the same time—which is very essential in such a circumstance—a mind that knew and saw and understood the War from many angles. It would perhaps be invidious to single out for special consideration any one of the sixty-six stories. They are all good. On the other hand, each could well justify a claim for attention. We doubt if there is a better collection anywhere—or that there ever will be a better collection. There are names in this volume that the War has made indelible in our minds. Many have written war stories that will last. In some instances there are names with which we are unfamiliar—but they have been worthy of appearing in this volume. The plan of the work is praiseworthy. There is Mr. Blunden's well-phrased and well-judged introduction. After that the stories are grouped as follows: " The Home Front," " Behind the Front Line," " In the Front Line," " Battle, Raid and Patrol," " The Lighter Side of War," " Strange Stories," " Soldiers on Leave," " In the Air," " At Sea," " Satires of Circumstance," " In Hospital," ' After the War." This division of the interests covered makes it unique, and apart from the definite story-telling value in the stories, the volume will be essential, not only for those future generations of people who wish to know something of the whole gamut of the Armaggedon of 1914, but it will be, because of this aspect, necessary for all future historians of the War. Simply because it gives so fine, so real, so dramatic a composite picture of the War. H. C. M., who writes a prefatory note, says truly, "a great epic drama of the War like Thomas Hardy's 'The Dynasts' (an eagle's-eye view of a world at war) has yet to come." We may not say that "Great Short Stories of the War" is an eagle's-eye view, but by very reason of its thorough comprehension of every aspect of the War, it does come in its entirety precious near to it. What makes it so utterly complete is that, not only are actual short stories here reprinted, but we are given short extracts from novels, "stories within stories," that have surged over the world with a moving emotion, so that no angle of view might be omitted. Some idea of the importance of the collection may be gathered from the fact that it includes the work of such notable writers as John Galsworthy, H. M. Tomlinson, Edith Wharton, A. P. Herbert, André Maurois, Coningsby Dawson, F. Britten Austin, "Sapper," Martin Armstrong, Roland Dorgeles, Somerset Maugham, R. H. Mottram, Liam O'Flaherty, Henri Barbusse, Erich Maria Remarque, Joseph Conrad, "Taffrail," "Bartimeus," C. E. Montague, Fritz von Unruh, Ernest Hemingway, Gerald Bullett—and a host of others. Reading again some of the stories, we agree that the collection is unique, and comprises the best that has been written from the early days of the War up to the end of last year. It is a beautifully made volume, printed well on excellent paper, containing close upon 1,000 pages, and published at 8s. 6d. Readers of "The Collector" will be interested in noting too that there is an edition de luxe, limited to 250 copies, all of which have been signed by Mr. Blunden.

From The Romance of the British Voluntary Hospital Movement
By A. Delbert Evans and L. G. Redmond Howard (Hutchinson).

THE LONDON HOSPITAL WHEN IT WAS NEARLY OUTSIDE LONDON, SHOWING OLD FORTIFICATIONS TO THE RIGHT.

From English Monasteries in the Middle Ages (Constable).

CASTLE ACRE PRIORY, NORFOLK SEAT IN PRIOR'S CHAPEL.

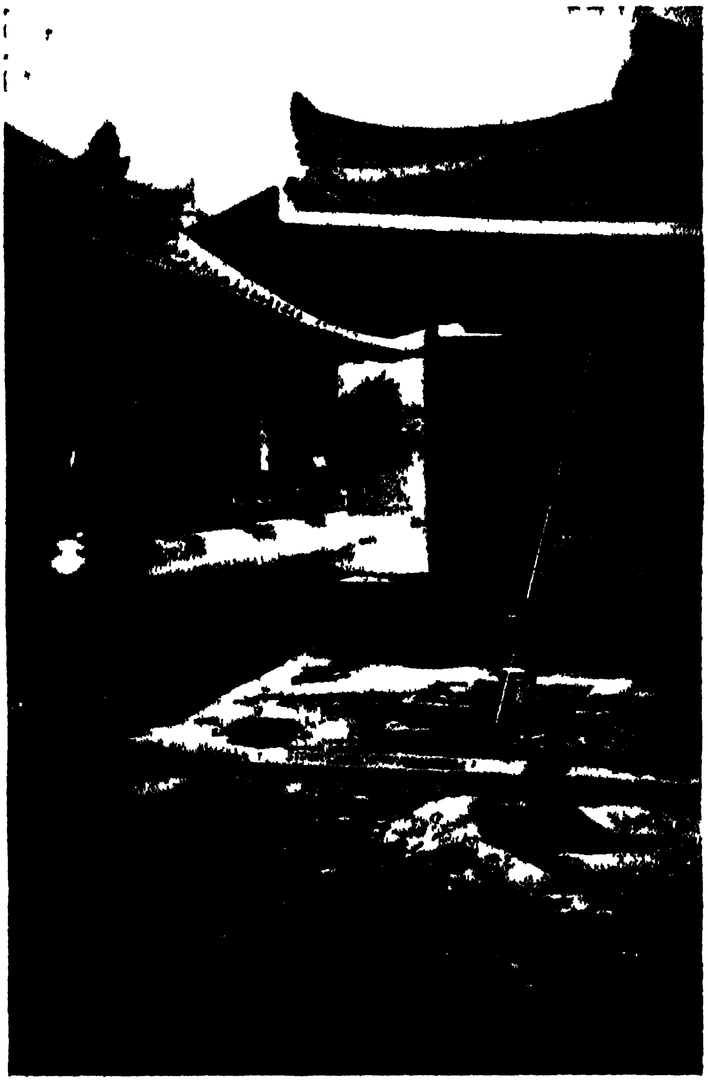
WITH THE "ITALIA" TO THE NORTH POLE.



By UMBERTO NOBILE.
Translated by FRANK FLEETWOOD. 15s.
(Allen & Unwin.)

Whether we consider General Nobile was to blame or not for the Italia disaster, it is only fair to read his book. It is not a denial or a counter-attack on his critics: it is the full, ungarnished story of the expedition which proved so disastrous. The imputation of insufficient preparation is completely refuted. No flight could have been prepared with greater care or foresight for emergency. Yet when the flight to the Pole began—before it began—Malmgren seems to have virtually assumed command. It is impossible to say whether, if Nobile had waited till later in the year, or on the return journey from the Pole had steered his own course, the disaster would have been averted. Yet this instance of an otherwise inflexible commander submitting to advice, which was contrary to his own experience, seems rather to suggest that once more the volatile temperament of the South triumphed over common sense. The almost criminal inaction of the Citta de Milano seems to deserve the severest stricture, for surely no rescue expedition ever had to contend with so many self-invented obstructions. The large amount of space devoted to the preparation and weight of the stores and scientific instruments makes interesting reading. The book is certainly one of the best of its kind.

KOREA OF THE JAPANESE.

By H B Drake 12s 6d (Bodley Head)

"Is it spelt with a C or a K?" asked Mr Drake's friends when he told them he was going to Korea, and a good many of us might find the question disconcertingly natural in our ignorance almost of the whereabouts of this outpost of Asia But this book, the work of a competent novelist and sympathetic observer, answers not only that question, but a great many more It is a broad survey of Korea to-day, its people, its daily life, its history, its relations with the Japanese—who, according to Mr Drake, are in Korea for much the same reason as finds us in India Most entertainingly written and further enlivened with fine photographs

From Korea of the Japanese By H B Drake (Bodley Head) THE COURTYARD INN

THE ROMANCE OF THE BRITISH VOLUNTARY HOSPITAL MOVEMENT

By Dr Delbert Evans and Mr Redmond Howard 18s net (Hutchinson)

It is a curious fact that matters of the most vital importance are often taken for granted with no thought of the romance and wonder behind them The great hospitals of Britain mean far more to the average Briton than he realises and their history is a romance which must surely stir him to the depths The story of their growth from the "spytals" and "bede-houses" of monastic England to the huge institutions of to-day is one which no thinking person can read unmoved It is a terrible story, stained with the cruelty and wastefulness of the dark days of ignorance, yet washed clean by the heroic efforts of those who strove to lift England out of the slough of sickness and suffering After considering the magnificent achievements of the voluntary hospital system in the past it comes as rather a shock to read that in order to maintain their present efficiency the hospitals need a capital expenditure of from four to five million pounds The authors of "The Romance of the British Hospital Voluntary Movement" carefully avoid taking sides in the question, State Hospitals v Voluntary Hospitals, but they cannot avoid the question—are their finances to be left to semi-hysterical street raids by students in fancy dress, flappers with their flag days, newspapers with their ballots bazaars dances and jumble sales? Even allowing for the fact that the spirit of voluntarism has brought forth fine proofs of British generosity in the past is it not time that this generosity be no longer individual but national? The sick citizen is none the less a citizen, worthy of the help and protection of his State It is true that the voluntary hospitals do receive some State aid in the case of pensioners tuberculosis patients venereal cases, maternity and child welfare and grants for medical education and research In spite of this assistance fully seventy per cent is left to the voluntary principle With the growing realisation that national health is a national asset comes the idea of placing the hospitals the guardians of the nation's health above all forms of controversy. Sir Henry Burdett's ideal of a "Hospital City," on a site well away from the contamination of the town, would free the workers "from some of the most burdensome trials which now cripple their resources and diminish materially the happiness of their lives" This book is not mere propaganda, nor is it an appeal to the charity which has nobly responded to innumerable appeals in the past It is a clarion call to public justice, that hospitals shall no longer be crippled with debt and faced with bankruptcy, but free to continue their work of easing the burden of suffering humanity.

From The Romance of the British Voluntary Hospital Movement By A Delbert Evans and L G Redmond Howard (Hutchinson). THE LONDON HOSPITAL AS IT IS TO-DAY, SHOWING HOW SLUMS HAVE GROWN UP ALL AROUND IT.

MRS. BATTLE'S OPINIONS ON WHIST.

By CHARLES LAMB. 1s. (Dent.)

This is one of a delightful batch of booklets that has reached us from Messrs. Dent, the other titles including Washington Irving's "The Country Church," William Canton's "Kenack's Little Woman," "Brother Wolf" from "The Little Flowers of Saint Francis," Charles Lee's "A Question of Taste," etc. Familiar friends as they are, and tastefully produced, they should fill an often perplexing gap between a Christmas card and a gift. Moreover they are all thoughtfully provided with an envelope ready for use.

From Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist
By Charles Lamb
(Dent).

HER FAVOURITE TOPIC.

THE 42ND PARALLEL.

By JOHN DOS PASSOS. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

The idea behind this very remarkable novel is reminiscent of that behind "The Dynasts": Mr. dos Passos is harassed by the conviction of convergence, struck by the apparent helplessness of human beings in the hands of some strange, incalculable power that does not direct, but diverts, thwarts, nullifies their lives. He sees the power working in the dark, planlessly planning, moving towards some monstrous, unescapable climax while men and women make their little plans, energise, dream and discuss about their motives, and then find the purpose and the poor achievement of their existences swept away in some gigantic cataclysm, such as the Great War. He tells us of the lives of Mac, an Irish immigrant's son, who learns printing and joins the I.W.W.; of Ward Moorhouse, the epitome of that school of thought which confuses prosperity with righteousness; of Eleanor Stoddard, fastidious, yet in her way esurient; of Janey, the girl who climbs from the lower middle-class to comparative comfort and riches as Moorhouse's stenographer; of her brother Joe, who remains "low," and more generous than his sister, who is a little ashamed of her common sailor brother; of Charley Anderson, also of the people, to whom the War is a release from living on the line that trembles between hunger and starvation. All these have their ambitions and their idlenesses; their private desires and dreams; their poor ambitions, their moments of kindness and enthusiasms. They are all working, consciously or unconsciously, with an end in view: and then the end comes, and it is not theirs. Whose is it? Who made the War that brings these people together in a common destruction, brings them together, only to sunder them apart? It is not the novelist's business to answer that, but Mr. dos Passos does not hide his own sympathy with the underdog, or his suspicion that wars could be prevented if selfish fools somewhere did not still believe the folly that there is something to be gained from them. He shows us, in a series that he calls "Newsreels," taken from the head-lines and the scare-headings of the newspapers, the extraordinary futility of the world as presented popularly to the workmen. He shows too, in a little series of thumbnail biographies, how the great men of the same period, the generation that ends in the War, have managed, in spite of the futility that rides in boastful view, in spite of this malign force that would spoil men's effort, to keep to their purpose, to remind their fellows that truth is, and beauty and righteousness. Luther Burbank, Steinmetz, Eugene Debs—these remain and their work, more significant than the selfish muddle most of us make of our lives. It is a powerful, uncomfortable, at times bitterly brutal novel; but it has beauty as well as force, and Mr. dos Passos, like Hardy, comes down however faintly in favour of the exultations, the agonies by which man proclaims his origin and possesses his inheritance.

From Artwork, Autumn, 1930
(Dent).

Horace Vernet.

BAGATELLE.

By GEORGE R. PREEDY. 7s. 6d. net. (Bodley Head.)

A collection of short stories, sketches and a play by the much discussed author of "General Crack" and "The Rocklitz." They take us back to Bohemia in the eighteenth century, to the Empire, Spain, Italy, the Spanish Netherlands and France; all are as deftly handled, as full of character-play and picturesqueness and out-of-the-way knowledge as Mr. Preedy's full-length novels.

From On the Edge
By Walter de la Mare
(Faber & Faber).

HEAD-PIECE TO "STORY OF THE GREEN ROOM."
A wood engraving by Elizabeth Robins.

MURDER IN STRANGE HOUSES.

By RICHARD PECKHAM. 5s. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

The publishers describe this criminal situation as a very complicated job to handle. It is also rather a complicated job to read. As in many other American detective stories, the sleuth is offensive and ineffective. "Spike" Harper, the policeman in this story, has little but tenacity to commend him to his job. The plot involves a dead man in an empty house, which has caught fire, also the remains of a woman killed previously in a motor accident and buried elsewhere. Everybody concerned lies and misleads as much as possible, and the final solution is brought about by a hurried recapitulation and rejection of the previous analysis. Frankly, this is hardly playing fair with the reader, but then we should be used to this sort of thing by now. We often complain of it, but still enjoy the story. This is the position with this book.

THE BROWN MURDER CASE.

By ROLAND DANIELS. 7s. 6d. (Harold Shaylor.)

Mr. Roland Daniels has already published several detective stories with complicated plots. We are not really sorry for Lilian Brown, who is found hanging by a strap round her neck, the end of the strap being caught in the top of the door which is locked. She is not real, but the cause of her death is the quarry and we are the hunters, with all a hunter's enjoyment. We go, not by fields and lanes, but through night clubs and dance halls, into London offices and country cottages; we hustle the caretaker and question the charwoman, and find poor Lilian's sweetheart, and interview dagos in low clubs and girls in flats. And we cannot stop until the hunt is ended and the solution found.

OPEN TILL SUNSET.

By D. M. LOCKE. 7s. 6d. (Nash & Grayson.)

If only the author had had a sense of humour this story would have been a much better one. As it is, Giles Westland, who is the central character, takes himself so seriously that what is meant for tragedy becomes in the end farce. In the begininng of the book he is intolerant of everyone but himself, at the end of it there is no one but himself. Yet the love story of Giles and Nadia Barovna, the beautiful film star, is quite pleasant, and fortunately it fills most of the pages. The incidents are not strained and Giles's happiness is complete until a tragic accident suddenly ends it.

DEATH IN A DECK-CHAIR.

By MILWARD KENNEDY. 7s. 6d. (Gollancz.)

This detective story is really a detective story for an unusual reason. There is a startling opening: an unknown man is discovered stabbed to the heart in a deck-chair at a holiday resort. The mystery must remain a mystery to the most experienced reader for well over two hundred pages. Clues and thrills abound, but the main interest of the book is that Mr. Milward Kennedy has decided to "write a detective story as it really happens." He has taken the essential features of a possible murder case and shown ordinary police methods at work to unravel the mystery. Scotland Yard and country policemen patiently discover the dead man's identity, the motive, the possible murderers. And so interesting is the excitement of the chase that even the sensational explanation seems dull in comparison. The chess problem proves more fascinating than the sudden checkmate. In brief, "Death in a Deck-chair" appeals both to the mind and to the nervous system. If the conclusion smacks of melodrama the very readable body of the tale more than compensates.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

By ELEANOR REID. 7s. 6d. net.
(Thornton Butterworth.)

It is a pleasure to come across a novel like this—an understanding picture of a lower middle class family. Lily Brown was secretly married but when her husband died and unexpectedly left her £20,000 with the injunction that she still kept silence, the trouble started. The family began to ask questions and suggest motives. This author knows a great deal about human nature with its pathetic failures and greed. Her character drawing alone justifies the story. The central figure, Lily, is especially well portrayed with her weak indecision but unexpected refusal to be engulfed in a vicious circle of piety and greed. Mrs. Eleanor Reid has written a good novel and one with unusual qualities.

From Chin-Wag
By A. Crossley
(Christophers).

OUR HOME-MADE TANK, CHRISTMAS, 1916.

From Athletics of To-day for Women By F. A. M. Webster (Warne). THE JAVELIN—MARIE JANDEROVA, CZECHOSLOVAKIAN RECORD HOLDER. The starting position for the run, old style.

ATHLETICS OF TO-DAY FOR WOMEN.

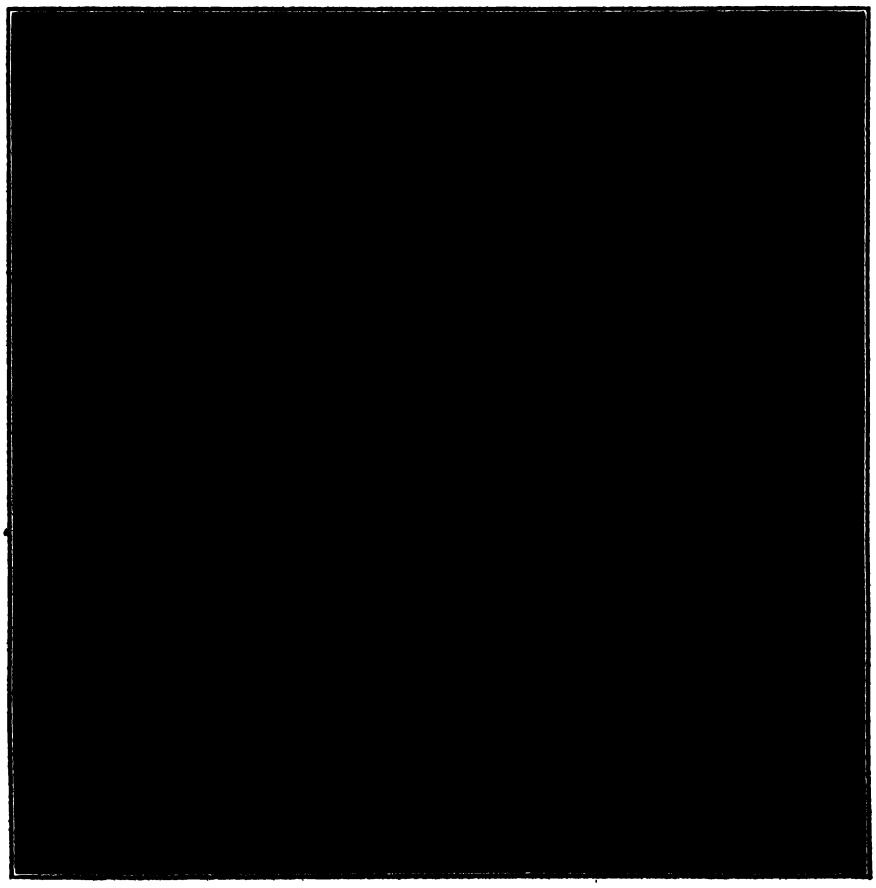
By F. A. M. WEBSTER. 10s. 6d. (Warne.)

Our author has set forth the history, development and training of athletics in this most comprehensive and admirably illustrated book. America is the pioneer of women's athletics in modern times, and was training girls in her schools in scientific play while we were still laughing at the feminine athletes in Britain. The War of course changed all that, and it was in France in 1917 that Mme. Milliat (whose provoking and charming countenance greets us from the frontispiece) founded the Fédération de Feminine Sportive. Austria instituted, it is believed, the earliest women's championship meeting ever held, and began international competitions. This delightful volume has sections on Running, Hurdling, Walking, Throwing the Discus, Putting the Shot, Throwing the Javelin, etc. Any girl who cares for games will hug the volume to her heart. The remarks on General Training are authoritative and helpful. ("Personally I prefer to see an athlete eat a hearty breakfast, a moderate midday meal and a light supper.") An Appendix of Women's Records in International Events is given at the end.

THE OBOLE OF PARADISE.

By AGNES MILLER. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

We begin with an exchange of telegrams between a newly-minted mining engineer, seeking fame and fortune in the frozen North, and his favourite aunt, "Miss Eunice McCreery; Re yours from Montlaurier Nov. 20, what in hades is an obole, have inquired here without result, rush reply to settle bet with my pal, William Gordon." And the answer is: "Obole probably rare Alaska this one being ancient French money no longer existing usually disapprove profanity but appropriate this connection who wins." Rather cryptically expressed, and we warn the lovers of "The Colefax Bookplate," Miss Miller's former book, that they will find the whole tale difficult to understand. We had to make three beginnings before we got the hang of it at all. When unravelled it is a rapid tale of crime. The characters are a group of people assembled in southern France where, at the Pension Dubois, adventures begin; and the curious gipsy tinker catches the cord on which he wears the lucky obole, on an awl. It drops in full view of a learned man from Bukarest; and the ball is set rolling.



From Athletics of To-day for Women By F. A. M. Webster (Warne). THE JAVELIN—LADY HEATH FORMER BRITISH RECORD HOLDER. The Hop, old style.

THROUGH UNKNOWN AFRICA.

By WILLEM JASPERT. 12s. 6d. net. (Jarrolds.)

We started this book with a sense of disappointment because there are no pictures, and pictures surely are one of the chief assets in a book of travel. Two German brothers, Willem and Fritz Jaspert, accompanied by the wife and child of the former, set out to explore the part of Africa known as Angola. There is no doubt their journeyings were hazardous in the extreme. The calamities which befell them, including evil treatment at the hands of the Portuguese, were rather overwhelming, but the fault of this book is too much preoccupation with such things as lack of funds, sickness and "official" obstruction. This does not mean that the expedition was a failure—indeed there was a considerable measure of success. The whole party lived as guests of the blacks, shared in native feasts and witnessed many of the strange rites of cannibal tribes, and there was evidently more in the journey than this book conveys to the reader. It is too much of a dull itinerary, lacking in vivid description.

From Alice & Thomas & Jane By Enid Bagnold (Heinemann). LAURIAN JONES, JOINT ARTIST WITH THE AUTHOR.

From Athletics of To-day for Women By F. A. M. Webster (Warne).

THE JAVELIN—THE REVERSE. Lady Heath shows a well-balanced position behind the scratch line.

OUTSIDE HEAVEN'S GATES.

By IVY M. CLAYTON. 7s. 6d. (Stanley Paul.)

Miss Clayton has provided an entertaining interlude for those who enjoy following sheer romance through considerable difficulties. The long arm of coincidence and abundant wealth are well employed, but they are generously diffused by delightful descriptions, especially of Italian gardens, scenery, etc. Roma, a young and beautiful girl, was left by her dying father in the charge of a friend, a merciless, brutal despot. This in itself is rather difficult to believe, but it forms a useful foundation for the development of the story. As the romance, commenced in stolen meetings by the riverside, steadily grows, the perplexities accumulate. The scene shifts to the sunny slopes of the Italian Riviera and here the flaws in the apparently insuperable barrier begin to appear, and with unerring neatness the unravelling develops until a thoroughly desirable solution is found.

THE GOLDEN FOREST.

By EDITH HOWES. 6s. (Dent.)

Miss Howes' previous parables of parenthood have been warmly received. These, in several volumes, have aimed at telling girls, in tender fashion, the facts of motherhood. "The Golden Forest" is admirably planned to serve a corresponding purpose in giving boys a knowledge of life, creation and fatherhood. Mr. Morne, a rich naturalist, takes a piece of raw material in the shape of Jack Rendy, an ill-treated guttersnipe, and through him opens the eyes of all other boys who are fortunate enough to possess the book. "Golden Forest" was the name of the property in New Zealand where Mr. Morne kept a number of animals for the purposes of investigation. Surrounded by the teeming wild life of the district and under the kindly care of a real animal-lover, Jack revelled in the freedom of the out-of-doors life and imbibed much gently-conveyed knowledge as he fulfilled his own particular duties. There is no doubt of the book's appeal to boys and no parents could desire a more delicate handling of the subject.

THE CHILDREN'S CARGO.

Lady Cynthia Asquith's Annual.

With coloured plates. 6s. net. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Like the delectable ship of the nursery rhyme—"And O, it was laden with pretty things for thee"—"The Children's Cargo" is almost below the Plimsoll line with the treasures it brings to the young people. "There are comfits in the cabin, And apples in the hold," and from the first poem, by Rose Fyleman, "Miss Brown," the nursery dressmaker, to the best story, by Adelaide Phillpotts, of "The Omnibus That Went Its Own Way," the cargo is full of appeal. Among those who have contributed to the good things are Walter de la Mare, Hilaire Belloc, Algernon Blackwood, A. A. Milne and Arthur Machen—we have not room for the other good names. There is a bit of entertaining guesswork by Denis Mackail; there are many full-page coloured plates, and there is an unusual, arresting story of a child-king and a protecting spirit-dog, by the editor herself. In fact here is a handsome volume of good literature, which children will merely recognise as "just right."

From Athletics of To-day for Women By F. A. M. Webster (Warne).

THE JAVELIN. Fräulein Hargus, German and World's record holder, showing the training method of throwing into the ground.

FRAU VICKI BAUM,
Author of "Grand Hotel" (Geoffrey Bles).

LEAVE IT TO SUSAN.

By K. R. G. BROWNE. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

A book of rollicking humour that contains all the ingredients of a first-rate comedy (including a butler with the embarrassing name of Darling), "Leave It To Susan" has a plot of love and mystery which never for a moment fails to be as amusing as it is exciting. Nicholas Durham, down in Essex to spend a week-end with an old school friend, falls in with a delightful girl, tries to catch her dog for her, lands in a house in which he has no business, and eventually finds himself involved in a mysterious affair concerning a Frenchman, his niece, an irate admiral who collects snuff-boxes and some others, including the girl herself and the lugubrious butler. A spirit of gaiety prevails throughout, and the story is as entertaining in theme as it is in the telling.

THE SECRET ATTIC.

By Frank R. Adams. 7s. 6d. (Stanley Paul.)

We cannot, it is certain, have too many mystery stories, and here is an excellent example of the sort of stuff that old and young England devours—on sea, on land, after work and at week-ends. Mr. Adams writes so pleasantly and clearly that we are grateful to him. There is none of that obscurity about his work which lurks in some subtler tales. Everybody can enjoy the dramatic opening, when Alan Long gets a job as caretaker of Stephen Cornewell's camp up at Tramping Lake, and on going to the station pauses to rescue a girl from drowning. He takes her along with him to be his housekeeper in that lonely hut to which he is going; and because she does not wish to make her name known to him he calls her Sylvia Waters. At the big house there is much mystery, a false door in the wall, a bloodstain under a rug. There are footsteps and rappings. No danger of the reader dropping the book at that; he will continue it to its fascinating close.

From The Home of the Blizzard
By Sir Douglas Mawson
(Hodder & Stoughton).

CORRELL ON EDGE OF RAVINE.

ADIOS!

By L. and V. S. Bartlett. 7s. 6d. (Murray.)

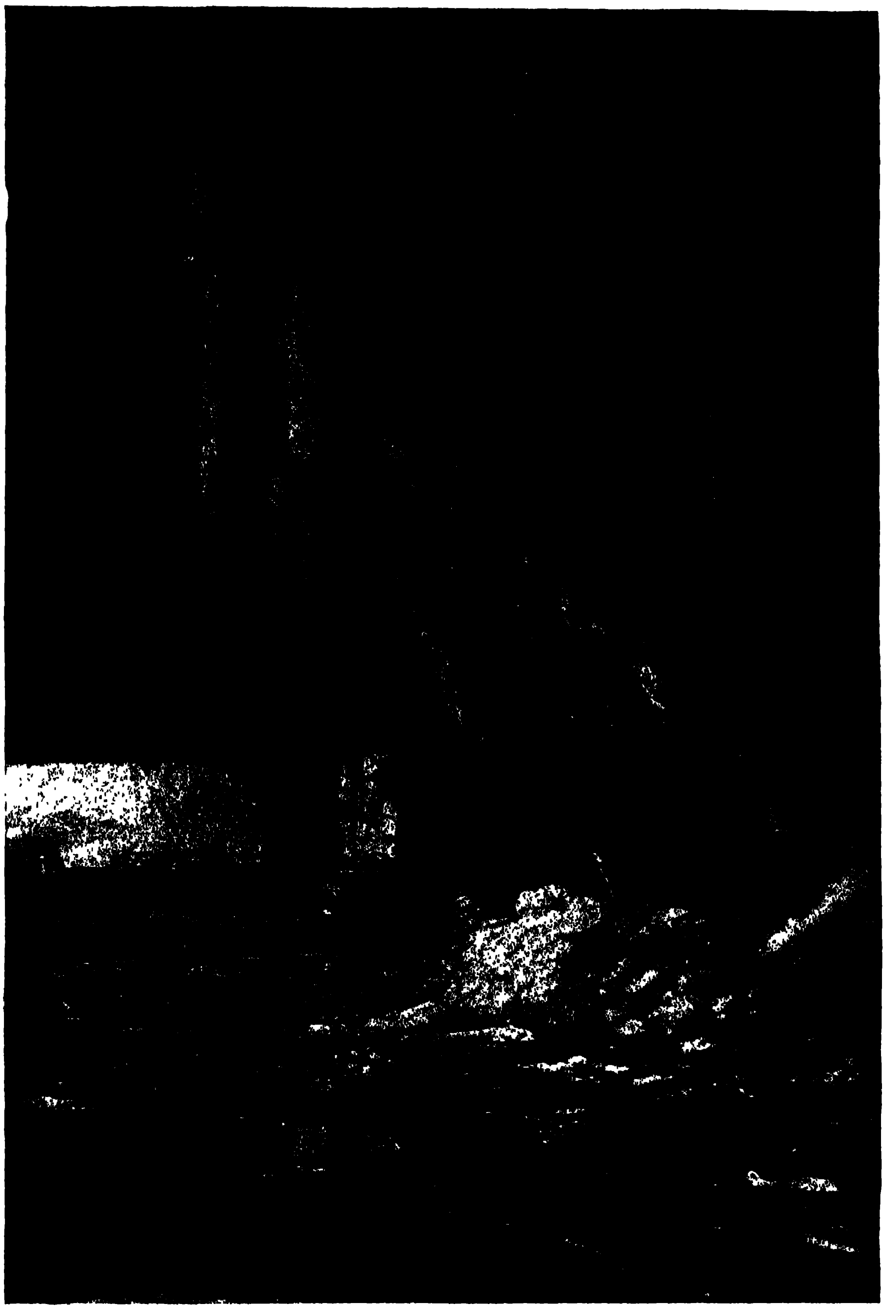
This historical romance records the adventures of Francisco Delfino, the gallant outlaw who, as a Spanish-Californian, was driven into rebellion by the tyranny of Yankee officialdom. A brutal assault, unavenged by American justice, sent Francisco to the hills, where he speedily formed a band of rebels, who practised the rough-and-ready justice of Robin Hood. On the other side, the forces of the law were represented by a band of rough-riders under Captain Howard, the finest representative here presented of an American gentleman. The elements of romance are woven by Howard's love for Delfino's sister, Anita, and by the affection that had formed between the two equally gallant men. This is a fine and unusual story, packed full of thrilling adventures, and includes a delicately told love-romance. Only one end to such a story is possible, and the authors do not seek to evade it. Delfino, the dreaded "Puma," utters his last adiós as he hurls himself to destruction beyond all reach of discovery.

RAIN BEFORE WIND.

By Frank Stafford. 7s. 6d. net. (Wright & Brown.)

Messrs. Wright & Brown make their bow to the public with this bustling story of love and adventure by an author who may be trusted to know his business from A to Z. It concerns the love of the beautiful Myrtle Farr-Johnson—Lady Gairloch as she becomes, in order to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the father—and Mark Chesterman, first officer on board one of the ships owned by Lord Gairloch. It is full of perils, thrills and hazardous exploits, leading finally, as all good tales do, to the happy pealing of wedding bells. A first-rate tonic for that post-holiday sinking feeling.

THE BACK-STAGE MYSTERY.



By Octavus Roy Cohen. 7s. 6d. net. (Appleton.)

Mr. Cohen nearly always gives us a good story, but we should not call this one of his best. It concerns the deductions of Jim Hanvey, a fat, indolent and benevolent detective on the track of murder and theft. The deceased, an objectionable actor, met his end in his own dressing-room at the theatre. Everyone who has come into contact with him has had the motive and opportunity to do him violence, including a property man, a leading lady, a jealous wife, a young Southern gentleman, his fiancée and her father. This results in some highly confused thinking on the part of the "official" police and some highly intelligent thinking on the part of the portly Jim Hanvey. The plot is good and some of the characters interesting, but the final solution of the mystery is a curious antithesis.

MARIO AND THE MAGICIAN.

By Thomas Mann. 5s. net. (Secker.)

When a German family went to an Italian seaside resort they found a curiously irritating atmosphere. They were refused the dining-table with the red-shaded lamp upon which the children had set their hearts at the Grand Hotel. Then there was the stupid panic at the vestiges of whooping-cough from which the little ones had but lately recovered. Even the burning sun became dull and slightly hostile; and finally there was the fracas about the action of the little daughter (eight years old) who stripped on the beach to wash her costume in the sea. Should they not turn their backs on the inhospitable place? Surely not! "Rather stay and look matters in the face, brave them out, perhaps precisely in so doing lies a lesson for us to learn." They stayed on: and reaped as the reward of their constancy "the unholy and staggering experience with Cipolla." This Cipolla was a travelling virtuoso, a conjurer. The bare announcement turned the children's heads, and all doubts due to the lateness of the performance were swept away by their enthusiasm. The family went. All the town, it appeared, had also gone. There was a delay in the appearance of the solitary performer, and when he appeared he proved slightly sinister. "A man of an age hard to determine, but by no means young, with sharp, ravaged eyes, compressed lips, black waxed moustache, and a so-called imperial in the curve between mouth and chin." When he divested himself of his cloak he appeared to be slightly deformed, and his physical deformity later proved to have warped his mind. His performance began strangely, and as it developed deepened in mystery. The children laughed, applauded and slept by turn. Should they not be taken home? No!—fascination, curiosity, an unwholesome spell held the parents, until their wills were liberated by the final tragedy. The change from the humorous irritation of the opening, to the developing mystery and horror of the climax in this "short novel or long short story," is as masterly as anything accomplished by Cipolla himself. The atmosphere is everything, and it is rendered with subtle skill and culminating force; and the briefness of the book, making it possible to sustain the atmosphere throughout, perhaps shows Thomas Mann to better advantage than his longer works. The illustrations by Hans Meid are in the spirit of the story.

From The Home of the Blizzard
By Sir Douglas Mawson
(Hodder & Stoughton).

GIGANTIC ICICLES ON THE CLIFF FACE OF THE SHACKLETON SHELF.

THE TICKER-TAPE MURDER.

By Milton M. Propper. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.

Some of the most ingenious detective stories are all compact of boredom: their very ingenuity is a constant irritation. Mr. Propper's story has the great merit of holding the interest on every page. There are two detectives on the trail, acting each on his own conception of the finding of the dead body of the financier, Philip Nixon, on the railway track. Daniel Gilmore, the elder, is cool and dispassionate; Tommy Rankin is eager and anxious; both are equally thorough. The book is full of suspects. First we have the men who were liable to be ruined by their own rash dealings in Nixon's railway shares; second we have his private secretary, Donald Gardiner, whom Nixon would not allow to marry his beloved daughter, Eleanor; third we have the valet Parker; fourth, the Marley family, whose sister, Martha, has been Nixon's mistress. And there are others. It is amusing to feel the chagrin of the detectives when they have made out a perfect case along each line, only to realise that they are wrong. There is only one mistake about this really brilliant detective chronicle, and that is its name, which has little bearing on the novel.

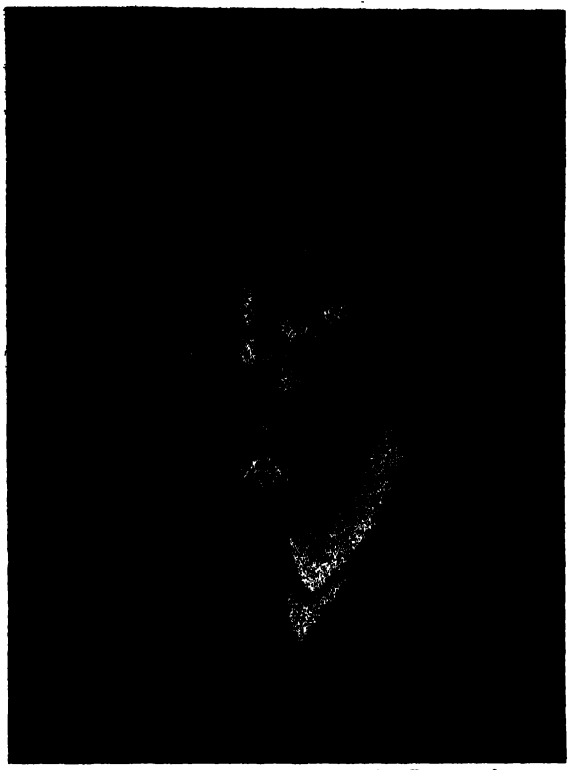
THE ROYAL NAVY.

By Geoffrey Parratt 7s 6d (Sheldon Press)

THE AMERICA'S CUP

By Nigel Lindsay 6s (Heath Cranton)

Notwithstanding the many books that have appeared on the Royal Navy the public generally is badly informed, and one therefore welcomes Captain Parratt's book, as he gives all the salient points needed or desired The author is not a naval man (as a matter of fact he is the esteemed manager of that old society, the S P C K), but has made shipping and naval matters a life-long study and so, though writing with knowledge he is unbiased by naval tradition and free from technicalities The book is written in no spirit of jingoism, yet it is truly emphasised that the British Empire more so than any other nation depends for its very existence on a strong navy Commending the book in a foreword, Vice-Admiral J F. T Harper says Our great empire is an outstanding example of what can be created by sea power and by sea power it must be maintained In times of war a nation which exists by the sea must be strong enough at sea to ensure the safe transport of its own ships Captain Parratt points out how little realised even to-day are the great efforts of the Navy during the War and how every little disaster met with the cry, What is the Navy doing? We remember when there was a minor German victory and the usual cry went up, yet we (we were on the Thames at the time) checked in the Lower Hope seventy-five vessels inward bound that day There is a remarkable amount of information condensed in the book, which covers naval warfare a short history of the Royal Navy and its development The chapter on battle tactics with numerous diagrams showing formation, etc, will help the layman to understand many things that have perhaps hitherto puzzled him A number of full-page photographs of ships, past and present, together with pen-and-ink sketches, increase the value of the book, which is one to be read and retained for reference



Cecil Freeman Gregg
Author of "The Brazen Confession (Hutchinson)

From naval warfare and its terrible consequences it is a pleasure to turn to a friendly rivalry on the sea the contest for that blue ribband of the yachting world—the America's Cup There is perhaps no one event in the world of sport that arouses such a world-wide interest, and its history as told by Mr Nigel Lindsay of the Royal Ulster Yacht Club comes at an opportune moment For its genesis we have to go back to the time of the Great Exhibition of 1850 when America a schooner-yacht and the first to sail the Atlantic came over on the invitation of British yachtsmen and took away the cup that has since borne the name of the yacht The author reminds us that she was not actually the winner as the American yacht did not complete the course, but in a generous gesture the British yacht did not press its legitimate claim Unfortunately that fine sporting spirit was not reciprocated in the years that followed and several of the races engendered bad feeling that however has passed away and the unsatisfactory conditions under which the races were once sailed exist no longer Up to the time of the Lipton era it is rather difficult to say which race caused the most interest but perhaps it was in 1887 when Thistle was the challenger As a lad we remember her lying off the New Thames Yacht Club at Gravesend, when King Edward, then Prince of Wales, came down We all took a personal pride in the yacht and were convinced the cup would come back, may Sir Thomas Lipton have the luck he deserves The very fine illustrations help one to realise the change in the design of the boats from the first challenger, Cambria, with her square topsail and foresail, to the cutter rig of the Shamrocks, though one regrets it was apparently not possible to include Shamrock V as she is the first to have Bermudian rig To yachtsmen the details of each yacht will be of special interest, whilst the maps of the racing courses and the conditions of the 1930 challenge will be helpful to all. Mr Lindsay has carefully compiled all that is of interest and, although he says no one but a yachtsman will be foolish enough to read his book, all who take an interest in clean, healthy sport will read it with pleasure.

From The Royal Navy
By Geoffrey Parratt
(Sheldon Press)

Lord Nelson about 1802
(After Beechy. Duke of Wellington Collection)

MR. PIERRE LOVING.

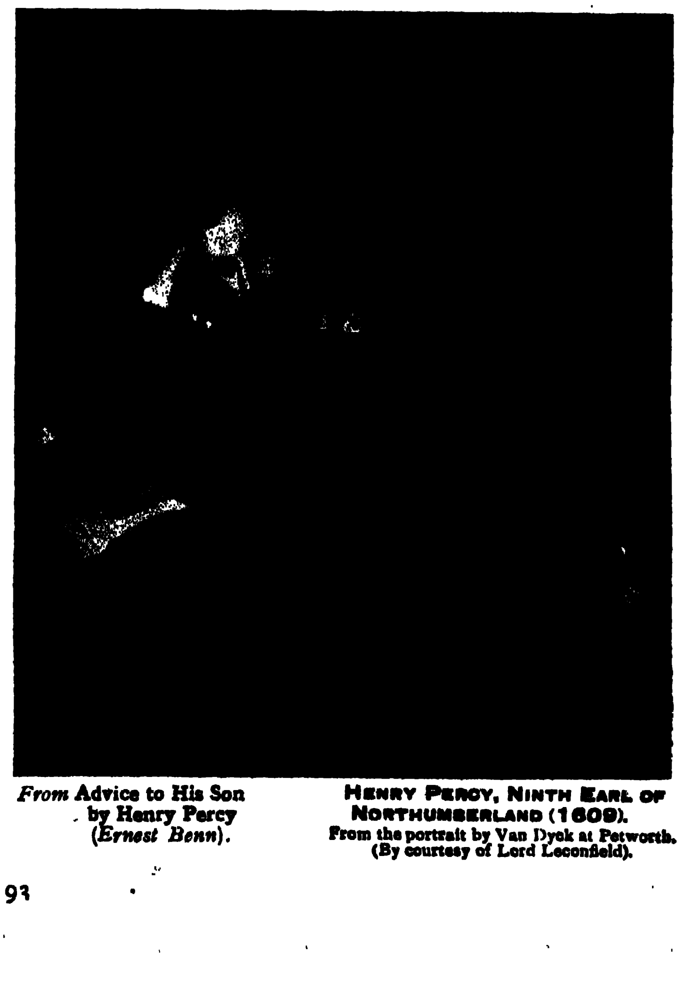
THE CAT OF HEAVEN.

By PIERRE LOVING. 7s. 6d. (Toulmin.)

With Baudelaire as its hero, this "attempt to interpret his mind and wit in relation to the circumstances of his life," in the words of the publisher, has a public ready made for it. What other public it will win for itself remains to be seen. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of work; but the Paris in which the scene is laid appears to us now a slightly silly Paris, and the artists and poets who inhabited it, for all their brilliance, a little futile as men. This background is, one feels, of rather greater concern to the author than a background should be; Baudelaire, whose genius should make him stand out from it, tends to sink into the position, invidious for a hero, of being merely one of a crowd.

ADVICE TO HIS SON BY HENRY PERCY,

Ninth Earl of Northumberland (1609).



Edited, with a biographical introduction, by G. B. HARRISON. 8s. 6d. net. (Ernest Benn.)

For all he came of ancient family with vast estates, it was an inheritance of ill-fortune and sorrow that fell to Henry Percy, and misfortunes multiplied. His uncle died on the scaffold at York for his share in the rising of the north in 1569. His father—a prisoner in the Tower—was murdered in 1585. (The government made out that he committed suicide.) His mother pretended no love for the young Earl. Marriage with the widow of Sir Thomas Perrot and the sister of Essex, "a lady of strong personality and a bitter tongue," was a long clash of wills, for Northumberland—deaf and hot tempered—quarrelled with Essex and the Countess sided with her brother. Then came the Powder Plot, and since his kinsman, Thomas Percy, was in it, then must Northumberland be brought to trial; with the result that he stayed in the Tower for fifteen years. During that long imprisonment Henry Percy wrote the greater part of this "Advice" to his son, which Dr. Harrison has now given to the world, prefacing it with an exceedingly useful introduction. The "Advice" is in two parts. In the first part the author is more concerned to set out, with refinement of style, his own views on education. The second part is—as Dr. Harrison observes—"no longer a treatise on educational method, but autobiography with comments," and "autobiography of this quality is almost unique at the beginning of the seventeenth century." There is anticipation of Lord Chesterfield's worldly common sense in the proverbial philosophy of Northumberland. "It is a greater mishap to become poor than always to have been poor." Children learning to read "should rather be employed in books well written for the phrase than chosen for the matter." Education is to perfect a man "in four things specially, graceful manners, commendable exercises, tone studies and a well-fashioned mind." Of the commendable exercises, "dancing may be admitted to grace the carriage." The well-fashioned mind "is free from perturbations and unseemly affections." In the second part the reflections are on wives (of whom a low and mournful view is taken), servants, and the management of landed property. The author has become "a kind of cynical Prospero, contemplating his own failure from the confines of a cell." To historical students, and to a larger public this book—small in bulk—should be entirely welcome.

HOW TO MANAGE OUR WOMEN.

By HENRY SAVAGE. Illustrated by AUBREY HAMMOND. 7s. 6d. net. (Toulmin.)

We might easily accuse Mr. Henry Savage of poking fun at himself as well as his neighbour. He is frank enough to admit, on the title page of his new book, that it is a deception—devices and pretences offered to such a type as "the solicitor's clerk with an unmanageable wife." It is a sprightly excursion into a weighty subject and thoroughly appetising, being full of witty ingenuity and the ripe wisdom of experience. It is only fair to say however that it is more a handbook of evasion than of management. Mr. Savage, a cynical being I fear, knows quite well that the wise male does not attempt to manage women, but learns to avoid being managed by them. The "advice" is contained in letters from Mr. Savage to his friends, and Mr. Aubrey Hammond's bizarre drawings lay further emphasis on one or two points lest they be obscure. We guarantee the book as delicious entertainment

From Advice to His Son by Henry Percy (Ernest Benn).

HENRY PERCY, NINTH EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (1609).
From the portrait by Van Dyck at Petworth.
(By courtesy of Lord Leconfield).

FINE ANGLING FOR COARSE FISH.

Lonsdale Library. Vol. IV. 12s. 6d. (Seeley, Service.)

From Fine Angling for Coarse Fish
By Eric Parker and other Authorities
(Seeley, Service).

THE PIKE (ESOX LUCIUS).

Lord Lonsdale in an editorial introduction explains that the aim of this excellent "library of sports, games and pastimes" is "to help and instruct"; not only the beginner "who wishes to learn all that the written word can teach him of his chosen subject," but also "the more experienced sportsman." The purpose is amply fulfilled in the latest volume. Mr. Eric Parker writes engagingly and learnedly of the literature of coarse fishing. Mr. Edward Ensom deals at length with roach and dace, perch, bream, chub, gudgeon and pope. Dr. W. J. Turrell discourses on pike-fishing and the art of spinning. The clerks to the Norfolk and Trent Fishery Boards elucidate Broadland fishing and the problems of fishery management. Captain A. P. L. Bacon removes all doubts on the legal aspect of fishing. In fact nothing relative is omitted, and the volume is simply indispensable to all who follow the craft of old Izaak Walton. More than fifty admirable full-page plates and one hundred other illustrations—to say nothing of a full bibliography—add to the joy and comfort of the reader.

CHINESE ART.

By WILLIAM COHN. 10s. 6d. net. (Studio.)

Chinese art is a product of over three thousand years, and Mr. Cohn essays to sketch its history in a brief seventy-five pages. In one sense it cannot be done, yet in another Mr. Cohn does it very well. He clears the ground with a few general remarks upon the three large divisions, or periods, into which Chinese art falls—the Early (to 249 B.C.) Middle Ages (to A.D. 960), and the Modern—and then specifically surveys the fields of Architecture, Bronzes, Painting, Sculpture, Ceramics, and Jade, Lacquer, Textiles and Silver. Under each head he indicates the broad features, with a glance at structure and development, so far as these can be described. For Mr. Cohn's chief point is that our knowledge of the subject, judged by the requirements of modern scientific method, is only in its very infancy. His informing chapters, based upon an extensive acquaintance and profound understanding of the various arts, are made specially valuable by detailed references to the ninety accompanying plates, which reproduce mainly examples from German collections shown at the exhibition of Chinese art in Berlin last year, the author's external motive for preparing this volume.

From Blowing Clear
By Joseph C. Lincoln
(Appleton)

WRAPPER DESIGN.

BRIAND: MAN OF PEACE.

By VALENTINE THOMSON. 18s. net. (Hutchinson.)

The daughter of a former Minister of Marine, herself brought up in the husky atmosphere of politics, has built up an interesting monograph on a foundation of personal memories. Mme. Thomson's study in no way suffers from the contrast between her easy and straightforward manner and the stormy tale she has to tell, for she gives her narrative a crisp and attractive form by the shortness of her chapters and the neatness of her paragraphs. After all it is no slight tribute to the sitter when a woman-artist can enhance a living likeness by the delicacy of her strokes. We are too much accustomed to shrill invective in the politics of France—a country that, as has been said, celebrates even its school fêtes by singing the most bloodthirsty anthem ever known. If M. Poincaré is the Socrates of France (especially in looks), and the late M. Clemenceau was her surly Diogenes, M. Briand might well be classed as the Nestor or the Cato, if he were not much more the man of action than the mere oracle. Over and over again he has made himself the master in an international encounter by the breadth of his ideas and the moderation of his tone. He has been likened to Mr. Lloyd George because of his Celtic origin and humble birth, his emergence from party surroundings into an international figure, his powers of improvisation at unexpected crises, and even the Druidic amplitude of his hair. But when Mr. George came back from the Paris Conference he reduced the account of his stewardship to a petty wrangle with Lord Northcliffe, and wasted an historic opportunity. On the other hand, M. Briand came to London for the Locarno treaty, and no one who heard him is likely to forget the quiet speech in which, with the spokesman of the Germans facing him, he exhorted all present to be good Europeans. Few statesmen in history could have carried off so great a gesture with sincerity, but his hearers knew the sentiment was of a piece with his whole career, even where he had to use strong measures to save the State. Alas! it was his colleagues on this occasion who supplied the anti-climax, for M. Briand went back that evening to an all-night sitting of the Chamber and the politicians who should have honoured him strove desperately to turn him out. Mme. Thomson brings out the best of her subject's life and character without flattery and without the "schoolboy love of antithesis." Her best chapters are the early ones because they forsake the beaten track of the familiar, and make his childhood live—the struggle of a Breton lad who fledged his imagination by reading Jules Verne, and brought himself back to realities by a contemplation of the sea. When his uncle was carried ashore, the relic of a wreck, the lad could look at nothing but the corpse's heavy boots; the cruel belongings that had sucked the hapless victim down to his death. Only those who have tried are aware of the many pitfalls for a writer who attempts the biography of a living celebrity, especially one who has been nearly a dozen times Premier. There is always the scuffle of controversy, cross-sectioning by party, the dust of misrepresentation and the danger of spoiling the result by a varnish of gush. Mme. Thomson has avoided all this, and made us her debtors to the extent of a convincing study of a profoundly human being. She makes us perceive that the "brav' Aristide" has increased his stature during the War and since, and of how many other statesmen can the same be said?

J. P. C.

From The Red Lily
By Anatole France
(Bodley Head).

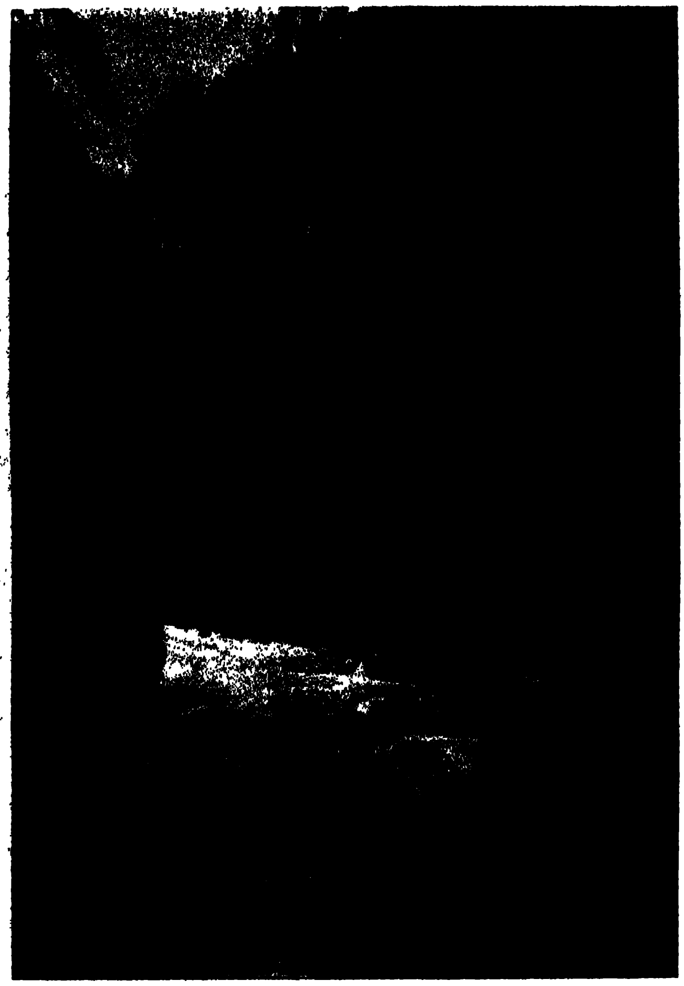
"IT WAS QUITE CLEAR SHE HAD A LOVER. SHE WAS WRITING TO HIM."

ORDEAL BY AIR.



By JOHN SCOTT HUGHES. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

The biographical particulars about Mr. Hughes which appear on the jacket of the book make one wish he had given us a straight book of experiences. As it is he has woven these experiences into a melodramatic novel. He is well qualified to write about flying and certainly conveys vividly the emotions and sensations of a pilot during a forced landing at sea, bombing and sinking a submarine, and other war exploits of the old R.N.A.S. I mean that Mr. Hughes is all right "in the air," but when he comes to earth and wades about in espionage, making his hero the victim of a fool commander and very nearly the victim of a German spy, the tale loses strength and vigour. Nevertheless, a readable book, with good things wrapped round a wellnigh worn out plot.

ETRURIA PAST AND PRESENT.

By M. A. JOHNSTONE. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)

To the library of books about Italy there seems no end; to them Mr. Johnstone's volume is by no means the least welcome, since it provides in compact and readable form a mass of information about some of the most captivating people and towns of the country. Mr. Johnstone does not write for trippers, but for intelligent travellers who are willing to absorb a certain amount of hard fact and steer their way through conflicting theories. Yet he is never dull, and his book is made the more valuable for its ample illustrations and diagrams.

From The Harz Mountains
By Christopher Marlowe
(Bodley Head).

VALLEY OF THE BODE NEAR THALE.

THE HARZ MOUNTAINS.

By CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE. 8s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

Before the War the Harz Mountains were comparatively little known by English visitors, who kept to the line Hanover-Brunswick-Magdeburg and did not venture southward to such lovely little spots as Halberstadt, Goslar, Wernigerode and Quedlinburg —still less to the fantastic Brocken with its grim stories of Walpurgisnacht. Now that Germany is again welcoming tourists, Mr. Marlowe should find himself in great demand as a guide, philosopher and friend to those contemplating a trip to this district —a trip which, as the present reviewer can testify, will remain conspicuously in their memory. Mr. Marlowe writes easily and entertainingly, managing to cram a great deal of information into a volume that can comfortably be slipped into the pocket.

RAMBLING KID.

By CHARLES ASHLEIGH. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

Semi-illiterates are the favourite figures in contemporary American fiction. Mr. Theodore Dreiser, Mr. John dos Passos and Mr. Ernest Hemingway are finding shoals of imitators. It would perhaps be unfair to Mr. Ashleigh to say that he has copied these transatlantic writers, especially as he has given his hero an East London birthplace; but certainly his picturesque yarn of the life of Joe Crane, called by his proletarian associates, " London Slim," on tramp through America, approximated in its telling to the immediate popular American model, which disdains all elegance. Like Mr. Upton Sinclair, Mr. Dreiser and Mr. dos Passos, Mr. Charles Ashleigh has evidently strong sympathy for America's revolutionary Labour movement. Joe is early made a member of that formidable organisation, the I.W.W., and is henceforward hailed as a " Wobbly." He becomes a hobo, jumps trains, and every now and then does a job of printing, but he gets right into Red politics wherever he goes: his one love affair is with a Communist girl. One of his comrades who believes in taking money from the rich to retain for the poor, involves Joe in a hold-up of wealthy townsmen. Though he is entirely innocent, he is lodged in the county jail. This is all to the good for the book as it enables the author to present a startling view of American prison life. Joe gets a lucky release and is smuggled out of California disguised as a sailor.

DOWN TO THE SEA.

By B. ALEXIS MACANDREW. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

" I mean to be beautiful and seductive," is Leone Lombard's decision when her parents ask her to choose a career before she leaves school. Then a miracle happens, an uncle dies and leaves her five hundred pounds a year till she is of age, and a fortune after that. She gets a little flat in London, looks up her school friends and learns her profession. In spite or because of its note of modernity, its clipped phrases, its cocktail loving girls and boys, we have here the old story of beauty, youth, love and rivalry; the sense and nonsense of the young. They all seem able to sport motor-cars, and kisses are popular, almost as frequent as cocktails, and so somewhat cheap. These young people are however much more self-reliant and more sensible than the sweet maidens of past years. The end of the story is marvellously hidden until the last paragraph.

From A Wayfarer in Wales
By W. Watkin Davies
(Methuen).

Reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

DYFFRYN MOELFRE.
(Photo by Judges, Ltd.)

THE HEAVENS AND THE UNIVERSE.

By OSWALD THOMAS, Ph.D. Translated by BERNARD MIALL. 7s. 6d. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

Dr. Oswald Thomas is a professor at Vienna and the late director of the Uraina Observatory. For many years he was accustomed to conduct parties on astronomical night excursions. "We observed the stars; we imagined ourselves transported into the space of the universe; and often I continued my talks until the sun rose to greet us." It is those tales, illuminated with the professor's sketches and diagrams, that are now given to an English audience in this eminently readable book. We can imagine nothing more helpful to all who would know something of the constellations of the heavens, of the movements of shooting stars, of the limits of the milky way and the glory revealed by the telescope. To the plain man, conscious of ignorance in the presence of nightly wonder, a book like this is invaluable. Ignorance can be dispelled without the telescope and knowledge extended, thanks to Dr. Oswald Thomas and his translator.

BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON.

By "ANONYMOUS." 21s. net. (Hutchinson.)

The author of that much-debated book, "The Pomp of Power," here renews the hubbub as to his identity, but with rather less frankness and attack. For instead of flaying other people he mounts the pedestal of reminiscent monologue, and gives us a series of anecdotal recollections rather than a matter-of-fact autobiography. He has a pen that is eminently suited to the lighter task—allusive, diverse and free from misgiving. He has watched life at many points—Canada, the law, society, politics, journalism (ownership included), and a round of "good men's tables." This perhaps is what lends the book its "clarety" flavour and zest, and eliminates the trite, the tumid and the stale. The author gives the palm to Brussels in respect, not only of fine Burgundy, but certain lines of cookery, but it is an agreeable relief to find that he devotes his book, not to victuals and kitchen-lore, but to the people he has met and the things they had to say:

"A few months ago I happened to be dining one night at a foreign Legation in a Continental capital. The French, Belgian, Dutch and Hungarian nationalities were represented amongst the twelve persons around the table, who also included three English-speaking people—two Americans and an Englishman. Yet at a certain moment my neighbour and myself happened to notice that all the conversation—and the conversation was not general—was being carried on in English. Twenty years ago that would never have been seen—or rather heard."

Perhaps it would justify a higher complacency if the English-speaking guests had been as competent in other languages as their neighbours evidently were. Elsewhere, as one might expect from his previous book, the author dips his pen pretty freely into politics. He tells how Mr. Lloyd George asked Mr. J. M. Keynes once at dinner his opinion on his financial policy, and got the answer: "All nonsense"—one that must have made an ice course needless. The book is decidedly entertaining, and is full of that essence of interest—little known things about well-known people. Nothing has been better said, for instance, about Lady Astor than somebody's comment quoted here—that she differs in one important respect from Lady Randolph Churchill—that she is interested in movements, whereas her compatriot has known no interests except "Randolph and Winston."

From Mrs. Grundy
By Leo Markum
(Appleton).

THE MAY-POLE.
After a painting by J. Nash.

THE ORDEAL OF MARK BANNISTER.

By A. COMPTON RICKETT and PATRICK LEYTON. 7s. 6d. (Herbert Jenkins.)

One moral of this absorbing story is not to evince an interest in crime in the presence of literal-minded busybodies. That is what Mark Bannister did in his dryly humorous way, and when his aunt died suddenly in his flat, leaving him all her wealth, some people began to talk about his curious interest in weed-killers. Rumour grew and grew until Bannister's life became haunted, and there was a guilty secret in his mind which lent force to the false suspicions. This situation is very orginally conceived and handled, and the story is driven almost to the verge of tragedy. The method of Bannister's escape from this thraldom will come as a complete surprise to the reader. Murder had been committed, but it was only by a detective's clever use of a dictaphone that the real criminal was convicted by his own recorded conversation. This book will take a high place among the detective stories of the year. Its writing and its characterisation give it distinction among its kind.

PEARLS, ARMS AND HASHISH.

By HENRI DE MONFRIED. Written down by IDA TREAT. Illustrated 18s. net. (Gollancz.)

"The Sea-Wolf," we are told, was the name given by the British Admiralty to M. Henri de Monfried, otherwise

Abd el Hai, a Frenchman of New English ancestry who went native, and became slave-trader, pearl-fisher, gun-runner and hashish-smuggler in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean—a picturesque background for adventures some of which M. de Monfried's ingenious apologia pro vita sua does not quite succeed in making commendable. There is a half-veiled reference to Colonel Lawrence which throws a curious light on our relations with the Arabs; the account of the pearl fisheries is interesting; and some vivid pen-pictures are given of life among the Somalis and other natives. We notice, by the way, that the old story of the Essex men who cut off the calf's head to extricate it from a gate seems to have its counterpart in Somaliland. One is inevitably reminded of the old African ivory trader, whose reflections and adventures were recorded in a similar way by a woman novelist. The book has no index, and one wishes that some of M. de Monfried's water-colour sketches had been included among the illustrations; but the story he has to tell is an unusual and interesting one, and it has been admirably set down.

GOD IN THE SLUMS.

By Hugh Redwood. 1s. net paper; 2s. 6d. net cloth. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

If the Salvation Army did no other work, its work in the slums would command the attention and admiration of the world. In this record of the Slum Posts there is no trace of hysteria and false emotion. It is the work of a prominent London journalist, Mr. Hugh Redwood, who by the accident of the Thames flood two years ago discovered the slums and discovered the "Army." There is a marvellously thrilling "story within a story" told here as to how this book came to be written. This is one of the most romantic and inspiring stories we have ever read. A band of young women are bringing in the Kingdom of God as part of the day's work. Here is a noble answer to religious scepticism and vain questionings as to the reality and power of the Unseen. In this book we feel the glow of the primal fire of early Christianity. It is impossible to underestimate the magnitude of the slum task. Rat-ridden, obscene hovels and their ghoulish inhabitants are cleansed and renewed. The hungry who seek bread are sustained, the weak are defended, sometimes at the cost of life itself. Self-effacement is a simple instinct with the devoted slum staff of the Salvation Army. Their first duty to themselves and to the community, they would say, is the practice of the presence of God. The Slum Officer stops murder, rescues girls and women from the streets, and mends everything from broken heads to broken hearts, and it is all in the day's programme and always the officer is "led by God." Do not argue for or against miracles, do not philosophise about prayer—read this book! If God is not in this work we need not trouble about Him. This is a book of miracles as up to date as the morning paper. Men and women are being made new and old things are passing away. Mr. Hugh Redwood quotes this unemotional but typical report of a Slum Officer—note the significance of the last sentence:

> "I thought I would prowl around, and just make friends where I could. So I entered a yard. The houses were all broken and empty, but something led me to peep into one of them. I thought at the time it was curiosity, but I afterwards knew it was God. Huddled up in a corner was a young woman with a wee baby. There was no bed for them, and she was black with bruises. She had lived with a man who had turned her out after ten years, during which time she had borne him nine children. To-day she has died from exposure and inattention at the birth of the baby. The man, since he is not married to her, goes free. Of course I am fixing up the children."

It is not too much to say that here is another "Broken Earthenware," and it has qualities that make it of more universal appeal. In the face of the facts and romance of this book, questions of theology fade into insignificance. It is the work of Christ, the remaking of men and women.

From God in the Slums
By Hugh Redwood
(Hodder & Stoughton).

Wrapper Design.
From a drawing by Frank Brangwyn.

THAT WILD LIE.

By Naomi Jacobs. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

A really good yarn with a genuine grip upon character. Emmanuel Gollantz, the Jew who came to England to found a family and a fortune, is a magnificent figure, kindly and hard, worldly and simple, and with constant and great integrity of purpose. The story itself presents little that is arresting; but the telling of it makes the book very much worth reading.

NIGHT RAIDERS OF THE AIR.

By A. R. KINGSFORD. 7s. 6d. (John Hamilton.)

This book has two defects. It is overburdened with slang, and its author is too much inclined to follow the war-books of the "women and wine" school. This is a pity because he has a good story to tell, and his sense of the dramatic enables him to tell his story extremely well. The "I" of the story is an artist whom we first meet as a soldier with New Zealand troops on their way to the War. He has adventures, which make good reading, before he is transferred to the Flying Corps. We are given a useful insight into the flying training organisation in England from the schools at Denham and Oxford, through reserve and home defence squadrons, to the fighting school at Turnberry. After a spell as an anti-Zeppelin pilot at home, the narrator joined No. 100 Squadron in France. This was in January, 1918, and he is at fault when he describes the squadron as a unit of the Independent Force which was in fact not formed until June, 1918. But this is a small slip, and the account he gives of the night-flying exploits of the F.G. 26's is authentic and exciting. The illustrations are first class.

From Night Raiders of the Air
By A. R. Kingsford
(Hamilton).

"HE RELEASED THE BOMB FROM THE RACK AND CALMLY CLIMBED BACK"

HEIRS.

By CORNELIA JAMES CANNON. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Here is a quiet, worth-while book. Its characters may be a little dull, but they are flesh and blood. Miss Cannon's heroine, Marilla Lamprey, has nothing improbable about her except her name. Marilla comes to the little manufacturing town of Lovell, in New Hampshire, as a school teacher. It is not long before she falls in with a worthy admirer, Seth Walton, a millowner, a man of some culture, a little burdened by his own shy reserve. Marilla keeps on with her teaching after marriage, as she is intensely interested in her pupils, who are for the most part the children of Polish workers. The author indicates how so fiercely a national race as the Poles became rapidly merged in the body of American citizenship. Marilla is especially concerned with the progress of Ewa Zabka, the worst girl in the school. She teaches her self-respect, which develops into extreme vanity. Ewa however later settles down into a model mother. In the meantime things have been going badly in the Walton household—Marilla, who sees the young wives around her happy with a plenitude of children, is denied that motherhood which she longs for. Estranged from Seth, she goes to Europe and is later recalled by news of his serious illness. Seth is crippled for life and Marilla finds her vocation in mothering a helpless mate.

I LIKE A GOOD MURDER.

By MARCUS MAGILL. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)

And it was a magnificent and justly deserved murder! A few moments after Molly Sullivan, who read altogether too many lurid novels, had uttered the words "I like a good murder," Peter Read's dead body was discovered in the back room of the little Brompton Road restaurant where Molly had spoken. It is Dr. Middleton, the Harley Street specialist, who really guesses the murderer's identity from the first and sets the trap which clears seven out of the eight suspects. In the interval one has a most thrilling pursuit, false clues, love interest, shots, humour and much vivid characterisation. There is, moreover, a sporting chance of spotting the winner before Dr. Middleton stages the last surprise, but as Marcus Magill has written two previous thrillers the chance is only a sporting one. The quickness of the hand deceives the eye and the delighted reader has to own himself beaten. "I Like a Good Murder" is well written, well constructed, and one of the most competent thrillers to date.

EXIT.

By HAROLD BELL WRIGHT. 7s. 6d. (Appleton.)

This author has an enormous vogue in America as a purveyor of romantic sentimentalism. "Exit" is not a favourable specimen of his art. The play within a novel, dealing with the characters of the novel itself, is a method of writing for Gide or Pirandello, not for a master of extended novelettes like Mr. Harold Bell Wright. "The people in the play," as Mr. Wright calls them, are Antonio Latour, an old actor with a heart of gold; Harriet Noel, the great actress, also sterling; Roy Donovan, the worthless actor whom she marries; Pierre Donovan, their son, an embryo David Garrick, and his callous half-brother, Bruce Carey, who somehow married the exquisite Ann, who loved Pierre. The aged Antonio says he will make them into a play and he does, much to the detriment of Roy Donovan and Bruce Carey. Bruce deprives Pierre of the money which was to educate him for the stage, and Pierre's father, Roy, becomes a murderer. It is all cleared up in "After the Play," leaving Ann and Pierre still very unhappy. Pierre's creator has handicapped him with a dreadfully facetious form of speech. The book is badly constructed and totally unreal in its characterisation.

AXEL MUNTHE.

(From a pastel by Countess Feo Gleichen.)

Dr. Munthe has just written a new preface for the twelfth impression of "The Story of San Michele" (John Murray).

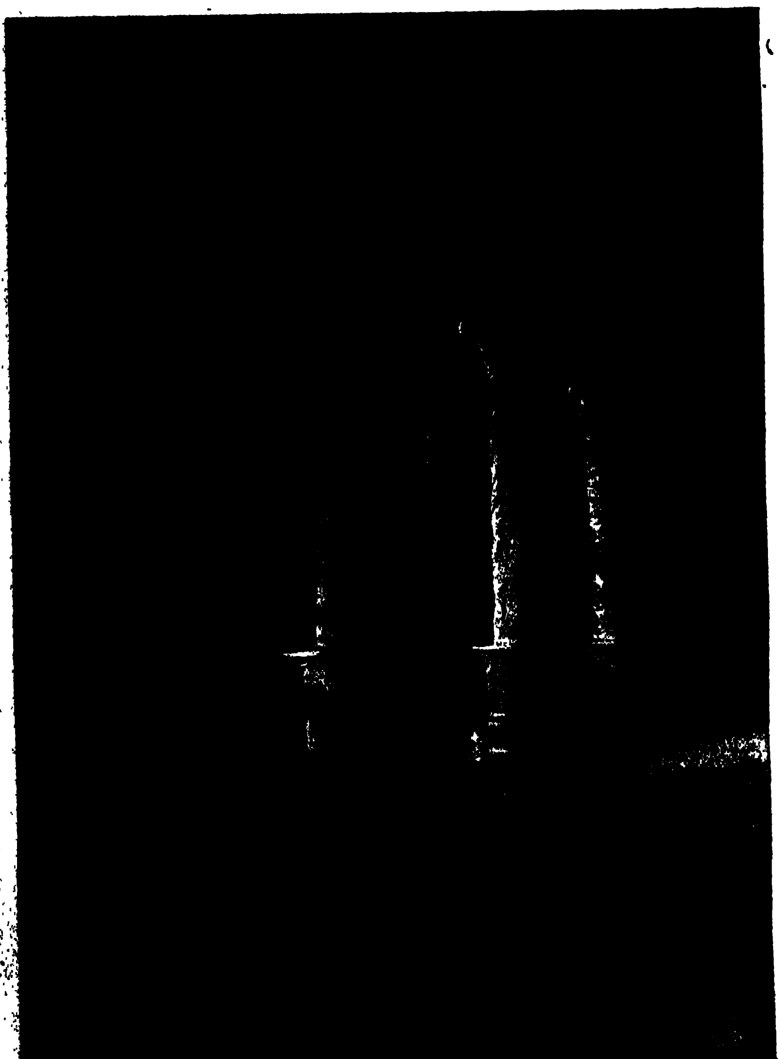
ORIENTAL MEMORIES OF A GERMAN DIPLOMATIST.

By FRIEDRICH ROSEN. 15s. (Methuen.)



Dr. Rosen has shown his affinity with Persian literature in many scholarly renderings of its poets, but some dread attached to the prospect of what he would have to say about the conflict of European policies in Western Asia. There he writes with even more authority, for his father was Consul in Jerusalem—an office to which he himself succeeded — and nearly the whole of his long career has been spent in Persia, Syria, Bagdad and the Holy Land, with big loops into India, Egypt and Arabia. But from the very opening this book dispels any fears, and even in his most patriotic moments the author makes one feel the presence of a travelled scholar with a delightful sense of humour, and a sense of racial psychology that is all too rare among his countrymen. He had no sympathy with the all-important Bagdad Railway scheme, and although he is merciful to the ex-Kaiser, we learn that when that turgid monarch paid his celebrated visit to the Holy City (and made a breach in its precious walls to admit his caravan of pomp), he did not even ask the identity of the German savant who showed him round. In after years he showed that he thought it was Dr. Rosen, and our author admits he knew his man too well to contradict. What a sidelight on Imperial infallibility! But the best part of the volume has no taint of politics at all, and the Herr Doktor is never more himself than when he is discoursing of Eastern poetry and humour, or describing the luscious hospitalities that bring them back to life. No one has better told the story of the insistent English dame who got an audience of the Sultan through a grand vizier's guile. When the "Shadow of Allah" ordered her out, the royal imprecation was interpreted into a gracious permission to view the royal gardens. There is genuine laughter also in the stories of the fat postmaster, the ambassador who did his own cooking, and the ways of native servants. Though Dr. Rosen resented the Teutophobe views of the late Sir Valentine Chirol, he recounts some excellent anecdotes illustrating the latter's marvellous knowledge and bonhomie. Also he pays a profound tribute to the quiet dignity and energy of the British diplomatic service, as well as to the personal charm and courtesy of the Hardinges, the Nicolsons, the Lascelles and other families who have left their memory fragrant throughout the Near East. He declares his conviction that India's diversity of races and religions must banish the hope of her self-government for generations to come. He argues for a non-racial and non-political reservation with regard to the Holy Places, and he repeatedly laments the fate that has dashed his hopes of an Anglo-German alliance. But where we feel regrets, it is that Germany never listened to the old regime of culture that he adorns — broad in spirit, keen for knowledge, and appreciative of merit wherever it occurs.

J. P. C.

MR. LIVIU REBREANU.

Author of "The Forest of the Hanged"
(Allen & Unwin).

From Oriental Memories
By Friederich Rosen
(Methuen).

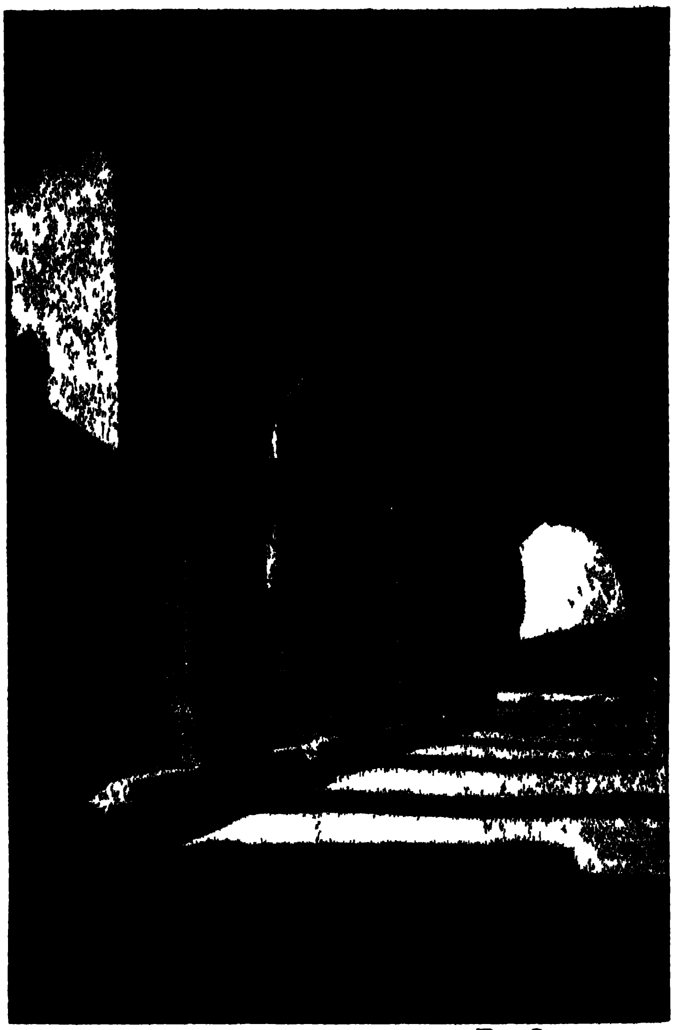
BAGH-I-FIRDOUS, GARDEN OF PARADISE, PERSIAN COUNTRY HOUSE IN SHIMRAN.

YEARS OF GRACE.



By MARGARET AYER BARNES. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

Here we have a long and polished domestic novel about American people of the upper middle class. It stretches over five hundred and eighty pages. Jane, the heroine, is for ever struggling with the problems of life. At the end, when we leave her in middle age, she thinks things over once more. "To what end do you struggle to live with dignity and decency and decorum? Was it only to cultivate in your own character that intangible quality that Jane, for want of a better word, had defined as grace?" This is a careful study of a tired and anxious woman without the consolations of religion. The book with its large canvas passes the supreme test: "Is it readable?" triumphantly. But it is predominantly a study of the emotions rampant in a large family observed from a feminine angle; so we do not recommend the average man to read it.

SIR JOHN MAGILL'S LAST JOURNEY.

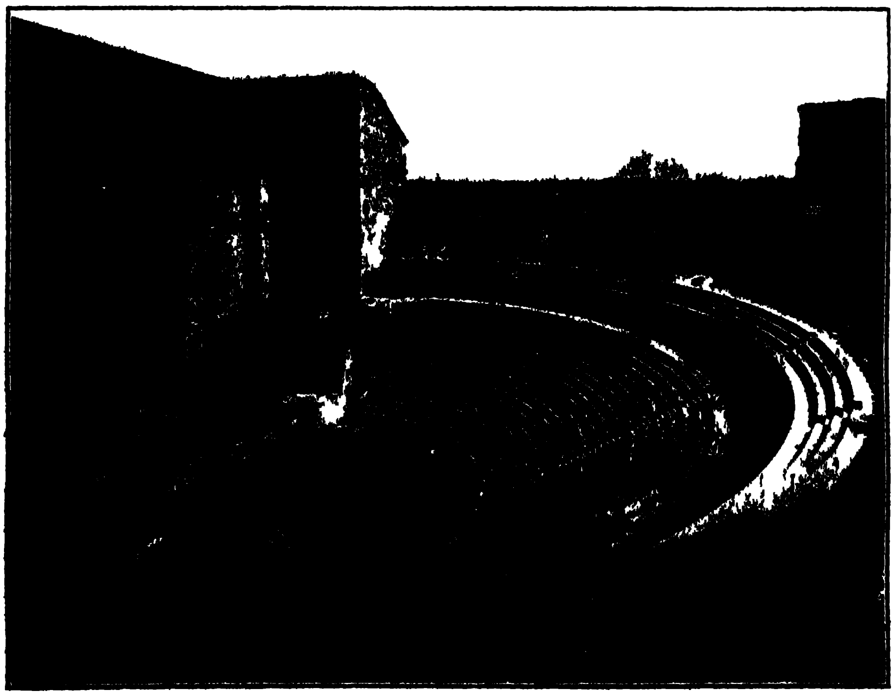
By Freeman Wills Crofts 7s 6d net (Collins)

This is good workmanship and a highly credible story Our old friend Inspector French is tackling the job of his career Sir John Magill set off for a certain place in Ireland but never reached his destination Apparently there was a good reason for this journey and one which suggested the motive for crime, but the good reason and the obvious motive clothed a deeper and more diabolical intention The outstanding quality in the work is that there are no loose ends left ungathered Every possibility is explored thoroughly in the sort of painstaking way we might expect of Scotland Yard when dealing with an actual major crime But the ingenuity of this case does not rest there, for the criminals involved are not given superhuman qualities they remain what the average criminal is, a misguided (even if clever) fool It is the competence of the story which carries this book, the writing is quietly effective without being brilliant

From The Handbook of Cyprus By Sir Ronald Storrs and Bryan Justin O'Brien (Christophers)

The Cloisters of Bellapaise (Foscolo)

A VOYAGE TO PURILIA



By Elmer Rice. 7s 6d (Gollancz)

An ethnologist and an aeronaut set off in quest of the fabled planet, Purilia, where they duly landed after a momentous voyage through space Purilia they found to be strangely similar to the earth, but the difference was even more striking For life and conduct in Purilia were a realisation of all the accepted conventions of cinemaland The air was somewhat difficult to breathe, the atmosphere throbbed with continual music, figures unaccountably swelled up to such gigantic proportions that the falling tear of a heroine resembled a golf-ball, and ever and anon monstrous platitudes echoed through space uttered by The Presence Readers may be assured that this is a most diverting and searching satire There does not seem to be a single cinema convention that is not delightfully burlesqued In a gay book nothing is funnier than the utterances of The Presence which recaptures perfectly the fatuity of the cinema caption Mr Rice is to be congratulated on his clever and diverting use of the Utopian framework The subject called aloud for satire and Mr Rice has filled the gap

THE THREE R'S

By Ganpat 7s 6d (Hodder & Stoughton)

We often wonder why Ganpat is not even better known as a writer His books are those of a seasoned traveller and soldier his wide experience of men in strange places, and his keen wise outlook on life illuminate and enrich his pages and if anybody who reads this review does not know his Magic Ladakh we are sorry for them In The Three R's he is perhaps not being over-serious it is a light tale of villainy and horror The three R's are a band of notorious criminals (One is Rykins, a Russian chemist) They do away with that skilful secret service agent Jules Guichard They used a woman to do it at least so I imagine it She would only be a tool—a pawn in a chess-player's hands There are some strong scenes in this romantic novel One of the most thrilling is when the hero goes eavesdropping on an insecure parapet The noose holds, he hears the plotters say, "and in ten days we shall leave England Once in Caucasia we're safe, the girl will be in good hands then" We cordially recommend "The Three R's" but we want 'Ganpat' to write about Central Asia next time

From Nero: Emperor of Rome By Arthur Weigall (Thornton Butterworth).

Roman Theatre at Orange

HUNTSMAN IN THE SKY.

By Granville Toogood. 7s. 6d.
(Heinemann.)

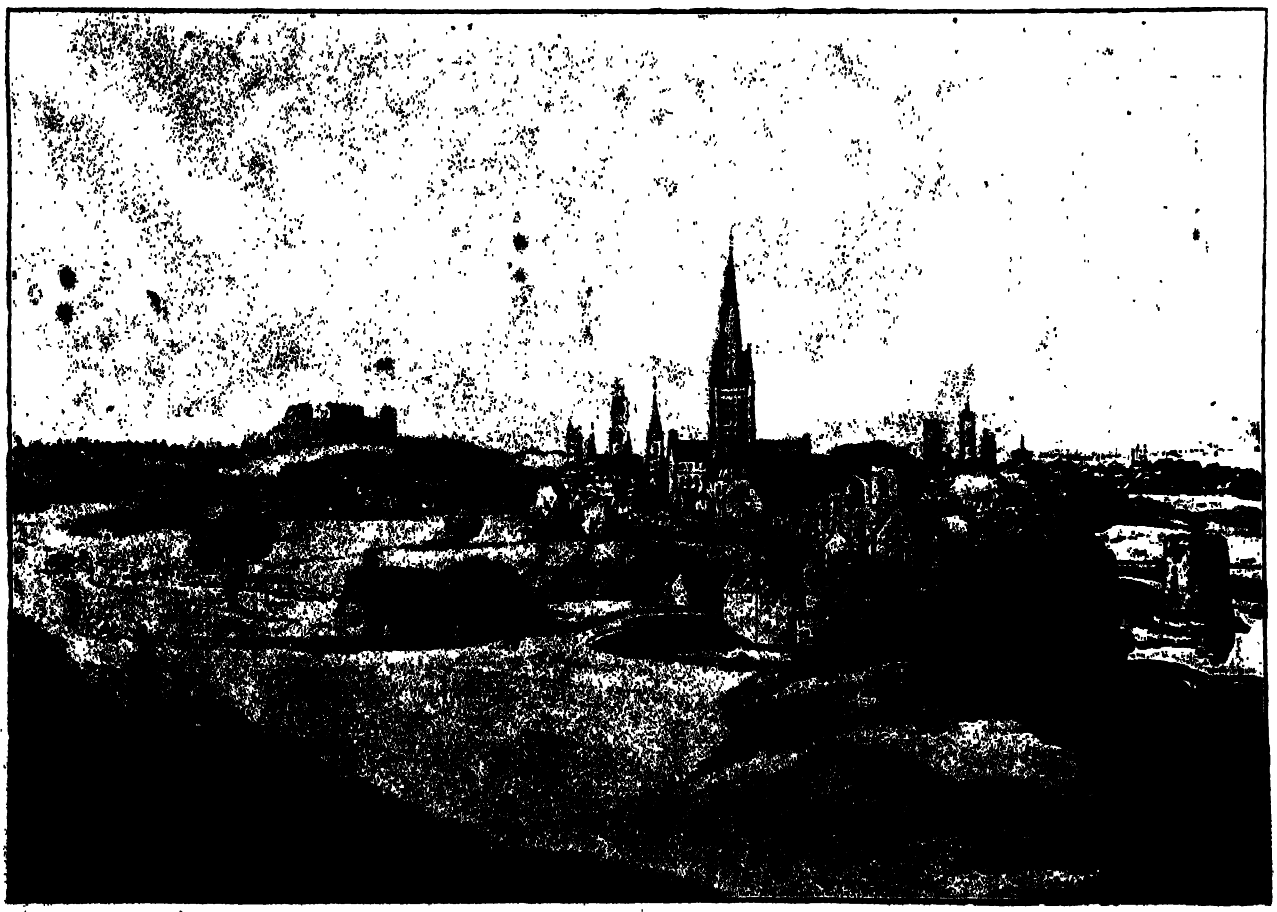
The huntsman, we may as well say at once, is Orion. Bart Garrison saw it at the end " burning clear, white and lustrous." He recognised it in the heavens " with a deep stirring of the heart: Orion ! " The author of this long and not by any means immature first novel tells us : " It is broadly a study of the creative mind struggling for realisation in the face of cloying influences." But the reader must not be put off by that. For there is much fine writing in the book, and there are descriptions of the country at dawn and dusk, in sunshine and moonlight, that are amazingly well done. And the chief characters are drawn vividly. There is no getting away from Grandfather Lloyd. The scene is Philadelphia, and it is to Philadelphia Bart has returned from the study of music in Paris. We follow the workings of his mind, and his adventures until the day when his friend the little Jew from Geneva conducted Bart's great piece in New York. It is a great achievement to have written so powerful and so clean a book as " Huntsman in the Sky."

THE YELLOW CYGNET.

By Harold Redcliffe. 7s. 6d.
(Cecil Palmer.)

The first part of this book about Australia concerns itself with a rather theatrical crime ; the second—and best—part with life in the Bush and the hunt for gold ; the third with politics and the elucidation of the crime. The author has interesting material at his disposal, and can describe picturesquely the scenes he obviously knows so well, but his characters are unreal, and their conversations are intolerably long and stilted. No one alive holds forth at such length.

LEVON WEST.



" Modern Masters of Etching " Series.
(Studio.)

Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman is remarkably expert in the art of the Introduction. This volume on Levon West is the twenty-fourth on the Masters of Etching for which he has provided a preface, and it might be the first, so freshly does he state the biographical facts and comment on the artist's plates. Mr. West is an American etcher with a picturesque career ; Mr. Salaman relates it pleasantly, and is admiring, but judiciously so, of his etchings, of which twelve are reproduced here. They illustrate mainly the artist's love of and success with the lonely spaces of the Rockies.

VALLEJO KITTY.

By Ann Knox. 7s. 6d.
(Constable.)

Kitty, too pretty for her own safety, never had a chance to lead a respectable life, and was immersed in the immoralities of San Francisco while still little more than a child. It was only when love came her way that she craved for something better, escaped from the atmosphere of glittering evil and started afresh in England, posing as a young American widow. A natural simplicity in her, unharmed by all her experiences, won her friends and brought her the security she yearned for ; and many years later, when driving in Hyde Park, she encountered again the man she had loved in San Francisco—the man who unknowingly had caused her to change the whole tenor of her life. Miss Knox's new book is a vivid and powerful piece of work ; some readers will find it too outspoken, but the characters are amazingly alive ; and the unpleasantness of its theme is modified by subtle humour and a rich understanding of humanity.

From An Introduction to the Rolls of Norwich Cathedral Priory
By H. W. Saunders
(Jarrolds).

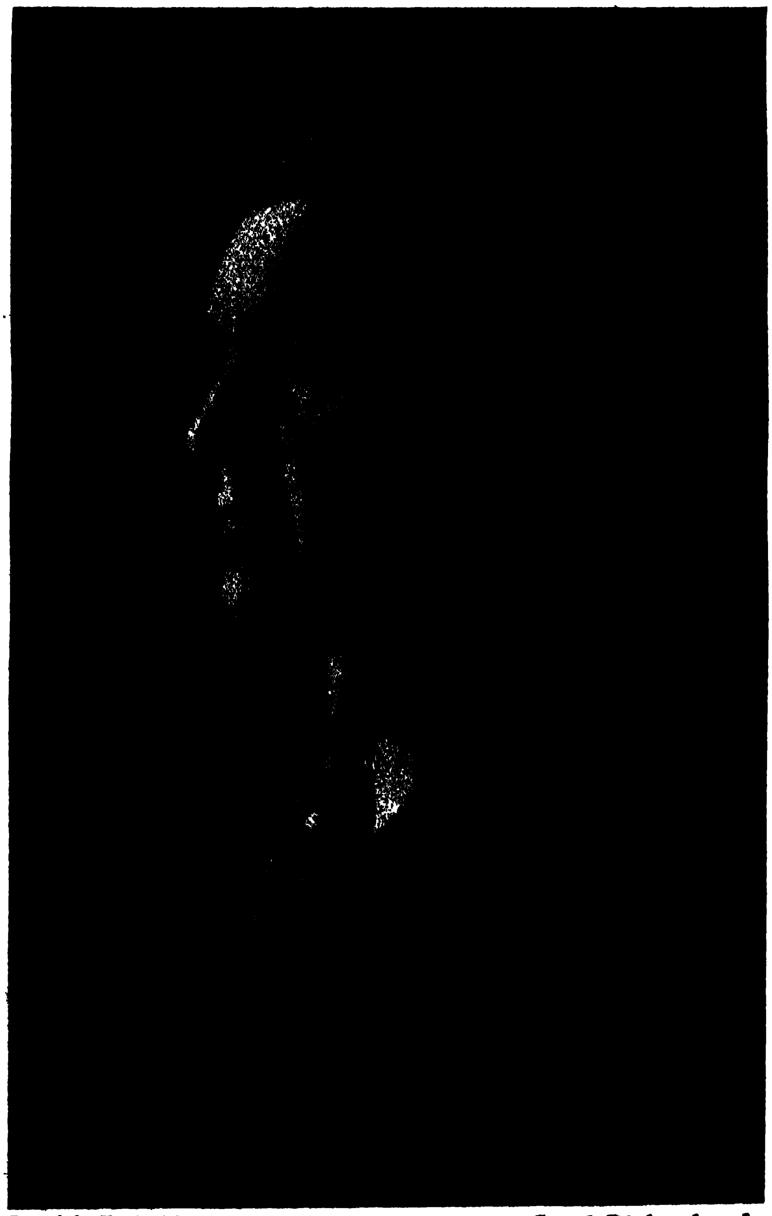
NORWICH.
(From an etching by Thomas Rowlandson.)

The Bookman

No. 470. Vol. LXXIX. NOVEMBER, 1930. Price One Shilling net.



1/- net monthly, except Special Numbers.
SUBSCRIPTION TERMS (Post free including all Special Issues): British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, £1 3s. 6d. per annum. Foreign, £1 4s. per annum.
Editorial and Publishing Offices: St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.
Registered at the G.P.O., London, for transmission to Canada and Newfoundland by Magazine Post.
Entered as Second Class Matter, March 15, 1929, at the Post Office at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879 (Sec. 397, P.L. and R.).

LORD BIRKENHEAD AS A WRITER

By J. P. Collins

ANY estimate of Lord Birkenhead as a writer must be a subordinate one, for we must bear in mind his legal eminence and his astonishing political career. The marvel was, not that he should write as easily and forcibly as he did, but that the strain he put upon his energies left him time to write at all. Perhaps it was impossible for a man of his versatility and impulse not to exercise his pen. Self-expression on paper came as naturally to him as hard riding or a smashing game of tennis. He needed all such outlets for venting his love of action and ideas, and his intense enjoyment of personal encounter.

He resembled Johnson in his resolute habit of flying at the extreme mark, and striving manfully for the victory. Gibbon and Burke were the lasting influences on his style. Too often he ignored Burke's condemnation of the orator who relied on ingenuity for winning applause. In the same way he may have relied as a writer too much on his notorious facility. In any case it is difficult to say of many a passage taken at random, whether it was written, or spoken, or both. But having chosen his models, he never deserted them, so that from first to last his style remained curiously consistent, perhaps because he never quite outlived the atmosphere of the Oxford Union.

Portrait by Hay Wrightson. Lord Birkenhead.

That style of his lay half-way between the Bar and the forum. With its array of Latinistic terms, and "long-tailed words in -osity and -ation," it was less impersonal than it seemed. It had more of the eighteenth than the nineteenth century in its composition, but lent itself all the more to the purposes of invective, controversy, exhortation, irony. If it had a fault, it was the common fault of the Ciceronian school—that it lacked the vital element of idiom. There is always a risk of its practitioners mistaking the positive for the accurate, and resonance for infallibility. But he never debilitated his utterances by amplification, as Dr. Parr said, or "encroached on eternity," as was said of Cockburn. If he was sententious he was never florid. He never "spoke essays" or "wrote debates."

What is more to the purpose, he usually hit the mark, and hit it hard. He could clinch his characterisation of Mr. Lloyd George in a sentence: "He is not very easy to grip." And he could put a subtle flash of humour in a frank, crisp dictum like the one about the late Lord Curzon:

> "We have the highest authority for believing that the meek shall inherit the earth; though I have never found any particular corroboration of this aphorism in the records of Somerset House. Lord Curzon is not meek; nor do I know of any particular reason why he should be. But personally I dislike meek men."

"Turning Points in History." By the late Earl of Birkenhead. 21s. (Hutchinson.)

Parliamentarians who chain themselves to the chariot of Fleet Street have been known to regret it. Lord Birkenhead had no reason to complain so far as remuneration was concerned. He said that his first two books brought him £60 apiece; and they say that before he had finished with publishers and agents he was receiving as much as £500 an article. But the whirligig of journalism has had its revenges, and much of what he wrote at high pressure, with such facile execution and with more indebtedness to others than he could always remember to acknowledge, may not be worth reprinting in his "Collected Works."

But let us judge him at his best. Many of his admirers, if asked to name a favourite and typical piece, would probably vote for the rectorial address he gave Aberdeen a couple of years ago, when he spoke up earnestly for intellectual honesty, plus the cultivation of a charm of manner. This, coming from such a quarter, may have given pause to some of the budding Aberdonians, and their opportunity came later.

And now we come to "Turning Points in History," a posthumous book that, like Esau, lacks its father's blessing and, what is more, his final supervision. Yet with all its imperfections on its head, it contains some of his ripest historical criticism. From Salamis to Dantzig, its twenty essays cover the salient crises in twenty-five centuries, and handle them judicially, humanly and with the breadth of a man of affairs. They combine the virtues of Froude without his errors, Bagehot without his prejudices, and Boyce without his professorialism. It should certainly rank as the best among his books.

Even a Benthamite with a disdainful visage may have senses, affections, passions, and nobody ever doubted Lord Birkenhead's sincerity when it came to the basic facts of life and human relationship. This man, so little given to wearing his heart upon his sleeve, paid a brief and memorable tribute after his mother's death which could not have been improved. But he surpassed it in the elegiac essay which concludes the volume of his "Contemporary Personalities." After a chain of superlatives that are easily excusable, he speaks of having, within six months, to stand at the graveside of two brothers younger, alas, than himself. He proceeds:

> "Of my brother, Captain Sydney Smith, I say nothing in this place; but I have written this of Harold because it grieves me that such an injustice should be done to his memory as to suppose that he was some faint re-echo of myself. He was, on the contrary, a man who gave strength himself; and had need to derive it from no other. My own life is indefinitely weakened by his death. I am a poorer man in virtue of it."

May we not all say the same of him and his passing, a decade or two before due time? If he ever had enemies, it was not because of his faults, but because of his candour and his courage. And even they may own they could have spared many a milder critic, if only for the Homeric laughter he could wring on occasion out of a biting retort or a devastating phrase.

W. PETT RIDGE

The Chronicler of the Cockney

By
Almey St. John Adcock

LONDON is haunted by the ghosts of men who have loved and written about her. Doctor Johnson is everywhere up and down Fleet Street; there and elsewhere you find Lamb, mingling in the surging life of the town; Dickens wanders all over London and makes it his own; Gissing has coloured Clerkenwell with drab romance for ever. And now another who, no less than these and such as these, knew and loved the great city and its people, has gone from our sight, though to most of us he and they will always seem more real and alive than the unknown living multitudes who throng past us in the busy thoroughfares.

The London Mr. Pett Ridge came to half a century ago was still very much the London Dickens has immortalised in his novels. It had no easy means of communication, no electric light, traffic was horse-drawn, many of the streets and buildings remained exactly the same as when Dickens had been familiar with them, and poverty went ragged and barefoot. To the majority of people in those days London was Dickens's London; the comedy and drama of his stories had touched it with magic, and a young man coming up from a Kentish village to be a clerk in the Continental goods office of a big railway company, at the modest salary of twenty-one shillings a week, must have felt he was walking into a story, moving among the very stuff of which stories are made.

He had, and retained all his life, an intense admiration for Dickens, and, like Dickens, he got to know London by tramping its streets, and in this way discovered its poverty and was filled with compassion for the children who played and scuffled on the pavements of its slums.

When he first arrived he joined the Birkbeck Institute, and in a very short time was acting as joint secretary of the debating society; but it was ten years before he began to write. The success of a fellow-student in having a turn-over accepted by the Globe induced him to attempt to do a sketch himself; he wrote "A Dinner in Soho," and sent it up to the St. James's Gazette. Sidney Low, the editor, not only printed it, but asked for more. The result was that he ventured into fiction under the pseudonym of Warwick Simpson and for a considerable while contributed to various periodicals, using that name as well as his own. He tells you in his autobiography, "A Story Teller," how "one glorious Saturday afternoon" he pulled off a double event—"the St. James's printed a sketch by W. Pett Ridge and, in the same issue, a story by Warwick Simpson."

Many men, thus encouraged, would have been tempted to abandon office work straight away. But to the young writer who asked him for advice in procedure, Pett Ridge always recommended caution, and adds, "I can truthfully say I have ever practised it." It is, after all, the imaginative man who is cautious; the self-respecting who will not risk being beholden to others. You will realise too in reading his novels that he ranks common sense at a high level and finds vanity amusing; besides, he had seen in his goings about too much of the discomforts and humiliations that attach themselves to the scarcity of money to dispense rashly with a regular salary. Not until he had published his first collection of short stories, "Eighteen of Them," and two or three other books, and was earning by his pen three times as much as he was earning at the goods office, did he decide to devote himself entirely to fiction. And no doubt that time spent in an office supplied him with much valuable copy for use in after years.

His first novel, "A Clever Wife," came out in 1895, and he continued to publish a book every year, sometimes two, from then on. "Mord Em'ly," which appeared in 1898, made his future as a novelist secure, and brought in royalties to the day of his death.

Always he had much in common with Dickens; like Dickens, he relied on character rather than plot, and his characters usually belonged to the hard-up section of the community and were very real people. Nor did he travel far outside London for the interest of his story. He was very conscious of the realities of life, of its squalor and hardships, but no less of its humour. In one particular I think he scored over Dickens. It is true that in Dickens's day the nicer a woman was the less character she was supposed to possess, and Dickens was influenced by the fashion of his period. To-day we have learned to pay tribute to the woman who can earn a livelihood and think for herself, and you will find in Mr. Pett Ridge's books some of the finest types of the modern girl—Florence Mackenzie in "The Two Mackenzies," Sydney Hayward in "Hayward's Fight," practical Aunt Bertha in "Just Like Aunt Bertha" are but three examples of his competent, up-to-date, intelligent business woman who, while revealing forcible personality and a strong spirit of independence, contrive to be as charming and feminine as any Dickens heroine.

With the conceit and bombast of youth he had a twinkling sympathy; he understood so well the self-importance of the young man in his teens who hoped passers-by would notice he owned a latch-key; the pride of a lad in obtaining his first situation; the London urchin's glibness at repartee. Robert Mapleton, in "The Slippery Ladder," hands out a lively impudence to his elders, and Mr. Pett Ridge says, "Nothing gives so much exhilaration to a London youth as a successful encounter in words with the mature." Perhaps his fullest, most entertaining picture of a young cockney is in "Well-to-do Arthur." Some people consider he was at his best in his short stories and sketches of London life; his humour was crisp and droll, and the short story served as an admirable medium for it. He was an excellent clubman, and the fund of anecdotes he stored in his memory helped to make him a popular platform and after-dinner speaker; the grave face he kept in telling a tale adding greatly to the zest of it. But he could speak earnestly and movingly enough when appealing on behalf of the slum children, for whom he did so much.

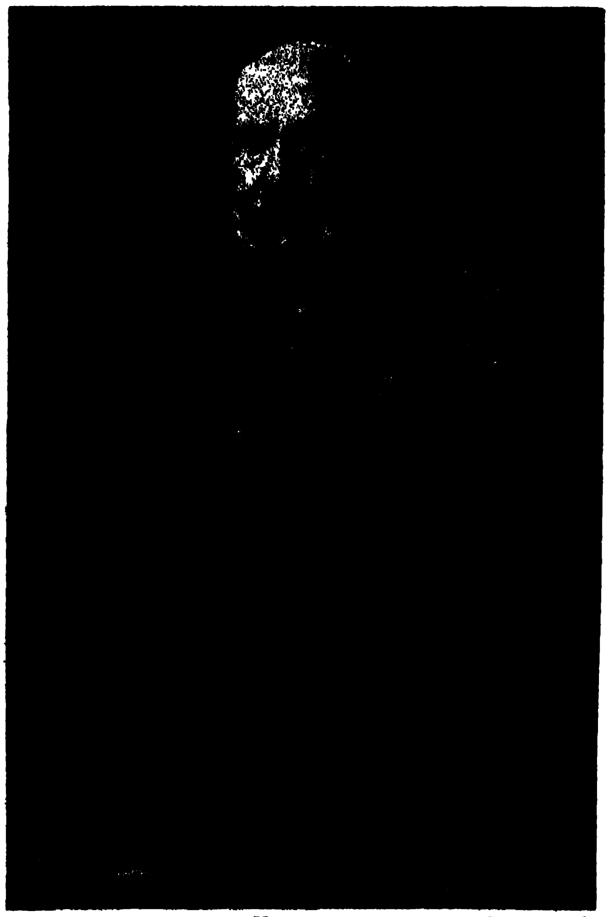
W. Pett Ridge.

From a drawing by Raphael Nelson.

Most men, writers especially, seem to tune their lives to some prevailing idea. Hardy could never escape the ironic; Gissing was obsessed by the futility of human existence; the key-note of Pett Ridge's life and work was courageous cheerfulness. For the quality of cheerfulness he had unbounded admiration. "Cheerfulness," he wrote somewhere, "is the gift of which the gods are most jealous, and he who possesses it has no right to keep it to himself." We are told that to a great extent man creates the world out of his own temperament, and one is inclined to believe this when one remembers that in their books both Gissing and Pett Ridge used much the same material, describing the same sort of people living under similar conditions; yet Gissing saw little save gloom and hopelessness in the mean streets of London, while Pett Ridge found a gay heroism and as much cause for laughter as for tears.

This was not because he was less sensible of the darker side of things; he did too much to alleviate it not to have been acutely sensible of it all the time.

London is richer and happier to-day because, fifty years ago, a young clerk came up out of Kent to work in one of its innumerable offices. And I like to think that the city, through all its many changes, keeps some spirit counterpart where those who have loved it and gone from it may walk in its familiar shadows, may find again the old courts and alleys they knew in their youth, and meet other kindred souls who, with them, would rather tread the well-known homely ways than dwell in some far-off golden heaven that holds no memories.



THE END OF AN EPOCH

Seven Pictures of Pre-War Europe

By Collin Brooks

"Chapters of Autobiography." By the late Lord Balfour. 10s. 6d. (Cassell.)
"Kaiser and Chancellor." By Karl Friedrich Novak. 21s. (Putnams.)
"Philip Eulenburg: the Kaiser's Friend." By Johannes Haller. English version by Ethel Colburn Mayne. 2 vols. 30s. (Secker.)
"The World I Used to Know." By Frau Marie von Bunsen. 18s. (Thornton Butterworth.)
"The Collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire." By Edmund von Glaise-Horstenau. 25s. (Dent.)
"Nearing the End in Imperial Russia." By George T. Marye. 18s. (Selwyn & Blount.)
"Makers of Modern Europe." By Count Sforza. 21s. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

Was it Talleyrand or another who said that those who were not adult before 1780 were incapable of knowing what life can mean? A realist in politics, Talleyrand was at heart a great romantic, and we have it on the best authority that the habit of the romantics is to cry "our king was with us—yesterday!" Those of us who remember an adolescence before 1914 are apt to fret the patience of our juniors by post-dating by a hundred and thirty years the charmed chronological line. If the epoch which ended in blood and flame between 1914 and 1922—between the murder of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand at Sarajevo and Mussolini's march on Rome—was not the age of gold, it was at least the age of tinsel, and no less so because the pageant of Europe was composed around certain dominant figures clad in sober broadcloth and sombre fustian. When emperors to the east, kaisers to the centre, and kings to the west dominated the scene; when material progress had advanced so quickly and so far that armies no longer marched on their stomachs, but had (so to speak) their stomachs brought after them along lines of communications that were railway-lines; when a leisured caste was able to play the great diplomatic game inherited from eighteenth century ancestors at a pace incredible before the days of steam and electricity; when massed populations, enjoying or demanding the benefits of popular education, played at being or becoming democracies without realising the truth of Jowett's remark to the young Belloc, that you cannot have democracies without democrats, which meant that you cannot in a single gesture acclaim democracy and adulate monarchy; when great ladies, a little more dowdy as wives than their prototypes had been as mistresses, still swayed the destinies of kingdoms by their whimsies or their petulances—when, in short, the continuity of feudalism and aristocratic government had begun to respond to the forces of a democratic modernism but had not been broken thereby, then life gained a glamour from the machinations of the great which could be enjoyed by the onlooking humble. Von der Goltz had written "A Nation in Arms," but not even the conscript nations had realised that, as Count Sforza says, when one has "sa geurre," one must pay for it, and that the cheering crowd of to-day, when rival monarchs meet amicably, is the cannon-fodder of to-morrow, when they meet in enmity.

Emperor Francis Joseph I.
From "The Collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire," by Edmund von Glaise Horstenau (Dent).

Well—the kings, if not the captains, have departed; the emperors are ended or exiled; the kaisers, by a last touch of irony, have been most vulgarly "kicked out." Here, in eight volumes, like the eight scenes of a pageant play, we have an almost complete picture of the end of the epoch which, to a Talleyrand de nos jour, must seem in retrospect as delectable as did that earlier time to the French cynic—and which, in actuality, and to a modern mind and imagination, was as utterly deplorable.

Here, first, is Arthur Balfour, the very flower of the aristocratic culture of his time, recalling a life of infinite intellectual resource between 1856 and 1886, and being himself recalled by Count Sforza as the last of a great type contrasting sadly with its modern successor. "The present generation in England, even its younger members, still feel the difference between the two types of leaders . . . because Balfour is but recently dead. . . . The link, however, will be broken some day. Nobody will ever realise that the pure light has gone. And this will be the saddest and surest proof that one of the best among the individualistic human types has disappeared for ever."

Only in a world arranged as our world was arranged before the onslaught of democracy and the last desperate sally of the despots could such a personality be brought to its full florescence. How spacious the leisure and how protective the environment needed for his growth, Balfour himself, with all his old charm, almost naïvely reveals. He went in youth to the Congress of Berlin and met there old Prince Bismarck, who, through the pages of "Kaiser and Chancellor," looms over Europe not so much as the consolidator of the new German Empire, but as the incalculable factor at the court of the new Kaiser, Wilhelm II, each of them orientated not by the ordinary political stars in their courses but by a detestation of the young Kaiser's mother, the Empress Frederick, Victoria's daughter, tragically robbed by her husband's untimely death of the liberalising reign of power to which she had looked forward and for which, in her womanly way, she had quietly conspired. The young Kaiser, accused by his father of "a tendency to vanity and conceit," abandons Bismarck, and, in "Philip Eulenburg," appears in mature life as a faithless friend permitting his intimate, and one of his chief agents of State, to be hounded down on a charge of perverted morals. There are moments when the Court at Potsdam shrinks to the dimensions of one of Theodore Powys's vicious villages; just as there are moments, especially in Frau Marie von Bunsen's memoirs, when it becomes expansive to the limits of a musical-comedy display.

It was not however upon the Court at Potsdam that the life of Europe turned, but upon the Court at Vienna. "The dissolution of the Habsburg Empire and the creation of the new states upon its ruins, next to the collapse of Russia, ranks among the most tremendous results of the World War," writes Colonel von Glaise-Horstenau. It would surely be no perversion of history to invert that sentence, and write that the most tremendous result of the decadence of the Habsburg Empire was the World War. In the two books, " The Collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire " and " Nearing the End in Imperial Russia," we have vivid sidelights upon the inability of the older diplomats to calculate the effects of their actions. The quarrel over Serbia was not a quarrel over the responsibility for a murder, but over things impalpable and profound. As Ambassador Marye, in a preface to his contemporary jottings on his tenure in Russia, ingenuously admits, with an air of pained surprise, " no one foresaw or dreamed of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia . . . another event of the first magnitude which was wholly unexpected at the time these notes were written is the disappearance and passing of the empire of Austria." Yet Russia had for generations seethed with revolt, the Red Sunday of 1905 was fresh in men's minds; Austria-Hungary had always been rent by racial discord. But the two emperors, Nicholas and Franz-Joseph, had been trained in a school of politics which firmly believed, as even President Lincoln's advisers had believed, that an external war could not fail to reunite internal factions. Austria, prompted and supported by Potsdam, seized upon, if she did not negatively provide, the murder at Sarajevo; and from causes " unforeseen " and " undreamed," " the Tsar's magnificent court " and the power of the Habsburgs ended with the epoch they had so largely filled.

Arthur Balfour, in England, the statesman-philosopher watching with detached mind and wise eyes the flux of events; Nicholas of Russia, indeterminate and swayed by a rascal monk and an hysterical wife: Franz-Joseph, and his luckless heir, bereft at last of the divine right of kings to govern wrong: Wilhelm II, neurotic and flamboyant, quarrelling with his mother, with Bismarck, with his son, with his most intimate personal friends, and driven always fiercely by the demon of megalomania: and about them all a society of shared traditions, prone to order the destinies of peoples from country houses and mess-rooms, from clubs and chalets, and to mistake, most tragically, the significances of the changing times, forgetting—or never realising—that serfs were becoming literate, and that of their literacy a new race of Jacobins was taking advantage. The menace the Emperors faced was not mutual, but common: for the menace was Marxism. And when their epoch ended, that menace was still unmet.

It is left to Count Sforza to show us for a moment, like an inspired peripatetic with a peep-show, the men who wrote the epitaph of the dead epoch, and tried to deliver without mishap the new. It is significant that among his portraits of " The Makers of Modern Europe " he does not formally include the master whom he refused, as Italy's ambassador, to serve. Discussing representative types of the older and defeated Europe, the Empress Eugénie, Popes Pius X and Benedict XV, and representative figures who at Paris, Lausanne and Locarno shaped our present political structure, discussing even Lenin and Sun Yat Sen, he does not discuss, save by inference and impingement, Mussolini. As the older diplomats did not foresee the Russian revolution and the break-up of Austria-Hungary, the newer diplomats at Paris did not foresee the Italian revolution (for it was that) and the break-up in Europe of the democratic ideal as it has embodied itself in Parliamentarianism. Reading this remarkable collection of character studies one feels that, though with the War an epoch ended, with the Peace a new one did not come to birth. Europe is still in the throes.

But of one thing even a superficial observer may be certain—that where the old epoch was dominated by personalities, petty or great as fate permitted, the new will be dominated by forces. Of those forces the political successors to the deposed or diminished emperors and kings will not be the directors, but the symbols, and to our grandchildren it may be a genuine bewilderment that a tragic old gentleman with mutton-chop whiskers and a farcical young poseur with a showman's moustachios once meant so much to the comfort and security of a thousand million people.

CHINA IN TRANSIT

A Princess and Her Circle

By Lady Hosie

" Kowtow." By Princess Der Ling. Illustrated. 15s. (Chapman & Hall.)
" The Golden Phœnix." By Mrs. Alfred Wingate. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. (Herbert Jenkins.)
" In the Chinese Customs Service." By Paul King. 7s. 6d. (Heath Cranton.)

Princess Der Ling has painted an attractive picture in her latest book, " Kowtow," of her early life as daughter of a high-born Manchu official and diplomat. Her hero is her father: and she takes tender pride in depicting him. He was amongst those liberal-minded aristocrats who, true to China's best traditions, gave ready attention to any who brought increase of knowledge, even though exponents of a strange civilisation. They were fine souls; they tried to navigate their country and its rulers through much tumult into sane and wide seas. They strove intelligently and with a courage that might shame us: for, as the author shows, they were in constant peril of betrayal by their own secretaries and of subsequent decapitation.

We first see " Lord Yü Keng " in his yamen, as a likin official in Central China: then promoted, and living in Peking: and finally as his country's representative in Tokio and Paris. In these last two cities he sought to win understanding of and friendship forChina by his sincerity and sociability. He genuinely liked the foreigner, and this helped China's cause greatly, although it aroused the suspicions of certain of his own countrymen who denounced him to the Throne. All through the book runs a note of cheerful family affection which is very pleasant to read. This Manchu daughter dearly loved her father: and it is fitting that her son should in his turn pay her a tribute in a delicate little foreword.

People have wondered if Princess Der Ling is to be relied on as to her facts. No foreigner of course can answer, as none has moved in her particular circles. But in every detail for which I can vouch, she must be credited with having given a faithful representation of Chinese life. This confidence in her fidelity is strengthened by her references to various people in her book whom one has met in real life. Her vignette of Sir Ernest Satow, that very learned and very English gentleman, is a case in point. Her pages are full of the sights, scents and sounds of China, whether good or bad.

One smiles in remembrance while reading of the chair-bearers hasting with the mandarin in his sedan-chair, lined with green broadcloth, through the jostling crowds of the narrow streets: of the " rhythmic spat-spat of the bare feet " of the boat-coolies on the river journey, made into a naval occasion by Chinese " gunboats " which flew white flags and pounded drums at sunset: of the lady caller who ate one mouthful in half an hour and in reality came to ask His Excellency if he could please spare twenty dollars a month for a poor relative of hers—to which request he had by Chinese etiquette to accede, though he never saw the gentleman in question. Like the author, I too have ridden through a great gate into Peking on a donkey, under the disapproving eye of a scandalised entourage. In her days the Princess ought to have been secluded in a Peking cart. In my days I was avoiding overcrowding in a motor-car.

Her anecdotes of her father took me back to the salt and savour of a beloved mandarin of my earlier days, Kung Ta Jen, who also was unafraid of examining into Western ways.

This enjoyable book is the work of a kindly and charming woman of sense, such as China can and does produce. It is written in amazingly good English.

Mrs. Alfred Wingate calls her essays "The Golden Phœnix" after the mythical bird which embodies the idea of Womanhood in Chinese art. She holds strong opinions, with which one cannot always agree. Some of her premises are disputable, such as when she affirms that the introduction of opium by Europe (she ought to have included America) caused the decadence of Chinese art. I fear China was already ripe for the poison. She is fiercely on the defensive for all Chinese culture and religion. She points out that, of the Eight Immortals, two are females, and draws the deduction that Woman has never been held for naught in China. Every modern writer on China would agree with her in this: but a caviller might counter-argue that out of Eight Immortals, no fewer than six are male!

Yet such an attitude of mind as the author displays, of respect for other cultures, willingness to believe the best of them and to learn, is indeed more commendable than self-complacency about one's own achievements. There is however a middle way, a "Doctrine of the Mean." Some of the Christian missionaries, whom Mrs. Wingate specially flagellates, were the first and the most sympathetic of learned translators and interpreters of Chinese literature and religious writings.

Mr. Paul King was for many years a member of that remarkable body of loyal servants of China, the Chinese Maritime Customs. His book, "In the Chinese Customs Service," tells of life at many ports and outports, from early days to modern, during the administration of Sir Robert Hart.

ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MEN

By Winifred Holtby

Reminiscences and Creations

"Impressions and Recollections." By Brigadier-General F. P. Crozier. 21s. (Werner Laurie.)
"Idle But Happy." By Vere Ker-Seymer. 18s. (Chapman & Hall.)
"A Different Drummer." By Lady Dorothy Mills. 8s. 6d. (Duckworth.)
"Laments for the Living." By Dorothy Parker. 6s. (Longmans.)

In a strange way Brigadier-General Crozier, Vere Ker-Seymer and Lady Dorothy Mills are kindred spirits. They are men of action—if one may use the term "man" in its human, not its sexual sense. In spite of the fact that Lady Dorothy Mills has earned her living as a professional writer, that Brigadier-General Crozier is already famous as the author of a best-seller among war books—"A Brass Hat in No Man's Land"—and that Mr. Ker-Seymer proudly boasts of his emulation of the lilies of the field, their three autobiographies concern events and actions rather than the development of character or the achievement of a philosophy. These three are extroverts, objective, engrossed in the passing show of life.

Brigadier-General Crozier was the child of an army officer, destined to become an army officer, and after one bitter disappointment when he was found to be too light and small for the Army, he fulfilled his destiny. He joined the South African War as a trooper who could not ride. From the first chapter then, this is a soldier's book. It concerns fighting in South Africa, in Sir Frederick Lugard's West Coast Force, in the Great War, in Ireland. The Brigadier-General enjoys fighting; it is his profession, his opportunity. When he had finished with the West African Frontier Force and had had a period of pioneering in Canada, he joined the British League for the Defence of Ulster and the Union, and nearly saw fighting in Ireland before the War. He is perfectly frank, and he is also—a rarer merit—perfectly unsentimental. He states his case with a candour that commands respect. "I believe that every man who saw the War, put up with the War and hated or enjoyed the War, according to his ideas and tastes and circumstances. I know my war was different to everybody else's war because I am different to everybody else. On the whole I loved my war. Why not? I had been brought up to it from my earliest days; I had heard men talk of nothing else; I had prepared for it and it suited my temperament. But I detest war for my country's sake."

That is a perfectly honest and comprehensible position. Brigadier-General Crozier states that he saw his war differently because he himself was "different to" everyone else. We are all different; but the Brigadier really is more different than most. His sturdy, obstinate, contentious courage is the mark of an independent mind as well as a sound nervous constitution, and this book is more than a record of military campaigns. It tells of a heavy drinker who became a teetotaler, a man who loved war who became a speaker and worker for the League of Nations Union, an Ulsterman who protested, almost at the cost of his whole career, against the outrages perpetrated by the Black and Tans. It draws a vivid picture of a dogmatic, robust, adventurous, likeable personality.

Mr. Ker-Seymer shares something of the Brigadier's tastes and temperament; but how differently has he used them! He too was trained for one career—the diplomatic service—and then shipped abroad for another. He too is a patriot. He too has ample physical courage, but he chose to demonstrate his on the Cresta Run, on ballooning and on motor racing in its early days. His scattered reminiscences, written with engaging gusto and humour, concern yachting and motoring, racing and boxing, Gaiety girls and Paris nights, South America in its lotus days, and London Society when it really was an "enclosed order." I have often wondered what the beautiful young men who adorned the illustrations of Edwardian numbers of The Ladies' Realm were really like. Now I know. For one chapter alone this book is worth publishing—for the salvaging from oblivion of the memory of "The Little Book," that enchanting Anglo-Portuguese conversation book which diverted the court of Napoleon III.

Lady Dorothy Mills confesses herself born the unwanted daughter of a noble house, who cut herself off with a shilling to marry the man she loved. She became a journalist of travel—an apt journalist. She knows that Sheikh stories will amuse the public; she knows that the daily papers demand news of chivalry; and with humour, observation and a splendidly opportune superficiality, she gives the public what it wants. The result is an eminently readable volume, lively and entertaining.

"Laments for the Living" is quite different. Dorothy Parker is what none of the other three writers are—an artist. Her men and women are not herself. They are displayed in lightning sketches, vivid, assured and revealing as close-up photographic snapshots taken in a clear northern light. Here is Mr. Durant, who could always make things comfortable for his own soul; here is a trunk call from a girl in New York, a girl in desperate trouble, to her indifferent lover in Detroit; a woman drinking, to find that her friend whisky has betrayed her; a snobbish white woman betraying her ill-breeding to a coloured singer. It is all done with swift and delicate precision, cruel, yet not malicious. Miss Parker has been compared to Katherine Mansfield. I think she has not the English writer's profound and luminous simplicity; but she has a deft and blazingly effective technique of her own. The men and women of her tales are even more real than the living authors of the three autobiographies.

THE FIRST OF THE DARWINS

Sidelights on Doctor Erasmus

By
Geoffrey Grigson

"Doctor Darwin: a Biography." By Hesketh Pearson. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

I bought my copy of "The Poetical Works of Erasmus Darwin, M.D., F.R.S. (with Philosophical Notes and Plates)" for one shilling in a little dark bookshop in Lewes. The three volumes (says a book-plate) belonged once to the Abney Chapel Library: the time for reading them was two weeks, which cost twopence; the fine if kept beyond that time, one penny per day; but the pages are perfectly clean, so that few twopences, let alone pennies, can ever have been paid; which is a pity, for if any of the Abney Chapel congregation appreciated bathos (the Blackmore kind of bathos of which "Martinus Scriblerus" treated) they could have found no richer mine.

The stock quotation relates to the generation of oysters, but it is not exceptional and I must give one or two other specimens of his style. Fish, in Doctor Darwin, are "scaly tenants of the main," and tea, "the steamy treasure." Nothing can appear unchaperoned by an epithet. Comedy becomes "The tittering Nymph, that tries her comic task, Bounds on the scene, and peeps behind her mask."

All his celebrations in elaborately hammered conventional couplets of the mysteries of science and nature and the amorosity of plants are good, but none are better than his description of Lot's wife:

Erasmus Darwin.
From a print after the portrait by Rawlinson of Derby.
From "Doctor Darwin," by Hesketh Pearson (Dent).

"She turns, unconscious of the stern behest!—
'I faint! I fall!—ah, me!—sensations dull
Shoot through my bones, my shuddering bosom thrill!
I freeze! I freeze! just Heaven regards my fault,
Numbs my cold limbs, and hardens into salt!—
Not yet, not yet, your dying love resign!
This last, last kiss receive!—no longer thine!'—
She said, and ceas'd—her stiffen'd form he press'd
And strain'd the briny column to his breast."

It is not prejudice that makes me emphasise the poetical pomposity of Dr. Darwin as an overture to reviewing Mr. Pearson's book. I do it to restore the balance, for though he must know how it reflects the character of this strange man, it is just the one aspect that Mr. Pearson passes over in tactful silence.

Erasmus was a very able doctor; a ruler of a provincial culture at Lichfield which Dr. Johnson heartily disliked (and with reason); a man of good sense (a very different thing from common sense); a pattern of kindliness and generosity. He was curious about the world he lived in, given to philosophical theorising and to foretelling all sorts of modern developments and discoveries from the doctrine of evolution to aeroplanes; he had as friends many of the great men of his time, and he was the grandfather of Charles Darwin: so far so good, but he was something else. He was to some degrees a pompous, dabbling, self-satisfied, yet most attractive ass—and this Mr. Pearson (a descendant) does not admit.

Consider the Doctor's friends. Some were fellow members of his Lunar Society; the great engineers, Boulton and Watt; Priestly, the chemist—all three of whom knew more about engineering and science than literature, for they thought Erasmus Darwin a great poet. Another was Josiah Wedgwood, the potter (his daughter was the mother of Charles Darwin), and another James Keir, the chemist, who said with unconscious cruelty that "the works of Dr. Darwin are a more faithful and more true mirror of his mind than can be said of those of most authors."

Except for their powers of literary judgment, these can be placed on the credit side; but there were others. There was, to begin with, Anna Seward, the "Swan of Lichfield," who (according to Mr. E. V. Lucas) "was not only one of the last things before the rebirth of poetry; but she was also one of the last things before the rebirth of humour." She wrote the first and most preposterous memoir of Darwin, in which she records how "in September, 1780, a playful correspondence passed between Dr. Darwin and Miss Seward in the name of their respective cats." Nearer the heart of Darwin, I suspect, and resembling him as curious hybrid links between two ages, were "Sandford-and-Merton" Day, Richard Edgeworth (father of Maria Edgeworth) and his son-in-law, Dr. Thomas Beddoes, father of the Beddoes of "Death's Jest Book." Day (witness any page of his masterpiece) was the most extraordinary mixture of prig, pedant and reformer. Edgeworth, like Darwin himself who was always devising new inventions, pottered ceaselessly with new mechanical toys, and he was, on the authority of Byron, "the worst of all bores, a boisterous bore." Fat, little Beddoes (whom Mr. Pearson does not mention at all) was another ingenious, eccentric, pseudo-scientific ineffectual, chiefly famous for taking a cow up to his patient's bedroom to make the atmosphere more healthy and for his views on the medical use of "factitious airs," as he called them, which led to the founding of his unlucky "Medical Pneumatic Institute" with the support among others of Darwin, Edgeworth, Boulton and Watt.

Darwin and most of his friends held liberal enough views. He knew and corresponded, for instance, with Rousseau; he praised the French Revolution; he was all against slavery and all for prison reform. Yet in his poetry and everywhere else he seems quite blind to the dawning spirit of a new age. I wonder sometimes if he ever saw a copy of "Lyrical Ballads," and what he thought of them. His preferences in poetry (which, he held, should be entirely a form of word painting) and in literature appear to some extent in the "Catalogue of Suitable Books" appended to his "Plan for the Conduct of Female Education in Boarding Schools," which again Mr. Pearson hardly mentions. The poetry includes Addison, Pope's Iliad and Odyssey, and his own "Botanic Garden," but not even the most elegant extracts of Shakespeare.

His forecast of evolutionary theory Samuel Butler has made familiar (and has exaggerated) in "Evolution Old and New" and "Unconscious Memory," but it should not be forgotten that Darwin attached no great importance to it himself. He tucked it away in a corner of his vast and curious hotchpotch "Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life," which reminds me of Sir Thomas Browne's "Pseudodoxia Epidemica" translated to the eighteenth century. Mr. Hesketh Pearson's remark that "it is his conception of evolution that has survived, not that of Charles" deserves angry exclamation marks. Philosophically there may be some truth in it, but there is a world of difference between a vague speculation (even if a line can be traced from it via Butler and "The Way of All Flesh" to vitalism, G. B. S. and "Back to Methuselah") and a reasoned theory based on scientific grounds.

The kindest critic in short could praise Mr. Pearson's industry in providing new material, but not his discernment in using it. Erasmus Darwin's mediocrity shines on every page of his biography, but Mr. Pearson does not or will not see it; nor does he see the significance of Darwin as a mark of transition to a new age. His true life therefore still waits to be written.

THE TRAGEDY OF GENIUS:

Michelangelo, Rembrandt and Beethoven

By Herbert Thompson

"Three Titans." By Emil Ludwig. 15s. (Putnams.)

The names which Ludwig has associated in this biographical trilogy are admirably chosen for the purpose. Michelangelo, Rembrandt and Beethoven are not only outstanding figures in their respective arts, but in their characters and careers they had much in common. Though they achieved great success in their lifetimes, they were lonely figures, their lives were embittered and they suffered vicissitudes which were no doubt due in some measure to themselves, but were the outcome of their exceptional personalities. Since their time their reputation has grown and has never been greater than now.

Beethoven has no doubt had a slight setback because of the present-day revolt against emotionalism and romance in music, but one has confidence that this is no more than a passing phase of fashion. In these days of flux and experiment in art it steadies one's judgment to turn to these immortals and consider their achievements. In the space of 357 pages Ludwig has contrived to give us a series of three vivid portraits. He does not seem to have undertaken any fresh research, but has accepted the recognised authorities, and culled from them just what served his purpose. His keen instinct for character has enabled him to provide his readers with a far clearer impression of the remarkable personalities of these great men than they would be likely to derive from the average biography. One realises their weaknesses, but is able to look upon them with sympathy and understanding.

Michelangelo and Beethoven had much in common: a suspicious, distrustful nature, a pride which was based on a realisation of great powers, making them stand far above all their contemporaries. In Michelangelo's case this took also the form of pride of family, which to us must seem rather ludicrous, as when we read of his satisfaction in discovering that he numbered an alderman among his ancestors! So, too, Beethoven insisted upon the "van" before his surname, though that did not imply noble birth, as did the German "von." Beethoven has indeed, in view of the family origin, been described as "a Dutchman," but the author rightly calls attention to the fact that of his four grandparents only one was not of German birth, so that there was far more German than Dutch blood in his veins. Both he and Michelangelo had so assured a position that they could afford to treat the grandees who were their patrons "de haut en bas," and it is amusing to see Michelangelo breaking his contracts with popes and princes—a dangerous proceeding in those days—and Beethoven writing rude letters to archdukes and cardinals. Beethoven was indeed often gratuitously rude, and it is a sign of his exalted friends' real greatness that they condoned his rudeness because they realised his genius. The oft-told incident at Teplitz, when Beethoven and Goethe met the Emperor and his Court, and "Goethe stepped aside politely, hat in hand, while Beethoven, his head covered, his hands behind his back, went tramping onward through the group with truculent gait and expression," is dismissed by Ludwig as "pure invention," and he reminds us that it rests on the unconfirmed authority of Bettina von Arnim, who is discredited by her proved falsifications. One is glad to believe this, especially as there has been a disposition to tell of this gratuitous piece of bad manners as if it made Beethoven a hero, and Goethe by comparison a mere sycophant.

Rembrandt was of a different type from the other two. His sensuous love of beauty was the dominating feature in his personality. It was this that led him into an excess of luxury, just as it did Wagner in a later time, and made him spend his money lavishly on the collection of things of beauty. His reckless expenditure when he earned money easily led him into bankruptcy, and, when the two women who had loved and cared for him had died there was nothing to prevent him from sinking into a penury so absolute that he was glad to serve as a witness for the sake of the half-gulden fee. It was his keen love of beauty that made him, in the famous "Night Watch," consider the portraiture a matter of less importance than the making of a great work of art. His experience and that of Michelangelo would seem to have coincided on the question of likeness—so important to the sitters, so irrelevant to a later generation. Thus "A Portuguese refused to take the portrait of a lady which he had commissioned, because it was not like her, and demanded the earnest-money back," and, when we turn to Michelangelo we read: "If anyone happened to ask him sceptically whether the two Medici in San Lorenzo were like the originals, he asked in reply, 'Who is going to come forward a thousand years hence and prove that the two Dukes were not like that?'" A comment which bears upon the recent controversy as to Earl Haig's statue! Admirers of Epstein, by the way, will point to the treatment of Michelangelo's "David," when first set up in Florence, as an instance of 'history repeating itself."

Turning to some points of detail, it may be pointed out that the cause of Beethoven's deafness is not generally accepted as suggested by the author. The incident of his leaving a note on Salieri is not quite accurately given: Ludwig's version is: "When the renowned Salieri once kept him waiting, he received a sheet of paper on which was written in enormous capitals: 'Your pupil Beethoven is here.'" The version as told by Moscheles is that when he found Salieri not at home, he left a visiting card inscribed "Der Schuler Beethoven war da."

PENN AND FRANKLIN

Fathers of American Civilisation

By
J. D. Griffith Davies

"The Making of William Penn." By M. R. Brailsford. 12s. 6d. (Longmans.)
"Franklin." By Bernard Faÿ. 15s. (Sampson Low.)

For more than a century the printing presses on both sides of the Atlantic have poured forth a steady supply of biographies of William Penn and Benjamin Franklin. Their friends have pinnacled them on the heights of Olympus; their enemies have besmirched their names with calumnies of the foulest kind; and still there is much to know about these men. Consequently we turn from the existing biographies to the works of Mrs. Brailsford and Professor Faÿ in the hope that they will reveal that something which which has so long been hidden from us—the complex motives behind the actions and policies of Penn and Franklin. We hope to discover the real explanation of Penn's "convincement" and of Franklin's sudden friendship for France. Was the one merely an expression of neurosis and the other the mysterious working of Freemasonry?

Bury Farm, Amersham.

From "The Making of William Penn," by M. R. Brailsford (Longmans).

Despite the excellence of these biographical studies, the reader will still find it well-nigh impossible wholly to understand Penn and Franklin. He gets nearer truth, it is true, but somehow it continues to elude him. Old doubts give way to new difficulties as the authors throw new light upon their subjects.

Mrs. Brailsford, a writer who is not afraid to quote her authorities, reveals an aspect of Penn's life which has been seriously neglected by the majority of his biographers. With infinite pains she sketches the career of Penn's father, Admiral Penn, whose loyalty to the government of the day is symptomatic of his religious "experiences." A doughty seaman, a typical gentleman of the period, Admiral Penn knew what it was to "get religion," to use a common American expression. One moment he would be the relentless enemy of Prince Rupert, the next a weeping listener to the oratory of the Quaker, Thomas Loe. Yet when his son, after years of doubt, adopted the Quaker profession of faith he threatened to chastise him!

Mrs. Brailsford's sympathetic treatment of Admiral Penn's chequered career helps us to understand the son in a way which has not been possible before. Time after time we see the father's influence making itself felt; time after time we see William Penn acting just as erratically as his father. For example, one moment he is hobnobbing with cynical old Pepys in the pleasant garden before the Navy Office, and the next he is enjoying the "quietism" of Thomas Loe and Mary Pennington. The young gentleman of birth becomes the stern old Quaker; yet when his father's honour was challenged he could sit down to write a spirited defence of the Admiral's martial activities. Mrs. Brailsford has attempted to make her hero "the greatest Englishman and greatest European of his time." Frankly I think she has failed, because it was Penn's good fortune to be born in an age of great men. That age knew Hobbes and Locke, the philosophers, Cromwell and Louis XIV, the statesmen, Milton and Jeremy Taylor, the mystics. William Penn, great man though he is, cannot claim priority over these.

Professor Faÿ too displays the same zeal and enthusiasm, and consequently seeks to convince his readers that his hero dominated the life of his times. He calls Benjamin Franklin "the apostle of modern times," a title connoting much, yet explaining little. Franklin's contemporaries were veritable giants, and their influences have extended far beyond their own times. In philosophy there were Voltaire and Rousseau, in statecraft Frederick the Great and Mirabeau, each of whom was destined to effect profound changes in life and government. But this over-enthusiasm must be forgiven, for Professor Faÿ has succeeded in producing one of the most attractive and scholarly biographies it is possible to find on the shelves of any library. It is comprehensive; and what is more important, it is convincing.

These Lives of William Penn and Benjamin Franklin throw an interesting light upon the characteristics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Penn, the child of the seventeenth century, is the enthusiastic seeker after truth; Franklin, whose long life filled the eighteenth century, is the disciple of reason. Paradoxically Penn's enthusiasm took the form of Quaker "quietism"; whereas Franklin's rationalism took the form of democratic enthusiasm. Penn was a staunch believer in the colonial theory; Franklin shattered that theory by his staunch support of a war of independence. Penn, the aristocrat, was a theocrat; Franklin, the prosperous business man, was a democrat; and there is nothing to be gained by stating the obvious truth that Penn was often more democratic than the rabid followers of democracy, and Franklin more aristocratic than the worshippers at the altars of caste and privilege.

PRACTICAL IDEALISTS: THE TAGORE FAMILY

By E. O. Hoppé, with photographs by the author

WHILE the future of India looms largely in the public mind in terms of warfare, a silent but pacific force is being aimed at the heart of Indian youth by one of the most remarkable families in many generations. Sir Rabindranath Tagore's name is known throughout the world, and shorn of his many academic titles by admiring disciples, his exquisite writings have earned for him the simple designation of "The Poet." So bright is the light of his literary fame that it tends to obscure the brilliance of his relatives, who themselves have achieved national and international recognition.

First there was Marashi, or "The Great Saint," Devandranath Tagore, father of the poet, who was himself a philosopher and thinker of considerable reputation. It was he who conceived the idea of converting the wastes of Bengali moorland, then the haunt of highwaymen, into the cloistered beauty which he named Santiniketan, "The Abode of Peace"; a place where men might withdraw from the turmoil of cities and material things, to the contemplation of nature and the inner life of the spirit. His illustrious younger son, Rabindranath, developed the idea further by opening the doors of this forest home as an educational institution for the youth of India, extending its influence far beyond the borders of its origin.

Here, East and West may meet, the most advanced theories of the day having their place in a curriculum that embraces as a fundamental principle the preservation and resuscitation of traditional culture; most of the classes take place in the open, in shadowed groves of sal trees, for Nature herself is considered as important a factor in the educational scheme as the professors of academic learning who come from all parts of the world to impart and acquire knowledge.

There is the brother of the poet famous throughout India as a philosopher; his sister Devi Sunayani, a gifted painter; another brother, the late Nabendra Nath Tagore, was an artist, and the poet's nephew, A. N. Tagore, is the founder of the Revival of Art Movement in India. His work is of special interest for its hyper-modern tendencies. There is also Surendranath Tagore, editor of Visva Bharati, India's most intellectual quarterly.

Dr. Rabindranath Tagore and group of International Students.

Among the international students who come as visitors to Santiniketan was, a short time ago, a young Danish girl and so greatly did the ideals and life there appeal to her that she eventually became Hindu and married the brilliant secretary of the college, Mr. Chakravarty. In a published letter to her friends she describes the atmosphere of this practical conception of a poet's mind. "Rabindranath Tagore, in his illumined vision of reality, sees the world as one, and it is his belief that by dispelling the mutual ignorance of nations, they can be brought together in spirit. He has therefore opened his 'Guest House of India,' where men and women, irrespective of differences of race and caste and colour, can meet on a plane of cultural co-operation. . . . You will find a famous European scholar studying Bengali from a mere boy, you will also be surprised to find the best minds of India keenly taking language-lessons from visitors from Europe, or following the lectures of young European students on themes like that of the newly organised 'Youth Movement.'"

The three distinct sections of academic life at Santiniketan correspond to the school, the college and the university, and the student is given every opportunity to exercise his individual talents, although he is expected to take his share of the responsibilities of communal existence—whether it be gardening, carpentering, weaving or road-repair. In view of social customs in India this was a startling innovation.

Speaking of early stages the poet says, "The Brahmin was supercilious, the non-Brahmin pitiable in his shrinking self-abasement. They hated to do any work of Dr. Tagore dictating to his secretary.

Under the direction of Abindranath Tagore the Art Section has developed a school of vigorous painting with definitely individual characteristics and its work is finding a place among the art collections of India and Europe. In its æsthetic code it adheres to the traditional forms, blending with them modern tendencies in clear visioned harmony, and the fresco decorations carried out by the students at Santiniketan are sufficient evidence of the originality of conception of these young artists.

Vidyabhavana, the section for higher study, has for its primary objective the centralisation of the differing ideals of art and civilisations derived from Asiatic influences.

Already the Research Institute has an international standing and students from the whole world avail themselves of the riches of its wonderful collection of classic and modern literature of the East.

The moving force of Visva-Bharati, " where the whole world finds its shelter," may be summed up in the poet's courageous refusal to believe that " the twin spirits of the East and West, the Mary and Martha, can never meet to make perfect the realisation of truth."

common good lest others besides themselves should get the least advantage. They sulked because they were asked to do for their own benefit the kind of work that, according to their idea of fitness, should be done by an ordinary coolie or by a paid cook. They were not ashamed of living upon charity, but were ashamed of self-help. Possibly they thought it unjust that we should gain the merit and they should pay at least a part of the cost.

" It might have been thought that this meanness and selfish jealousy, this moral lethargy revealed in the utter want of beneficence in them, were inherent in their nature. But within a very short time all these have been changed. The spirit of sacrifice and comradeship, the disinterested desire to help others, which these boys have developed are rare even in children who have had better opportunities."

Dr. A. N. Tagore,
Artist and Founder of Bengal Art School.

LITERATURE TO THE RESCUE

The Menace of the Machine

By
Hugh Ross Williamson

" They talk of the triumph of the machine
but the machine will never triumph.

" Out of the thousands and thousands of centuries of man
the unrolling of fern, while tongues of acanthus lapping at the sun,

' for one sad century machines have triumphed, rolled us hither and thither, hardened the earth, shaking the lark's nest till the eggs have broken.

" Shaken the marshes till the geese have gone and the wild swans flown away, singing the swan-song of us.

" Hard, hard on the earth the machines are rolling,
but through some hearts they will never roll."

SO protests D. H. Lawrence in one of his last poems,[1] and in the protest voices the uneasy cry of the age. Standardisation ; mechanisation ; a soulless efficiency ; the mass stifling the individual ; machines eating men —these are the ideas which colour the art of to-day, inspiring it sometimes to denounce them in savage satire, sometimes to avoid them in elegant sophistications, sometimes to portray them in vivid realism. The manifestations are many, but the central problem is one. How is Life to escape the menace of the machine ? And Literature, engaged in finding a solution for Life, must be judged by the sureness of the truth and the sensitiveness of the vision it can bring to the task.

The responsibility is heavy, heavier perhaps than ever before, because of late years the public for the written word has increased so vastly. And this very extent of it has led some who most love literature to despair of it and to doubt whether, after all, it is equal to its task. In a biting pamphlet,[2] F. R. Leavis notices some of the dangers with which it is beset. He reminds us that culture itself is at a crisis, and that the voices of the traditional guardians of that culture are being drowned by the clamour of the "criticism" which, in the columns of the cheaper newspapers, "gives the public what it wants." Critics and readers of sensibility who once might have been honourably described as "cultured" are now dishonourably derided as "high-brow." Their influence on the reading public, never great, is now almost negligible, and their place is taken by the immensely influential pontiffs of the Press. "To compute how many bad books a year, on the average, Mr. Arnold Bennett has turned into literature would hardly be worth the labour." Having catalogued a few of that writer's more obviously silly remarks, Mr. Leavis asks: "How is it that he can go on exposing himself in this way without becoming a byword and a laughing-stock? . . . It is that there is no longer an informed and cultivated public."

[1] " The Triumph of the Machine." 1s. The Ariel Poems. (Faber & Faber.)

And without the reader, of course, the writer must in time fail. Great literature can be produced only in an age attuned to its message. Hostility it can meet and emerge strengthened by the shock, but indifference and neglect spell death. The consistent laudation of the fifth rate (the constant repetition for instance that the dreary futilities of the Cocktail School are genius of a high order) results in the increased production of the fifth-rate. And a dominating criticism which connives at this false standard of values strikes at the heart of literature.

If it is thus menaced from within—and Mr. Leavis deals equally justly with that other disastrous influence, the various "book societies"—it has to fear from without the competition of the films which, with their atmosphere of cheap emotionalism, their background of tawdry ostentation, their repertoire of infantile plots, mould the outlook of a far larger public than books, even at their most banal, can touch. The cinema is a deadly narcotic; it offers its devotees an escape from life; and, like other drugs, it sets up a craving. The film-mind, when it turns to literature, seeks there the prescription as before. The invigorating sanity of true art it fears and dislikes. Instead it demands—and is given—endless translations of films into print.

A desperate plight! And help seems very far away. Nothing more tangible, in fact, than hope and a belief that "what we value most matters too much to the race to be finally abandoned; and that the machine will yet be made a tool."

But there is another and a brighter side to the picture. If Mr. Leavis has all the pessimism of a prophet, R. L. Duffus[3] has the optimism of an investigator. He sets out to survey the place of reading in American life, and although he finds that "the American public buys approximately two books per capita each year, and that it pays for books certainly not more than one half of one per cent. of its annual income," he does not lose heart. For he notes what is so often forgotten—that it is unfair and misleading to judge the potentialities of the masses for literary appreciation by their immediate response to things which, until a generation or two ago, were enjoyed only by a small instructed minority. What is apparent to-day is that many more people do read than did fifty years ago, and that the general standard of books in demand is steadily rising; that in fact there is a desire for better quality as well as increased quantity.

If that is so in America, where admittedly the average cultural level is lower than in England, there is surely in this country every reason for hope. Mr. Duffus lightens the darkness of Mr. Leavis's sky, even if the flash throws more deeply into the shadows those self-appointed leaders who mislead.

Thus far we have approached the problem from the outside. From their points of vantage these two writers have surveyed the battle below them. Hugh I'Anson Fausset[4] takes us into the heart of the fight. He shows us why we cannot escape it. "The chief problem before a sensitive mind to-day is to achieve an inner simplicity which will enable it to master the distractions of a complexity unexampled in the history of the world." This simplicity, he thinks can be attained surely in but one way—by that disciplined exercise of the imagination which comes from the experiencing of great art.

The old sanctions of organised religion have, as he sees it, broken down because they can no longer satisfy us intellectually. The new sanctions of science have no power to answer to our emotional needs. We wander "between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born," and we can escape only by finding something which shall embrace the whole of our nature and satisfy every side of us. And it is the poet—in the widest sense of the term—who has "the secret for which we are seeking, of living in the whole, of being completely responsive to experience." By learning of him, by understanding what it is that he does and in what manner he sees, we too can come safely through and share his triumph.

We may disagree with parts of Mr. Fausset's thesis, but there can be no doubt that in his main plea for the necessity of imaginative literature as a means of disciplining our imagination he has come to the heart of the matter. And, by implication, he narrows the issue down to something quite personal. It becomes an individual matter. Each of us must make our own the resolve:

> "Hard, hard on the earth the machines are rolling,
> but through some hearts they will never roll."

Each of us, independent and alone, must pursue art for life's sake.

These two approaches, then, reveal the present problem of literature in its entirety. On the one hand we need a great reservoir of vital literature from which to draw strength to master the difficulties of the machine-age. On the other, we see considerable forces, both external and internal, at work to hinder its formation—the chief ones being results in one form or another of the mechanical trend itself. And the constructive solution of it all lies to the hand of the individual. We cannot all be great writers, but we can at least encourage them by being great readers. That is our duty and our privilege.

[2] "Mass Civilisation and Minority Culture." 1s. 6d. (Cambridge: Minority Press.)

[3] "Books: Their Place in Democracy." 8s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

[4] "The Modern Dilemma." 2s. 6d. (Dent.)

To put the matter in a sentence—we must save literature in order that literature may save us.

But how? First and foremost, I repeat, by the constant exercise of an individual judgment. That is the most important thing. Individualism may be an unpopular creed at the moment, but what we most need is not less of it but more—particularly in literature. For sufficient of it would rid us of the menace of mass-made criticism. It is essential to get rid of the attitude which approaches a book: "'So-and-So' in 'Such-and-Such' praises it, so it is bound to be good," or "'This-and-That' Society recommends it, so it is sure to be worth getting," or "The author is of the school of 'Thus-and-Thus,' so he will certainly have something important to say." There are cases of course where a trusted critic's recommendation or a favourite author's name may be a valid reason for reading a book, but none where it can be a valid reason for accepting it. That is a matter of individual judgment, and one must have the courage to disagree.

More than any other form of courage, this seems wanting among the majority of us. Rather than label ourselves eccentric by confessing that we found the last best-seller dull and unreadable, we join in the general chorus of praise. Rather than admit that we have not read "the book that everybody is reading," we adopt the dicta of a fashionable critic and air his opinions as our own. Rather than brave the sneers of a clique by suggesting that the latest "brilliant and penetrating" study is so much pretentious rubbish, we hold our peace and perhaps secretly reproach ourselves for our dullness. We suffer in fact from that form of cowardice called snobbery.

But when this is overcome and we realise our duty as independent critics, where are we to seek some standard of judgment which shall be more than a personal caprice? This consideration opens up a subject—the canons of criticism—far too vast to be dealt with here. But I would suggest that one question above all others should engage the mind of the reader: Is the book alive? Does it, in its own way, face life as we have to live it to-day? Does it dare the machine? Then weigh it well. Or does it seek to escape the age by ignoring it? If it does that, however brilliant it may be, however learned, beware of it. It is on the side of the machine, for tacitly it admits the machine's triumph.

But the machine must never triumph. . . .

BONÆ SUB REGNO VICTORIÆ:

A Further Instalment of the Queen's Correspondence

By T. Earle Welby

THERE is probably no truth more often forgotten by critics, whether of books or of public persons, than the truth that achievement depends, in quite other than the moralist's sense, on character no less than talent. It is not a question of whether a man or woman called to great responsibilities has or has not a particular bundle of virtues; it is a question of whether he or she has the virtues (and vices) which assist the employment of the talent, and is free from the vices (and virtues) which would impede its employment. It is in fine a question not of excellence or defect on a general view of human society, but of adjustment to the particular task or rôle.

Well, reading "The Letters of Queen Victoria: Third Series" (25s.; Murray), I am once more thrown into a state of wonder that she should ever have been criticised by anyone in a hostile spirit. She had limitations? She certainly had a great many. For all her shrewdness, she was quite often wrong in policy and prediction. Morally and æsthetically, she belonged not to an aristocracy always by its very nature more or less antinomian, but to the bourgeoisie. True; and what did it matter? Her every quality and defect did but fit her for her métier, as she conceived of it. Nothing in her impeded any other thing in her. Her autocratic impulsiveness took her up to the very limit acceptable in a limited monarchy, but not beyond it; and her scruples, though they prevented her from going too far, never or very seldom prevented her from going hard till then. Her unity, energy and trenchancy were not weakened by considerations which would have weighed heavily on a subtler nature.

All this is very evident in Mr. Buckle's admirably edited volume, which covers the period 1886–90, and which is to be followed by two more volumes bringing the scheme to an end with Victoria's life. To the political historian the chief interest of the present volume must be in the long section concerned with Mr. Gladstone's Irish Home Rule policy, and in those pages which show the Queen and the future King, Edward VII, recoiling from the Kaiser's treatment of his mother and of them.

Mr. Gladstone is very plainly informed in May, 1886, that "her silence on the momentous Irish measures which he thinks it his duty to bring forward, does not imply her approval," and that she can only see danger to the Empire in the course he is pursuing. "The Queen writes this with pain, as she always wishes to be able to give her Prime Minister her full support, but it is impossible for her to do so when the union of the Empire is in danger of disintegration."

As for the Kaiser, the Queen's warmth of affection towards him as a member of her family can be seen in these pages swiftly altering into colder and colder astonishment, at his treatment of his mother, at his eagerness to be paying diplomatic visits abroad and holding reviews of troops at home before mourning for his father is over; at his amazing demand that in private conversations the Prince of Wales should treat him as an Emperor and not as a nephew. "Perfect madness" is her summary in 1888 of his conduct. The political relations between the two countries, she agrees with Lord Salisbury, "should not be affected by the miserable personal quarrels," but "the Queen much fears that, with such a hot-headed, conceited and wrong-headed young man, devoid of all feeling, this may ANY moment become impossible."

The reader of that passage will not fail to appreciate the latent humour in Mr. Buckle's preliminary acknowledgment that the Emperor William II has kindly agreed to a selection of his letters being included in the volume.

Notes at Random

NOTICES

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

The Christmas Number

The Christmas Number of THE BOOKMAN needs no introduction. It is indeed by now an institution whose fame has reached many who never see THE BOOKMAN month by month. It is—to use an overworked adjective because it happens to be the only one which applies—a unique publication, and this year it will of course contain those supplements, with notes and illustrations of the season's books, which make it so valuable as a guide to readers.

Some of the artists included are: Clare Leighton, Eric Fitch Daglish, Harry Rountree, Lionel Edwards, Augustus John, G. L. Stampa, George Morrow, C. E. Brock, Donia Nachshen, G. K. Chesterton, Arthur Rackham and William Nicholson.

The theme of the number is the Laureateship. There will be articles on the present Laureate from various angles—as a poet, as a prose writer, as a dramatist. There will be a series of critical revaluations of the Laureates of the last hundred years—Bridges, Austin, Tennyson, Wordsworth—each written by a specialist in his subject. There will be a gentle reminder of Homeric noddings in an article on the bad verse of the early Laureates. The competitions will be in harmony with the theme; they will all, in some way or another, be connected with the Laureateship or its holders. And there will be a "John Masefield" Crossword.

The second section will be devoted to some of the literary figures who have died during the year. Very little has been written (or known) of Scott-Moncrieff, the famous translator, and I am fortunate in having secured an article on him and his work from a personal friend and fellow translator, Mr. de V. Payen-Payne. Mr. Collin Brooks is presenting Conan Doyle in a new light—as the chronicler of the real London of the nineties, of which Holmes, far more than the Yellow Book or the Yellow Press, was the typical figure. Bridges is treated in the Laureate section by Professor Lascelles Abercrombie, and I hope to write a consideration of D. H. Lawrence as the last of the Puritans.

The third section will be concerned with the two outstanding centenaries of the month—Christina Rossetti and Benjamin Constant, creator of "Adolphe" and friend of Madame de Staël.

The fourth section—which will coincide with the "Collector"—will be devoted to Book Illustration and will contain many fine illustrations. One of the articles of this section concerns "Children's Illustrated Books of the Nineteenth Century"; another discusses the work of the great illustrators of this century.

Eric Gill

Among these the name of Eric Gill stands high, although he is best known perhaps for his Stations of the Cross in Westminster Cathedral. But few know his far finer Stations (executed, I believe, after the Westminster ones) hidden away on the little church of St. Cuthbert, on the outskirts of Bradford. Father John O'Connor, who is the priest at St. Cuthbert's, is a friend of Gill and he is writing a personal pen-picture of him for the Christmas Number.

—And "Father Brown"

I am giving away no secret when I say that Father O'Connor himself is known to a far wider circle of literary people than Eric Gill, the illustrator. But not as Father O'Connor; as Chesterton's "Father Brown." Personally I must confess that, keen admirer of that priest-detective as I have been these many years, I began to lose interest in him after I met his "original." You will remember that G. K. C. dedicated his last Father Brown volume to "Father John O'Connor, whose truth is stranger than any fiction" (Father O'Connor received Chesterton into the Catholic Church). So I may say that Father John O'Connor himself is far greater than his shadow.

Mr. Evelyn Waugh

I see that Mr. Evelyn Waugh is the latest recruit to the ranks of the literary Roman Catholics. His conversion is, as the newspapers see it, a literary "event," and they remind us of those who have trod the path before him—G. K. C., Ronald Knox, Alfred Noyes and Sheila Kaye-Smith—as though these writers formed a kind of secret society. One must admit that a certain discipline and direction is discernible in the work of all of them since their conversion, though none has become so vigorous a pamphleteer as G. K. C.

A "Roman à clef"?

The other "sensation" is the suggestion that in his latest novel, "Cakes and Ale," Mr. Somerset Maugham has drawn an unfriendly picture of Thomas Hardy. Mr. Maugham has protested that nothing was further from his mind, and that his Victorian novelist (O.M. and all) might just as well be Meredith. It might. And it might equally be a purely imaginative portrait. At least it must be accepted as that.

A Word on Crosswords

The brilliant crosswords of "Torquemada" in the Observer are in a class apart. They are the very kings of their kind. But I think that "Procrustes," whose first "Bookman Crossword" appears on the cover of this number, will run him very close.

As many competitors dislike cutting a corner from one of the pages of the magazine for the coupon—and it certainly does detract from the appearance of the bound volume—the coupon, together with the crossword, will in future be printed on the back cover. And the crossword will also be printed in a smaller form on the ordinary competition page, so that the bound volume may contain a complete record. H. R. W.

The Booklovers' Circle

LONDON

Wednesday, October 1st.—The opening meeting attracted an excellent attendance. Mr. Gilbert Thomas, who took the chair, alluded in feeling terms to the many-sided genius and charming personality of the late Mr. St. John Adcock, and to the unfailing and stimulating interest which he always took in the Circle. By a happy reference to his literary activities, Mr. Thomas introduced Mr. Hugh Ross Williamson, editor of THE BOOKMAN, who was unable to be present, to the audience, extending to him a very hearty welcome as president of the Circle, and wishing him all happiness and success in his new work.

The lecturer of the evening, Mr. S. P. B. Mais, in the course of a brilliant address, trenchantly attacked the obsession of so many modern novelists with sex. Unlike villagers, miners and others whom he met in real life, their characters were conspicuous for marital infidelity, promiscuity and even, in some cases, unnatural vice. He illustrated his points by allusions to several popular writers of the day, analysing the characters in one recent novel with great pungency. The free use of profanity in novels was another practice which was untrue to life. At the same time Mr. Mais is opposed to a censorship. After Mr. G. B. Burgin and Mr. Clive Holland had spoken, a brisk discussion arose, in which Miss Irwin, Mrs. Blanckensee, Miss Russell, Dr. Mullins, and others took part.

J. D. M.

Westminster College.

From Little Dean's Yard.

Programme

November 12th.—Reception to meet Mr. Hugh Ross Williamson.

November 26th.—Miss Joan Temple: "How I Came to write 'Charles and Mary.'" Chairman, the Hon. Gilbert Coleridge.

Other lecturers for the present season include Mr. Sidney Dark, Mr. T. W. Hill, Mr. Harold Monro, Mr. H. M. Tomlinson, Mr. A. E. Coppard, Mr. W. R. Calvert, Mrs. Champion de Crespigny and Mr. W. Francis Aitken.

Saturday Programme

VISIT TO WESTMINSTER SCHOOL

Saturday, September 20th.—Standing back from Westminster's busy thoroughfare of Victoria Street is the collegiate-like quadrangle known as Dean's Yard, to enter which is to leave the turmoil of the street for the quietude of a haven of rest. On the east side of the quadrangle is the entrance to a still quieter spot, called Little Dean's Yard, where under the shadow of the Abbey Church stands the ancient and historic College of St. Peter, more familiarly known as Westminster School. In this time-consecrated spot the Booklovers' Circle met to visit the school, under the guidance of Mr. Lawrence E. Tanner, M.A., one of the masters and author of "Westminster School, its Buildings and its Associations." There is but little of the history of the foundation not known to Mr. Tanner, who, in his unique position as Archivist, is acquainted with the history, veritable as well as traditional, which has gathered round the school, where his name and that of his father are familiar "as household words" to past and present Westminster scholars.

The Circle first visited what is known as the Great School Room, which although no longer used for teaching purposes, is the heart of the school, where prayers are daily read, where Election Examinations are held and all important assemblies meet. Resting awhile in this venerable schoolroom, the Circle listened to a brief account of the history of the school from its foundation in the fourteenth century to modern times. Leaving the Great School Room, with its memories of many famous names in our literature, the Circle proceeded to Ashburnham House, where the library, pictures and innumerable objects of interest were seen. The grass plot forming the garden of the house, it was explained, occupied a part of the monastic refectory. Mr. Tanner vividly recalled some of the striking historical scenes enacted in the Refectory, of which only a portion of the north and east walls are now standing.

The old College Hall was next visited; this building, formerly the Abbot's State Dining Hall, is now no longer used as the College Hall, but as the dining hall solely. It contains a musicians' gallery, probably of late Tudor construction, and here the Annual Westminster Play was acted from the days of Queen Elizabeth to the middle of the seventeenth century. The musicians' gallery and its approaches formed an ideal background for Mr. Tanner's final address on the production of a play in those far off years.

At the conclusion the Rev. J. D. Mullins fitly expressed the grateful feelings of the Circle to Mr. Tanner for his interesting and instructive addresses on one of the most famous schools in England.

E. J. F.

Saturday, October 18th.—Visit to the London Museum, conducted by Mr. E. G. Crowsley. Report next month.

All applications for membership should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Mrs. Sophie Hine, 48, Lee Park, Blackheath, S.E.3.

BRIGHTON AND HOVE

The Circle started its meetings on October 20th with a lecture by Mrs. Hobman (Daisy Adler) on "The Influence of the Cinema on Literature and Life."

Lieut.-Colonel Wylde is giving two lectures on Radium—(1) "The Mystery of Creation: Discovery of the Clue"; (2) "The Inner Secret of Matter."

In November Mr. F. Mott Harrison gives "A Talk on John Bunyan." Mr. Harrison's Life of Bunyan will probably be familiar to many.

In 1931 Dr. Marie Stopes has kindly consented to lecture once again to the Circle, and in February that much valued, consistently kind friend, Mrs. Champion de Crespigny, will give an address on "Psychic Science and Modern Thought." Mrs. Curtis-Willson will speak on "Kipling's Poetry" in March, and a Social Evening and Debate will take place in January—the last of which was an outstanding success.

The subscription for members is now five shillings (instead of seven shillings and sixpence). Non-members are charged threepence admission.

AWAITED APPEARANCES

Some Books to be Published in November

This Decade

The nineteen twenties have at last found a chronicler, and in A. C. Ward's book of that name (Methuen) there is a record of the changes and revolutions in literature, ideas and ideals which have impressed themselves on the mind of the writer during this last decade. Mr. Ward considers critically the younger writers on both sides of the Atlantic, and while it is certainly too early to come to a final opinion on their work, it is quite time an analysis was begun.

A Standard Work

The Cambridge University Press are issuing their eighth volume of the Cambridge Ancient History, entitled " Rome and the Mediterranean, 218–133 B.C.," and their third volume of " Plates " to illustrate volumes seven and eight of the History. The volume treats of the rapid advance of Rome to a position of predominance over the older great powers of the Mediterranean world. It begins with the struggle against Hannibal and ends with the tribunate of Tiberius Gracchus, when the revolutionary epoch was said to begin. There are chapters also on Syria, Thrace, the Bosporus and Rhodes.

Laud, Archbishop

Mr. Tristram Coffin will give us a new study of Archbishop Laud, " the shepherd in purple who handled his crook like a sceptre and wore a prelate's cap like a crown." The book will be published by Eyre & Spottiswoode.

Spain

Professor Altimara's " History of Spain " is a large and exhaustive work in four volumes, but he has now made an abridgment of it, and as " A History of Spanish Civilisation " it is to be published next month by Constable. Its main value lies in the fact that it avoids well worn topics and devotes much space to pre-Roman Spain and the colonisation of Latin America. There is also in the last section an account of the political factions of the nineteenth century, which will help many in understanding the present situation.

History in Cartoons

The most pleasant way to learn contemporary history is certainly by the agency of the cartoonist, and many will welcome " The Best of Low " (Jonathan Cape), which contains one hundred of the social and political cartoons, selected by David Low himself as the best of his Evening Standard work. Each cartoon is annotated by the artist, partly I believe by way of justification !

An Inspiring Autobiography

Thomas Okey, Emeritus Professor of Italian at Cambridge, is an acknowledged authority on Italian history and literature. He was born seventy-eight years ago in Spitalfields, the son of a poor basket-maker, and his life, the story of a slum boy's triumph over almost insuperable difficulties, is told by himself in " A Basketful of Memories " (Dent). The same firm is publishing a new edition of Professor Okey's " Venice and Its Story," illustrated with forty colour plates.

Mr. Robert Graves Again

Many of us who read " Good-bye to All That " hoped by the time that we came to the end of the volume that it really was a farewell. Mr. Robert Graves however is publishing an " appendix " to the book under the title of " But It Still Goes On " (Jonathan Cape). One of the chapters is actually entitled " A Postscript to Good-bye to All That," and the book also contains " a brief autobiography of the Divine " (!) called " The Alpha and Omega of Baal."

School Reminiscences

Major O. F. Christie, in " Clifton Schooldays " (Shaylor), gives an account of life at Clifton thirty-five years ago which should appeal to a wider circle than that of old Cliftonians, for the Major was a contemporary of Sir Henry Newbolt, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, and other now famous figures in the world of art and letters, and he has amusing anecdotes to relate of all of them.

Knight and Traitor

Roger Casement, who was executed for high treason during the War, is one of the most mysterious figures of modern times. In " The Life and Death of Roger Casement " (Jonathan Cape), Denis Gwynn gives us a full account of his life, partly based on Casement's own diaries and letters, partly incorporating much new material. He traces Casement's career from the time when he gained a knighthood for his chivalry in exposing at great personal risk King Leopold's barbarous treatment of the rubber slaves on the Congo, to his entrance into Irish politics which finally led to his death. Casement, distrusted in Ireland, hated as a traitor in England, and suspected as a British spy in Germany, is an ideal subject for Mr. Gwynn's graphic treatment.

Wordsworth

Mr. Herbert Read is publishing in book form the lectures he delivered at Trinity College, Cambridge, during his tenure of the Clark Lectureship, 1930. Although " Wordsworth " (Jonathan Cape) is primarily biographical, there is an acute analysis of Wordsworth's poetry.

Scotland's Golden Age

" A Scottish Man of Feeling," by H. W. Thompson (Oxford University Press), though in part a biography of Henry Mackenzie, the friend of Scott and the author of " The Man of Feeling," is rather an attempt " to account for the literature of that Golden Age which produced David Hume, Robert Burns and Sir Walter Scott." Mr. Thompson says in his preface : " I think that no previous author has attempted to explain how, within the lifetime of one man, the sentiment, intellect and faith of Scotland found expression in works of such consistent and enduring beauty."

A New England Poet

The work of Robert Frost, one of the most popular of the American poets, is not, outside a small circle of admirers, sufficiently known in this country. One hopes that the publication of his collected poems (Longmans) will draw more attention to him in England, for he is that very rare phenomenon—a poet who is both for the poet and for the " average man."

Selections from Blake

Mr. Laurence Binyon has edited selections from the poetry of William Blake (Macmillan), in which he has endeavoured to present the best of Blake's poetry, including selections from all of the prophetic books. Mr. Binyon supplies an introduction in which he is mainly concerned with Blake's central ideas and his symbolic presentment of them, but there is a separate essay devoted to an examination of Blake's metrical experiments.

A Lennox Robinson Play

Mr. Lennox Robinson's new play, " Ever the Twain," which was produced for the first time in the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, last year, is to be published next month by Macmillan.

Mediæval Pictures

Miss Joan Evans found many admirers for her work, " Life in Mediæval France," which, while based on sound scholarship, recreated the mediæval scene in popular language. She has now written " Monastic Life at Cluny " (Oxford University Press) in which she covers roughly the period 910–1157, and touches upon every aspect of life in a great monastery. Also she examines in some detail the artistic and literary work of the Cluniac monks. It should be the more worth reading because Miss Evans has no thesis to maintain, and is concerned neither to attack nor to defend the monastic ideal, but merely to draw a picture from contemporary material.

A Journey to Paris

From Constable comes a hitherto unpublished diary of the Rev. William Cole, a schoolfellow at Eton and a life-long friend of Horace Walpole. It is called " A Journal of My Journey to Paris in the Year 1765." The diary reveals a Paris that Walpole himself never saw, and the journal is alive to-day as a guide-book for as much of the older city as has survived the Revolution.

Afterthoughts

All admirers of Logan Pearsell-Smith's work—and they must be many—will welcome his new volume, " Afterthoughts " (Constable), which should be as successful as " Trivia " and " More Trivia." I understand that the provisional headings are " Life and Human Nature," " Age and Death," " Other People," " In the World," " Art and Letters," " Myself."

The Nineteenth Century Theatre

" A History of Early Nineteenth Century Drama, 1800—1850," by Allardyce Nicoll (Cambridge University Press), is a further instalment of the Professor's most valuable history of the drama from 1660 onwards. The same general method of treatment is employed as in previous volumes. Both the theatrical tendencies and the dramatic activities of the period are covered, and the appendix contains a list of some ten thousand plays produced between 1800 and 1850.

The Cinema

Mr. Huntley Carter has a unique position among theatrical annalists. His books on the European Theatre, and the Russian Theatre, and the Russian Film have become source books for the student of contemporary drama, and his new book, " The New Spirit in the Cinema " (Shaylor), should be sure of as wide a public. It is illustrated, as the previous books have been illustrated, with a number of excellent photographs.

A Child Author

Another addition to the list of very young authors is Miss Moyra Charlton, daughter of Brigadier-General Claud Charlton, formerly Military Attaché to the British Embassy at Washington. At the age of twelve she has written a book about an Irish hunter, called " Tally-ho," which Putnams are publishing. It is illustrated by Mr. Leonard Edwards, and Lord Lonsdale has written a delightful prefatory letter. The book is said to be another " Black Beauty," and should certainly appeal to all lovers of that classic.

A New Series

The first four volumes of Harold Shaylor's new series of " Modern Writers," edited by Thomas Moult, will be ready this month. The titles are " George Moore," by Humbert Wolfe; " Alfred Noyes," by Walter Jerrold;

Continued in next column

Continued from previous column

" James Joyce," by Louis Golding; and " André Maurois," by David Glass Larg. The aim of the series is to bring present-day authors " to life," and the volumes will contain specimens of unpublished prose and verse, letters, and in some instances reports of actual conversations between the author and his critic.

READER.

OTHER PEOPLE

Notes on some Periodicals

The Adelphi

The Adelphi has now gone back to its original form, title and price under the editorship of Max Plowman and Richard Rees, but Mr. Middleton Murry, released from the " humbler duties " of editorship, will be a more frequent contributor than ever; in the October number he writes on " Northcliffe as Symbol," and gives a further instalment of " Reminiscences of D. H. Lawrence." Roger Clarke gives us the first of four articles on the Public Schools, and Max Plowman, in " Beauty and . . . Freud " estimates the psychologist in a manner at once penetrating and sane.

In an editorial foreword the policy of The Adelphi is restated—" the first principle we desire to see governing the contents of this magazine is the apparently very simple one summed up in the phrase ' a sense of reality.' " All those who have watched the magazine through its seven years of life will agree that, whatever it may have lacked, it has not been wanting there: it has always stood for " a sense of reality " which has given it a very definite personality among periodicals of the day. And we wish it continued and increasing success.

The Criterion

This quarterly review, so far removed from The Adelphi in its general line of thought, contains a new estimate of D. H. Lawrence by J. H. Thomas, an illuminating article on Christina Rossetti (whose centenary is celebrated next month) by Geoffrey Rossetti, some poems by Stephen Spender, and an article by Montgomery Belgion on " Criticism," which is written to a large extent round Mr. I. A. Richards's recent book. The other articles and the reviews are up to their usual high standard.

London Mercury

Of the articles in the London Mercury many will like best Forrest Reid's picture of minor fiction in the eighties. Dennis Arundell contributes a criticism of the production and stage setting of " The Ring " at Covent Garden, and John Metcalfe has a powerful short story entitled " Judas."

Life and Letters

The first and best article in Life and Letters is " Death's Jester," Mr. F. L. Lucas's estimate of the work of Thomas Beddoes. With the increased interest in the metaphysical school of poetry, Beddoes is steadily coming in to his own, and the reader who is as yet unacquainted with his work could find no better introduction than this charming essay. J. M. Robertson contributes an article on " The Efficiency of FitzGerald."

The Author, Playwright and Composer

In this quarterly Ashley Duke's article on " Play Translation " and R. Ellis Roberts's remarks about a Ministry of Arts are of general interest. John Galsworthy writes a note on the P.E.N. Club Congress of 1930, and Theyre Lee-Elliott has an illustrated article on " The Art of the Book Jacket."

The Bookshelf

"I MAKE BESEECH"

Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Latest Book

By
Thomas Moult

"Thy Servant a Dog." By Rudyard Kipling. 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

One thing is certain about this "new Kipling": Mr. John Galsworthy, long famous as another human being who cannot resist the four-legged, tail-wagging creature that "can sit up, and put paws over nose—it is called 'Making Beseech,'" will be just as unable to resist "Thy Servant a Dog." Another famous dog-lover, Jack London, is already in the land to which all good dogs surely follow their masters, or he too would find it irresistible—although when one thinks the matter over perhaps he will do even as it is. But again, when one thinks the matter over, the numbers of dog lovers, famous or unknown, who will lose their hearts to Mr. Kipling's quartet of stories are countless, especially as it is the most charming and lovable book he has ever written.

"One time I saw Tags in Wood Edge. I told about Ravager."

From "Thy Servant a Dog," by Rudyard Kipling (Macmillan).

Boots, the sturdy terrier who is the canine hero of it, and who has "no-dash-parlour-tricks, Master says," will rank with Buck and White Fang in Jack London's dog stories and with Mr. Galsworthy's jolly little animal among the classic dogs of literature. There is not the least doubt about it. Boots takes us for his own, as a good dog always does, before he has been in our company more than a moment. Why, his very introduction to us does the trick, and it comes on Mr. Kipling's very first page:

> "Please may I come in? I am Boots. . . . This is Flat-in-Town. I live here with Own God. I tell: There is walk-in-Park-on-lead. There is off-lead-when-we-come-to-the grass. There is 'nother dog, like me, off-lead. I say: 'Name?' He says: "Slippers.' He says: 'Name?' I say: 'Boots.' He says: 'I am very fine dog. I have Own God called Miss.' I say: 'I am very fine dog. I have Own God called Master.' There is walk-round-on-toes. There is Scrap. There is Proper Whacking. Master says: 'Sorry! Awfully sorry! All my fault.' Slippers' Miss says: 'Sorry! My fault too.' Master says: 'So glad it is both our faults . . .'"

It will be observed from this brief snatch out of the opening page of the first story that Mr. Kipling has made another of his gallant attempts in technique to overcome the peril which faces all who seek to convey in human language the utterance of animals. The most successful writers of dog stories hitherto have avoided making a dog speak. They have given their analysis of the dog's mind in descriptive form. But Mr. Kipling goes boldly out for dialogue. His Boots speaks in a vivid staccato that resembles to a remarkable extent the snappy bark of a Highland terrier in particular, and he has succeeded. For long periods we are under the spell: we feel that this is the authentic voice of a dog—or rather that it would be a dog's speech if it could speak in human terms. He has also been wise to dovetail the doings of men and women along with the doings of his animals. Thus the stories have their brilliant relief and contrast—especially as they are stories with genuine human interest. Indeed we conceive an affection for the "Two Own Gods" as we watch their movements through the dogs' eyes. And the growth from babyhood to boyhood of the "Smallest Peoples" becomes a sheer delight.

But the dog is the thing, after all. We are privileged to join with him and his four-footed friends in the most gorgeous and yet the most natural doggy adventures, such as that of chasing a rat, or foxes, or (grave offence that earns them more "proper whackings") calves in the field. We are with them when they kill a hedgehog—"There were hedgehog in ditch. He rounded up. I said loud. Hunt Terrier came out of bushes and pushed him into a wetness. He unrounded. Hunt Terrier killed. I said: 'You are most wonderful, wise, strong, fine dog.'" We share their emotions about the Sabbath—"There was Bell Day, when Master comes black-all-over, and walks slow with shiny box on top and 'don't-you-play-with-my-brolly.'" And finally (for quotations cannot go on for ever, although we could go on for nearly ever) we are with the little creatures when they formulate their ideas about work:

> "Ravager said: 'What are your dirty game?' He said: 'Rats.' And he said he held rat-records at three pubs. We said: 'What are pubs?' He said: 'Lummy! You make me ache!' And he said pubs were where E went after 'is job. Slippers said: 'What are E?' Toby Dog said: 'Im, which is Own God.' I said: 'What are job?' He said: 'What gets you your grub.' I said: 'That are at Adar when bell goes for Own Gods' Middle-eat, which are Lunch.' He said: 'You know fat lots, you do!'"

It is gratifying to see that Mr. Kipling's hand has lost none of its old mastery.

A LAWYER'S HUMAN SIDE:

Sir John Simon's Speeches

By
Hamilton Fyfe

"Comments and Criticisms." By the Rt. Hon. Sir John Simon. 8s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

At first sight this book did not attract me. The table of contents showed that it consists for the most part of speeches and addresses, some delivered on controversial, others upon honorific occasions. They were brought together by Sir John's secretary, Mr. Rowland Evans, in the hope, says the chilly foreword, "that some passages may be worth perusal." Not a promising start, I thought! However, I was agreeably put in the wrong.

Sir John Simon has won fame and a vast fortune at the Bar by his gift of clear expression and by untiring industry in getting up his cases. He says there is no need for an advocate to be eloquent. "For every sort of tribunal it is forcible and orderly statement far more than rhetorical elaboration which induces belief and effects persuasion." This being so, no one would expect Sir John to make political speeches full of either fireworks or flowers. His method of addressing the House of Commons or a meeting of his (or anybody else's) constituents is the method employed by him in addressing a jury. He prepares carefully; he marshals his arguments and illustrations in an orderly, logical manner. He is earnest, yet not insistent; forcible, but never passionate; he might induce you to side with him, he would never swing you off your feet and set you vehemently applauding. That is why he cannot be a political leader. He is too intellectual, too reasonable, too detached.

Yet all this has a compensating advantage. His speeches read well. The orations that call forth thunders of applause are, when they appear in print, like the remains of a gay garden fête next morning. The decorations that seemed so brilliant are seen to be tinsel, the lanterns with their light extinguished have a garish look. These calmly composed and quietly delivered speeches of Sir John Simon's are as good to-day as they were when he made them, although one goes back twenty-four years and another eighteen. They still glow with the steady light of reason; they illuminate not only their special subjects (Home Rule, Disestablishment, the General Strike and so forth), but the general mundane movement, the problems of all ages, the working of an acute analytical mind.

Further than this the book has a claim on our gratitude. It reveals Sir John in a new character. No one thinks of him as a humorist; most people would say he was the last public man they would suspect of a sense of fun. Yet here we have ample evidence that he enjoys a joke as well as anybody. His criticism of Portia's speech for the defence in the case of "Shylock v. Antonio, Bassanio intervening" is delightful:

> "Of course she was a lady barrister and it was her first brief; so on both grounds we must speak with indulgence and consideration. But I don't greatly admire her performance as a matter of advocacy. No doubt that was a very fine passage, all about the quality of mercy, and it would have been a most admirable way of addressing the Court in mitigation, supposing that Antonio was going to be convicted. But since she had got in reserve that point about the pound of flesh, I must say I think she ought to have brought it out immediately. If I had been the Duke of Venice, though I should have decided in Portia's favour, I should have made her pay the costs of the first half-hour of the hearing."

Of games Sir John speaks with zest and jollity. The suggestion that a fourth cricket stump should be added prompts the remark that most of us find three quite enough and not infrequently one too many! Mention of golf in India reminds him that the "greens" are usually mud" and the greenkeeper often a gaunt individual, very scantily clothed, who spends his time squatting on his heels as though he were perpetually considering the line of a putt, and whose tools consist, not of a mowing machine and a worm eradicator, but of a watering pot and a plasterer's trowel."

Even in a speech on such an occasion as that of the Oxford Union centenary he can make fun of other distinguished guests. "Stern disciplinarian as our Alma Mater is, she had not forced us all into the same mould, as anybody can see who compares the outline of Mr. Belloc with the appearance of Viscount Cecil." Even about his profession he can joke and call it a game. "For the game of advocacy one wants a good digestion, a good temper, and a good clerk; and of these three the greatest is a good clerk."

A very human, pleasant, wise book.

AMERICAN POLITICS

By Hamilton Eames

"The Strange Death of President Harding." From the Diaries of Gaston B. Means, as told to May Dixon Thacker. 15s. (John Hamilton.)

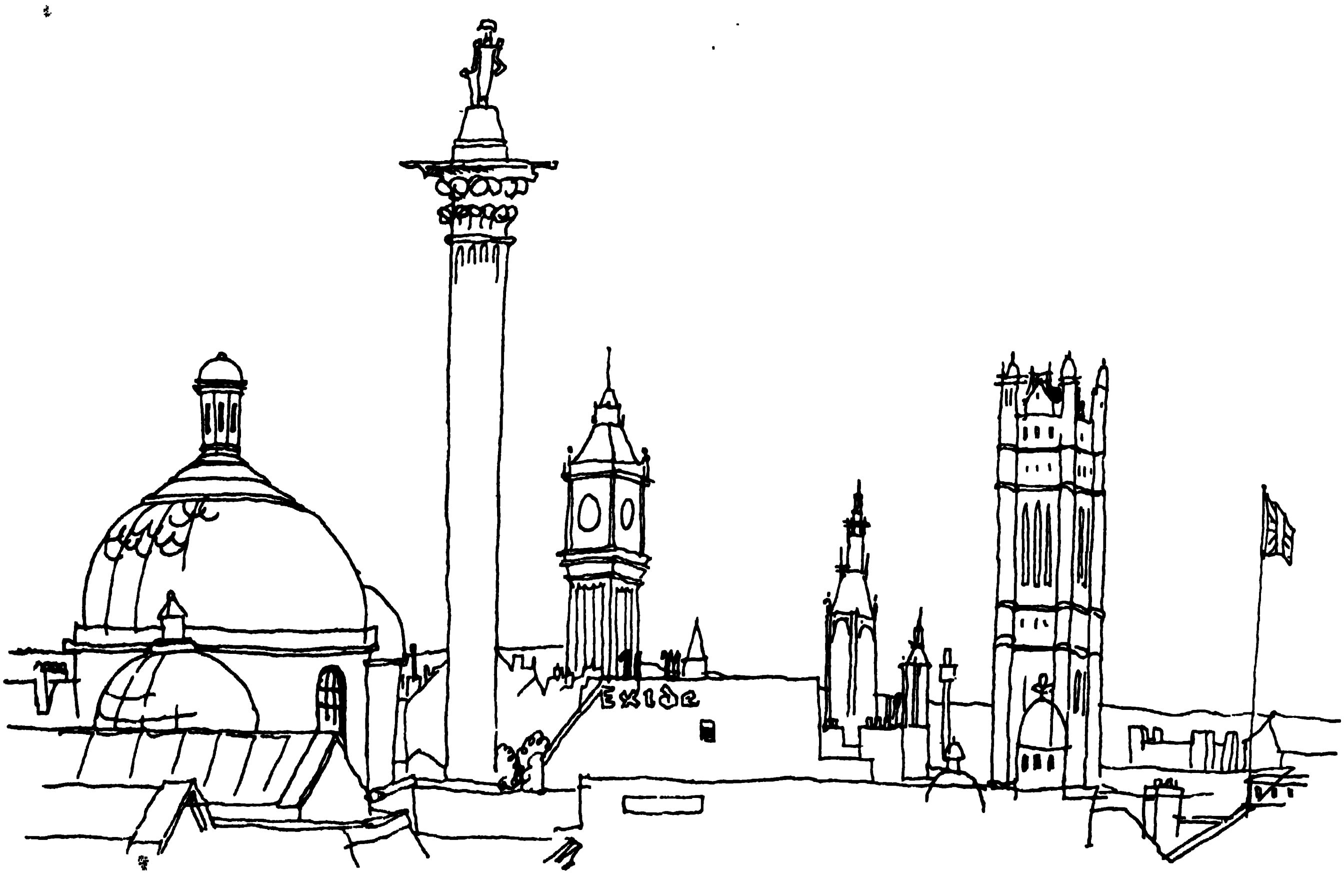
In "The Strange Death of President Harding" the first sentence of the foreword is: "If Gaston Means should talk!" And for some three hundred pages he does so, bluntly, slangily, and to a mild citizen even shockingly, but his tale is one of absorbing interest. He is apparently well qualified to expose the brutality, the cynicism, the sordid background of the notorious Harding administration, for he held the position of "Department of Justice Investigator" and, as well, a confidential position under Mrs. Harding for the primary purpose of unearthing to the drabbest detail the President's affair with Nan Britton, the mother of his only child. It is not a pretty story, but for those who stand in awe before the hypnotic ruthlessness of American graft it is singularly revealing. The major thesis of the book—that Harding was murdered by his wife—is startling, and, as Mr. Means presents the evidence, all too plausible.

One cannot help feeling a little sorry for Harding; his mental, moral and spiritual equipment fitted him only for a mildly responsible post in a very small country town where he could misbehave without serious social consequences. But he was driven, driven, driven by a wife who lusted for power, by astute, cold-blooded politicians who saw in him the puppet quality so necessary to their financial success and he never seemed to awaken to the difference between the White House in Washington and his own humble house in Marion, Ohio. He was probably honest enough; he was far less of a politician than have been his successors to the high office of President; he never seemed to fathom the unplumbed, salt, estranging seas of political intrigue, and, finally, he was so sentimental that he could not conceive of a base motive in a professed friend. But where one feels a certain pity for this incongruous figure, one can feel only contempt and loathing for his associates. They recognised no standards of conduct; when expedient—if Mr. Means is correct—they resorted to murder; their greed was unquenchable.

Mr. Means, not long ago released from the Federal Penitentiary at Atlanta, told his story to May Dixon Thacker for publication. The manner of the writing is frequently irritating and somewhat humourless. For example, Mrs. Thacker in her preface says of Mr. Means's revelation: "The story is in no way a reflection on the American political system. On the contrary, it is a vindication of this system. It clearly reveals how a Great Party (the capitals are Mrs. Thacker's) was tricked and how it has extricated itself with a dignity and poise and surety of purpose unexcelled in history." These trumpeting, starry-eyed words must bring a wan smile to the lips of many an American who is, at the same time, a staunch Republican.

LONDON, TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY

The Varied Sights of a Great City



By
E. Beresford Chancellor

"London Promenade." Written and illustrated by W. Gaunt. 25s. net. (Studio.)
"London Lanes." Written and illustrated by Alan Stapleton. 15s. net. (Bodley Head.)

Of the making of many books about London there is no end. Nor indeed, while the city continues to expand and when new generations succeed one another who knew it not even as their fathers knew it, is there any likelihood of there being any cessation in the almost daily outpouring of such things. Those who are acquainted with the manifold ramifications of the city, both in its historical and topographical aspects, and how many who know very little about it save what they glean from the labours of others, throw themselves with a sort of bloodthirsty zeal on the well-worn topic; until one is inclined to cry "Hold! Enough!" But here and there, fitfully emerging, as rari nantes from the gurgite vasto, there come to the surface books on London which are yet really worth attention, and are welcome contributions to the mass of sound work which has preceded, and will in due course, no doubt, follow them.

The two works under review differ from each other in most respects, but have the common interest of dealing with aspects of the great city in an original way. The first is a mélange of the topographical and the social, as it were, and presents us, by its vivid and often amusing text as well as by its illustrations (both by the author), with a picture of that London which the older among us knew so well, and something of which still lingers in secluded fastnesses to the evident wonderment of a later generation.

It is a book which is as original in intention as it is in execution. To the author the ordinary guide-book landmarks, as they may be termed, are by no means alluring. Indeed I am inclined to think that such things as the Tower and the Abbey, and so forth, have ceased to be very attractive to those bright young people who have perhaps, in their childhood, heard of the things, and in their mature youth have determined not (in their own sprightly phraseology) to give them the glad eye. Mr. Gaunt at any rate will have none of them. To him the Empire and the Alhambra, the old Café Royal (with such an excellent drawing of the place one knew so well, Consule Planco, and such a really Manet-like rendering of its typical habitués) and all the purlieus of Leicester Square, where Ciro's discreet frontage deadens the sound of the tub-orator nearby, and Shakespeare in stone looks and muses on so many and such wonderful changes, are the attractive spots.

Silhouette of London.

From "London Promenade," by W. Gaunt (Studio).

Indeed, in the "London Promenade" you are seldom far from the garish lights of this centre of night-life, with that raffish air that it has worn for so long, and which, even in these more sober days, has not entirely deserted it.

To turn to the second of these London books is to emerge into a region of pure topography and history. Those who remember Mr. Stapleton's delightful book on "London Alleys, Byways and Courts," published some six years ago, will know with what charm of draughtsmanship he illustrates his subjects. In the present work his technique has improved, and a certain quality of hardness which characterised some of the pictures in the earlier book (but only some of them) is here absent. There are, Mr. Stapleton tells us, no fewer than nine hundred lanes in London, and he appears to have something informative to say about them all. When one thinks of the vast area to be covered and the intricacies of a great city, of which these lanes form the tiniest of arteries, one can realise what a labour has been entailed in merely tracing them, apart from that of describing them and the historical facts attached to so many of them.

TWO DISCOVERIES OF ENGLAND

Through Austrian Eyes

By O. M. Green

"England, the Unknown Isle." By Paul Cohen-Portheim. Translated by Alan Harris. 8s. 6d. (Duckworth.)
"Rough Islanders." By Henry Wood Nevinson. 7s. 6d. (Routledge.)

It is a consolation for us English, resigned to thinking of ourselves as the most unpopular people in Europe, to find that those who take the trouble to know us are generally complimentary. Among the many recent discoverers of England—Spanish, German, French, Czechoslovak—none has been a closer, more detailed observer, more penetrating and sympathetic, than this Austrian, Mr. Cohen-Portheim. That he was interned in England during the War has not made him less—perhaps it made him more—enthusiastic; and his occasional shafts of wit have ever a kindly touch, as when he writes:

> "To a foreigner the word 'Englishman' calls up a picture of a rich tourist, but to an Englishman the word 'foreigner' suggests waiters, hairdressers, organ-grinders and small shopkeepers."

He admires our manners immensely—even an official opens a conversation with a courteous "What can I do for you?"—which he ascribes partly to our climate—which "has the same antipathy to anything immoderate or extreme as its product the Englishman has"—partly to that ideal of repression which is the key-note of our best education. But this ideal makes us much misunderstood. We are anything but the unimpassioned beings we appear:

> "It is just because the Englishman is a man of very strong impulses that his education aims at subduing them, and because the unregenerate savage within him is still pretty strong that he keeps him chained up."

Mr. Cohen-Portheim thinks that the Saxon predominates most strongly in our mixed ancestry and thus explains our passionate love of the country, which is for him the motive of all our actions. Well, the Saxon distrusted towns and shied off them. Having starved out Augusta he left it to fall derelict, so that London preserves scarcely a trace of the Roman city. "The idea of the town as a work of art is nothing to us," says our author. But while we agree with him here in respect of provincial manufacturing towns, he seems to push his theory too hard in London; his chapter on the great City is so vivid, so appreciative of its splendours, that one wonders he does not see that these are the product of an enthusiasm equal to his own. One knows many Londoners who can hardly be induced to sleep a night out of London. One old delusion (as it seems to us) Mr. Cohen-Portheim retains. He defends our foreign policy against the common charge of treachery and hypocrisy: we are no worse than any other nation. But he none the less implicitly believes in the far-reaching and astute nature of England's plans—such as, he says, she is now pursuing in Asia. "Europe" has been defined as a "group of wicked old men sitting round a table in secret." Can England be the same? It does not accord with our popular theory of "muddling through." But how should foreigners understand our policy when we seldom understand it ourselves?

Where the Teuton analyses and explains, Mr. Nevinson is content to observe and report. The Crown, the aristocracy, gentry, middle and working classes pass in successive review, described in that beautiful, easy English which makes all Mr. Nevinson's writing so pleasurable. But one wishes he would not sneer at those who, presumably he thinks, would consider themselves above him. Such jibes not only distort the picture; their unfairness is revealed again and again by Mr. Nevinson's own observations only a page or two farther on. The later chapters are far more congenial. Among peasants, mechanics, miners and fishermen, in slum dwellings and the deadly monotonies of "mass production," Mr. Nevinson is wholly at home, and he writes with deep insight and sympathy. These are fine, moving pages, to be read not with much comfort; but at least we may thank Heaven things have moved since the days of "Sybil," "Mary Barton" and "Ralph Rashleigh." In pleasanter mood the chapter on English humour, which Mr. Nevinson claims as the base of all that is best in English nature (a hundred stories of the War support him), is delightful.

Mr. C. R. W. Nevinson's accompanying illustrations are vigorous and effective, but one feels that they would accord better with a different style in the writing. Rather like putting a piece of new cloth on an old garment.

IN THE HEART OF LONDON

"The Annals of Covent Garden and Its Neighbourhood." By E. Beresford Chancellor, M.A., F.S.A. With 16 illustrations. 18s. net. (Hutchinson.)

By Covent Garden and its neighbourhood Mr. Beresford Chancellor means the area bounded by Long Acre, St. Martin's Lane, the Strand, and Drury Lane. This area comes into history as a garden and burial ground of the monks of St. Peter's, Westminster. Henry VIII made it a pasture for his sheep. After being the property of the Protector Somerset, it was granted to the first Earl of Bedford, in whose family it remained for as many years as there are days in a year. The Cecils wanted it; bu the fourth earl declared he would "impoverish" himself if he sold it—a reason strange to modern ears. The fourth earl laid out the square and engaged Inigo Jones to build the famous Piazzas and St. Paul's Church. And so Covent Garden became a fashionable quarter. The patent for the market was granted to the fifth earl of Bedford in 1671. The golden age of Covent Garden was the eighteenth century, when it was remarkable for the men and women eminent in literature, art, music, and the drama who lived or forgathered in the tributary streets and by-ways. It is with these, and some others more notorious than famous, that Mr. Chancellor is chiefly concerned. The list is a formidable one. In rather less than 300 pages he has packed the essence of material for a thousand. The result is a work of fascinating interest and permanent value.

Francis Aitken.

COUNTRY BY-WAYS

"Green Fields of England: A Book of Footpath Travels." By Clare Cameron. 12s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

This is another addition to that rapidly increasing series of books whose motive is to discover "the England that is England," by the simple expedient of taking England unawares and going round to the back door when she is expecting you to arrive at the front. Miss Cameron visits the Chilterns, the Thames Valley, the Cotswolds, East Anglia, some Yorkshire abbeys, the Welsh Border, Central Wales, and, of course, Sussex. She goes to most of the obvious places in those districts but arrives at them by devious footpath routes. The footpaths are her chief concern. Rather than forsake one she will leave Castle Howard a mile away to the right and follow it hot-foot for the nearest ruin.

But such is the infinite diversity of the English scene that one can usually find the sort of thing that one sets out to find, and such is its kindness that that which is sought will not be long withheld from the seeker. What it cannot guarantee is that every such seeker who "seems to have a spirited kinship with Richard Jefferies and Edward Thomas" will, ipso facto, "capture the mood of the English pastoral." The process is more difficult than the mere abandoning of mechanised transport for a good stout stick and a haversack on a bright spring morning.

If we cannot all become Richard Jefferieses, many of us could become Richard Cobbets, and Richard Cobbet managed very well on his horse.

Reginald Pole.

THE LADIES OF LLANGOLLEN

New Light on a Quaint Friendship

By S. M. Ellis

"The Hamwood Papers of the Ladies of Llangollen and Caroline Hamilton." Edited by Mrs. G. H. Bell. 21s. net. (Macmillan.)

For over a hundred and fifty years speculation has been concerned with the motives which induced two Irish ladies of high birth, Lady Eleanor Butler and Miss Sarah Ponsonby, to "elope" together, in May, 1778, despite the efforts of their respective families to prevent them, from Ireland to Llangollen, where they lived, united in love and amity, for fifty-one years In their picturesque house here, Plas Newydd, they resided for forty-eight years, until death severed the partnership in 1829; the survivor died two and a half years later. Throughout all the long years of their residence at Plas Newydd, the Ladies of Llangollen were only absent for one night from their home, the occasion when they slept at Barmouth in July, 1827. Naturally they became a legend whose echoes extended far beyond the village they "squired," bullied, tended, and doctored. Many celebrated people stopped to visit them, for Plas Newydd was on the great high road from England to Holyhead and Ireland; their visitors included Sir Walter Scott, Wellington, Madame de Genlis and her daughter, Lady Edward FitzGerald, Miss Seward, and Wordsworth, who celebrated the friendship of the Ladies in the sonnet ending:

> "In ours the Vale of Friendship, let this spot
> Be nam'd, where faithful to a low-roof'd cot
> On Deva's banks, ye have abode so long,
> Sisters in love, a love allowed to climb
> Ev'n on this earth, above the reach of Time."

As they grew old, the eccentricities of the Ladies increased; they had from the outset adopted a masculine style of dress, and wore their hair short. They were in fact pioneers of those cultured and independent, but often eccentric, women who are to-day frequently met with as artists, schoolmistresses, and of a mode of life jestingly termed "bachelor." Lady Eleanor Butler, the senior of Miss Ponsonby by some seventeen years, was distinctly of a masculine type, and was the dominant member of the strange partnership; her friend, Sarah, was in youth more gentle, feminine, and vivacious. Lady Eleanor had the protective instinct strongly marked in her nature. She had "reached the age of thirty without having one lover"; but she had become the devoted friend of Sarah Ponsonby when the latter was quite a little girl.

Mrs. Tighe with her daughter (Mrs. Hamilton) as a child.

From "The Hamwood Papers of the Ladies of Llangollen," by Caroline Hamilton (Macmillan).

The real reason for the "elopement"—when Miss Ponsonby was twenty-three and Lady Eleanor nearly forty—now transpires in the book under review. Hitherto it had been believed that they—or one of them—had been crossed in love and, finding men base deceivers, had resolved to retire from the world of fashion, courtship, and unrest. But it now is clear from the interesting letters, and diary of Mrs. Goddard, quoted by Mrs. Bell, that Sarah Ponsonby, who lived with her cousin, Lady Elizabeth Fownes, fled in order to escape the illicit amatory advances of her cousin's husband and her own host, Sir William Fownes. So she "leapt out of the window" one night, and armed with a pistol and her little dog, "Frisk," she joined her beloved friend, Eleanor, in a barn, where they "lay two nights on straw." They walked six miles over the mountains, and eventually reached Waterford. Here they were tracked by the servants of their families and were betrayed by the barking of "Frisk." And so, in the flustered description of one of their relatives, "The Runaways are caught and we shall soon see our amiable friend again whose conduct, though it has an appearance of imprudence, is, I am sure, void of serious impropriety. There were no gentlemen concerned, nor does it appear to be anything more than a scheme of romantic friendship."

Lady Eleanor in disgrace was now threatened with incarceration in a convent despite her mature age, so she again disappeared and fled to the house of the naughty Sir William Fownes, where she was secretly admitted by Sarah Ponsonby, who kept her friend concealed in a closet opening from her bedroom. Food was brought up for her by a servant girl, Mary Carryl, who later accompanied the Ladies to Llangollen, where the brawny wench, who was known as "Molly the Bruiser," protected and served them for long years.

Finding it useless to frustrate the resolve of Eleanor and Sarah to go away and live together, their relatives no longer sought to restrain them, and so the twain settled at Plas Newydd, where the long years stretched before them full of peace and love and mutual interests after the agitations and storms that had preceded their arrival.

Lady Eleanor in particular rejoiced; for many years she kept a journal recording every incident of their joint lives —their visitors, their activities in the village, the management of their house, what they ate, and what their minor maladies. Often her entries were simply expressions of happiness in association with Sarah:

> " September 24th, 1785. Read Madame de Sévigné. My love drawing. From seven till nine in sweet converse with the delight of my heart over the Fire. Papered our Hair.
>
> " December 7th. Spent the evening without candles by the light of the Fire and faint glimmering of a pale Moon, talking over our affairs. My Sweet Love. A Silent Pensive Day."

In the journals quoted by Mrs. Bell those for the years 1786 and 1787 seem to be missing. I can throw some light on what happened to the volume for the latter year. Lady Bulwer Lytton, who was living in Llangollen in September, 1854, relates in a letter to A. E. Chalon, R.A.:

> " I have had the most joyous and genuine laugh I have had since the year before the Flood, when I was 15. Doubtless you have 'heard tell' of those misguided and romantic old ladies, Lady Eleanor Butler and Miss Ponsonby, who eloped (!) from Ireland, Miss Ponsonby dressed as a groom in top-boots and buckskin unmentionables, Lady E. as a peasant girl or some such misérére. Well, they came and settled down here at Plas Newydd, and in 1787 Lady Eleanor kept a journal, which I have been reading. It is written with a crow-quill in a very fine Italian hand and looks like poetry—but is the very prosiest of prose. Their menus du diner are minutely given, and as the dinners certainly were not such as Vatel would have achieved, they (the old ladies) appear to have been martyrs to indigestion, the attacks of which seem to have been as regular and relentless as the visits of the tax-gatherer, n'ayant rien de caché pour les amis. They also give minute descriptions of the emetics which they were in the habit of taking, but these latter, like a fashionable husband, did not remain with them long, and they, like ditto wives, appear to have been considerably relieved by getting rid of them. . . . The perusal of this priceless document I owe to a great ally of mine, the Old Parish Clerk, who was a protégé of the old ladies. . . ."

One must not forget to relate that the villain of the piece, Sir William Fownes, met with appropriate retribution a month after the second departure of Miss Ponsonby. He died of " a strangulation or gout in the stomach," and before the end admitted that it was " his own fault that he was punished for." Lady Elizabeth Fownes died a month later. But the Ladies of Llangollen lived on for over half a century; their house became a museum and their fame is great unto the present day.

A SUFFOLK DIARY

The Bungay gentleman whose diary makes " An Englishman at Home and Abroad, 1792–1828 " (10s. 6d.; Heath Cranton) is John Barber Scott. The diary is easily classed as something of a discovery and, as edited by Mrs. Ethel Mann, it gives us much of the best material to hoist the book well up in its class. The larger life of the period, as well as some pictures of the contemporary country-side, has its share in these readable records. For John Scott is one of those exclusive people who actually conversed with Napoleon and he does not forget to increase the importance of his document immeasurably by detailing his encounter with the great man at Elba.

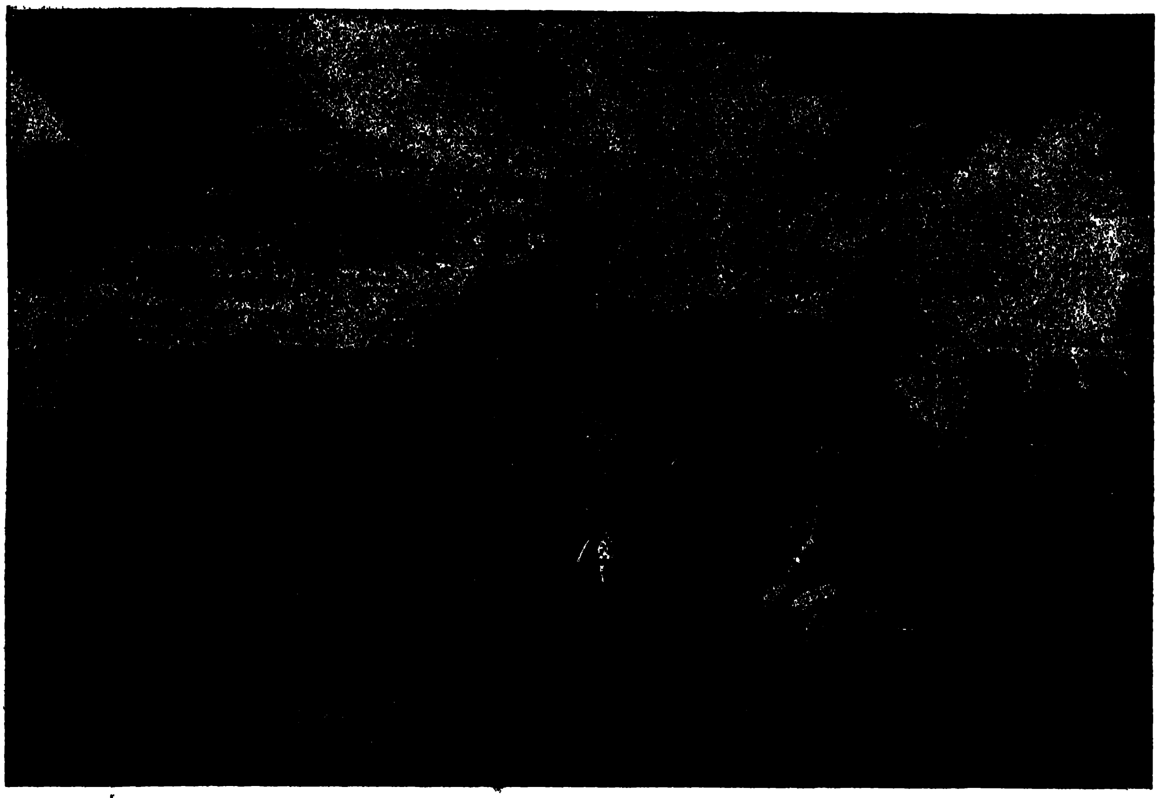
THE PRINCE OF PICKPOCKETS

Mr. Richard S. Lambert has written a study of George Barrington, whose fame is partly made by several dictionaries of quotations as one of those

> " True patriots all; for, be it understood,
> We left our country for our country's good."

He entitles his book " The Prince of Pickpockets " (12s. 6d.; Faber & Faber), and deals adequately and thoroughly with the astonishing career of Barrington. At the same time we are not to conclude that Barrington wrote the famous Prologue with which he is commonly associated, and which contains the much-quoted tag. The fame of this incomparable convict rests more securely on the record which Mr. Lambert has now put together in attractive and readable form—a rarer story than a deal of fiction.

A SOURCE-BOOK FOR HISTORY:



Diaries of an Equerry to George III

By George Knowles

"The Diaries of Colonel the Hon. Robert Fulke Greville, Equerry to His Majesty King George III." Edited with Notes by F. McKno Bladon, with a Foreword by Frances Countess of Warwick. 18s. net. (Bodley Head.)

These Grevilles are always important. Robert Fulke Greville, whose diaries are now given to us edited by Mr. F. McKno Bladon, was an equerry in waiting to George III, and a second cousin of that Charles Greville whose famous diaries have yet to be quite adequately exploited. They seem, these Grevilles, to be permanently on point duty in busy thoroughfares of life. Robert of that ilk comes to life in this presentation of his diaries, and he involves in his vital activities and machinations by Colonel Wellbred what time his royal master behaves either curiously or insanely or, very often, as cleverly as the best of those in the circle.

Madame D'Arblay's unsolicited testimonial, quoted by the editor, is also brought home to us—" there is something in Colonel Wellbred, so equal and so pleasing, it is impossible not to see him with approbation and to speak of him with praise." Robert Greville does not rank with the great ones nor with his contemporary cousin nor with his fellow servant of the Court who has so aptly nicknamed him. But his diary is an asset to a growing class of readers who, at the bidding of Lord Ponsonby, have been taught to revel in the literature of diaries.

H.M. King George III Returning from Hunting.
From the picture by Pollard Junior, engraved by M. Dubourg.
(By permission of Messrs. Fores).
From "The Diaries of Robert Fulke Greville," by F. McKno Bladon (John Lane).

jerky but pointed style a procession of desirable people of the period. He, it must be remembered, was Fanny Burney's Colonel Wellbred and the fame of his concurrent diarist at the Court of George III immediately guarantees the value of the new diaries. They could not fail to justify the text of a foreword which is written by Frances Countess of Warwick—the reminder that most of our history has been made by rulers who have paid more attention to the trivial than to the serious things.

The trivial things of this picture of the Court of George III are not always so trivial. They become important as one studies a remarkable period of British history. They are delightful entertainment for the unconcentrated reader but they are often what has been roughly called " the goods " for the professional historian. There is indeed still much that is mistaken to disperse about the life and habits of Farmer George. Robert Greville in his simple, forthright way helps us to a proper atmosphere in an English crisis—a short thirteen years of eighteenth century life at a point which needs all the light that can be shed upon it. A great deal of the history of this period may not have been made by the monarch. But it was made all round him and the people who made it march in and out of this diary, observed in small and

The monotony of a great deal of life in the royal circumstances of the time is no discouraging feature of Robert Greville's jottings. He has other things to discuss as when the famous harpsichordist comes to Court and he admires " some of his compositions played as I have heard them by Lady Hamilton." So we are reminded of a famous lady, that friend of Charles Greville who was Emma Hart and who lives in the foot-notes to history for a greater friendship still. In another but not less entertaining class is Robert Greville's story on the first importation of merino sheep into this country. Farmer George, Sir Joseph Banks and Greville are the prime movers in this movement after that " accidental conversation I had with the King in Richmond Gardens," and here is the conversation as reported by Greville.

Robert Greville's diary, like all good diaries, improves on acquaintance, partly perhaps because the king himself improves with the passage of time. Ultimately we are taken to Weymouth where the third part of this diary was written and where the king found life to suit him. It is this part of the diary which carries the pleasant scene of His Majesty's return from hunting in a picture probably painted after the beneficial stay at Weymouth.

THE AMERICAN REVOLT

"England in the Age of the American Revolution." By L. B. Namier. 25s. (Macmillan.)

In the history of North America the 8th of September, 1760, is a date that stands four-square as a landmark. At Montreal on the morning of that day Vaudreuil, the French viceroy of Canada, sent through the British outposts a letter accepting the stern demands of his opponent, Jeffery Amherst, the British commander-in-chief. New France had fallen; and with the capitulation of Canada there was surrendered to the British Crown more than had ever been surrendered to any Crown before. It might have been expected that this triumphant culmination to the efforts of British regulars and American provincials would have led to a continued and firmer union of interest and effort. Actually it might be said with truth that on that September day of 1760 the first rift, soon to open to a fissure and later to yawn to a chasm, developed in the solidarity of the victorious side.

After the Treaty of Paris in 1763 the defence of an empire which had received such substantial accretions in Asia and America necessarily occupied the attention of the British Government. It implied the maintenance of a standing army in America, a project to which the colonists were bitterly opposed. Nothing would convince them that France was merely scotched, not killed. Curiously enough in less than a fortnight after the signing of the Treaty of Paris the colonists were to realise that there was an aftermath of trouble in the discontent of the pro-French Indians whose lands had been sequestrated. Pontiac's war was remarkable as throwing up an Indian leader of remarkable powers of organisation, and as revealing an unexpected skill, tenacity and concert among the Indians themselves. Some of the colonies suffered terribly, but it was, in the main, by the efforts of English soldiers that the tide of rebellion was at length rolled back. To Great Britain, crippled with the cost of her share in the Seven Years' War, it seemed unfair that she should be called upon to undertake the entire cost of the defence of the American colonies. She was ready to bear the whole naval cost, but for the land forces she expected the provincials to pay a part. There were in existence laws of navigation and trade—to which the colonists had never raised objection—which, had they been observed, would have obviated all difficulty. But smuggling was carried on by the colonists to a staggering extent—worse still, there had been much scandalous illicit trade with the enemy in the late war. The famous Stamp Act was introduced merely to obtain from the American colonists, in the least objectionable way possible, one-third of the £300,000 required annually to maintain a garrison in America to protect the colonists from the Indians, from future European aggression, and from the land speculator and the landgrabber within their own borders.

If we wish to understand how England reacted to the attitude taken up by her colonists in North America it would seem that we ought to be given a picture of the circumstances which have been very briefly summarised in the preceding paragraphs. Mr. Namier however tells us practically nothing whatever about them, and this being so, we feel that the title of his book is not a happy one. For he deals not with "England," but entirely with the House of Commons, and 'The Age of the American Revolution" is a little misleading.

The opening sentence of his volume provides the key to the whole: "The social history of England could be written in terms of membership of the House of Commons." This is a statement with which we profoundly disagree. We really do not come to grips with America in Mr. Namier's book until page 265, where in Part IV he gives the names and the sentiments of the members, by classes, with a knowledge of, or an interest in, America—the West Indians, the Merchants, the Army Officers, the Naval officers, the land speculators; and this is followed by an extremely useful survey of the question of the proposed retention of Guadeloupe instead of Canada. In its limited specialised scope this book, which is most admirably documented, will be a useful companion to the works of Alvord, Beer, Channing, Hinkhouse, Howard and Van Tyne. F. E. WHITTON.

NERO FOR THE LIBRARIES

By Hamilton Fyfe

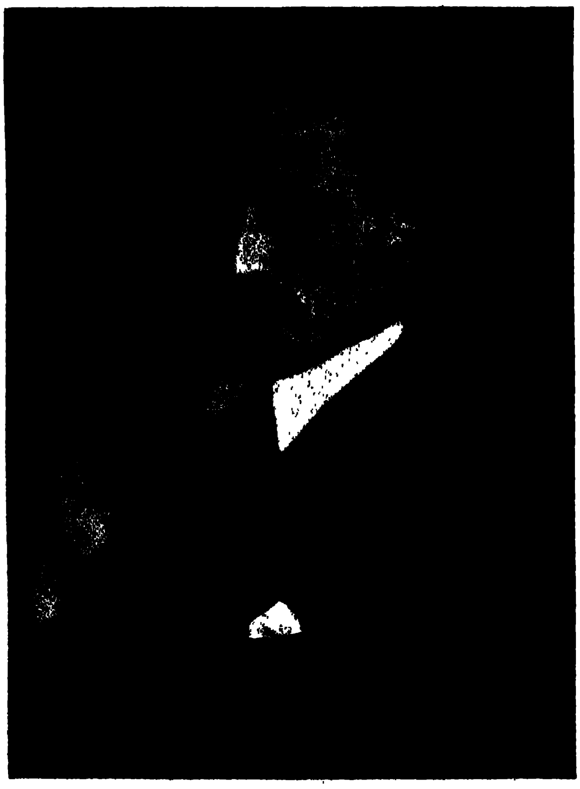
" Nero, Emperor of Rome." By Arthur Weigall. 21s. (Thornton Butterworth.)

History is almost always wrong in details and right in a general way. We often praise men for virtues they did not possess, we often blame them for crimes they never committed. But we may feel confident that they were virtuous or criminal in some other fashion. The verdicts of History, though they may not be supported by evidence, seldom err.

Thus the world has long execrated the name of Nero as that of a despot, bloodthirsty and inexcusable, more than half crazy and vicious to a degree unexampled in the annals of depravity. Partly because it suited later emperors to blacken his character, partly because the Christians represented him as Belial, Antichrist, the King of Unrighteousness, the Man of Sin, the Beast whose number in the Book of Revelation was 666, Nero became, as his best English biographer, Mr. Bernard Henderson, put it, " a type of inconceivable wickedness and unnatural horror." It was Mr. Henderson's task to dissipate that legend and to substitute for it a portrait more like the truth.

It is surprising therefore to find the claim put forward that Mr. Arthur Weigall's book " for the first time " shows Nero in a light less unamiable than that of tradition and popular fancy. All the more surprising in that Mr. Weigall in certain passages follows Mr. Henderson's narrative very closely. This is especially noticeable in such passages as those which relate the deaths of Nero and his tutor, Seneca. It may be said that no doubt both authors took the facts from the same sources, and we may leave the matter at that. Nothing however can explain away the statement that the view of Nero taken by Mr. Weigall is a new one.

To scholars and persons who read history for knowledge this book offers nothing new. To the general reader it will give a very fair notion of the character of the Emperor and of the age and of life among wealthy and leisured Romans in the first century of the Christian era. Some discount must be allowed on the stories of lust and cruelty, treason and greed, which may make readers unacquainted with Roman literature suppose that decent people were very rare. They were no rarer then than at any other period of human history. But they were in the background; the front of the stage was filled by their opposites, and it is these with whom Mr. Weigall is concerned. Also it is upon the sensational rather than the solid that he lays the more stress. He might have made more of Nero's talent for choosing men, of his good sense as a ruler during the earlier part of his reign, and less of his appearances as " artist " in public. But no doubt it is the Emperor on the stage as a singer who intrigues the popular imagination and if this book is not popular it will miss its mark.



A GREAT REVIVALIST

" George Whitefield, The Awakener." By Rev. Albert Belden, B.D. With an Introduction by Rt. Hon. Ramsay MacDonald. 12s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

Biographies of Whitefield are fairly numerous, but there will be a welcome for a new one so vividly wrought out as Mr. Belden's. It is fair to say however that while the biography necessarily occupies the larger part of the present book, Mr. Belden has more than a biographical aim. He longs for a revival of Whitefield's spirit in a form applicable to modern conditions, and in two or three concluding chapters he indicates what in his view that form should be. It would be outside the scope of this journal to attempt an estimate of Mr. Belden's idea as to the way the theological ideas and methods of the eighteenth century should be translated for to-day. As to his ultimate contention—that the evangelistic spirit is to find its modern expression in bringing about a better social order by means of political activity—that too is outside our scope. One may perhaps suggest that from Whitefield, the flaming apostle of individual salvation, to this doctrine is rather a far cry whether the doctrine itself be right or wrong. And the whole topic is, we fancy, rather more complicated than Mr. Belden has realised. However that may here be put aside.

The story of Whitefield is in itself a fascinating one, and loses none of its magnetism in Mr. Belden's telling. In its main outlines it is of course fairly well known. Mr. Belden has a certain number of fresh facts, specially in connection with Whitefield's " Bethesda," the orphan home he founded in America. But new or old, the tale holds us. This man, who anticipated John Wesley in the practice of " field-preaching," deemed so undignified then, who spent his years in hurrying to and fro between England and America as a missionary of the Gospel, who could sway multitudes by the power of his oratory and at the same compel aristocratic rakes to seriousness, who died almost on the pulpit steps—this was a man whom a just judgment must pronounce with a greatness something like that of St. Paul. Mr. Belden tells us of his journeys; of the churches he founded; of the adulation, varied by hostilities of the mob; of his unceasing labours and his undying passion for souls—and we live with Whitefield and in him as we read. Once again, a very great man.

There have been other verdicts. We are glad to see Mr. Belden's faithful dealing with Dr. Johnson, who saw in Whitefield nothing more than a religious demagogue. Even more recent writers have belittled his fame, or tried to. Mr. Arnold Lunn, in a Life of Wesley, talks of Whitefield's " vanity," because the preacher sought the countenance and help of the Countess of Huntingdon. This, and other criticisms of the kind, have been part of an effort to set Whitefield on a lower plane than Wesley—a futile procedure, in all conscience. The difference between a height of a thousand feet and one of nine hundred and ninety-nine is surely negligible. Both men are so great in their own sphere that any difference, if it exists, is of no account. Of course a conventional religiousness, to-day no less than previously, will have little admiration for a man who refused to have his missionary zeal cramped by formal bonds. But any impartial judge will rate Johnson's " coffee-house gossip " at its true value, and will declare, as Lecky (certainly no religious enthusiast) declared, that the appearance of Whitefield and the whole movement of which he was one of the protagonists, marked one of the really great formative events of our history. H. W. C.

Brig.-General Spears

whose book, " Liaison 1914," has just been published (Heinemann).

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE

By Marjorie Bowen

"William III and the Defence of Holland." By Mary C. Trevelyan. 21s. (Longmans.)

It was, in the year 1672, part of the design of Louis XIV, in his aspirations towards a revival of the Empire of Charlemagne, utterly to conquer the Netherlands, that "valiant sandbank" which the French monarch haughtily claimed to be no more than the muddy deposit of French rivers. The real enemy at whom the King of France aimed was the Habsburg, that shadowy but immovable Cæsar, the hereditary foe of the Bourbons and their pretensions; the immediate annihilation of the United Provinces seemed easy enough. Louis XIV had the best generals, the finest army, the most perfect war organisation in the world; his martial display, his wealth, the huge resources of the absolute monarchy built up by Richelieu, his personal renown (he was then at the zenith of his flamboyant manhood) were such as to alarm even a mighty foe; England was his pensioner and the rest of Europe ill-prepared to withstand his presumptuous pretensions.

Nor were the Dutch in a condition to meet any manner of attack; twenty years of a parliamentary oligarchy, under the rule of John de Witt, an idealist, a pacifist and a man shortsighted by reason of his own prejudices, had enervated them into a nation of traders and pamphleteers; their barrier forts were in ruins, their men had been discouraged to train for arms; the military, aristocratic classes had long been powerless and, though they had maintained their ancient pride in their sea power, their land forces and defences had been completely neglected; added to this their clumsy and complicated machinery of government was disjointed by discontent and party spites, for John de Witt was only popular among his own peculiar following. Such was the position of the Netherlands when the King of France hurled at them the full terror of his Jovian thunders. The result was chaos, despair, revolution, the instant loss of all the provinces save Holland, Zeeland and those farthest north. In this desperate situation, which led directly to the fall and murder of John de Witt and his brother, the most unlikely event occurred. The young heir of the ancient House of Orange, born during the bitter eclipse of both his paternal and his maternal house, hitherto deprived of all the offices and honours worn so brilliantly by his illustrious ancestors, sprang to the rescue of his overwhelmed country, rallied what seemed her useless resources and roused a fervour of patriotism that in two campaigns drove the redoubtable enemy from the Netherlands.

This youth was William III of Orange, a frail, elegant, austere and inexperienced prince of whom it was afterwards to be said: "For thirty years he had the honour of being the foremost personage in Europe." He spent his life in battling with France and in the end won, though he did not live to see the rout at Blenheim or the English flag flying over the rock of Gibraltar.

It is the opening years of this extraordinary life that Miss Trevelyan has attempted to write in the book under review. She has brought patience and learning to the task but has lost her central protagonist in a mass of unimportant detail; she goes, too, over a good deal of ground, overfamiliar to English readers, in her accounts of the politics of Charles II and Louis XIV. Her style is pedestrian and the subject can ill bear this; a bibliography is a grave lack, as also is any acknowledgment of the numerous recent works on the same subject. The maps are excellent and most useful, the illustrations seem carelessly chosen; they are, at least, poor. It was a pity to give the wretched etching of John de Witt with the De Baan portrait and the Dordrecht bust available. A careful, praiseworthy compilation, but one hardly likely to rouse much enthusiasm for a most remarkable man. The notes are an irritation; the scholar will not need them and the ordinary reader will find them unintelligible.

CABBAGES AND KINGS

"Traveller's Luck." By E. V. Lucas. 6s. (Methuen.)
". . . And Such Small Deer." By E. V. Lucas. 3s. 6d. (Methuen.)
"Come To Think Of It . . ." By G. K. Chesterton. 6s. (Methuen.)

A windfall of three books of essays has just occurred, two from Mr. Lucas and one from Mr. Chesterton. Of Mr. Lucas's one is a light and graceful animal anthology compiled from his published books, and the other is a collection of recent essays. Mr. Lucas has lost nothing of his dexterity and charm. His relish for quaint out-of-the-way things is unfailing, and in reading his commentaries on such subjects as "Arnold's Fyfield," "Bear-Meat" and "The Names of Apples" we realise why he is a perfect anthologist. He is interested in everything; nothing is too small for him to notice, and no one else can use so little to such purpose.

There is probably no living writer of essays so unlike Mr. Lucas as Mr. Chesterton. If Mr. Lucas is a connoisseur exhibiting his trifles with ease and polish, Mr. Chesterton is a born fighter, heedless of detail and careless of form, but exulting in the joy of battle. There is an air of inspired impromptu about all that he writes. And if Mr. Lucas is interested in little things for their own sake, Mr. Chesterton certainly is not. All things are symbolical to him. Where Mr. Lucas, for instance, would write about a mince-pie, Mr. Chesterton would write about the mystic idea of a mince-pie. No doubt in actual life he would give a mince pie his separate and serious attention, but when he takes a pen in his hand he cannot touch the smallest thing without shooting off into the cosmos.

In the present book he surprises us as usual by his ingenuity and insight, his humour, his dogmatism, and his immense capacity for enjoying himself, even at the expense of the reader, who appears to be a minor consideration. We might add by his inability to come to the point, for while he can put a thing perfectly in a sentence, he is apt to bury it under a heap of what he would call explanations which do not explain. Nor has he lost his habit of indulging in literary eccentricities, which hinder the progress of his argument, like a schoolboy stopping to play leap-frog on the way to school. But, as he suggests in his introduction, the times have changed, and he has been compelled to sober down a little, for he is no longer an individual fighter, but a soldier in an army; and while he has always been essentially a defender of the faith, using his medium as a weapon (though no one ever more heartily enjoyed its mere tricks and flourishes), his latest book of essays is more directly controversial than his former ones.

YORKE CROMPTON.

FOLK-LORE SPREADS ITS WINGS

"Myths and Legends and the Australian Aboriginals." By W. Ramsay Smith. 21s. (Harrap.)
"Folk Tales of a Savage." By Lobagola. 5s. (Knopf.)
"Greek and Roman Mythology." By William Sherwood Fox. 12s. 6d. (Williams & Norgate.)

Charabancs run through Avalon: and English fairy lore is securely—though so neatly!—bound between cloth boards. Our mythologists now make for the ends of the earth if they are to find fresh and freer ways in legend. Now, as if in challenge to the many, and recent, statements on the wretchedness, the barbarity and the general hopelessness of the Australian aboriginal (who in all our geography books was understood to serve second place to the kangaroo), comes Dr. Ramsay Smith's "Myths and Legends." Neither the title nor the unassuming preface does justice to the scope and value of the book. Mythology leads Dr. Ramsay Smith—as it has led so many others—to anthropology; anthropology to sociology.

Directly and modestly, he gives of the knowledge gained during thirty years' friendship with the fleeting tribes of Central Australia. He tells with rare sympathy their wild, hearty, friendly fables; of the Creation, of the "Land of Perfection," of Nurunderi, the great leader of the aboriginals: he describes their social order, their strict moral code, their daily round, their hunting and their sports; he devotes the whole of an eerie, fascinating chapter to their witchcraft and their potent mental suggestion.

The days of the black are numbered in Australia. Dr. Ramsay Smith has given a work of the greatest importance to anthropologists.

"The Folk Tales of a Savage," by Lobagola, are not so much tales as we know them as engaging little pastorales on which the curtain falls so soon as the stage is fairly set. They have no plot, these happy tales from the simple, childlike mind of the true bushman; no malice, no envy. Writes the artless Lobagola in his preface, "I hope some time to write still more folk stories of West Africa." The reader will find himself hoping so too.

Professor W. Sherwood Fox, of Ontario, treads hard beaten tracks, and we must be neither surprised nor disappointed if we find little that is essentially new in his book. He sets out to stress the importance of myths as vehicles of religious thought; but many of his pages are devoted to rather curt précis of the original legends; bedizened with an occasional Americanism. "Herakles," we read, "was 'big business' personified." But the book is very thorough.

IVERACH MACDONALD.

CHRIST LEGENDS: The Imaginations of Piety

"Christ Legends." By Selma Lagerlöf. Translated from the Swedish by Velma Swanston Howard. 8s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

The human race has always possessed, as one of its outstanding characteristics, an insatiable appetite for wonder. No doubt this began in its earliest gropings: when it first became aware of the stars, the trees, the flowers, the ocean; and it is wondering still. It has been said that it is evidence of the eternal child in all of us; but one would like to believe, rather, that it is an integral part of maturity: one with an acceptance of maturity's privileges, a sense of high responsibility and a questing idealism.

Like all other appetites, it grows with what it feeds on. If the collection of marvels, with which the universe is so prodigal, is not sufficient for the more eager among us, then new marvels must be invented, and fresh combinations of the existing ones arranged. The mythologies of all countries show this industrious improvement on Nature; and, since the institution of Christianity, the lives of the various saints and martyrs show it as well. It is not, of course, enough that a holy man was holy: he must undoubtedly also have worked miracles and been familiar with unfamiliar marvels. And this being so with apostles and disciples, then how much more so with the Master Himself?

The present collection—or perhaps it would be more correct to say, selection—of Christ legends, by Madame Selma Lagerlöf, is admirably compiled. Eleven in number, they are told with a simplicity of style and economy of diction which are eminently suitable to the subject-matter. The gleam of true poetry is in them all. The first ten deal progressively with the birth, early childhood and Passion of the Saviour; and perhaps one might select for especial mention "Robin Redbreast" as an example of the best and true elements of a legend in their right and beautiful proportions. The final story, concerning Christ only very indirectly, could well have given place to the fine (and, surely, strangely omitted) legend of St. Christopher, or to that quaintly beautiful one of the boy Jesus healing His playmate of the serpent's sting. But in a book of this kind, it is always difficult to refrain from exalting one's own personal predilections.

VERNON KNOWLES.

SHORTER NOTICES

The Call of Adventure

WINGS AROUND THE WORLD. By Baron Koening Warthausen. 6s. net. (Putnams.)

The title is rather sweeping considering the large distance the Baron traversed by boat, but this does not in any way detract from the merit of his performance and the long distances flown in his tiny 20 horse-power aeroplane are a tribute to the courage of the pilot and design of his plane. The book deals chiefly with scenes and incidents in the countries over which he flew and with his stay in America—a stay which nearly became permanent as a result of a serious taxicab accident. The book has been written in the hope that it will interest the young who have ambition to fly, and it should certainly succeed in its object.

PARACHUTING. By Charles Dixon. 12s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

Mr. Charles Dixon has here given us a history of the parachute. Of all things connected with aeronautics, parachutes have received the least attention. We have come to accept them in much the same way as lifebelts. The dangers faced and lives lost in the air have occasionally brought parachutes to the notice of the public, but their proper place in the development of flying has been ignored. This book therefore is the more welcome.

The author deals with the whole history of parachuting from the early attempts of Garnerin and Hampton to the hairbreadth escapes of Lindbergh and others. The book is fully illustrated with excellent photographs from the air, and it will appeal to everyone who has the slightest interest in flying.

DANGER RIVER. By Clyde Eddy. 18s. (Skeffington.)

The successful navigation of the famous Colorado River is the story dealt with in Mr. Clyde Eddy's book. Though it may be difficult to regard the navigation of a river as an affair of life and death, the realistic photographs and vivid descriptions of Mr. Eddy impress on the reader the dangers that attended the expedition. Setting out with a crew of thirteen men—nearly all of whom were students —Mr. Eddy arrived at his goal, the Needles, after six weeks' battle with the two hundred perilous cataracts of the Colorado. As on many expeditions there was a certain amount of discord between the members, but the author does not dwell at any great length upon the unpleasant incidents of the trip. The navigation is the thing, and like a good story teller he realises it. And he tells the story well, especially the narrative of the descent of the rapids.

ALL ABOUT SHIPS AND SHIPPING. 7s. 6d. (De La More Press)

This handy pocket-sized volume contains an astonishing variety of nautical information, besides illustrations and diagrams, all packed into a very small compass. There is a list of the ships of the Royal Navy with a brief description of the more important units, also a short history of the Service and the mechanical side of its development. Another useful feature is a list of the principal shipping companies' fleets with their house-flags and the distinguishing marks on the funnels. The articles on yachting, navigation and seamanship, though compressed, are well-informed. Historical sketches, useful tables and lists of nautical events, make this an invaluable little book to all who are interested, professionally or otherwise, in maritime affairs.

Among other things we learn that there are sixty-nine sailing ships, wholly or partly square-rigged, still afloat and in commission. Unfortunately, only three of these are British, the majority flying the Finnish flag. The veteran of this romantic flag is the Diego, built at Sunderland in 1868; the newest is the German barque Padua, built in 1926.

Recent Fiction

EXPERIMENTS IN TECHNIQUE: Vicki Baum and Arnold Zweig

By Hermon Ould

"Grand Hotel." By Vicki Baum. 7s. 6d. (Geoffrey Bles.)

"Claudia." By Arnold Zweig. 7s. 6d. (Martin Secker.)

"It is quite a mistake to suppose that hotel chambermaids spy through keyholes. Hotel chambermaids feel no interest whatever in the people behind keyholes. Hotel chambermaids have a lot to do and are tired out, and they are all a little disillusioned, and besides they are entirely occupied with their own concerns."

Thus Vicki Baum, the author of "Menschen im Hotel"; and she ought to know, as before writing her novel she took a situation as chambermaid in a large hotel in Berlin and kept it for six weeks while she gathered impressions. But "Grand Hotel" (the English title of her book) gives evidence of more than a power of observation, though that is plentifully evident: she has the rare faculty of seeing beneath surfaces and discovering the humanity concealed by appearances. "Grand Hotel" has all the elements of a thriller, and at times it thrills as thrillers thrill; but the characters are interesting for their own sake as well as for the part they play in a complicated patchwork of events. The little provincial clerk, Kringelein, who, having been condemned by his doctor to early death, throws up his past, his nagging wife, his irksome employment and environment of pettiness, gathers together all his available resources and decides to have one glorious bust-up in Berlin, is a Wellsian character drawn with something of Mr. Wells's deftness. The tragedy of the ageing Russian dancer—ageing though scacely middle-aged—whose public, callous as all impersonal forces are, is growing cold, is also told with sympathy and freedom from sentimentality. For although there is more than a dash of bitterness in Vicki Baum's attitude towards modern life, there is no cynicism and therefore no sentimentality.

The technique of her book is an interesting specimen of work influenced by the "talkies." The reader is hurried from one room of the hotel to another; he is permitted a glimpse of the events behind those doors which leave chambermaids blasé—the dancer's lonely tragedy, relieved by one episode of unexpected love; the middle-aged business man awakened to desire; the handsome nobleman turned crook, but so attractive that everybody wept at his violent death; the perky little typist whose beauty of person left no man unmoved; and above all, the clerk Kringelein, the down-trodden worm which turned and rent its trampler! Interlocking adventures, a little too easily linked perhaps, flit from screen to screen and the life of a great hotel with its shifting population is convincingly portrayed. "Grand Hotel" is imaginative journalism, with a background of pity. Mr. Basil Creighton must be praised for the translation, which has the spriteliness and somewhat slangy fluency which no doubt distinguish the original. The book is bound to be popular.

Arnold Zweig's new work, "Claudia," is also an experiment in an unusual technique. It is not a novel. The original is called "Die Novellen um Claudia," and the difficulty of rendering that phrase in neat, compact English probably led to the adoption of the present makeshift. Claudia is the subject of seven short stories, told by several characters who figure in the narrative, one of them by herself. The purpose of the method is presumably to obtain a sculptor's view, so to say, of the central character as seen from all sides.

Mr. Zweig writes fluently and with conviction, and spares no pains to convey the psychological processes by which he and his characters reach their conclusions; and yet Claudia does not quite come to life. Take each of these stories separately and you will have as vivid a portrait of Claudia as you could expect; your own imagination will fill up the hollows and delve behind the shadows, but it is not easy to dovetail the different views of Claudia as seen by different eyes. It is a jigsaw puzzle of which some pieces are missing; and a jigsaw should leave nothing to the imagination, its essential virtue being its completeness.

Claudia is a beautiful woman, intelligent and cultured, and is one of a small group of friends, all men except herself and her mother, who are the narrators of the tales. There would be no object in attempting to outline the story here: its value lies not in the events recorded, but in the psychological insight displayed by the author in explaining them. The first story is dull, only acquiring significance in the light of later stories, but the others are always interesting and sometimes absorbing.

Perhaps the most masterly is the one called "The Album," an almost terrifying realisation of the approach of old age written by the mother of Claudia; but "Nuit Blanche," which tells with delicacy and reticence the story of Claudia's fear after marriage, runs it close. Mr. Eric Sutton's translation reads so easily that one accepts it, as a whole, unquestioningly.

Mr. Collin Brooks.

Author of "Account Paid" (Hutchinson).

FOOT-NOTES TO A SAGA

More Forsyte Stories

" On Forsyte 'Change." By John Galsworthy. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

It is easily understood that, as he tells us in a quite unnecessary note of apology for offering us a score of " apocryphal Forsyte tales," Mr. Galsworthy finds it " hard to part suddenly and finally " from that notable family whose chronicler he has constituted himself. He has, as he also says, lived with them so long, and they must have grown almost more real to him than his friends in the flesh. As the years go by most of us tend to become a little garrulous about our family histories, relating, to ears not always willing, little incidents remembered or handed down to us by household tradition, and these tales strike just the note of a casual and spontaneous functioning of the memory, have just the air of unstrained intimacy which belong to such fireside anecdotage. But Mr. Galsworthy has one advantage over the rest of us : when he talks of his Forsytes he is never tedious.

A knowledge of the double trilogy is taken for granted in the reader of these stories. All of them however belong to an earlier period than the " Modern Comedy " and the majority of the events which they record took place before that unfortunate affair of Irene and Bosinney which was the theme of " The Man of Property," the first book of the Saga. Arrayed in chronological order and exactly dated, they cover almost a century, from the day in 1821 when " Superior Dosset " Forsyte brought his numerous and motherless family from Bosport to London " in two post-shays and the Highflyer coach," to that November morning in 1918 when Soames, a man of sixty-four, sought refuge in St. Paul's, " because it was big and old and empty, and English," from the noises of a London gone suddenly delirious, and stood beneath the dome " with his hands folded on the handle of his umbrella and his left knee flexed as if standing at ease." The notation of Soames's reactions to the War is one of the things which Mr. Galsworthy has done most delicately in this book. One feels that he started by disliking Soames, but that he has come to be fonder of him than of any of the others. Certainly, in all that vast gallery, his is the most deeply studied and most carefully finished portrait.

Between those two extreme dates there are stories from almost every decade, and with unemphatic skill Mr. Galsworthy indicates the changes which the advance of years brings, so imperceptibly that when they are realised it is with a shock of surprise, in fashions and points of view and human, especially family, relationships.

Relations between parents and children naturally play a considerable part in these episodes. There are two companion pieces in which figure those most attractive of the Forsytes, old Jolyon and Young Jolyon—their last evening together before the boy goes to Eton, studied in Mr. Galsworthy's tenderest mood, and a more tragic day some years later when the father hurries to Cambridge to get a son who has been trying to live like a Whyte-Melville young man out of the clutches of a moneylender. Two pieces in lighter vein are that in which Francie and Eustace, aged twelve and eleven, go into open revolt against Roger—another sign of changing times—because he insists on sacking a butler who is bibulous but their particular friend, and that in which June, aged eight, with the results which would have been disillusioning to anyone less certain of the innate goodness of humanity, encounters her first lame duck. This volume must certainly go on the shelf which holds the Saga and the " Comedy."

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

NOVEL NOTES: Mr. Dreiser, Mr. Graham and Two "Firsts"

TWELVE MEN. By Theodore Dreiser. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

"Nearly every turning-point in my career," says Mr. Theodore Dreiser, "has been signalled by my meeting some man of great force, to whom I owe some of the most ecstatic intellectual hours of my life." In his new book he has gathered together twelve such men, one of them his own brother, others men he has encountered in the way of business, or has gone out of his way to meet. In these studies he has material for more than a dozen novels; for character is the raw material of the novel, and not only the chief subjects of his miniature biographies, but wives, mothers and casual acquaintances who hover in the background are strangely real and, as seen through his eyes, suggestive of countless stories. Life is rich in ideas for such a man as Mr. Theodore Dreiser; one realises this when one notices how quickly he responds to vital temperaments. He gloried in Peter, whom he met in the art department of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, because Peter had such enthusiasm in living; he was attracted too to "De Maupassant Junior," who contributed to a magazine he was editing, and forgave the young man's arrogance because he had such a zest for life and work, and along with it such genuine ability. Charlie Potter was a very different type, simpler, less intellectual but no less interesting; he was reputed to be that rarity, a contented man, and Mr. Dreiser, having the indefatigable curiosity of the born writer, went to inspect him. Other studies concern "A Country Doctor"; Culhane, "A True Patriarch"; Rourke, the mighty; a mayor, and W. L. S., who died with his dreams unfulfilled. "We toil so much, we dream so richly, we hasten so fast, and lo, the green door is opened!" The author penetrates those lives with a wonderful understanding, and can discover and reveal in his human fellows what, unaided, most of us might fail to see, or be powerless to interpret.

BROTHER TO BERT. By Charlotte Haldane. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

"Brother to Bert" rings true to life, of a sort, a life of low music-halls and "drunks," free loves and the frenzied workings of the "artistic temperament," so-called. A book so brilliantly written that it skims successfully over the very thinnest of ice. From perambulator days on Bert and Len live in the blinding glare of the limelight. Their hearts and their heads are as light as their heels. They are miserable apart. They share their sorrows, their joys, their loves. Feverishly they dance through life, the pace growing hotter and hotter, till the dancing ends up on death's dark precipice. Lil, Len's better angel (rather a "teazy" angel at times, and with good reason), wrenches one twin back from its edge while helping to shove the other over.

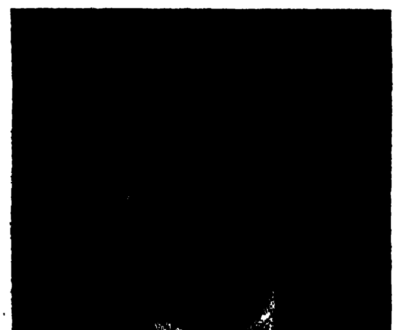
None could blame her! There is hardly a pleasant character in the book. Lil has the kind of "sweet" nature that easily develops into that of a shrew under the lash of extreme provocation. A harrowing book about sordid people, and yet life blows through it and carries the shrinking reader along on its breeze.

Miss Jolliffe Metcalfe.

FINISHED ABROAD. By Jolliffe Metcalfe. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

This novel is the record of Nancy Drew's experiences in Madame Domini's finishing school at Lausanne. To call it a school is something of a misnomer; for the instruction was farcical, and the sole purpose of the institution was what may be euphemistically called self-development. The girls and young women, cosmopolitan and of very different ages, were engaged not very successfully in killing time. It is hardly necessary to describe the tone that existed in such a place. To call it morbid and neurotic were an understatement. What interest there is in the story is in the contrast between Nancy, a normal English girl, and her companions, whose thoughts did not extend beyond love and dress.

The author's intention was doubtless satire, but in this (her first) novel it is imperfectly realised. To satirise morbid silliness without being dull requires a very skilful hand, and the author's imperfect success causes no wonder.



ST. VITUS DAY. By Stephen Graham. 7s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)

For long enough before the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria made his fatal entry into Sarajevo the younger generation of Serbs had been talking about his destruction. It was all in the air that he should be shot or bombed, and youthful revolutionary spirits met in secret and discussed ways and means. Six lads, some of them mere schoolboys, awaited his coming on June 28th, 1914, all of them fully armed. That other revolutionaries who assisted them in procuring arms and explosives were using them for their own ends, they did not suspect. Their own motive was simple enough—revenge against Austria and anxiety to free Serbia from slavery. They had no idea that their action would plunge Europe into warfare, but this it did and, in the end, achieved their dream of freedom, though not one of the six lived to see that achievement.

Mr. Stephen Graham describes, through the medium of fiction, the events which led up to the assassination and the characters concerned in the plot. He must have made exhaustive research to recreate so dramatically the preceding years.

THE SECRET IMAGE. By Laurence Oliver. 7s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

From the rectory tower Mabel Penrose, the rector's wife, looked across the sea and saw Trevean ablaze. Trevean was one of the small islands of "the Scillies," and on it, in its one house, Charlotte Blair and Jack Irskine had lived together for several years "in sin." And while the fire still raged, Charlotte, hurt and unconscious, was brought to Mabel's door for shelter. Thus begins a moving story of love, passion, tragedy, told with force and skill with touches of humour and unusual insight. Charlotte gradually recovers strength, but not memory. And here Mr. Oliver's quiet force is almost startling. He writes as if from experience, and as Charlotte drifts back to consciousness, and wonders, and tries to understand, and recalls nothing, not even her own name, the effect is most impressive. At last some words of an old friend quicken the numbed brain, the past lives again, and in the following chapters we learn Charlotte's story from girlhood to marriage, and on through the dull, repressed years as the wife of Sir Edward Blair. Then came the War—and Jack Irskine, and "the life of sin," so beautiful, so happy, on Trevean. There memory stops. But, later, there is a second shock, and to Charlotte comes, with torturing clearness, the memory of the rest of her story, and the final tragedy. "The Secret Image" is, we understand, a first novel. It is certainly a distinguished piece of work.

Laurence Oliver.

A GALLERY OF WOMEN: Six Diverse Studies

"The Natural Mother." By Dominique Dunois. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)
"Heirs." By Cornelia Cannon. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
"Spleen." By Olive Moore. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)
"Masquerade." By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)
"The Office Wife." By Faith Baldwin. 7s. 6d. (Sampson, Low.)
"The Woman in the Wilderness." By Constance Smedley. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)

As Mr. Wells long ago reminded us, there are at least two sorts of women. One might be tempted to consider this pronouncement of Otto Limburger an underestimate, but it is probably true that the most impenetrable of all barriers is that which divides the woman with maternal instincts from her sister who lacks them.

Miss Clare Leighton, whose book, "Woodcuts," is to be published shortly (Longmans).

The first two novels are concerned with the problems of childlessness. In the case of Georgette, the heroine of the Femina Prize novel, desire to become a mother is intensified by fear of losing the farm which she and her husband hope to inherit. This, to the French peasant landowner, would be the direst of tragedies, and the desperate measure adopted by Georgette to save the land makes a moving story, well and simply told, though the book loses a great deal by clumsy translation.

It is a personal and introspective sorrow that troubles Miss Cannon's ex-schoolmistress Marilla, a far more complicated individual. Having married for children, she can neither forgive herself nor her husband when the marriage proves sterile, and this attitude bids fair to spoil both their lives. Miss Cannon has too sure a sense of character for ready-made remedies; she is content to handle the situation with understanding, and while never losing hold of her central theme gives us delightful pictures of life in modern New England. Some of the liveliest chapters depict the difficulties and humours of the Polish post-war immigrants to Lovell with their efforts to placate the original settlers and become "good Americans."

With "Spleen" we come to the other side of the picture. The idea of child-bearing is abhorrent to Ruth. In her own words, "What to them is such a wonderful thing is to me fuss and ugliness . . . and meaningless too, and dull and hopeless. . . . A boy is born. Or a girl. . . . And you know beforehand every possibility of its life, and like a litany the answer is unalterable and as assured. Birth. Adolescence. Marriage. Birth. Old age. Death." Ruth's story is revealed through the medium of her thoughts. Sometimes the thread is disconnected while we watch the peasants of the Island of Foria—silent Mario plaiting his long scarlet garlands of tomatoes, the crested women water-carriers with nereid-swinging hips—or listen to the artist Uller discourse against priests, marriage, musicians and the English nation, but all is experienced through the consciousness of this tormented, eternally questioning woman. "You who have wisdom but no peace," wrote Uller. There is wisdom and beauty, and horror too, in this highly imaginative novel written with an emotional intensity that accords well with its subject.

"Masquerade" is a rather far-fetched tale of plot and counter-plot revolving round the English country house of Somerton. The improbabilities however are easily overlooked in enjoyment of the entertainment provided. The situations are neatly contrived, the dialogue witty, and there is a caustic humour in Mrs. Sidgwick's descriptions of people and events that provides piquancy. Two at least of the characters, the German wife Magda, and her husband's grim stepdaughter, remain unforgettably in one's mind.

Miss Faith Baldwin takes a New York typist for heroine in her endeavour to state some of the difficulties of modern business life. Though lacking subtlety in portraiture or creation of atmosphere, it is competently written and will no doubt be popular with many who like an eventful novel with plenty of love interest.

Miss Dorothy Parker, author of "Laments for the Living" (Longmans), reviewed in this issue.

A Welsh enchantress moves through the pages of "The Woman in the Wilderness," a lively, sympathetic story in which the author has succeeded in conveying some of the charm of Elise's tortuous personality. The rather wholesale changes of heart demanded by the happy ending entail some sacrifice of naturalness in an otherwise attractively spontaneous book.

E. S.

LOVE IN AMBUSH. By Barbara Willard and Elizabeth Devas. 6s. (Gerald Howe.)

The love affairs of two young ladies of the 1840's are amusingly unfolded in a series of letters to each other. Selina, an inmate of her aunt's uncongenial home at Richmond, and Henrietta, bored by the rusticity of Midhurst, find relief in pouring out their feelings, recounting their amorous adventures, describing their clothes and railing against the tyranny of their elders to a sympathetic audience. The atmosphere of the period, which is particularly suited to the epistolatory form, is well sustained, and the book is generously illustrated with pen drawings by one of the authors.

Of the two Selina perhaps shows the sprightlier wit and her letters are more indicative of character, her modesty being reinforced by a good deal of self-knowledge.

THE REMORSE OF MONSIEUR LE CURÉ. By Helen Mary Boulnois. 7s. 6d. (Shaylor.)

Monsieur le Curé de la Roche is a saintly St. Francis-like figure beloved by all who know him. A breakdown in health causes him to forsake his work in a poor quarter of Paris and accept the hospitality of his cousin the Marquise in her old home on the sunny shores of the Mediterranean. Here comes an innocent troubler of the peace in the shape of a young English chauffeuse who recalls a romance of the Curé's youth. Through his grief, which after all is founded on a misapprehension, the Curé gains a deeper sympathy with his flock and settles down to a tranquil old age much to the joy of his cousin, whose generous heart is for ever occupying itself with plans for the happiness of others.

There is considerable charm in the telling of this simple story with its pictures of Provençal life, the gay chatter of the Marquise and her entourage throwing into striking relief the picturesque asceticism of the old priest.

A MEDIÆVAL ROMANCE

"The Flame on Ethirdova." By Hector Bolitho. 7s. 6d. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

Mr. Bolitho's vagaries in literature have been interesting, not because his work till now has possessed any great intrinsic merit, but because it has always seemed to be clearing the way for something bigger and more successful. One picks up his latest work eagerly; is this a valuable book, or are we to be treated to more sweepings, entertaining perhaps in their way, but falling short of the finished workmanship of a well-constructed novel?

It is gratifying to find in "The Flame on Ethirdova" a more ambitious project than the author has attempted before. The pomp and circumstance of a mediæval monastery give scope to both the satirist and the romantic; Mr. Bolitho approaches his subject reverently and has written a story which at times is genuinely beautiful.

The story is charmingly told, and it is remarkable how sharply every character lives, so long as Mr. Bolitho will let it. Unfortunately he sees in death the most solemn and moving moment of life and he can seldom resist killing a character off almost as soon as he has created it. As a result the book is episodic and constructionally weak, the author's interest (and no author delights in his own characters more) hopping from person to person, until fifty pages from the end a shock is provided by the introduction of a new character whose part is nothing else but the working out of a suitable conclusion.

It may be that Prince Hubertus, whom we should have much enjoyed meeting earlier, was Saint John reincarnate, but that is at the best a makeshift, and still leaves a feeling of dissatisfaction. The only real thread holding the book together is the rhythm of Mr. Bolitho's style, which perhaps just carries the reader through two hundred pages. But it was a heavy and needless burden to have laid upon it.

J. E. F.

YOUNG LESLIE. By R. J. White. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Young Leslie" is an historical novel dealing with the Rebellion of '45; the story is staged in the Midlands and in Italy. On the death of his father (shot in the back by one of the Hanoverians) Young Leslie is chosen leader of the gang. The Black Dragoons, a band of people living in caverns in the wild region of Dovedale, outlawed on account of their unswerving loyalty to the Stuart cause, have become the terror and scourge of the country-side and of all those who now own allegiance to King George.

Prince Charlie and Young Leslie meet in Rome and swear undying friendship. Dangers abroad, disappointment and bitter disillusionment become their daily portion. Adverse winds and the English fleet drive them from England's inhospitable shores. Together they face the final desperate hope and at the head of the leal clansmen and a small undisciplined army of English followers they march on Derby, only to retreat. The book is well written and the characters live.

OLD PATCH'S MEDLEY. By Marjorie Bowen. 7s. 6d. (Selwyn Blount.)

These stories of eighteenth century London reflect something of the ironical spirit of Old Patch, the favourite jester of Cardinal Wolsey. They concern various parts of London, "mainly the London of which some traces yet remain, the London of two hundred years ago, which has to some of us the familiarity of a recurrent dream." Nobody is more skilled than Miss Marjorie Bowen in evoking an atmosphere of things past and gone, and in her tales, with their fascinating romance and covert satire, the character of period and place is strongly marked. You have stories of Lincoln's Inn Fields, of Covent Garden, of a house near Hampstead Heath, of St. James's, Soho, Drury Lane, Islington—neighbourhoods haunted with memories of the eighteenth century, and haunted too, no doubt, by Old Patch in the days of his quips and banter, perhaps still by his mocking ghost.

THE DORSET OF T. F. POWYS

Some Fine Short Stories

"The White Paternoster." By T. F. Powys. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

Mr. T. F. Powys is not without his imitators; but they who trespass into Powysian fields soon get lost. His art is not to be imitated. His world is all his own. Topographically it is reputed to be somewhere down Dorset way; but as a matter of fact there is no map that will reveal the Dorset about which Mr. Powys so exquisitely writes. Americans may go on conducted tours round the Hardy country; but when it comes to Tadnol and Dodder and Maids Madder (if Americans ever take up the cult of Powys), they had better stay at home. For the truth is that the Dorset of "Mr. Weston's Good Wine" and "Innocent Birds" and "Kindness in a Corner" lives only in Mr. Powys's mind. Not that it is any the less vital for that; only they do foolishly who criticise it for being too rude, or too fantastic, or too given over to the wiles of the Evil One. The only just criticism one can possibly apply to Mr. Powys's tales is whether they are convincing as works of art. Judged on that score it must be confessed they usually come through singularly unscathed.

Take for instance the short stories that make up this newest book from his pen. They are uneven—it would be too much to expect them not to be—but at their best what a perfect art they betray! One of the finest stories in the collection is the title story. To nail it down to any kind of précis would be like attempting to tell someone what "Full Fathom Five" is all about; it cannot be done. Here is a tale of country credulity, of virginity mysteriously protected, of an old man's simple love faithfully rewarded. Considered as photographic art it is monstrous, absurd; countrymen do not talk to God as Mr. Moggs did, nor, even in Dorset do mothers bid their daughters hang a white paternoster over the doorway to "keep naughty ones away at night-time." Considered however as life transmuted into art, it creates a perfect illusion. To enjoy Mr. Powys's books, in fact, one must be as willing to yield oneself up to "that willing suspension of disbelief which constitutes poetic faith" as if one were reading "The Ancient Mariner" itself. If you complain that you ought not to be expected so to do when reading prose, that is another matter: Mr. Powys demands it of you. Denying his demands you will miss some of the loveliest prose-work of our time. After having published twelve books, Mr. Powys is at last sinking into the public consciousness as a writer worth reading; but not until readers cease to apply to his work the critical standards that are usually applicable to novels and stories will he be at all widely read—and perhaps, so standardised are our conceptions, in our time that will never be.

"The White Paternoster" is his second collection of short stories, and a few of them, even if we had not already read them in reviews and magazines, we should have no hesitation in dating a considerable way back; but even so, some of the best tales he has ever written are here. Especially do we single out "Old Men," a fable of the craftiness of rural old age; "The Bride," a swift and terrible tragedy; "What Lack I Yet?" a tale of cruelty brought at last to unrepentant knees; and "A Pretty Babe," an almost legendary story of a faithful shepherd. And here, as in all of Mr. Powys's books, is a prose as limpid and clear as cool running water. There are three fine masters of the modern short story now writing in England, and one of them (and perhaps the best of them) is T. F. Powys. For his style alone he would deserve our highest praise; so undefiled does he keep the well of English prose.

C. Henry Warren.

THE BACK-TO-BACKS

Grim Realism

"The Back-to-Backs." By J. C. Grant. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

Only an angry man could have drawn such a grim, brutal picture of a mining village in the north of England. Throughout his book we feel that Mr. Grant is a very angry man—a man who sees black instead of red. He is infuriated that human lives should be reduced to such squalor and misery, that human bodies should be broken and wasted with toil, and writes of these things in the heat of passion. His story is the shadow of truth rather than the substance, a distorted and misshapen shadow, but holding the image of truth nevertheless; you cannot get away from its realism, even if you protest that there must be a lighter side to the ugliness he draws so convincingly; that there must be humour as well as suffering around the pits; idealism as well as sensuality. He is conscious of the beauty that haunts even the most desolate lives, of the affection that binds heart to heart, but he is less conscious of the humour and tolerant good-humour that are to be found everywhere among human creatures; that is why his book strikes a note of unrelieved harshness.

He paints his village in stark black-and-white down to the smallest detail; he is nauseatingly frank; he shows you without reticence the lives of the Shieldykes—Geordie and Jane, their two sons and adopted daughter. Incidentally the lives of other mining families mingle and intermingle, and for background there is the sordid village of Hagger with its pit and its swamp and its mountainous slag-heap. Among other horrors we get a vivid description of an accident in the mine which makes Tom Shieldyke a cripple for the remainder of his life.

Mr. Liam O'Flaherty, in his preface, calls it "a terrifying novel." It is more than that; it is a novel that jars and hurts at almost every page, but contains notwithstanding passages of wistful beauty.

Almey St. John Adcock.

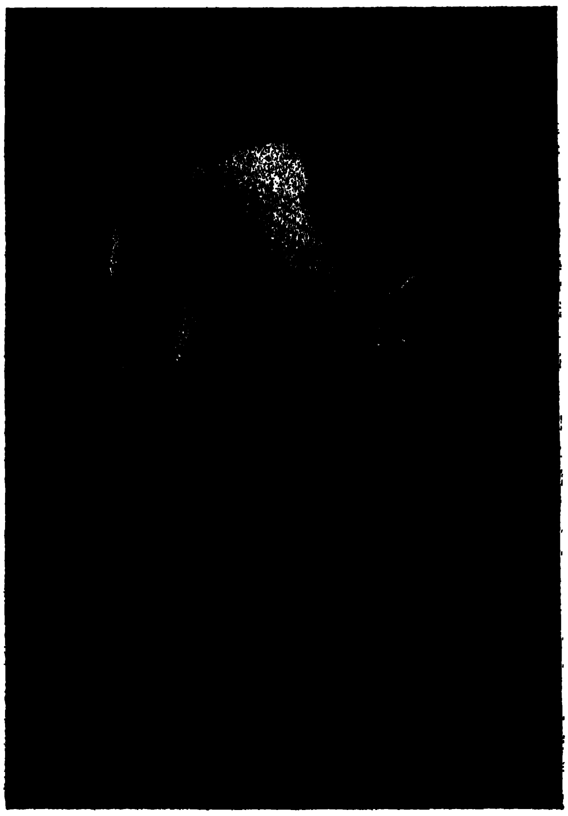

Photo by Elliott & Fry. Mr. Hugh I'A. Fausset, whose new book is reviewed in this issue.

THREE POPULAR NOVELISTS

UNCLE SAM IN THE EYES OF HIS FAMILY. By John Erskine. 7s. 6d. (Putnams.)

Mr. John Erskine has borrowed the "cartoon figure" of Uncle Sam to fill the rôle of hero in his latest novel. "I have long believed that this figure might be filled out into a complete character, endowed with an inner as well as a public career. Our national temperament, that is, might have a biography. Since no one else has attempted it, I here try my hand." So says Mr. Erskine in his foreword. "Uncle Sam" is the kind of book with which to settle down in an arm-chair, with the curtains drawn, the fire burning red, and a November fog blasting the world outside. Its satirical humour turns a grey world gay. It is like a visit to the pictures—the silent ones—with an organ playing softly in the distance. Picture after picture glides swiftly across the screen, too swiftly. They are there and then they are gone, the transit has been so swift, the captions flicker on and off again. Uncle Sam is a convincing symbol of the best American spirit, its push, its resourcefulness, its bulldog grip. Uncle Sam is so deliciously human, the reader sorrows when he is sad and laughs when he rejoices.

Here is a new friend to be added to the list of fiction affinities. Uncle Sam lingers in the mind like a pleasant dream. One would hate to forget him. The dramatisation of "some European opinions of our country" alone makes the book worth reading. They are rich with dry humour.

BELSHAZZAR. By H. Rider Haggard. 7s. 6d. (Stanley Paul.)

"Belshazzar." Glamour of Egypt; glitter of wandering queens; visions of pavilions hung with priceless carpets, warmed by scented braziers, crowded with vessels of silver and of gold. Clash of battles; triumphs of victory; pawns of fate; these gauds decorate the pages of "Belshazzar." Sais, Salamis, Memphis, Thebes, Babylon—such names as these drift across the pages, calling up visions of days of splendour long since past and gone. Amasis, Pharaoh of Egypt, Belshazzar, King of Babylon, Daniel the Prophet, stalk across the stage, fighting, plundering, cursing, interpreting, judging. And a love story set among all this splendour. The scenes set in Babylon are the most effective in the book. The heart of the reader must warm to Nabonidus, aged King of Babylon, weak but kindly, his false beard of ceremony hanging loose upon his neck, his golden crown awry, his "jewel-encrusted" cloak slipping from his shrunken shoulders, gloating over the images of the gods he had filched from the people to add to his collection of the gods of his empire.

After many adventures true love runs smooth, the lovers are united and Belshazzar meets the end he so richly deserved, but not quite so painful a one as was surely his due.

STORM DRIFT. By Ethel M. Dell. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Miss Dell's latest hero, Tiggie Turner, who appeared as a subsidiary character in "By Request," is of a dove-like mildness compared with some of her earlier creations. Until on the deck of a steamer he encounters a young girl apparently deserted by her husband, he is an ordinary agreeable young man more popular with his own sex than with women. This meeting and its ensuing complications however transform him into a determined though always chivalrous lover whose faith in the lady survives a good deal of evidence about her decidedly eventful past.

If Tiggie is far from being the strong passionate man we know so well, Viola is the essence of femininity. A successful career as a child dancer in Paris was followed by three years of married life with a drunkard in the East. She is an inspired bridge player, a skilful instinctive nurse, yet she manages to retain the sort of helpless innocence that causes little children and young men alike to compare her with an angel. Miss Dell drags hero and heroine through incredible adventures with her usual gusto before the inevitable happy ending is reached.

LONGITUDE AND PLATITUDE
A Dull Travel Book

"Labels." By Evelyn Waugh. 8s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

When, on the fourth page of "Labels," one finds Mr. Evelyn Waugh giving a detailed description of what it feels like to fly from London to Paris, one is at once assailed by horrible fears; and a further study of his book only serves to show that these fears were well founded. In view of the reception accorded to Mr. Waugh's two novels it was reasonable to expect that his first travel book would make some pretence to originality; but those who seek for original thought or material in "Labels" will be sadly disappointed.

Mr. Evelyn Waugh.
From a portrait by Henry Lamb.

After a chapter on Paris which adds nothing at all to the ordinary person's knowledge of that city, Mr. Waugh proceeds to Monte Carlo, Naples, Port Said, Cairo, Valetta, Constantinople, Athens and Ragusa, returning to England by way of Mallorca, Gibraltar, Barcelona and Seville; and although his comments on hotels and his guidebook-like notes on the principal "sights" may be useful to people who are thinking of taking a similar trip, they are hardly likely to enthral the general reader. And yet Mr. Waugh has a kind of talent: his description of Gaudi's architecture is neat and cleverly written, and it makes one regret the space which he has wasted in describing deck-games, in drawing a conventional picture of the life of the British colony in Port Said, in quoting from Baedeker, and in mentioning such personal details as that he had his hair cut in Constantinople and that he stayed in Athens with two friends called Mark and Alastair.

Mr. Waugh's farrago of longitude and platitude strikes one, in the end, as being the material on which a book might eventually be based, rather than a book itself. Any traveller could produce his own "Labels," but few, perhaps, would take the trouble to do so; fewer still would have the assurance to send it to a publisher; and even fewer—perhaps no one but Mr. Evelyn Waugh—would have the luck to get it published.

EDGAR HOLT.

THE LIGHTER SIDE
Taxis and their Habits

"Taxi." By Anthony Armstrong. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

For a Punch author to write a treatise on taxis is certainly unexpected. Indeed a treatise on taxis at all would not, at first sight, commend itself to the general reader. But that is only because the general reader knows nothing about taxis. He is however not to be blamed on that account, for until Mr. Anthony Armstrong made them his subject, nobody else appears to have thought of doing so.

Now because Mr. Armstrong is—will he forgive the term?—a professional humorist, there may be a temptation to dismiss this book of his with an airy: "Oh well, you can be funny about anything if you try." But did Mr. Armstrong set out to write a funny book about taxis? The answer, we feel, is in the negative. He found himself interested in taxis, and studied their history, and made friends of their drivers, observing their characteristics both at home and abroad—and found them funny. He didn't manufacture the fun; it was ready made. But how fortunate it was to find so facile a pen as Mr. Armstrong's to interpret it! That Scotland Yard requires the back seat of a taxi to measure 16 inches by 20 and the front seat 14 by 17 probably leaves us unmoved; it needs an "A. A." (I don't mean an Automobile Association) to point out that Scotland Yard thereby displays a recognition of comparative anatomy since, in a mixed party, men take the front seats and women the back.

Two chapters are devoted exclusively to the London taxi-driver. "During the Christmas season a lorry was taking a stack of holly from Covent Garden to a big florist's and the driver, feeling in the spirit, had decorated the bonnet with various sprigs from his load. At the corner he was nearly run into by an elderly taxi-driver and so, leaning out, proceeded to tell him what he thought of him in blistering terms. The old driver listened till it was over, then shook his head reproachfully and said: 'What's the use of 'aving 'olly in yer bonnet, if you ain't got 'olly in yer 'eart!'" Laced with stories like that, Mr. Armstrong's chapters on the London taxi-driver soon pass. As for the Parisian driver, what does he think of his London counterpart? "They march at slowness," he says scornfully, "my God, at a slowness; they have it always in the head to avoid the collision, they conduct the carriage as if pedestrians were worth the trouble and, see you, monsieur, thing formidable, they never horn!"

There is a chapter on taxi law—and very curious it is—as when a man who has hired a cab with three friends drops two of them half-way and picks up two others, he is only required to pay the "extras" for two; there is a chapter on taxis and crime, and another on cab shelters and standings. Continental taxis are dealt with, and New York taxis, and taxis during the War. Who, but for Mr. Armstrong, would have supposed that in one type of the apparently simple taximeter there are no fewer than 900 separate parts (and well over 1,000 in another type); and to him must go the credit of perpetuating the historic tip of £20 and a diamond tie-pin. This last fact appears in a chapter on taxi "records," where it is mentioned that men who drive for some companies have to hand in a report of any defect that their taxis may develop. This report of a broken taximeter now lies in the archives of a South London company: "Sir, Having picked up a gent in Piccadilly, I took him to Hammersmith. The meter went wrong and at the end only registered 8d., much to the delight of the old —— inside." The naïveté of the report lies in the fact that the missing word was written in full, but, as Mr. Armstrong points out, this not being a War book, it cannot be reproduced.

F. A. RICE.

TENNYSON RECONSIDERED

Georgian Verdicts

"Tennyson." By Humbert Wolfe. 3s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)
"The Poetry of Alfred Tennyson." An Essay in Appreciation. By C. H. O. Scaife. 5s. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

Each of these little books represents an attempt to restate the case for Tennyson in terms of the thought and feeling of to-day, and both start from the same position. Mr. Wolfe describes his purpose as being to prove "that much recent criticism of Tennyson was the result rather of reaction against Victorianism than of reading the poet"; while Mr. Scaife asserts that "in our time at least we shall never do justice to Tennyson, the poet, until we separate our judgment from Tennyson, the Victorian."

Mr Wolfe indulges in much characteristically pretty writing, and admirers of it will enjoy reading that, in "Come into the Garden, Maud," "the great wings have taken the air and are beating with a steady, faultless rhythm for the stars," or that, after seeing Tennyson's early play, "The Devil and the Lady," "the Muse of English verse must have taken a deep breath, laid her hand on the boy's hair, and with her slow adorable smile have whispered in his ear, 'Well then!'" But while writing such as this may adorn a case, it does not advance it, and we lay Mr. Wolfe's book down with the feeling that he has evaded the central issue. What he has done is to concentrate on "Maud" in the belief that "if it could be demonstrated that one considerable poem, written in his middle years, was more passionate than Swinburne, more various in execution than 'Lollingdon Downs,' and as great an innovation as 'The Ancient Mariner,' it would not be necessary to attempt a further examination of the 'Idylls of the King' or of the Plays to support my contention that Tennyson, so far from being the muffled poet of domestic horizons, was as lonely and as wild as his own eagle." And certainly on this ground he makes out a very good case.

But to claim that Tennyson is "the poet of passion in a way that Swinburne never achieved," is not to prove the reality of his passion or to convert those who feel that the passion of "Maud" is unreal in a different way from that of "Dolores." That Tennyson suffered all his life from "some dark undercurrent woe," and that this found intense expression in "Maud" cannot be doubted. But it was because this neurotic distress prevented him from making true contact with reality that his love poetry no less than his muffled domestic poetry has a taint of falsity. While therefore Mr. Wolfe's appreciation of the metrical originalities and felicities of "Maud" is admirable, if a little effusive, his treatment of the emotion which underlay it, and indeed of Tennyson's emotional history as a whole, strikes us as often fanciful and sentimental.

Mr. Scaife, on the other hand, resolutely avoids indulging either fancy or sentiment at his subject's expense. The central point of his appreciation is "In Memoriam," which, he writes, "is a kind of biography; the record of an emotion. At first numbing, it grows to a feverish agony, and then gradually subsides and passes into the general tissue of the author's life. Tennyson was equipped by nature to embody such an experience in poetry, for those poems in which he had already achieved excellence are all marked by a quality of painful melancholy, a morbidity of desolation which gave him his moments of greatest poetic beauty."

The morbidity in short which Tennyson expressed and with which he wrestled in "In Memoriam," has a reality which it lacked in "Maud." In the one it was centred upon a friend whom he had passionately loved and lost; in the other it was artificially associated with a melodramatic love-story which, however well he handled it, never touched the depths of his being.

Mr. Scaife's appreciation of "In Memoriam" deserves therefore careful consideration, and I find it in many ways convincing. But the same may be said of his book as a whole.

HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

Poets' Corner

MR. PREEMBY AND MODERN POETRY

The Writers of 1930

By
Wilfrid Gibson

"The Best Poems of 1930." Selected by Thomas Moult. 6s. net. (Jonathan Cape.)
"Collected Poems, 1920–1930." By Alfred Gordon Bennett. 8s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

"'But perhaps you don't like modern poetry?'

"'I don't mind it,' said Mr. Preemby genially." Does not this bland reply on the part of Christina Alberta's father to the question of Mr. Crumb admirably express the cheerful indifference of the great public, and even of the smaller reading public, to the indefatigable activities of the World's Worst Sellers? It is an indifference to be deplored; yet I am afraid none of the poets in the books under review sounds a clarion note that will rouse the great public, or even unduly excite that small but optimistic clan which is ever on the alert for the sound of a new note. Mr. Moult claims indeed that he has gathered together in his anthology the "Best Poems of 1930"; but if his claim has any justification, all I can say is (to mix my metaphors) that 1930 was not a vintage year. Of course any volume that contains work by A. E., Davies, de la Mare, Blunden, Chesterton, Laurence, Noyes, Sturge Moore, Watson and Wolfe cannot be altogether without distinction; but though the poems by these poets are all characteristic, not one of them gives us its author at his best, with the exception perhaps of Laurence's "The Triumph of the Machines."

Mr. Alfred Gordon Bennett.

Nevertheless there is one poem of outstanding merit in the book, a poem that seems to me on an altogether different plane from anything else in the collection, and this is Roy Campbell's superb "Horses of the Camargue." I should like to have the pleasure of quoting it here for the pleasure of my readers; but I should have to give it as a whole, as I could not bear to mutilate it by amputating even its most magnificent lines. For the rest, in their humbler way, I consider Richard Church's "Museum Piece," Helen Choate's "Resurrection," Michael Colley's "Order of Service" and Monk Gibbon's "Being But Men" the most notable poems in the volume. I take the liberty of quoting the last, as brief as it is beautiful:

"Being but men, not gods, we'll need take pride
In all that gives the lie to mean estate;
All moments borne beyond the common tide,
All littleness of heart made briefly great;
All beauty vouched with sudden indrawn breath,
A word, a turn of head, a lovely look,
A gesture grave, a phrase defying death,
Or a chance sentence in an unsought book."

I suppose I should be too modest even to mention my own contribution, but I only do so to point out a misprint which makes nonsense of the tenth line, in which "divine" should read "dwine." It is perhaps only fair to the printer to add that I accept responsibility for the rest of the poem.

Although many of Mr. Bennett's verses have been printed in periodicals, these periodicals were evidently either too obscure or too exotic, even for so diligent a researcher as Mr. Moult, for nothing from them is included in his anthology. Yet "Principal Poets of the World," in which Mr. Bennett tells us some of his poems have appeared, should be a notable publication! Unluckily in his note of acknowledgment Mr. Bennett does not satisfy our curiosity by indicating which precisely of his poems the editor of that momentous magazine (or is it a tome? I feel sure it must be a tome!) had the "discernment" (Mr. Bennett's own word) to include. But at all events we have the satisfaction of having gathered together in one volume all the poems that Mr. Bennett has written during the last ten years, and need not go searching for them in the Dublin Mercury, The Mombasa Times, The Manchester Book, The Sunrise Annual, Pegasus (U.S.A.), or any other of the dozen or so world-scattered periodicals to which he contributes. Perhaps, after this mild chaff, the remark that Mr. Bennett is a poet of considerable accomplishment may sound as if it were meant to be nasty; but I honestly intend it as a tribute.

TWO ANTHOLOGIES

"Jewels of Song." An Anthology of Short Poems compiled by W. H. Davies. 6s. (Jonathan Cape.)
"A Victorian Potpourri of Verses, Known, Unknown and Forgotten." Collected and edited by Georgiana B. Abdy. 6s. (Bodley Head.)

There are so many anthologies nowadays that everybody who brings out a new one feels compelled to explain why. Miss Abdy frankly apologises, and Mr. W. H. Davies tenders as an excuse that his anthology is different from any other and none of the poems in it exceeds twenty-four lines. There are notable omissions, of course—was ever there an anthology without?—but Mr. Davies can always protect himself by saying that the poet whose work finds no place in his collection wrote no poem within the twenty-four line limit that particularly appealed to his fancy. His choice ranges from early anonymous poets to those of the present day. "The only poems I have included by living authors," he says, "are those that I am jealous of, and would be glad of the chance of stealing." Of the one hundred and twenty writers whose work is represented less than two dozen are living. Miss Abdy has gone entirely to the Victorian poets and notes how "they rather revelled in melancholy . . . and were also a little sentimental." The poems she has selected are typical of the period, and both her book and Mr. Davies's, while often using familiar material, offer something a little different from the ordinary anthology of verse.

A. A.

RICHARD CHURCH'S POETRY

"The Glance Backward." By Richard Church. 8s. 6d. (Dent.)

"The Glance Backward" is Richard Church's most important book so far. It is the book which many of us, who have watched his poetry with enthusiasm for the last four or five years, have been waiting for. It contains work which finally places him among the few really considerable English poets of to-day. The fine passion which informed his earlier lyrics, from the "Philip" volume to the "Theme with Variations," remains to inform these; but it is now a passion past mere flowering-time, and come at last to the harvest of fruit. In compiling his book it would seem that Mr. Church has had in mind the organic form of a piece of music—a concerto, perhaps—and so has divided his poems into three "movements": Allegro, Scherzo, and Penseroso. The first sets the key and states the theme; the second provides a momentary respite, a lyric repose; and the third, fuller, richer, bolder, completes the poet's point of view. Here, in this last section, you will find the climax of Mr. Church's genius, lyrics whose beauty and magic and inspired reasoning set them shining like stars in poetry's dark night of experimental rationalism. His passion is the flame of an intense imagination, illuminating with its fire every awareness of the senses. So fierce an imagination allows of no illusion, for it lights up all things, and reveals the spirit that informs them. In our feverish preoccupation with the material problems of the moment we may forget—

> "the single heart, the one
> And unimpeded purpose of the soul:
> The love that rises like the morning sun
> And sets upon a life made whole," but the poet does not forget, and, out of the torment of his remembering, he cannot help reminding us.

> ". . . Oh, music!
> Stream of paradisal milk, sustaining
> The night of time, the garden-birth of mankind,
> We hunger, we thirst, we are motherless, being rivals
> Of God; Prometheans, demons, something more than mortal,
> Surrendering the breast for prophecy,
> Burying our mother and our little selves
> Beneath our pride and childhood's fallen foliage
> We have set out upon the noon of triumph,
> But in our dust that banished music tortures,
> Mocks our male mouths that bleed with broken words."

Here is a poet, then, who so accepts life, that passion becomes an elusive and difficult gateway to the freedom of the spirit. Here is a poet who, like Donne before him, is concerned with the battle of the flesh and the spirit; but unlike the famous Dean he does not capitulate. He realises that, as long as life lasts, it is this very battle that gives life to the spirit: with every new rising of the sun he cries "A crown to win!" Leave peace for those whom D. H. Lawrence was wont to call "the grey men," those in whom imagination (Blake's synonym for it was the Holy Ghost) is dead. Your true poet, who has known what it is to stand—

> "A statue in moonlight, blotting some stars,
> Timeless, chipped with cosmic scars,
> And fabulous to human blood," does not want peace from such a remembering. It may be a torment, but it is a divine torment, a reminder of the spirit that informs us all. C. HENRY WARREN.

The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—Burton

WHAT IS A FIRST EDITION?

Third Article

I HAVE tried, in a general way, to indicate exactly what a first edition is, but in other and more specific cases, there are many other things, as I have indicated, that must be remembered. One hardly knows just what to pick out from among the thousand and one cases as the best instances. As I write there comes to my memory a novel in which a certain paragraph, at the end of a chapter, was eliminated in subsequent printing. It was a novel published many years since, and was Lucas Malet's remarkable story, "Sir Richard Calmady." I don't suppose anyone of the younger generation has read it, and yet it is an excellent piece of fiction. I dare say the first printing may be a valuable book one of these days, because of the paragraph at the end of one of the chapters being cancelled in later editions.

Reproduced from a Coloured Sporting Print.
From Christmas Catalogue of Coloured Plate Books and Sporting Prints (Export Book Co.).

A matter that sometimes perplexes a number of earnest collectors is that of the wrapper. You may well ask in what way a wrapper affects first edition collecting. Rightly or wrongly, it affects it very much. A book may come out in its first edition form with a particular wrapper, and then the later edition with an entirely different one. Sometimes only a very few copies of a work will appear in a wrapper utterly different from the one that comes to be known. There have been many cases of this during the past few years. A wrapper has been used which, for some reason or another, is quickly discarded. A very special case that I have in mind at the moment of writing is that of Mr. Galsworthy's "Silver Spoon." A few were sent out on their journey with a certain kind of wrapper, but the author not liking it the wrapper was changed. Copies of the first edition which are wrapped in this rather precious jacket are much more valuable than the later editions.

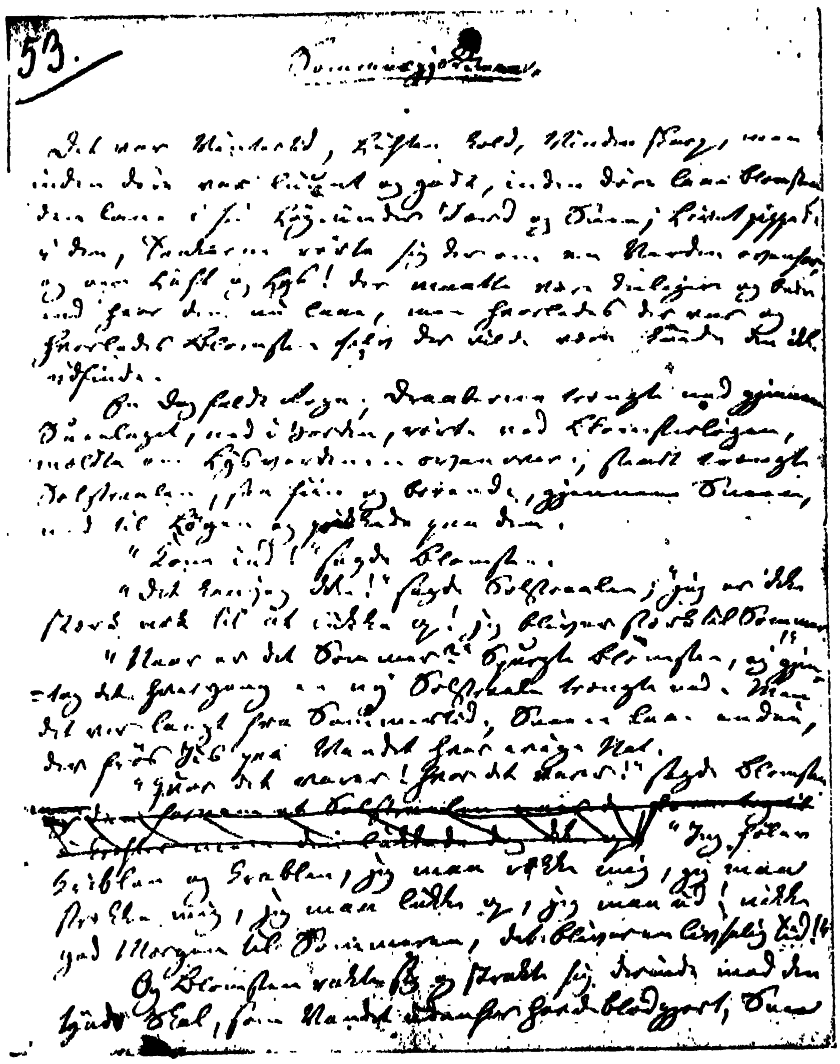
We must remember, also, that there are such things as advertisements at the end of books. The dates of these advertisements decide whether a volume is, or is not, a copy of the first issue. The actual book may well be a copy of the first issue, but unless the advertisements, which were often dated years since, are the original ones, the book is of less value; the advertisements may bear a later date than those that were bound up with the book when it was published. This is another aspect of the first edition for which I have absolutely no sympathy. But these later dates do make a difference in the cost of certain first editions, to the extent of many pounds. It is all rather foolish. What happened was this: a few hundred copies of a book were bound up, and enough advertisements—actually a short catalogue of the publisher—were printed to go with them, and dated. Then when these were all sold, a new order was given for a further supply, and a new lot of these short lists were printed, with a later date. And although the book itself was an actual part of the first printing, because the fresh lot of the short catalogue had a later date on it, this copy of the book is not regarded as a first edition. Personally, I think this is carrying first edition collecting too far. Sometimes these advertisements were left out altogether; as in the case of Mr. Wells's "Time Machine." The so-called first edition has advertisements included, but a later portion of the edition has not. But there is a difference of many pounds in the cost of the two. It is the same with "Richard Yea and Nay," by Maurice Hewlett. There are different dates on the advertisement pages, and if by any chance you think you have a first edition, it would be as well to make sure that the date actually covers the first number printed, before deciding that your copy is really the first edition.

SOME INTERESTING LISTS

During the next few weeks I shall be looking forward to many good catalogues of all shapes and sizes, and even colours and styles. They will be full of the titles of books which every book collector is hoping one day to possess, and perhaps, in some cases, they are volumes so scarce and precious that only the rich can afford to buy. It is a wonderful thing to be a rich man, with a taste for books, but I am doubtful if he gets a finer joy out of his treasures than you and I do, as we count the pennies for the purchase of some much desired volume.

Suckling & Co. have been doing business for many years now. I seem to remember them beginning business many years before the War. I have seen their catalogues regularly, and I was looking through their 104th last night. And a very readable one it is. This one is a Catalogue of Portraits, and is described as "Chiefly of British Personages of National, Local and Family Interest," and it includes many engravings in mezzotint, line and stipple of the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. This firm has always been noted for its collection of portraits, and I believe they have a great many more than are to be found in this catalogue. I hope I shall be receiving soon a copy of their catalogue of books.

Two catalogues on my table are from Messrs. Dobell. One is a list of rare books, chiefly in English literature, and the other, quite a late one, covers a great many excellent editions of modern books. The first list comprises a selection of books from the library of a Scottish gentleman, who had a fine taste in literature; while the second catalogue gives the titles of some splendid first editions that had belonged to the late Charles Whibley. Just as I am writing these notes, there comes, forwarded from my home address, a catalogue of rare books which had chiefly belonged to the Duke of Leeds. I notice among these William Congreve's autographed copy of Fanshawe's translation of Luis de Camoen's "The Lusiad," 1665, £25; and a set of Otway's Plays, which also bears Congreve's signature, £30. Other books in this list are first editions of Sir John Vanbrugh's "Æsop," 1697, and Goldsmith's Essays. I would certainly suggest asking for Catalogue 365 of modern books, containing works by Samuel Butler, A. E. Coppard, Lord Dunsany, Thomas Hardy, Aldous Huxley, Rudyard Kipling, D. H. Lawrence and others.



A well printed list, of a handy size, reaches me regularly from James F. Drake, a well-known New York firm. The latest one to come to hand is numbered 221, and is full of modern first editions. It has been instructive to go through this catalogue, and compare the prices with those that are obtaining in this country. Over there the prices of first editions are being well maintained, and I gave some instances last month. There are a great many collectors in U.S.A., and their numbers are increasing rapidly. I notice in the present list a number of W. W. Jacobs's books—an author to collect—varying in price from $6.50 to $15.00; many Masefields, including "The Tragedy of Pompey the Great," $35.00; several O'Flaherty books, all quite moderate; and a number of Shaw items.

The Francis Edwards Catalogue (No. 529) that I want to call attention to this month, is an exceedingly entertaining list of general books, covering no less than eighty-one subjects. It is aptly described as "A large selection of books on most branches of literature, including notable works from well-known libraries and other sources" recently purchased.

From William Brown comes a well made list of books, including a fine set of Ayton & Daniell's "Voyage Round Great Britain undertaken in the summer of 1813," 1814–1825, £210; Burton's "Arabian Nights," £42; Boswell's "An Account of Corsica," £21; a first edition of George Eliot's "Felix Holt," 3 volumes, 1866, £6 15s.; Holinshed's "Chronicles of England," 1577, £32; and Kipling's "Jungle Book" and the "Second Jungle Book," £45.

A special autumn list of coloured plate books, sporting prints and pictures has been issued by the Export Book Co. These have been purchased mostly from a Yorkshire mansion.

Hans Andersen Manuscript
(actual size 10¾ by 8⅞ inches).
From Messrs. G. Michelmore & Co.'s Catalogue of Rare Books, Autographs, Manuscripts, etc.

copies. Major Hartley knows how to make his catalogues attractive. I have marked a great many items in this list No. 26—so many, in fact, that I think it had better be sent for, rather than I should curtail my own references.

Basil Hyman has sent an advance copy of his new catalogue No. 6. We were just finishing these notes when it came along. There are some most excellent things in it. Many of them very desirable. Not everyone would want the Dryden item, No. 8, "Annus Mirabilis" for £5, but there are some who would. Then there are one or two of Andrew Marvell's books, and several pages of first and rare editions of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Mr. Herbert Tremayne's new catalogue is a clearance list covering a great number of desirable books at prices that strike me as very reasonable. I like the careful way Mr. Tremayne describes the condition of the books he has for sale.

Catalogue No. 20, issued by the Sign of the Huntsman, is a good and varied list, containing some 665 entries. It is well classified and well printed.

I am interested in the catalogue of W. M. Murphy & Sons. It is of a general character, and includes both old books and new. I see there are quite a number of Ainsworth items, of varying prices. It seems strange that so few people read him nowadays. Entry No. 204 in this catalogue is a rare association copy of "Veneres et Cupidines Venales Augustini Niphi," containing James Boswell's autograph, £50; and there are many good first editions of modern books. I notice one of Brett Young's "Portrait of Clare," 10s. 6d. An author, as they say on the Stock Exchange, "to lock up."

Major Hartley Clark's new list of rare books and first editions has just reached me. It includes a number of authors' MSS., autograph letters and presentation

Mr. J. D. Miller's new list of modern first editions and association copies is particularly good. And I have noticed a number of good Victorian items in it too. I don't think we are paying enough attention to these books. The "Forsyte Saga" is marked at eleven guineas, and some of A. P. Herbert's books at fair prices. People are collecting him. I notice two of Mr. E. V. Lucas's books: "Mr. Ingleside," 25s., and "London Lavender," 30s. These are rather costly, but I am perfectly sure all of Mr. Lucas's books will appreciate one of these days.

B. H. Blackwell, the notable Oxford house, has sent me three lists. The three are parts of a whole: No. 1, Classical, of second-hand and new books; Nos. 2 and 3, Educational. I found myself particularly attracted by the first part, because it not only contains some excellent old editions of the classics, but also many standard and more recent ones.

Two other lists have just arrived. One from Pickering & Chatto and one from Frank Drayton. The first named is really Part X of a collection of old and rare books. There are still one or two parts to follow, and then it will complete an extremely valuable collection of catalogues. The Pickering lists are always worth the closest attention, for they include many famous works, numbers of which are often unknown to the general book-buying public.

In the enthusiasm for the moderns we are apt to forget some of the old books, but here in this Pickering list there is a galaxy of them, and a few pounds expended thereon will bring a rich literary and economic reward as time passes. There are a great number of first editions included, such as Puckle's "The Club," £10 10s.; Rawlins's "The Rebellion," £12 12s.; many of Edward Ravenscroft's books, and a great number of works dealing with Old Romance.

Frank Drayton's catalogue comprises an interesting collection of books mostly from the libraries of General Pitt-Rivers and Thomas Bodley, a direct descendant of Sir Thomas Bodley, founder of the Bodleian Library. It is a mixed but interesting collection of old and more or less modern books, although there are not many recent ones among them. But the two collections, and the balance of miscellaneous books gathered together from various sources combine to make a good list.

I don't know if there are many readers of the notes who know of the very good and readable catalogues that are issued by Galloway & Porter, a house that I have myself known for a great number of years. The present list that I am writing about is No. 132. It is a catalogue containing some 2,500 items—books in all branches of literature, covering almost every division of it. One could take up no end of space in writing about this capital catalogue, but it is just impossible. I have often spoken about the joy of reading catalogues, and the Galloway & Porter one is just one of this kind. The general part of this Cambridge bookseller's classified list contains a great many notable and famous works, and there are many that lure me as they will the reader. The English Literature and First and Limited Editions sections contain many good things.

The Little Bookshop—what an attractive name this is—has just sent out a nice catalogue; indeed, one that is very attractive. I like always their lists, and in this new one there are no end of first editions, in most excellent condition, of C. E. Montague—that writer of almost great prose—R. H. Mottram, H. M. Tomlinson who has a tremendous admiration for Montague's work—T. F. Powys, H. G. Wells, and Hugh Walpole.

There has been an avalanche of antiquarian catalogues, and during the last few days of October there has arrived an extraordinary number, many of which are too important to dismiss with a few lines. "The Collector" hopes to give full consideration to these in the next issue.

THE MARKET

Some of the first editions of books by G. B. Shaw have dropped in price during the past few months. But the drop is surely only temporary. There is no need for us to say that they are worth collecting, without any consideration for their economic value. Even so, they are also worth collecting because their prices will enhance again before long. Mr. Shaw's earlier books are of great value, but there are others that are not beyond the means of most of us. "John Bull's Other Island" may be bought for a pound or two nowadays, whereas not so long since it was fetching four and five, and even six pounds. A copy was mentioned in an American catalogue the other day at $35.00.

Yes: Mr. Kirby was right in his excellent article about H. E. Bates. He is a man whom, you will remember, we advised the reader to collect. Indeed we share our contributor's enthusiasm for Mr. Bates, and Mr. Kirby mixed his enthusiasm with the right measure of good judgment and helpful information. He mentioned things about H. E. Bates which we did not know, and the list of titles is useful. It is to be hoped that our readers made a note of them. Mr. Bates's books are going up, and some of his earlier ones are really scarce. He is an instance of what we are always saying about discovering an author for ourself, before the world finds him out. That is the way of true collecting. He is a young man with a great future. We choose the word deliberately. Mr. Bates's first novel, "The Two Sisters," was written when the manager of the office in which Mr. Bates was working at the time, was not looking! This is a book not easily come by, but it is worth a pound or so. According to our records, some of his other books, such as "Catherine Foster," "Day's End," "The Last Bread," "Seven Tails" and "The Spring Song," range in price from 15s. to 42s.

Let us remind readers that this month is to be published the first volume of "The Anatomy of Bibliomania," by Holbrook Jackson. As before stated, it is to be in two volumes. Anyone who has read Mr. Jackson's "The Eighteen Nineties" will know how excellent a work "The Anatomy of Bibliomania" will be.

Here are some limited editions to be noted:

- "The Epic of Jutland." By Shane Leslie.
- "Books and Business." By A. Edward Newton.
- "The Aloe." By Katherine Mansfield.
- "Robinson Crusoe." By Daniel Defoe. Introduction by Ford Madox Ford.
- "Street Haunting," By Virginia Woolf.
- "The Masque of Queenes." By Ben Jonson.
- "Poems and Verses." By John Keats. Edited by J. Middleton Murry.
- "A Collection of Articles." By George Bernard Shaw.
- "English Mediaeval Painting." By E. O. Saunders.
- "Bibliography of Italian Writing Books of the Sixteenth Century."
- "Intimate Journals." By Charles Baudelaire. Introduction by T. S. Eliot.
- "Three Black Pennys." By Joseph Hergesheimer.

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE

A Note

The Bibliography of Richard Le Gallienne is exceedingly complicated. I do not know of anyone who could pretend to compile it with complete accuracy; but the following notes—which are substantiated by copies in my collection —may be of assistance to collectors of an author whose first editions are rapidly appreciating in value.

MY LADIES' SONNETS. Privately printed, 1887.

An ordinary edition, and an edition limited to 50 copies and signed. The colophon in the limited edition is in Le Gallienne's own handwriting. The ordinary edition usually contains an errata slip; but in a presentation copy in my collection the slip is absent and the corrections are made in Le Gallienne's own hand. This is, I presume, one of the earliest copies. There is no slip in the limited edition, and the errata are uncorrected.

VOLUMES IN FOLIO. Elkin Mathews, 1880.

An edition limited to 50 signed copies; and, I presume, an ordinary edition.

THE STUDENT AND THE BODY-SNATCHER. Elkin Mathews, 1890.

Written in collaboration with R. K. Leather. There was an edition limited to 50 copies (unsigned), and I suppose there was an ordinary edition. But I have never seen or heard of a copy. This is the only book ever printed in Wallasey.

THE BOOK-BILLS OF NARCISSUS.

First published by Frank Murray of Derby in two editions—one of 100 copies, the other of 250 copies both unsigned—in 1891.

Reprinted from an entirely different type by the same publisher in 1892 in an ordinary edition, and an edition of 25 signed copies.

Reprinted from a third type in 1895 by John Lane, with a portrait and an additional chapter. Whether there was a signed or large paper edition of this issue I do not know. This is the book commonly described as the First Edition, although the fact that it is not is expressly stated on the verso to the dedication.

ENGLISH POEMS. Elkin Mathews, 1892.

In three editions. One of 800 unsigned copies; an extremely limited edition, signed; and an edition only of a few copies printed on vellum, and containing three poems not printed in the other editions. From a recent item in a bookseller's catalogue I gather that the leaves containing these three poems may be obtained separately from the book. The vellum copies were unsigned, and were I believe for presentation amongst the author's friends. The only copy I have seen, however, bore no presentation inscription.

LIMITED EDITIONS AND CONFESSIO AMANTIS. Privately printed, 1893.

There are at least two editions of this little pamphlet which was printed, I believe, as a Christmas card. The one is printed on hand-made paper in blue paper covers; the other on what I suppose is vellum in brown paper covers.

Most of Le Gallienne's other books are fairly well known in their several editions. A very rare but exceedingly interesting Le Gallienne item is the card printed at his first wedding. It appears in two states; the second, and the state in which it was ultimately issued, contains a correction in the quatrain. I have actually seen the card in both states, but all except one or two of the cards in the first state were destroyed. The correction is from "puny priest" to "holy priest."

J. WHITLEY NANCE.

A NEGLECTED ARTIST:

Baudelaire on Constantin Guys

" The Painter of Victorian Life." A Study of Constantin Guys, with an Introduction and a Translation of Baudelaire's " Peintre de la Vie Moderne," by P. G. Konody. Edited by C. Geoffrey Holme. £2 2s. (Studio.)

" Le public est, relativement au génie, une horloge qui retarde," wrote Charles Baudelaire in an essay on Delacroix. The saying might suitably be prefixed to the same critic's study of Constantin Guys, who received in his lifetime very little of the appreciation given him after his death. In the case of Guys, however, some of this neglect must be laid at the door of the artist himself, for never, surely, was any man of talent so self-effacing as he. He regarded it as a personal injury when Thackeray, one of his earliest admirers, mentioned him by name in a laudatory article, and it was at his especial wish that Baudelaire, in " Le Peintre de la Vie Moderne," referred to him throughout simply as " M. G." Only this remarkable shyness on the part of Guys can have prevented so fine an art critic as the author of " Les Fleurs du Mal " from making him personally famous.

The present Studio publication is described as a companion volume to the same firm's " London Promenade." The chief function of " The Painter of Victorian Life " would thus seem to be that of illustrating an earlier period. As a presentation of Victorian England and Second Empire France the 140 reproductions of Guys's work are fascinating. The ladies are authentic fashion-plates come to life; the gentlemen are dandies, beaux, élégants, or whatever you like to call them, to the very type. We are taken straight back to Thackeray and Whistler, to the days of great exhibitions, balloon ascents and the can-can.

As to the art of Constantin Guys, that too should appeal to modern tastes, for he received no training, owed allegiance to no school, and carried on no obvious artistic tradition. He was the best possible example of that eagerly-sought type, the spontaneous artist. Herein lies much of his greatness. He drew and painted for the same reasons, and by the same processes, as a child draws and paints. His delight was in movement—the disposition of the limbs rather than the character or emotion of the faces. Hence those agile dancers, stately ladies, and graceful horses and carriages. He must have had an extraordinarily perceptive eye, and there is never a line wrong in those beautifully-balanced chaises—it matters not that the wheels are not mathematical circles; they are definitely things that revolve and raise dust and support Quality. The horses are toy horses, with legs elegant almost to the point of disappearance, but they can rear beneath a cuirassier with all the vigour of the tubby pony that bears Velazquez's Don Baltasar Carlos.

As artist to the Illustrated London News, Guys was sent to the Crimea, and some of the plates reproduced from the journal show the appalling transformation which—necessarily, no doubt—the artist's vivid sketches underwent at the rapid hands of the engraver. These sketches, for the most part done on thin paper to assist the process-men, have unfortunately nearly all disappeared, but sufficient of Guys's work remains to indicate how well fitted he was to record military events. It is chiefly the colourful atmosphere of the parade-ground that attracts him, and the pageantry of reviews.

The "Review at Madrid" is typical of Guys's " toy parades." The cockaded ranks move with fascinating precision obliquely across, but entirely within, the composition. The dark, slightly-sketched frame of the crowd hems them closely about. The white obelisk immediately catches the eye, and leading it to the toy general beneath, indicates the presumable raison d'être of the parade. One imagines the soldiers turning smartly about (for there is no way out of the picture—a cardinal virtue) and performing their evolution again and again; and one wonders what the engraver, hurrying to press, would have made of this little masterpiece.

FRANCIS WATSON.

SWIFT'S LETTERS

An Eighteenth Century Classic

There is a story about Swift which few people have heard. One evening Pope and Gay called on him. They were both intimate friends of the Dean, and well acquainted with his paradoxical humours. Swift was a little sceptical when they said that they had left their lordly friends to visit " a poor scurvy Dean."

" But," said he, " since you are come in I must get some supper for you, I suppose ? "

" No, Doctor, we have supped already." they said.

" Supped already ; that is impossible. Why, it is only eight o'clock."

" Indeed we have," they assured him.

" That's very strange, but if you had not supped, I must have got something for you ; let me see ; a couple of lobsters would have done very well, two shillings ; tarts, a shilling ; a bottle of wine, two shillings ; two and two are four and one is five ; just two and sixpence apiece. There Pope, there's half-a-crown for you, and there's half-a-crown for you, sir ; for I won't save anything by you, I'm determined."

This was all said with such seriousness that, in spite of the visitors' protests, they were actually obliged to take the money.

The story is highly characteristic, for Swift was wayward and tempestuous in his moods. Everyone knows how he broke " Vanessa's " heart by a mere look and a gesture. Whimsicality and strident humour, white-hot rage and offensive vituperation were all part of him. But these qualities live mainly in his books and pamphlets.

There was another side of Swift, and for that we must go to the letters. It is perhaps a truer, certainly a more intimate side. Like Byron, Swift showed in his correspondence currents of feeling, desires and hopes, and unreserved affections, almost entirely alien from his public writing. Certainly his writings are charged with human feeling, but its utterance is shrill and indignant. He was the champion of the oppressed, and driven to use the brutal methods of the tyrants. In the letters, on the other hand, his kindliness is unfettered, and flows in lambent streams to the bosoms of his intimate friends. At the same time, his correspondence is full of sidelights on contemporary history under Queen Anne, and makes a choice possession for anyone who would " catch the manners living as they rise."

Luckily enough, Swift's writings are not the preserve of wealthy collectors. Apart from " Gulliver's Travels," most of the early editions are seldom overpriced. I lately saw a copy of the " Tale of a Tub," dated 1704 (the year of publication) going for eight shillings ; and you can always get Hawkesworth's first edition of Swift's letters (in quarto, 1766) for about thirty shillings—an investment well worth while.

It is with these two volumes that we are concerned, though there are other collections of his correspondence. An unauthorised edition was published by a piratical printer in Dublin in 1735, and caused Swift much annoyance. Another batch was gathered by Dean Swift and published in the collected edition of Swift's works. But Hawkesworth's edition is the interesting one, and contains the important letters to Esther Johnson (" Stella ") and to Esther Vanhomrigh (" Vanessa "), besides some delightful letters from Lord Bolingbroke and others of Swift's friends.

Horace Walpole, who seems to have had a word on everything that came to pass in the century, assured George Montagu that Hawkesworth's collection could not fail to amuse him : " His journal sent to Stella during the four last years of the queen is a fund of entertainment. You will see his insolence in full colours, and, at the same time, how daily vain he was of being noticed by the ministers he affected to treat arrogantly. . . . But what strikes one, is bringing before one's eyes the incidents of a curious period."

This "period" begins in 1703 and ends about the time that Swift became a hopeless and raging lunatic. A gallery of many characters moves upon the scene during that time, almost all of whom were leaders of politics, society and letters in their day—Harley and St. John, Pope, Arbuthnot and Gay, Prior and Addison. I believe Sir Edmund Gosse claimed Swift to be the dominant intellectual figure of the age before Johnson. Certainly these folk show extraordinary deference and attachment to him, to his unnamed but accepted influence upon their minds and motives.

We see him first as the spokesman in London for the Irish bishops who were agitating at this time for the "first fruits." This brought him to the court, to London society, and to the leaders of party faction, who soon discovered his abilities as a pamphleteer, and angled for the favours of his pen and person. When the rivalry of Harley and St. John was most intense Swift became the skilful confidant of both, and in him all partisans had a common confessor. But though politics and the machinations of the court play an important part in the letters, they are really matters for the historian rather than the student of human life. To-day the intriguing for place and favour, the wire-pulling to secure the good graces of great men is simply ennui. But there is a lively interest still in Swift's terror of the Mohocks, his playful petulance about his losses at ombre, his fulminations against the rigours of Lent, his comments on Steele's arrest ("He has been mighty impertinent of late in his Spectators"), or his contempt of the court which serves him merely for a coffee-house, and "abounds in dinners" in August. There are glimpses of him at a hundred tables and "sittings." He sees Prince Eugène who is "plaguey yellow"; he meets Trapp and dubs him a coxcomb. He meets Parnell and Pomfret and likes them; Lady Godolphin displeases him—"I'll pull her down"! He sits for an hour with the Duchess of Shrewsbury at her toilet. He belonged to the select company of literary benefactors known as "The Brotherhood," and became the familiar of Lord Ormond, and Lord Lansdowne, Sir William Windham, Lord Oxford, the Earl of Arran, and others of "The Sixteen."

He had a taste for the current humour. To Mrs. Dingley he recounts a new-fashioned way to outwit Stella which they called a bite. "You must ask a bantering question, or tell some d mned lye in a serious manner, and then she will answer or speak as if you were in earnest; then you say—Madam, there's a bite! I would not undervalue this, for it is the constant amusement in court." He has another sally about the craze for if-puns. "The Bishop of Clogher has made an if-pun that he is mighty proud of, and designs to send over to his brother Tom; but Sir Andrew Fountain has wrote to Tom and told him the pun, and desired him to send it over to the bishop as his own; and, if it succeeds, it will be a pure bite. I'll tell you the pun. If there was a hackney coach at Mr. Pooley's door, what town in Egypt would it be? Why it would be Hecatompolis; Hack at Tom Pooley's!"

Somehow the legendary Swift has become an austere and tirading figure. The bitter sarcasm and disillusions of "La Puta" and "Gulliver's Voyage to the Houyhnhnms' are probably responsible for this. But we must remember that these voyages were written late in life, and were the outpourings of a man of broken health and soured and shattered hopes. The letters of his latter years show him developing into a morbid and ego-centric melancholic, short-tempered and self-pitying. His brain-storms and deafness weigh upon his peace of mind. "The cruel disorder of deafness and giddiness" drives him into perilous solitude. His nature becomes embittered; he writes to a friend, "I will never value myself as a philanthropist, because it is a creature that I now hate more than a toad, a viper, a wasp, a stork, a fox or any other that you will please to add."

But this terrible mood was the pathetic outcome of many misfortunes—the loss of friends, of thwarted ambition, the hard complacency of rulers, the slothful indifference of the downtrodden. It is not the true Swift. There is a letter of Lord Bolingbroke's which, I think, shows exactly how those who knew him best regarded him :

> "Dear friend" (he writes) "the last sentence of your letter quite kills me. Never repeat that melancholy tender word, that you will endeavour to forget me. I am sure that I can never forget you, till I meet with (what is impossible) another who's conversation I can delight so much in as Dr. Swift's; and yet that is the smallest thing I ought to value you for. That hearty sincere friendship, that plain and open ingenuity in all your commerce, is what I am sure I can never find in another man. I shall want often a faithful monitor, one that would vindicate me behind my back, and tell me my faults to my face. God knows I write this with tears in my eyes."

And these sentiments could be repeated from the letters of every other friend who knew Swift in his young and ardent manhood.

Nothing is more striking than his urgent efforts to better the lives of his friends either by money or influence, when, as he says, "his heart ran before his pen." Although not given to boasting his charity, he confessed to Lady Betty Germain, "When I had credit for some years at court, I provided for above fifty people in both Kingdoms, of which, not one was a relation." He found his way unerringly to the hearts of his real friends, and became in turn the recipient of all their woes and joys. The very depths of his soul were stirred when "Stella" Johnson lay dying in Ireland. He dared not, for weakness, come to her bedside.

"We have been perfect friends these thirty-five years . . . and the remainder of my life will be a very melancholy scene, when one of them is gone, whom I most esteemed, upon the score of every good quality, that can possibly recommend a human creature. . . . I would not for the universe be present at such a trial of seeing her depart. She will be among friends that will tend her with every possible care, where I should be a trouble to her, and the greatest torment to myself. . . . Let her know I have bought her a repeating gold watch, for her ease in winter nights. I designed to have surprised her with it, but now I would have her know it, that she may see my thoughts are always to make her easy. I am of opinion that there is not a greater folly than to contract too great and intimate a friendship which must always leave the survivor miserable.'

I have said nothing about the passionate letters of pursuant Vanessa, or of Swift's bantering replies. Nor is there space in this short discussion to say much about the famous Journal to Stella, which throws such bright illumination over the finest chapter of Swift's history. And still more remains to be unearthed—the jovialities of Gay and the Duchess of Queensberry, the lively and glancing epistles of Lady Betty, the tender and thoughtful letters of Lord St. John, Swift's interests in his Irish home, his comments on his own writings and the works of Pope and Gay, his vivid little pictures of court intrigue, his visits to booksellers, auctions and, mirabile dictu, the cinema!

Vive la bagatelle! was the famous motto of his life. It is best exemplified in the infinite variety which throngs into his letters. And it is the spirit which prompted his most famous poem—his verses upon his own death :

> "Receive the news with doleful dumps—
> The Dean is dead (Pray what is trumps?).
> Then Lord have mercy on his soul!
> (Ladies, I'll venture for the vole).
> Six deans they say shall bear the pall;
> (I wish I knew what King to call)."

PHILIP PARKER.

BAUDELAIRE'S INTIMATE JOURNALS

The Blackamore Press have issued a book which should appeal to collectors for a variety of reasons. In the first place it is the first English translation of the "Intimate Journals" of Charles Baudelaire, and is of great importance to all readers of that strange French genius. The English rendering is well done by Charles Isherwood. In the second place it is illustrated by reproductions of Baudelaire's own drawings. Thirdly—and chiefly—it has a long introduction by T. S. Eliot, which forms one of that writer's most masterly pieces of criticism. At a time when T. S. Eliot's literary future is the subject of much speculation, any contribution from his pen is eagerly seized upon by admirers anxious to discover whither "Ash Wednesday" points.

The "Intimate Journals" edition is limited to six hundred and fifty copies. Fifty of these, specially bound, are signed by T. S. Eliot; and three hundred and fifty more, unsigned, are for sale in England at 21s. each.

H.

MODERN TEMPERA-PAINTING

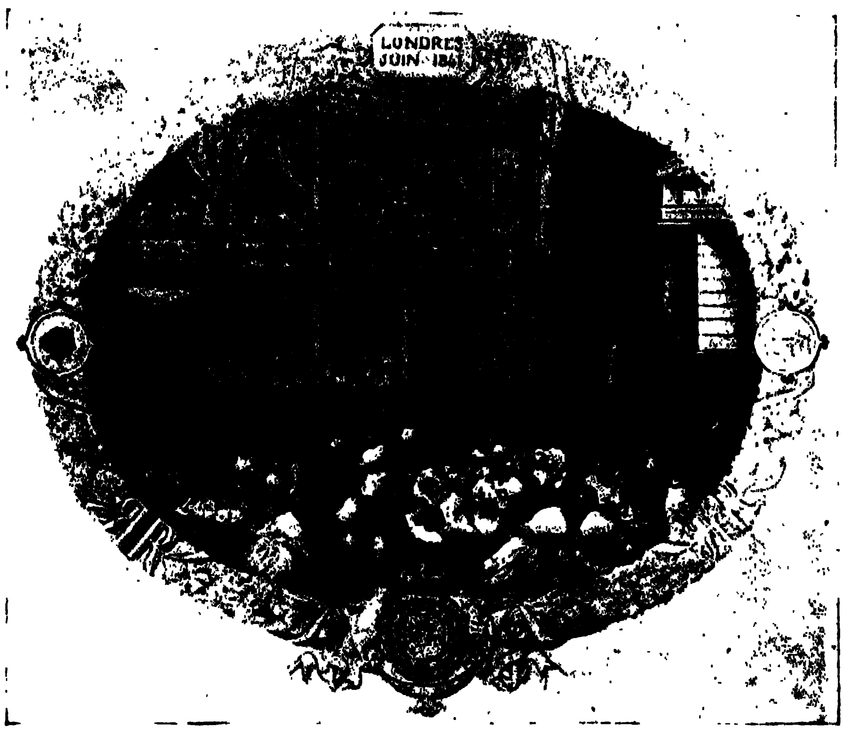
"A Manual of Tempera-Painting." By Maxwell Armfield. 6s. (Allen & Unwin.)

The revival of tempera dates only from the beginning of this century, but while the many modern movements have been spending their force in various directions experiments in this valuable medium have been steadily pursued, and now Mr. Maxwell Armfield has collected the results of those experiments and presented them in a compact form. Mr. Armfield rightly insists that tempera is not merely a means of laying on colour, but a language with a character of its own and demanding a special outlook and mode of thought in the artist.

The characteristics of tempera, since it is quick in drying and unchangeable when dry, are, in the execution, swiftness and precision, and, in the effect, a delicate exactness which no otiose eccentricity can compass. The artist, therefore, must know precisely what he wishes to do, and he must do it with methodical accuracy. A lucid and definite outline is essential.

Y. C.

Of the Theatre



"LAUDATOR TEMPORIS ACTI"

Gordon Craig on Henry Irving

By
Christopher St. John

"Henry Irving." By Edward Gordon Craig. 15s. (Dent.)

IT was a wise Jesuit who instead or reproving his pupil for saying he couldn't "stand that prig St. Aloysius" told him to remember that "saints are at the mercy of their biographers." This is more or less true of all the eminent dead. Least true perhaps of the creative artist, poet, painter, or musician, who leaves behind him in his work an expression of himself which affords the reader of his life a valuable means of checking its writer's opinions of his character and genius. Although an actor at his greatest is reckoned by some, by Gordon Craig, for example, a creative artist, we are unable to refer to his works for confirmation or contradiction of his biographer's opinions. All we can do, if the actor lived too long ago for us to have seen these works for ourselves, is to refer to descriptions of them, and as these are usually more enthusiastic than illuminating, a kind of patchwork of faded raptures, we get no more than a vague inkling of what his performances were like.

Her Majesty's Theatre. Farewell of Mlle. Rachel at the close of 1841 Season in June.
From the water-colour by Lami.
By courtesy of the Victoria and Albert Museum.
From "Henry Irving," by Edward Gordon Craig (Dent).

It is the great virtue of Gordon Craig's study of Henry Irving that he has succeeded in reconstructing one of the actor's masterpieces in such detail that it speaks for itself, and provides us with the evidence we need for judging whether the assertion that Irving was the "greatest actor of his time, not in England only, but in Europe and America," is well founded. It is twenty-five years this month since Irving died, so to the young, and even to the middle-aged, for one must be well over forty to have seen him at all, he is but a name, a name surrounded by an aureole which his detractors have never succeeded in filching from it. This new generation of playgoers may have heard that this man called Irving, buried in Westminster Abbey, thrilled audiences long ago in "The Bells," and may have thought, as they have been taught to think by dramatic critics, that this was only because audiences then were composed of rather simple, stupid people with an old-fashioned Victorian taste for crude and theatrical melodramas.

That this is very likely I have evidence in an article in the Daily Telegraph, in which it is stated that "it is just as well that the famous players of an earlier generation cannot return, for we might be shocked and disillusioned." Well Irving returns in "The Bells," in Gordon Craig's pages, and we find that his art is as great as we who are old remember and we who are young have been told it was.

Irving had been acting for fifteen years when he created his masterpiece, busy (429 different parts once in 782 days) perfecting his mask, "a mask which could be a hundred faces in one," years of preparation, years of positive hatred (manifested in a peculiarly brutal way in Dublin) from the public.

> "There can be but one masterpiece, although we often hear of the thing in the plural. I had this from a connoisseur of pictures who explained to me that a masterpiece was that piece of work done by a painter when his tutor had no more to teach him, and which entitled him to be called a master. This piece, 'The Bells,' was Irving's masterpiece, and proclaimed him a master."

The text of the third act of Leopold Lewis's melodrama (an adaptation from the French) is given, demonstrating that an actor's masterpiece can be created out of the simplest materials. One hesitates knowing the wealth of their potentialities to call them "poor." The word does not fit them any better than the materials, three notes, out of which Beethoven fashioned that wondrous musical building, the second movement of the "Choral" Symphony. Gordon Craig's proposition that "actors of genius really prefer a play that is not a great play" means no more than that they prefer unshaped, unworked materials.

"You must allow," he writes, "the actor of genius to select a rôle and a play which he can count on as offering sufficient resistance. The toughest, the least literary play does this—a play of mere bones, strung together, without subtleties or complexes."

Such a play was "The Bells." It left Irving more to do, to imagine, to invent than "Hamlet" or "King Lear," and to convince readers who never saw Irving of his creative powers Gordon Craig could not have made a better choice of a part in which to present him than Mathias.

Although he does not reconstruct Irving's performances in Shakespeare's rôles, he indicates very clearly what they were like, when he is analysing the actor's technique, vindicating his pronunciation of English as Chaucerian, his movements as a carefully designed dance, his method of speaking verse as one rhythmically cognate to Shakespeare's method of writing it. This vindication is not superfluous, for the stupid calumny that Irving spoke English badly, and walked awkwardly is generally believed because it has the sanction of the word of clever men like William Archer, Gilbert Murray and Bernard Shaw. I could quote many passages which show how curiously insensitive these men were to the beauty of Irving's style, but prefer to quote one in which that beauty is transfixed:

> "Every sound, each movement was intentional, clear-cut measured dance; nothing real—all massively artificial—yet all flashing with the light and the pulse of nature. A fine style. . . . His movements being measured, rhythmic, planned, it may be too obvious to state that the action of his face was part of all this, and was measured too; yet it may not have occurred to one or two of my readers that this control of feature till immobility was achieved constituted a mask. . . . A mask never fidgets; it endures, and at the slighest touch it becomes expressive. It lights up and speaks. Irving was all for these slight, significant touches. Anything sprawling was simply not Irving."

If you can't tell what kind of actor Irving was from this, it is your fault, not Gordon Craig's. And what kind of producer? What kind of manager? What kind of man? Read the book, and you will be in no doubt that these kinds have the common denominator "great." Great you will surely think was his attitude towards other actors:

> "He would look on other actors somewhat in the same way that St. Francis looked on the Franciscans. There before them lay their path—clearly indicated—and damme, hardly one of them following it. 'I found an Order' says St. Francis. 'I provide a roof to cover our heads; I go away to attend to the sick, and on returning I find everybody in feather beds and making themselves comfortable. What do you want to be comfortable for if you are a Franciscan?' And so it was with Irving. 'What do you want with approval or disapproval if you are an actor?' For it meant the whole of this world and the next with Irving to be an Actor, and in his innocence, his proud innocence, he supposed it meant as much to every other performer."

The elements are mixed up in us, so it is unreasonable to be surprised that the man who could write this noble book about Irving could disfigure it with some extremely ignoble references to Bernard Shaw. It is not what is said which creates an unpleasant impression—there is much that is true in the criticism of Mr. Shaw's plays, although the statement that "a good play by Mr. Shaw embraces all that is matter-of-fact" is rather absurd—but the way it is said, a spiteful "cattish" way, which lays Gordon Craig open to the suspicion that he is jealous of Mr. Shaw's position in the theatre. When I have added that his allusions to Henry Irving's "leading lady," his great mother Ellen Terry, are disappointingly scarce, and a trifle Miltonic in character ("He for God only, she for God in him") I have said all that I can say against the best book about an actor I have ever read.

DOMESTIC INTERIORS: Three Current Plays

There is a great deal to be said for the Victorians. You can see them at their worst, of course, at "The Barretts of Wimpole Street," in the grim person of Mr. Moulton-Barrett (magnificently acted by Cedric Hardwicke). Of this play Mr. Horace Shipp wrote at length in the October Bookman, and I do not intend to cover the ground again, except to mention that the more debatable episodes in the play as it was presented at Malvern have been removed for its London appearance. (In some quarters incidentally there still persists the opinion that the open adoption of the unpleasant view of Barrett's character is something rather modern—an evidence of the iconoclastic tendencies of this generation. "Elizabeth Barrett discovered at last that her father was in truth not a man to be treated with; hardly perhaps even a man to be blamed. She knew to all intents and purposes that she had grown up in the house of a madman." That is quite as severe as anything in the play. It was written in 1903 by G. K. Chesterton in his popular study of Browning.) But granted that Barrett was parental discipline run mad (if nothing worse), there is still a great deal to be said for the Victorians.

The Barrett household, terrible as it is made to appear in Mr. Besier's play, is not a whit more terrible than the modern households presented to us in Mr. Coward's play, "Private Lives" (published by Heinemann at 5s.), or in Mr. Somerset Maugham's "The Breadwinner" (2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d.; Heinemann). One only wishes that the characters in both had had to call Mr. Barrett "Papa." It would have improved them.

Mr. Coward's people are those we have become accustomed to in his plays. They drink and divorce and remarry; swear and fight; smash gramophone records on each other's heads; roll about on the floor kicking and screaming; and contribute generally to a happy and successful evening. "Private Lives" is not another "Hay Fever"; nor is it Mr. Coward at his worst. It is just one of his average achievements.

Mr. Maugham, satirist, in "The Breadwinner" holds up to our disapproval the modern generation. There have been few crueller pictures of the youth of to-day (asking "When was the War?") than in the opening scene of this play. The hero is a ruined stockbroker who, rather than save himself—as he can do by means of an offered loan—and rebuild his position, prefers to leave his wife and two children and go abroad to make a living as best he can. And the point about it is that we do not feel disposed to blame or despise him, but rather genuinely to hope that he gets safely away.

Here is a reversal, indeed. We watch the Breadwinner escaping from his children with the same sympathy as we watched Elizabeth Barrett escaping from her father. But we much prefer the Victorian tyrant, even in his madness, to the Georgian ones, with their belauded "sanity."

H. R.

DRAMATISTS' NOVELS
Maugham and Van Druten

"Cakes and Ale." By W. Somerset Maugham. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)
"A Woman On Her Way." By John Van Druten. 7s. 6d. (Putnams.)

From the novels of expert playwrights one expects, and one usually gets, a nicer sense of form and proportion than can be found in ninety per cent. of modern fiction. The neat handling of a story, the sharp definition of a character and the knowledge of the right moment for revealing a new essential fact are qualities which every successful dramatist must have; and they are qualities which stand clearly out in Mr. Somerset Maugham's new novel, "Cakes and Ale." His "sense of the theatre" is never far distant, as he reveals, through the mouth of one Ashenden, a middle-aged author, the tale of the first marriage of Edward Driffield, a distinguished novelist who had died before the opening of the story.

The action moves on two planes—one in the present day, showing Ashenden pestered by a literary friend for some first-hand reminiscences of Driffield, and the other in the past, as Ashenden recalls, for his own amusement, his memories of Driffield and his first wife. In his modern chapters Mr. Maugham has a good deal of airy badinage about literary fame and the way to achieve it, and in Alroy Kear he presents an amusing caricature of the kind of second-rate novelist whose pertinacity brings success; but the real charm of the book remains in the past, in its views of Victorian village life and of London in the nineties, and especially in its picture of Rosie Driffield, the charming, uneducated and unfaithful wife of the great Victorian novelist. Mr. Maugham has painted her well—so well that she quite overshadows her distinguished husband, as he advances from poverty and obscurity to an assured position in the world of letters. She is shown as a woman whose unfaithfulness was the logical outcome of a naturally affectionate disposition; she is a loyal friend and a good companion; and the reader who learns to see her through the narrator's eyes will find that a thrill of amused pleasure is awaiting him when he reaches the last chapter.

Mr. Maugham has been so much praised for his cynical and unsympathetic portraits that it is almost surprising to find him creating a sympathetic heroine; but his dexterous way of doing it gives colour to the theory that if you scratch a cynic you will find a sentimentalist.

Mr. John Van Druten is also a playwright, but he is not yet on the same level of accomplishment, either in drama or fiction, as Mr. Somerset Maugham; and the particular qualities which ought to be found in a dramatist's novel are sadly lacking in Mr. Van Druten's "A Woman On Her Way." His book will satisfy those who are not yet bored by accounts of liaisons and cocktail parties and by supposedly "smart" conversation; but sophisticated readers will feel that Mr. Van Druten has spoilt a goodish story by overloading it with details.

The character of Elinor Johnson, a rather fatuous woman-novelist, is quite fairly presented, and the account of her two disappointing love affairs and her final acceptance of RichardGilchrist is good material for a second-rate novel; but it is ruined by the introduction of pages and pages of tedious conversation. When he has learnt to prune his work, Mr. Van Druten may quite easily write good novels, for he has a fair descriptive talent and a certain power in the creation of characters.

Every reader of "A Woman On Her Way" will be delighted by Elinor's youthful secretary, Angela Lane, who makes gentle efforts to impose the nobility of her ideals on Elinor's novels.

It would not be a bad idea if Mr. Van Druten himself had a secretary like Angie. She would probably cross out some of the tiresome expletives which his characters are constantly using, and she might even advise him to put amorous relationships aside when finding a subject for his next novel.

E. H.

MISS GLASPELL'S NEW PLAY
An Omnibus Volume

"Six Plays." 7s. 6d. (Gollancz.)

A banned play, a big success and a notable "flop" are included here—though really "Badger's Green" deserved better luck. The big success, "Street Scene," is speaking for itself at the Globe Theatre, whither I commend my readers; they will find there a difficult production superbly done, with two outstanding qualities: the suspense maintained throughout it by sheer character interest, and the fierce zest for life (or for such happiness as they can extract from life) that these characters display.

"Down Our Street" should be the London counterpart of all this, but somehow falls short of it; its types are faithfully observed and their talk first-rate; only their author lacks the emotional intensity of Mr. Elmer Rice. "Socrates" provides a marked contrast to these two—a thing of cumulative nobility, based on the original texts, and rising steadily to a scene of great beauty and dignity at the philosopher's death. "Green Pastures" is a modern mystery play—the personality of God, seen through negro eyes. Its theme precludes performance here; but no one interested in the modern theatre can afford to miss reading it.

But the pick of the book is the new Glaspell play, "Alison's House." It has two themes: one (hardly more than touched upon) the bitterest lesson that man has to learn—to see his hard-won nobility stultified by forces outside himself; the other, a most intense awareness of old beauty faded. Another American play—Stark Young's "Colonnade"—had some of this second quality; and it is curious that a so much younger land should thus recapture the fine flower of life-in-the-past. The beauty of Miss Glaspell's treatment matches her theme. She has an exquisite tenderness—in her folk, in her dialogue, even in the atmosphere of the old house, which by some magic in her writing grows from the printed page, as surely as though the scene were being staged before us. A rare and lovely play.

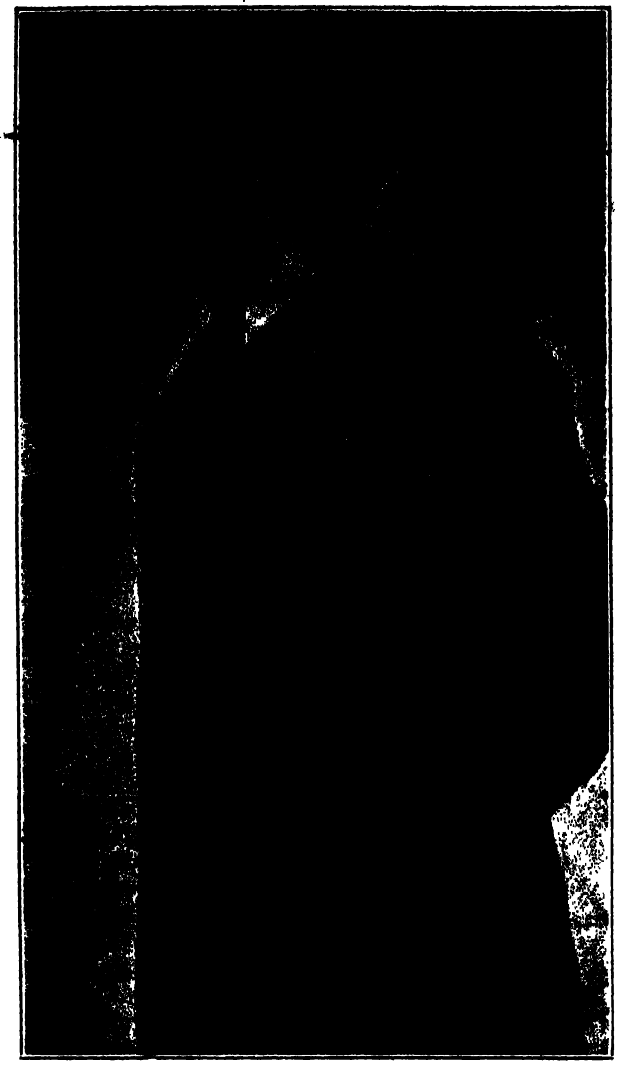
G. S.

Miss Susan Glaspell.
From a drawing by D. Nicholson.

THE STRUGGLES OF A PIONEER
A New Life of Ibsen

"Ibsen, the Master Builder." By A. E. Zucker. 10s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

Controversy still rages between those who see in Henrik Ibsen a thinker of the first rank, a philosopher determined to influence the thought of the world, and those who maintain that he was a supremely skilful dramatist, quick-witted enough to fashion his dramas around ideas that were in the air. That he introduced new methods into the theatre is common ground between the disputants; whether his plays affected the human mind and humanity's ways of living is a question not likely to be answered with any certainty for a long time to come. Professor Zucker makes no attempt to decide this debatable point. Whether Ibsen had a "message," or believed that he had, this book does not discuss. It is a good straightforward account of him and his work with a certain amount of fresh material, chiefly recollections by people who knew the dramatist in his later years.



Although the author is American (he has a chair at Maryland University) he says scarcely anything about the treatment of Ibsen's plays in the United States and in England when they began to be performed just about forty years ago.

In his own country even there was hesitation in welcoming Ibsen. He had been given a State pension to enable him to write, but what he did write was not at first to the taste of the Norwegian intelligentsia. It was Germany which gave him encouragement; in Germany he lived for many years. Had he been born British, he would probably never have been heard of. He had the greatest difficulty in getting his early work acted and published; it was, first, the assistance of the famous violinist, Ole Bull, who got him a job at the Bergen Theatre as producer, and then the State pension, which freed him from the necessity of making up prescriptions in a chemist's shop all his life. It is scarcely possible that "Brand" and "Peer Gynt" which made him secure as a writer should have been produced in such scanty leisure as the drug-store allowed. The chance to travel, to settle for a while in Rome, developed his genius, allowed it to ripen and expand. As a Briton, he would have been given no help of the kind that made all the difference to him; we have only commercial theatres; we have no State fund for the support of young men and women who seem likely to do good work.

It is arguable that Ibsen's energetic character might have triumphed unaided. But this character seems to have been moulded chiefly by success. As a young man he was diffident, he was easily cast down. There were times when he contemplated taking "a subordinate position in the custom-house where he might have rotted away spiritually while for long hours each day he weighed bags of sugar and coffee." He thought of emigrating to Denmark to seek employment there. His sturdy Johnsonian assurance, his pride in being independent, grew only as he made money and found himself famous.

His eccentricities are not concealed by his latest biographer, nor even the interest that he took in clever girls when he was an old man, which caused difficulties with his wife. That was a pity, for she had been a constant encourager of his highest efforts. She understood him and believed in him. She may have had as much to do with his success as Ole Bull or the government which granted him the means to go abroad.

H. F.

Henrik Ibsen.

From "Ibsen: Master Builder," by A. E. Zucker (Thornton Butterworth).

SHAKESPEARE FOR ACTORS

"The Swan Shakespeare: A Player's Edition." With notes by C. B. Purdom and illustrations by Jean Campbell. 3 vols. 25s. (Dent.)

One foresees this edition having a great vogue among Shakespeare-lovers, and more especially among those societies whose love is expressed in action. Of interest to all students (it follows the standard Camrbridge text, complete with the poems, and has an exhaustive glossary) it is particularly addressed to the amateur producer. Not that it undertakes the producer's work: it is "merely a beginning" for him, Mr. Purdom says: but a beginning which will set him far on his road, giving him more various information in its neat bulk than he might glean from many an hour's research in the libraries. There are notes on each play—its costumes, staging, music, properties, and the age and appearance of its chief characters: with illustrations giving details of dress, ornaments, etc., and even instructions for making them.

Also a general introduction, which is both pithy and full of exact and compendious knowledge. This treats of Shakespeare's stage and the conditions of his task: gives a good short account of him, and of contemporary theatres and companies: some notes on the first texts, and a chronological table: a short bibliography of the standard works on, e.g., costume and music: besides some instructive and often challenging remarks on Shakespeare-production in general. It is all thoroughly well done and (not least important in a work of this kind) a triumph of ordered terseness. The volumes are separately obtainable at 9s. each; but few readers, and no society, will willingly stop short of the set.

G. S.

BROADCASTING FOR BOOKMEN

Some November Talks of Literary Interest

Selected by
J. D. Crawshaw

In the winter months, when the portable set is restored to its rightful place by the fireside and no longer breaks the stillness of garden or river, it is well that the speakers of the B.B.C. should occasionally talk to us of books. And surely enough in the talks arranged for November there is a fair sprinkling of talks of literary interest. It might be urged that the sprinkling is not sufficiently generous; and those who maintain with Austin Dobson that "Old wine, old books, old faces, these are best," will find some cause for complaint in the November programme, where old books are not very strongly represented. Apart from Mr. Basil Willey's final talk on the novels of Thomas Hardy (November 3rd, 7.25 p.m.) and Mr. V. C. Clinton Baddeley's weekly readings from "David Copperfield" (November 6th, 13th, 20th and 27th, 6.0 p.m.), there appears to be only one other concession to literature of the past. That is the series of talks on the Spirit of Adventure (November 1st, 8th, 15th, 22nd and 29th; London and Midland Regional, 8.30 p.m.), in which readings will be given from the lives and adventures of great explorers.

But perhaps, after all, the people who are really fond of old books would rather read them than hear someone else talk about them; and it may be true that the average listener finds an account of a new book more interesting than an appreciation of an old one. Those who like to hear about the latest publications can listen to Miss V. Sackville-West (November 3rd and 17th, 7.0 p.m.) and Mr. Desmond MacCarthy (November 10th and 24th, 7.0 p.m.), who will talk of books in general; or to Mr. A. Duff Cooper (November 13th, 7.0 p.m.) and Mr. Michael Sadleir (November 27th, 7.0 p.m.), who will review the most important of the new novels. The idea of alternating the book-reviewers is undoubtedly a good one, for it is a little monotonous to hear the voice of the same reviewer week after week.

Among talks of general literary interest there is Mr. J. C. Squire's final talk in his Enjoyment of Words series (November 7th; London and Midland Regional, 8.30 p.m.). Mr. Squire's talks have been designed to make people more appreciative of the words which they read and use, and his final talk is sure to be entertaining and instructive even for those who have not heard the rest of the series. For the lovers of modern poetry there is the weekly series of readings from notable modern poets (November 3rd, 10th, 17th and 24th, 6.0 p.m.); and for people who are able to listen to morning talks there is the continuation of Mrs. Oliver Strachey's series on "Reading for Fun." This month she is dealing with Books about Crime (November 7th, 10.45 a.m.) and Books of Everyday Life (November 21st, 10.45 a.m.).

By a new arrangement these morning talks are being given in the London Regional programme.

In addition to the talks which are directly concerned with books and literature, there are others which are likely to make a particular appeal to serious readers. Everyone who has read Canon Streeter's "Reality," and everyone who has been advised to read it but has not done so, should make a point of hearing his contribution to the symposium on Science and Religion (November 9th, 5.45 p.m.). Another notable contributor to this Sunday symposium is Sir Arthur Eddington (November 23rd, 5.45 p.m.), while the talk by Professor Samuel Alexander (November 30th, 5.45 p.m.) stands out as one of the most important features of the month's programmes. I do not know if Professor Alexander has spoken before the microphone before, but in any case no one should miss the opportunity of hearing the greatest English philosopher of the day. The other speakers in this symposium during November are the Very Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard (November 2nd, 5.45 p.m.) and the Rev. C. J. O'Hara, S.J. (November 16th, 5.45 p.m.).

Other talks which are likely to appeal to the general reader are those by Professor Ernest Barker on "What Is Liberty?" (November 13th, 20th and 27th, 7.25 p.m.), and those by Sir James Jeans on "The Stars in their Courses" (November 18th and 25th; Daventry only, 8.0 p.m.). And the many admirers of the Hon. Harold Nicolson's "Some People," and of his recent biography of his father will automatically switch on their sets for his Friday evening comments on People and Things (November 7th, 14th, 21st and 28th, 9.20 p.m.).

The talks mentioned in this article are in the National Programme, unless otherwise stated.

IN THOSE DAYS

(From THE BOOKMAN, November, 1895.)

We are informed, on what appears to be reliable authority, that Mr. Alfred Austin has been appointed Poet Laureate, and that the formal announcement may be expected about the middle of this month.

* * * * *

It is understood that Mr. Ruskin receives a minimum sum of £4,000 a year for his works, the sale of which continues unabated.

* * * * *

It is not often that the appearance of a new writer is heralded by the announcement of half a dozen books, but something like that has happened in the case of Mr John Buchan. Mr. Buchan, who is only twenty-one years of age, is a Scotchman, the son of a Free Church minister in Glasgow. Last session he took a scholarship at Glasgow University, where he worked hard at Philosophy and Classics; and he has just gone to Oxford, where he is entered at Brasenose.

While in Scotland, Mr. Buchan did a good deal of work for the Glasgow Herald, and he contributed articles to Macmillan's and the Gentleman's Magazine. One of the Macmillan papers was entitled "Scholar Gipsies," and that is to be the name given to the volume of collected essays to be published by Mr. John Lane. Several of these are descriptive of life in the drove roads, on the borders. Mr. Buchan used to make his holiday among the shepherds there, and his volume of Scotch stories, "The Face of Persephone," which may be expected in the spring, will deal with their life, in a less sentimental manner than several recent Scotch writers have employed. A volume of Fishing Verses is on the stocks, and we understand that a Covenanting Romance is nearly finished. Before coming south Mr. Buchan spent a few days with Mr. Crockett.

* * * * *

The competition among sixpenny general magazines of the Strand type bids fair to be unprecedented. About a year ago the Windsor Magazine was started, and it is to pass into the capable hands of Mr. David Williamson, and to publish the new story by Mr. Hall Caine. The Ludgate Monthly has been taken over by the Black and White Publishing Company, and is to have new life put into it. Mr. Pearson, of Pearson's Weekly, is to commence a magazine which is avowedly a rival to the Strand. Messrs. Harmsworth, of Answers, have long had on the stocks yet another periodical of the same kind. And of course there are rumours of more to come.

* * * * *

Mr. Rider Haggard is understood to be contemplating more than one journalistic enterprise at present—a daily newspaper, and a periodical specially devoted to serve Africa.

ADVENTURE TALES

A Postscript and a Comparison

"The Museum Murder." By John T. McIntyre. 7s. 6d. (Geoffrey Bles.)
"The Green Jade Hand." By H. S. Keeler. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)
"Mysterious Waye." By P. C. Wren. 7s. 6d. (Murray.)
"Man-Hunt." By L. A. Knight. 7s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)
"A Hair Divides." By Claude Houghton. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)
"China Seas." By Crosbie Garstin. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

I had in mind, this month, to sum up and conclude the set of articles in which I have discussed the technique of the crook-story—I hope not ad nauseam: for half the fun of reading thrillers is to compare the different ways of concocting them—but it turns out that the month's parcel includes two which are not crook-stories at all. This pair, "A Hair Divides" and "China Seas," are of such individual and fine quality that I postpone them for separate treatment: proposing meanwhile to turn over the four thrillers, and to see how far they conform to the best thriller type.

A quick start, and an early corpse: steady development; not too much light on what it is all about; and as much plausibility as possible, for Aristotle's sake—such we have found to be among the most important ingredients. "The Museum Murder" misses some of these essentials at first, though Mr. McIntyre manages to mix things up very prettily when he gets into his stride; but he is never very plausible—least of all in the licence which his hero enjoys, to investigate independently under the nose of the police. "The Green Jade Hand" and "Mysterious Waye" are quicker off the mark; also, their element of mystery is more strong—Major Wren keeping readers wondering what his man will do next and why; Mr. Keeler successfully exploiting a most ingenious red-herring. "Man-Hunt" employs three effective gambits which the others rather neglect—night-operations (crook stories ought to take place, like "Macbeth," mainly in the dark), plenty of good mixed fighting, and a cross-country chase at the end. The treatment is better, too; for Mr. Keeler comes to grief in the matter of dialects, and Major Wren's light relief is marred by a certain facetiousness which does not always come off.

To turn from these books to Mr. Houghton is to realise what a gulf separates the commercial thriller from the study of character, more especially since "A Hair Divides" is itself concerned with a crime; but the crime here is nothing, the psychological consequence all. It is the story of a second-rate talent, brought up short in impotent jealousy against genius. Mr. Houghton has gone far indeed since his early work of seven years ago; this latest book has an almost Dostoievskian range. Another excellent story is "China Seas"—character again, but this time with thrilling adventure in the Merchant Service for background, and with word-pictures of sea, wind and landscape which Conrad himself could not better. Two really notable books. In each the physical events, which would have formed the central theme of a mere adventure tale, are kept subservient to the keener interest of character. It is not that the events are scamped ("China Seas" holds thrill enough for three adventure-stories); simply that the author's main concern (and so the reader's, inevitably) is the reaction of his folk to their experience. Events here are incidental; they do not rule the plot; rather they seem themselves to be ruled by their victims, in the sense that they are subdued and forced into the task of helping to mould a man's soul. This surely is the way in which events should be used, on the higher level of fiction; it gives the measure of difference between thrill-making and literature.

Graham Sutton.

BOOKMAN COMPETITIONS

Results of October Entries

I.—The Prize of One Guinea for the best original lyric is awarded to Maiiquita Villard, 18, Half Moon Street, Piccadilly, London, for the following:

CORINTHIAN GULF.

We sailed from Corinth West one burning August noon,
Drowsily watching, till the coming night—
An interval the lovelier for the absent moon—
Stealthily broke upon our torpid sight.

Like an unearthly stream of gliding mercury
Turning with dusk as dim as lead in tone,
The slow, smooth water under us moved heavily.
Startlingly black beside it, rose the cone

Of one small island. In the ambient light's decline,
Bands, at first dull, of purple, gold and blue,
Grew clear and bright above the sea's horizon line;
While overhead the Milky Way burst through,

A branch whose sharp leaves lighted from their fiery maze
An arch so deep and dark, it seemed to us
That even they, joined with the hidden sun's last rays,
Could not have made it quite so luminous.

The silence of the pausing world swept stars and sea,
And like our breathing which in sleep becomes
Rhythmic and full, the silence beat unconsciously.
The thunder rolling from a thousand drums

With all the far reverberations of the sound,
Could not have held for us a power more strong
Than silence then; its majesty had drowned
Even the waves' slight, swishing, tuneless song.

Then, with the last oblivious fibre of our sense
Vibrant with outward beauty self-revealed,
We marvelled at our ecstasy, and we were tense
With the surprise of it. Though long concealed

From us, during the dead past's tedious spell,
Perfection yet had been; now we were hoping
Reason would be requited for its toil as well,
And by some sign from heaven, could cease its groping.

And yet we knew that we were asking this in vain.
Sufficient answer to the mystery,
Our quickened mood. The mind must nurse its doubt in pain;
No further revelation is to be.

We also highly commend the lyrics by Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), Frank N. Jellicoe (Hounslow), Marguerite Allday (Birmingham), P. N. Freeston (London, N.W.), Frederick N. L. Poynter (Folkestone), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), L. C. Lesley House (Christchurch, N.Z.), A. Doris L. Wilson (Bedford), Mary L. Lane (Victoria, Australia), G. M. Haines (Ringwood), E. M. Frampton (Wakefield), D. F. Larkin (Brighton), Edith M. Walker (Bournemouth), Dallas Kenmare (Barnt Green), Isobel M. Lillie (Bridlington), Melfin W. Jones (Cardiff), A. E. Saunders (Castleford), J. E. L. Fletcher (Nyasaland), Verna Loveday Harden (Toronto), Vera I. Arlett (Worthing),

II.—The Prize of Half a Guinea for the best quotation is awarded to the Rev. F. Hern, Rowland's Castle, Hants, for the following:

MY EARLY LIFE.

By the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, C.H., M.P.
(Thornton Butterworth.)

"Either a little Liberal
Or else a little Conservative."
W. S. Gilbert, Iolanthe.

We also select for printing:

THE UNCERTAIN TRAVELLER. BY JOHN FISHER. (Duckworth.)

"He knew not where he was, nor greatly cared."

BYRON, Don Juan, Canto 8.

(John E. Woods, 63, Mayfield Road, Earlsdon, Coventry.)

STAYING WITH RELATIONS. BY ROSE MACAULAY. (Collins.)

"Though this be madness, yet there's method in't."

SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet.

(A. Eleanor Pinnington, 70, Pitt Street, Norwich.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best note on the heroine of fiction the writer would like to entertain at his or her table is awarded to Barbara Hughes-Stanton, Scarsdale Lodge, Wrights Lane, W.8, for the following:

HANNAH MOLE FROM "MISS MOLE."

BY E. H. YOUNG.

Hannah Mole would certainly be an ideal guest. Unlike most fictional heroines she is possessed of no dazzling beauty or still more dazzling deeds of prowess to make one feel distressingly inferior and obliged to listen humbly. No, Miss Mole would enjoy herself, and thus enjoying throw caution to the winds and regale one with stories. Stories which would bring stages of her life to you—that infinitely hard and mostly dreary life—but to her, with her gay humour and unquenchable love of it, a life worth living in spite of longings. Her delicious malice stripping all those people in her existence of their petty vanities—those people who only see her as a drab little person in her proper place—but avoiding mere "cattiness" by her obvious unconscious liking for those nine-pins which she so joyously knocks down with her rapier wit—What an amusing evening we should have.

Old Age.

Sculpture by a pupil of the Tagore School.

(See article on Page 112).

We also specially commend the replies from E. D. Bennett (Stockport), Mrs. E. G. Elton (Norbury), J. E. A. Gedge (Harlow), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Jeanne Harrison (Canterbury).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English literature applicable to the leaders of the three political parties is awarded to the Rev. Edwin J. Matthews, The Rectory, Calstone, Calne, Wilts, for the following:

"I'll do, I'll do, and I'll do."

SHAKESPEARE, Macbeth, Act I, Scene 3.

We cannot refrain from printing the reply from Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson, 26, Chatham Grove, Withington, Manchester, who has given three quotations instead of one, and to whom a consolation prize of THREE NEW BOOKS is awarded:

RAMSAY MACDONALD:

"Our dole more deadly looks than dying."

JOHN FLETCHER, Dirge of the Three Queens.

LLOYD GEORGE:

"The cynosure of neighbouring eyes."

MILTON, L'Allegro.

STANLEY BALDWIN:

"And in me there dwells no greatness, save it be some far-off touch of greatness to know well I am not great."

TENNYSON, Lancelot and Elaine.

We also select for special commendation the replies by Marjorie Darrah (Prestwich), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), Iris Ottaway (Bungay).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book, is awarded to Lucy Malleson, 64, Gordon Road, Ealing, W.5, for the following:

NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

BY KATHERINE MANSFIELD. (Constable.)

It is to be questioned whether Katherine Mansfield was really qualified to criticise the ordinary novel. Her own conception of life was so individual, her reactions so delicate, that she did not always realise that a more clumsy and blurred outline did not necessarily involve insincerity but merely imperception. The chief value of this book to her admirers will be the vivid examples it affords them of her keen powers of observation, her sharp and delicate wit, her knowledge of the heights of human nature, and her burning insistence on truth, that was her touchstone in all things.

We also specially commend the replies by Mollie Moore (Warnham), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Norwich), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Dallas Kenmare (Barnt Green), M. K. McIntosh (Cheltenham), Ronald Kidd (London, W.), F. D. Young (Blaenau Festiniog), Joan Vale (Moss Vale, New South Wales), G. Pitt (London, N.), Evelyn Bamber (Wilpshire), Mrs E. G. Elton (Norbury), B. Noël Saxelby (Buxton).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to J. Macnaughton Smith, 41, Central Hill, Upper Norwood, S.W.19.

PRIZE COMPETITIONS FOR NOVEMBER

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than December 12th. A competitor may enter for all the Competitions, but must cut out the coupon on the back cover and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the completion, in not more than twelve lines of rhymed verse, of Diaper Sandoe's "sentimental alliterative love-poem" referred to in Chapter I of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel." It was composed during the time that the poet and Lady Feverel "played Rizzio and Mary together," and the only lines extant are:

"For I am not the first who found
The name of Mary fatal."

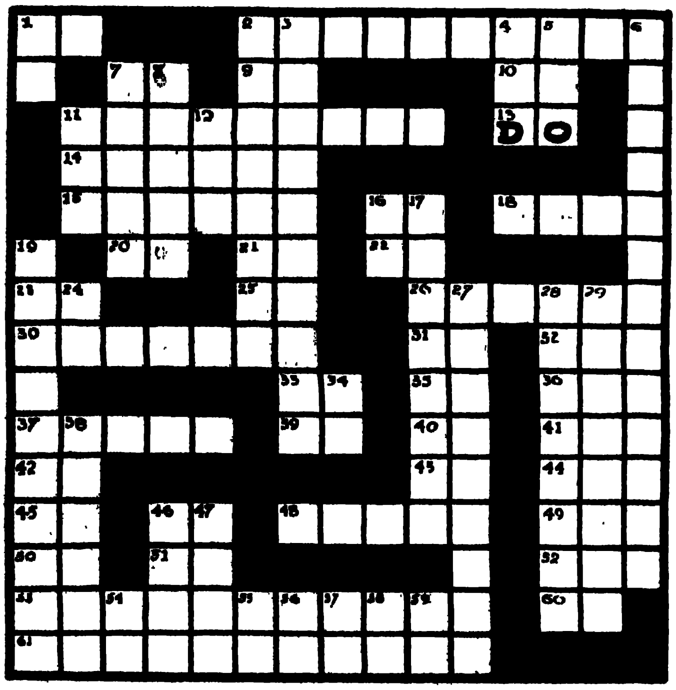
II.—HALF A GUINEA for a description by Mr. Samuel Pepys of Armistice Day, 1930, in not more than two hundred and fifty words.

III.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse of the twentieth century applicable to any book advertised in this number.

IV.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best letter not more than two hundred words in length disagreeing with any review which appears in this number.

V.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a competition.

"THE BOOKMAN" CROSSWORD.



I.—CHARLES LAMB. BY "PROCRUSTES."

ONE GUINEA will be sent to the sender of a correct solution who provides the best clue to 13 across.

Competitors should use the crossword on the cover for their attempts. The one on this page is for reference in the bound volume.

CLUES ACROSS.

1. This relation of Elia "is the systematic opponent of innovation."
2. Where mendicants decay.
7. Brother and sister.
9. Indefinite article.
10. Behold.
11. Hither repaireth the Reader to secure a place for Dalston or Shacklewell.
14. When maidens such as Hester die there is none of this.
15. A 12-like tribesman.
16. Preposition.
18. Elia writes "d——d" rather than utter this.
20. Have a shot, though handicapped by lack of tail.
21. National Institute.
22. American State.
23. 1 across thought it a pity that fine Eton lads should become this.
25. Exist.
26. He is evidently upset by the present commemorations of his Roman creator.
30. Charles was too late to frustrate crazed Mary's this.
31. Distinguished order.
32. Girl's name.
33. Negative.
35. 23.
36. Vigorous request for silence.
37. "It was as if some of those disfigurements in . . . had seized upon" the schoolboy.
39. Elia's friend who "got me to think I understood the first proposition in Euclid, but gave me over in despair at the second."
40. 51 reversed.
41. More than one.
42. Preposition.
43. But (Italian).
44. Alas, miserande puer!
45. Another distinguished order.
46. Prefixed to historical fruits.
48. See 4.
49. Ahems.
50. 10.
51. Hail.
52. For the royal and ancient.
53. By these Lamb is chiefly known.
60. An authoritative signature.
61. She enjoyed the rigour of the game.

CLUES DOWN.

1. A schoolfellow of Elia's, whose departure disproved that death was wearing out ("Distant Friends").
2. He was Horace's. Lamb was too late to have one.
3. Form into a military body.
4 down and 48 across. Familiar, but Lamb found them sadly transitory.
5. Lamb was forty years 4 when this battle was fought with additional water.
6. "This was once a house of trade"—but now "a desolation something like Balclutha's."
7. Retain each till June.
8. May cause much pain.
11. Reverse French wireless.
12. There was this even in Heaven.
16. Preposition.
17. To Lamb the 2 across was all one (delete a 52 across).
19. This good master is welcome on "All Fools' Day."
24. Put and take away the tail.
27. Unnecessary to Lamb's worth.
28. One who tries to live up to the china in his room.
29. Letters should be.
34. 31.
38. Part of West Africa.
46. Prolonged chuckle.
47. In Elia's story an accident led to the discovery of a new one.
54. Indian demonstrators might wish thus to upset a title.
55. This half-brother of Miss Burney was an artist in the matter of Valentines.
56. South Africa.
57. Initials of a poet friend of Lamb's.
58. Preposition.
59. Chemical suffix.

PALL MALL EAST IN 1894.

HYDE PARK CORNER, 1894.

Glimpses of Sherlock Holmes's England

WITH THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR IRA D. SANKEY AT THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE, 1892.

The Bookman
Christmas Number

No. 471. Vol. LXXIX. DECEMBER, 1930. Price Six Shillings.

1/- net monthly, except Special Numbers.
SUBSCRIPTION TERMS (Post free including all Special Issues): British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, £1 3s. 6d. per annum. Foreign, £1 4s. per annum.
Editorial and Publishing Offices: St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.
Registered at the G.P.O., London, for transmission to Canada and Newfoundland by Magazine Post.
Entered as Second Class Matter, March 15, 1929, at the Post Office at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879 (Sec. 397, P.L. and R.).

The Poet Laureate

THE POETRY OF JOHN MASEFIELD

By Charles Davy

NOT long before the War an elderly poet, who had been almost famous during the "Yellow Book" period, spoke to me with a smile of "The Everlasting Mercy." "I always call it," he said, "the 'everlasting cursy'." Nowadays we are less easily frightened by strong language, and "The Everlasting Mercy" is unpopular mainly for other reasons—for its emotionalism and its religious earnestness.

But in spite of the crudities of this poem there are passages in it which have a spontaneous force seldom equalled in Masefield's later work, and unknown in his earlier work. The "Salt-water Ballads" and the "Ballads and Poems" are by a man who has felt the sea and the country-side and has found in himself a gift for writing verse, but they are more often distinctive through their material than through their expression. Nor is their sentiment very sure—the "tall ship" of "Sea Fever" sails perilously close to the sea-coast of Bohemia.

Mr. John Masefield in his garden.

It was only when the English Review began to publish his long narrative poems that Masefield established himself as a poet who could not be regarded as a shadow of Kipling. These long poems, dramatic rather than epic in conception, are a natural link between Masefield's shorter lyrics and his poetic plays (with which in this article I am not concerned). Their sustained energy—their "drive"—sets them apart from most twentieth century poetry. It is rare nowadays to find a poet who is not afraid of character and incident—a poet who attempts to give us a world of objective action rather than a world of subjective imagery. And it is never through any faltering of energy or weakness of construction that these long poems fail. They do not make us feel that Masefield ought not to have chosen this particular medium. When they fail it is through lack of that controlling taste whose function it should be to save energy from running over into bathos.

Bathos—this is Masefield's besetting enemy. Its worst attacks occur in "The Daffodil Fields" and "The Widow in the Bye Street." Its presence is very noticeable at times in "The Everlasting Mercy," less noticeable in "Dauber" and scarcely noticeable at all in "Reynard the Fox." But if only one of Masefield's long poems was to be kept it is not "Reynard the Fox" that I should choose — nor "Right Royal," which is in the same vein, but much less well done. Personally, I think I should choose "The Everlasting Mercy," but I can understand many people preferring to keep "Dauber."

"Dauber" is not nearly so skilful, nor so consistently effective as "Reynard the Fox," but it seems to embody far more original experience.

> "Out of the rain the voices called and passed,
> The staysails flogged, the tackle yanked and shook.
> Inside the harness-room a lantern cast
> Light and wild shadows as it ranged its hook."

The sea, the ship, the old seamen, the hurricane off the Horn—all these are real in this poem. Dauber himself does not seem to me quite real, because here again I feel Masefield making the mistake of not knowing where to stop. He strains our sympathies by appealing to them with unnecessary emphasis—and it is in this sudden chilling of the reader's sympathies that bathos essentially consists.

" Reynard the Fox " is Mr. Masefield's most successful poem chiefly, I think, because it is largely descriptive. It does not tempt him to emphasise an emotional moral and it gives full scope to his command of swift, rhythmical verse.

> " They saw the Yell Brook like a gem
> Blue in the grass a short mile on ;
> They heard faint cries, but hounds were gone
> A good eight fields and out of sight,
> Except a rippled glimmer white
> Going away with dying cheering,
> And scarlet flappings disappearing,
> And scattering horses, going, going,
> Going like mad, White Rabbit showing
> Far on ahead, a loose horse taking
> Fence after fence with stirrups shaking,
> And scarlet specks and dark specks dwindling."

It is not surprising that " Reynard the Fox "—vivid, dramatic, traditional in theme yet modern in treatment—should have become probably the most popular and widely-read poem written by any Laureate except Tennyson.

Its two weaknesses are that the fox is given human thoughts and human emotions, and that (to my mind) the whole poem is more contrived than inspired. The long opening account of the meet is full of tersely effective thumb-nail sketches, but it is rather like a parade of typical English specimens. The assembly of Chaucer's pilgrims (a frequently quoted parallel) is far more living and genial. Then the run itself seems to be planned with a rather too obvious care for dramatic effect. But this may be hypercritical; and of the poem's descriptive qualities there can be no doubt. If it is not the finest kind of poetry it is certainly a brilliant genre piece ; and on this account it will probably outlast nearly all the rest of Masefield's work.

Apart from his long narrative poems and his early sea pieces, Masefield has written a large number of sonnets and miscellaneous poems. The full extent of his output is often not realised ; his " Collected Poems " (including the plays) make a bulky volume of nearly eight hundred pages.

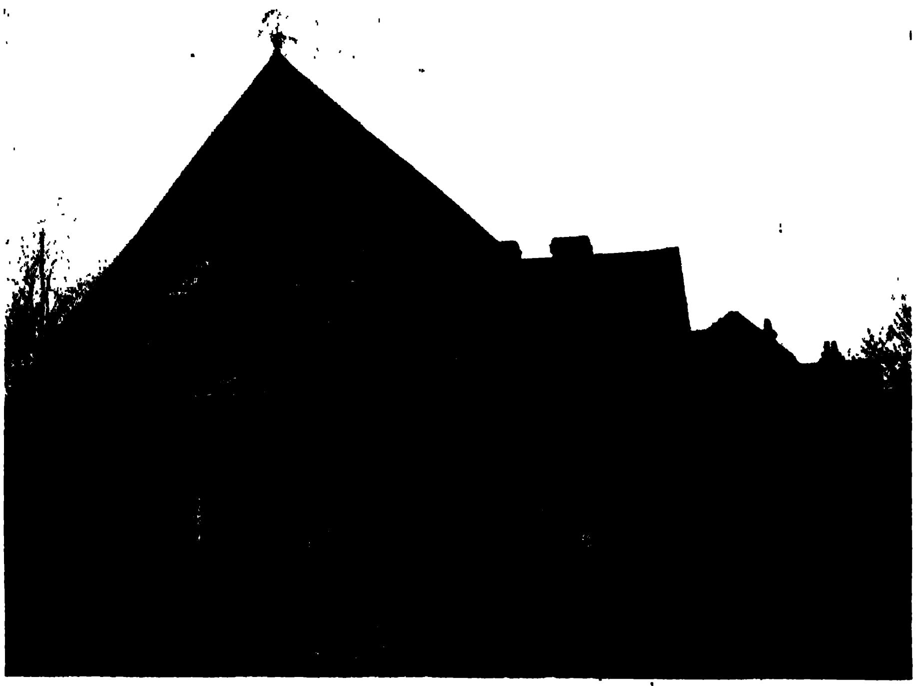
Among these miscellaneous poems much of his best work is to be found ; but it needs some looking for. " Enslaved," for example, is shorter than the other narrative poems and in a different key, but it is full of colour and movement and dramatic feeling, and deserves to be at least as well known. " August, 1914," will endure, I think ; " Biography " I like, and many other passages, scattered through the sonnets and elsewhere, which I have no space to quote.

But wherever I start reading in the " Collected Poems," it is never long before I feel a certain uneasiness. The constant invocation of " beauty," for example—it seems to me that beauty, like happiness, cannot be invoked or pursued for its own sake. A poet's business is to make us aware of beauty, not to talk about it. When he talks about it, he is like a man waving a flag and singing " Rule, Britannia " in war time. There is no flag-waving in the front-line trenches of poetry.

Perhaps another way of putting this is to say that Masefield appeals more to the emotions than to the imagination. He stirs up familiar emotional associations but he seldom forces upon us new imaginative experience. Much of his poetry can be enjoyed only at the cost of surrendering to a slightly bemused emotional mood. And it is his determination to flog our emotions into this yielding state that leads him, as I have already suggested, into his worst faults.

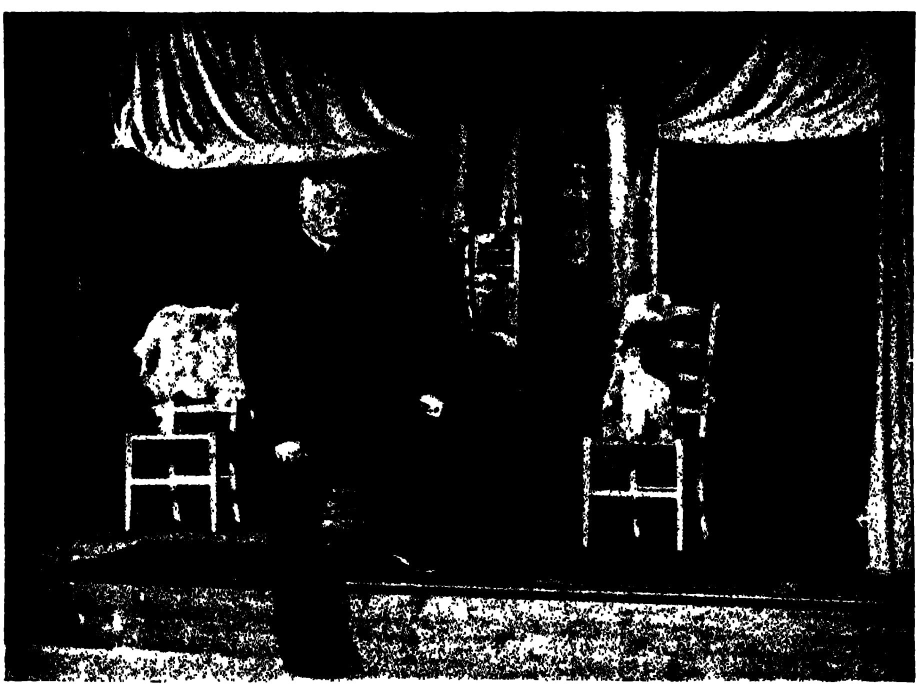
To praise Masefield merely for his technical equipment—his remarkable command of rhyme and metre and rhythm—would not be very flattering. The question one would like to ask—though it is a question which cannot be answered—is why a poet, whose early work was—in spite of its crudities—so full of force and promise, has not developed further.

When Conrad left the sea and went to live in Kent one felt that he had finished his voyages. I am not sure that this is true of Masefield. Perhaps there are voyages, necessary for a poet, which he has not yet made ; and he may not find it easy to make them now from Boar's Hill.



THE PROSE OF JOHN MASEFIELD

By T. R. Henn



" FOR words, after all, words manipulated with all his delicate force, were to be the apparatus of a war for himself. To be forcefully impressed, in the first place ; and in the next, to find the means of making visible to others that which was vividly apparent, delightful, of lively interest to himself, to the exclusion of all that was middling, tame, or only half true even to him. . . ."

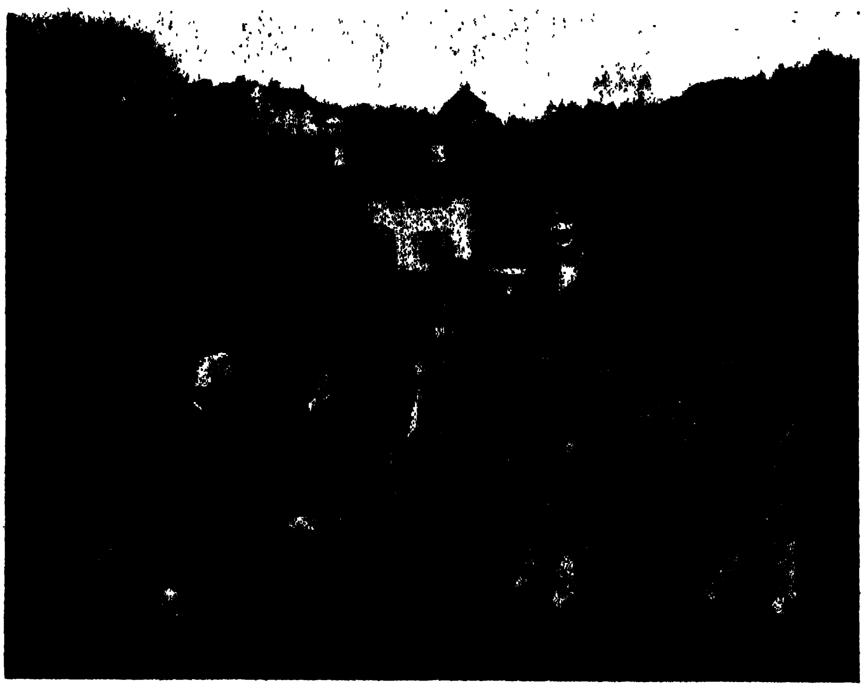
I have come fresh from re-reading " Marius the Epicurean." Perhaps one tends to feel of Pater's own style as Coleridge felt of Gibbon's : we " seem to be looking through a luminous haze or fog." That great book, with its exaltation of Roman piety and its strange peacefulness, has a peculiar charm that was Pater's secret alone. The writing of his age has something of the scent of the hot-house, and a quality of leisure to which our own time is very alien ; and while it would be difficult to find two writers of more conflicting personality than Walter Pater and Mr. Masefield, yet the literary ideals of Flavian might serve for a text for both.

" A Mainsail Haul " and " A Tarpaulin Muster " have something of the preciosity of one who has just discovered the possibility of speech " as fully flavoured as a nut or an apple " ; the prose rhythms are those of the pseudo-Celtic school, without ever having their full vitality. There is word-painting in " Edward Herries," but it is stiff and unreal ; life only comes in the description of the sea, and in the speech of sailors. There is much in these short stories to foreshadow later development ; but it is the little volume on Shakespeare in the Home University Library which first

MR. MASEFIELD'S THEATRE AT HIS HOUSE AT BOAR'S HILL.

MR. JOHN MASEFIELD ON THE STAGE OF HIS PRIVATE THEATRE AT BOAR'S HILL, OXFORD.

"THE COMING OF CHRIST."



"THE TRAGEDY OF POMPEY THE GREAT."

Scenes from two of Mr. Masefield's plays shows Mr. Masefield at his best. Here the criticism is dogmatic, explosive, compressed; short staccato sentences, opinions which frequently invite contradiction, and paradoxes which are a little too Chestertonian, alternate with judgments which have the supreme merit of being fresh, vivid and felt. A certain mystical power gives weight to his views on tragedy, and there is apparent throughout a fierce hatred of unrealities, in scholarship as in life.

This same fierce hatred gives its impetus to the opening chapter of "Multitude and Solitude," and lies behind "The Street of To-day." The former is in many ways, I think, the most remarkable of the novels. It is important because it aims at depicting psychological development of some complexity. The early death of the heroine provides the novel with a background sufficiently dim to give rise to no sentimentality; and the reader is left free to follow up character in its setting of action. There is no finer example of Mr. Masefield's art than the description of the tropical storm.

Mr. John Masefield and his daughter at Boar's Hill, Oxford.

It would be unfair to suggest that the relative success of "Multitude and Solitude," and the failure of "The Hawbucks," lay solely in the presence of a love interest. But some careful reading of the dialogue both in "The Hawbucks" and in the early chapters of "Odtaa" confirms the suspicion that Mr. Masefield is neither a student of feminine psychology nor a natural master of dialogue; and it is a hypothesis which will serve to explain much. As a novel of English country life, "The Hawbucks" is undated (internal evidence suggests the early years of this century); but the circle of hard-riding and harder-swearing "squireens" becomes more and more incredible as the book progresses.

It is in "Sard Harker," after all, that his prose is seen at its best, and its best is unique. It has speed, economy of movement and a rhythm which quickens the blood. I read it first in almost ideal surroundings, in a hospital in India; it held the attention for two long days. A second reading left one less sure; perhaps it was the disappointment attendant on purely adventure stories, more probably an episodic quality which makes the story creak at times upon its hinges. But the style is there, strong, swift and nervous; witness it in the picture of Sard in the swamp:

"The soft green grasses gave before him; they stroked his face gently, they closed in at the back of his neck, he felt them caress his body and tremble along his legs and lay enfoldments about his feet. When he thrust out his hands to swim, they sped from him, for they were frail grass and he a strong man; but before his stroke was made, they were back again; he felt them at his chest; they touched his chin; they rose from the water and touched his face . . . he wrenched that foot clear, and lo, all those soft little frail grasses seemed to come all about with a whisper, and they were as heavy as lead and as strong as sail-makers' twine."

Here an impression is conveyed most vividly, even to the similes which form the cadence, with a sense of rhythm which Stevenson or Synge might have envied; and it would be easy to give a score of parallel instances from the book.

English literature gives few instances of men who achieved fame as poets and as prose writers; perhaps Hardy, Meredith, and Milton in a somewhat different sphere, are the only examples. It is unreasonable to demand that a Poet Laureate should be a great novelist; and it is unlikely that our grandchildren will regard Mr. Masefield's prose as of more than historical interest. But he has shown that a vivid and readable adventure story may be written in good literary prose; he has showed that the portrayal of sheer action was in itself material for something approaching the epic scale, with its swiftness, its laconic statement and its lyric qualities.

Is the range of experience, of horses, of ships, of South America, of the English country-side, limited by its very intensity? Is this—to return once more to Flavian—the cause of his failure and the justification of his success? He has made visible—witness the multitude of descriptions in prose and verse—that which was vividly apparent, delightful, of living interest to himself; and he knows to the full the force and energy of words. But a novel such as "The Hawbucks" demands, by its plan and conception, a wider range of experience than "Jim Davis"; it demands an imaginative sympathy and a balance of mood and sympathy which the greatest artists possess; and it cannot be achieved by a knowledge of what is "middling, tame, or only half true." La verité consiste dans les nuances.

THE PLAYS OF JOHN MASEFIELD

By Norman Marshall

NO contemporary dramatist has been more poorly served by the theatre than Mr. Masefield. I can recall having seen over a score of productions of his plays, but only three of these performances were fair to the author. English actors and actresses are, at present, experts in the detailed and realistic reproduction of everyday life on the stage, but as soon as they have to cope with a non-realistic play they are clumsy and bewildered. If the play is in costume, their idea of achieving an "imaginative" production is merely to smother the play in spectacle and to make it seem as unreal and as far removed from everyday life as possible by adopting a laboriously artificial and stagy bearing, and speaking in a pompous and unnatural voice. If the play is written in verse they either do their best to conceal the fact by using all their technique to make it sound as "realistic" and as like prose as possible, or they use the verse to show off the range of their voice, without any particular regard to its rhythms or its meaning.

Mr. Masefield's two most successful plays, "The Tragedy of Nan" and "Pompey the Great," are written in modern colloquial prose, but these, together with the rest of his plays, can only be successfully produced on the stage by a producer who realises that they are essentially non-realistic plays, and that although written in prose, the prose is essentially that of a poet. It has, of course, none of the florid and over-decorated qualities of the stuff which used to pass as "poetic prose," but it is prose which is non-realistic and artificial in its elaborate and strongly marked rhythms.

If the rhythmic pattern of these plays is ignored in the production, the dialogue becomes laboured and unconvincing. In "The Tragedy of Nan" for example, the speeches, taken line by line, are abrupt and jerky, written almost entirely in brief, detached sentences. The producer and the actor must stand back from these speeches and see them as a whole, realising that each separate sentence is as insignificant and ineffective by itself as an isolated bar in a passage of music, but that together they form an elaborately balanced and magnificently effective structure.

As a writer of plays in verse Mr. Masefield has suffered unjustly from his critics as well as his actors. His verse plays have been adversely criticised by critics reading them in their studies (instead of seeing them in the theatres), for the very qualities which make them theatrically effective.

In the theatre there is no time to savour the delicate phrase. Words speed past the ear so quickly that the subtle word or phrase is swept by before it can be appreciated. The verse of Mr. Masefield's plays is good theatre verse because it is full of vivid lines and phrases which make an instant effect upon the mind of the hearer.

A Scene from "The Coming of Christ."

The weakness of Mr. Masefield's verse plays is that they are apt, suddenly and unexpectedly, to stop dead. Verse which a moment before was swift and exciting becomes sluggish, drained of all colour. The action of the play ceases. It is as if Mr. Masefield, in the very act of manipulating his puppets, suddenly becomes lost in thought. He lets the strings fall, his puppets droop upon their stage, and he stands brooding contemplatively over them, until at length the mood passes and, picking up the strings, he jerks them to life again.

His plays are a conflict between the contemplative and the active sides of his nature, and all of them lose dramatic force through the author's tendency to relate incidents instead of allowing the audience to see them. And yet Mr. Masefield is fully alive to the fact that action is the very essence of drama. In his essay on playwriting in "The Taking of Helen and Other Prose Selections" he writes that "the foundation of drama is this—that human nature is hypnotic; if you do something you will hold the attention of men."

Nevertheless in "Pompey the Great," in "Philip the King," in "Good Friday" and in many of his other plays the author seems reluctant to show his characters in action. Events happen off the stage, and we watch the reactions to these events in the minds of the characters on the stage. The method is never dull, but it is too contemplative for the theatre, as we know it to-day.

It was perhaps a realisation of this which led Mr. Masefield to build his own theatre in the garden of his house on Boar's Hill, a theatre in which the actor, no longer isolated from his audience, could speak the more thoughtful and intimate passages of the plays as they were meant to be spoken, instead of having to bawl them out in an attempt to "put them across" to the audience.

As if to compensate for the lack of genuinely dramatic action in his plays, Mr. Masefield is liberal in the provision of scenes which make plenty of appeal to the eye by means of pageantry. He fully appreciates the visual side of play-writing, and most of his work is rich in magnificent pictures. He has the eye of a painter, and his plays have both the merits and the weaknesses of the work of a painter serving the theatre. He sees his plays as a series of pictures, and as a result he is apt to lose interest in the movements of his characters on the stage between the pictures, leaving them to themselves until he is ready to regroup them.

If only he had been able to distinguish between dramatic action and mere motion, some of his plays would rank with Flecker's "Hassan" as examples of what is meant by the "art of the theatre," an art which achieves its effect by the use of all the other arts which the theatre can command. As it is, "The Tragedy of Nan" and "Pompey the Great" are among the very few successful tragedies written for the modern theatre, and are distinguished by that austerity which is the characteristic of all Mr. Masefield's dramatic work, and is otherwise almost entirely lacking in contemporary play-writing.

It is this austerity of purpose which enabled "The Coming of Christ" to survive the ordeal of its presentation in Canterbury Cathedral. The subject of the play and the setting in which it was given would have laid bare the slightest tawdriness or theatricality of conception or execution, and one can think of no other living playwright whose work could have withstood this test.

MASEFIELD AND CRABBE: An Affinity

By A. Raymond Boyden

Despite many differences in outlook and style, there is an extraordinary resemblance between the work of Mr. John Masefield and that of the eighteenth century poet, George Crabbe. They both set out to write with a similar object in view. Crabbe's purpose was to be a realist. He did not intend to mock the nakedness of truth with the "barren flattery of a rhyme," but to > "paint the Cot,

> As Truth will paint it, and as Bards will not."

Similarly, Mr. Masefield shouted the truth as he saw it in lurid language and fine verse. He prefaced his first book with the well-known "Consecration" that has fired his whole artistic life.

The vigour and originality of "The Everlasting Mercy" won Masefield immediate fame, precisely in the way that "The Village," with its daring novelty in poetic treatment of the poor, made Crabbe's name. "It was praised in the leading journals; the sale was rapid and extensive; and [the author's] reputation was . . . permanently established"—these words, written of "The Village," are equally applicable to "The Everlasting Mercy." Indeed, almost any critical statement regarding Crabbe, such as that to be found in "The Cambridge History of English Literature," might equally well have been written of Masefield.

The two poets undoubtedly hark back to a common master in Geoffrey Chaucer. It is known that Crabbe was thoroughly familiar with "The Canterbury Tales," and there is a story told—it may be quite apocryphal—that while Mr. Masefield was working in a carpet factory in the United States he purchased a 75c. Chaucer and decided to become a poet! If Crabbe and Masefield both derive from the same master, the essential difference in the result is explained by the fact that Crabbe lived in the eighteenth century, and modelled his verse on that of Pope, "the poetic dictator of the day," while Mr. Masefield did not begin writing until the dawn of the twentieth century, and was fundamentally influenced by the genius of Mr. W. B. Yeats.

Crabbe and Masefield, then, are similar in that each developed a gift for telling tales in verse and for drawing in a few incisive lines psychologically profound character sketches of living people. In their works both poets make their moral purpose clear, almost tract-like in parts. Both ascribe "most of the unhappiness related . . . to the ungoverned passions or weaknesses of the characters." Both write with a wealth of understanding and a desire to arouse sympathy with and pity for suffering humanity. Read "The Parish Register" and "The Borough," and turn to "The Widow in the Bye Street" and "The Daffodil Fields." Are there not often apparent the same lines of thought, the same accents, almost the same tones of speech?

There are similar patches of incredibly dull verse in both poets, and the same wellnigh perfect food for parody. Many of the faults mirrored so trenchantly and delightfully in "Rejected Addresses" reappear, to be laughed at once again, in Mr. J. C. Squire's merry parodies of Masefield in "Tricks of the Trade." But Crabbe nowhere supplies the pseudo-Celtic glamour that enables Mr. Squire wickedly to exclaim:

> "There's that purple passage done,
> And I have one less lap to run."

This treatment of beauty is one of the vital differences between the two poets. There is wholly absent from Crabbe the passionate lyric note that pervades all Masefield's work.

Of the obvious coincidences of resemblance perhaps it is worthy of note that Crabbe began his poetic life with a long piece on "Inebriety," a subject that has ever attracted Mr. Masefield. Again, the chief character in the tale of backsliding related in Letter XXI of "The Borough" is Abel Keene, and of "The Everlasting Mercy," Saul Kane. Crabbe wrote three novels when he was artistically old enough to recognise their grave defects and to "murder his darlings" during one of his periodical incremations. Mr. Masefield confessed some time ago that he hoped the several novels of his nonage were "all forgotten by now."

Crabbe was, and Mr. Masefield is, extremely popular with his contemporaries. Both poets in consequence reaped an unusually large financial reward from poetry. In 1827 Crabbe walked about London with Murray's cheque for £3,000 for the copyright of "The Tales of the Hall" stuffed in his waistcoat pocket. I do not propose to speculate on the value in 1927 of Mr. Masefield's copyrights, nor on his exact income, but it is probably rather more than a modest competence!

Finally, the present Laureate is undoubtedly the finest sea-poet England has produced, and though the "bond of sympathy" is manifestly a strong one between the two poets, it nevertheless is astonishing that one of the few striking sea-pieces in verse outside Masefield's work should be in Crabbe's "The Borough."

A Century of Laureates

ROBERT BRIDGES

By
Lascelles Abercrombie

Technique and "The Testament of Beauty"

THE preference nowadays is all for lyrical poetry. This is a fashion of the time; and a very slight acquaintance with literary history will suggest, that it is no more likely to be permanent than any other fashion. The real connoisseur, now as ever, likes every kind of poetry: all he requires is, that it should be good poetry. Perhaps there are signs that this fashion is not quite so masterful as it was. "The Dynasts" hit it pretty hard; so did "The Testament of Beauty." And indeed a fashion which would put the whole of Homer and Lucretius, and the chief of Dante and Shakespeare, into some sort of second class, is not likely to be the last word in literary taste. Still, there is not much doubt that if a poet has produced a considerable body of lyrical work, whatever else he has done, that will be the work commonly preferred to-day. It has certainly been so with Robert Bridges—at any rate before "The Testament of Beauty" came out. The usual opinion has been that his real contribution to English poetry is the "Shorter Poems": the rest of him, it was thought, the Dramas and Masks, the sonnet-sequence of "The Growth of Love," the experimental and reflective poems, even the delicious "Eros and Psyche," would not in the long run be found to matter much.

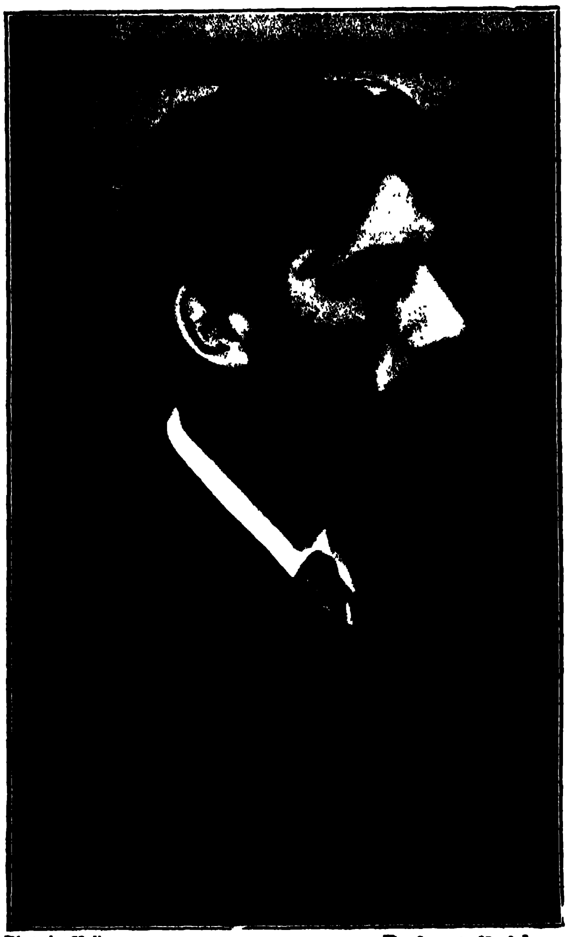

Photo by Hollyer.

Robert Bridges in 1888, æt. 44.

This opinion does not arise from the facts of the case; it arises simply from the fashionable preference for lyrical above all other kinds of poetry. It may be true—I think it probably is true—that his best work is in his lyrical poems; but the superiority, if there is any, is nothing very conspicuous; and as for the notion that his lyrical poetry comes first and the rest nowhere—well, "The Testament of Beauty" has, I should suppose, made that absurdity finally untenable. But it never was tenable; and the uncritical exaltation of his lyrical above his other work is, I believe, responsible for that other absurdity, the notion that he is a poet of technique—in the sense, namely, that he elaborated poetic craftsmanship into a calculated artifice without having, or caring to have, anything particular to say.

It is odd how suspicious the English mind is apt to be about technique in poetry. Obviously, Bridges was profoundly interested in technique: he studied it in many languages, and made all the use he could of his studies. But why should that be suspect in poetry which is taken as a matter of course in music and painting? And it is odd that a poet who wrote out of experiences, both intellectual and spiritual, so rich and broad and deep as Bridges' were, should have ever been accused of using technique for its own sake, as if the art of poetry were nothing but a kind of superlative conjuring trick. This accusation could never have stood for a moment against Bridges' work as a whole; it could only have arisen in the minds of those who, obsessed to begin with by this philistine mistrust of technique in poetry, knew nothing of Bridges but the "Shorter Poems."

For the technique there is unmistakable; but the piercing cry of extreme passion, and the emphatic note of insistent significance, are not there very notable. There is plenty of significance in these lyrics for those who can see it; as in the famous "Whither, O splendid ship," and the equally admirable "Who has not walked upon the shore," with its superb expanse of vision. There are rarities of emotion, like the "Nightingales" and "My spirit kisseth thine"; there are ecstasies like "Awake, my heart, to be loved" (what a perfect justification here of the utmost cunning of technique! what better expression of rapture could there be than this pattern of reiterated rhymes!); the pathos of the "Dead Child" is scarcely to be borne; there is a wonderful ceremonious gravity of feeling in the elegy, "Assemble, all ye maidens." But none of these things are stressed at all; and more characteristic would probably seem—more characteristic, I dare say are—those lyrics composed simply to put us in possession of moments of experience which the casual, blunt reader might very well think nothing remarkable.

Thus, "The Palm Willow" was apparently written merely in order to lead up to the magical phrase in the last two lines:

> "The woodland willow stands a lovely bush > of nebulous gold;
> There the Spring-goddess cowers in faint attire > of frightened fire."

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
CHRISTMAS, 1930

From a drawing by FRANK SLATER.

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

Well, so it was. "Faint attire of frightened fire!" With what subtlety and intensity, at those words, the moment of experience—the complex of sense and thought and feeling—comes to life in our minds! But what message has the moment for us? Nothing but itself, nothing but its unique, exquisite self. And this is typical. The truth is that Bridges lived so continuously in the experience of beauty, and beauty was so absolutely for him the essential reality of things, that his lyrical art was serenely content to fix and immortalise, without comment or stress, the passing beauty of the moment. But to do so, with the perfection that is present all through the "Shorter Poems," required all the scholarship of technique he had so patiently acquired. The beauty of the moment needed no message to justify it; all it needed was the art to capture it. Only such a vivid interest in technique as Bridges had could have arrived at that art.

Ideally, there is no distinction between technique and matter in poetry. Actually, the distinction is often obvious enough. But Bridges, within the limits of his temperament, came as near as may be to the ideal. The whole of "The Testament of Beauty" (into the profound and fine philosophy of which I cannot now enter) proceeded from its first seven lines:

> "Mortal Prudence, handmaid of divine Providence, > hath inscrutable reckoning with Fate and Fortune:
> We sail a changeful sea through halcyon days and storm, > and when the ship laboureth, our stedfast purpose
> trembles like as the compass in a binnacle.
> Our stability is but balance, and wisdom lies > in masterful administration of the unforeseen."

Wisdom has seldom spoken a more pregnant oracle; yet those great seven lines were composed as an experiment in technique. For Bridges, to experiment in technique was to speak his heart and mind. He no sooner took hold of his technique than the matter for which technique exists came to him as naturally as breathing.

It is the peculiarity of his lyrics that their matter is, on the whole, important simply by reason of the immediate beauty of the moment in which it occurs; and frequently this beauty is of such delicacy that its importance is scarcely appreciable except by those for whom, as for the poet, beauty is always and everywhere important. Hence the vulgar myth that his poetry is deficient in matter. But read his non-lyrical poetry, and the myth is exploded at once. Outside his lyrics, Bridges is full of matter. I need only mention the extraordinarily skilful argument of the "Wintry delights," with its Lucretian versifying of the most difficult scientific themes, the great dialogue in which Persephone tells Demeter of the "mysteries of evil" in the underworld, the penetrating psychology and the historical insight of "Nero," the vision of the last judgment in "The Christian Captives," Margaret's passion in "Palicio."

And now there is "The Testament of Beauty." It is much to be hoped that one effect of that noble poem will be to set people reading Bridges all through. They will then discern that, besides the lyrics, and the poems and plays I have already mentioned, he is the author of two of the most enchanting masterpieces in the whole body of English poetry—"Eros and Psyche" and "Achilles in Scyros."

ALFRED AUSTIN

A Laureate who was not a Poet

By
T. Earle Welby

IT was the unluckiest day of his life when Alfred Austin was made Poet Laureate.

Forget that he held that position, and as Tennyson's successor, and he will appear no worse than a good many contemporaries who busied themselves with poetry without being poets. He was no fool: Mudford, of the Standard, was not an editor to establish a fool as his principal leader-writer; Lord Salisbury was not the statesman to take counsel with the undiscerning; Courthope was not the sort of critic to share his editorship of the National Review with a colleague devoid of literary judgment. Even his verse was not always contemptible. On rare occasion he could write a lyric in such tolerable imitation of the Elizabethans as:

> "When logs about the house are stacked,
> And next year's hose is knit,
> And tales are told and jokes are cracked,
> And faggots blaze and spit,
> Death sits down in the ingle-nook,
> Sits down and does not speak:
> But he puts his arm round the maid that's warm,
> And she tingles in the cheek."

Now and then he could produce a rather good image, as in his sonnet on returning to the rigours of the English climate:

> "Amazonian March, with breast half bare,
> And sleety arrows whistling through the air,
> Will be my welcome from that burly land."

He wrote another sonnet:

> "Now on the summit of Love's topmost peak > Kiss we and part; no farther can we go ..."

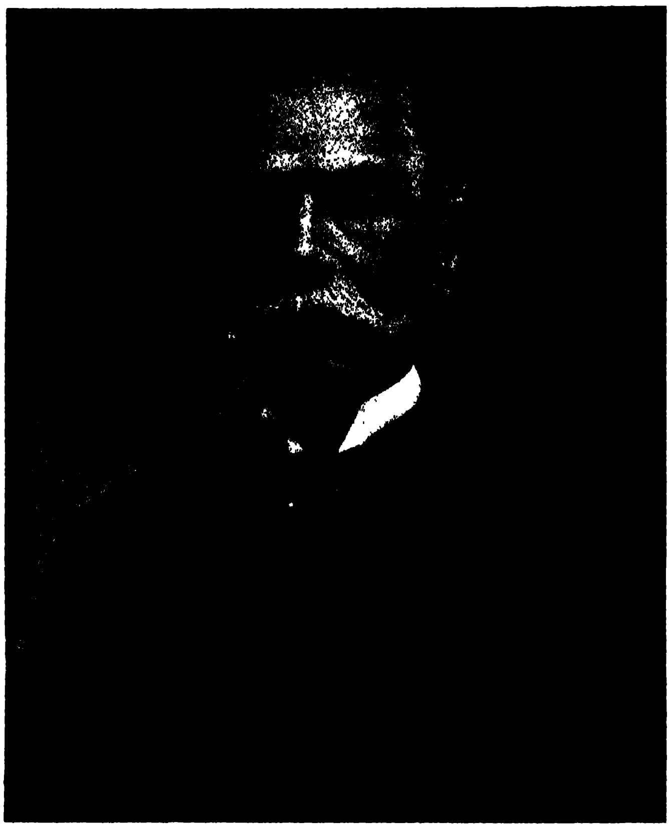
which has an idea, and some feeling, and a respectable level of expression maintained throughout. There is some fresh observation in certain of his pieces on the country-side.

But the pieces which have a measure of such secondary merits are not numerous; the pieces in which he humourlessly collapses, once or oftener, constitute perhaps nine-tenths of his work; and, most damaging consideration of all, not one thing that he wrote has the primary merit without which the secondary are of no avail.

He wrote a good deal in prose about the principles of poetry, winning the approval of John Addington Symonds, and in his remarks on individual poets there was sometimes a certain shrewdness, as in his complaint that Tennyson was rather too feminine in some of his moods. But his efforts in verse show clearly enough that he never understood the vital truth about poetry.



"All the rest is literature," said Verlaine, relegating to that category everything in verse which is not magical. The Alfred Austins of every age assume that the expression, with some literary merit, of untransmuted feeling can be poetry. It cannot. As a man, the poet has the same feelings, though it be in an intensity not many of us know, as all of us. The merely literary merits of his direct expression of them differ only in degree, not in kind, from those of any capable craftsman in words. What differentiates him is the "shaping spirit of imagination," the power of transmuting his matter, so that we shall have in the result not the original matter but—what shall I say?—the animating idea of it, the reflection of it in some celestial mirror, not the beautiful thing as it was but eternal beauty manifest in it ephemerally.

In Alfred Austin there is statement, sometimes competent enough in a merely literary way, but never is there evocation. Though too facile, he was not unaware of the value of some minor methods of pleasing the ear, and once pointed out to the touchy but in this instance acquiescing Tennyson that there was a too close approximation of the same vowel in "lion" and "nigher," in:

> "Slowly comes a hungry people, as a lion creeping nigher > Glares at one that nods and winks behind a slowly dying fire."

But he never understood that the words of poetry, in the admirable phrase of Joubert, must vibrate and leave endless undulations behind them. Music, in the fine sense, not merely in the sense of avoiding ugly or monotonous sounds; colour; perfume: in these he was utterly lacking.

Portrait by Elliott & Fry. Alfred Austin, 1893.

And then there was his utter lack of humour. Oscar Wilde once made enormous fun of Alfred Austin's Utopia in which culture would be made compatible with part-time menial work:

> "Anon, a broad-browed poet, dragging
> A load of logs along. . . ."

Wilde's wit played upon the fact that the log-rolling poet, far from being a dream of the blessed future, was a reality of the depressing present. Oddly, he missed the folly of putting "Anon," a poet well represented in the anthologies, in that context. The whole poem is an unconscious joke; Alfred Austin remained so unalive to its absurdity that, having written it in 1863, he revised it in 1889, and proudly reproduced it in his autobiography in 1910. Of more notorious plunges into bathos it is needless to write: they are kept in loving memory by all of us, together with the worst of Wordsworth's, of Coventry Patmore's, and of others who, unlike Alfred Austin, were poets. But even there Alfred Austin cannot be given inverted eminence, for he is but an Icarus without wings.

ALFRED TENNYSON IN YOUTH

The Man Behind the Legend

By
Hugh I'A. Fausset

THE publication a year ago of Tennyson's early play, "The Devil and the Lady," has added considerably to our knowledge of the boy who grew up in the Somersby rectory. His precocity as a writer of verse was indeed recorded in his son's "Memoir" which told us that the young Alfred was only eight when he covered a slate on two sides with Thomsonian blank verse in praise of flowers, and that at twelve he composed an epic poem of five thousand octosyllabic lines in the manner of Sir Walter Scott. But the short quotation which was all that was previously known of a play written at fourteen gave no idea of the remarkable quality of this precocity. And now that we have the whole play to study, perhaps what surprises us most is not the astonishing talent for versification which it reveals in a boy of fourteen, the extraordinary variety of knowledge, gleaned from his father's library, or the foretastes of the mature poet, but the unguarded glimpses which it affords of a side of Tennyson's personality that was too soon to be concealed and suppressed.

Something doubtless of the frankness and gusto of this play was an echo of his reading in Elizabethan drama, but it is well known that to the end of his life there survived beneath the recoiling sensibility, fastidiousness and moral dignity which he showed to the world, a rougher and more primitive strain. And the vigorous vitality, the broad humour and Rabelaisian invective of this early play, though mixed with much that is imitative and at times frankly schoolboyish, express a side of his nature which was never, in his poetry at least, to appear openly again.

Doubtless it is useless to inquire whether the climate of his age or some obscure revulsion in himself was responsible for this singular suppression. But I believe that the two most pronounced qualities of his early poetry and to some extent his whole development as a poet are traceable to it, and that this play does help not a little, as his grandson suggests, to solve the enigma of Tennyson the man.

It is still believed by many that the young Tennyson was a purely lyrical poet, an exquisite embroiderer of words, who gradually became preoccupied with religious, moral and social problems, and particularly with that conflict between faith and doubt which shook his age to its foundations. But no one who reads his early poetry with an open mind can continue to hold that view for a moment. Even in "The Devil and the Lady" we find the boy of fourteen beginning to ask those questions of life, concerning the place of man in the universe, the relation of mind to matter and of body to spirit, which he was to continue uneasily to ask and answer to the end of his days.

But in the poems which appeared seven years later, his first important publication, this inner questioning has so eaten into the instinctive confidence of youth that hardly a trace of the earlier exuberance, vigour and frankness remains. Instead we find a poet whose persistent mood is one of morbid distress and melancholy, which finds implicit expression and so relief in the melodiously exotic music of such poems as "Claribel," "Mariana," "The Ballad of Oriana" or "A spirit haunts the year's last hours," or is explicitly and almost hysterically proclaimed in "Ode to Memory" or "Supposed Confessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind." Indeed, there is nowhere in his work, unless it be in "The Two Voices," a clearer statement than in this latter poem of that strange malaise which seems to have attacked Tennyson in late adolescence and which clung to him throughout his life despite all his later attempts to conceal it under moral affirmations or to cure it by domestic attachments.

Alfred Tennyson, 1838.
By Samuel Laurence.

Between the age of fourteen and twenty-one the fear of physical death and of physical life seems to have awoken in him with a disabling intensity, and with it a doubt of God, not only as he had been taught to regard Him, but as a determining and sustaining reality in himself. Thus in "Confessions of a Sensitive Mind" we find him writing:

"How sweet to have a common faith!
To hold a common scorn of death!"

And far from looking forward with adventuring eyes, as he stands on the threshold of life, his "gloomed fancy" recoils from a future so uncertain and insecure.

"Thrice happy state again to be
The trustful infant on the knee!
Who lets his rosy fingers play
About his mother's neck and knows
Nothing beyond his mother's eyes."

"Oh! wherefore," he cries,

"... do we grow awry
From roots which strike so deep?"

And although he rejects the comfort of traditional belief and claims

"... man's privilege to doubt,
If so be that from doubt at length,
Truth may stand forth unmoved of change,

the concluding lines of the poem,

"O weary life! O weary death!
O spirit and heart made desolate!
O damned vacillating state!"

show how little positive satisfaction doubt has brought him. If this were the only poem which provided evidence of the young Tennyson's subjective disorder, it might reasonably be argued that we were confusing an imaginary with a personal confession. But the truth is that almost all the poems in this 1830 volume confirm its evidence and show too that his neuroticism was conditioned not only by mental doubt but by a curious instinctive shrinking. This handsome, haughty, and swarthy young giant had developed a "double nature." An exquisite and fastidious sensibility had sapped the native certainty of boyhood and left him self-engrossed and self-divided. The sense of languor and melancholy which inevitably accompanied such a state breathes through the loveliest of his early lyrics, whether on the lips of his "Mariana" sighing

"I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

or in the autumnal chant of the year above the mouldering flowers or the jubilant pain of the dying swan. For however secretly distressing it was to stand

"... aloof from other minds
In impotence of fancied power," his detachment favoured the perfecting of a rare artistry, the exquisite shaping into melodious words of troubled moods and delicate perceptions. But if morbidity had its compensations in the realm of verbal art, while a poet who "upon himself himself did feed" could distil his feelings with a rare concentration, the recoil from life which was at the root of his unhappiness had disastrous consequences when he tried to relate himself to others and above all to women. The early poems addressed to imaginary young ladies, to Lilian,

Isabel, Mariana, Madeline, Adeline, Margaret, Rosalind, Eleänore, and Kate, betray, more clearly perhaps than any others in this 1830 volume, by the falsity both of their sentiment and sensuousness his frustrated, because introverted, creative impulse.

In his second volume which appeared three years later we find the same inward bafflement served by a more perfect art and rendered into a more dissolving music in such poems as "The Lady of Shalott," "Œnone" and "The Lotus Eaters," while in others, such as "The Palace of Art" or "The Two Voices," the sense of separation from life and inward discord, recorded in the earlier "Confessions," is more resolutely faced and defined. But no true solution of the problem is found. In "The Two Voices" there is instead only the sentimental consolation of "the sweet church bells," and the homely spectacle of church-goers to whom the poet however does not attach himself, preferring the fields and woods "so full with song"; while "The Palace of Art" ends with a revealing compromise between self-indulgent æstheticism and the discipline of the simple life:

> "So when four years were wholly finished,
> She threw her royal robes away.
> 'Make me a cottage in the vale,' she said,
> 'Where I may mourn and pray.
>
> "'Yet pull not down my palace towers, that are
> So lightly, beautifully built;
> Perchance I may return with others there
> When I have purged my guilt.'"

And in fact Tennyson never left his palace of art. But while still lodging within it he did strengthen and enrich that defensive compromise with life which was always to be for him a substitute for that true devoting of the self to life by which alone a "double nature" can recover unity. And doubtless Hallam's death in September, 1833, deepened his morbidity, removing, as it did, the one personality which drew him out of himself and infected him with something of its expansive idealism.

We can only conjecture the quality of his feeling for Hallam by the fact that it was absorbing enough to delay his marriage for nearly twenty years and by the poems which derived from it, and which include not only "In Memoriam," but the "Morte d'Arthur," "Ulysses," parts of "Tithonus" and such short lyrics as "A Farewell" and "Break, break, break." And judging by these it would seem clear that it was the deepest emotion of his life. For Hallam alive had beckoned him out of his morbid prison-house, and Hallam's death had closed its doors again. And as time softened his sense of immediate distress the two moods which memory associated with Hallam came to coalesce, the belief of his friend that > ". . . something ere the end,

> Some work of noble note, may yet be done," with that voice of inward woe and desolation, which Hallam's death had swelled to

> ". . . an agony
> Of lamentation, like a wind, that shrills
> All night in a waste land, where no one comes,
> Or hath come, since the making of the world."

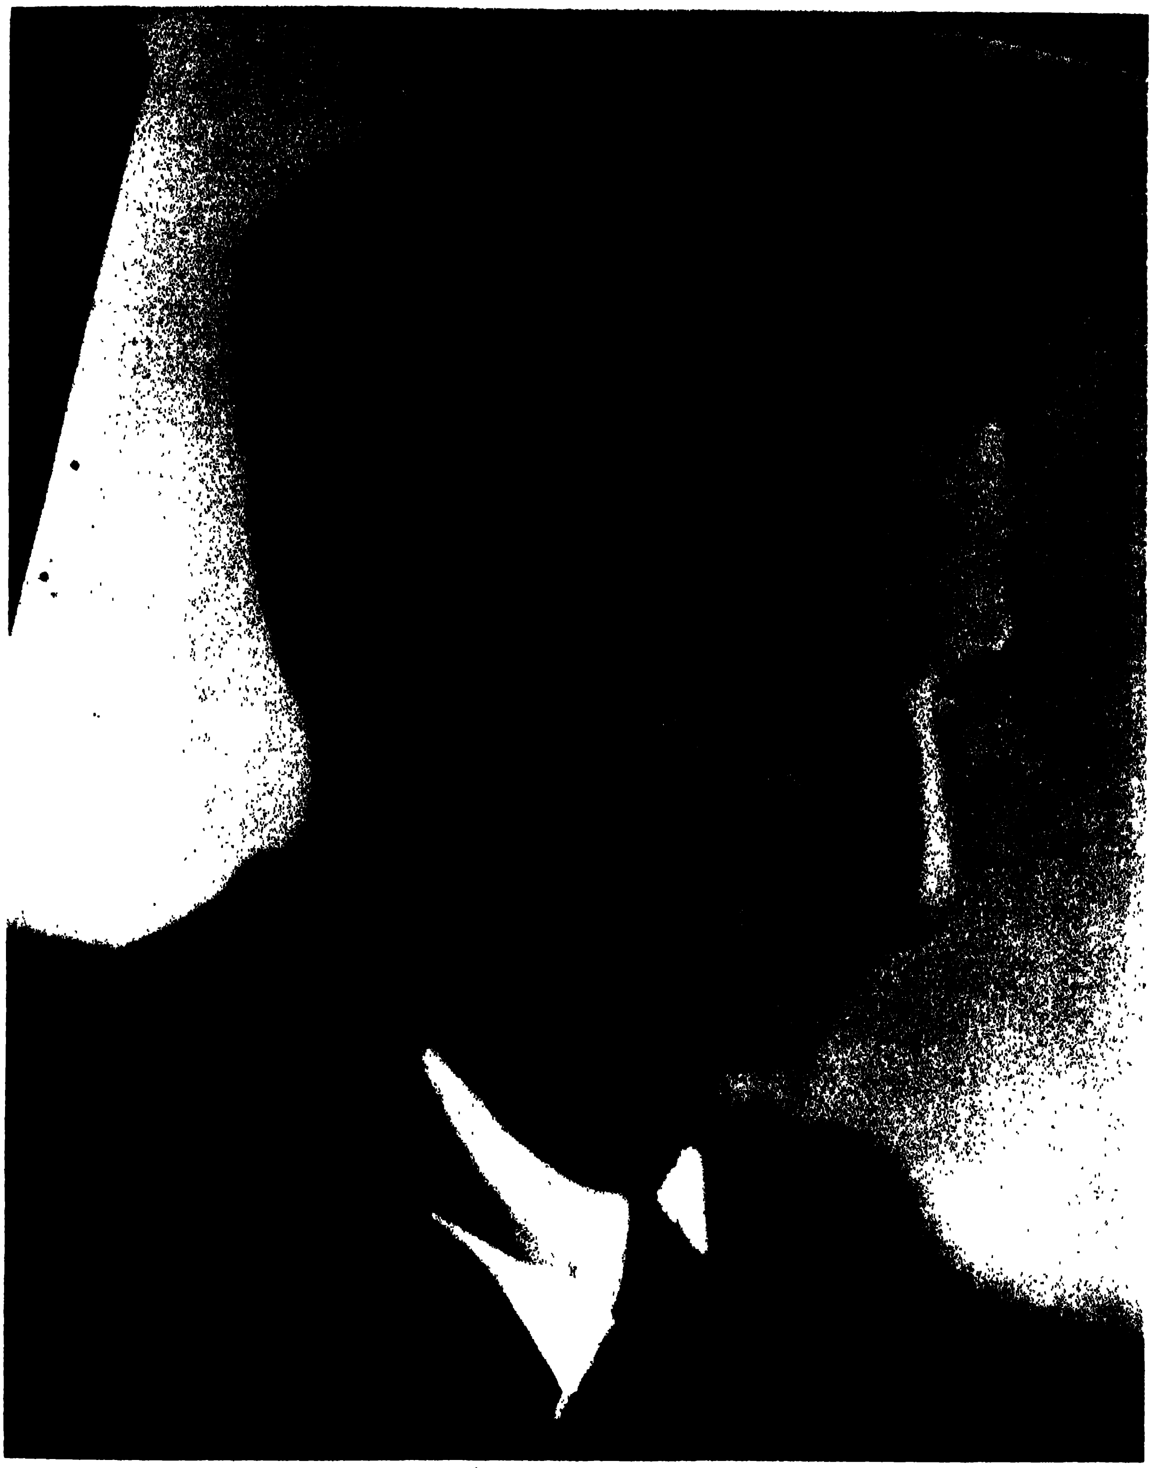
When Tennyson tried to express a man's passion for a woman, whether in "Locksley Hall" or in "Maud," or, in a more sententious vein, in "The Princess," his words rang false. In "Edwin Morris" he had excused his inability to love light-heartedly with the words:

> "It is my shyness, or my self-distrust,
> Or something of a wayward modern mind
> Dissecting passion. Time will set me right."

But Time never did set him right. It only veiled in domestic and moral sentiments his uneasy sense of abnormality and his fastidious recoil from natural instincts. And so, despite the careful compromise which he built up, he continued to be haunted by

> ". . . Some dark undercurrent woe
> That seems to draw."

And it was from this secret and indefinable pain that his most melodious and his most poignantly pondered poetry derived.



WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

The Poet's Vision and the Problems of Revolution

By
Edgar Holt

ONE of the characteristics of great poetry is its dual appeal to the intellect and the senses. The minor poet may fill you with joy by his nice arrangement of pleasant words, or may lead you to deep reflection by his comments on life and the universe. The power to do both at once—to flatter your senses at the same moment when he is wooing your mind—belongs only to the great poets. This power was possessed by Wordsworth, though he did not always use it. Often enough he was content to be a magnificent usurper of the painter's throne, to describe a flower or a landscape in words which showed them as clearly as oils or water-colours could have done. Often enough he descended to the platitudinous verse-making which was so rightly castigated by J. K. Stephen. But in those works of Wordsworth to which in 1930 the lover of great poetry returns most often, there is ample material for both emotional and intellectual satisfaction. That is why "The Prelude" and the best of the sonnets still retain their unshaken eminence in the world of letters.

At the present time their significance is possibly greater than ever. In the comfortable later years of Queen Victoria, when the tide of revolution seemed to be ebbing, Wordsworth's impressions of the French Revolution may have seemed to be of purely historical interest. But to-day, when in so many countries the captains and kings have departed, and in so many others the captains have taken the place of the kings, the reactions of a sensitive and intelligent mind during a period of revolution emerge from the soft gloom of the historical into the blinding glare of the topical. If it be true that poets are the "unacknowledged legislators of the world," may we not hope to find in great poetry a true and wise interpretation of the problems of revolution? That is a fine heritage for a poet laureate to have left to posterity.

From a camera portrait by HOWARD COSTER. SIEGFRIED SASSOON.

At the time when he paid his first visit to France, in the summer of 1790, William Wordsworth must have shown to the outside world the appearance of a fairly ordinary young man. After his boyhood and schooldays in the Lake District, where he was a pleased participant in all the games and pastimes of his school-fellows, he went to Cambridge, to pass three years in more or less dilettante fashion. Though inwardly conscious that "the Poet's soul" was with him, he "read lazily in trivial books" and made no particular mark in the academic world. In the summer vacation he was glad to go back to his north-country friends and, when occasion offered, to pass

> "The night in dancing, gaiety and mirth,
> With din of instruments and shuffling feet."

He came down from the University as an amiable youth of twenty-one, with no plans for his future; and probably no one, except his devoted sister Dorothy, had any real inkling of his future greatness. But before he came down he had laid, quite unintentionally, the foundation-stone of his greatest work. He had been to France.

William Wordsworth aged 28.
By Hancock.

That first visit was only "a march of military speed" through France on his way to Switzerland and the Italian Lakes. It was enough to show him the first stage of a revolution, and to fill his heart with fervour. In those memorable lines in "The Prelude" he has described how > "Europe at that time was thrilled with joy,

> France standing on the top of golden hours,
> And human nature seeming born again."

Triumphant looks, he tells us, were then the common language of all eyes, and armies were fretting for battle in the cause of Liberty. Twelve years later, as he walked near Calais on the road to Ardres, he looked pensively back on those far-off days; and in a sonnet to the companion of his first visit to France he dismissed the revolutionary fervour of 1790 as "the pomp of a too-credulous day."

During those twelve years Wordsworth had made the spiritual pilgrimage which gave him the material for some of the greatest poetry in the world. His revolutionary beginnings sprang naturally from his general outlook on life. The respect for human nature is implicit in all of Wordsworth's poetry—most of all perhaps in those gloomy poems about Cumberland beggars and female vagrants which he loved to compose in his early manhood. He insists that the meanest of created things cannot exist "divorced from good," and that a spirit and pulse of good are inseparably linked to every mode of being. Human nature, he thought, should be given a fair chance, and nothing was more inevitable than that the magic words of liberty, equality and fraternity should capture his senses and intellect at the first assault.

At the outset, as has been frequently observed, his political philosophy had much in common with Rousseau's, and the majestic autobiography of "The Prelude" shows the development of his theories under the stress of fact. A second and longer visit to France confirmed his first opinions. "Beholding," as he has said,

> "that the best
> Ruled not, and feeling that they ought to rule,"

he could have nothing but joy in a revolution which allowed the common people to rise from the depths, fresh as the morning star. In France, though he met and talked with royalists, he remained a revolutionary, and back in England he consorted with Godwin and his circle and defended his French brothers with eager pen.

For a few years his faith lasted; but as the French Revolution got into its stride, Wordsworth began to realise that this was not at all what he meant. With aching heart he watched the callous leaders, who

> "with clumsy desperation brought
> A river of Blood, and preached that nothing else
> Could cleanse the Augean stables."

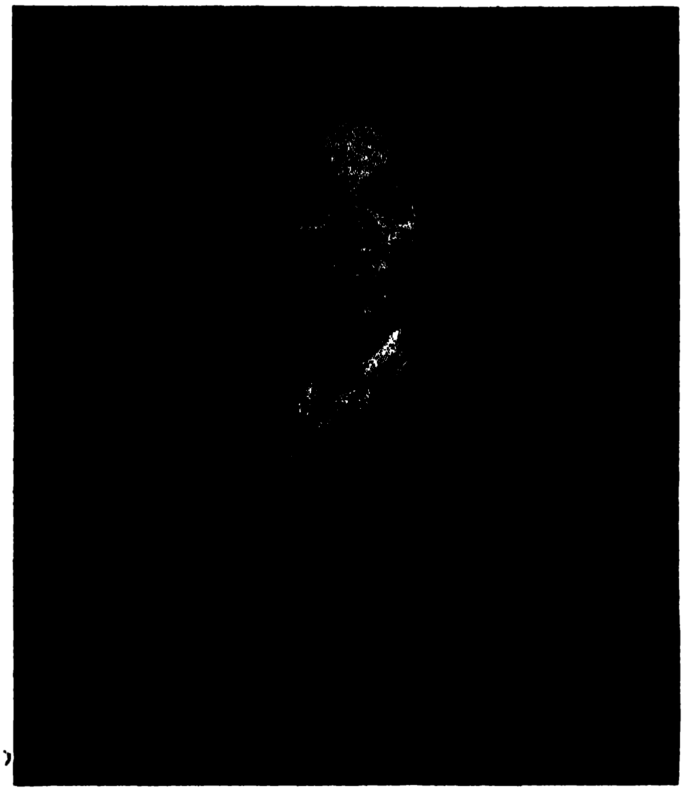
He watched the coming of Bonaparte, and in a bitter passage he described how the sun of revolution, which had risen in splendour, set like an opera phantom. And in the end his heart turned from France to his own country, where freedom still existed.

Perhaps the real plot of "The Prelude" is Wordsworth's discovery of freedom. He began, as he shows us, with the idea that freedom can be achieved by a revolutionary coup; he ended with the realisation that genuine liberty is inward and spiritual freedom. He was too fond of humanity to be a good revolutionary, and he saw that bloodshed and despotism were the results of the violent changes which he had once admired.

He had gone past them. Without a poet's vision to enlighten them, the revolutionaries were still floundering in the darkness, and many of them are floundering there to-day. But Wordsworth has passed on, to become the laureate of humanity, instead of the laureate of some small political creed, and to prepare for the world his majestic song of revolution and a poet's mind.

LAPSES OF THE EARLY LAUREATES

Some Masters of Bathos from Shadwell to Pye



By Geoffrey Grigson

If Mr. Masefield, with the Lays still fresh upon his forehead, ever considers those other heads whom they have adorned, and some of the limping, leering, sycophantic dough-like lumps of verse kneaded inside them, he may well square his shoulders and, without any pharisaical taint, thank Heaven that he is a better man than most of his predecessors.

As an officially recognised office, the laureateship has existed for two hundred and sixty-two years, and has been held by three or four of the worst poets who ever wormed their way into biographical dictionaries. With Dryden the laureateship at least began well. The butt of sack and stipend demanded of him no formal duties. They demanded none of Shadwell and Tate, though both proved obedient machines on state occasions, and pointed the way to a sorry change. Shadwell (Dryden's Og) may have been a fair dramatist, but as a poet he could sink to the bathos of the famous couplet in a poem written to welcome his sovereign back from the Battle of the Boyne (in which he had received a slight wound):

> " But Heav'n of you took > such peculiar Care
> That soon the Royal Breach
> It did repair," and I have found another quotable couplet of his in the earlier poem congratulating Queen Mary upon her arrival in England:

John Dryden.

> " Our ador'd Princess to Batavians lent,
> Is home to us with mighty Interest sent "

—the interest, of course, being the victim of the Royal Breach.

Tate we have better reason to remember for the libretto to Purcell's delightful " Dido and Æneas " and his carol, " While shepherds watched their flocks by night." As a poet he was not altogether negligible. He was little better or worse, in fact, than others of his century who knew the value of panegyric to dead or living.

> " August Britannia in that dismal Hour,
> Half-blushing saw Her gen'rous Lion low'r.
> He now lies grov'ling, whose once awful Roar
> Struck Terror to the World's remotest shore."

So, a little oddly, if bursting with sad patriotism, he wrote in his memorial poem on Queen Anne. It does not unfairly represent his poetical prowess whenever he tried to be highly serious or topical.

With George I and Nicholas Rowe, a decent fellow of dignity and parts, the Laureateship started on its slide down Parnassus to the abyss. It was not altogether Rowe's fault, but while he was Laureate it first became the Laureate's duty to labour for his pittance, to turn out automatically an ode for the New Year and another for the King's birthday. Rowe did them well enough, if dully (how else could they be done ?), but till the custom lapsed in Southey's time, these odes brought on the office more and more ridicule.

Eusden was the first butt; which was not unnatural, seeing that this obscure parson with a taste for strong ale was able calmly to compare George I with Julius Cæsar and Moses. It was usual for the odes to be set by the Master of the King's Musick (the post now held by Sir Edward Elgar) and then sung at the State Drawing-rooms, a proceeding which happily drowned the words. Perhaps it is comforting to think that the worst poetry ever written by laureates was written for some of the worst kings.

Eusden's ode for 1721 relates the story of a nimble Druid who sprang from the hallow'd Grove the very second that Cæsar landed in Kent, and foretold, not only the fatal Ides but the coming of George:

> " In revolving Years, believe > me, > (Heroe ! I will not deceive > thee)
> From distant, German
> Climes, shall rise
> A Heroe, more than Julius > wise,
> More Good, more Prais'd, > more truly Great,
> Courted to sway BRITANNIA'S State:
> Such are the fix'd Decrees > of Fate.
> The Priest, the Bard, the > Prophet then withdrew
> And to the thickest Sylvan
> Covert flew."

And when George died, he indited a poem to his sacred memory:

> " Yet fell not BRUNSWIC on > Barbarian Plains,
> But, in the Confines of his > own Domains,
> Calm, as he reign'd, expir'd :—so Moses spy'd
> The promis'd Land, and > bow'd his Head, and > dy d."

His prompt address to the new Queen Caroline has a startling apostrophe of her virtue:

> " Thou, by a Conduct regularly nice,
> Hast rais'd a Blush, unknown before to Vice."

I should add that 1930 has seen the bicentenary of Eusden's death. It was, alas, one of the few bicentenaries that the world disregarded. As a crowning insult a ticket I sent in at the British Museum the day before the centenary in search of the one volume which contains most of Eusden's verse, returned with the legend "mislaid." It may not be found again in six months or six years.

With King Colley, who held the Dunce's throne, it is not surprising that Eusden figured among Pope's Sons of Dullness, whose

> " Maggots half-form'd, in rhyme exactly meet
> And learn to crawl upon poetic feet."

But he never had such hot fire to withstand as Colley, who stood out as a man of some ability and fame. Still Cibber's odes are dreadful; and I must quote the chorus of his Birthday Ode for 1732 for the sake of the parody which followed it in the " Grub Street Journal."

> " His realms around
> Diffuse the sound
> From ports to fleets the jovial cannon play,
> 'Till ev'ry peaceful shoar
> Receives the rolling roar
> And joins the joy that crowns the day."

And then the parody:

> " Gin shops around
> Diffuse the sound !
> From cells to garrets stun us with the noise.
> Shake, shock and rend the shoar,
> . Revive the rolling roar !
> And halloo laureate C——r, boys."

When Cibber died the graph of merit nearly leapt up. The laurel crown was offered to Gray. It was offered moreover without the need of writing odes, but Gray would have none of it. "The office," he wrote to his friend Mason, "has always humbled the possessor hitherto; if he were a poor writer, by making him more conspicuous; and if he were a good one, by setting him at war with the little fry of his own profession; for there are poets little enough even to envy a poet laureate." And so it went to Whitehead.

The Lord Chamberlain might have done worse. Whitehead has written a readable poem or two, particularly "The Enthusiast," and if he had no sense of humour he was officially a cut above Cibber and Eusden.

After Whitehead, Thomas Warton; and for a time the laureateship struggled out of the lowlands of Parnassus which Whitehead had reached. But Gray was right. The office humbled its possessor: the odes still had to be written, and Warton, scholar and true poet, brayed them out in the usual style and with the usual consequences.

To see a decent poet wallowing in the mud is no pleasant sight. Let us spare him quotation and remember that ladling out praise to the Georges was never the easiest or most enviable task for an honest man. It demanded priming with much more sack than the Lord Steward provided.

No sack, not even an Atlantic of sack, would have livened up Warton's successor, Henry James Pye, country squire, M.P., J.P., a gentleman of private means, impeccable virtue, and invincible stupidity, yet a laureate who deserves the curses as well as the commiseration of his successors.

Though no teetotaller, he petitioned with success that the butt of sack should be commuted in money: and so it continues to the present day, Mr. Masefield drawing his annual £27 in lieu of wine from the Lord Steward as well as his stipend of £72 from the Lord Chamberlain.

"Poetical Pye" deserved all he got. Nothing daunted him: he wrote on and on. Some of his works were excellent. His "Universal Sportsman's Dictionary" went into many editions and so did his "Summary of the Duties of a Justice of the Peace"; but his poetry rolled out an ugly, oily, unending stream of bathos. His formal odes (and the universal ridicule poured on them led at last to the abolition of New Year and Birthday odes when the laureateship at last began to rise under Southey) are well enough represented by a Birthday Ode parody:

> "Hail, all hail, thou natal day,
> Hail the very half-hour, I say
> On which great GEORGE was born!
> Tho' scarcely fledg'd I'll try my wing,—
> And tho' alas, I cannot sing,
> I'll crow on this illustrious morn!"

His verse includes "Alfred, an Epic Poem in Six Books," and better (or worse) still, "Naucratia; or Naval Dominion," which was published in 1798 with a dedication to George III. This poem starts with the first rude savage who accidentally bestrode a log and ends with Britannia ruling the waves with all her matronly vigour. A perusal even of the analysis of each part might well have brought attacks of madness on George. There is much that is peculiarly Pyeish and naïve about the analysis to Part III:

> "Voyages of discovery by order of his present Majesty—Cook—French Revolution—Destruction of French Marine—Victory of Lord Howe—Victory of Lord St. Vincent—Apostrophe to Commerce and Peace—Danger of relaxing military exertion—Carthage and Rome—France and England—Comparison between naval and internal strength—Character of British seamen—Coast navigation one of their chief nurseries—Danger of canal navigation interfering with it—Canal by seaside, near Southampton—Naval Mutiny—Lord Duncan's victory—Onslow—Burgess—Contributions for the widows and orphans of the slain—Inequality of the verse to the subject—Naval Songs—Conclusion."

Still, Pye had a distinction and an opportunity offered to no laureate since Nahum Tate—one of his New Years began a New Century. He sat and chewed his quill until it scratched out the sonorous but obvious opening of "Carmen Sæculure for the Year 1800":

> "Incessant down the stream of Time
> And days, and years, and ages roll,
> Speeding through Error's iron clime
> To dark Oblivion's goal."

If Southey at times sank low and Austin paralleled eighteenth century absurdities, the laureateship was never again to be so humiliated. Pye above all should be a warning to those misguided folk who still think that the laureateship should be something more than an honourable sinecure, and not a kind of poet's O.M. for past rather than future services.

Pope's Introduction to Dryden.
By Eyre Crowe.

They Have Written . . .

THE RIGHT WRONG THING

Conan Doyle and the Spirit of the Nineties

By
Collin Brooks

In " Rewards and Fairies " there is a story which displays Rudyard Kipling in the mood, but not the manner, of Thomas Hardy—much concerned with the irony of human judgments. It is called " The Wrong Thing," and tells of the knighthood which was bestowed upon Hal o' the Draft by a parsimonious king blind to the true merit and significance of the artist. One imagined, when the tale was new, that the emotion which filled Hal o' the Draft had also filled his creator, for the reward of popularity which came to Kipling came not from the work in which was shown his dearest artistry. Be that as it may, it is certain that to the day of his death Arthur Conan Doyle knew the emotion, for he held that the accolade of public acclaim, which had been his from the earliest days of " Sherlock Holmes," had obscured in the public mind his real right to appreciation. He was honoured for Sherlock Holmes; and those greater literary works which he himself held in honour received but a passing tribute from an occasional reader of discernment. He might have taken heart at the error, for the public was not wholly wrong in its judgment. Sherlock Holmes was not the wrong thing: it was the right thing acclaimed for the wrong reasons, or, as Henry James might have said had Doyle been one of his fictional creations, it was " the right wrong thing."

Photo by E. O. Hoppé. Sir A. Conan Doyle in his Study.

Divers men in diverse places—" myself not least "—have borne testimony that for them and their generation the eighteen nineties, that renaissance period of English fiction, is typified not by the languishing æsthetics of Wilde and not by the vigorous jingoism of Henley, but by Mister Sherlock Holmes " bowling down Baker Street in a hansom cab." The characteristic organ of that time was not the " Yellow Book " or the National Observer, but the Strand Magazine. The memorable creation was not Lord Ormont, or Jude, or " the Woman Who Did," but Sherlock Holmes. The dominating public figure was not Gladstone with his collars and frenzies, Chamberlain with his orchid and his monocle, Balfour with his soulful droop, or Salisbury with his massive head, but Holmes with his deer-stalker, his pipe, his dressing-gown and his hypodermic syringe. It was the supreme merit of Doyle's craftsmanship that with great economy he gave such reality to his creation that the personality became of more importance than the plots of which he was the pivot.

With no other man, of flesh or of fiction, has the public so intimate an acquaintance. The eccentric habits, like that of pinning correspondence to a mantelshelf by a jack-knife and that of keeping tobacco in the heel of a turkish slipper; the change of pipe or garb to suit a change of mood, the black clay for introspection and the cherrywood for disputation, the mouse-coloured gown for Baker Street and the large blue gown when a case took him from home; the love of German music and the refutation of Watson's charge of lack of culture by the apt quotations from Taine and George Sand and Winwood Reade; the odd form of wit, which is known now to the elect as Sherlockisimuss; the asperity with stupidity and the delight in a showman's dénouement—our knowledge of these phases of his character make him as real as Samuel Johnson and more fully known than many an historical personage enshrined for us in massive biographies and a small library of memoirs.

But it was not for this economy in creation that Doyle deserved the adulation which was bestowed upon Holmes. He was not alone among his contemporaries in that apt craftsmanship, for we know Captain the Reverend Sir Owen Kettle almost as intimately as we know Holmes. The thing for which Doyle deserved appreciation—the right thing—can best be expressed by saying that while his contemporaries compared him with Gaboriau and Poe, posterity will compare him with Jane Austen. When the Holmes canon has ceased to be read as a series of character-part melodramas, it will be cherished as a valuable costume-piece.

When, as a boy, one first read Sherlock Holmes, one read as much for the plot as for the setting. A re-reading, when the plot ceases to surprise, is an excursion into interiors. There must have been a time when " Emma " was read with a sustained interest in the amorous instabilities of Frank Churchill: " Emma " to-day is read for the human scene, not as it moves, but as it is " set." We care, again, little in 1930 for the happenings at Mansfield Park, but we care much for the places and the way in which they happened. So, in time, the Holmes canon will be read.

So much a child of his era was Sherlock that it comes as something as a mental shock to find him for once using a motor-car and a telephone when he is called from his Sussex retirement by topicality to befool in 1914 a German spy. Save for this startling excursion into the twentieth century, he remains essentially a representative figure of the transitional period between the mid-eighties and the late nineties. Were all other evidence destroyed, from his adventures Macaulay's New Zealander could reconstruct the kind of life that the English then lived. Those short stories that lie between the " Scandal in Bohemia " and the " Retired Colourman " might be adequate first authorities for a social history.

What do we find in them ? A Europe in a state of constant perturbation about Naval programmes—not once or twice in his rough island story does Holmes lightly wave away titles and honours after recovering treaties and plans. A world fearful of the next erratic freak of one powerful European potentate ruffled by Britain's colonial development and apt to send messages without the cognisance of his Ministers of State. A community whose swiftest mode of road travel is the cab, whose trains go at express speeds of fifty miles an hour, whose valises and gladstone-bags have not yet been outmoded by wardrobe trunks and expanding suit-cases, whose democratic admiration of aristocratic social beauties is such that professional photographers still display their lovely photographs for sale in shop windows, not foreseeing the picture post card boom of the early nineteen hundreds or the photographic processes of the twentieth century illustrated society weekly. A world of cheap prices, in which the very best hotels charge only eight shillings for a room, half a crown for breakfast, and—unbelievably—only eightpence for a glass of sherry. A business world in which the typewriter is as yet so rare that from a few flaws in alignment Holmes can deduce the personality of the possessor of any machine. A capital city which still abounds in ragamuffins but one remove in kind from the "Poor Joe" of Dickens, ragamuffins who know nothing of school-leaving ages and whose parents know nothing of a "dole." Country houses and London lodgings still illuminated by gas-jets not yet, presumbably, enhanced even by the incandescent mantle.

All these indications of the kind of life that was lived forty years ago are there. What of the people who lived it? Society then, as we see it through the hawk-like eyes of Holmes, was dominated by a select aristocracy, very class-conscious and extremely jealous of its marital honour. Statesmen for the most part were drawn from this aristocracy, although many of them were beginning to find the resources of landed proprietors unequal to the pace set by rich manufacturers. (Lord Holdhurst, who was Secretary for Foreign Affairs and a future Prime Minister, Holmes noticed, had a struggle to keep up his position and was reduced to the plebeian economy of wearing shoes that had been resoled.) Below this first circle of the London Inferno—or was it Paradiso?—were other circles, upper-middle-class circles in which honest "cits" were blackmailed or troubled by wild sons who might steal coronets pawned to their fathers' firms for vast sums by owners unmentionably great in the land; lower-middle-class circles whose homes are described for us with the vividness of Arnold Bennett, but without his photographic detail; upper-lower-class circles in which sporting poultry dealers wore side-whiskers and spent their leisure backing horses; lower-lower-class circles which still supported the Christmas goose club and went to bed by candlelight; shabby-genteel circles which revolved round lodging-houses and the females of which sought posts as governesses because the emancipation of woman had not yet opened business and trade to them.

Each of these circles had its romantic interlopers—Mutiny veterans; millionaires whose fortunes had been founded when convict ships still sailed for Botany Bay; ex-bushrangers; gold-diggers and prospectors who had fallen foul of Mormonism, [illegible] immoral religion which was perpetually stirring [illegible] menaces to the English home; foreign gentlemen of dubious origin and still more dubious occupations. Communications were, by modern ideas, faulty. A hunted man could cross to Europe and lose himself with little difficulty. Transit across the high seas was dangerous, ships under sail were constantly and conveniently wrecked by [illegible].

The new journalism w[illegible] coming in, but the Northcliffe rates of pay had not been instituted, for while Neville St. Clair as a reporter was sent out to gather at first hand articles on begging but, even as a "stunt artist"—as we, with our graceful idiom, would call him—he could not raise twenty-five pounds when he desperately needed it, and turned professional beggar in good earnest, making two pounds a day by that work instead of two pounds a week as a star reporter. The old journalism was not yet dead, for London was not restricted to three evening papers, but had many. Holmes, wishing to publish a small advertisement, instructs his agent to use the "Globe, Star, Pall Mall, St. James's Gazette, Evening News, Standard, and any others that occur to you," giving us a total well over the half-dozen which immediately occurred to his mind.

As Jane Austen left for us pictures of a social life untroubled by railways and industrialism, so Doyle has left for our children pictures of a life untroubled by telephones and "talkies." Her quiet, sequestered country-side is matched by his cosy city. England to her had been a country garden: London to him was still a township. Both gave tone to picture by a skilful use of climate. Those showers that send her heroines tripping for shelter into linen drapers' shops, those fogs which swirl down Baker Street and draw Holmes from his test-tubes to the coal fire over which the faithful Watson is already sitting, are cunningly used contrivances to create more than a sense of physical atmosphere. Each was working in a narrow medium. She neglected Napoleon and the forerunners of the Ludditics to concentrate upon her warm interiors: he neglected Manning and the leaders of the Dock Strike, Wilde and the denizens of the Grosvenor Gallery, to concentrate upon his warm interiors. It is but an accident of form that her interiors housed men and women disturbed by nothing more serious than strained or complicated amatory relationships, while his housed men and women disturbed by material disaster and sudden death. The room into which Holmes walks from his own lodging in Baker Street may contain a corpse, whereas the room into which Sir Thomas Bertram walks will only contain a cad, but the essential point is that into each room we walk too.

Head-piece to "The Ghost of a Hansom Cab."
From "London Promenade," by W. Gaunt (Studio).

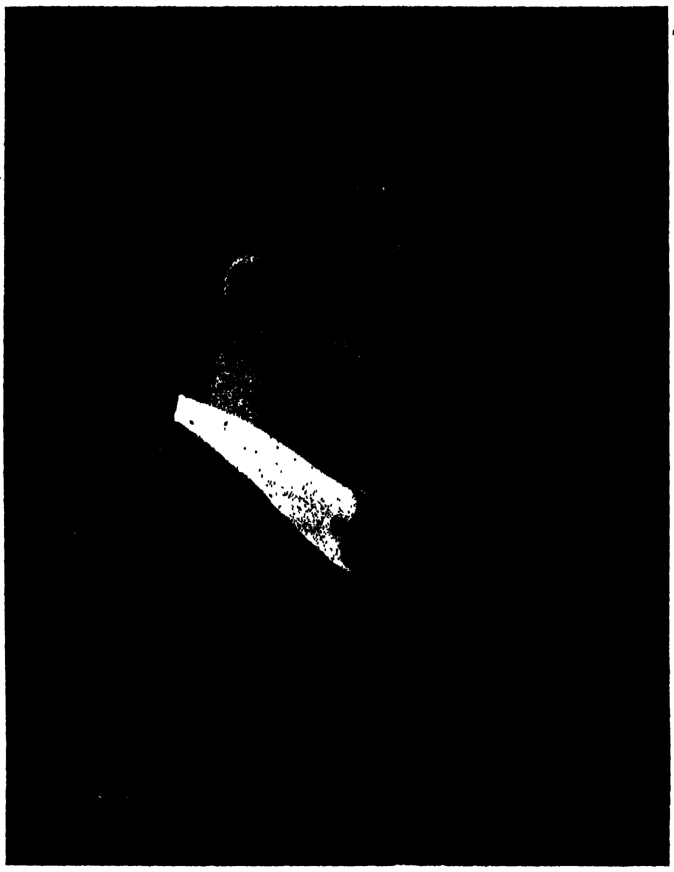
And, let it not be forgotten, the room and its occupants in each case we shall see the better because of the quiet irony of the artist who presents it. "Doyle an ironist!" the shade of Jane might cry. Aye, lady, it was my word. The Noble Bachelor; the Duke of Holdernesse; Wilhelm Gottsreich Sigismond von Ormstein, Grand Duke of Cassel-Falstein and Hereditary King of Bohemia; the Rt. Hon. Trelawney Hope, Colonel Ross, the owner of Silver Blaze—yes, and little Lestrade of the Yard—these are figures wrought by an ironist, or, if not by an ironist, by a carver of puppets who constantly forgot that the work in hand was to articulate wooden figures, because irony kept breaking in.



It is only when one compares the pictures of these two recorders that Doyle's real stature becomes apparent. The early nineteenth century interiors of Jane Austen are filled by men of feelings: the late nineteenth century interiors of Conan Doyle are dominated by a man who thinks. Jane had written for a caste which esteemed reserve and emotion: Doyle wrote for a literate democracy which ardently appreciated action and intelligence. Both, in the quietest way and as if by accident, satirised and arraigned the audiences for which they were articulate. Each held a mirror to the age, and if Doyle fashioned as his caryatid a gaunt and eccentric hero where Jane had used a group of gay and concentric heroines, the reflection was no whit less true and exact.

THE TRANSLATOR OF MARCEL PROUST

C. K. Scott-Moncrieff and his Work

By de V. Payen-Payne

In the Elizabethan age translators wrote for love of the work and to help their more ignorant fellow-countrymen. North's translation of Amyot's "Plutarch," Florio's "Montaigne" and Urquhart and Motteux' "Rabelais" were not written solely for money. It was not until the rise of the novel that a race of translators appeared who were willing to turn out versions of foreign successes without much attention to accuracy and none at all to style. These hacks undercut one another to such an extent that it became possible to get a long novel translated for as little as £20. It is not to be wondered at that the translation was often a woeful parody of the original. One classic instance of mistranslation was when the French word for pork-butcher (charcutier) was rendered as "char-cutter."

C. K. Scott-Moncrieff.

There were, it is true, even in Victorian times, well-known authors who were experienced in foreign tongues. The names of Swinburne, Meredith and Andrew Lang at once occur to one's mind; while John Payne's translations from many languages were renowned. The majority of French novels, even those of Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas père, Mérimée, Sand and Gautier, were but poorly presented to the non-French reading public. When Ernest Vizetelly attempted to present Zola in all his stark coarseness to an English audience, he was promptly clapped into jail. But the hectic nineties did lead to an increased interest in French literature; two publishers H. S. Nichols and Leonard Smithers, produced many translations of memoirs and novels, among them those of the Lutetian Society, to which Ernest Dowson, Arthur Symons and Teixeira de Mattos contributed.

This greater interest in accurate translation was partly due to the better methods of teaching introduced after the foundation of the Modern Language Association in 1893. A public was created who could appreciate good work. But it was the alliance with France during the Great War that brought home to five million Englishmen the fact that French merited more attention, and this gave an impetus to the work of a new race of translators. Of these Charles Kenneth Scott-Moncrieff was one of the most capable and industrious. But he did not stand alone; the names of Richard Aldington, V. B. Holland, J. Lewis May, R. S. Garnett, H. Wynne Finch and Hamish Miles among others must not be forgotten.

Scott-Moncrieff was born in 1889, descended from a distinguished Scots family; early he showed the promise of intellectual eminence by winning the blue riband of a Winchester scholarship. Subsequently he went to Edinburgh University, where he came under the influence of George Saintsbury, at that time Professor of English. Scott-Moncrieff took a first in English shortly before the War broke out. He obtained a commission in the K.O.S.B., and in 1917, at Monchy-le-Preux, he was severely wounded in the foot, received the M.C. and was transferred to G.H.Q. In July, 1920, he became private secretary to Lord Northcliffe and later joined the editorial staff of The Times, from which he resigned in 1923 to devote himself to literary work.

His first book had been published in 1919; it was a translation of the "Song of Roland," with an introduction by G. K. Chesterton and a note on technique by his former professor, Saintsbury. He attempted to reproduce line for line the old French epic. He followed this in 1921 by a translation of "Beowulf," to which Lord Northcliffe furnished an introduction. But these were but first attempts in an art in which he was to prove a master.

Since 1903 a wealthy asthmatic, the son of a French doctor and a Jewish mother, decided to write a long work on the fashionable world of the Third Republic in France, the life history of a social climber, which might rival Balzac's "Comédie Humaine." Marcel Proust shut himself up in his flat at 102, Boulevard Haussmann, with his faithful servant, Céleste, and wrote all night the vast book he called "A la recherche du Temps Perdu." Anything less like the classic clarity of French prose had never before appeared in France. Its long unwieldy sentences, its countless metaphors, its enormous parentheses made it difficult reading even for the French, and still more so for the foreigner. Proust had published the first two volumes, "Du Côté de Chez Swann," in 1913 at his own expense, and although he had just finished the tenth and last volume when he died in 1922, yet only six volumes had been published.

The very difficulty of his prose, and the corrupt state of his text, written by a dying man in bed in a series of note-books, began to attract the literary public. Paul Souday, that sound critic, was one of the first to praise him in Le Temps. For as Guy de Maupassant well said in his "Mont Oriol": "Les vrais lettrés n'aiment que les livres artistes incompréhensibles pour les autres." Whether Proust's work will prove immortal as literature it is impossible to prophesy, but his marvellously vivid recollections of his childhood should make it live. As a work of reference for the period it will always be consulted by future historians, and form a mine of information as do Pepys and Saint-Simon.

Scott-Moncrieff had been attracted by Proust since 1920, and decided to translate him. The enormous effort necessary to translate ten volumes of intricate psychological analysis can be realised only by those who have read Proust and attempted to translate easier works. To discover the exact equivalents of Proust's technical phrases and slang expressions, Scott-Moncrieff would take infinite trouble and apply to any friends he thought might help him. He usually had a bundle of text or proofs in his pocket. In 1922 were published the two volumes of "Swann's Way," which met with a chorus of praise from all capable of judging such work.

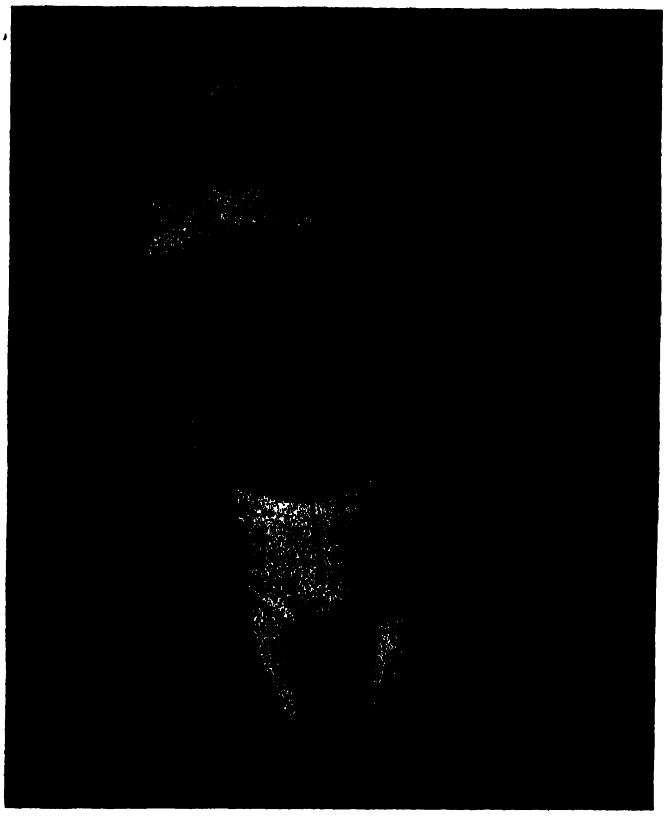
For eight years Scott-Moncrieff continued his work. "Within a Budding Grove" appeared in 1924, "The Guermantes Way" in 1925, "The Cities of the Plain" and "The Captive" in 1929, and "The Sweet Cheat Gone" (a delightful title for "Albertine Disparue") in 1930. He had just finished correcting the proofs of this last volume, but had not time to write a translator's prefatory note before he died in Rome on February 28th, 1930.

In his note to "The Captive" he gives examples of the corrupt state of Proust's text, in which there are not only the usual printers' errors and mistakes of Proust himself, but also transposition of whole sentences and paragraphs; so that the translator in many cases had to rewrite the French text as the author himself would have done, had he lived to see his later volumes in proof. The result is that the translation is a more beautiful piece of work than the original—a book unique in literature.

In addition to his main work, which will prove a touchstone for future generations, Scott-Moncrieff translated the thirteenth century "Letters of Abelard and Heloïse," Stendhal's "La Chartreuse de Parme" and "Armance," J. R. Bloch's "Et Cie" and two novels of Pirandello, "Shoot" and "The Old and the Young." He would have done better to turn to German than Italian, in view of the huge circulation of certain post-war books; but in 1925 he moved to Pisa in order to get quiet for his work, and he was attracted to the Italian dramatist.



He possessed a most engaging personality, he made friends wherever he went and was always willing to act as cicerone to those who visited him in Italy. When in London he was usually to be found in the congenial atmosphere of the Savile Club. His knowledge was vast, his kindness and charity unbounded. In fine a choice spirit who has passed away too soon and at the height of his powers.

D. H. LAWRENCE

The Last of the Puritans

By
Hugh Ross Williamson

It is a depressing thought that most great writers have to die in order to be appreciated. It is more depressing that, in many cases, death merely increases confusion. Since D. H. Lawrence's death, the inevitable pious memorials have been raised by a literary world anxious to make amends for the neglect and hostility and half-hearted patronage which were his portion during life. The pendulum has swung to the other extreme. The people who have never read his works are now as loud in praise as formerly they were in condemnation. Lawrence is being "excused" and "explained"—excused for views he never held or explained in terms he would have rejected. And those of us who care for his work and believe him to be one of the most significant creative writers of the century, have to wait with what patience we can muster for the time when his name shall cease to be a rallying-cry for irrelevant prejudices, so that we may soberly assert his true worth without the certainty of being misunderstood—a time when we can admit that he wrote much hastily and badly, much foolishly and deplorably, without being immediately convicted by the cultured of insensitiveness and treachery; a time when we may admit that he battled for an ideal and strove desperately to translate his experience into living art, without being suspected by the mass of an unhealthy and disproportionate interest in sex. That time is not yet. No balanced and authoritative judgment is so far possible; we are too near the battle. For the moment we must content ourselves with glimpses of the man himself as shown by his friends,[1] with the first outlines of sane criticism[2] and with his superb—though unrevised and hastily finished—final novel.[3]

D. H. Lawrence, aged 21.
From "D. H. Lawrence," by Stephen Potter (Jonathan Cape).

This short article is not an attempt to assess Lawrence's importance or to expound his teaching. Conclusions on these matters can be reached only by each individual after a first-hand acquaintance with his writings. My object is merely to suggest a line of approach which has been, as far as I can discover, either neglected or repudiated by his commentators, but which in my opinion is vital to a true understanding of his position.

It is simply that D. H. Lawrence was a Puritan, in the strict sense of the term; as much and as fundamentally a Puritan as Milton and Bunyan, and Carlyle and Browning, and Ibsen and Shaw; and that the distinguishing marks of Puritanism as a creed are also the distinguishing marks of his work.

If this sounds paradoxical, that is partly because the term "Puritan" has been degraded to mean something quite different from its original significance, and partly because D. H. Lawrence's writing, with its emphasis on the physical side of life, has been vaguely confused in the popular mind with the modern decadent movement. "Puritanism" in fact recalls Stiggins, and Lawrence the sex-novelists. But it must be remembered that Cromwell, not Stiggins, is the typical Puritan, and that to associate the name of Lawrence with the contemporary "sex-novel" is as sensible as to claim that a spiritual continuity with the work of Milton is apparent in the writings of Mrs. Aphra Behn.

[1] "D. H. Lawrence." By Richard Aldington. 1s. (Chatto & Windus.)—"D. H. Lawrence." By Rebecca West. 3s. 6d. (Secker.)

[2] "D. H. Lawrence." By Stephen Potter. 5s. (Jonathan Cape.)—"D. H. Lawrence." By J. Middleton Murry. 1s. 6d. (Cambridge: Minority Press.)—"D. H. Lawrence." By F. R. Leavis. 1s. 6d. (Cambridge: Minority Press.)

[3] "The Virgin and the Gipsy." By D. H. Lawrence. 6s. (Secker.)

But before discussing in more detail what Puritanism is and what it is not, it is worth recalling a confession of Lawrence himself:

> "I think it was a good thing to be brought up a Protestant, and among Protestants a Nonconformist, and among Nonconformists a Congregationalist. Which sounds pharisaic. . . . Altogether I am grateful to my Congregational upbringing. The Congregationalists are the oldest Nonconformists, descendants of the Oliver Cromwell Independents. They still had the Puritan tradition of no ritual. But they avoided the personal emotionalism which one found among the Methodists when I was a boy.
>
> "I liked our chapel, which was tall and full of light and yet still; and colour-washed pale green and blue, with a bit of lotus pattern. And over the organ loft, 'O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness' in big letters. I don't know what the 'beauty of holiness' is exactly. It easily becomes cant or nonsense. But if you don't think about it—and why should you?—it has a magic."

There, for good or evil, are the formative influences of Lawrence's spiritual life and belief. That, in the adolescent revolt common to most intelligent men, he repudiated the narrower dogmas of his people and that, when he later forged his own personal creed, it bore few superficial resemblances to the version of Puritanism then current, in no way affect the issue. There is profound wisdom in the Jesuit saying: "Give us a child till he is seven and then do with him what you will. Lawrence was born and bred a Puritan, and a Puritan he remained till the end.

What is this Puritanism? It has many manifestations, but the root of it all, in both the religious and the political sphere, is a militant individualism—a vital belief in the personal responsibilities of each separate man and woman; a refusal to become a mechanical unit in a crowd, to pay lip-service to mob-idols and mob-ideals, to accept imposed judgments and ready-made creeds. Politically it is passionate in its demand for liberty—liberty not to take what it can but to give what it must. In that it demands freedom to serve, not freedom to steal, it differs essentially from anarchy, which is not less abhorrent to it than tyranny, and it demands rights in order to fulfil its responsibilities. It is for that reason willing to concede rights, even against itself.

No one with a knowledge of Lawrence's career will doubt that he showed this individualism in his life; no one who has read his books can fail to find its traces on every page. In his "creed" in "Studies in Classic American Literature," it is most obviously and concisely expressed:

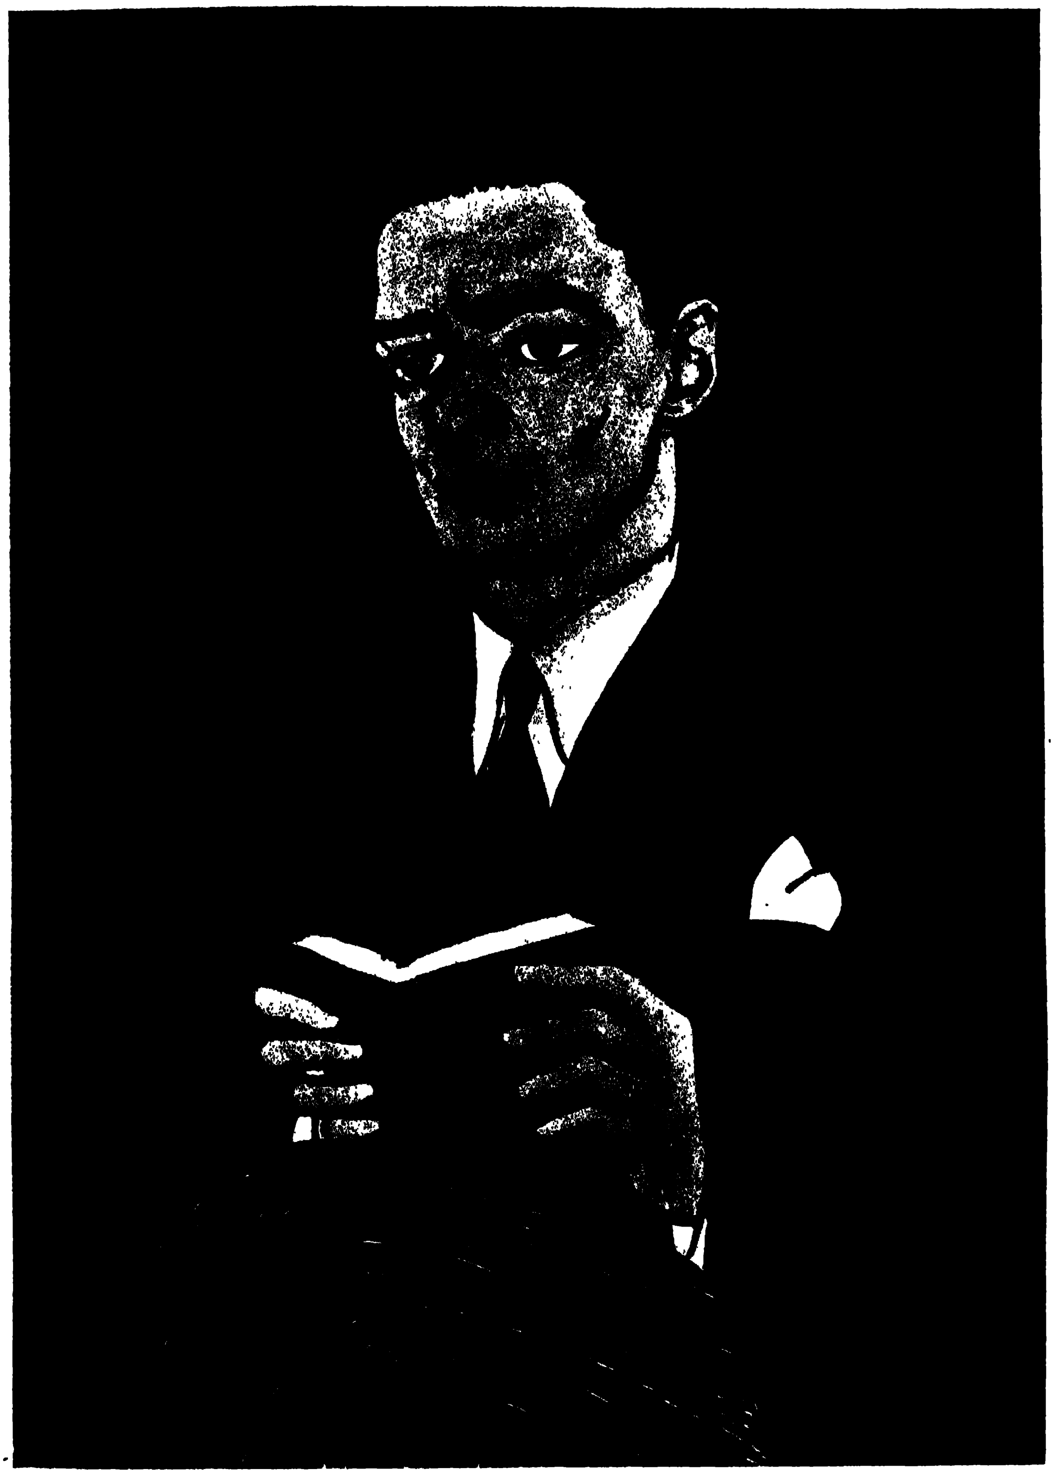
> "I am I.
>
> "I will never let mankind put anything over me, but I will try always to recognise and submit to the gods in me and the gods in other men and women."

The personal search for God, the questing for that Will to which each man must submit himself or perish, is at once the justification and the outcome of the Puritan's individualistic belief. It is the religious basis of his political principles. It is this that gives him the strength to stand alone, and saves his individualism from degenerating into a weak and foolish egoism. And this sense of dependence, of being used by a Power greater than oneself, has seldom been more finely expressed than in Lawrence's:

> "Not I, not I, but the wind that blows through me,
> A fine wind is blowing the new direction of Time
> If only I let it bear me, carry me, if only it carry me."

Whither he did not know. His novels as a whole are a record of a pilgrimage. At first hesitatingly, as if not fully conscious of what he seeks, he turns to conventional things and finds them barren. It is in "Aaron's Rod," I think, that he shows himself definitely aware of his real need and dimly perceives his goal, in "The Plumed Serpent" he reaches it. Upon the nature of his Dark God there discovered, it is not my purpose to dwell. It is sufficient to say that, rightly understood, this deity is not so far removed from that of more orthodox belief as either Lawrence or his detractors supposed. It is, at all events, a personally apprehended reality, reached only through the agony of soul of a relentlessly honest man.

This personal search for God, shared in some degree by all creeds though pre-eminently the mark of the Puritan, leads naturally to that other tenet which isolates the Puritan from every other form of religious belief—his repudiation of sacramentalism. He is the sworn opponent of the sacerdotal system, because that system is the outcome of a belief in a mechanical mass-salvation, and because it imposes limits on his liberty of search for God. To him sacramentalism is impossible also, because to him there is nothing common or unclean; there is no channel through which the final revelation may not come. And he holds therefore equally that there is nothing intrinsically uncommon, nothing magically clean. "I reckon a crow is religious when he flies across the sky." So Lawrence epitomised the anti-sacramentalism of his people.



And it is exactly in this connection that I see him most a Puritan when least suspected of it. "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is, for many reasons, a deplorable experiment. It was foredoomed to failure; the ban on it was a necessity. But the motive behind it was gallant enough, even if it was sufficiently quixotic to be almost universally misunderstood. Lawrence, the Puritan, remembered that there were certain words which, through the ages, have been condemned as both common and unclean. And he determined that it ought not to be so. He would break down this last and ultimate segregation by the might of his art. As was to be expected, he failed and the civilisation and culture of the centuries, entrenched against him, nearly broke him in revenge.

The inevitable outcry over "Lady Chatterley's Lover" was the culmination of the long campaign of misrepresentation which had continued for some time (and still persists in certain quarters) of Lawrence's attitude to sex. In reality his attitude there again was simply that of the Puritan. Puritan, not ascetic—a very different thing. Asceticism—the wilful suppression of half one's life in the supposed interest of the other half—is as far removed from Puritanism as is sacerdotalism and, like sacerdotalism, is essentially a Catholic characteristic. The Puritan admits celibacy without admiring it, believing that a man alone is a man but half fulfilling his destiny. On the other hand—and this has led to the confusion with asceticism—he is sternly set against the wanton indulgence of the flesh.

This is exactly the position of Lawrence, with his fierce, almost hysterical insistence on monogamy (Mrs. Carswell has reminded us that personally he was "without vices, with most human virtues, the husband of one wife"), and his biting scorn for pornography in literature and promiscuity in life.

Finally his whole conception of art is Puritan. "'For art's sake' alone I would not face the toil of writing another sentence." Those might have been Lawrence's words instead of Shaw's; certainly they describe perfectly his attitude. He wrote novels because he wanted to deliver a message. His art was entirely didactic, and if he had no inclination to rhapsodise over the holiness of beauty, it may have been because he understood, even better than he thought, the meaning of the "beauty of holiness." To return to Shaw: "He who has nothing to assert has no style and can have none; he who has something to assert will go as far in power of style as its momentousness and his conviction will carry him." There is the explanation of the great strength and the rugged beauty of Lawrence's art—that he was never self-consciously an artist.

I have called him "the last of the Puritans" because Shaw, though he is still writing, said all that he had to say in 1903 (ten years before the appearance of "Sons and Lovers") when, in the magnificent third act of "Man and Superman"—from whose preface I have already quoted—he restated Puritanism in the terms of this century. Lawrence is thus quite definitely Shaw's successor in the tradition, and it is impossible to see, at the moment, a successor to him. For we seem to be entering on a second Restoration period with all the vulgarity and none of the wit of the first. No Puritan offers himself for persecution, and the mob consoles itself as best it can with a company of Cowards.

From a drawing by POWYS EVANS.

T. S. ELIOT.

A Hundred Years Ago

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI (1830-1894)

By S. M. Ellis

"My castle stood of white transparent glass,
Glittering and frail with many a fretted spire,
But when the summer sunset came to pass
It kindled into fire.

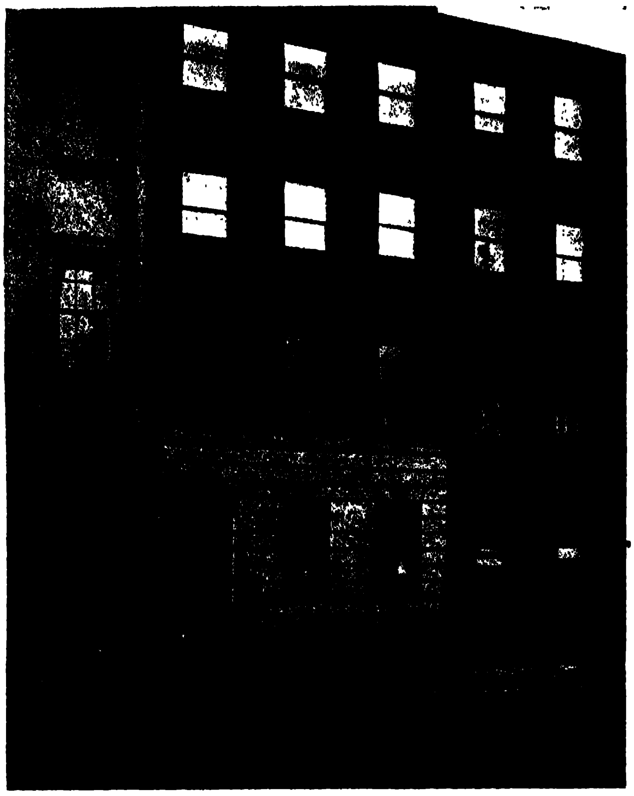
"My pleasaunce was an undulating green,
Stately with trees whose shadows slept below,
With glimpses of smooth garden-beds between
Like flame or sky of snow. . . .

"We sang our songs together by the way,
Calls and recalls and echoes of delight;
So communed we together all the day,
And so in dreams by night."

So Christina Rossetti envisaged what her life might have been: the reality never approached the dream, for her emotions and yearnings were stultified by ill-health and religious restraint, and never found expression save in lovely snatches of poetry. Fate offered her two lovers, unpicturesque and unromantic both in nature and mien: she resigned both on religious grounds, but in retrospective ecstasy the poet's dream idealised them with qualities they never possessed. And though she loved flowers and birds and scenic beauty, Christina Rossetti never lived, as a poet should, in the country. Her life passed in sombre London houses—Charlotte Street (near Portland Place); 38, Arlington Street (near Mornington Crescent); 166, Albany Street; 56, Euston Square; and finally the long eighteen years at 30, Torrington Square. In fact, eleven months spent at Frome in her youth comprised the longest period she ever was away from London. There is something deeply tragic in the thought of this (by descent) Italian girl, a poet by nature, endued with all the passion and capacity for love of her race, and with its craving for sunlight and warmth, living out her years under the grey London skies in days when London fogs were at their worst. She could only imagine early spring:

"I wonder if the sap is stirring yet,
If wintry birds are dreaming of a mate,
If frozen snowdrops feel as yet the sun
And crocus fires are kindling one by one:
Sing, robin, sing,
I still am sore in doubt concerning spring."

Dreaming of her own mate, but never to find the bold lover of youthful dreams, never to be wife and mother. The Via Dolorosa of Christina Rossetti's life can be traced in her "From House to Home," wherein earthly desires are gradually merged in spiritual resignation.



A hitherto unpublished portrait of Christina Rossetti at the age of sixteen. By Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

From "The Life of Christina Rossetti," by Mary F. Sandars (Hutchinson).

Her life in fact typifies that of the professed nun—she chants it in "The Convent Threshold," "Shut Out," [and many another sad lyric—and its record is in the main one of frustration, negation, resignation, and withered hopes straining at the last for the consolations of the Spiritual Bridegroom, as may be read in her "Advent."

The blossom of talent in one generation of the Rossetti family was in itself remarkable. Heredity and early environment had a great deal to do with the mental development of Christina, the youngest of the four children of Gabriele Rossetti, a Neapolitan exile who, settling in London, became Professor of Italian at King's College, and Frances Polidori, daughter of Gaetano Polidori, a cultured Tuscan who had been Alfieri's secretary, and sister of that eccentric Doctor Polidori, Byron's physician and author of "The Vampyre." Christina's elder sister, Maria Francesca Rossetti, the future student of Dante, was born in 1827; the elder brother, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, poet and painter, in 1828; and William Michael Rossetti, critic and biographer, in 1829. Christina Rossetti was born on December 5th, 1830, at 38, Charlotte Street, Portland Place. Her Italian descent had a near strain of English through her maternal grandmother, and the resulting use of two languages in the family circle greatly ncreased and enriched the vocabulary of the future poets. Christina quite early in youth found pleasure in romantic writers like Scott, Mrs. Radcliffe, and Maturin, and by the time she was eleven had commenced to write poetry. The first verses (that survive) were appropriately addressed " To my Mother,"[1] for to the end of this parent's life Christina was a devoted daughter. Her first " Verses " were privately printed when she was seventeen by her grandfather, G. Polidori, at 15, Park Village East, in 1847.

110, Hallam Street, Portland Place.

Soon after this date her brothers were evolving the Pre-Raphaelite Movement, and among their artist friends who came to Charlotte Street was James Collinson (1825–1881), son of a bookseller in Mansfield. He was of some pictorial talent, but personally a dull, timid young man, short and thick-set, with a thick neck also; he spoke, with some good sense, in a provincial accent; he was tame and somnolent—in fact he had the most amazing capacity for falling asleep on every possible occasion, so perhaps he was the prototype of the Fat Boy in " Pickwick." He fell in love with Christina at first sight, and her brother, William Rossetti, acidly comments, " Well he might, for in breeding and tone of mind, not to speak of natural genius, or advantages of person, she was markedly his superior." Strange to say, Christina seems to have loved him very much; she was impressed too by his successful Exhibition picture of 1848, " The Charity Boy's Debut." She was now eighteen years of age, and though she at first refused her curious suitor because he was a Roman Catholic, she accepted him later when he said he could revert to the Church of England as a High Anglican. But before two years had passed, Collinson decided that he must after all be a Roman Catholic, so Christina " revoked her troth with deep sorrow and reluctance, and only at the bidding of a supposed duty." It was more than that: her broken romance affected her health, and transfigured by sorrow, her mind conceived her lost lover (unheroic though he may have been) in those lines of passion:

> " O dream, how sweet, too sweet, too bitter sweet,
> Whose wakening should have been in Paradise,
> Where souls brimfull of love abide and meet;
> Where thirsting, longing eyes,
> Watch the slow door
> That opening, letting in, lets out no more.
>
> " Yet come to me in dreams, that I may live
> My very life again though cold in death;
> Come back to me in dreams, that I may give > Pulse for pulse, breath for breath;
> Speak low, lean low,
> As long ago, my love, how long ago."

The years passed. She had, with her mother, the experience of conducting a day school; she wrote her greatest poetry, " Goblin Market and Other Poems " (published in 1862); she visited France; and was ever occupied with her family duties. Then in 1864, another suitor—a friend she had known for some years—came forward in the person of Charles Bagot Cayley (1823–1883), the son of a merchant and born near St. Petersburg. He had been an official in the Patent Office and had lost all his money in an advertisement scheme. He was however a man of culture, and a very able translator of the classics. He was shabby in dress, but punctilious in courtesy: " to laugh was not his style." He had been good looking in youth, but when he advanced as the suitor of Christina Rossetti he was a melancholy man with " rather pinched features." He was forty-one and she thirty-four, so the wooing was mature.

Once again religious difficulties intervened, for Cayley was unorthodox in his views. In addition he had scarcely any money, so nothing was settled, and the idea of marriage was permitted to fade. But they remained friends, indeed lovers, until Cayley's sudden death twenty years later. To onlookers it had seemed just a sad case of two middle-aged people putting aside the happiness of their joint lives for want of a little exertion and self-sacrifice: yet doubtless the decision was a wise one, for Christina Rossetti, at any rate, was not adapted to married life in circumstances of poverty and ill-health; genius is ever ill to live with, and indeed Mr. T. J. Wise goes so far as to say that both the lovers of Christina Rossetti were lucky to escape a permanent residence with her sharp tongue.

Nevertheless the sacrifice of her second lover meant for Christina deep tragedy and bitter and passionate regrets. She had recorded the progress of her resurgent romance in " Il Rosseggiar dell'Oriente "—verses secreted in her locked desk and never seen by anyone until they were discovered after her death by William Rossetti; and in those other sad songs written in 1864–1865—" If I had words at least to vent my misery," " Shall I forget on this side of the grave ? ".

Love was gone, age at hand and terrible illness:

> "The hope I dreamed of was a dream . . . and now I wake exceeding comfortless, and worn, and old,"

Christina Rossetti at the age of eighteen.

By Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

From " The Life of Christina Rossetti," by Mary F. Sandars (Hutchinson).

[1] The original manuscripts of these poems are now in the collection of Mr. T. J. Wise, and they bear the note in Mrs. Rossetti's handwriting: " These verses are truly and literally by my little daughter, who scrupulously rejected all assistance in her rhyming efforts under the impression that in that case they would not really be her own." Mrs. Rossetti died in 1886 at the age of eighty-five.

for in 1871 Christina Rossetti was attacked by the obscure "Dr. Graves' Disease," which disfigured and destroyed her looks and left permanent heart trouble; by 1893 cancer had developed, and all hope of permanent recovery was abandoned. Ill-health had shadowed all her life and pitched the key for her most lovely songs. Thus, "When I am dead, my dearest," was written when she was only eighteen and before she had experienced the melancholy effects of the breaking of her first love affair. "An End," "Dreamland," the exquisite "Oh roses for the flush of youth," and, I fancy, "Remember me when I am gone away, gone far away into the silent land," all belong to this early period.

All through her life her thoughts were with death and the tomb. As Alice Meynell expressed it: "Christina Rossetti conformed to the ancient discipline. Her portrait should have been painted with the skull on the table." She possessed all the gentle resignation of the old anchorites in the face of suffering, and the beauty of her patience and spirituality can be read in the moving descriptions by Mr. Mackenzie Bell,[1] who saw her in her last years and after death. The end came on December 29th, 1894; she was conscious and engaged in prayer until within a few minutes of her death. She was buried in Highgate Cemetery on a day of wintry sunshine, with a sprinkle of snow on the ground, while a robin sang on a branch of a leafless tree. Here, in the last words she wrote:

> "Sleeping at last, the trouble and tumult over,
> Sleeping at last, the struggle and horror past,
> Cold and white, out of sight of friend and lover,
> Sleeping at last."

Photo by W. A. Mansell & Co. Christina Rossetti.
From a drawing by D. G. Rossetti.

[1] Mackenzie Bell's sympathetic and critical biography of Christina Rossetti was published, in 1898, by Hurst & Blackett. In this the centenary year of Christina Rossetti's birth has been published an excellent memoir by Mary F. Sandars (Hutchinson, 1930), which contains much new material. There are also the published Reminiscences of his sister by William Rossetti.

Dante Gabriel, Christina, William Michael Rossetti and their Mother.
From a photograph taken by Lewis Carroll (Rev. C. L. Dodgson) in the garden of Rossetti's house, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, 1863.

BENJAMIN CONSTANT (1767-1830)

Creator of "Adolphe" and Friend of Madame de Staël

By
Bernard Causton

A hundred years ago this month Benjamin Henri Constant de Rebecque died after a life torn between conflicting aspirations, hopes and fears spent on a career that must inevitably attract the attention of those alike interested in literature and politics. For in Benjamin Constant (who must be distinguished from the painter of the same name) was found the "rare union of the man of the world with the man of letters," in the words of Alfred de Vigny, who as a young and yet unknown poet made the acquaintance of the veteran author of "Adolphe."

Benjamin Constant
1769-1830.

Benjamin Constant was born in Lausanne on October 25th, 1767. Astonishing country, Switzerland, to have cradled the first beginnings of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Benjamin Constant and Henri Frederic Amiel, whose lives spanned between them the greater part of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries! All three were inwardly devoured by the peculiar instability of genius and displayed a marked incongruity by contrast with their neighbours. Each too will be remembered conceivably more by the love story of their lives than the philosophical, political and theological outpourings on which they set great store.

The significance of early Swiss environment should not be pressed too far, for Benjamin Constant's spiritual home was Paris, however much at times he might sigh for solitude. Indeed he found his Swiss background a constant hindrance in later years to his eligibility for the French Chamber, for he was forced to establish genealogically his French descent so as to circumvent his enemies' attempt to disqualify him as an alien intruder.

Though in his "Journal Intime" and "Cahier Rouge" Constant gave further revelations of his intimate feelings, it is by "Adolphe" that he is best known, and this brief classic among human documents has a particular claim on English interest. Experiencing a set-back in his political aspirations in 1815 when, after the restoration of the Bourbons, the July elections brought a sweeping victory for the extreme royalists over the liberals with whom he was then identified, he decided to reap the advantage of the favourable reception accorded in England to his pamphlet against war and, by implication, against Napoleon, "De l'Esprit de Conquête." His arrival in England was naturally attended with the keenest expectations that he would publish some interesting reminiscences of Buonaparte in view of the rôle of reconciliation that he had played (somewhat equivocally his enemies declared) during the Hundred Days. Instead Constant brought out "Adolphe," written some years before.

In a certain sense the narrative may be regarded as autobiographical, since the description of the hero's upbringing recalls some of the circumstances of the author's early life. Benjamin Constant's mother died in giving him birth. His father, Juste Constant—shy, reserved and defensive—was constantly involved in lawsuits and avenged his misunderstandings with the officers of his regiment in moody outbursts of irony which undoubtedly contributed towards Benjamin's temperament. Where there is added, as in his case, the secret imperative need of genius to discover the Why and Wherefore of human contacts, the sheer difficulty of effecting an understanding lends a vivid sense of discovery unknown to those who make their social adjustments in a manner almost automatic by contrast.

Our young autobiographical hero, Adolphe, had derived from friendship with an aged lady of wit and perception (in whom the commentators see a portrait of Madame de Charrière, the first woman to dominate his life by the allegiance of intellectual affinities), "an inveterate repugnance to all trite maxims and dogmatic standards." Hence bored by the trite conventionality of society in a provincial German town, he was in a particularly impressionable condition to perceive the rarity and charm in the pride and disillusionment of Ellénore. She is described as: "A Pole, a celebrated beauty, although no longer in her first youth." That last phrase hints the tragedy that is to follow.

She responds to Adolphe's entreaties. It is the last romance of her life, but the first of his. Ambitious for his future, railed at by his father and friends for neglecting his chances of a career, he tires of her and, consumed with sorrow at her unhappiness, lacks the merciless resolution—which might have been less cruel in the long run—to break off the relationship. It drags on till her death, precipitated by the anguish she has undergone, releases him.

Of the author of "Adolphe" it is interesting to note that he was indifferent to poetry and the beauties of rural scenery. But, an omnivorous reader, he had early relished the writings of Rousseau (while expressing abhorrence of Rétif de la Bretonne), to whose uninhibited sensibility something in him responded, though the growing insight of a courtier added, in his instance, a finer edge of perception to the promptings of his feelings.

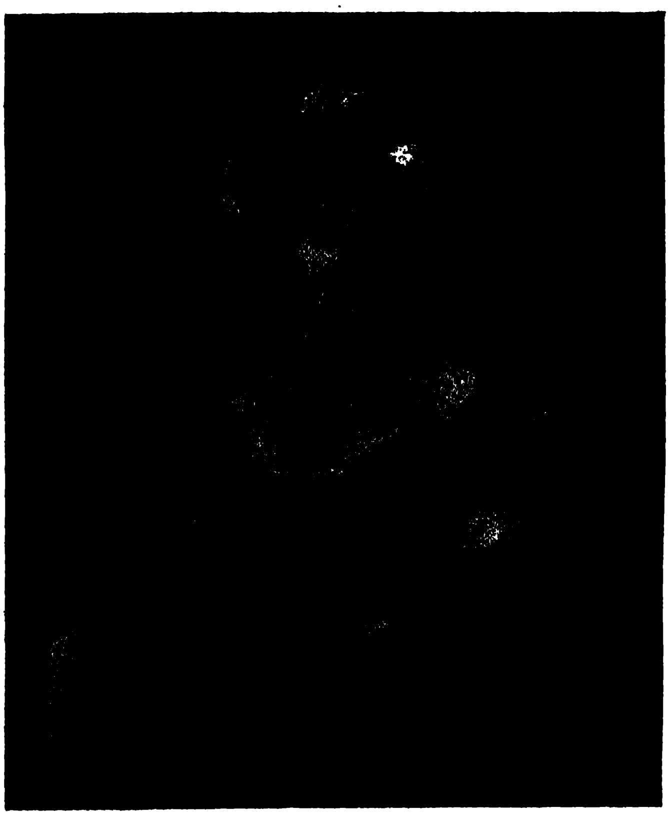
LA SERVANTE DE BOCKS. MANET

From "THE TATE GALLERY." By J. B. Manson, Director of the Gallery. With 32 plates in colour, and many other illustrations. Quarto, handsome cloth, gilt. 42/- net.

(T. C. & E. C. JACK, Ltd.)

Perhaps "La Princesse de Cleves," by the Countess de la Fayette, comes nearest to "Adolphe" in realistic portrayal of the cruel Nemesis that awaits tender but ill-assorted gallantry. Sincerity removes such revelations of the heart several stages from the grade of eighteenth century amorous chronicles, where the fickle and irresponsible qualities of courtiership predominated. Certainly the type of petit maître who adorned the intrigues narrated by Choderlos de Laclos and Crebillon fils, would have registered dismayed amusement at Adolphe's unsimulated avowal of his feelings:

"Unhappy he who, in the first moments of love's fulfilment, does not believe his love eternal. . . . There is something touching, almost sacred, about a woman swept away by the flood of her heart's emotions. It is not the passions, it is not Nature, it is not the senses that are the destroyers; it is the calculations which our social life make a habit with us, the considerations which our experience imposes on us."



Already that word "believe" foreshadows the mortality of love, and in fact out of the hundred odd pages of which "Adolphe" in the "Classiques Garnier" edition consists (I am quoting however from Paul Hookham's translation) only a mere score occupy the space during which Adolphe was in love with Ellénore. After her death is discovered a farewell message with which the narrative closes:

"Must I die, Adolphe? You would then be happy. . . . She will die, this wearisome Ellénore, whom you cannot bear near you, whom you look upon as a stumbling block, on account of whom you find every place in the world unhappy. She will die. You will get back, unshackled, to the crowd in which you are eager to mingle. You will know them for what they are, those people, and perhaps one day, revolted by the sordid hearts around you, you will miss the heart that was all yours, that beat only with love for you, that would have braved a thousand dangers to shield you, and that you no longer deign to reward with even a glance."

Here we are not troubled by an easy propagandist moral. "Adolphe" is a tragedy, reminding us how often in life we think and care less for those who manifest their need of us, while we respect those whose reserve may be only indifference.

Noteworthy, as reflecting Constant's lifelong preoccupation with religion and the prospect of death, is Adolphe's account of the last prayers uttered for Ellénore:

"I heard them repeat the funereal sentences automatically, heedless of the fact that they themselves must one day be the principal actors in a like scene. I was, however, far from despising those ordinances. Is there one of them of which man, in his ignorance, dares to assert the futility? They soothed Ellénore; they helped her to take the tremendous step towards which we are all advancing, beyond which no one can predict his next experience. I am not surprised that man stands in need of religion; what astonishes me is that he should feel himself strong enough, sufficiently sheltered from the calamities of life, to dare dispense with it. He should rather, it seems to me, be driven in his weakness to invoke its aid. In the blank darkness that surrounds us, is there a glimmer that we can afford to disdain? Amid the torrent that sweeps us along, is there a branch at which it is beneath our dignity to catch?"

Madame De Staël.
Engraved by E. Scriven.
From the original picture by F. Gerard, in the possession of M. de Broglie, at Paris.

Stimulated by his reading of the Encyclopædists he had early conceived a thesis for proving the superiority of paganism to Christianity, but his "History of Religions" underwent some notable changes of thought owing partly to the influence of German metaphysicians before its publication between the years 1824 and 1831, the last volume thus appearing posthumously. As he wrote to a friend in 1811: "I am no longer that fearless philosopher, sure that there is nothing after this world, and so pleased with this world that he rejoices that there is no other. My work is a singular proof of what Bacon says, that a little learning leads to atheism and more learning to religion."

Originally intended for Oxford Constant does not appear to have matriculated there but at Erlangen, and later at Edinburgh acquired a taste for dialectic and disquisition. Indeed so trilingual was he that Sainte-Beuve frowns magisterially (in a foot-note to "Portraits Littéraires") on Constant's recourse to English and German turns of expression, as likely from its very versatility to militate against the finest verbal felicity in French.

Neither of Constant's wives seems to have been very prominent in his life, the second marriage being undertaken apparently to escape from the entanglements of Madame de Staël. It is this celebrated woman, daughter of Necker, the banker and Minister of Finance, and married to the Swedish Ambassador, who has been "featured" by some commentators as the original of Ellénore in "Adolphe," though Professor Rudler's supposition that that heroine was a composite portrait of various women with whom Constant had been associated seems the most probable.

It was with Madame de Staël that Constant intrigued to get Talleyrand the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, but the newly appointed Minister did little in return for his benefactors. Years afterwards Constant, as a determined opponent of the censorship laws muzzling the Press, got himself returned to the Chamber for the Sarthe division, where however he owed his hold to the patronage of a rabid, provincial journalist, named Goyet, who wrote thus to remind him of his dependence: "Remember, I lead public opinion." There may be politicians to-day who will sympathise with Constant in this predicament.

In July, 1913, M. Caillaux unveiled a monument in a public square in Le Mans, commemorating Constant's political representation there. But it will be as the author of "Adolphe" that we shall best remember him. Opinions may differ as to the rightful successors in this tradition of peculiarly intimate narrative, but "Adolphe, 1920," by John Rodker, and "Le Diable au Corps," by the late Raymond Radiguet, are noteworthy present day exercises in the same genre of literary expression which seem to attest that the spirit of Adolphe is not dead even on the centenary of his creator.

MY FIRST BOOK

Famous Men Recall the Books of their Childhood

By

R. Thurston Hopkins

It is seldom that one sees any of the old juvenile books in the hands of children nowadays. Fifty years ago, before the advent of junior "thrillers" and mystery stories, the mainstay of every boy's library was a bulky volume of "Robinson Crusoe" with copious illustrations, and Hans Andersen's Tales. But such old companions have been banished by the present generation, and to-day the elderly and middle-aged reader would need a landmark to guide him into the bookland of his childhood. Perhaps there is no better landmark than a muster of those books which were the earliest favourites of some of our most eminent living citizens.

Rudyard Kipling

Mr. Kipling was probably born with a taste for curious and out-of-the-way books. At fourteen he was in the editor's chair of the United Services College Chronicle, and was allowed the run of the head master's study—that "brown bound, tobacco-scented library" that he speaks of with such reverence in his chronicles of schoolboy life.

Kipling stolidly read his way through the whole library. There were many of the ancient dramatists, a set of the "Voyages of Hakluyt," a literary treasure which no doubt supplied Kipling with much information that he makes use of in his later books; French translations of the Muscovite authors, Pushkin and Lermontoff; "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám," afterwards parodied by him in "Departmental Ditties"; there were volumes of Crashaw, Dryden, Alexander Smith, L. E. L., Lydia Sigourney, Fletcher's "Purple Island," Donne, Marlowe's "Faust," Ossian, "The Earthly Paradise," "Atalanta in Calydon" and Rossetti.

The books of Kipling's childhood serve to give some idea of how he obtained the marvellous mastery of detail and that astonishing grasp of life in all its phases which made him wellnigh a wizard among writers before he was out of his teens.

Mr. Bernard Shaw

As Mr. George Bernard Shaw, and his opinions on every conceivable subject, are at present the centre of so much attention, it will be of interest to open with the books which captured his imagination in early life. It has often been said that Shaw was born a greybeard. In all the attempted memories of those who knew him in his childhood there is a note of hesitation, a hint that he was not the ordinary light-hearted boy of common daily life. In a homely phrase, "people didn't know what to make of him," and to this day nobody knows what to make of him. Thus it will not come as a surprise to discover that the books which usually catch the fancy of boys and girls inspired in him no enthusiasm. Shaw says bluntly that he loathed and despised children's books from the accursed "Swiss Family Robinson" onwards. "I loathed them," he writes, "for their dishonesty, their hypocrisy, their sickly immorality and their damnable dullness. Even as a child my moral sense, like my penetrating literary judgment, was sound. I have no more recollection of my first book than I have of my first meal. I read everything that came my way, but I had to be encouraged by my mother to persevere at 'Robinson Crusoe' until we landed on the desert island, after which he carried me with him unaided. I acquired a very boyish (not childish) taste for Shakespeare from the snippets printed beneath Selous's illustrations."

Shaw names "The Arabian Nights" and "The Pilgrim's Progress" as the two literary sensations of his childhood; he read them and found in them the note of genius.

"This shows," he remarks, "that I was as good a critic in my infancy as I am now, though I could not then bring such brilliant reasoning to support my opinion."

Two poems made a profound impression on Shaw as a child; he admits that he was born with an uncanny knowledge of the "Ancient Mariner" and "John Gilpin"; also with an unaccountable recollection of Baron Trenck and his escapes from prison.

Children should be let loose on big libraries without restriction; but the table should be covered with big illustrated copies—with the two or three lines illustrated printed beneath each picture—of Shakespear, the Pilgrim's Progress, Don Quixote, Robinson Crusoe, the Arabian Nights, Grimm's & Andersen's Tales &c &c. The illustrations should be romantic or realistic, but never comic. "Children's books" should be rigidly excluded. G. Bernard Shaw 29/7/29.

Mr. Justice Eve

It has been said that Mr. Justice Eve resembles something between a prize-fighter and a farmer. This is not perhaps a very flattering way to describe a learned judge who is generally accepted as one of the most popular figures to be met with in the profession of the law; but it does prepare the reader to expect from Justice Eve a loyalty to the old favourites in the bookland of childhood. A burly man with a square jaw and keen eyes that do not require the aid of spectacles; he has the far-seeing vision of the man who loves the wide open spaces and even thinks with an almost physical exuberance of strength. The eyes reveal the man and reveal the child. "My reading as a boy," writes Sir H. Trelawney Eve, "was almost wholly confined to books of adventure. Mayne Reid, Fenimore Cooper, Ballantyne, 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'Masterman Ready' and the like. 'The Swiss Family Robinson' was perhaps the book which was my favourite; my delight in it is with me a living memory still."

Mr. Justice Eve, who is an authority on farming and all kinds of live stock, also mentions that books about animals always gave him pleasure. "Despite half a century of hard work in the humdrum profession of the law," he writes, "I have all my life preserved a love for the wild places and a delight in the companionship of animals of all kinds," which shows that the books of his childhood have made a good and lasting effect on him throughout life.

Questioned on his opinion regarding the "movies" as a modern substitute for boys' story books, Mr. Eve says: "I have no dramatic tastes . . . my holidays are always spent in the open air. I have seen next to nothing of 'the pictures' and cannot offer any opinion on their merits or the reverse. I do not think fairy tales ever attracted me, and this may be the explanation of my having absolutely no taste for the drama."

Mr. Charles Blake Cochran

Mr. Charles Blake Cochran thinks the right boy can tell the right book directly he strikes it. Every boy, he thinks, should have one peak-favourite book which above all others is his alone, and to which his fancy perpetually returns, conjuring with its scenes and characters, and interweaving them with his own life. Mr. Cochran's favourite was "Treasure Island," by Robert Louis Stevenson. The proof to him that it was "his" book was not that it has never been forgotten, but knowing on reading the first few pages that he never could forget it.

"I have often wondered," said Mr. Cochran, "what book I should choose if it was my fate to be marooned on some desert island for the rest of my life, with the choice of one single volume for a companion. It would be very difficult to make a choice, but I think that Shakespeare's 'Plays and Sonnets' would be the book for me."

CHILDREN'S ILLUSTRATED BOOKS

Some Craftsmen of the Nineteenth Century

By
H. M. Cundall

Towards the end of the eighteenth century William Blake produced "Songs of Innocence," "Songs of Experience" and other books for children by a process of printing on copper plates invented by himself; the lines instead of being bitten away by acid were in relief. But the mystic work of this artist with weird imaginations were hardly suitable for the young. Children at that period were more likely to appreciate the chap (i.e. cheap) books known as "penny plain and tuppence coloured." These little books and ballads on broad sheets, together with gaudy ribbons and tinsel jewellery, were hawked about the country by pedlars. The illustrations were mostly very crude and the colours were laid on by children. Each child was employed in using only one colour, and the print was passed from one to another until the colouring was complete.

Even in these early days some of the little books issued by John Catnach and his son James were embellished by cuts by Thomas Bewick, the noted engraver of birds and animals. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the chap-books written in verse assumed a more pretentious character, and in order to make them more attractive had coverings of Dutch paper stamped with designs in bright covers. "The Daisy" and "The Cowslip," cautionary stories in verse adapted to the ideas of children, may be mentioned as examples.

Later on "Dame Wiggins of Lee and her Seven Wonderful Cats," chiefly written by an old lady of ninety, was issued. Ruskin was attracted by the meritorious rhythmic cadence of the verses, and produced a new edition in 1885. Facsimiles of the woodcuts were made, and Ruskin added four rhymes, which were illustrated by Kate Greenaway.

An advance now was gradually being made in book illustrations, and "German Popular Stories," translated from "Kinder und Hausmärchen" by the Brothers Grimm, was published in 1826, with illustrations by George Cruikshank. In the next decade Edward Lear, a water-colour artist, whilst engaged by Lord Derby in making drawings of birds for a work known as the "Knowsley Menagerie," produced his well-known comic drawings and verses for the amusement of his lordship's children. Ten years later they were brought out as a "Book of Nonsense." It became extremely popular, and numerous fresh editions followed for many years. Lear however was not the originator of nonsensical rhymes, as "The History of Sixteen Wonderful Old Women" was published in 1821, and shortly afterwards "Anecdotes of Fifteen Young Ladies" appeared. Both books consisted of absurd rhymes and illustrations.

About 1830 the publisher, Charles Tilt, with whom David Bogue later became partner, brought out a series of stories concerning animals, some of them illustrated by Thomas Landseer, for children, and Joseph Cundall (the present writer's father), who was at that time an assistant in the firm, wrote "Tales of the Kings of England," founded on Holinshed and Froissart in 1840, and "Robin Hood and his Merry Foresters," taken from old ballads, in the following year. They were written under the name of Stephen Percy, and both of these works were illustrated by Sir John Gilbert, then a rising young artist.

The Night Fag.
By Sydney P. Hall.

From "Tom Brown's School Days."

Soon afterwards Joseph Cundall commenced business as a publisher on his own account. He produced in five years more than thirty children's books illustrated by eminent artists of the day. He became associated with Mr. (afterwards Sir) Henry Cole, the Director of the South Kensington, now Victoria and Albert Museum. (Incidentally it may be mentioned that Mr. Cole at this time was conceiving the idea of holding an international exhibition. Later the project was warmly taken up by Prince Albert, and the outcome was the Great Exhibition of 1851.)

Amongst Joseph Cundall's first productions was "Felix Summerby's Home Treasury," edited by Mr. Cole. It consisted of a series of small books for children, illustrated by many of the best artists of the time, including C. W. Cope, R.A., T. Webster, R.A., R. Redgrave, R.A., J. C. Horsley, R.A., F. Tayler, J. Linnell and J. Absolon. All the books were excellently printed by Charles Whittingham at the Chiswick Press. He also issued "Gammer Gurton's Story Books," edited by Mr. W. J. Thomas, under the nom de plume of Ambrose Merton, the librarian of the House of Lords. They were illustrated by F. Tayler and J. Absolon. Amongst other publications were "Story-Books of the Season," by Harriet Myrtle (Mary Gillies), with pictures by Absolon, and "The Good-Natured Bear," by R. H. Horne, illustrated by F. Tayler.

Up to this period the wood engraver produced his blocks with a graver, which gave fine lines in imitation of copper and steel plates, but in the sixties, when book illustration is considered to have reached its peak, the knife formerly used by the early engravers was once more employed, and broader and freer results were obtained. The Cornhill Magazine and Good Words were amongst the first publications to give illustrations in this manner, after drawings by Leighton, Millais and Frederick Walker. Messrs. Novello & Co. issued "National Nursery Rhymes and Nursery Songs," with prints after A. B. Houghton, George Pinwell and other noted book illustrators. They were produced by the Brothers Dalziel, who were the principal engravers at that time. Later, through the means of photography, line and half-tone blocks were mechanically made, and the art of wood engraving has now become almost extinct.

When we went out with Grandmamma.

From "Marigold Garden," by Kate Greenaway (Warne).

Early in the nineteenth century William Savage revived chiaroscuro printing, which was introduced abroad in the sixteenth century. Some of his prints contained as many as thirty colours. In 1834 in the preface to "Feather, Tribes of the British Isles," the publisher wrote, "I should mention the vignettes on the title pages are novelties — polychromatic printing, or printing in many colours from wood blocks." These were executed by George Baxter. They were printed first from a key plate, which was a steel plate etching, and the colours were added by means of wood blocks. Three years later Messrs. Day & Son, the lithographers, produced toned lithographs which consisted of superimposing a yellow tint and leaving the high lights white. Chromolithography was introduced by this firm later, but owing to the number of heavy stones required, the process was expensive. With these exceptions during the first half of the century the colouring of all book illustrations was done by hand.

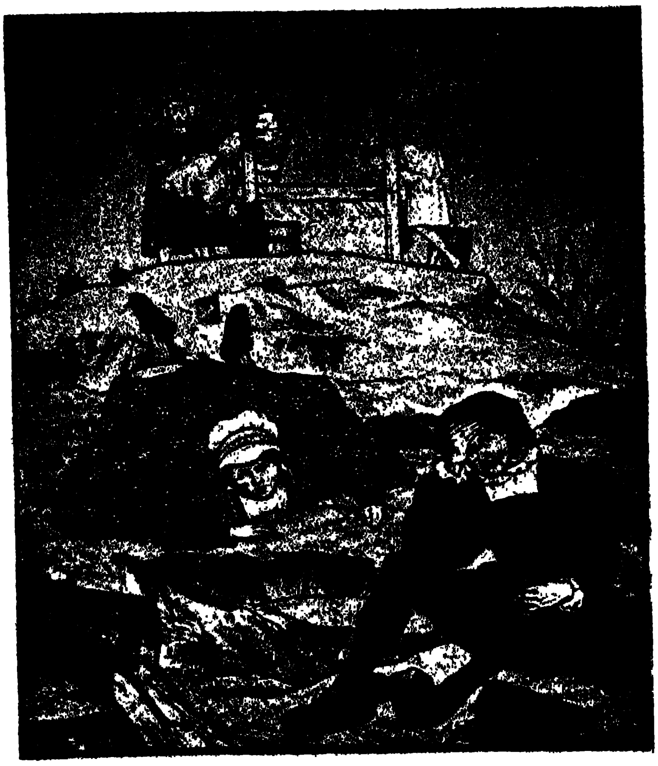
About 1855 Messrs. Leighton Brothers introduced the printing in oil colours from wood blocks using heavy oils, which produced prints resembling oil paintings. The proprietors of the Illustrated London News were among the first to make use of this process. In the next decade Messrs. George Routledge & Sons brought out numerous toy-books for children with illustrations printed by this means, after drawings by well-known artists, including H. Stacy Marks, R.A., J. D. Watson, Harrison Weir and Walter Crane. To Edmund Evans great credit is due for the many excellent books printed with illustrations by means of wood blocks and resembling water-colour drawings, now superseded by the three-colour process. He became associated with Walter Crane, Randolph Caldecott and Kate Greenaway, and the children's books illustrated by these artists are amongst the best published in the latter part of the century. Walter Crane was a prolific worker, and in addition to his book illustrations he became noted as a designer of textile fabrics and wall-papers. Randolph Caldedott was chiefly known for his coloured picture-books, especially those with jovial huntsmen, horses and dogs. Amongst the best were "The Three Jovial Huntsmen," "The Mad Dog" and "The Farmer's Boy." He also drew many illustrations for the Christmas numbers of The Graphic.

Kate Greenaway's name will always be associated with the dainty drawings of children and flowers produced in her books. Her success was greatly owing to her association with Edmund Evans, who printed nearly all her books. Her father, a draughtsman and engraver in his early days, was employed at Ebenezer Landell's, a pupil of Bewick, where he met Birket Foster and Edmund Evans, all Northumbrians. Greenaway's friendship with the latter continued all his life, to his daughter's benefit. Kate Greenaway, besides making the illustrations, also wrote some verses as well for her books —amongst which may be mentioned "Under the Window, with Pictures and Rhymes for Children," "A Day in a Child's Life," containing songs set to music by Myles B. Foster, the eldest son of Birket Foster, and "A Marigold Garden."

And every sort of dance they knew.

From "Marigold Garden," by Kate Greenaway (Warne).

Two very notable books for the young were published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.—"Tom Brown's School Days" and "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland." They were brought out about seventy years ago, and new editions are still being printed. The former, written by Thomas Hughes, has illustrations in the early editions by Sydney P. Hall and Arthur Hughes, and in later ones by E. J. Sullivan. The latter, written by the Rev. Charles Lutwidge Dodgson, under the pseudonym of Lewis Carroll, and illustrated by Sir John Tenniel, has long since become a classic.

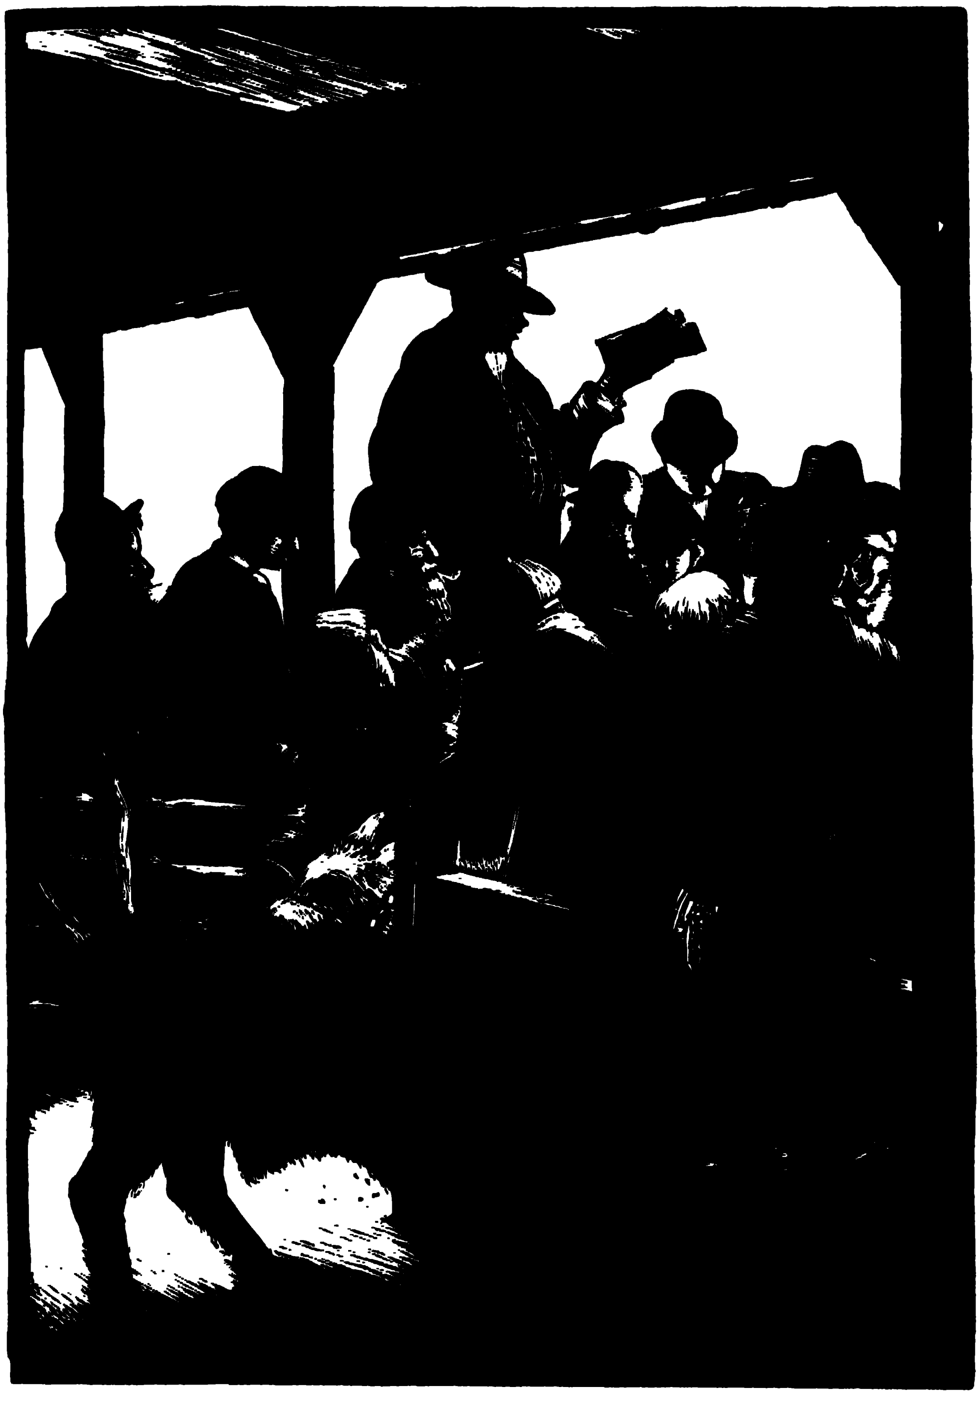


THREE JOVIAL HUNTSMEN.
(By Randolph Caldecott.)

From ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND."
By LEWIS CARROLL.
Illustrated by JOHN TENNIEL
(Macmillan).

"YOUR HAIR WANTS CUTTING,' SAID THE HATTER.
(The "Mad Tea Party.")

By H. STACEY MARKS, R.A.



JACK AND JILL.

From "A ROMANCE OF THE THREE R'S."

LITTLE QUEEN ANNE.
(By Walter Crane.)

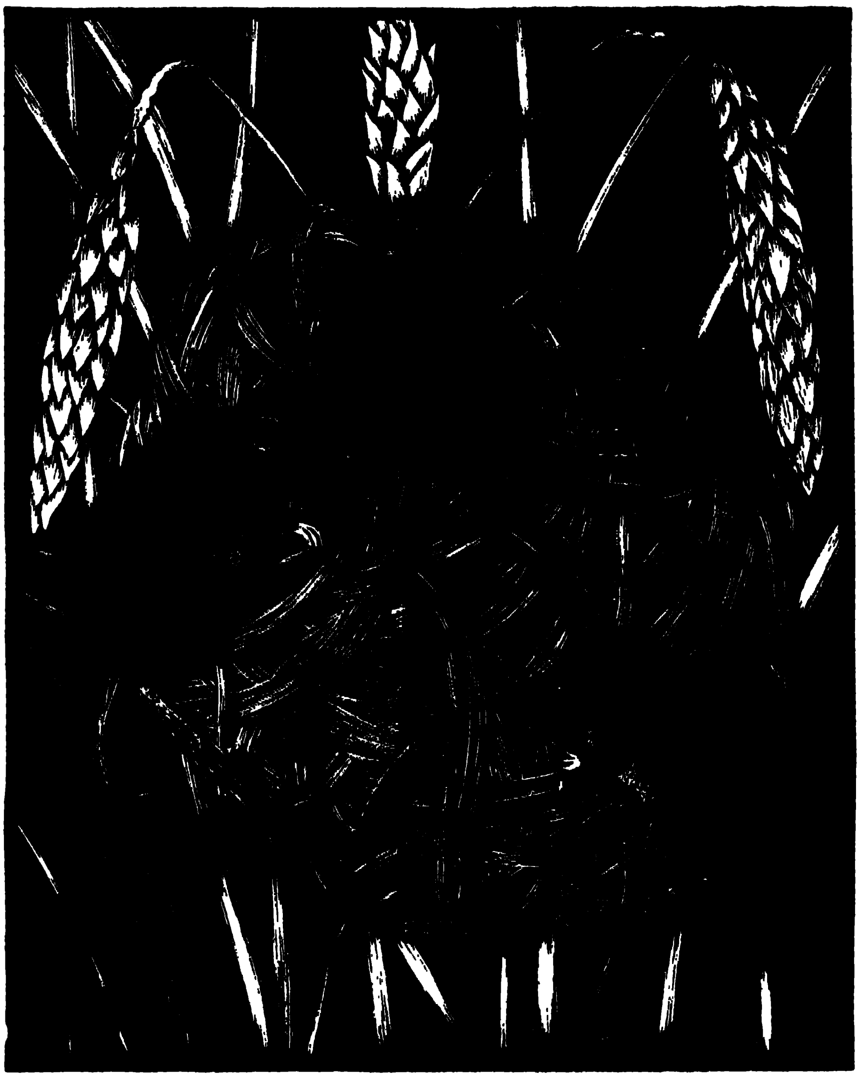
Some Children's Illustrations

From "WOODCUTS: EXAMPLES OF THE WORK OF CLARE LEIGHTON" (Longmans).

THE CALF AUCTION.

DECORATION ENGRAVED ON WOOD FOR "THE CANTERBURY TALES" BY ERIC GILL.
(By permission of the Golden Cockerel Press.)

SOME ILLUSTRATORS OF THIS CENTURY



Artists in Pen-and-Ink, Colour and Woodcut

By Harry Kirby

In considering briefly the subject of twentieth century book illustration we might well begin—indeed chronological sequence demands it—with an artist whose work became famous before the nineteenth died. During the closing years of the last century Hugh Thomson held a premier place in English book illustration. From the discovery of his talent by that astute editor Comyns Carr (of the English Illustrated) to the end of the century the tale of the books illustrated by Thomson is a remarkable one. Consider the '90's only! "The Vicar of Wakefield" (one of the most popular editions ever published) came out in 1890; the following year saw "Cranford" (in its turn a "book of the year"); in '92 was published "Beau Brocade." "Our Village" was illustrated in '93, whilst '94 saw not only "Pride and Prejudice" (with the emblematical peacock blazoned on its cover) but also the delightful "Coridon's Song." "The Story of Rosina" marked 1895, whilst Somerville's "Chace" filled 1896. The next year (1897) was a vintage one, for during its passage the remaining novels of Jane Austen received attention—attention so skilful that all true "Janeites" are pledged to these editions. Finally 1900 was celebrated by the "Kentucky Cardinal" of James Lane Allen.

Much of Hugh Thomson's success was undoubtedly due to specialisation. He studied eighteenth century life and detail till he had practically absorbed the moods and manners of that age. Further, he was fortunate in being associated in many ventures with another specialist of the same period. Indeed, the association was so pronounced that we almost instinctively couple the names (Thomson, in whimsical mood, had coupled the portraits already, as possessors of the 1890 "Vicar" will be aware) of Austin Dobson and Hugh Thomson. Few collaborations of author and artist have been so consistently successful as was this union.

During the present century Thomson's industry hardly slackened and from 1903 to 1920 almost every year saw fresh evidence of his skill. In scope the illustrations ranged from Shakespeare to Barrie: from Fanny Burney to Hawthorne (the "Scarlet Letter" of the latter was actually his "swan song") and in much of his later work the effect of adding colour was tried.

Harvest Mice.

From "The Natural History of Selborne." By Gilbert White. Illustrated by Eric Fitch Daglish. (Thornton Butterworth).

If Thomson used colour only occasionally his young contemporary Arthur Rackham used little else (as readers of THE BOOKMAN must be well aware). Rackham had been known as an illustrator since about 1894, but he did not become really well known till his "Rip Van Winkle" of the present century. His reputation was firmly established by the brilliant "Peter Pan in Westminster Gardens" of 1906 (a work very hard to secure to-day as it has so frequently been broken up to adorn nursery walls) whilst with his "Alice" of 1907 he achieved the distinction of being the only serious challenger of the Tenniel tradition. Even Austin Dobson (a most ardent Tennielite) admitted the charm of Rackham's art in a deft "proem" contributed to this edition.

To chronicle Rackham's work is impossible in a short article. To describe it is a pleasant task. The artist possesses a genius for depicting the world of Fairyland: the country where roam elf and gnome; goblin and ogre. His imagination must be prodigious, for not only does he call up these creatures at his will, but he imbues the landscape also with strange life. His trees (there is a particular willow that might well be termed the "Rackham" willow) take on strange shapes, and bough and twig leer and gesticulate in the most disturbing manner. In contrast to these fantastic shapes his children are singularly human and lovable.

It has been urged that Rackham is not versatile: that he has dwelt overlong in the unreal world of fairyland and cannot consequently grapple with the ordinary workaday world. Such criticisms have no more than a modicum of truth. It is not disputed that Rackham has made the weird and grotesque his special duty, but that he is not at home outside this sphere may well be contradicted by his attractive "Vicar of Wakefield" of 1929.

Whilst mentioning children we cannot well pass over Ernest H. Shepard. True, his name seems to appear chiefly at Christmas time (though "grown-ups" meet him regularly in Punch) and in connection with the verse of A. A. Milne, but we occasionally meet him outside these rather circumscribed limits. "Pepys's," for instance, has been made much more of a book for the people by the addition of Shepard's illustrations, whilst the "County Songs" (to which E. V. Lucas contributed the verse) should be submitted as a model to all guide-book makers. Topography, as taught by Messrs. Lucas and Shepard, would be a most attractive addition to any curriculum. A characteristic of this artist is his manner of using his pictures as a frame for the accompanying scrap of verse or prose.

The brothers Brock are still with us and for that we are grateful. Like Hugh Thomson their best work was their earliest, and was done in the '90's. Their work is curiously alike, the only difference being the somewhat clearer, firmer line of H. M. If C. E. draws a delightful "Mrs. Battle," H. M. replies with a "Sir Roger" looking every inch a "knight of the shire." Against C. E.'s most diverting "John Gilpin" we can balance the cheery, ample-girthed "Will Wimble" of H. M. One peculiarity is shared by the brothers also, that being the exquisite truth of all their period interiors. The tall-boys, long case clocks, chests, tables and the like have that essential air of "rightness" about them so beloved of the connoisseur.

But we must leave pen-and-ink for a moment and consider other illustrative methods. The one that looms largest on the horizon at the moment is undoubtedly the woodcut. Probably the cult arose through the distaste engendered by an excess of photo-mechanical reproduction. Whatever its origin it has come to stay, for by its medium the artist not only conceives his fancies but is able to execute them and that right down to printing point. Moreover the cut looks remarkably well on the printed page and can be printed concurrently with it. It has little to compare it with the facsimile work of the engravers of Dalziel's time, but is an affair of bold line and solidly massed blacks.

The private presses have done much in the woodcut revival and of their disciples none has done more clever work than Eric Gill. He uses either black or white line with equal facility and his draughtsmanship is sound. Much of his effort has been directed towards the illustration of religious works and though there may be disagreements with the ascetic—at times stark—handling of the subjects, the artistic nature of the work is never in doubt.

Eric Daglish and Robert Gibbings have much in common. Both delight in the portrayal of wild life (with a leaning towards ornithology) and their technique is not dissimilar. Perhaps we derive the greater pleasure from the work of Gibbings. He has the Bewick knack of making a duck (shall we say) look just a duck; so true to nature that the thought of criticism does not arise. Daglish (with far less economy) does not achieve the same result. Most of his work is technically brilliant (we remember a charming little dormouse in one of Fabre's books) but the decorative element is always uppermost. Instinctively we imagine what delightful frescoes could be made from this or that picture (as indeed they might) but the notion, intriguing as it is, indicates that the mantle of Bewick will never fall on Daglish.

Less complex is the art of Miss Clare Leighton. She is a comparative new-comer (many of us will recall her poster work for the Empire Marketing Board) but has already made her mark in book illustration. It needed only two books to establish this—Hardy's "The Return of the Native" and Wilder's "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." In both she shows a skilful use of white line with a very bold use of massed blacks. The peculiar mood of the last-named book has been finely caught. Recently Miss Leighton has been busy with Tomlinson and has illustrated his "The Sea and The Jungle."

These names are but a few of the workers in this medium. We ought to mention Douglas Bliss, Stephen Bone, Gordon Craig, John and Paul Nash, Gwendolen Raverat and Percy Smith and many others, but space will not permit.

Line engraving is little seen to-day. It is too patient a process for these hurrying days, but George Moore's "Brook Kerith" has been illustrated in this manner. The work, done by Stephen Gooden, is highly esteemed; so much so that copies of the book are almost unprocurable. The engravings possess rare dignity, and although Blake is brought to mind there is too much of Gooden in the work to sustain any charge of imitation.

Aunt Prue and Aunt Rose.

From "My Son and I" (George Allen).
Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

Coloured aquatint too has almost ceased to be. Remembering the pictures of Allen and Rowlandson we regret its passing. Sporting illustrators we have in plenty—Lionel Johnson, Nicholson, Munnings and Armour, to mention only a few, and the study of the equine race has at no time received greater attention. It is curious that hunting (which is after all the sport of the comparative few) receives so much attention. Some day it will strike our sporting artists that there is beauty in a Rugby field, or grace in a skimming swallow dive. At present they seem too impressed by the dismemberment of a weary fox or the crumple of a stricken partridge to heed less sanguine sports.

In concluding these brief notes, we may see that book illustration, so far as the present century has progressed, is in a vigorous condition, nor need we have any grave apprehensions as to its future.

FORGOTTEN TREASURE

Letters from the Past

A London publisher must have been startled to receive from Nottingham, in December, 1799, a long letter which baldly began :

> " SIR,
>
> " I am writing an Epic Poem, the plan of which is, ' Satan, over intent on the destruction of Mankind, is represented as the prime cause of this calamitous War. He sends an emissary to inspire the God of celestial Love with brutal malice, to wound the favourite of Astrea, the Heaven-born Orvan. Eros, thence is exiled from Elysium, and becomes the instrument of Satan, to raise in the hapless Louis, that mighty passion for the fair Antoinette, which afterwards proves so fatal. . . ."

And so the plan goes on and on, dragging in St. George, several noble Heroes, and Minerva who " arrives at the frontier of Great Britain, and after presenting her emblazoned Shield to the Admirals of the British Navy, she assumes the disguise of an Eremite and takes up her favourite Charge ; at the same time her sacred influence inspires the united force of the Christian Powers, that the Enemy is everywhere repuls'd." The writer of this astonishing letter (which asked five guineas for the first three cantos and four guineas for the remaining twenty-seven) was the unfortunate poet, Henry Kirke White, then aged fourteen, and it is one of the plums of Mr. R. N. Carew Hunt's " Unpublished Letters from the Collection of John Wild " (6s. ; Philip Allan). John Wild was his great-grandfather ; he began to collect autographs soon after Waterloo, and at his death left thirty-nine large and unexplored volumes. Until Mr. Carew Hunt examined them and saw their value, they were all kept under lock and key. This first selection includes letters and notes from Wren and Marvell, Gay, Pope, Chesterfield, Wilkes, Richardson, Sterne, Voltaire, Caroline (George IV's unhappy queen), Shelley, Goethe and many others. Most of them, it must be said, have none of the value of Kirke White's letter, and give about as much " kick " as the sight or handling of George Meredith's bath sponge or Mr. Wells's razor blade. Of all, the most important is perhaps Sterne's letter to Robert Dodsley on an errand similar to Kirke White's. He is offering him " Tristram Shandy " for £50 :

> " The Plan, as you will perceive, is a most extensive one—taking in not only the Weak part of the Sciences, in w[ch] the true point of Ridicule lies—but everything else, which I find Laugh-at-able in my way."

The letters from Shelley to a bookseller (1814) asking for books and offering a post-obit bond in payment ; from Wilkes to Suard ; from Richardson to a young lady friend ; from Wren describing his difficulties with incompetent workmen at Hampton Court ; from Caroline to Lady Byland, written (1820) in halting English about her return to " dear old England," were all worth publishing. Mr. Carew Hunt prefixes to every letter short explanatory notes, in which he sometimes, though seldom, goes wrong. He hardly gives the right impression for instance in seeming to defend Gifford against " Peter Pindar " in the note prefixed to " Peter Pindar's " account of a scuffle with that " calumniating ruffian." Gifford was an unprincipled Government hack who deserved all the abuse he got from " Peter Pindar " as well as from William Hazlitt.

G. G.

THE OLD BRUSHMAKERS

Secrets from Unprinted Records

" The Old Trade Unions : From Unprinted Records of the Brushmakers." By William Kiddier. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

To have gathered together old and often tattered minute books, some of which had been given to children to scribble on, and others which had been rescued from the shop of a cheesemonger to whom they had been sold for wrapping-paper, and to have transmuted their contents into something lively and illuminating, is no mean achievement. That is what William Kiddier has done with rare care and devotion in the book which is before us. To him, with his lifelong acquaintance with the trade and his intimate knowledge of the technical terms, these old documents have revealed their secrets, and he in turn has made of them a revelation to the general public. He has mirrored for us, not only the habits and customs of a society of working brushmakers a hundred years ago—he has also discovered to us the men themselves in all their native simplicity and all their forthright brotherliness.

From the available data Mr. Kiddier has deduced the fact that the first brushmakers' union was formed in Manchester in 1747. Other provincial societies were formed later in the same century, and a United Society linking the various separate units came into being in 1779. The London Society, which became the head-quarters of the whole movement, was formed by a Dr. Pain.

The days referred to in these old documents were trying days for the " working classes," and tradesmen of the type of these brushmakers had no rights that were recognised by the State. Consequently they had to fashion their own defences and shape their own course, and they had to do it all with the utmost secretiveness. Societies of workers were more than suspect, they were illegal. The men met behind closed doors in the upper room of some tavern which was known as the Clubhouse. Their best friend was generally the tavern-keeper, who acted as their treasurer and to whom they were often in debt. But they repaid him always when times were good, and meanwhile drank his beer " for the good of the house." At these clubhouse meetings discussions took place on all questions affecting the society, such as wages, unemployment relief, grants to widows in case of death, and loans to other classes of workers in temporary need. When matters required the vote of all the members, an extraordinary method was employed. The documents relevant to the discussions were placed in a small tin box, which was taken round surreptitiously from shop to shop. The matters thus referred to the members were discussed around the pitch-pan, and the " voices " were recorded in the box which then passed on its way, ultimately coming back to head-quarters with the votes or " voices " of all concerned.

It appears that long before statesmen had dreamed of a way of dealing with unemployment, these brushmakers evolved a system of handling it within the borders of their own trade. The country was mapped out showing all the centres where brushmaking was practised, and a Tramping Route was drawn up. It covered over forty towns and involved a tramp of over twelve hundred miles. Assuming that a brushmaker out of work started from London, he would follow a definite route in his search, and at each town where there were shops he would present his " Blank " or card of membership, and would receive a sum for immediate expenses, averaging about three shillings, with a shilling for beer and sixpence for a bed. If he tramped the whole route and was still out of work, he would become a " receiver " and would get ten shillings per week for a period.

C. H. H.

ERIC GILL: The Searcher for Reality

A Personal Impression of the Artist

By John O'Connor

BY the time this appears in print, I hope its subject will be able to read it, for as I write he lies seriously ill in the hospital of SS. John and Elizabeth. When I met first Eric Gill he was still wearing a red tie. Not that he much affected collar, tie or any choker. (I like him better in his working blouse, which has only a neckband.) He had so recently been a Fabian that he was wearing out his red ties, on such special occasions as when he went to Hawkesyard Priory to wear the Dominican habit and chant office in choir, so as to do the thing aright in the austere chapel at Ditchling. And so they did afterwards, as I can testify. But he wore the red tie with an air, in those days, as a kind of homage to Holy Church, for putting up with the likes of him, as he might put it.

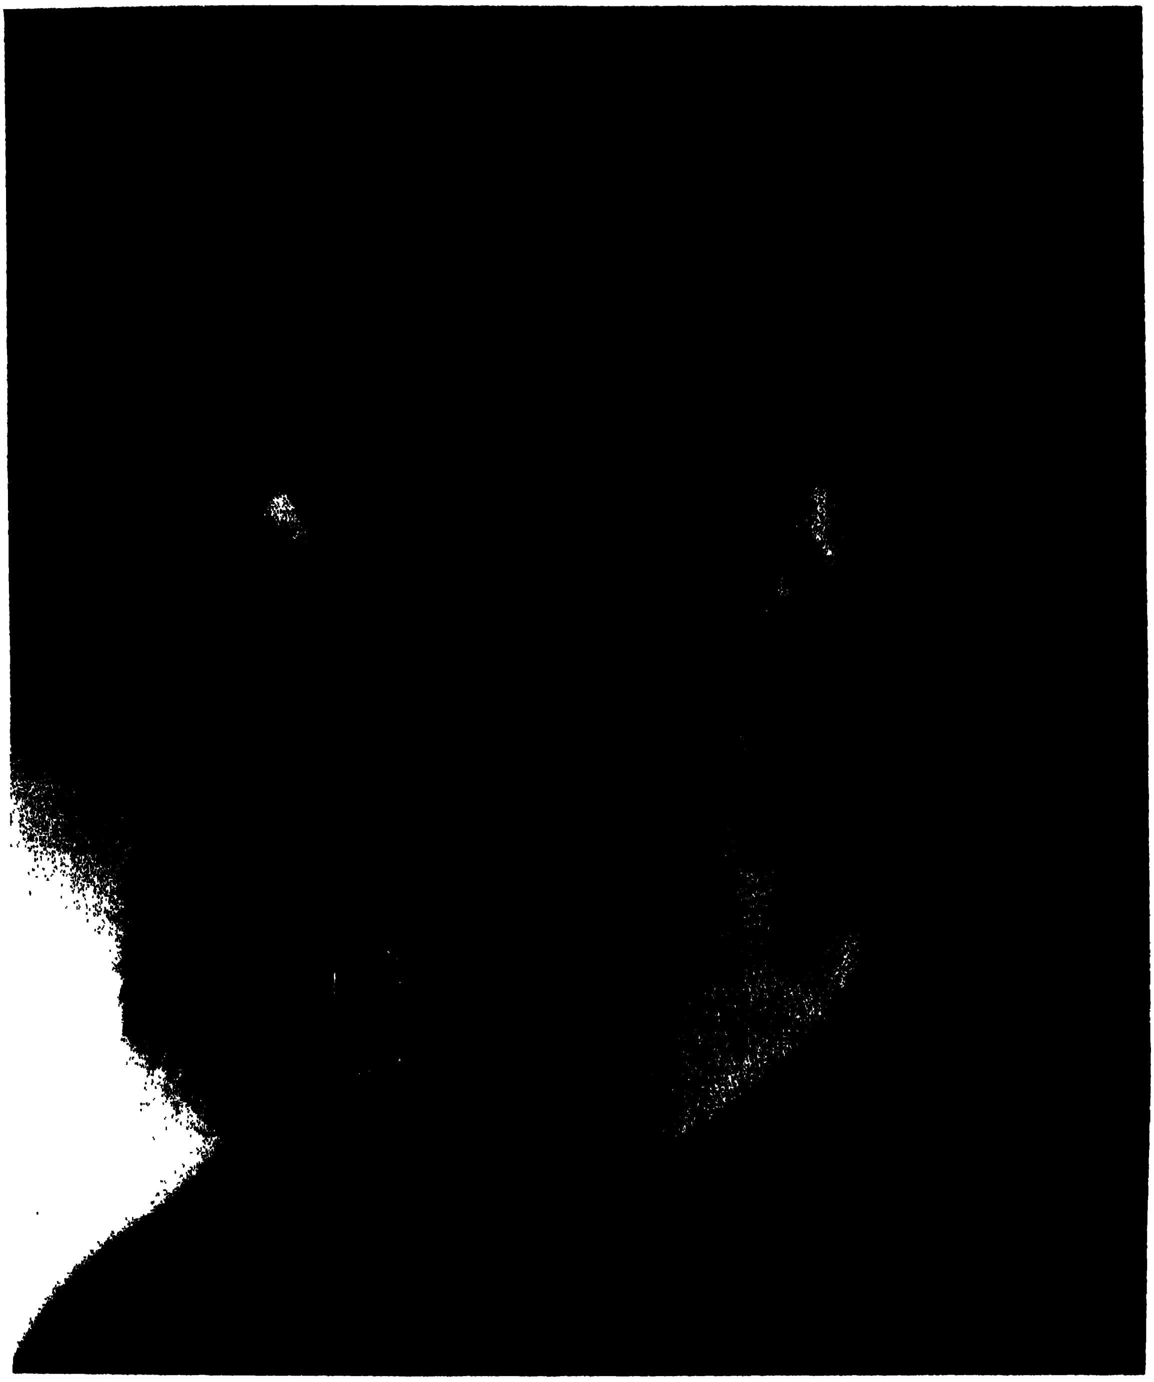
Born in Brighton, the son of a clergyman of the Countess of Huntingdon's connexion, he was apprenticed to a firm of architects. To work as a builder who does not build ran counter to something very deep in his nature, and he made away from "architecture." He often uses quotation marks yet when he mentions the subject. I have heard him tell how he taught drawing for fifteen years. As a good Fabian craftsman, he made a pilgrimage to Chartres, where he concluded that its builders must have had the right point of view about most things. So he set out to put himself body and soul at their point of view, and thus joined the Catholic Church, for he sought in vain nearer home for signs of the right point of view.

When he desired to take the necessary steps, he was quite at a loss to find anyone to tell him what those might be, but he found someone at last, as he usually does; though once within the pale, he found equal difficulty in getting any Catholic to see just why he had come in. However he did the Westminster Cathedral Stations of the Cross, and those who had shrieked loudest because the Westminster Cathedral was not Gothic, lost their voices permanently with protesting against the Stations for being so. He has since executed another set in Bare Stone for St. Cuthbert's Church in Bradford, thereby imperilling the vocal organs of persons not otherwise articulate. The second set are more to his own taste, for he worked more at ease, with full authorisation to simplify and broaden. The Westminster series did not quite express his riper judgment. This may be taken to mean that he develops rapidly. The "spearin'" eyes behind the round spectacles, under the soaring brows, are always trying to see into things, and some of his nude studies have been made from draped figures in violent action in a Daily Sketch photograph.

Once, late at night, I was rash enough to assert that a Madonna and Child inside a vesica or ogive (a woodcut) struck me as touching the nerve of sublimity. Another man might have said "thanks awfully" and gone to bed on it, but not so Eric Gill. "Now that is what I want to get at," quotha—"why is it sublime?" And so my dull brain had to give itself reasons, and some definition of the sublime had to be ground out of the creaking mill of the mind, as little versed in such work as, say, the British Public.

So bit by bit he seeks confirmation of his far surmises, or deep reason for scanning unreason in Aquinas and his followers. I have seen him buttonhole a learned man in a common-room, sometimes only to find that the Learned Man was not so learned as all that. But all-night sittings, sometimes on the edge of a friar's bed, and readings in Jacques and Maritain, have brought him to write down his discoveries and speculations, which are largely embodied in "Art Nonsense" and other essays. When he first discovered Maritain's "Art and the Schoolroom" I had to translate it for him orally while he carved with his pocket-knife a piece of box into what he called Dean Inge because it was as like him as anyone else. The translation was interrupted by a journey to Rome, but on the way back I met him in a Swiss hostelry, and there was his Maritain for me to read to him under the trees to the sound of cow-bells. He never scorns to better his work of mind or hand by practice, and his ardour in pursuit of reality has led him to slightly rash affirmations, always spoken under correction, as for instance when he says that God must have inclined to create things for their own sakes.

The search for reality may be said to be the motive of his craftsmanship, and his figures are often more actual than life, though for a number of years he did not study from life. From being a recognised master in carved epigraph, he has come to be a designer of type, especially of "sans-serif." He is really very highbrow in the effective sense, but no man is more homely or accessible. A husky voice, ingratiating as Greta Garbo's (I believe), and a very short, very ready laugh, as the head tosses back, are at the service of any real person that comes along.



I LISTENED TO DISTANT MUSIC . . .

I listened to distant music,
And watched the Autumn leaves come tumbling down
In my half sleep, I watched in gilded dreaming
My other self, and to the fancy seeming
About to fight a knight of great renown—
I listened to distant music.

I listened to distant music,
And saw a blue grey sky in silver set.
For golden leaves I grew in weakness fighting
For money sheaves, 'gainst conscience stronger lighting—
For twelve hard years, the answer that I met.
I listened to distant music.

Oh! open to weakened music,
Unbar your gate, that pride may yet return
From that grim fight—dejected, bent and weary,
Hide not from light my soul, so sad and dreary,
Just wait and rest, for all men have to learn—
That life is not all brilliant music.

GERALD ATTENBOROUGH.

From a camera portrait by HOWARD COSTER.

ERIC GILL

Notes at Random

The Poet Laureate

Criticism, however hard it may be for the recipient to bear, has at least one compensation: it enhances praise. It is indeed only from the critical spirit that true praise can come. He who commends everything may as well commend nothing. This number of The Bookman is pre-eminently Mr. Masefield's number, but that does not mean that it contains articles which are merely uncritical eulogies of the Poet Laureate's work. He himself would be the last to desire such a travesty of a memorial. Rather an effort has been made to ensure that the estimates of him are as honest and as sincere during his lifetime as are those critical valuations of his four predecessors in office. That I think is the greatest compliment that can be paid him.

For Sir William Watson

As these words are written, an appeal has just been issued on behalf of Sir William Watson. By the time they are read, I hope the response will have been exceedingly generous. But in case anyone should have overlooked or forgotten it, I reprint it here, with the suggestion that a contribution to the fund would be an ideal Christmas gift to Literature.

Photo by J. Russell & Sons. Sir William Watson.

The signatories of the letter invite:

" lovers of great literature everywhere to unite in doing honour to one who has done full honourably by them.

" Through all the crowded, changing years " (says the appeal), " since Tennyson greeted the young author of 'Wordsworth's Grave' ('always it is verses, verses, but now at last comes a poet'), William Watson has remained loyal to the high purposes with which he set out, and has splendidly fulfilled them.

" In nearly thirty volumes of poetry and prose, from 'The Prince's Quest" (1880) to the 'Selected Poems' (1928), he shows himself always the great craftsman, abhorring the casual and the slipshod and holding facility suspect. As a lord of language, he is in the Miltonic tradition.

" And now, after seventy-two years of life—fifty-eight years of it spent in the august but materially unremunerative service of his Muse—this oldest of our living poets lies ill and in poverty. We fear it must be accepted as a melancholy fact that the world is too often neglectful of its chief authentic singers until the shroud covers them; and we wish for our country that at least it shall have no cause here for final self-reproach.

" We have accordingly decided to inaugurate a testimonial fund in recognition of Sir William's magnificent contribution to the poetry of our time and race, and in spite of the abnormally difficult conditions now everywhere prevailing, we do not doubt that our appeal will meet with an immediate and generous response, both here and in the Dominions and in America.

" The fund will be administered by a committee consisting of Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie, Mr. Arthur Machen, and Mr. Wallace B. Nichols. Subscriptions may be sent to the Midland Bank Ltd., 5, Prince's Street, London, E.C.2, or to any of the Midland Bank branches. Cheques, etc., should be made payable to 'Sir William Watson Testimonial Fund A/c.' "

The Signatories

The appeal is signed by the following: Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie, Mr. Henry Ainley, Mr. F. Britten Austin, Sir J. M. Barrie, Sir Gomer Berry, Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. Edmund Blunden, Mr. Gordon Bottomley, Viscount Burnham, Sir David Y. Cameron, Lord Camrose, Sir Martin Conway, Marquis of Crewe, Sir James Crichton-Browne, Mr. Walter de la Mare, Lord Desborough, Mr. James Douglas, Mr. John Drinkwater, Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Vincent Evans, Sir Johnston Forbes - Robertson, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. D. Lloyd George, Mr. Wilfrid Gibson, Sir Richard Glazebrook, Lord Gorell, Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, Very Rev. W. R. Inge, Mr. W. W. Jacobs, Dame Madge Kendal, Mr. Coulson Kernahan, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Sir John Lavery, Sir Wm. Llewellyn, Comdr. Oliver Locker - Lampson, Sir Sidney Low, Dame Edith Lyttelton, Mr. Arthur Machen, Prof. J. W. Mackail, Mr. Reginald McKenna, M. André Maurois, Mr. T. Sturge Moore, Mr. Wallace B. Nichols, Mr. Edward Percy, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Lord Riddell, Sir Rennell Rodd, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Hugh Walpole, Mrs. G. F. Watts and Mr. Clarence Winchester.

The Femina Vie Heureuse Prize

This annual prize of £40 is presented by the French magazine, Femina, on the award of a committee, for the best work of imagination in English, published during the year by an author whose work has hitherto, in the opinion of the committee, received insufficient recognition. This year the books recommended to the Paris committee are "Miss Mole," by E. H. Young, "High Wind in Jamaica," by Richard Hughes, and "Three Daughters," by Jane Dashwood. The final decision is expected in the early spring.

The January "Bookman"

I hope to start three new features in the January issue of THE BOOKMAN. One is a page "For the Writers of To-morrow," which will contain articles written specially for those between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, with prize competitions specially designed for them. Another is a BOOKMAN Cartoon. The third is a series of articles on significant living writers of other countries.

"Queue"

A gallant little magazine called Queue, published by Alfred Wareing at the Theatre Royal, Huddersfield, has just made its appearance. It is an attempt to bind together actors and audience in a common appreciation of and desire for the best in drama. Mr. Wareing, whose theatre at Huddersfield is an oasis in the dramatic desert of Yorkshire, sees that the salvation of the theatre lies in the education of the audience, and Queue is a first—and long—step in this direction.

H. R. W.

THE COSMOS

"The Mysterious Universe." By Sir James Jeans. 3s. 6d. (Cambridge University Press.)

Sir James Jeans's "The Mysterious Universe," which gives an exposition of the modern mathematical conception of the universe, on the basis of relativity, is one of the most discussed books of the moment.

This is hardly surprising, for there has been nothing in the intellectual world more sensational than the advance of physics and mathematics in the last few decades. Revolution following revolution have shattered the old Newtonian mechanical conception of the cosmos. We can no longer picture it as a complicated machine, and must now view it as mathematical abstractions, and certainly under this view we find in cosmic phenomena consiliencies, and consistencies, where under the old conception we found contradictions.

Further, the new mathematical interpretation of the cosmos obliges us to believe in curved space, and to substitute for the idea of gravitational pull, kinks in curved space. Alas, not even Sir J. Jeans has succeeded in making me understand why space-time is curved or how a kink in the curvature can supplement, or supplant, or explain my idea of a falling body, but I am content to take that mystery on faith, and to believe that the substitution of mathematical expressions for mechanical pictures leads, through mathematics, to fuller and more accurate knowledge of cosmic processes.

But here I leave Sir James Jeans, for it seems to me that a mathematical description, or representation, or interpretation—it seems to me that a mathematification of the concrete facts of experience cannot, as truth, supplant or supersede or oust our sensuous concrete conceptions. Seven-dimensional space may exist as a mathematical abstraction, and may have value in ratiocination, but it can no more take a superior place, in reality, to the seen and the sensuous, and to the mechanical conception of the seen and the sensuous, than "x" in a mathematical equation can take a superior place to the eggs it represents.

Yet Sir James's brilliant treatise relates more than mathematical progress—it relates spiritual advance, for when a great mathematician ventures to find a Mathematician behind a mathematical universe, may not chemists and biologists be permitted to infer that a Chemist and Biologist made living matter, and may not lovers of truth and beauty surmise a Lover of Truth and Beauty behind the conscious life of man?

Sir James Jeans has written a book intensely interesting, provocative and inspiring, and incomparably the most lucid explanation of relativity that I have read.

R. C. M.

E. H. Young.

From a drawing by Angela Verne.

MR. MOTTRAM ON BANKS

"Miniature Banking Histories," by R. H. Mottram. 6s. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

In "Miniature Banking Histories," which includes brief histories of fifteen banks and four bankers, Mr. R. H. Mottram has certainly succeeded in whetting the appetite for much more information on each of the subjects he selected for inclusion in his book. Banking institutions of the present day are regarded by the public in terms of their reputation, the services they perform, the strength of their balance sheets and the good name of their directors and officials. That most of these institutions, some of them now of almost incredible magnitude and influence, should have commenced as small provincial private banks, is a fact realised by but few outside of banking circles. The story of their evolution is suggestive of romance. Especially is this the case in the chapter, "The Rise of the Rothschilds." Development by amalgamation seems to have ceased in this country, but not so in the case of the United States, and on this account the chapter, "American Banks Established in London," is already in need of revision. For instance the Chase National Bank merged with the Equitable Trust Company of New York in June, 1930.

The latter part of the book consists of nine chapters on "Scenes of Banking Life" which, as Mr. Mottram appropriately says in his preface, "attempt to body forth the daily intimacies of an occupation hardly touched by imaginative fiction." Some of these nine chapters provide a lighter vein to the book. So few banks in the British Isles have issued official histories of their inception and development, partly owing to the lack of continuous records, that Mr. Mottram is to be congratulated on his collection of facts and figures and delineations of personal character, and on the way he has presented them in such readable form in so small a space.

J. B. O.

Some Recent Biographies

TWO STATESMEN: Winston Churchill and Stanley Baldwin

"My Early Life." By the Rt. Hon. Winston S. Churchill. 21s. (Thornton Butterworth.)

"The Real Stanley Baldwin." By Wickham Steed. 7s. 6d. (Nisbet.)

In discussing the "Baldwin enigma," Mr. Wickham Steed remarks: "There was a 'Balfour enigma,' and there is a 'Winston enigma.' The one was and the other is important because there was no telling what 'A. J. B.' might do or why he should do it; and one can never be sure how and why 'Winston' will transform himself into something new and strange."

In his early years, between 1874, when he was born in Dublin, and 1908, when he "married and lived happily ever afterwards," Mr. Churchill had transformed himself from the allegedly stupid son of Lord Randolph into an eager active-service subaltern, into a brilliant war correspondent, into two kinds of author, into a Parliamentary candidate fighting a forlorn hope, into a popular hero, into a professional lecturer, into a Member of Parliament, and into a Tory rebel. In youth he was not so much a rolling stone as a bounding boulder.

Since 1908, when this volume of autobiography ends, Mr. Churchill has changed again many times, and has achieved conquests in many different fields of activity. He has to his credit a classic biography; at least one standard piece of military history, supported by others of repute; the finest history of his own times that has been written; an output of paintings which mark him as an amateur equipped with the technique of a professional—and he seems to have filled every office of State open to a commoner except that of Prime Minister. Nothing which he has produced has exceeded in racy charm this remarkable volume of personal reminiscences. The questing, red-headed youth looking for trouble with an assiduous zest; fighting in more continents than Napoleon; bearding the great Kitchener; snapping contemptuous fingers at his captor Boers; reaching by private thought the laborious conclusions of the Greek philosophers, and thus treating them with scant respect when an itch for learning afflicted him between polo matches at Bangalore, and he plunged into the scholastic adventures that Harrow had denied him; and determining that no door shall remain barred to his challenging cry of "This is I—Hamlet, the Dane!"—this was the relative child which was father to the man.

Not, let it be hastily conceded, that the Statesman has ever shed the zestful qualities of his youth. Mr. Churchill to-day is essentially unchanged for all his changes. This very book is adequate testimony that the gods love him and he will die young. But surely no Minister of the Crown born in the older traditions of Parliamentarianism ever had so strange a prelude of self-education as he. Besides his flashing record of adventure, the early life of Mr. Baldwin seems drab and colourless. As Mr. Steed says of it: "On coming of age in 1888, Stanley Baldwin entered the family business as his father's partner, and for twenty years was a model employer." It is not, one sees, the contrast between the idle and industrious apprentices: no man was ever more industrious than Winston Churchill. It is the contrast—if the phrase will not be misconstrued—between the industrious apprentice and the Chevalier d'Industrie. Mr. Baldwin has treated life in the mood of some solid church-going "cit," while Mr. Churchill has treated it in the manner of some galloping highwayman. The technique of the one has been the technique of Dick Whittington: the technique of the other has been that of Dick Turpin. One ambles on a pad to great responsibility: the other gallops into the heart of danger, and there finds power. Both are honest, both are suspect of instability. If the one was a bounding boulder, the other has been a mossy rock on which judgment has too often split.

Wickham Steed.
From a drawing by Peggy Smith.

Mr. Steed asks if Mr. Baldwin is a simpleton, or a statesman of more than normal subtlety—is he, as the Americans might put it, a political Machiavelli or a political moron? He is beyond all question a patriot and a poet, though the medium of his poetic contemplation is prose. We know not what Mr. Churchill may find to add to the last volume, when it comes to be written, of his autobiography: we know not what new debacle or triumph will solve for some other biographer the Baldwin enigma. But we know that the uncertainty is due to different causes: that one is an enigma because of a temperament too adventurous and the other because of a temperament too placid. Yet let it not be thought that the adventurous and dynamic temperament is the more shallow. In this book Mr. Churchill delivers, in an almost slangy vernacular, little homilies which rephrased might have come from Mr. Baldwin's mind. Versatility does not always imply superficiality.

Of the relationship of the two men and the two types in Government, Mr. Steed gives an illuminating example: "There is room for doubt whether Mr. Baldwin is ever quite free from a sense of inferiority in dealing with men whose minds are reputedly superior to his own. Once, when discussing with a friend a point of policy on which his second Administration had clearly gone wrong, he said, with a gesture of resignation: "I thought we should have taken another line; but then Winston came along with his hundred horse-power brain, and what was I to do?"

That sense of inferiority is conspicuously absent from the youthful Churchill as the older Churchill remembers him.

C. B.

COSIMA WAGNER

Wife to a Genius

"Cosima Wagner." By Richard Count du Moulin-Eckart. Translated from the German by Catherine Alison Phillips. Introduction by Ernest Newman. 2 vols. 42s. (Knopf.)

If any woman might be considered to shine in a reflected light it was surely Cosima Wagner. The daughter of Franz Liszt and the wife of Richard Wagner, she was associated with two of the most prominent figures of the nineteenth century. On this account alone her biography was worth writing, but Count du Moulin Eckart, who from childhood upwards was on terms of intimacy with Cosima and her belongings, makes no less a claim for her than to style her "the greatest woman of the century." He certainly, in this ample biography, extending over nine hundred pages, gives a striking picture of a remarkably strong personality, and this though he brings his story no later than to 1883, the year of Wagner's death, and leaves the remaining forty-seven years of Cosima's life for a further instalment, to be entitled "Die Herrin von Bayreuth." As it was in this later period that she carried on Wagner's work, almost single-handed, and produced all his operas that had not yet been staged at Bayreuth, this promised volume should add materially to the impression of her commanding character.

In earlier days she was less before the public eye, but her influence reached even further in its results. The crisis in her life was when she left von Bülow and joined her fate to Wagner's. As Mr. Ernest Newman points out in his valuable Introduction, the affair was something different from "the usual matrimonial triangle," and from this biography, and especially from a passage in her diary in which she addresses her children and explains to them her motives, we can learn for the first time the true nature of the affair. We can also form some idea of what she did for Wagner in those critical days, how she made possible the completion of the Ring and of "Die Meistersinger," the composition of "Parsifal," and the consummation of Wagner's whole artistic career in Bayreuth.

In nothing is Cosima's influence more strikingly presented than in her services as intermediary between the composer and the King of Bavaria, two sensitive, highly strung natures who, in spite of the strong sympathy existing between them, must otherwise infallibly have come to grief, even without being mixed up in the welter of Munich politics. Cosima's correspondence with the king displays her in the light of a consummate diplomatist, and though her approach to this august being may sometimes seem to us almost servile, it is at any rate less abject than the terms in which Bach addressed his sovereign.

What is really of interest to us in this correspondence is such a matter as the progress of the composition of "The Meistersinger," almost from day to day, up to the time of the first performance in Munich, when its unqualified success marked Wagner's triumph over his official detractors no less than did his presence in the Royal Box by the side of the king. Wagner's personality was far from being a pleasant one; one is accustomed to angularity, even to rudeness, in these highly charged natures—Beethoven and Brahms are striking instances—but Wagner's conception of his artistic mission made him regard everything and everybody as subservient to it. So he made his way ruthlessly in pursuit of his aim; he used every one who could help him, and discarded him when he could be of no more service. So it is less wonder that he antagonised so many with whom he came into contact than that, in spite of all opposition, his works made their way so soon as they did. Happily they were judged by the great public, who knew him only through his scores, without being prejudiced by his egoistic personality.

H. T.

A GREAT EDITOR

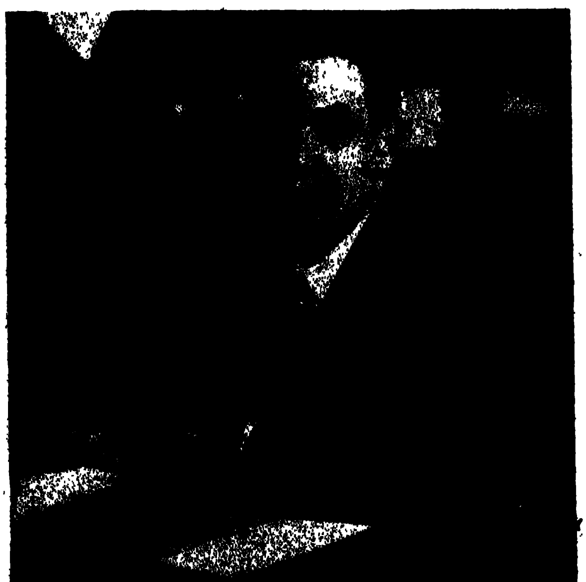
"St. Loe Strachey: His Life and His Paper." By Amy Strachey. 16s. (Gollancz.)

Speculation as to "what might have happened if——" is an amusing if not a very profitable pursuit, and it is undoubtedly amusing to attempt to calculate the results that would have followed had Alfred Harmsworth, as he nearly did, purchased the Spectator. In fact, tempting though the offer was—an income of £4,700 a year for Mr. St. Loe Strachey—it was turned down, and though Mrs. Strachey, in the delightful memoir of her husband just published, admits that she was sorry, she frankly states that his relief was immense. "Although," she says, "he had laid down in the strictest manner that for five years he was to be secured a complete editorial and political dictatorship, he knew perfectly well, from reading the Daily Mail, that he would not be free in spirit as well as free in law."

This was in 1897, when Hutton had died and Townsend wanted to retire, and Strachey was taking over the paper with which his name is inseparably and for ever connected. Means were found for overcoming the financial difficulties, a fact for which the constituency served by the paper can never be sufficiently thankful. Harmsworth bore no malice, as may be seen from what he wrote about the Spectator and its editor a year or two later, concluding with words which express very well what most of us feel about the man: "He was born to edit the Spectator, and he is one of the few men of his generation who has, without doubt or hesitancy, fulfilled his destiny."

Mrs. Strachey has written just the book that was called for. It is in no sense a formal biography, still less is it akin to the dramatic sensationalism that so often serves for biography to-day. Its purpose is best expressed by quoting the words of the dedication, addressed to Mrs. Strachey's three grandchildren: "To Susan, Charlotte and Christopher, to help them to remember." Nothing that may remind these young folk of their grandfather is omitted, and a great deal is revealed which will lead them to form an estimate of him, more faithful than would have been possible had the book not been written. Particularly will they be enthralled by the revelations of his intimacy with such men as Lord Cromer and Theodore Roosevelt. They will read how it was to "Ed. Spec.," as his friends called him, that Lord Cromer disclosed the fact that Campbell-Bannerman had offered him the Foreign Secretaryship, and that he had refused it because he feared that he might "become responsible for socialist legislation"; how Roosevelt wrote in the dark days before America came into the War: "My dear fellow, you and those like you are playing heroic parts; I admire and respect you; I bitterly regret that my own people are not at this time rising to the same level."

R. S. F.



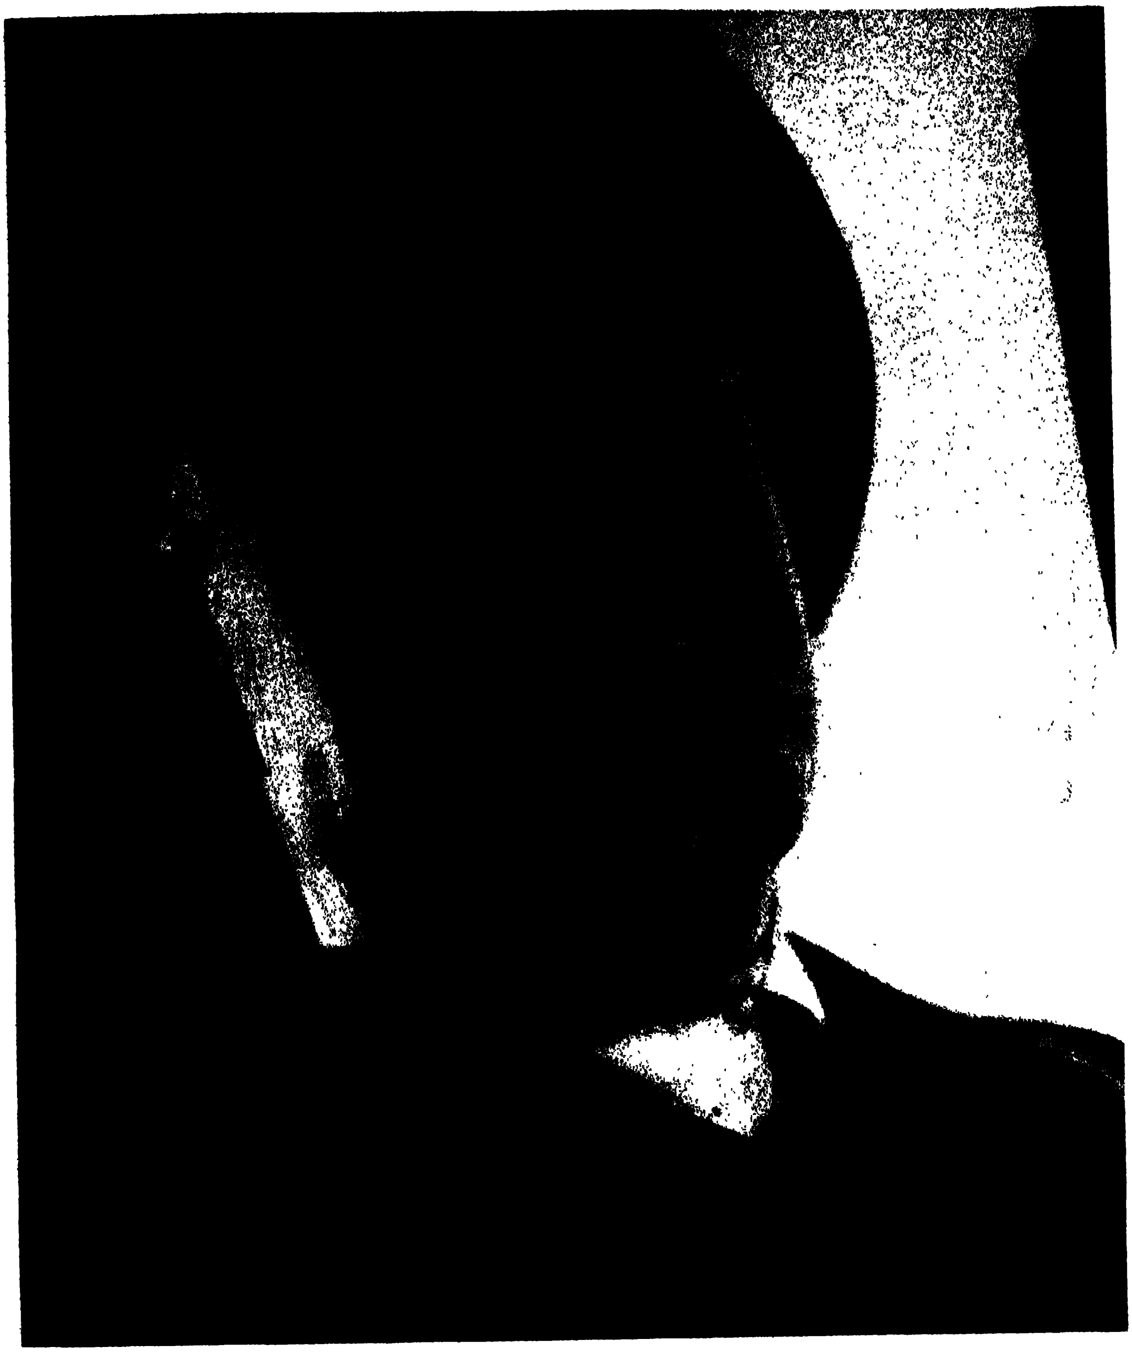


Photo by Elliott & Fry. Mr. St. Loe Strachey.

From a camera portrait by HOWARD COSTER.

H. R. MOTTRAM.

THE TRUE BURNS: An Unprejudiced Portrait

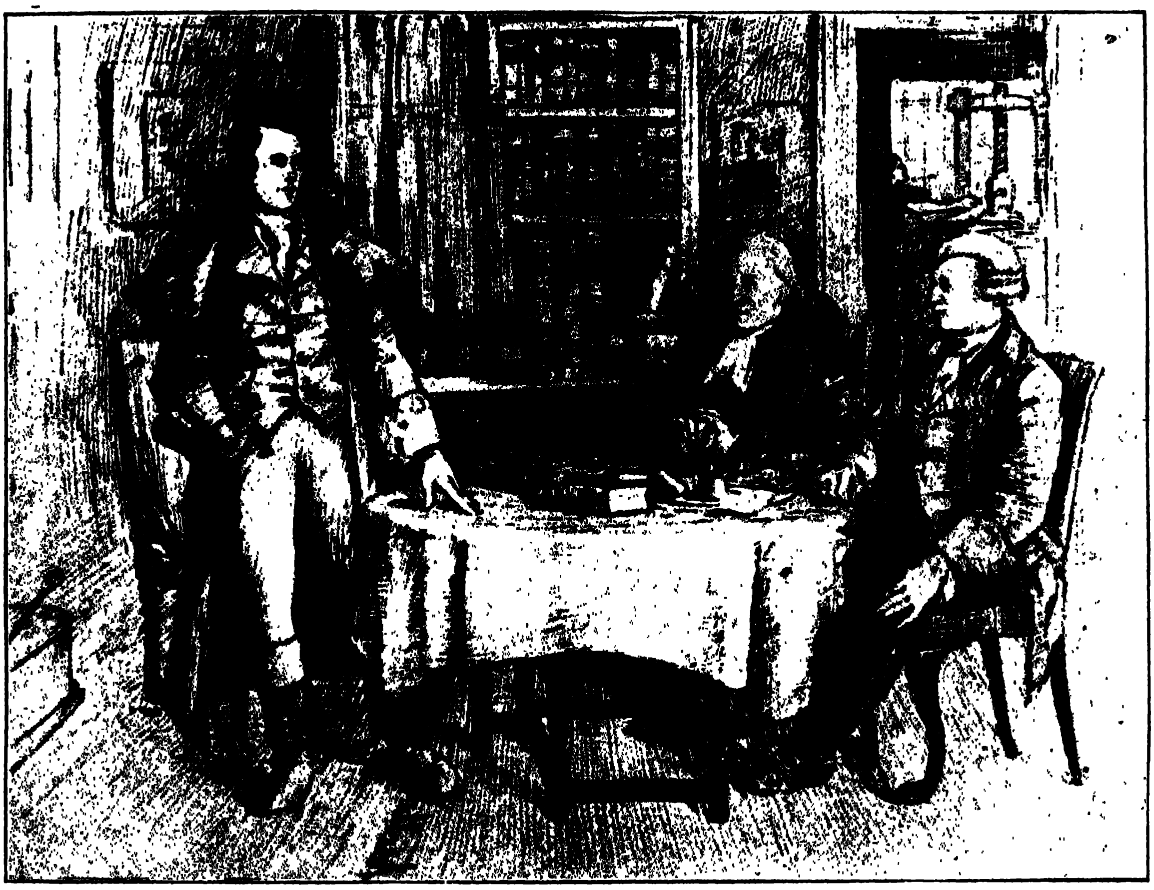
"The Life of Robert Burns." By Catherine Carswell. 15s. (Chatto & Windus.)

Once in a dark, bumping van between a Cornish town and village I argued about Robert Burns with half a dozen farmers' sons on their way back from an agricultural class. The argument had started over temperance and prohibition (all of them were Rechabites) when one said, "Well, take Robert Burns. Wouldn't he have written better poetry if he hadn't drunk so much?"

That was in 1928, so that here was Burns, a hundred and thirty-two years after his death, in a place so remote from Ayrshire, still being used as an object lesson for puritans.

The story typifies much that Mrs. Carswell has had to face in writing her new life of Burns. It is an attitude not confined to Rechabite farmers' sons. Read nearly every biography or biographical essay from Dr. Currie downwards. In more or less degree a covert or open moralising taints nearly all of them. If the biographer lacked sympathy with Burns ("to lack sympathy with Burns," says Mrs. Carswell, "is to lack sympathy with mankind") he produced something so horribly bad as Principal Shairp's book, which called "The Twa Herds," "Holy Willie's Prayer" and "The Ordination" "unpleasant satires," regretted their "unbecoming levity" and the fact that they were ever written. Stevenson attacked Principal Shairp, but under his greater sympathy lurked the same small adder of righteousness, and like many others he found it necessary to take sides in Robert's love affairs by attacking Jean. Henley had a better understanding, but must needs defend Jean by attacking Highland Mary. And so it went on.

In our own time, with some critics and readers anyway, the outlook on Burns has naturally altered. Professor Oliver Elton could write of him with critical truth and Sir Walter Raleigh praise his "enormous gifts of courage and candour" which raised him out of a spiritual prison.



But for all that the damage was done, and much of it was material damage, mutilation for righteousness' sake, and even destruction, of letters and alteration of manuscripts. And if those who use Burns as an object lesson are fewer to-day, there are still others who defend him with false charity and concealment, who still have something of the cautious moralising taint—others whom Burns (as Mrs. Carswell declares) would have hated as much as he hated gentility's "contumelious sneer."

A biographer, then, who would assimilate all the host of new letters and material as well as revalue the old, who would picture Burns honestly in a full narrative, still had stumbling blocks before her. But Mrs. Carswell has done her work fearlessly and well. In an easy-running, connected, frank story that paints brilliantly the Scottish background, that does not pause to consider more than one side of disputed points, but at the same time never twists them unnaturally, and never conceals anything relevant, Mrs. Carswell has consistently presented the true Burns, the Burns of his own letter:

> "A man conscious of having acted an honest part among his fellow creatures; even granting that he may have been the sport at times of passions and instincts; he goes to a great unknown Being who could have no other end in giving him existence but to make him happy; who gave him those passions and instincts and well knows their force. . . ."

Burns, above all things, knew himself, his own weaknesses and their value, and that alone makes an honest biography of him inspiring to read. His life is usually presented as dispiriting, the blackness of its frustration and failure letting in none of the light of its triumph; and it is, I think, to Mrs. Carswell's supreme credit that she revises this without upsetting the balance.

G. G.

Burns in the office of James Chalmers, printer and editor of the Aberdeen Journal.

From a drawing by William Smith junior, the original of which now hangs in the editorial room of the Aberdeen Daily Journal.

A LADY OF HIGH DEGREE

Tudor Pictures

" A Woman of the Tudor Age." Edited by Lady Cecilie Goff. 18s. (Murray.)

In this book Lady Goff has supplied us with some very valuable information, drawn from official sources, of the life led by aristocratic society in Tudor England. This alone would have been a sufficient justification for her work, but she has also written a realistic and human, if somewhat incoherent biography of one of the most important women of that time, and, starting from the point of view of a contemporary and often of a participant, has thrown on some of the outstanding events of the political and social history of the period, sidelights which are the more valuable because they do not come from the usual coldly logical, external standpoint.

Katherine Willoughby, who is the nominal subject of the book, and whose story serves as its main unifying element, was an offspring of the old nobility of mediæval England and married a man who, though not of so old a family, had by his previous marriages and his own abilities risen to a position of very high importance in the State. Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, the second husband of Henry VIII's sister Mary, is almost as intriguing a figure as his fourth wife Katherine, and at his death, half-way through the book, there is a distinct climax, from which we do not recover until well on in the later pages. The account of his share in the suppression of the religious revolt in Lincolnshire is particularly good. The importance of this rather neglected part of the Pilgrimage of Grace and the peculiar nature of the revolt are brought out very well by a judicious selection of documents and a careful commentary.

The Duchess of Suffolk.

From a miniature by Holbein, in the possession of the Earl of Ancaster.

From "A Woman of the Tudor Age," by Lady Cecilie Goff (John Murray).

The individual history of the Duchess of Suffolk, important as it is, is not the most valuable achievement of this book; this achievement lies rather in the faithful portrayal, with the aid of contemporary documents, of the social life of the Tudor period, with its system of wardships and "contract" marriages, and of the domestic life of the aristocracy, illustrated by comprehensive household accounts. This aspect of Lady Goff's book makes it of great value as a supplement to the political history of the time.

K. V. M.

THE FIRST LORD COWLEY

Wellington's Brother

" The Diary and Correspondence of Henry Wellesley, first Lord Cowley, 1790–1846." Edited by his grandson, Colonel the Hon. F. A. Wellesley. 21s. net. (Hutchinson.)

When in 1759 a young Irish peer of twenty-four years of age, Lord Mornington, married the daughter of Viscount Dungannon, it could hardly have been anticipated that the five sons to be born of this marriage would all obtain distinction, and in four cases win new titles for themselves; two of them indeed rose to the highest celebrity in the persons of the Marquis Wellesley, the greatest of all Governors-General of India, and the Duke of Wellington; the second son was created Baron Maryborough; the fourth became Rector of Chelsea and Prebendary (but not Bishop, as incorrectly stated by the editor of the book under review) of Durham; while the fifth, Henry Wellesley (1773–1847), the subject of this volume, entered the Diplomatic Service, became British Ambassador at Vienna and Paris, and was created Baron Cowley in 1828.

Henry Wellesley was fortunate, of course, in that he entered public life under the ægis of his two famous brothers, who had already conclusively demonstrated the brilliance and ability of the Wellesley family. These high exemplars were never forgotten, for in 1841, when Lord Cowley was a man of sixty-eight and reappointed British Ambassador in Paris, he wrote to Lord Wellesley: " It has ever been my pride to be considered as your pupil, and in all the public situations I have held it has been my chief endeavour to conduct myself in such a manner as not to discredit the affectionate interest you have never ceased to manifest towards me."

The letters and diaries of Henry Wellesley make good reading. He was originally in the Army, and served with the Life Guards in Flanders. On returning from Lisbon in 1794 he was captured by a French frigate. He escaped from Brest, and succeeded in reaching England in an open boat on the second day, after experiencing extreme hardships of severe weather and cold. He was accompanied by fourteen persons; one of these was drowned, and three others died in the boat from exposure. Many curious matters transpire in these pages. Henry Wellesley was concerned with the duel between Canning and Lord Castlereagh. Again, during the Congress of Vienna in 1815 the Emperor Alexander of Russia became so exasperated with Prince Metternich that he desired to waive the privileges of his rank and fight a duel with the arrogant Austrian Minister. They habitually cut each other, but amity was unexpectedly restored by the news of Napoleon's escape from Elba, for Metternich was compelled to announce the fact to the Emperor, " which ended by their embracing, and they became so intimate that Alexander never took any step without consulting him."

In his diary for September 20th, 1845, Cowley gives an amusing glimpse of Queen Victoria's character and her jealous preoccupation with Prince Albert and his precedence:

> " All the accounts from Germany are full of complaints of the Queen's behaviour upon her visit to Germany. Upon her arrival at Cologne she took offence at the pas having been given to the Archduke in preference to Prince Albert, the Queen of Prussia having taken the arm of the Archduke. The Queen in consequence refused to dine in public that day, and the King of Prussia put off the dinner which was to have consisted of one hundred and sixty guests. Her Majesty's conduct during the whole of her visit to the King of Prussia was equally ungracious and offended everybody—and her meanness in money matters has made her the general theme of contempt and censure. Prince Albert and his suite at the review appeared in plain clothes, upon the pretext that they had not brought their uniforms with them. It is to be apprehended that this Royal visit will not contribute to make us more popular in Germany. As a contrast to the parsimony of the English Sovereign, the Empress of Russia is expressly enjoined by the Emperor, during her residence abroad, to spend fifty thousand pounds a month. Her Britannic Majesty had better stay at home than have these displays of ill-temper and parsimony in a foreign land."

This entertaining book is enriched by many interesting family and other portraits.

S. M. E.

THOMAS CHATTERTON: Sinned Against but Sinning

"A Life of Thomas Chatterton." By E. H. W. Meyerstein. 30s. (Ingpen & Grant.)

Were there required an example of the gross perversion of truth by English sentimentality, hardly a better could be found than the popular myth of Chatterton, the youthful genius driven to his death by the cold-blooded machinations of his established elders. Chatterton was without doubt an astonishing genius, but he was also without doubt an unprincipled rogue. The evidence of his contemporaries on this aspect of his character is conclusive: "A young man of very uncommon abilities but bad principles": "choleric beyond description": "He was an instance that a complete genius and a complete rogue can be formed before a man is of age." Admittedly the last quotation is the opinion of Horace Walpole, who has played the part of villain in the popular imagination, but who was indubitably the injured party in any transactions he had with Chatterton.

One of the great merits of Mr. Meyerstein's book is that he does Walpole justice, on the whole. He has written a work at once exhaustive and profound, in which he traces in great detail the genesis of Chatterton's extraordinary deceptions, for genius though he was, to call him anything but a forger is to burke the issue. Many have tried to defend him upon the grounds of the popularity of spurious literary ascriptions at the time, citing "Ossian" and the "Castle of Otranto" as witnesses. But they forget that the author of neither of these works attempted to make capital out of his pious and literary fraud.

Chatterton, on the other hand, bid for Walpole's patronage with forged antiquities, and that they were literary forgeries makes not the slightest difference. That Walpole had the sense to see through them has been laid to his blame for two centuries, most ridiculously and unfairly. What the result would have been if Chatterton had approached Walpole with his verses rather than his prose, or had avowed his authorship of the Rowley cycles, is an idle and an unprofitable speculation; but at least it should be remembered that Walpole always recognised the poetic genius of the youth to whose discreditable practices he owed prolonged and unjust misrepresentation.

For those who can unravel the convolutions of Mr. Meyerstein's sentences (and those who do not make the effort will be missing something), this new life of Chatterton is a work of the first moment. It is the fruit of nine years' research, and every page might be expanded into a treatise. It is indeed this very plethora of learning that has resulted in so difficult a book. Mr. Meyerstein seems to have tried to squeeze into each sentence what could with advantage have occupied two, if not three, and with greater clearness. But it is ungracious to carp.

R. T.

WILLIAM WINDHAM

"Early Life and Diaries of William Windham." By R. W. Ketton Cremer. 15s. (Faber & Faber.)

No oblivion could be more iniquitous or less comprehensible than that which has overtaken the name of William Windham. He was, as a contemporary put it, "at once eminent for learning, taste, eloquence, wit, courage and personal accomplishments": he held office as Secretary for War under Pitt: he enjoyed the friendship of such men as Fox, Burke and Dr. Johnson: he flits, as Mr. Ketton-Cremer aptly says, "an agreeable shadow" through almost all the memoirs of the late eighteenth century: he was one of the finest orators of an age in which oratory was not suspect: he was an extremely popular man both in those exalted circles in which, by right of birth, fortune and political eminence, he habitually moved, and with the masses, whose affection he gained by his ardent championship of their natural sports.

He left behind him a reputation such as few have enjoyed, and the immense mass of the Windham papers, edited in 1866 by Mrs. Baring, as well as copious journals and papers which remained in the possession of his heirs. It is from these that Mr. Ketton-Cremer has composed his book, and a very delightful one at that. It must however be acknowledged that by far the most entertaining parts of it are those contributed by the author himself, and that the extracts from Windham's own diaries are rather disappointing.

Windham was a man of an extraordinary temper, morbidly self-reproachful, timid, obstinate and melancholy, suffering agonies of conscience for little or no reason. He laboured under a depressing inhibition, what he himself calls a "feel," which made him question his every impulse and must have made his life a misery. It is mainly with this spiritual conflict that his early diaries are concerned, and if they had been fuller and more conscientiously written up, they would have given us a surpassingly absorbing record of the struggles of a mind and heart in every way noble. But to him, as to so many people of the same temperament, the systematic keeping of a diary was impossible.

All this may prejudice people against the book, but that is the last thing intended. It is a book that all lovers of eighteenth century memoirs must treasure. Mr. Ketton-Cremer is the right man for the work, and no praise can be too high for the way in which he has presented his subject.

R. T.

JANE AUSTEN

"Jane Austen." By R. Brimley Johnson. 15s. (Dent.)

Mr. Brimley Johnson has for many years been well known as an expert upon the subject of Jane Austen and her works, and in his new book he brings to fruition the labours, almost, of a lifetime. What particularly emerges from it is the charm of Jane Austen as a woman. Nothing could be farther from the truth than the acidulated judgments of the feline Mrs. Mitford and her daughters. The novels themselves should be a sufficient indication of the character of their author, well bred, witty, clever and satirical as she was.

Jane Austen.

Mr. Johnson cannot, in the nature of things, have anything new to say, for there seems to be nothing new to be found out.

R. T.

BOCCACCIO

"The Life of Giovanni Boccaccio." By Thomas Caldecot Chubb. 15s. (Cassell.)

Giovanni Boccaccio is one of those authors better known by repute than by a constant perusal of their works. Of the mass of writings which this remarkable man left behind him, only the tales that comprise the "Decameron" have survived in general recognition. And these perhaps for two reasons besides their actual merits: they served as models for Chaucer, who gave many of the Italian's characters a fame, in England at least, which they would not otherwise have enjoyed; and some of them are of that frank grossness which gives an interest by no means literary to several ancient and a fair number of modern authors. But Giovanni Boccaccio was more than a lively retailer of current anecdotes that make human beings laugh at themselves; he possessed many rich gifts—those of character drawing, of colour, of satire, of industry, of a brilliant delight in the eager life surging round him. His own career was varied, full of action, if not always fortunate; he was the friend of the elegant Petrarch, he lectured on Dante, he knew poverty, he came near to a reformation of spirit and manners. In pain and old age he turned to spiritual longings; even if this aspiration did take the form of relic-collecting, this only meant that, like many a more enlightened spirit, he could not rise above the need of the symbols of his age; few can. Like the English poet he helped to inspire, Boccaccio felt the true pangs of genius:

> "The life so short, the craft so long to learn,
> The assay so hard, so sharp the conquering."

The absorbingly interesting life of this brilliant and lovable man is told with learning and sympathy by Mr. Chubb. The result is an excellent book, which can be warmly recommended, both to those who wish to know something of what lies behind the glittering name of the creator of the famous "patient Griselda," and those who delight to dwell on pictures of that lively, lusty, yet somehow fragrant and ingenuous Italy of the fourteenth century, already the cradle of the arts and sciences.

The old illuminators used both vinegar and honey to obtain their pure and dazzling colours, and Boccaccio employed the acid and the sweet to realise his vivid effects; he could write of his contemporaries bitterly (more bitterly, alas, as his own joyous youth vanished!), and he could write of them with that warm tolerant humour and compassionate tenderness that is one of the most endearing qualities any writer can have.

William Blake said that "as Linnæus numbered the plants, so Chaucer numbered the classes of men," but perhaps this honour should rather be given to his forerunner—Giovanni Boccaccio.

MARJORIE BOWEN.

HEINE

"Heinrich Heine: A Critical Examination of the Poet and His Works. By H. Walter. 12s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

An adequate review of Mr. Walter's able study would require pages. Here we can only indicate its general method and spirit. The biographical facts and the literary criticism are intermingled, the work of each successive phase being dealt with in connection with its environment. This may somewhat hinder a reader from obtaining a unified and summary idea of the poet's genius; but clearly in the case of Heine, the nature and quality of whose work depended so much upon his surroundings, no other method is easily possible. Moreover, it adds enormously to the interest of the study to see, under Mr. Walter's guidance, how the interplay of external circumstance and inward spirit led Heine into romanticism, out of it, and back into it again; how it gave character to his political writings; and how in many other ways it coloured and shaped his work.

The author has evidently made a very independent study of his theme. H. W. C.

MR. PEPYS

"Pepys." By John Drinkwater. 21s. (Heinemann.)

The misfortune that attends a successful diarist is that his private or social life, of which he generally writes in his journal, assumes in the eyes of posterity a disproportionate importance. This is not a matter of much moment in such cases as that of Walpole, whose public life was not really very momentous, or of Hickey, who had none at all; but with Samuel Pepys it amounts to a very serious injustice. Entirely through his own fault, we tend now to regard him solely in the light in which he presents himself in his Diaries that of a rather uxorious, inquisitive, snobbish, flirtatious, garrulous, intemperate, fussy little man. In reality he was a supremely competent civil servant, who did more, perhaps, than any other man of his time to lay the foundations of English sea-power, and struggled manfully, for many years and against appalling odds, to bring some method and efficiency into the chaotic departments of the Naval Offices. But all this is forgotten in the turmoil of those ten or so years during which he noted with extravagant detail every triviality of his daily life.

In so far as Mr. Drinkwater has insisted upon Pepys's essential importance as a public official his book is to be greatly commended. It gives a pleasant enough résumé of Pepys's antecedents, private and official life, and not unhappily retired old age. It is a work of some competence, but pedestrian, and seeks to acquire a raison d'être which some indeed might well consider to be questionable, by raising and, when judically weighed and argued, settling difficulties where none is to be found. For instance, the lengthy discussion of Pepys's peculations at the Navy Board seems entirely unnecessary, since anybody knows that what would now be deemed flagrancies of corruption were, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, regarded but as the natural perquisites of office. However, for those, and there are many nowadays, who like their classics at second-hand, this is a book worthy of attention.

R. T.

SHREWSBURY

"Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury. By T. C. Nicholson and A. S. Turberville. 15s. (Cambridge Press.)

Charles Talbot was born in 1660, and succeeded as a boy to a considerable fortune and the headship of one of the oldest and most distinguished families in England. In spite of his youth he took a leading part in bringing over William of Orange, and he became a Secretary of State in 1689. For the rest of his life he remained one of the most important political figures in the country, and was perhaps more than any other man responsible for the peaceful accession of George I.

This book is an account of Shrewsbury's political career. It is a conscientious piece of work and is quite pleasantly written, but it is rather dull. Shrewsbury is a wooden figure jerked in and out of office by the authors. No attempt is made to bring either him, or the England in which he lived, before the imagination of the reader. We are told he was a man of wide culture and great social charm, but there is almost nothing here about his private life, what he read, or with whom he talked. Even his political life is dealt with unsatisfactorily. It was full of unexpected resignations, and curious alliances with unlikely people at unlikely times. Some clues are given here, but clumsily. The authors scarcely try to understand or to explain the workings of Shrewsbury's mind. The treatment of his intrigues with the Jacobites, is very inadequate.

The authors admit that the "story has been told with as little comment and conjecture as possible," and add: "It is well to propound the puzzle completely before attempting its solution." But surely it is the business of a biographer at least to comment, and not to supply us with two hundred and twenty pages of assorted bones, and only in the last ten attempt to fit them together and supply them with any flesh. N. H. F.

From a camera portrait by HOWARD COSTER.

PHILIP GUEDALLA.

THE NORTHERN HURRICANE

A New Life of Gustavus Adolphus

By Marjorie Bowen

* "Gustavus Adolphus." By Lieutenant-General Sir George MacMunn, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., D.S.O. 18s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Great as is the fame of this Swedish king, named by experts the first of modern soldiers, extraordinary as were his achievements, brilliant as was his personality and tragic as was his death on what used to be termed "the bed of honour," his is not a familiat figure in English letters. Perhaps because there is something superhuman about the noble warrior, perhaps because the loftiness which marks all his actions puts him above the common sympathy of his fellows, Gustavus Adolphus has been rather avoided by both the historian and the romancist. Sir Walter Scott, in "The Legend of Montrose," gave the impression made by the Lion of the North on a professional soldier of the time, but made no attempt to depict the man himself; in "The Amber Witch," by Wilhelm Meinhold, is a glimpse of the great Protestant hero which remains in the reader's memory with the vividness of something actually seen; but it is only a glimpse.

Gustavus Adolphus.

Perhaps Gustavus Adolphus has been avoided because he lacked that touch of the extravagant, of the violent, the strange, that so attracts us all; yet his life was passed in a tumult of mighty action and he was the hero of one of the most tremendous dramas ever enacted; nor did he lack the more tender strokes which go to make up a magnificent character; his private integrity was never impeached; he was eminently lovable, he was romantic enough to give a lustre to his youth by a delicate love idyll, to travel as Captain Gars (Gustavus Adolphus Rex Sueciæ) to view his prospective bride incognito, he was probably the most superb-looking man, with the exception perhaps of Edward IV, who has ever led an army, and he died young in the moment of victory. Yet even the great German, Schiller, chose Wallenstein and Piccolomini as his heroes when he wrote of the Thirty Years War.

Does Gustavus Adolphus owe his remoteness to the fact that he had learnt what Marcus Aurelius taught of spiritual withdrawal from the world ?:

> "The soul can assume her own fair weather, and her own fair sea, > Bethink thee of this power Nature has given thee."

It is very fitting that the life of this mighty man should be written by a soldier of the great distinction of Lieutenant-General Sir George MacMunn, who is able to describe military operations with a precision and clarity impossible to the civilian; how many accounts of famous battles are perforce but a confusion of terms! But Sir George, one feels, could "work out on paper" all the complicated campaigns of the victorious Swede and his little model army; he does give diagrams of Breitenfeld and Lutzen. Sir George is also a more than competent historian of the vast intricate policies of the Counter-Reformation; his style is lucid and direct, and he makes the most baffling interplay of events understandable; there is a short bibliography of books in English and French, a map and portrait, but no index; it is to be hoped that Sir George will write the lives of other famous soldiers, of whom may be said "man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, pompous in the grave," and "a grain of glory mixed with humbleness."

THE LIGHTER SIDE

Humorous Books for All Tastes

By
F. A. Rice

"The Man Who Made Gold." By Hilaire Belloc. 7s. 6d. (Arrowsmith.)
"More Misleading Cases." By A. P. Herbert. 5s. (Methuen.)
"The Dickens Advertiser." By Bernard Darwin. 7s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)
"Adam's Apples." By Harry Graham. 5s. (Methuen.)
"Things That Annoy Me." By E. V. Knox. 5s. (Methuen.)
"Two Legs and Four." By Anthony Armstrong. 5s. (Methuen.)

Like the Speaker of the Evening, the authors of these various works need no introduction; and those who this Christmas may be tempted to run a finger along that treacherous shelf marked "Humour" in the bookshops, will do well to let it pause opposite any of the above.

Seemingly Mr. Belloc and Mr. G. K. Chesterton have fused together in the production of those satires known as Chester-Bellocs—indeed Mr. Chesterton has lost quite a ton in the process—and now with the arrival of their latest, "The Man Who Made Gold," we may say emphatically, "Let no publisher put them asunder." The story of the book is clear from its title—would the same might be said of other novels!—but though Mr. Charles Lexington, Fellow of St. Olaf's, had the secret of making gold, he did not actually discover it. That had been the privilege of an eccentric undergraduate, who later perished miserably, leaving Mr. Lexington with a small bar of crystalline substance, a minute quantity of which, dropped into molten lead, turned that lead to gold. Not doubting that he would be able to manufacture more of the crystalline substance when the time came, Mr. Lexington proceeds to market his gold. And though he does so cautiously and at enormous profit, the profit soon appears insignificant, and in his endeavour to do better for himself, throws caution to the winds and the money market on the verge of panic. Unfortunately he tampers with his talisman, but his subsequent adventures, so amusingly illustrated by Mr. Chesterton's pencil drawings, maintain the same high level which have long characterised, etc. . . . and those who contemplate giving the new Chester-Belloc away as a Christmas present will do well to buy it in advance, so that they may read it for themselves; and very likely keep it for themselves.

Aunt Margaret at Ramsgate.
From "Adam's Apple," by Harry Graham (Methuen).

Misleading Cases see Mr. A. P. Herbert at his most ingenious, and this further selection, reported, edited and annotated by him—the majority of which have already been carefully noted by students and others in the pages of Punch—now find themselves in a companion volume to their predecessor, which so far has set them the encouraging example of running into five editions.

Mr. Bernard Darwin may be said to have lifted his eye momentarily off the ball in order to give us "The Dickens Advertiser," but seldom has golfer lifted eye to better advantage. He has made a study of the advertisements which appeared in the original parts of Dickens's novels, and while they amuse they also instruct, as those interested in early Victorianism will soon discover. There was a firm in the Strand advertising a "Crimean Outfit" for eighteen guineas, comprising requisites "for Officers proceeding to the Seat of War; also Portable India-rubber Boats as used in the Harbour of Balaclava." Who can recall the Caspiato, or folding bonnet for ladies? And which of our great-grandfathers was it who fell for The Gentleman's Real Head of Hair, or Invisible Peruke which was worn "round the head in a manner of a fillet, leaving the ears loose." Nearly all the advertisements are reproduced in their original form, being accompanied by Mr. Darwin's delightful running commentary.

When Captain Harry Graham dedicates his latest book "To the President of the United States of America, to whom we owe so much, without whose kind encouragement these verses were all written," it is pretty clear what we are in for. Nor does he disappoint us—his rhymes are as light-hearted and youthful as ever; and Mr. John Reynolds's illustrations are most entertaining.

Finally, to the already long list of books whose contents are "here reprinted by the courtesy of the proprietors of Punch," are added "Evoe's" "Things That Annoy Me" and A. A.'s "Two Legs and Four"; though why Mr. Knox should be so Annoyed by these Things, when we are so amused by them, is difficult to see. As for "Two Legs and Four"—which is a collection of stories mainly about children and dogs—the publishers appear somewhat doubtful of its success, for on the jacket they commit themselves no further than to say that its readers "should laugh heartily." Don't worry, Mr. Armstrong—they will!

Reconciliation of Science and Religion.
From "The Man Who Made Gold," by Hilaire Belloc (Arrowsmith).

A WHIFF FROM THE PAST

Comic Confessions

"The Georgian Confession Book. 7s. 6d. (Foyles.)
"A Year of Good Luck." Collected by Edith Brampton. 2s. 6d. (Heath Cranton.)
"More Ruthless Rhymes." By Harry Graham. 3s. 6d. (Edward Arnold.)

I never met old Uncle Ainscow, the hero of my young imagination, but I can still imagine him more vividly than many other relatives whom I did see often.

He was a jolly sailor who left his cheerful personality stamped for ever between the covers of my mother's confession book. And what a jovial old sinner he was! He elbowed in with his frank pagan avowals between the bashful confessions of a maiden whose choice of feminine virtues was humility, and a tactful youth who professed to worship at the same shrine and who eventually married her.

But the confession book which revealed disappeared along with the crinoline which obscured. A confession book now would tell us nothing we did not already know about our friends. Nowadays repressions have gone by the board. We live in an age when our opinions and preferences concerning the most intimate subjects are shouted from the housetops. We know far too much about one another, and have no hesitation in telling others what qualities we most admire and find lacking in them. In short, we read one another like the books our grandparents compiled to ventilate their suppressed desires, and only for our descendants or for the student of manners and modes will our tabulated "confessions" have the slightest novelty.

Superstitions we still have with us. They die hard but there are few new ones being born. The aeroplane, the tube and the cinema have not yet minted a new currency. If a young man gets up and offers his seat to a lady in a bus it has no significance except that he is going to get out at the next stop. But perhaps it is as well, for to be a thoroughly superstitious person is already to have a whole-time occupation. It would be very unlucky for an anthology of superstition to fall into the hands of a woman who is both conscientious and superstitious. Her life would become a nightmare of embarrassing and conflicting ceremonies if she plays for safety in the pursuit of love, riches and health. She would grow moles between her eyes, on the right forehead, on the arm and shoulder and on the right ear. She would sneeze not only over her right shoulder but here, there, and everywhere. She would have pockets made so that she might carry in them live spiders, lemons, and the small bone of a leg of mutton. She would, in short, be forced to imperil her chances of obtaining those pleasant etceteras of a woman's life, good looks and friendship, in order to make certain of its big prizes.

We are all of us more callously self-reliant than we were thirty years ago before the reformer, Harry Graham, brought out his first great textbook and spread his gospel of ruthlessness through England. It would be going too far to say that he first brought ruthlessness into the nursery, but he is at least a Herod of verse and he holds the scales of ruthlessness more evenly between youth and age. After thirty years the note of righteous querulousness is not silent, and he sings:

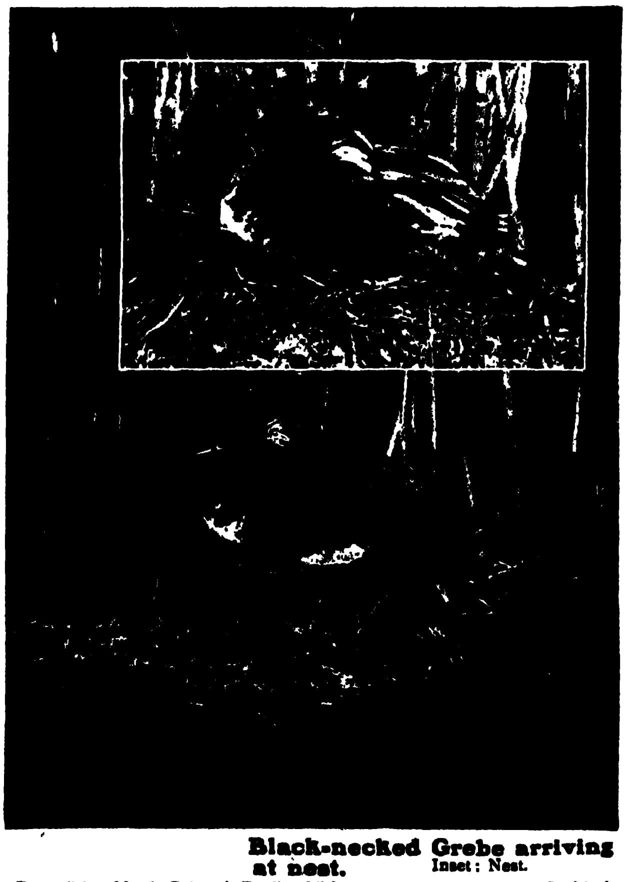
> "When Grandmama fell off the boat,
> And couldn't swim (and wouldn't float),
> Matilda just stood by and smiled,
> I almost could have slapped the child."

But a moment later he is the understanding exponent of the perplexities which assail modern youth and points the finger of scorn at its spurious imitators:

> "It seems that with Eternal Youth
> Great-grandmama is gifted,
> For though (to tell the honest truth)
> Her face has twice been 'lifted,'
> To-day she doesn't look to me
> A minute more than ninety-three."

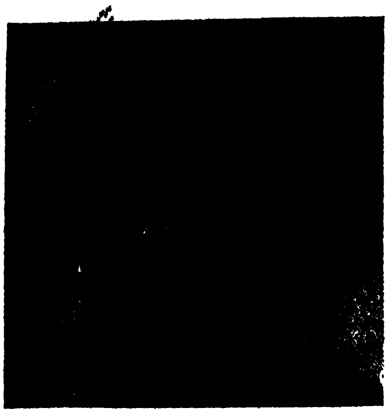
GILES DUGDALE.

BIRD WATCHERS



Julian Huxley's Advice

"Bird-Watching and Bird Behaviour." By Julian Huxley. 5s. (Chatto & Windus.)
"A Bird Watcher's Notebook." By J. W. Seigne. 12s. 6d. (Philip Allan.)
"New Zealand Birds." By W. R. B. Oliver. (New Zealand: Fine Arts.)



Those who to-day desire to take up the study of wild life—which many of us regard as among the most fascinating pursuits possible, whether we live in the country or exist in a town—are much more fortunate than were their predecessors. Books on the subject multiply apace; practical in the main, interesting and written by true "watchers of the Wild." When the present writer was a boy he would have given much for such helpful advice as that tendered by Mr. Julian Huxley on the subject of bird-watching. To know what to seek and how to observe saves time and disappointment, and I heartily commend the little volume. Mr. Huxley tells how, at the age of fourteen, he became a real bird-watcher; and we must thank that green woodpecker which visited his aunt's laundry yard, not merely for arousing his interest but for convincing him that "under my nose, in the familiar woods and fields, lived strange and beautiful creatures of whose strangeness and beauty I had been lamentably unaware."

When such knowledge comes in this illuminating fashion, a new Watcher of the Wild is born. Mr. J. W. Seigne, however, came to the study of birds in different manner. He had been a slayer; but he gave up shooting and turned his estate into a sanctuary, chiefly in order that he might study that illusive bird, the woodcock. He has discovered much—and not only about woodcock. From Great Britain to New Zealand is a long flight, but with birds to carry us it is easily made. There has been no authoritative work on New Zealand birds since Buller's, published nearly fifty years ago, and Mr. W. R. B. Oliver, Director of the Dominion Museum, Wellington, renders a great service both to his fellow-countrymen and to ornithologists the world over by giving them his comprehensive, well documented and well illustrated volume.

W. R. CALVERT.

Black-necked Grebe arriving at nest. Inset: Nest.
From "Rambles in Britain's Birdland," by Oliver G. Pike (Herbert Jenkins).

Helen Shackleton
(Mrs. E. H. Brietscke), author of "Saucy and All" (Macmillan).

Awaited Appearances

Notes on Some Books to be Published in December

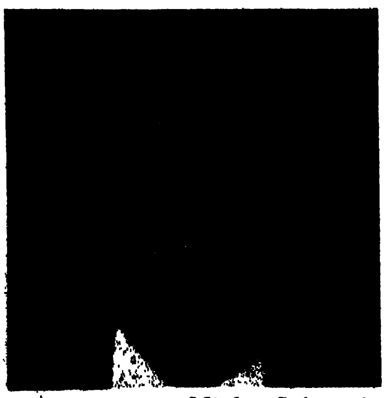
Portrait by Hughes. Miss Pamela Wynne, author of "East is Always East" (Philip Allan).

Persian Painting

Next month the great Persian Exhibition opens at Burlington House, and stories of the treasures to be seen there are already stirring our curiosity. "Persian Painting," by Basil Gray, of the British Museum (Benn) provides that background of knowledge so necessary to the full appreciation of the beauties of work alien in technique and culture. Mr. Gray sketches the history of the various Persian schools, of their rise and decline, and the peculiarities of composition, colouring, landscape and costume. The book will be fully illustrated.

A Provincial Lady



Miss E. M. Delafield's delightful "Diary of a Provincial Lady," which has been appearing in Time and Tide, is to be published in book form by Macmillan. This book should prove one of the most popular of the month's publications.

Dr. Barnardo

J. Wesley Bready has written the life of a pioneer in "Dr. Barnardo," which Allen & Unwin will publish. The book opens with an historical introduction, and traces the story of Barnardo's work grow a tiny Donkey shed Ragged School to an organisation which has influenced legislation the world over. The battles which he had to fight against prejudice, bigotry and antiquated laws are told in detail.

The Vision of William

William of course is William Langland; his vision concerned Piers the Plowman. This famous Middle English poem has been translated into Modern English by Donald Attwater, and illustrated with woodcuts by Denis Tegetmeier. It will be issued in a limited edition by Cassells. Tegetmeier is said to be a true satirist—the man of flame, not of squibs; and there are seven full-page engravings. Personally it is for his work that I shall most welcome the book. Those sufficiently interested in Langland to appreciate and understand him are quite competent to read his poem as he wrote it, without the aid of "translations."

Mirko Jelusich,
author of "Caesar" (Allen & Unwin).

The Fall of Christianity

Professor G. J. Heering has written an indictment of Christianity in its relation to war and the modern state. He considers that Christianity has embraced political absolutism and nationalism, and made far greater concessions to the expediencies of the world than the Christian ethic permits. The book, which is translated from the Dutch by Rev. J. W. Thompson, will be published by Allen & Unwin.

Greek Independence

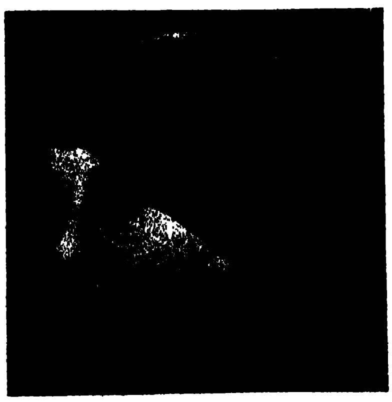
The Cambridge University Press is publishing Mr. C. W. Crawley's "The Question of Greek Independence." This is a study of British policy in the Near East, 1821–33, and its publication will celebrate the centenary of Greek independence. The period treated marks the beginnings of modern Greece and the decline of Turkey, and is a turning-point in the relations between England and Russia, which makes comprehensible the temper of the Crimean War.

An Omnibus Wilde

The latest addition to the "Everyman's Library" (Dent) is a selection of Oscar Wilde's best work. One may now obtain in one volume, for the small sum of two shillings, two plays, "The Importance of Being Earnest" and "Lady Windermere's Fan"; his novel, "The Picture of Dorian Gray"; his "Ballad of Reading Gaol"; and his fine but little known essay, "The Soul of Man Under Socialism." There is a preface by Hesketh Pearson.

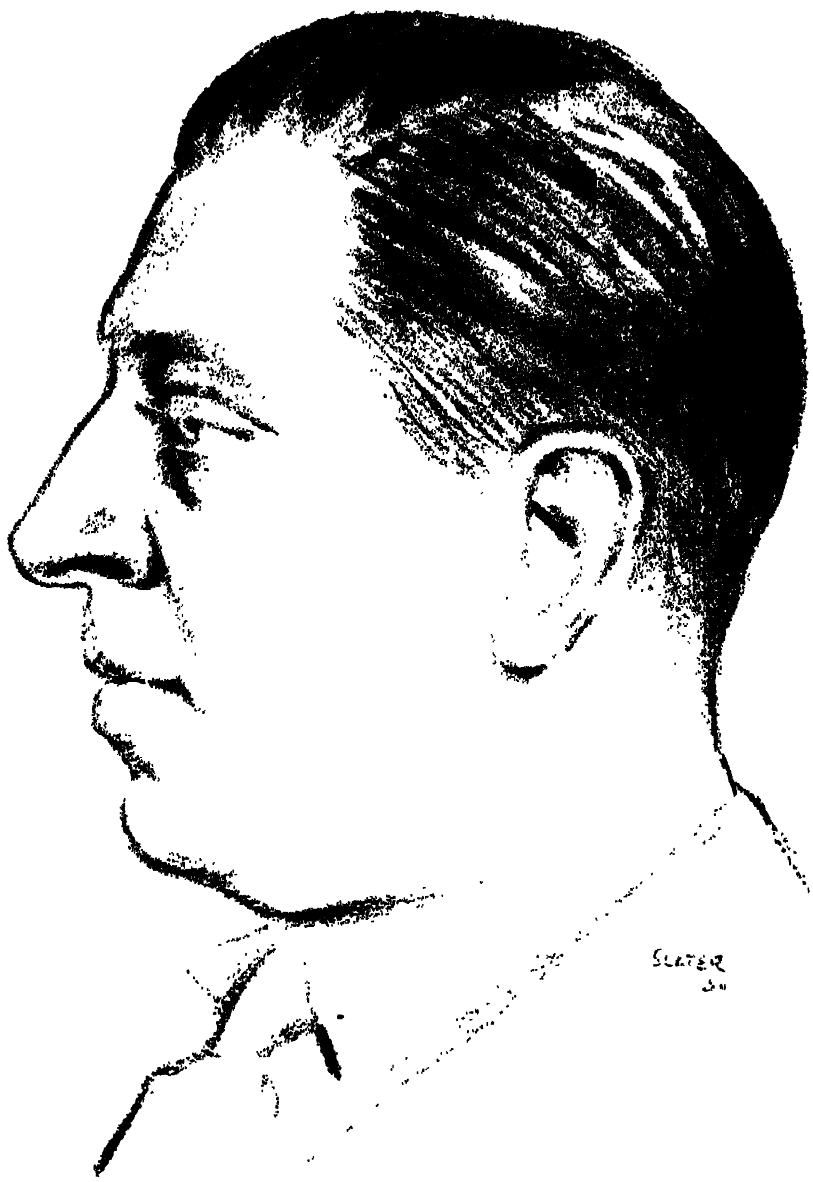
"Hell in the Foreign Legion"

Romantically, via "Beau Geste," the Foreign Legion is a popular place. Actually there can be few more apposite descriptions of it than that in the title of this book (Allen & Unwin), in which E. F. Löhndorff portrays faithfully the appalling hardships and inhuman punishments to which the men are subjected.



For Bibliophiles

"The Bibliophile's Miscellany, 1931" (Cassell) is the offspring of the "Bibliophile's Almanack," edited in 1927 and 1928 by Oliver Simon and Harold Child. The Miscellany for 1931 includes articles by Edmund Blunden, Arthur Hayward and Hamish Miles, and there will be advance information about the activities of the most famous Presses during the coming year and (probably) insets of some interesting new types. The book will be printed by the Curwen Press.



A Children's Book

Miss Anne Parish is already known by her novels, "The Perennial Bachelor" and "All Kneeling." Benn's are now publishing a charming children's book from her pen, entitled "Floating Island," which she has illustrated herself.

READER.

Miss Margaret Anderson,
author of "My 30 Years' War" (Knopf).

From a drawing by FRANK SLATER.

OSBERT SITWELL.

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
CHRISTMAS, 1930

From a drawing by HELEN WILSON.

THE HON. VICTORIA SACKVILLE-WEST

BROADCASTING FOR BOOKMEN

Some December Talks of Literary Interest

Selected by J. D. Crawshaw

The Poet Laureate started a valuable train of thought when he spoke, a few weeks ago, at the Festival of the Scottish Association for the Speaking of Verse. He observed that broadcasting could be a great asset in the dissemination of poetry, and he expressed the belief that, if the broadcasting people would work with the poets, we could have one of the most remarkable schools of poetry that we have had for centuries.

Why not more Poetry?

Mr. Masefield's opinions are generally inspiring, and the more one considers his pronouncement about broadcasting the more one comes to realise the shortage of poetry in the present broadcasting programmes. While the B.B.C. is so anxious to make us appreciate good music, our appreciation of good poetry receives far less attention; and yet there are many people (myself included) who would rather listen to a good poem than to some of these unintelligible noises which modern Frenchmen call music. I may be desperately low-brow, but I would far rather listen to a recitation of Mr. Chesterton's "Lepanto" than to a performance of M. Ravel's "Bolero"; and I think that there is a good case for more poetry and less music in the B.B.C. programmes. In December the only concession to poetry is the continuation of the series of readings from Modern Poets (December 1st, 8th, 15th, 22nd and 29th: 6 p.m.).

"David Copperfield" continued

The general talks for December, though interesting in many ways, are rather sparse in material of particular appeal to bookmen. There is however the continuation of Mr. Clinton Baddeley's readings from "David Copperfield" (December 4th, 11th and 18th: 6 p.m.); and since Mr. Clinton Baddeley reads with plenty of life and expression they are well worth hearing. Mrs. Oliver Strachey is making two of her pleasant excursions into the domain of "Reading for Fun," and her comments on "Books about Nature, Animals and Children" (London Regional, December 5th: 10.45 a.m.) and "Some Types of Novels, Short Stories and Other Books" (London Regional, December 19th: 10.45 a.m) are likely to provide a good deal of wisdom in a short space of time. The craze for "omnibus" volumes seems to have affected her in her choice of subjects, for the title of her second December talk is surely an "omnibus" title if ever there was one!

New Books

The usual weekly talks on new books are being given by Miss V. Sackville-West (December 1st, 15th and 29th: 7 p.m.) and Mr. Desmond MacCarthy (December 8th and 22nd: 7 p.m.); but there is only one talk on new novels. This is by Mr. A. Duff Cooper (December 11th: 7 p.m.). The readings from the biographies and autobiographies of great explorers, under the title of "The Spirit of Adventure," are being concluded this month (London Regional, December 6th, 13th and 20th: 8.30 p.m.).

Apart from the talks which are directly devoted to literature, there are one or two others which are likely to attract all who love books. Most people in these days are acquainted with the writings of Dean Inge and Dr. L. P. Jacks, and it will be a delight to hear their spoken words instead of merely scanning their printed pages. Dean Inge is giving the last talk but one in the series of Sunday talks on "Science and Religion" (December 7th: 5.45 p.m.). All who know the quiet and sane philosophy of the Smokeover stories will agree with me that it was a brilliant idea to make Dr. Jacks the last speaker in this important series.

Freedom of the Press

Professor Ernest Barker's final talks in his "What is Liberty?" series are also worthy of note (December 4th, 11th and 18th: 7.25 p.m.), and particularly the first of these, in which he will discuss the freedom of the Press. In addition, there are the usual talks by Mr. Harold Nicolson, Mr. James Agate, Mr. Ernest Newman and Mr. Francis Birrell, and many of the other talkers are also known to readers through the medium of books, even though the subjects which they are discussing are not literary.

∵ The talks mentioned above are in the National Programme, unless otherwise stated.

IN THOSE DAYS

Book Topics a Generation Ago

(From THE BOOKMAN, December, 1895)

As we intimated some time ago, the Strand Magazine, which has hitherto eschewed serials, is to attempt a new departure. The first serial published will be by Dr. Conan Doyle, and will be entitled "Rodney Stone." It is a picture of English life in the days of the Regency, and is said to be full of graphic passages, among the best bits being a description of a prize fight.

* * * *

Professor Saintsbury's work on the History of English Literature in the Nineteenth Century has been somewhat delayed by his appointment to the Edinburgh Chair, but it is expected to be ready early in 1896.

* * * *

Mr. John Davidson is said to have received £35 for his recent verses in Phil May's Annual.

* * * *

The New York World says that a copy of the first edition of "Vanity Fair," presented by Mr. Thackeray to Charlotte Brontë and bearing an inscription, has recently been purchased by a London journalist at the moderate price of 6s. In reality the book bought was "Esmond," and the price paid was £20.

* * * *

We understand that Mr. Rudyard Kipling's new story, "William the Conqueror," will extend only to about twelve thousand words. Mr. Kipling wrote it in response to a tempting offer from Mr. E. W. Bok, of the American Ladies' Home Journal, and it is to appear in England in the Gentlewoman.

* * * *

We hear that Mr. Anthony Hope is now anxious to abandon the writing of short stories, and to confine himself entirely to the production of longer books.

* * * *

Mr. Anthony Hope's "Prisoner of Zenda," as adapted for the stage by Mr. Edward Rose, is still drawing crowded houses in New York. We hear that it will shortly be brought to this country, and that it will be produced at the St. James's by Mr. George Alexander.

* * * *

An editor received the other day a curious application for help. The writer said: "I am sorry you do not like my romance, for I feel that I have the secret fire in my veins. If however you cannot accept my book or my poetry, will you give me a berth as a heavy goods porter?"

* * * *

Mr. Eugene Field, the American author, died suddenly last month at his home near Chicago. He was of New England stock, but his chief work as a journalist was done in the Chicago Daily News, which has now become the Record. Recently his reputation had spread from the fields of journalism by some lttle books of tales and verses which had wide popularity, and showed originalty and delicate fancy. Mr. Field was a man of much vitality and an excellent speaker, an enthusiastic book collector, and lavishly hospitable. Many English bookmen will regret to hear of his death.

Correspondence

A Memoir of Scott-Moncrieff

DEAR SIR,

May I be allowed to mention, through the courtesy of your columns, that a short memoir of my son, the late C. K. Scott-Moncrieff, is in preparation, with which it is desired to include some of his poems and extracts from his letters? I shall be indebted to those of his friends who may care to send me material from which such extracts may be made. All letters would be carefully considered, and returned at an early date to their owners.

Yours, etc.,
(Mrs.) J. M. SCOTT-MONCRIEFF.

316, Clive Court,
Maida Vale,
London, W.9.

Mr. Priestley and Women's Clubs

DEAR SIR,

Mr. Priestley's "Angel Pavement," with its morbid outlook, must be a disappointment to many admirers of "Good Companions." Yet were it not for a paragraph in Mr. W. B. Nichol's article, published in your September issue, one might swallow one's disappointment in silence. This paragraph really calls for a reply.

Mr. Nichols, after bestowing "faint praise" on other parts of the novel, says Mr. Priestley's description of life at the Burpenfield Club is "extraordinarily well done and contains more psychology than any pseudo-Freudian novel." As a resident in a London women's club I say that this is a lamentably masculine and ignorant statement.

Where has Mr. Priestley obtained his copy? For no club resembling the Burpenfield Club can exist. What he describes may approximate to a mental home, or a poor law ward, but let him not call it a typical women's club. No less unfortunate a creation is his mouthpiece, Miss Marfield. No one would expect humour, courage or even common sense from such an empty-headed, resentful little wretch—and naturally she takes a jaundiced view of her club life.

It is a pity that Mr. Priestley has chosen to sneer at life in a women's club. It meets a great modern need, and many women consider that it offers them—besides economic independence—both interesting companionship and breadth of outlook in greater measure than does the more solitary life of furnished room or flat.

Authors must have copy; they should have "conscience" too!

Yours, etc.,
AMY HOGG.

Nutford House,
Nutford Place,
London W.1.

Bogy! Bogy!!

DEAR SIR,

As a reader of THE BOOKMAN for more than thirty years —I still have a few unbound copies dating back to the late nineties—I venture for the first time to write a letter to its editor. The reason is that I was moved from my habitual calmness of mind by the first paragraph of the article on Penn and Franklin.

Your contributor, Mr. Davies, writes: "We hope to discover the real explanation of Penn's 'convincement' and of Franklin's sudden friendship for France. Was the one merely an expression of neurosis and the other the mysterious working of Freemasonry?" I must confess that I am quite unable to follow here the workings of your reviewer's mind. Franklin was a Freemason: but were there no Freemasons in England? Why should French Freemasonry, even then very different in spirit from the English and American craft, induce a sudden friendship for France in the sturdy American? If I were to write a life of Villon no doubt Mr. Davies would say: "We hope to discover why the ragged poet developed a fondness for tripe and even wrote a ballade in its praise: can this have been the mysterious working of Freemasonry?" Or again, if I wrote a life of Kipling he would no doubt remark: "After a life spent in India, Canada and other parts of the Globe, Mr. Kipling developed a sudden fondness for Sussex: can this have been the mysterious working of Freemasonry, to which he was openly attached?"

And why, sir, are neurosis and Freemasonry so cunningly coupled? In seeking an explanation of Newman's conversion to the Church of Rome and of Peel's conversion to Free Imports are we to ask: "Was one merely the expression of some neurosis, and the other the mysterious working of Freemasonry?" Solomon Eagle walked the streets naked with a brazier of coals on his head, and Johnson grew fond of Fleet Street. Was one merely the expression of some neurosis and the other the mysterious working of Freemasonry? I notice that of our public men, Lord Brentford displays a passionate Protestant convincement and the Prince of Wales displays a fondness for golfing in France. Is one merely an expression of some neurosis and the other the mysterious working of Freemasonry?

Mr. Davies as I say leaves me bewildered as to the way in which his mind works in these matters. I can only suspect that he is the victim of some neurosis, or imagines himself to have suffered in some way from the mysterious working of Freemasonry.

Yours, etc.,
WILLIAM BROOKS.

The Authors' Club,
London.

Mass Civilisation

DEAR SIR,

I much appreciated your appeal for "Literature to the Rescue" in this month's BOOKMAN. Our present civilisation needs some tonic, and if literature can provide it, so much the better.

I must none the less protest against your analysis of the present state of what you call culture, as it seems to me to be based on a misconception of the facts. Mass civilisation may be a product of machines. The standard of mass civilisation is not, witness the artistic standard of films from Soviet Russia, where—or so we are told on authority disputable only by those who have seen for themselves—the "mass man" is ruler of the land. If any single factor can be held responsible for the present standard of artistic appreciation, it is rather the democratic philosophy which has been extending its influence over Europe since the eighteenth century.

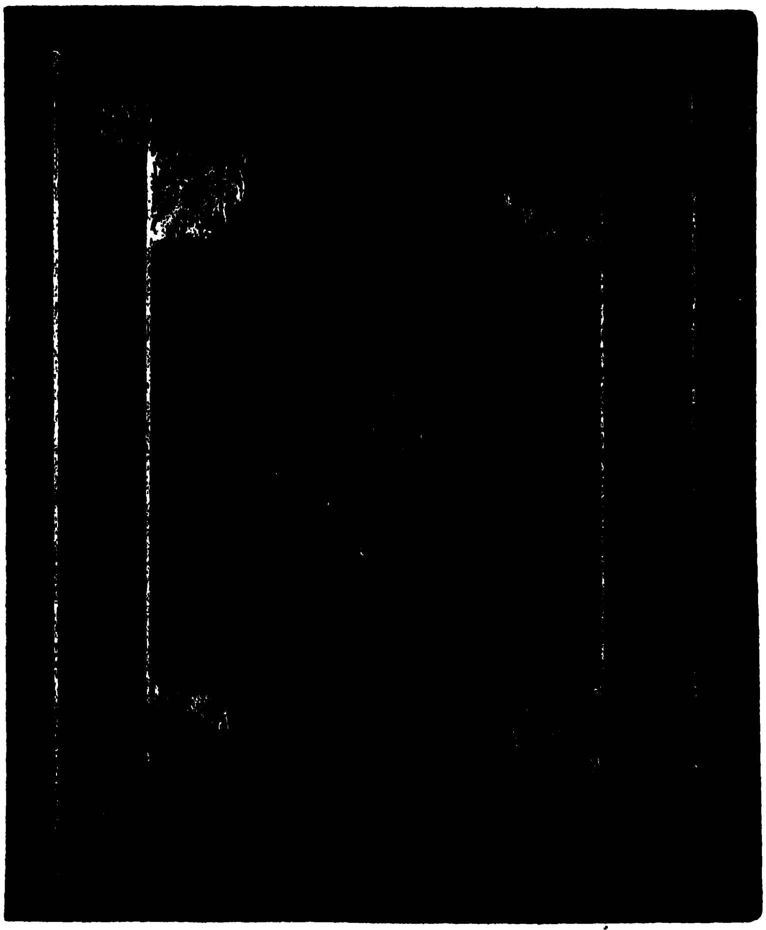
To reduce the matter to its most intelligible form, it is only necessary to apply the argument to the case of food. You will agree that the present standard of living in England is not such as to make it necessary for anyone to eat tripe. You will probably also agree that there are people who do eat tripe. They even prefer it to caviare. You and I could no doubt give them reasons why they should so prefer it. We could tell them that tripe is wholesome, whereas caviare is a food only fit for those whose taste has been vitiated by too great variety. But they could give us a better reason—that they like it. And that declaration of taste there can be no gainsaying—not at any rate in a democratic country such as that favoured by your otherwise agreeable servant.

WILFRID HINDLE.

Hammersmith, W.6.

The lady with the balloons [illegible]

The COLLECTOR



" Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

CATALOGUES OF VARIETY

Last month I made some reference to the huge batch of catalogues that had found their way to my desk, and by this the number has very much increased. In fact, it is going to be difficult to give all of them the attention they deserve. What I would like to do is to devote a much more lengthy consideration almost to nine-tenths of them, but this would delay the printing of my notes for some months, and then their economic value would have lessened considerably. So it would seem that a short reference, and a speedy one, is much more desirable.

One of the more interesting and valuable catalogues that have come to hand since last month is one issued by Messrs. Elkin Mathews, to whose lists I have frequently called attention. The new one, rich in its bibliographical usefulness, is " English Literature in the Early Nineteenth Century " covering the years 1789–1837, to which Mr. Blunden has contributed a most worthy introduction. Much time and thought must have been given to this estimable catalogue. Against the name of every author is given the year of his or her birth and death. This is an important list which all bookmen should be sure of obtaining, not only to examine with care, but because I am sure there is bound to be at least one book in it that the reader wants, and because it is a catalogue to be kept for reference.

My pile of catalogues this month—as well as the overmath from the previous month—contains some really valuable ones. I have just referred to one. And here is another. It is one published—this and some others ought to be described as " published "—by Messrs. G. Michelmore & Co. It is a beautifully produced list of choice books in magnificent contemporary bindings from the libraries of very famous people, such as Catherine and Marie de Medici, the two Louis, XVI and XVIII, Marie Antoinette, Henri II and a host of others. There are also precious autograph letters and manuscripts, as well as some extraordinary choice books. Some of these items range in price up to £2,000; so it will be gathered how great is the value of some of the things in this Michelmore catalogue. The bindings described are magnificent.

Binding made for J. B. Inglis about 1825.—D. Belchier.
(Hans Beer-Pot (London 1618) belonging to G. Arents, Jr., New York.)
From " English Collectors of Books and Manuscripts, 1550–1900," by Seymour de Ricci (Cambridge University Press).

And the new Tregaskis catalogue is worth more than just a casual glance; in fact the Caxton Head lists are always made with so much care, that no one who pretends to be interested in books and autographs can possibly ignore the Tregaskis ones. The present list is devoted to autograph letters, historical papers and documents. I am particularly attracted by the series of Nelson letters, and a fine collection of Bondoni letters and papers, as well as a number of royal autograph letters—Henry VIII, Mary I and Elizabeth, and one or two most interesting letters from Wagner. This reminds me that Harold Reeves has a new catalogue of old musical works available. I doubt if there is a shop other than Mr. Reeves's, where there is so comprehensive a stock of musical works.

I dare say there are many readers of " The Collector " who are more than a little interested in French books, and who make a point of looking for certain works in that language to add to their collection. Every now and then there is issued a catalogue of French novels by some antiquarian bookseller, and one has just reached me from Messrs. Ellis. It is a list that contains the cream of their stock of old and rare French books. There are almost five hundred entries in the catalogue. It is difficult to select a title for special mention, but I note an attractive edition, in two volumes, of the " Memoires du Comte Grammont," £2 10s., Montesquieu's " Le Temple de Guide," £1 10s, and " Les Œuvres de M. François Rabelais," in one volume, £12 12s., while the illustration we have reproduced is from a manuscript—" Les Dits des Philosophes," translated from Latin into French by William de Tignonville. This is a precious and a wonderful manuscript of the fifteenth century, beautifully written upon 159 leaves of vellum, with five illuminated miniatures, within borders of flowers and grotesques in gold and colours The price of the rare and beautiful MS is £900

I am glad to welcome a first catalogue, not a very long or ambitious list, but a very nice one, and I hope Mr Johns will send me his future ones Of course, it is mainly composed of first editions Another helpful and interesting list of first editions reaches me from Bertram Rota, and very readable and educating it is in these days of lowish prices I note a good collection of Brett Young's works including a copy of "The Dark Tower for £3 10s, some seventeen items of Hugh Walpole's works ('Maradick at Forty, 25s) and many works by J B Priestley These are just one or two books out of over nine hundred I like this list Another catalogue, comprising many first editions of old as well as modern books and a number of original manuscripts of D H Lawrence and Mr Phillpotts is that issued by Messrs J A Allen & Co This is a fine catalogue—1 674 entries—and the lay-out as we say, is attractive which I always think adds to the value of a list

Right at the top of Mr Halewood's new catalogue is a quotation from the world renowned Dr Rosenbach It says Stocks are falling books are rising That is an excellent text especially the second part The spiritual value of a book—assuming it is a good book—is always rising Also, I seem to see that prices are better too which means the market is rising as well although it will not reach its rightful position again until the industrial depression lessens There are a number of notable works offered us in Mr Halewood's catalogue, many of small price and many exceedingly valuable items such as a first edition of Barrie's "Window in Thrums 16 guineas Lord Lytton's first publication Ismael £32 10s and Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy £105 I notice a copy of Coppard's "Adam and Eve for 6 guineas

From Gilbert Jameson I have received a new catalogue of general books including as most lists do to day a number of modern first editions I was attracted by several of the items among t which were a four volume edition of Goldsmith's Miscellaneous works and some first editions of Scott's novels Which reminds me that in the catalogue of E & M Kennard there are quite a number of old and scarce books (a first edition of Vavasour Powell's The Bird in the Cage £25) and some autograph letters association books and moderns And here I should like to draw attention to a delightful and pleasing little catalogue of some 450 entries of books of a varied kind sent me by the International Book Shop and also a very useful one made up chiefly from a sale at Christchurch (Hants) Manor, issued by Russell Oakley

"Make your old books perfect I read on the front page of a catalogue of engraved portraits chiefly of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries sent out by Mr F Guntrip, and if you are at all interested in the fascinating business of grangerizing, here is the list to get While the reader might find the wanted extra portraits in the Guntrip list he might also discover some of the old books he is looking for in a catalogue of miscellaneous books recently printed by the Surrey Bookshop Other general lists which I want to record are those from W M Murphy & Son, a most excellent one, for it took me a time to run through it because there are in it so many interesting books in all branches of literature, a handy size list, including many rare works of Barrie, Bennett (Old Wives Tale £50) Hardy (Under the Greenwood Tree,' £105), a collection of George Gissing's books, from P Finnimore, a general catalogue from J S Billingham, and a short list of modern firsts from L E Thomas, all of which are carefully described and moderate in price

There are two important catalogues which I always enjoy studying and both are worth while adding to one's

Les Dits Des Philosophes.
French Fifteenth Century Manuscript.

From Messrs. Ellis's Catalogue of French Books, No. 275.

collection for careful examination. I have mentioned Mr. Tremayne's before, and I find his new one (No. 11) as readable as ever; while the other comes to me from W. H. Smith & Son (Southport). This latter—as is Tremayne's—is devoted entirely to modern firsts.

A very fine 320 page catalogue of English Literature of the nineteenth and twentieth century, being a selection of first and early editions of the works of all notable British authors and book illustrators, together with a number of books on sports and pastimes, comes from Maggs Bros. I am always on the look out for their noble catalogues, and this new one is splendid I am only a third of the way through it, and I must put it on one side for the moment to examine some others. There are many excellent items in it—collections of H. G. Wells, Sir Walter Scott, Alfred Noyes—in fact, there are books for sale in this list by many of the great and famous writers in English Literature. The latest Frank Hollings list is described as "A Stocktaking Catalogue," Part, II M-Z. There is also a short addenda. I notice particularly a fine collection of scarce and curious works of occult and allied esoteric interest. A Third Selection of Books bearing upon the Romantic Movement in English Literature has been issued by Ingpen & Stonehill. I have in previous catalogue notes referred to the earlier catalogues, and have drawn attention to the value of them for collectors, and this new one is a worthy successor to those others.

I wonder if you have ever thought of asking Mr. Greville Worthington for his list? His house used to be known as Baker's Bookshop. Mr. Worthington's new catalogue came along the other day, and I soon found myself closely engaged in reading through the well planned pages. It has a nice cover upon it, and the authors' names are in bold, but not unattractive type. I was interested in a little group of Lascelles Abercrombie's books, a single volume, 'Nicky, Son of Egg," by Gerald Bullett (just because he is worth collecting against the future), a number of Richard Le Gallienne's works—all at low prices these days, several of Anthony Hope's books, and lots of others. Mr. J. D. Miller's latest list is a good one. I see there are one or two of Herbert Read's books in it—a fine thinker, with a true sense of literature in his style, whose works will surely be fashionably collected one of these days, and who is collected and read by those who understand.

Quaritch, an hour or two since, posted me their list No. 437. A special one dealing with works on aeronautics, astronomy, horology and no end of other things. A catalogue for the specialist. An interesting catalogue, well arranged, is that of Symington's. It contains 888 entries, covering but a small selection of their stock. There are many and varied collections offered for sale. Many of the books from the library of the late Sir E. M. Satow, and also the library of Professor C. S. Kenny are to be found in Heffer & Sons' list, No. 351. The Heffer catalogues are always good. This one is set out in two columns to a page, and actually records no less than 2,662 books. Among the moderns I see that "Good Companions" is offered at £3 10s., and Edmund Blunden's notable "Undertones of War" for 2 guineas, both of which I should buy if I did not have two rather nice—one particularly so—copies. There is an interesting section devoted to Foreign Historical Works. A. H. Mayhew's most recent list contains some distinctive books, a number of Greek and Latin classics, a series of Hansard's Debates, and Cardinal Newman's copy, for 5 guineas, of Johnson's "Rasselas."

Two lists were recently sent out by Davis & Orioli. One, No. 52, of a general character, and one, their 34th, of modern first editions. There is a copy of Coppard's "Black Dog" for £10—the price seems to keep up; seventeen autograph letters and six post cards written by D. H. Lawrence to an intimate friend, £60; several books by T. S. Eliot, whose books should be carefully sought for, and preserved for their delectable items. The Export Book Co. have quite a collection of the rarest of items in their new catalogue, including association copies of Carlyle, Dickens, Thackeray, Ruskin and Mayne Reid. There are many other good things in it. Lists have also come in from William Dunlop and Colbeck Radford & Co. The members of this latter firm are Mr. Percy J. Dobell, Mr. Arthur E. Dobell and Mr. M. Colbeck Radford. They call their pleasing list "The Ingatherer"—a little sheaf of autographs and manuscripts "Ready to be Harvested out of the Stores of Colbeck Radford & Co." A very nice way of putting it.

If you want to look out for those books that are remaindered by publishers, ask Henry J. Glaisher to put your name down for his list. There is always something good in it. Mr. Glaisher also issues a catalogue of second-hand books. The short one that I have before me at the moment contains a copy of one of the fifty signed copies of Robert Bridges's "Testament of Beauty," for £50.

And so at last I come to the end of this very long pile of catalogues, not one of which have I adequately described. Antiquarian lists are so admirable in these times that they deserve considerable and more detailed consideration. But there it is, and there is no more space to spare. Excepting that I must offer a word of congratulation to Mr. James F. Drake, of New York, whose business has reached its twenty-fifth year. He has issued a delightful little list, bound in a silver cover. It contains a number of very rare items, including a first edition, for $5000.00 (£1,000) of "Jane Eyre" and Boswell's Johnson, first edition, $5000.00, in the original boards. A magnificent Sawyer catalogue has come into my hands, as these notes are being written, and I see among the many wonderful things in it is a fine copy of "Jane Eyre" for £700. Next month I shall devote some space to this catalogue.

THE GREAT CARDINAL

Cavendish's "Wolsey" reprinted

I have just received from the Alcuin Press, of Chipping Campden, Gloucestershire, a very beautifully produced book which I shall put carefully among my bibliophilic treasures. It is a reprint of George Cavendish's "The Life and Death of Thomas Wolsey," the earliest separate biography written in the English language. As the present year commemorates the four hundredth anniversary of Wolsey's death, its appearance now is apposite, and it is the first of a series of reprints of all the great biographies from this to Boswell's "Johnson."

The text of this four guinea edition (Richards Press, 90, Newman Street, W.1) follows exactly the original MS. in Cavendish's handwriting, now in the British Museum. Previous editions (including the famous Kelmscott Press edition of 1893) suffered from editorial modifications. The volume is a quarto, 8½ by 11¼ inches, printed from a type which practically reproduces a famous Aldine fount designed in Wolsey's own lifetime. It is decorated with head-pieces and tail-pieces and initial letters drawn by Paul Woodroffe. I like especially the decoration of the O and the penultimate tail-piece. But the entire book is a joy.

H.

From "THE GOLDEN ARROW,"
By MARY WEBB.
Illustrated by NORMAN HEPPLE.
(Jonathan Cape.)

"THEY PICKED FOR TWO HOURS, ABSORBED AND PERSPIRING."

THE NEW HAZLITT

"The Complete Works of William Hazlitt." Edited by P. P. Howe. Vols. I, IV and V. To be completed in 21 vols. £15 15s. net. (Dent.)

Hazlitt certainly has been fortunate in those who have devoted themselves to the preservation of his fame. Few critics or essayists, particularly those whose work was largely written for the press, have long survived their own generation. Yet Hazlitt is known to-day (though not by any one recognised masterpiece) to all with any pretensions to literary taste. He is represented, not only by one-volume reprints and selections; but by the sumptuous edition of his Works, here and now once more revised and completed with scholarly care and enthusiasm.

Outside great genius, the survival of fame is no doubt in part accidental; and I am disposed to believe that Hazlitt lives to-day—because he wrote, with distinction, about Shakespeare; because he was intimate with Coleridge and Lamb; because he published those uncomfortable confessions known as "Liber Amoris," inspired by hysteria. Such reasons, obviously, would each influence a different public: combined they have served, I think, to preserve more than his name in many minds.

Since Hazlitt has been, for these or other reasons, kept continuously before our notice, it is not surprising that we are all ready to read and discuss his work. For the personality that is never hidden behind anything he wrote, that may at times indeed be found inartistically obtrusive, is at once complex and intriguing. His intellect and emotions are both so evident, so vital and so intense, often drawing him—as it would seem—in contrary directions and fighting for mastery of the man; that, whether to hate or love, to scorn or admiration, our feelings are no less excited than our intelligence, and we are stimulated by the spell.

When Messrs. Waller and Glover produced, some ten years before the War, their thirteen volumes of Hazlitt, we were able—without the need for hunting out forgotten periodicals or searching among second-hand booksellers—to test our impressions under the guidance of authority. Hazlitt's wisest biographer, Mr. P. P. Howe, has not approached their work as something to be cast aside or superseded; but has most generously acknowledged with honour the sound foundation upon which his own fine structure is imposed: not generally even himself "collating a text found trustworthy in the extreme," frankly stating that to have "scrapped" the notes which were so integral a part of their edition "would be unthinkable."

It has simply happened, as often when the pioneers have done their work so well, that the passing of years and the pursuit of opportunities suggested by them, has enabled him to use or discover material they were forbidden or did not know of, and—in other cases—to modify or reverse their judgment in the light of wider knowledge. The "New Writings, First and Second Series," discovered and already issued by Mr. Howe, are naturally incorporated—with other "articles" never before reprinted: it is now possible to include the Life of Napoleon; and the present editor has decided, on his own judgment, to reprint the English Grammar for the first time. Occasionally, by a reversal of judgment or by obtaining a once inaccessible original, he has chosen a different text; and, so far as possible, he has removed quoted paragraphs of Hazlitt's own writing "out of the notes and into the text."

We shall now have all 'books issued by Hazlitt in his own lifetime 'presented' in a chronological sequence"; followed by contributions to periodicals "under the most convenient arrangement." It is impossible, I think, not to approve Mr. Howe's method and applaud his work.

The three volumes first issued and now before us are—by chance or design—representative of Hazlitt in many moods: including his own favourite and first-born, the "Essay on the Principles of Human Nature," that notable collection of Essays "The Round Table," with two important critical volumes, "The Characters of Shakespeare's Plays" and "Lectures on the English Poets."

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

A BOOK COLLECTOR SPEAKS

Mr. Edward Newton's Advice

"This Book-Collecting Game." By A. Edward Newton. 15s. (Routledge.)

"Book-collecting. It's a great game." Thus does Edward Newton begin his new book, and by doing so, sums up himself and his hobby.

He says that "anybody with ordinary intelligence can play it," and in his first chapter, "A Preliminary Canter," goes on to describe how he started and how he "got up speed." Newton is joyously and naïvely egotistical (good book-collectors cannot help being egotistical in view of the fact that they must have a worthy pride in their acquisitions), for he states: "I own to-day, and value highly, books which cost me fifteen cents." And this is the matured book-collector speaking. And if the information which can be extracted from the volume about certain individual rarities in his own collection should make the reader a little melancholy about his chances of ever touching the shadow of Newton, the philosophic and happy style in which the pages are written should at least imbue the average collector with the right spirit.

Delightful words of bibliographical wisdom shine from the pages as, for instance: "Good collecting depends on two things—money and intelligence; with either you may go far; with both you are irresistible."

The book itself is strongly bound in art canvas and contains 410 pages and over 130 illustrations; the important and necessary index is good and covers sixteen pages.

One of the main chapters, headed "What to collect—and why," is the most misleading—as usual, because it does not tell the reader any more than a bookmaker would if asked the question, "What shall I back in the next race, and how much shall I speculate?"

This chapter contains eulogies upon Thomas Wise, the famous book-collector, and on Leary's bookshop of Philadelphia, and tells of rare editions of Shakespeare, Milton, "Pickwick Papers," "Humphry Clinker," etc., beyond the dreams or hopes of the average book-collector, and does not give much practical advice for the man with little capital.

A short chapter of twenty pages serves to deal with "American Literature," and in this we learn that Newton believes that "Moby Dick" is America's supreme contribution to world literature. He admits that his list of authors is not impressive, and is candid enough to admit that American authors are not collected in the sense that English authors are, for the reason that they are not of the first rank. Further, in view of a certain amount of controversy which has been raging over the comparative virtues of American first editions of English books, it is illuminating to have Mr. Newton's opinion, for he says: "It is always best to pay a dollar or two more in the first place and get a first English edition."

In the last chapter of the book, the author has made a list of one hundred good novels. It is a list which should be entered into every book-collector's notebook, as it is perhaps the finest practical thing in the book.

One other of the best chapters is that dealing with the Format of the English Novel, and here the book-lover will find less discursive writing and more of direct value to interest him.

I will venture the opinion that the average reader will have the reaction that "This Book-Collecting Game" is well worth playing, especially if the sterling advice of a master hand, as expressed in the last hundred words of the book, are followed. I will not divulge the secret of these last words, for it would not be fair to Newton.

GILBERT H. FABES.

SOME CLASSIC NOVELS

"Amelia." By Henry Fielding. Introduction by George Saintsbury. 2 vols.
"Middlemarch." By George Eliot. Introduction by Leslie Stephen. 2 vols.
"Shorter Novels" (Eighteenth Century): "Rasselas," "Castle of Otranto," "Vathek." Introduction by Philip Henderson.
Everyman's Library. 2s. per vol. (Dent.)

The latest additions to "Everyman," including two-volume issues and a group-volume, represent certain critical stages in the development of English fiction, which have contributed to the making of history.

The modern novel, as we know it, was born in the eighteenth century; and was almost immediately matured in the work of Henry Fielding, the master of his age. Though "Amelia" is perhaps the least popular of the great novels, its structure and contents are fundamentally characteristic of the century and its new art. Its Victorian heroine, reincarnated—surely of deliberate intent—in "Vanity Fair," is no less typical because drawn, by way of apology, from the novelist's wife; and if the hero lacks almost every quality of heroism, he was conceived as a confession, and autobiography in fiction compels almost literal truth to life. The military gentlemen, the clergy, the peers and panders, with that generous-hearted figure of frailty, Miss Williams herself, compose a picture (lacking only the robuster qualities of a Tom Jones) of that sentimental immorality, alternating with simply sincere moments of repentance, that has immortalised the novelist and his world.

In very much the same position towards the nineteenth century, we have also George Eliot's "Middlemarch." Probably no novelist presents with such intensity and completeness the mental and moral strivings after new light as the author of "Adam Bede."

The "Shorter Novels" provide material for the study of two centuries, in aspects somewhat outside the regular march of fiction. "Rasselas" compactly reveals the main outlines of a master-personality, at once intensely individual and thoroughly typical of his age; and may be called a novel in the making, without the constructive ability of Richardson or Fielding, but alive with human nature and thought. "The Castle of Otranto," though insincere and artificial, proves its author an enthusiast in untrodden paths of history and art; and actually became the origin of a small school in unEnglish fiction.

R. B. J.

WITCHES

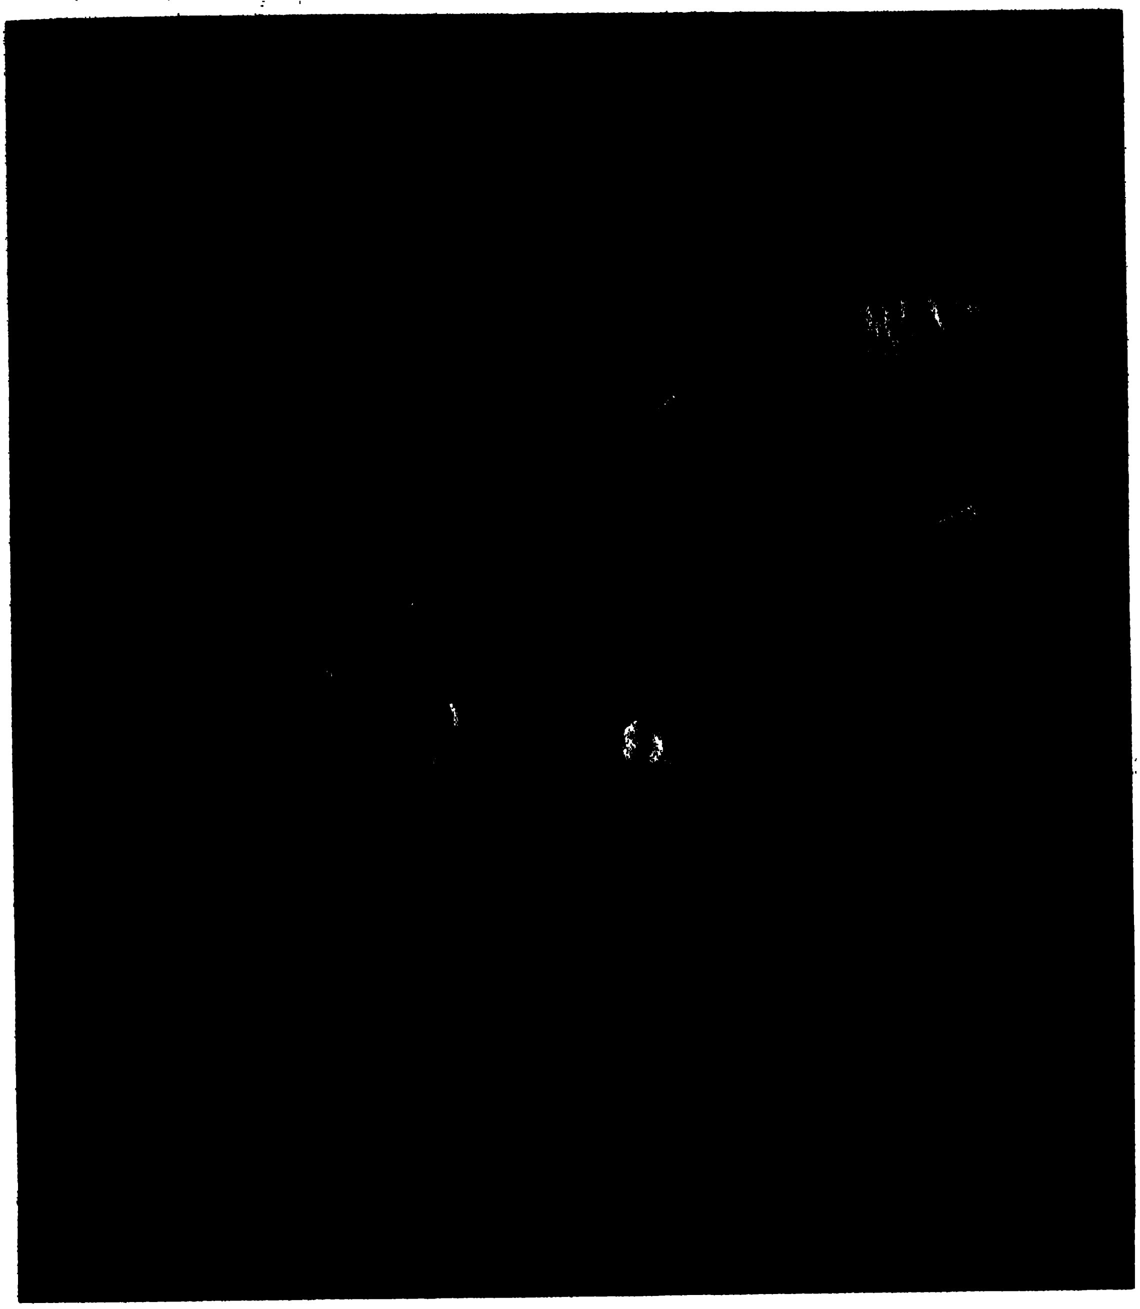
Reginald Scot, Esquire, whose "Discoveries of Witchcrafts" was written and published in Queen Elizabeth's reign, was, according to Mr. Montague Summers's preface to the sumptuous new edition of this work (42s.; John Rodker), "a man of legal training, an active man in his own circuit, a man full of little businesses and yet of leisure to give a 'solid reading' and 'the perusing of obscure authors,' a man who had a great reputation in his own circle as a scholar and a bibliophile, above all a man of intensely sceptical turn of mind." It is through the eyes of such a man that we approach the problems of witchcraft which so beset his contemporaries and which made the audiences of his day regard the weird sisters in Mr. Shakespeare's play "Macbeth" as beings whom any individual might meet any day straying over a heath.

It is an absorbingly interesting book in that it illustrates so vividly the morasses in which the human mind could flounder until so recently. Scot, though many of his reasons against a belief in witchcraft seem puerile to-day, was at least on the right lines in his healthy agnosticism—an agnosticism which Mr. Montague Summers in his preface (dated "In Festo B.M.V. uulgo Del Conforto 1930") seems to deplore. The book, beautifully printed on a Dutch paper specially made for the edition, is limited to 1,275 copies.

EGYPTIAN CIVILISATION

"Egyptian Civilisation: Its Sumerian Origin and Real Chronology and Sumerian Origin of Egyptian Hieroglyphs." By L. A. Waddell, LL.D., C.B., C.I.E. 12s. 6d. net. (Luzac.)

This is an important addition to works on Egyptology. Vast as our knowledge of ancient Egypt is increasing yearly as the advancement of the decipherment of monuments proceeds, yet there remain uncertain two questions of paramount importance. The first of these is the question of the origin of the civilisation of the country, and the second that of determining the real chronology of Early Egypt, which in turn forms our chief basis for estimating Early European, Cretan and Western chronologies. These problems have arisen from an almost total lack of evidence, which has occasioned, rather than restrained, much widely divergent theorising from the time of Herodotus onward.



But now at last it seems as though Dr. Waddell has quite definitely and scientifically determined the date of the period of Menes and his First Dynasty, hitherto fixed at dates differing from one another as much as two thousand years—by the newly discovered synchronisms between Early Egyptian and Mesopotamian history, whereby it is made clear by the early Sumerian inscriptions of the First Dynasty and pre-Dynastic Pharaohs that these same Pharaohs were at once and the same time also Sumerian emperors of Mesopotamia. The importance of such discoveries cannot be overrated, and the praise of all is due to Dr. Waddell for his scholarly treatise.

JOSEPHUS

"Josephus and the Jews: The Religion and History of the Jews as Expounded by Flavius Josephus." By F. J. Foakes Jackson, D.D. 12s. 6d. (S.P.C.K.)

Readers of Josephus will gladly recognise the debt they owe to Dr. Foakes Jackson for this scholarly book. They will be able with its help, to study their author with much larger understanding than heretofore—and what is equally important with power of discriminating between what they should gather and what they should cast away. Dr. Jackson provides a brief biography, and then a chapter on the religion of Josephus as revealed in the Apion. Then he takes us through the history of the Jews from early times and onward as it is described in the Antiquities and in the Wars. These chapters are in effect an epitome or abstract of Josephus's works, with many elucidations of doubtful points and many corrections of errors which Josephus (not by any means always in ignorance) set down.

One cannot like Josephus any better, this man of half-hearted patriotism, selfish, time-serving, untrustworthy—when one has reached Dr. Jackson's last page. But one can better appreciate his value as an historian. In fact, this volume serves as a corrective for both a too unquestioning acceptance of Josephus and for the too extreme contempt towards him which sometimes takes its place. Some such summary and commentary as this has long been needed, and we are grateful to Dr. Jackson for supplying the need.

From a camera portrait by HOWARD COSTER.

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

PIERRE LOTI

By Clifford Bower-Shore

"The Romances of Pierre Loti." 14 vols. 6s each. (Werner Laurie.)

PIERRE LOTI (the pen name of Louis-Marie-Julien Viaud) was born at Rochefort on January 14th, 1850. As a boy he was timid and shy, and judged from French educational standards was a lazy, indifferent pupil, and cared little for reading. His most noticeable and lovable trait, his fondness for animals, manifested itself when he was nine. At fifteen, yearning for romance, he took the crucial step and intimated his intention of joining the Navy, which he did two years later, after spending some time at Lycée Henri-Quatre in Paris.

Pierre Loti.
After a painting by Lévy d'Hurmer.
From "The Life of Loti," by Edmund B. d'Auvergne (Werner Laurie).

Although during his sojourn in Paris he had no thought of earning a living by his pen, after a period in the Navy, his native egoism quickened by his large experience, he found his real vocation in self-expression. Firmly believing in the doctrine that the proper study of mankind is man, nothing pleased him more than to mingle, in disguise, with the Turks and Greeks on the wharves of Smyrna, and with the Arabs in the back streets of Algiers. He enjoyed a fight, and brawled and rollicked with the fervour of a common seaman. And he once masqueraded as a clown at Toulon with great success!

The year 1876 saw the most romantic chapter of his life. Seeing a girl behind the latticed window of a harem in Salonika, he forthwith fell in love with her. He sought, and by devious means obtained, her acquaintance. The girl was Hadije, immortalised as "Aziyade," a character unique in romantic literature, in "Constantinople," Loti's earliest and most beautiful book. "Aziyade" spelt Turkey to him and it imparted to Loti a deep sympathy for Islam above all other religions; he was its friend for ever.

In one of his self-revealing passages Loti exclaims, "My heart is as changeable as an equinoxial sky," and on occasion in expressing his inconstancy and moments of passion, he becomes extravagant, incoherent and even grotesque, though from the age of twenty-nine he no more erupts in volcanic, passionate loves.

His work when first published in France met with a cool reception, although several critics admitted that the work displayed talent, style and wit, abounding in vivid description and sharply defined silhouettes. Maxime Gaucher, however, recorded that Loti "ought to have devoted his talents to something better than the recital of unpleasant and vulgar amours." But in reality charm is the key-note of Loti's work; it pleases and leaves us with a little wistful regret, proof that the writer has the gift of something far more subtle and deep-seated than mere literary technique. His descriptive power is unique, and the resultant word-picture is magnificently painted, and forms the basis of work possessing a fascination as binding and potent as a witch spell. No jaded beauty is to be found in his work, and his elegance of style, combined with brilliance of character conception, provide sketches of remarkable beauty, sharp and miniature as images in a convex mirror. Essentially human, his work wields a broadening, intellectual influence with its pungent, exotic flavour, and causes one to lose more than a little sympathy with the banal conventionalities of life which tend to make one underestimate the excellence of the unconventional artist working upon a rigorous, self-analytical picture of himself, combining every quality of artistic refinement with the starkness of crude realism.

At his best Loti, with exquisite simplicity of style, where thought and expression are in perfect harmony, extracts from his life of exotic adventures the sweet of fantasy dyed deeply in reality. His characters, alive and vital, are symbols of rich sincerity and understanding. The passages of delicate imagery permeating his work are spontaneous and rich with the hues of glamour and romance. The cadence and rhythm of his prose testify to his conscientiousness as an artist, and to his sensitive and perceptive mind.

Loti's masterpiece is undoubtedly "The Iceland Fisherman." He wrote the book with great care, and for a time the amorist was forgotten and the author only remained. "Pêcheur d'Islande" is only a simple story, but it is pregnant with dynamic power and shrewd intensity of life. Sombre pathos outlined with a delicate, transparent beauty provides a most impressive and fascinating piece of work, and the characters' nobility and simplicity stamp them as beings apart, and they are, in the most gracious sense, children of nature. This novel bids fair to become a really great epic of the sea.

Elected to the Academy in 1891, Loti, the "immortal singer of the sea," retired from the Navy in 1910, and after playing an insignificant, but nevertheless honourable part in the Great War, he died in June, 1923.

Many have called Loti the supreme conceited egotist —but he was less satisfied with himself than any man. It would be more true to say that the essence of him was his compassion.

THE SEA: The Atlantic Ferry and Old Clipper Ships

"The Atlantic Ferry in the Twentieth Century." By F. Reid Corson. 12s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)
"Rough and Tumble on the Old Clipper Ships." By Robert Ramsay. 10s. 6d. (Appleton.)

The history of the Atlantic "ferry" is the history not only of one particular sea route, but of progress in marine transport the whole world over. For it is on this route, the most important of those which link the Old World to the New, that competition has been keenest and the skill of the engineer and the shipbuilder have reached their highest expression. We see sail giving place to steam; the reciprocating engine to the turbine and the turbine being threatened by the internal-combustion engine. The Atlantic has been, and still is, one of the great battle grounds of modern enterprise where, beyond all others, the race is to the swift. All this is brought out by Mr. Corson in his admirable book which, though it professes to be no more than a record of the Atlantic shipping lines, is more fascinating than many a novel.

The Tyne-built Steamship "Hudson"—which entered the Norddeutscher Lloyd Atlantic Service in August, 1858.

From "The Blue Riband, the Romance of the Atlantic Ferry," by Charles E. Lee (Sampson Low).

In a vivid style which sometimes startles by reason of its simplicity and frankness, Mr. Ramsay writes of life as he knew it on the old clipper ships at a time when sail was gradually giving place to steam. The utter lack of literary artifice enhances the value of the book as a personal narrative of a vanished era and proves that if there is much to regret in the passing of the sailing ship, there is also much for which to be thankful. For if the romance has gone, so has the inhuman brutality; if the chanty is no longer heard upon the seas, neither are the seaports infested with crimps and "runners." It is as well that the truth should be told, even at the expense of a little false sentiment, and those who read this enthralling book will agree that the passing of sail is not without its compensations.

ROLF BENNETT.

Poets' Corner

THE POET WITH A DOUBLE LIFE

Last Poems of John Freeman

By Wilfrid Gibson

" Last Poems." By John Freeman. With an Introduction by J. C. Squire. 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

It is always with a pang that one reads the words " Last Poems " on the cover of a book by a beloved and admired poet; but the pang comes with a sharper poignancy when one reflects that the volume contains, not the last sheaf of an achieved harvest, the last evening songs of a veteran who has passed in the plenitude of years, but the work, much of it fragmentary and unfinished, of a poet who perished in the noon of life with his singing powers unabated. And such a poet was John Freeman, who died just eighteen months ago after a too brief, but amazingly strenuous life of forty-nine years. Just how strenuous that life was, few, even of the lovers of his poetry, could have realised, unless by chance they had discovered that John Freeman, in spite of the handicap of an ailing body, had carved himself out two diverse careers in life--that of a business man and that of a poet. As Mr. Squire tells us in his admirable introduction:

> " At the age of thirteen he entered the service of the Liverpool Victoria Friendly Society; when he died he had risen to the very top of this great organisation, and was Secretary, Director, and (in the words of a colleague) ' the Chief Executive Officer directing very successfully and efficiently the operations of a staff of over seven thousand engaged in the business of Industrial and National Health Insurance with many millions of contracts and funds of £20,000,000.' "

How little the readers of his profound reflective metaphysical poems would ever have dreamed their writer was leading these two lives, at least superficially; for there is little doubt that in the inmost recesses of his being the two lives, with all their discords, were resolved into a profound harmony.

Freeman during his life was never a popular poet, though his work was loved by a circle of his fellow-craftsmen. He was no writer of facile and taking verse; and these last poems, like their predecessors, are not to be lightly scanned or lightly appraised; they are to be read and re-read, brooded and pondered over and gradually absorbed into one's consciousness for its eternal enrichment. Of course it would be easy to chatter brightly about Freeman's metrical invention and about the amazing craftsmanship of his work, that strangely original verse which, if it did not always move with a ripple and swing, had a sinewy strength and fibre, a texture interwoven of emotion and intellect; but what can a mere reviewer say of the spirit of poetry which informs all that Freeman wrote, except to tell the reader that it is there and bid him hasten to hearken to its voice? What can be said about Mr. Freeman's work has been said so admirably by Mr. Squire that there seems little need for anyone else to speak. His introduction seems to me as nearly adequate as any introduction to poetry can be; and I feel tempted to quote another passage in which he asserts something that needed to be asserted, and should be pondered by those who only know Freeman's work fragmentarily in anthologies. Freeman was indeed the poet of his beloved trees, but he was something more than a singer of the beauties of Nature.

" He never wore his heart on his sleeve, but those who are fit to find the key may find it, and when they do they will discover that, except only the late Robert Bridges, he was love's truest scholar among modern poets. Were all his love poetry assembled, Swinburne's words might far more aptly be applied to it than to Gautier's scented novel: ' This is a golden book of spirit and sense.' "

MILTON IN FRANCE

"Life of Milton, together with Observations on ' Paradise Lost.' " By Louis Racine. Translated with an Introduction by Katherine John. 6s. (Hogarth Press.)

Katherine John, in translating Louis Racine's " Life of Milton " together with his " Observations on Paradise Lost," has undertaken a worthy labour of love. Louis Racine may be known to some as the youngest son of the overshadowing Jean, and to others as a very dull poet, but to few is he known as an admiring translator and critic of Milton. And Louis deserves a better fate, for his sensibilities were refined enough to reveal to him superlative poetry even when he was quite incapable of creating superlative—or even mediocre—poetry for himself.

Katherine John has increased the value of her book by prefacing her translations of Racine with an essay on Racine's Miltonic predecessors. Information regarding St. Maur, the Abbé Mareuil, and Anne-Marie du Bocage which tells of the several treatments of Milton is not readily accessible. In Katherine John's introduction the reader must not expect a thoroughly comprehensive analysis of Miltonic influence in France; the scope of the book and the fact that the introduction points primarily to the succeeding translations forbid an exhaustive treatise, but enough is said to present to the casual reader an adequate background for Racine's work, and enough is implied to stimulate the more serious reader to a further investigation of his own.

H. E.

A STUDY OF WORDSWORTH

" Wordsworth." By Herbert Read. 10s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)

In reprinting the Clark Lectures which he gave at Trinity College, Cambridge, Mr. Herbert Read has produced a concise, lucid and in some ways challenging volume, which will take its place among the really important studies of William Wordsworth. His book is in no sense an " introduction " to the works of the poet; it is rather an immensely valuable epilogue, to be read and debated by those who are already familiar with Professor Harper's careful survey of the facts of Wordsworth's life.

In expounding his theory of the relationship between Wordsworth's life and his poetic activity, Mr. Read has supported his case by pertinent references to the poems and to the known facts. He explains much by a discussion of Wordsworth's early love for Annette Vallon, and in view of the fact that most of his greatest poetry was written in the decade after his first meeting with Annette, there are good grounds for maintaining that his " thwarted emotions found an external and objective compensation in his poetry."

Among the most notable parts of Mr. Read's study are his examination—and refutation—of the claim that Wordsworth is a philosophical poet; his rejection of the view that Coleridge had a decisive influence on Wordsworth's work; and his analysis of Wordsworth's doctrine of the relation between feeling and poetry.

E. H.

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
CHRISTMAS, 1930

From a drawing by [illegible]

MR. HERBERT READ.

A VARIETY OF SINGERS

Collected Poems and a New Poet of the Country-side

"Poems for Children." By Walter de la Mare. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)
"Hazards." By Wilfrid Gibson. 5s. (Macmillan.)
"The Armed Muse." By Herbert E. Palmer. 3s. 6d. (Hogarth Press.)
"Ploughed Earth." By Claude Colleer Abbott. 5s. (Constable.)
"Winter Movement." By Julian Bell. 5s. (Chatto & Windus.)
"Early Poems." By Humbert Wolfe. 6s. (Blackwell.)

Fortunately, in the House of Poetry there are many Mansions. There is one for Edmund Blunden as well as one for T. S. Eliot; and one for de la Mare as well as one for D. H. Lawrence. It is necessary to fortify oneself with some such reflection before embarking upon the review of poets as many and various as those whose latest books are here under consideration. How else justify their inclusion in one group? For certainly nothing unites them except their claim, each in his degree, to a Mansion in the accommodating House aforesaid. All are poets, and there the bond ends. Let there be no labelling, therefore, or classification; and let chance decide who shall come first or last.

Here, then, is Walter de la Mare. Into one handsome volume his publishers have collected all his books of poetry for children: "Songs of Childhood"—that rare little book first issued under the pseudonym of Walter Ramal; "Peacock Pie"; three songs from "Crossings" and others from "Flora" and "Down-Adown-Derry"; and about twenty poems never before printed in book form. For many Mr. de la Mare is at his best when, as a poet, he writes for children. The world he inhabits is small and dewy-clear, full of sweet echoes lost to adult ears, and innocent as the first morning of time. Not that a child would understand all the poems, for instance, in this collection. But then "understanding" is not the first requisite Mr. de la Mare asks of his readers. It is enough if you know how to listen; for music is the key to his world. And who like a child knows how to listen? The present volume, therefore, is addressed not so much to children as to the child in us all. To confess that these poems mean nothing to you is to confess that the child in you is dead. To enjoy them is to let the poet conduct you back to that immaculate world where once you had free access but to which, since understanding has dulled your vision, you have since lost the way. Small need, therefore, that Mr. de la Mare should end his delightful preface with an apology: "I hope at least they won't do anybody, however young, or even old, any harm." We for one are glad that a poet still lives who, in this sophisticated age, can light us the way to a lost innocence.

After Mr. de la Mare comes Wilfrid Gibson—and let chance take the responsibility! "Hazards" contains some hundred and thirty poems and is dated "1928-1930." For Mr. Gibson is a prolific poet. Not that prodigality will ensure anybody admission to the House of Poetry. No Mansion awaits the poetic journalist there. It is not enough merely to think poetically; and that, it must be owned, is Mr. Gibson's danger. He has poetic thoughts. Whether it be coming down on a winter's morning to let the sweep in, or seeing in the waiting-room at Euston a group of Russian emigrants bound for Canada, Mr. Gibson will instinctively turn the incident into a poem. Well and good—so long as it does not become a trick. Usually this poet's instinctive sense of the dramatic saves him. His eye is quick to catch the antilogy of things and he has a fine ability in setting the incident down on paper. Nevertheless "Hazards" would have been a better book if the inspiration had oftener waited for a white heat.

Mr. W. H. Davies.
From a drawing by Raphael Nelson.

Lack of heat was never a fault in Herbert Palmer's poetry. In many ways, "The Armed Muse," small book as it is, is the best he has yet given us. It is urgent with life, ever fierce:

> "For you are rich and I am poor;
> And you're a tower and I'm a clod,
> And you are verminous with Power,
> And I am much oppressed with God."

That is the very stuff of poetry; and just to be able to write like that argues a training rare in these days. More, it argues an intensity of feeling that, compared with so much modern poetry, is as blood to water. Moreover Mr. Palmer has a philosophy; no second-hand philosophy won from books; but one wrenched by suffering clean out of life itself. Of all the books in this varied collection, his is the one we most cordially recommend.

After such full-bloodedness, the poetry of Maurice Baring has almost the elegant air of the eighteenth century. Secure in his religious faith he writes like one shut off from life in the cool and rather dim seclusion of the cloister. Even when he is writing of the War his sorrow, beautifully expressed, is a personal, almost private, affair. It is a relief to come out into the open country with Claude Colleer Abbott. For one thing, his poetry is more objective. He gives one the feeling of long horizons of ploughed clay and wide sweeps of open sky. And yet, putting his book aside, no clear emotion remains, no memory of lines like Mr. Palmer's; rather, one feels, here is a poet to watch. Julian Bell is a name new to us and his poetry is not quite like any we have ever read. He dedicates his book to Richard Jefferies and certainly he has Jefferies's exact eye for rural matters—but he has none of Jefferies's marring sentimentality. Obviously, and admittedly, he has been reading Gerard Manley Hopkins: thence his occasional ruggedness. He has the eye of a poet and he has painfully chiselled for himself a personal technique. That is very much indeed; but whether he has the heart of a poet remains to be seen.

And so chance brings us at last to Humbert Wolfe, whom apparently, popularity and importunate publishers have persuaded to reprint in one volume his early work. But not even a new preface can give these verses much value now - unless it be of interest to you to see the facile but prentice hand of a poet learning its craft. To us "Early Poems" reveals only a charming dexterity.

C. HENRY WARREN.

Recent Fiction

MOSTLY GERMAN:
A Collection of Foreign Fiction

By
C. A. Dawson Scott

"The Forest Ship." By Arnold Höllriegel. 7s. 6d. (Putnams.)
"Flint." By M. Herbert Read. 7s. 6d. (Noel Douglas.)
"Recollections and Other Tales." By Ion Creanga. 7s. 6d. (Dent.)
"The Kingdom of Love." By Max Brod. 7s. 6d. (Martin Secker.)
"Faber." By Jacob Wassermann. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)
"The Name of Action." By Graham Greene. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

Translation is chancy work both for the creator of a book and the artisan. How is a man who is only a craftsman to realise the deeper meanings the artist gives his work? And when the translator is herself an artist—as in the case of Miss Ethel Mayne—how can she be sure of getting a book to turn into English that shall be worthy of her delicate perceptions? In "The Forest Ship," by Arnold Höllriegel, she has to deal with a mixture of travel and story on which her fine art is wasted. A number of dull people have taken a trip to the Amazon, and their boat is held up by a revolution. Halfway through the book one of the passengers gives an historical sketch of Pizarro's expedition in the time of Charles V. Though shapeless and wordy, as "A Book of the Amazon River," "The Forest Ship" has its place. Those going thither in search of butterflies or similar game will find it interesting.

"Flint" is the story of a crippled musician who, born in Russia and educated in Paris, goes as soon as he is grown up to America. From thence, owing to his foolishness in not obtaining expert advice, he is presently deported. The writer's English could be improved. He says "Financial success came, and the couple took off several months for a holiday in Europe." This example also shows how bald is Mr. Read's style. On the other hand the scenes depicted are interesting, especially those of the hero's early days on the Russian farm.

It is a pity that Creanga's "Recollections" were not published in a slim volume by themselves, for they are followed by some enchanting fairy tales which would have made a Christmas gift-book for children. Combined they fall between two stools, and may miss the popularity they deserve. It is however a good thing to be able to read in English the work of this distinguished Rumanian.

Mr. Aldous Huxley.
From a drawing by D. Nicholson.

In the excellently translated "Kingdom of Love," by Max Brod, are many flickering phrases which excite and stimulate. He has a lyrical power which it is pleasant to discover. He says such things as—"the peculiar delight in adventure which is not far removed from wisdom," and at once you see a gay procession of adventurers, those pioneers who since the beginning have gone forth from viks and homesteads, and before that from caves and holes. He talks of "the ancient dark delight without which the earth would be so poor," and under the moon lover bends to lover all the world over. The story is that of a man who has been unjustly condemned to a term of imprisonment through, as he imagines, the jealous hatred of an old schoolfellow. He is obsessed by fear of this man's hatred, and sets off to prove the matter. The result is an unconvincing story of wanderings which eventually reveal that he has been mistaken in his fear. The account of a Jewish settlement on Mount Carmel is good but not apposite, in fact the writer appears to have written his story round a journey he has taken rather than have made the cruise incidental to the tale.

When will writers learn that information vital to their stories must not be conveyed by long-winded confessions made by minor characters? This clumsy device shows lethargy of mind. The information should be given by means of scenes and events; it should happen, not be narrated. To give it in this way means extra work and fine handling, but unless a man will take trouble and more trouble over his work, unless he will do it better than he can—why write? Jacob Wassermann is in this respect a sinner. His chorus in "Faber, or the Lost Years," is Faith, the lady-help, who during the absence of the wife, explains to the husband why and how his wife has changed to him during the years in which he has been absent as a prisoner of war.

This is a book of fine psychology, and therefore one could wish that Miss Mayne had been its translator. We should not then have had phrases so strange to an English ear as "we reached a bosh, which appeared like a burst of flame of a hundred colours," and "she talked like a hodge-podge." So bad is the translation that we are left wondering over some of the meanings. Could Jacob Wassermann really have given us such stiff and stilted dialogue? It is impossible to tell.

The finest of these six novels is undoubtedly "The Name of Action," by Graham Greene. This is surprising, for Mr. Wassermann has a fine reputation, and the psychology of Faber shows that he has depth and an unusually keen appreciation of values, but this book, at least, is without humour, a heavy and wordy tale. On the other hand "The Name of Action," which has humour and emotional fire, is but a fantasy. Mr. Greene is so gifted a writer that he should cry "Hold! Enough!" till he can find a theme worthy of his powers.

"The Name of Action" is the story of a revolution in southern Germany which is engineered by a young Englishman for no particular reason. He has fallen in love with the wife of the dictator, a woman whom Mr. Greene brings to life and who is an enchanting creation. The change at Trier to a democracy is made because the dictator is not man enough to take to himself the woman to whom he is married. Mr. Greene hits the truth when he declares that if a state is to have permanency it must be built by normal people and run on normal lines. The book arrests attention for the thought underlying its fantasy and for the emotional charm of the writing.

THE MYSTERY GAME

Outwitting the Detective

"The Murder at the Vicarage." By Agatha Christie. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)
"Account Paid." By Collin Brooks. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)
"The Three R's." By "Ganpat." 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
"Man in a Black Hat." By Temple Thurston. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)
"The Governor of Kattowitz." By Graham Seton. 7s. 6d. (Butterworth.)
"Hercules, Esq." By Gwyn Evans. 7s. 6d. (Shaylor.)
"The Clue of the Silver Key." By Edgar Wallace. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
"Plain Murder." By C. S. Forester. 7s. 6d. (John Lane.)

Macaulay had a habit, his biographer tells us, of periodically testing his mental faculties to assure himself they were as keen as they used to be. The modern reader of mysteries and thrillers might act on this suggestion, and whenever a new detective story appears try to discover whether or not he had lost his cunning in solving a problem or guessing the villain. It is excellent sport. An author sets out to baffle and the reader pits his wits against him; on the one side is the arch-deceiver, and on the other side the man struggling against deception; the question is, who will win.

Probably not a single member of the Crime Club will detect unaided the secret in Agatha Christie's "Murder at the Vicarage." There is good reason why. Mrs. Christie is an adept at throwing dust in our eyes. Her latest story is not so subtle as "Roger Ackroyd," but it is remarkably adroit, and the plot depends entirely upon false suggestion. Let me make a frank confession. I flattered myself upon a perfectly satisfactory unravelling of the riddle, and I was utterly wrong. A double surprise came when I found that in place of the conventional detective of fiction a quaint old lady who poked her nose into other people's business was the triumphant picker-up of clues which eluded everybody else. The book is rich in humour also, and if only Mrs. Christie were more particular in her grammar (which is quite deplorable at times) she could be congratulated on another masterpiece. At all events she "plays the game," and gives us a splendid run.

Then there is Mr. Collin Brooks with his ingenious "Account Paid." He laughs at us in his preface by making a bland assurance that the identity of the villain is "obvious from the first few chapters." What with a murdered heroine who is not murdered, mistaken identities, changed names and double crossings, it takes a very shrewd brain indeed to detect the facts—indeed Mr. Brooks himself requires three final chapters to explain them, and that is the only weakness in a very strong and original book. Explanations should be crisp, dramatic, convincing and not confused with multitudinous details and fine-spun arguments. But it is a well devised tale on new lines, and it leads to a terrific climax.

"Ganpat" plays the game also, and keeps us on the alert. The villains in "The Three R's" are melodramatic, and when they arranged the killing of M. Guichard they wove their snares with such wizard skill that only a master-wizard like Réné Fauconnier could possibly disentangle the threads. How it was achieved is "Ganpat's" task to show, and in a mixture of wild adventure and gentle romance he thoroughly succeeds.

I have often wondered why novelists do not resort more frequently to the strange lore of the Rosicrucians. Lytton turned it to good account, and even Thackeray yielded to its fascination. But Mr. Temple Thurston in "Man in a Black Hat" has given us a weird figure in a certain Gollancz who might have been modelled from the Count Saint-Germains himself—a creature possessed of the ancient wisdom and powers of sorcery enabling him to retain his youth, to defy death and to project his spirit into places which his physical body did not reach. This is a tale for lovers of the occult, with some hair-raising situations.

Am I mistaken in assuming that Mr. Graham Seton changed his mind when half-way through writing "The Governor of Kattowitz"? Why should a sensuous and repulsive ruffian and trickster like Conrad Pusov suddenly change into a love-sick hero prattling of sunshine and sugar and sweethearts?—and why should the pure and beautiful Maria who feared and loathed him abandon her real hero Hans and murmur that she had loved the rogue Conrad all the time? It is inexplicable, and an enigma that no one will be greatly interested in elucidating.

We can turn from this topsy-turvydom to the sheer extravaganza of "Hercules, Esq.," where for a round million pounds a dauntless and resourceful hero so thoroughly achieves the impossible that he puts his classic namesake of ancient Greece to shame. Or we might disport ourselves with the incredible coincidences in Mr. Edgar Wallace's "Clue of the Silver Key" and wonder whether we are really supposed to take such things seriously. Finally we can glance at Mr. Forester's "Plain Murder" in which no psychological point whatever arises—a story of crime so crude that the only mystery it suggests is why it was written. If it were to analyse the pangs and reactions of criminals, that was done effectively, once and for all, by Godwin in "Caleb Williams" a century ago.

J. CUMING WALTERS.

A LARGE CANVAS

"Jim Redlake." By Francis Brett-Young. 10s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

This is a bulky, full-dress novel of the familiar Dickensian type that begins at the beginning and pursues its hero through childhood, youth and early manhood with remorseless thoroughness. Doubtless it will appeal to many readers by its undoubted charm of idyllic description and sober precision of style. For ourselves we hardly feel that Mr. Brett-Young, in choosing so large a canvas for the display of his talents, has been quite well inspired. The progress of the story is of necessity slow, and the doings of the characters, like the characters themselves, lack the vitality that would keep our attention through the seven hundred and eighty-seven pages of the book. This is the more unfortunate as one remembers with regret the special distinction of his earlier books, with their eerie suggestion of hidden things behind the landscape and figures of the Welsh Marches. They had something strange and penetrating about them that was not commonplace.

Mr. Brett-Young's interesting little candle of tender and mystical flame will light up a dark romantic cabin like "The Dark Tower," but when it comes to a large and imposing modern edifice like "Jim Redlake" the effect, to say the least of it, is dim. The author's foreword informs us that the names are taken from the Ordnance Survey, and the characters themselves partake somewhat of their abstract and schematic fount. Jim's father, the selfish successful novelist of tradition, and his grandmother, the wicked stepmother of our nurseries, though planned on familiar enough lines, hardly carry off the imposture, though the lady is assisted by a Jane Austen-like definiteness of outline. Moreover from the beginning we become aware that the author has in his mind firmly divided his creatures into the sheep and the goats, and this wiry line of demarcation can be only too clearly traced right down the whole ninety-four of them.

However, once he has accepted this rather primitive state of things, the reader who will persist will find much to reward him. There is a good deal of the old charm in the description of the Leicestershire country-side with its sporting doctors and parsons, its local squabbles and the snobbish behaviour of those who aim at getting in with the "county." Better still is the momentary glimpse of the wilder beauty of the Welsh Border country and the ancestral, almost haunted mansion of Trewern.

Of the Theatre

SOME NEW PLAYS

Lord Dunsany's Fantasy

By
Graham Sutton

"The Old Folk of the Centuries." By Lord Dunsany. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)
"Wonderful Zoo." By F. Sladen-Smith. 3s. 6d. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)
"Captain Banner." By George R. Preedy. 3s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)
"The Love-Tiff." Translated by Frederic Spencer. 2s. 6d. (Blackwell.)
"Hamlet." By May Wynne. 7s. 6d. (Alston Rivers.)

Lord Dunsany's new play appears in a limited edition, of which the first hundred copies are autographed. It is a fantasy, true to the Dunsany type—or formula, if you like: and yet a formula which no one else can handle with the authentic Dunsany touch: romance and pedantry, riotously intertwined. We have the solemn professor of entomology, deep in appropriate tomes: the good woman who "does" for him: the little girl, to whom the routine of enchantment comes as a matter of course: the crabbed witch with cat and cottage: and the fairy prince, turned by the witch into an unusual butterfly which the professor laboriously ensnares. But the prince, when restored to human shape, turns out to be not a prince at all, but a somewhat bewildered little London guttersnipe, whom the professor's housekeeper (she would!) promptly packs off to school. What happens to him thereafter forms the rest of the play: for he finds Lord Dunsany's fantastic academy so little to his taste that he returns to brave the witch again and gets himself re-enchanted. This is all worked out in the fanciful vein which Lord Dunsany's readers will expect. It is unlikely to be seen on any commercial stage; but it is well within the scope of dramatic societies, and should not lack interpreters. A most charming trifle.

Another uncommercial fantasy (stranger and deeper than Lord Dunsany's) which the alert society cannot afford to miss, is "Wonderful Zoo." At first it seems disconnected, with its grotesque procession of characters and swift-changing scenes. But it grows in coherence, this picture of a lunatic at large for a day, a puzzled but interested spectator of the life of a city. In his small space and seemingly haphazard manner, Mr. Sladen-Smith has a good deal to say about man and his achievements: and says it with entertaining competence.

"Captain Banner" is a semi-historical romance, based on the story of Caroline Matilda of Denmark, sister to George III. Its scene is the prison-fortress of "Wisberg" (Hamlet's Elsinore) whither the disgraced queen is sent to die as unostentatiously as may be: its hero, the dour prison-governor who may regain the favour of the court through her death. Mr. Preedy has excellently conveyed the grim atmosphere of Wisberg; but as a whole, the play falls short of its setting and theme, and of its publisher's praises. Its style is stiff and even a little pedantic, the texture of its plot somewhat thin (a few more characters, and a more complicated clash of interests, might have helped here). It is more real and human, certainly, than the cloak-and-sword type of drama which was Mr. Preedy's alternative and which he is at pains to avoid; but his emotions strike one as being hardly big enough for the tragic atmosphere which he builds up.

A far cry, from this to Molière. "The Love Tiff" is a translation, in rhymed couplets, of the short comedy which Valville extracted from Molière's "Dépit Amoureux." Two pitfalls lurk for the rhymed-coupleteer—the monotony which comes from his finding his task too easy, and the obscurity which comes from his finding it too hard. Mr. Spencer avoids them both; he also solves the major problem of the Molière-translator—namely, to get his dialogue colloquial without losing his "period." And the result, with its neat rhyming, is one of the happiest Molière-versions that has cropped up for some time.

Miss Wynne's "Hamlet" is Shakespeare's novelised, with a good deal of the original dialogue done into prose. Why? "This novel has a unique appeal" say the publishers. It adds some old Scandinavian records and legends, also a tender passion of Horatio for Ophelia. Why, again? By reading it, "lovers of Shakespeare will learn more fully to understand the great master and his masterpiece." Lovers of Shakespeare, please note.

ENGLISH DRAMA AT THE NADIR

The Year 1800–1850

"Nineteenth Century Drama: 1800 1850." By Allardyce Nicoll. 2 vols. 30s. (Cambridge University Press.)

Professor Allardyce Nicoll has now brought his history of the drama in England up to the middle years of last century, and the present volume is even more welcome than its predecessors. For it covers the times when our English stage was at its lowest ebb, when extravaganzas and farces of little or no merit were the stock theatrical fare, when the playwrights were hacks and men of letters either neglected or misunderstood the drama. Exactly how deep were the depths reached can be appreciated only by a detailed study such as Professor Nicoll gives us here.

It is, in spite of its shortcomings, an important age, because it forms the link between the theatre of Sheridan and the age of Robertson, who was, in a remote and primitive way, the herald of the dramatic renaissance. And it is moreover a well-documented age, for the author has had to index in his hand-list of plays (which forms the second volume) between 10,000 and 12 000 titles—as against the 600 in the 1600–1700 volume.

The whole work contains much acute criticism of the condition of the theatre, of the playwrights, of the audiences, and succeeds in giving a vivid picture of the age. But for two points in particular one is grateful to the author. He says something that has badly needed saying for some time. In the first place, he suggests that the Romantic poets "have long been the spoilt children of literature," and that it is time we recognised that their failure to write for the stage may have been less the theatre's fault than their own. Few with a knowledge of the stage and its needs would dissent in these days from the opinion that the poets failed as playwrights, not because they were too good for the theatre but because they were too bad for it. A great dramatist needs a far greater sweep of imagination and a much finer technique than the poet; above all he needs the power of seeing and portraying objectively what the egocentric poet can treat only subjectively.

The second point is allied to this. Professor Nicoll suggests that criticism at this period was unhelpful. The "great" critics—Coleridge, Lamb and Hazlitt—were indeed some of the worst dramatic critics we have had, because they wrote of the theatre from any point of view but that of theatricalism. Hazlitt offends least, but only Malone had any real idea of what the theatre in his time needed.

But the theatre had to wait almost till this century before there arose a race of critics capable of directing her course, and a race of dramatists able to speed her on it.

H. R.

From a drawing by MAITLAND HOWARD. See page 4 ALLARDYCE NICOLL.

FIVE BOOKS ON THE WAR

Mons, Verdun and the Kitchener Armies

By

Lieut.-Colonel F. E. Whitton, C.M.G.

"The Advance From Mons." By Walter Bloem. 7s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)
"Verdun." By Marshal Petain. 12s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)
"The Yarn of a Yeoman." By S. F. Hatton. 10s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)
"The Kitchener Armies." By V. W. Germains. 7s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)
"Secret Service." By Major-General Sir George Aston, K.C.B. 18s. (Faber & Faber.)

The words "Advance from Mons" have a curious ring, so accustomed are we to think of 1914 in terms of the famous Retreat. The title shows of course that the book is by a German, though its scope covers more than the thrust through Belgium into France, for it includes the retreat from the Marne to the Aisne as well. It is claimed to be the most accurate war-book that has come out of Germany, and in the foreword no less an authority on 1914 than Sir James Edmonds summarises it as one of the most graphic and dramatic accounts of the War yet written. The author, who served as a captain in the 12th Brandenburg Grenadiers, was a trained writer before 1914 for he was the author of three novels dealing with the Franco-German War. The descriptions are vivid and telling, and nothing can beat the words which tell of the author's first experience of shrapnel: "Another tearing scream, and another, four in close succession--gorr!—gorr!—gorr!—gorr! and four bursts--crash!—crash!—crash!—crash!—above our heads, but this time on the roofs of the houses, and a rain of broken slates rattled down on our helmets and shoulders. A most devilish, damnable feeling!" Non meminisse juvat. Captain Bloem was frankly impressed by the British army, and not only its musketry but its artillery as well seem to have come as a surprise. Seeing that this book has been translated by one, and sponsored by another professional historian, one cannot escape a malicious thrill of glee over the error on page 16 regarding the date of the battle of Spicheren in 1870.

French Soldiers bar the road at Essen station.
From "The Revolver Republic," by G. E. R. Gedye (Arrowsmith).

Marshal Petain's book "Verdun" is of a different stamp. He was not, like Captain Bloem, a mere pawn but in high command, and his volume has not therefore the subjective interest of "The Advance from Mons." Although he gives a good picture of the actual fighting it is with bold sweeps of the brush, and he necessarily begins with a reasoned account of the general position on the Western Front at the end of 1915. We do not actually come to Verdun until one quarter of the volume has been passed, and the terrific combats round it are succeeded by the counter-thrust which led to the Somme, 1916. The technical interest in the book consists in an examination of the value of permanent fortifications and Marshal Petain believes that Verdun provides the most valuable lesson of the War in this respect; his verdict is that of General Normand, "The army unquestionably won the battle, but concrete contributed its share." The fighting which began in February lasted until nearly the end of the year, and the triumphant French offensive moved the German Crown Prince to a pathetic confession of the bitterness of failure. This book is adequately mapped but we know what Carlyle must have felt when he moaned, "a Sibylline indexless farrago yet not without some bright jewels in the blind, dark, awful belly of it." "Verdun" is not quite as bad as that, but it could do with an index all the same.

"The Yarn of a Yeoman" is a capital book. It has been written, to a certain extent, as an antidote to "All Quiet on the Western Front." The whole story goes with a swing.

The next book recalls the sense of wonder one experienced in 1914 when the words "Kitchener's Army" first struck the eye. Was not "The King's Army" good enough? However, recruits rolled up fast enough which was the main thing, but inevitably the old regular army did not at first feel that this strange new thing was part of itself. There is a mass of statistical and useful information in this book, presented in a clear and interesting way. There is too the usual New Army gibe against the staff on page 209, and something about admission to, and training at, Camberley that is perilously like nonsense.

6-inch Howitzer. Position near Mametz, 1916.
From "The Gambardier," by Mark Severn (Ernest Benn).

Sir George Aston's book is unfortunately named. There is very little of real "Secret Service" in it and what there is seems rather vieux jeu. There is a perpetual far horizon, it is always jam on the next page but never jam on the page you are reading, and much of the text reminds one of the announcements preliminary to the "Royal Nonesuch" in "Huckleberry Finn." But as regards certain incidents in the Great War in which secrecy was of absolutely vital importance the book is written with that lightness of touch and those frequent flashes of humour that are Sir George's own.

BAGATELLE

Mr. Preedy Again

"Bagatelle and Other Diversions." By George R. Preedy. 7s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

Mr. Preedy frankly confesses his mood and his intentions in his preface; he is obsessed (to his own delight, it appears) with certain ghostly figurines and yearns to endow them with sufficient life to make others give them at least a passing glance. Many writers, especially those of a fecund invention, are thus overwhelmed by the number and vivacity of the children of their creation; this writer appears to have some peculiar affinity with the most baroque aspects of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; one suspects that he writes of these periods because he is more at home in them than any other, including his own; it is the epoch of Goldoni, of Tiepolo, of Farinelli, of the melancholic Bourbon Kings of Spain, of glittering mercenary soldiers, of wanton, lovely, heartless women, of endless wars slow and stately as parties of pleasure, of a décor inspired by Chieurguerra, Paulus Decker, Fischer von Erlach and Bibbiena.

It is a notable indication of the author's very pronounced tastes that none of the tales are set in England and that most of them have some musical significance or symbolism; the Hofburg at Vienna seems (unavowed or not) Mr. Preedy's favourite "drop-cloth" and characters founded on Maurice de Saxe, Prince Eugène, Marischal Keith or Potemkin, his favourite heroes. Despite the extreme sophistication of the elaborate settings, some of the stories are brutal enough; the lapse of a hundred years between the two "Tunes for a Trumpet" shows the same theme treated first cruelly and then elegantly—yet both and all are full of pathos, an incurable mournfulness behind the rich veneer of pomp and beauty and grandeur.

Johnson in 1777.
From the bust by Nollekens.

The author's work, as shown in this volume, and it is not easy to judge a writer by short stories which may reflect only a passing mood, does not seem akin to much or anything in present-day English fiction; he appears to derive from Gozzi and Hoffman (a curious mixture, perhaps) and to savour a little of Hofmansthal; the extreme detail of the decoration in say "Capriccio," belongs surely to painting more than to literature; Mr. Preedy appears to be describing what he has actually seen, his puppets may speak with the majestic, cold nobility of Metastasio, but just as important are their backgrounds by Lambertazzi, their costumes by Veronese and Poeppelmann.

MARJORIE BOWEN.

BOSWELL SUB-EDITED

If it is necessary to reduce Boswell, in these busy times, to dimensions which may be supposed to have a greater appeal, then "The Conversations of Dr. Johnson" (8s. 6d.; Knopf) is a work well done under the editorship of Mr. R. W. Postgate. Some good folks will no doubt desire a Boswell which takes us straight to the talk of the great man. They may agree that "to reduce the gigantic Life to dimensions that the ordinary man can comfortably read" is a necessary operation and means the making of a greater public for the best that is in the best of biographies. Other people, who do not take their Boswell in homœopathic doses, Mr. Postgate will most certainly annoy. Mr. Postgate has no right to make the sweeping statement that only by his conversations is Johnson now remembered. It is simply not true.

A CONTRAST

Von Hügel and Parry

"Two Witnesses: A Personal Recollection of Hubert Parry and Friedrich von Hügel." By Gwendolen Greene. 7s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

Mrs. Plunket Greene's book, written out of her recollections of her father, Sir Hubert Parry, and of her uncle, Baron von Hügel, is in many ways intensely interesting. In order to make a right approach to the volume, however, the reader should understand that the authoress has not given us biographical sketches of either man, except as biographical points may incidentally come in. The book is really an account of the way in which the dominant characteristics of father and uncle have influenced the writer's inner life. And a good many pages are devoted to the writer's exposition or discussion of the religious matters involved. Indeed it may fairly be said that the book deals with Mrs. Greene's own spiritual experience—with her spiritual reactions to the characters of father and uncle—rather than with the lives of Sir Hubert or the Baron.

But it is none the less interesting for that. What holds the reader from start to finish is the contrast between the musician and the theologian in fundamental things, and the resulting contrast between the gifts they gave. Contrast it is. For while no one will question what the filial piety of the daughter here affirms—that in the passion for goodness the two men were at one—that is scarcely enough to justify the description of their lives as "parallel, else divergence would cease to have any meaning. Two arcs curving by widely different routes to one goal would be a fitter phrase. Sir Hubert Parry, always passionately seeking the beautiful and the good, always generous and brave, nevertheless stood apart from institutional religion of every kind. Indeed his attitude to the Church, specially to the Church of Rome, was one for which hostility is not too strong a word. And he thought it a sign of weakness to desire a personal God. Yet he seemed to be conscious throughout of something lacking, as his periods of gloom often showed. (There is a touching line in which Mrs. Greene relates how at the end he sat up, stretched wide his arms, and said, "O God, I see.") The greatness of his character gave his daughter an ideal. But it was from the Baron, mystic and saint, that the secret of the ideal's realisation came. It is in the pages dealing with von Hügel that we learn how the authoress has really satisfied her mind and heart.

H. W. C.

POST-WAR GERMANY

"Meet the Germans." By Henry Albert Phillips. 15s. (Lippincott.)

A bird's-eye view of post-war Germany written by an American after a recent return visit which lasted for more than a year; it is a book that should be read by all visitors, intending visitors, and social observers, since it opens many windows to our understanding. Unfortunately the style becomes at times slightly irritating; but once the reader has overcome that initial handicap, he will find himself extraordinarily interested both in the text and in the splendid illustrations.

"THEY DO THESE THINGS BETTER . . ."?

The Dreyfus Case and Another

"Dreyfus." By Walter Steinthal. Translated from the German by Captain Raymond Johnes. 10s. 6d. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

"French Justice." By Manuel Menéndez Valdés. Translated by Dora Round. 9s. net. (Faber & Faber.)

The story of Alfred Dreyfus is one which can always bear retelling, and there is one reason which makes Herr Steinthal's version particularly valuable. The early historians of the Dreyfus case found it difficult to give a precise estimate of the German attitude. It was obvious that the Germans were vitally concerned in the matter, since Dreyfus was falsely accused of acting in their interests; but the exact attitude of the Kaiser and his counsellors, both at the time of the first court-martial and during the agitations for revision, was more a matter of speculation than of certain knowledge. Since the War, however, the papers of the German Foreign Office have been published to the world, and Herr Steinthal has been able to draw upon them in compiling his version of the Dreyfus case. And so, while his record of the various phases in France is no more than an admirable restatement of facts already known, he has been able to round off the story with some interesting passages on the effect made by the case in the lofty regions of German diplomacy.

We see the Kaiser, changeable as ever, at one moment ready to intervene and to declare categorically that Dreyfus was not a German agent, and at another moment haughtily rejecting the French demands for intervention; we see Bülow's nice balancing of arguments for and against intervention; and we read the Kaiser's own fantastic theory, which suggested that Dreyfus, in connivance with the French High Command, had really sold military secrets to Russia, in order to impress Russia with the splendour of France's military strength! In view of his explanation of the German point of view in the amazing tangle of the Dreyfus case, Herr Steinthal's book is perhaps the most adequate record of the whole affair that has yet appeared in English.

Captain Dreyfus at the time of the first trial.
From "Dreyfus." By Walther Steinthal (Allen & Unwin).

Though the case of Señor Valdés has not attained the celebrity of the Dreyfus case, and is now unlikely to do so, it remains an uncomfortable story for people who care about the good name of France. Señor Valdés is a Spaniard who went to work in a French aeroplane factory in 1918; and the record of his arrest for alleged espionage, his sentence to death on very inadequate grounds, the commutation of his sentence to penal servitude for life, and his experiences in various prisons in France and French Guiana is a story which no one can read unmoved. It is true that a good deal of his harsh treatment can be set down to the effects of war-time hysteria, but even war-time hysteria should be kept within bounds.

Were it not that M. Albert Londres and other French journalists have already made fierce attacks on various aspects of the French prison system, one might be inclined to ascribe part of Señor Valdés' story to a vivid imagination. But the corroborative evidence from other sources is too strong, and the story of his three years and nine months in captivity has the uncomfortable ring of truth. "French Justice" is a book of horrors: it makes one hope that the present reforms of the French prison system will proceed with all rapidity, and that the prisons of French Guiana will soon be "reformed altogether."

E. H.

BOLSHEVISM

"Darkness From the East." By Serge de Chessin. Translated by Reginald J. Dingle. 10s. 6d. (Harrap.)

The author of this book is a Frenchman, who was born in Russia, knows the language and people well and has made Russian politics and Bolshevism his life study. Like René Fülöp-Miller in "The Mind and Face of Bolshevism," he emphasises that Soviet doctrine is not merely political, but a philosophy which strives to order the smallest details of life and thought. The paradox of its onslaught on religion is vividly shown. It can only succeed in this by becoming a religion itself, with Lenin as its god, an appalling ritual and even "Red fetishes and Communist-blessed medals."

If it does not believe in God, it apparently believes in the devil, judging by Soviet trials of witches. The converse is a wave of fanaticism among millions of Russians, naturally peasants most of all, and the revival of fantastic sects, like the Shakers, such as Ossendowsky described in pre-Bolshevik days.

CIVIL SERVANTS

"The Romance of the Civil Service." By Samuel McKecknie. With Foreword by Rt. Hon. Philip Snowden. Illustrated. 6s. net. (Sampson Low.)

We did not dream that there was a romantic side to the Civil Service until we read this very good book. It is most entertaining, with more of literature than politics in it. The ramifications of national government and the relation of that government to industry, art, science and the host of things men and women engage in are immense. This book renders a real service to us in that this is a side of social history that is seldom dealt with in a popular way. As with all Messrs. Sampson Low's "Romance" series, it is very well illustrated. Give it to your friends in the Service, and they will be proud of their association. At the moment it has made us feel very kindly towards the income tax question, but perhaps that benevolent attitude will depart with the arrival of Schedule D.

PRIZE COMPETITIONS FOR DECEMBER

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than January 12th. A competitor may enter for all the Competitions, but must cut out the coupon and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS., as the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—TWO GUINEAS for renderings of John Masefield's poem "Beauty" ("I have seen dawn and sunset on moors and windy hills") in the manner of Bridges, Tennyson and Wordsworth. The versions must keep the original length and rhyme scheme, but the metre and the selection of objects of beauty should be altered to suggest the predominant tastes of the previous Laureates.

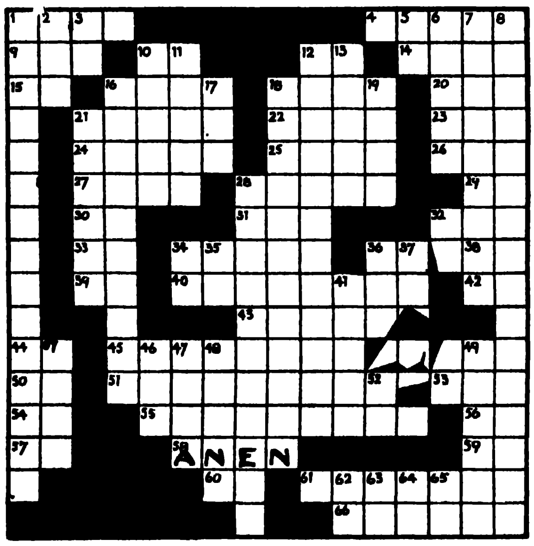
II.—ONE GUINEA for the best list of alternative Laureates to Bridges, Austin, Tennyson and Wordsworth. Reasons for their superiority over those actually chosen should be given in not more than fifty words each.

III.—HALF A GUINEA for the best criticism, in not more than a hundred words, of the articles on John Masefield's work appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN.

IV.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best quotation from the poetry of John Masefield applicable to any book advertised in this number.

V.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a competition.

"THE BOOKMAN" CROSSWORD.



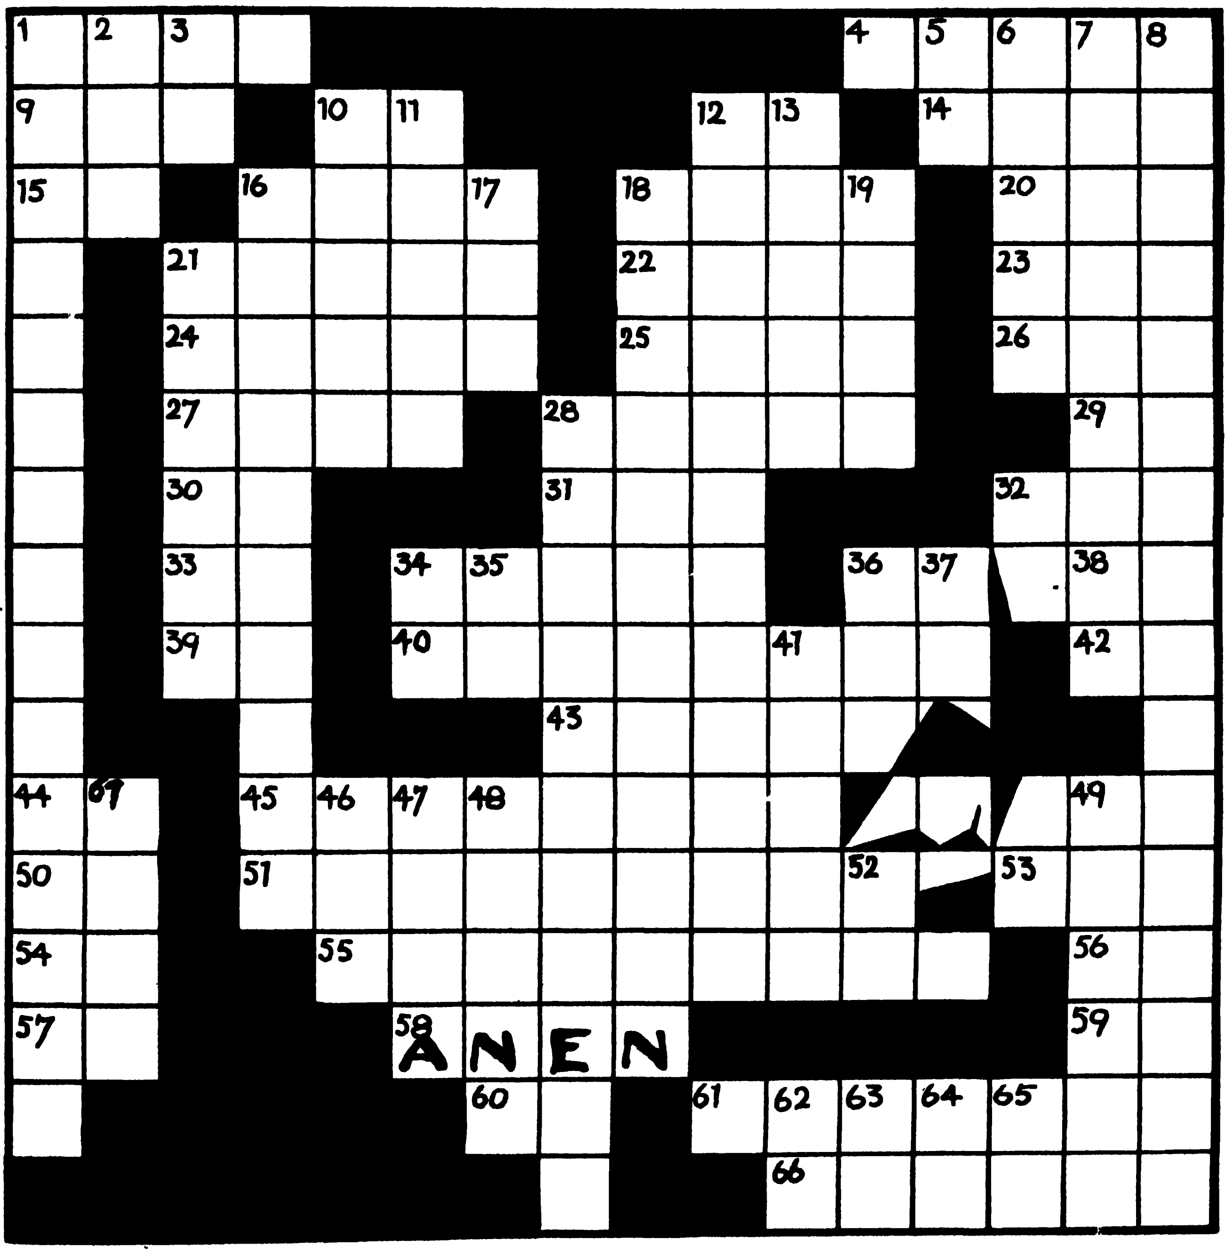
II.—JOHN MASEFIELD. BY "PROCRUSTES."

Two GUINEAS will be sent to the sender of a correct solution who provides the best clue to 58 across.

Competitors should use the Crossword on the opposite page. The one on this page is for reference in the bound volume.

CLUES ACROSS.

1. Railway.
4. To make this argillaceous material, prefix an injunction to silence to what is right in "London Town."
9. "Drive them grunting in the banks, And a long, long pull to Mydath."
10. A mild expletive for a Masefield character.
12. Abbreviate 12 down.
14. From South-Eastern Europe.
15. Half 1 across.
16. Freehold estate.
18. Type.
20. Tom cried out for her in 8 down.
21. A West Indian Republic in turmoil.
22. River in the Masefield country.
23. ". . . out the road, the dogs won't hurt 'ee" ("Reynard the Fox").
24. Drake was decidedly Philip the King's.
25. To solve the puzzle, you must be able to do this from Masefield.
26. In the (Carlotta's language).
27. Latin for Masefield's favourite element.
28. 22 across flows through this county.
29. Four European rivers.
30. Latin pronoun.
31. If these were pots there would be more unemployment.
32. Possessive character.
33. Character in "Odtaa."
34. Not quite the Widow in the Bye Street, but diminutive.
36. Wind and foxhounds say this in Masefield.
38. With 30 across we only need Brute.
39. Not 1 across, but another.
40. St. George and mercy in the field.
42. Character in "Dauber."
43. To Jupiter.
44. Jimmy Jaggard looked like contracting this complaint (8 down).
45. Mad.
49. Ltd. (German).
50. Somebody is in your debt, but not I.
51. Throw a Muse's head at her feet.
53. Minister of the Word of God.
54. No skipper would set this course.
55. If Masefield were a woman, Good Friday might give him this title.
56. Concerning.
57. But this is a different matter (see 54 across).
59. Conjunction.
60. 39 across.
61. Sculpturesque.
66. You cannot escape her in Masefield's sonnets.



CLUES DOWN.

1. "So I have known this life, These beads of coloured days."
2. A change of head would make her sad story universal.
3. On old pillar-boxes.
5. Reverse his initials. It opens in Santa Barbara.
6. Prussian Island.
7. His predecessors.
8. Poem of a sinner saved.
10. Farewell.
11. Rob a prominent Indian of his former mother.
12. A Customs Inspector is this, but not always sufficiently so.
13. Explorer and writer.
16. Let her go headless to sunny Palestine.
17. Abel Brown was an unquotable one.
18. Dauber sailed it.
19. Ones (N.B.).
21. They are not necessarily blasted, even in Masefield, where they may be ghostly.
28. Ships dear to the poet.
34. In the year of the reign.
35. 57 across.
36. Conjunction.
37. Verb.
41. Danger of fire on this ship.
46. Not so much as a tree.
47. In such an association Masefield's poems would be read.
48. They live on a Greek island.
49. More so with paint than tackle, but he rounded Cape Horn.
52. Note.
62. Weight.
63. Preposition.
64. Pennsylvania.
65. 30 across.
67. Slow and old in Spain.

THE BOOKMAN CROSSWORD

II

Clue to 58 :

COUPON

For Competitions

December, 1930

Name...

Address ....

....

REFORM IN INDIA

Statesmen and Philosophers

By
Sirdar Ikbal Ali Shah

"An Indian Diary." By Edwin S. Montague. 21s. (Heinemann.)

"Prophets of New India." By Romain Rolland. 21s. (Cassell.)

During the most critical days of the Great War in 1917, Edwin Montague became the Secretary of State for India. Soon after assuming his office, he realised that the intimate connection which the War had established between India and the West was having a marked influence upon Hindustan. The hypnotic control of the British was already receiving a challenge, and it seemed to him that the only method of retaining the loyalty of India was to overhaul the entire fabric of constitution there.

Imbued with these ideas he journeyed to India, and travelled far and wide through the country for about six months after the historic pronouncement of His Majesty's Government on August 20th, 1917. The diary before us is an unconventional and honest picture of the work of one of the greatest Englishmen of our time. In it he describes his difficulties in overcoming the official red tape of the Indian Civil Service mind; and these notes, dictated to his shorthand typist after a hard day's wading through files, or interviews and discussions, show both the extraordinary penetration of his mind to grasp facts, and the deep passion to create an historical precedent in bringing about a lasting Anglo-Indian understanding.

Mahatma Gandhi.
A drawing by Sjt Kanu Desai.
(By courtesy of the artist.)

From "Mahatma Gandhi: His Own Story," related by C. F. Andrews (Allen & Unwin).

The idea seemed to possess him so firmly that he considered it his destiny to evolve something great, something worthy of British justice. In his diary about a Conference one can read the whole minutes of the debate, his arguments, his cross-examinations, the replies of his opponents and, what is more, one can follow his gallant endeavours to reconcile ideas of hard-boiled Indian Civilians with his own liberal attitude. Whether he is snipe-shooting or on the back of an elephant at a tiger hunt, his mind is far away from the scene. He was always thinking of the future constitution of India.

The fascinating point about his diary is that, engrossed as he was in matters of high policy, his human side is always apparent. His pen-pictures light up the narrative. Here is how he describes the Maharaja of Bundi: "His beard deliberately combed to point to every direction of the compass, and his very conspicuous make-up—dyed hair, painted eyebrows and so forth—were worth seeing." His remarks are always penetrating though charitable. Of a distinguished journalist he remarked: "He is very willing, well meaning, a good journalist, full of pious aspiration and no definite views."

And what delightful scenes too he paints of state gatherings, especially of the after-dinner speeches: 'The Commander-in-Chief, whose manner, rather than his words, was extraordinarily successful; and the way in which he laughed at his own jokes and beamed round the room made whatever he said a success." Then he comments upon the speech of the Viceroy himself: "Chelmsford followed, leading off with the most undistinguished split infinitive that ever dropped with a thud upon a dinner table."

"Prophets of the New India" is of interest to the students of comparative theology; for it is probably the first authentic record of the life and preaching of the Vedanti Order in India.

For the Western mind the rendering of an Eastern philosophy is not always easy, but the original writer and the translator (both Europeans), are to be congratulated for having captured the fire of the cult described. There might not be anything particularly new in the teachings of the Swami (for much of it is to be found in the ideas of the Sufis of Bokhara, and even in the writings of Christian mystics), yet the book remains a scholarly exposition.

CIVIL ADMINISTRATION IN MESOPOTAMIA

The War Period and Post-War Problems

"Loyalties. Mesopotamia, 1914-1920." Vol. I: From the Outbreak of War to the Armistice. By Lt.-Col. Sir Arnold Wilson. 18s. (Clarendon Press.)

"Here follow the names of men, skilled in counsel or the fight, who, heedless of their lives in the service of the country, were, within but a few years, snatched from earth, their lives unlived, their task undone. Though dead they still live in the hearts of their sorrowing comrades. It is to the greater glory of God, and that their memory may be kept green, that their friend and fellow-worker has given himself to the making of this book." Such is a rough translation of the Latin dedication of this volume, and it explains the title "Loyalties." Colonel Wilson felt justified in discharging what he felt to be a pious obligation, namely to record the manner in which the trust imposed, from the outset of the Mesopotamian campaign, upon the Civil Administration was discharged. And he has written with the specific object of removing certain misapprehensions as to the aims and methods of the Civil Administration during and after the War.

Inevitably therefore the book is in places somewhat combative, and inevitably also though here the necessity is not so evident—the progress of military operations, to which civil functions were at all times ancillary, had to be described. Possibly the military side of the campaign has been overdone; certainly in this volume it rather tends to overshadow the purely civil questions with which the book is nominally concerned. In Chapter V, however, we are given in detail the beginnings of the administration of the Basra Wilayat which followed the occupation of Nasiriya. The first departments to receive attention were those concerned with law and order, namely the police and the military governates. Justice next occupied attention, and it was necessary to prepare a provisional and temporary code of law, suited to our immediate needs, and based partly on Indian and partly on Turkish law. Concurrently with the organisation of these services, steps were taken to reconstitute the revenue department. Then came sanitation, an exceedingly difficult problem. Every effort was made to give the civil population a better water supply.

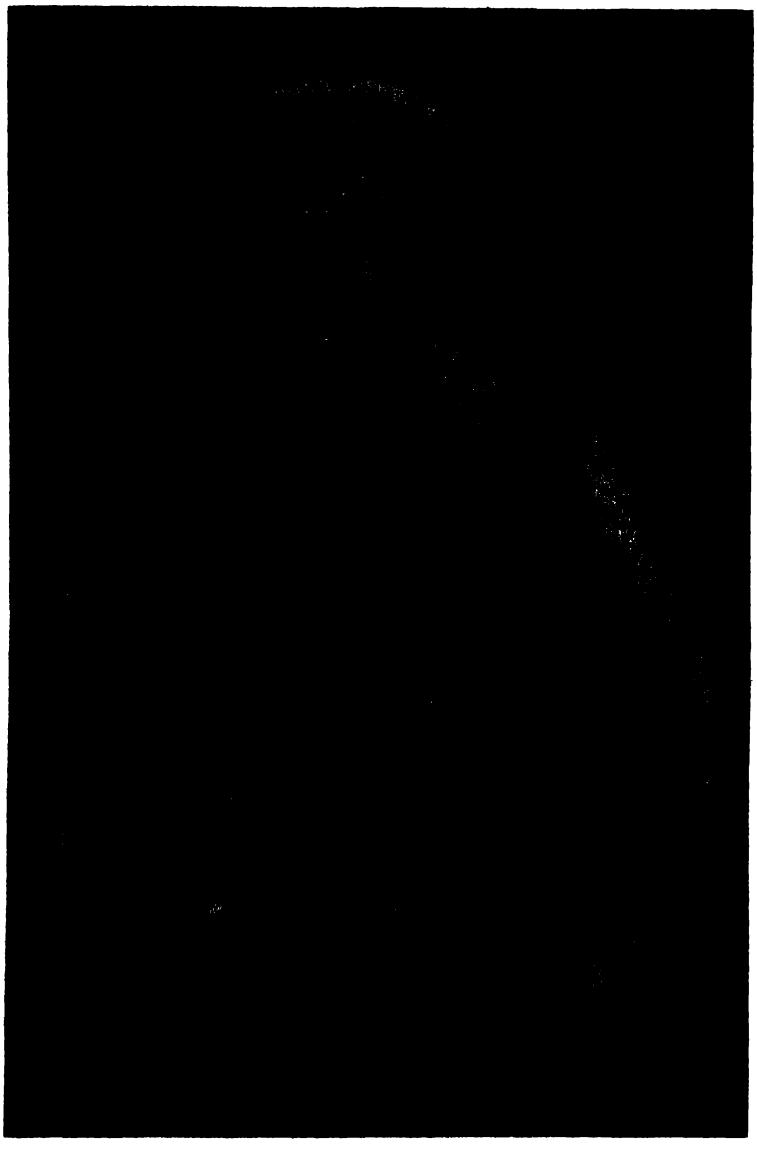


Photo by Bassano.

Maj.-Gen. Sir Charles V. F. Townshend.

From "Loyalties" (Clarendon Press), by Lt.-Col. Sir Arnold Wilson.

After corpora sana came the health of the mind. The Basra Times was started in English on November 29th, 1914; soon after the capture of Bagdad the Bagdad Times appeared, likewise under the responsibility of the civil administration, in English and Arabic. The civil administration was well served by its editors, and was fortunate in having as coadjutors two ladies of amazing attainments. One was the late Miss Gertrude Bell. The other was Mrs. Lorimer, wife of Lieut.-Colonel D. L. R. Lorimer, some time in charge of the Amara sanjaq. Mrs. Lorimer was third in the succession of editors, and of her Colonel Wilson says: "Never was the paper better edited and less censored than under her regime; never were translations into Arabic better supervised." After the formation of a Press came the organisation for the control of hostile trading concerns, and after that came other branches of the embryo civil administration which were started during this period, namely education and the postal and telegraphic services.

Chapter XII is one of the most interesting in the book. It is entitled "Reorganisation at the Base and on the Lines of Communication"—though here again the subject-matter is naval and military rather than civil, for the chapter begins with Military Policy, and deals also with Reorganisation of River Transport, River Conservancy, Dredging Schemes, Pilot Service, Mechanical Transport and the Royal Flying Corps.

This is an excellent book, but it is open to the fault that a preliminary knowledge of the Mesopotamian problem is taken for granted. Yet in the very first page of his preface Colonel Wilson admits that "the public memory is short"; "notoriously short" on page 128, where he also remembers that the rising generation have not even a memory of the campaign. Writers of books on questions of the Great War must remember that even now there are inquiring Peterkins and inquisitive Rose Dartles who want to know not only why we fought in Mesopotamia but why there was a Great War at all.

F. E. WHITTON
(Lieut.-Colonel).

EUROPE SINCE THE WAR

By Hamilton Fyfe

Some Present Discontents

"The Revolver Republic: France's Bid for the Rhine." By G. E. R. Gedye. 10s. 6d. (Arrowsmith.)
"Since Then." By Sir Philip Gibbs. 15s. (Heinemann.)
"Emperor Karl." By Arthur Count Polzer-Hoditz. 21s. (Putnams.)
"The Life Story of King Alfonso XIII." By Evelyn Graham. 18s. (Herbert Jenkins.)

In each of these books the author, either consciously or without understanding, helps to show what has brought about the troubles of to-day. The best of the bunch is Mr. Gedye's account of the foolish French effort to strip off the Rhine Provinces from the German Reich. To that must be attributed a large part of the exasperated feeling which made eight million Germans vote for Fascism at their recent General Election.

Fear has curious effects. It blinds the eyes to reality, it hardens the heart against compassion, it drives out common sense. The very idea that the Rhinelanders had any wish for a Republic of their own, apart from the rest of Germany, could only have found lodgment in minds panic-stricken with terror. Soldiers are notoriously timid—soldiers in high command, that is to say. So it was not surprising to find French generals suborning a few nobodies to create a buffer state. That the idea should have captivated politicians so astute in other matters as M. Poincaré and M. Tardieu seems hardly credible. Yet they have both admitted that it did. Mr. Lloyd George saw things more clearly as they were. He told the French bluntly: "You are going the wrong way to work." He realised that, even if there were any desire for separation in the Rhineland, the blundering French method was going the right way to kill it.

Photo: E.N.A. H.M. the King of Spain.

From "The Life Story of King Alfonso XIII," by Evelyn Graham (Jenkins).

Mr. Gedye tells with spirit and humour the story of the clumsy plot which came so absurdly to grief. He was on the spot all through as correspondent of The Times; his dispatches aroused gleeful satisfaction among all forward-looking people because they were so good in themselves, so fearless and true.

Sir Philip Gibbs has almost given up journalism—in this country at any rate—but his book on events in Europe since the Armistice has the qualities of good journalism. It is a melancholy story that he has to tell; he does not try to soften its sombre hues. Perhaps he leaves out of account too entirely the masses of people everywhere who have gone on living quietly and not unhappily, in spite of the events that have filled the newspapers. Perhaps too he is a little hasty in his outcry against high taxation in Britain (for he intersperses opinions among his historica sketches). He forgets that the people who lived on investments in France and Germany have suffered in a fashion far more severe. The German Rentier lost everything when the mark ceased to have any value. The French lost four-fifths of their savings by the reduction of the purchasing power of the franc from tenpence to twopence.

That saying about men not being heroes to their valets is a delusive piece of cynicism. It may have been true in the eighteenth century, when with huge periwigs and red-heeled shoes and ruffles and silk coats, men made themselves look magnificent; they certainly must have looked very different when they got out of bed in the morning. To-day it is usually the people nearest to the great who give the best report of them. Unfortunately they seldom discriminate in their devotion. If one had to estimate the late Emperor Karl of Austria by this book which his chief private secretary wrote about him, one would suppose his early death deprived the world of a very remarkable man. Unless indeed one noticed that the good opinion of the German Emperor was quoted as decisive! He thought well of Karl, therefore Karl was an outstanding personality. Alas, that no longer carries conviction.

Karl was an agreeable and, considering his upbringing, rather an intelligent young man. But his reputation is not raised by stories such as this:

> "Once when the Emperor was travelling, the head of the Military Chancery was aroused at 12.30 p.m. [this is evidently a mistake for a.m.] by a telegram in which the counsel for certain rebels asked for a reprieve for the condemned. The official did not tell the Emperor of the telegram until the morning. The Emperor said: 'You should have wakened me. I am only a human being.' By that time the four ringleaders were already executed."

Those executions and others like them caused the Empire to burst asunder. If Karl had been a monarch of any spirit and foresight, he would have hanged the official too.

It is lucky for the biographer of the King of Spain, whom he describes as "one of the most popular monarchs in Europe," that no revolution has broken out before his book appeared. The character of the work may be judged from that quotation. It is for those who delight in what Austin Dobson called "the little great, the infinite small things" pertaining to royal circles. They will like it and will learn from it something about Spain as well.

From a drawing by FRANK SLATER

SIR PHILIP GIBBS.

ART
POETRY
BELLES-LETTRES

From Correggio : His Life and Work
By Corrado Ricci
(Warne).

THE APOSTLES : SS. JAMES THE LESS AND THOMAS.

BOOKS ON ART

"Art and Artists: Drawing, Painting, Engraving." By W. E. Sparkes. 10s. 6d. (Nelson.)
"The National Gallery." By Trenchard Cox. 12s. 6d. net. (Faber.)
"Thirty Years of British Art." By Sir Joseph Duveen. 7s. 6d. net. (Studio—Autumn Number.)
"English Tapestries of the Eighteenth Century." By H. C. Marillier. 12s. 6d. net. (Medici Society.)
"Dictionary of Marks and Monograms of Delft Pottery." By Professor Jean Justice. 21s. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)
Robert Austin. "Masters of Etching" Series. 5s. (Studio.)

The contents of Mr. Sparkes's volume are governed by the fact of its being included in the "Highroads of Modern Knowledge" series. "Art and Artists" is a comprehensive title, and no single book bearing it could well aspire to original research. Mr. Sparkes acquiesces in dates and attributions as (provisionally) accepted by the authorities, and pursues his way through his subject along the well-blessed track. Yet his survey displays originality by what it includes and what it leaves out. He begins with Drawing, which is itself something novel, and into eighty copiously illustrated pages brings under brief review ancient civilizations as reflected by their drawings on the flat and in relief. Prehistoric examples are followed by Egyptian, Cretan and Mycenian, Etruscan, Greek, Roman and Byzantine, and these again by Indian, Chinese, Japanese and even Peruvian and Maya. This is much the most interesting section of the work. That on Painting repeats an old story from Giotto to Whistler, with generalisations upon the Schools, but mainly by references to individual pictures, some fifty of which are reproduced in colour. These, so far as they go, are quite well chosen as types, but the scheme necessarily involves an arbitrary selection, and makes no attempt at all to embrace modern instances. The last is true also of the illustrations to the brief section on Engraving, which confines itself chiefly to a rapid description of processes.

From Animals in Greek Sculpture
By Gisela M. A. Richter
(Oxford University Press)

HORSEMAN.
End of fourth century B.C.
(Metropolitan Museum, New York.)

Mr. Trenchard Cox calls his book on the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square a "Room to Room Guide," which means that it is one which the visitor will do well to take inside with him. He will have no difficulty, thanks to the excellently clear plans that head the various chapters, in knowing where he is in the galleries, and in finding his way about in them so as to follow the different schools. Now that the Duveen and the Mond Rooms are opened, the Italian pictures are doubtless arranged as they will remain for a considerable time. We note, on the other hand, the indication found on page 95 that considerable alterations in the hanging of the Dutch Rooms are projected. It is evident that Mr. Cox has had to take his book's life in his hand in arranging it on a plan which the taste of any new Director may upset. But, braving the risk, he has produced an extremely useful volume; one which, properly employed, will prove an easy and safe guide to an unparalleled choice collection.

Sir Joseph Duveen's opinions of the movements and methods in the art of our own time are necessarily interesting, and in "Thirty Years of British Art" they are well and moderately expressed. What he has to say about the New English Art Club, the International, and other bodies is impartially stated, and he somewhat consciously and precariously balances judgment in regard to the Royal Academy. His firm conviction is, he says, that at no time in the history of Great Britain and Ireland have we, as a country, possessed such a wealth and range of artistic talent as we have to-day. In skill and taste, he believes our painters, sculptors, etchers and other art workers can compare more than favourably with those of any other land. Only they lack the means of displaying their wares, and of selling them when shown, and the discussion of the reasons therefore leads Sir Joseph to an exposition of the valuable Duveen Scheme of exhibitions which aims at giving the living artist his chance. Numerous reproductions of representative works of the period under review add greatly to the interest of the volume.

From Modern Architectural Sculpture By W. Aumonier (Architectural Press).

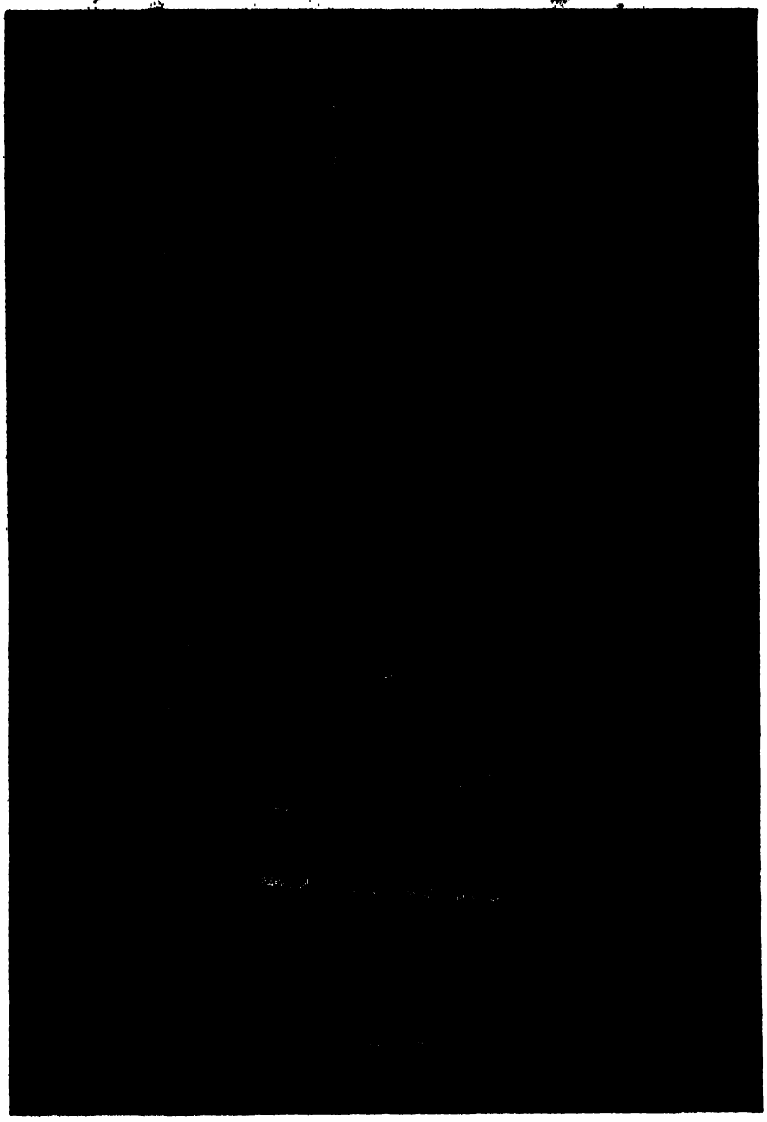
THE NEW AGE. (Sculptor: Allan Howes, England.)



Mr. Marillier's Handbook to the post-Mortlake production of English weavers is arranged in the form of a catalogue raisonné for convenience of reference, the purpose for which, he imagines, it will most often be used. There is little indeed in the subject calling for literary treatment. The Mortlake tapestry works, founded by James I in 1619, faded out towards the end of the century and the weavers dispersed. Some were engaged at the Great Wardrobe, which was created for the maintenance, repair and storing of the royal tapestries, and also wove new ones. But how far it engaged in the latter before the final closing of the Mortlake factory is in doubt. Francis Poyntz was a director at Mortlake and subsequently manager of the Great Wardrobe, but whether he or Thomas Poyntz, the relationship between whom is not known, carried on business independently of the royal establishment, is also a question. In any case, all the tapestries signed by the Poyntzes belong to the latter end of the seventeenth century. There is considerable obscurity concerning the transition to the unexpectedly extensive enterprises recorded in Mr. Marillier's exhaustive Handbook of reference, which is copiously illustrated.

From The National Gallery By Trenchard Cox (Faber & Faber).

MARCO BASSITI: THE MADONNA OF THE MEADOW. (Room VI.)

A curious reason accounts for the faïence of Delft being associated with the town from which it is named. It was not that Delft possessed a clay specially favourable for its production. Only one of the three clays of which it is compounded is to be found on Dutch soil. The two others came from Mühlheim and from Tournai. But Delft in Holland's golden age was doing an immense trade in beer, and when it began

From A History of Spanish Civilisation
By Rafael Altamira
(Constable).

TOMB OF JUAN DE PADILLA, PAGE TO FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.
(Bruges Museo Provincial.)

to decline under competition in the middle of the seventeenth century, the capital released from it was transferred to the faïence industry, for which the abandoned breweries also served as factories. Other circumstances favoured this commercial instinct, and the manufacture of Delfsche porsleyn flourished exceedingly until decline set in towards the end of the next century. The factories assumed specific names, and it is of these and their owners and the potters employed in them that Professor Jean Justice has compiled his Dictionary. It sketches the history of thirty-five factories and records their marks and monograms—over 1,400—for the use of the amateur and collector. There is abundant evidence of the "pirating" of marks, which makes attributions problematical.

Mr. Malcolm Salaman has no difficulty in making interesting his biographical and critical introduction to Mr. Robert Austin's etchings. Of those twelve are reproduced, including the "Puppet-Master," "The Woman Tethering a Goat" and "Woman Praying," plates illustrative of a wide range of feeling. The writer rightly lays emphasis on the sculpturesque quality prevailing in them all.

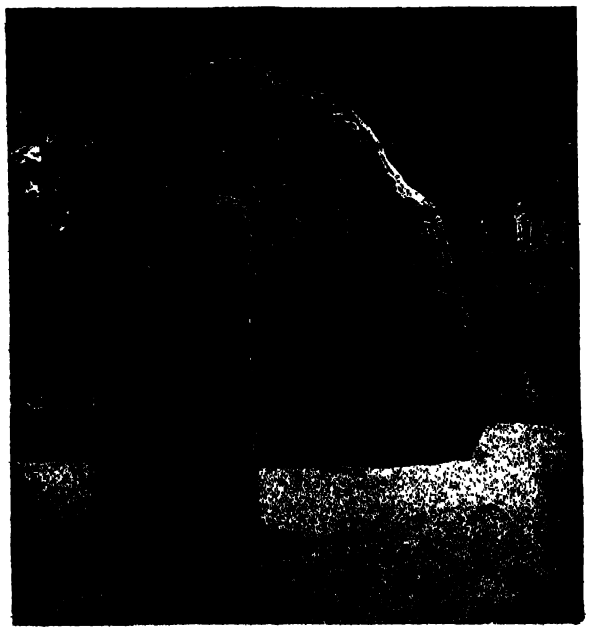
D. S. MELDRUM.

A HISTORY OF SPANISH CIVILISATION

By Rafael Altimira. Edited, with an Introduction, by J. B. Trend. 21s. (Constable.)

Professor Rafael Altamira's book may justly be considered a most distinguished one, not only in the quality of the author's work but also in the manner in which the publisher has presented it to the public; one might almost say that the illustrations alone justify the publication were it not that Professor Altamira is so intelligent a scholar. His subject is so vast—ranging from the elements of the neolithic civilisation in Spain to nineteenth century fans—that detailed comment is impossible. There is a classified biography, which will be of invaluable use to the student of any special aspect of the civilisation discussed in the body of the text.

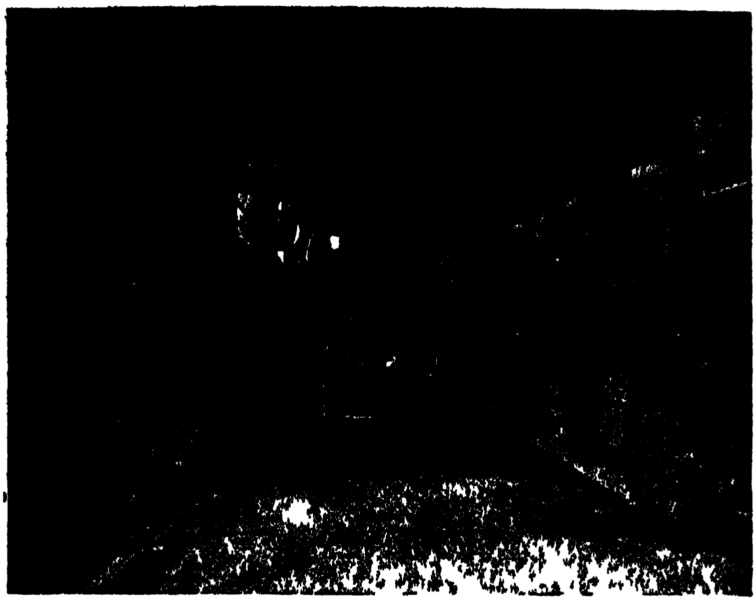
THE ODYSSEY OF HOMER



Rendered into English prose by S. H. Butcher and Andrew Lang. Illustrated after drawings by W. Russell Flint, A.R.A. 25s. (Medici Society.)

This surely is the perfect gift-book Odyssey. It contains the entire Butcher-Lang translation, most attractively set out, and it has twenty illustrations by Russell Flint which admirably capture the Greek spirit. They have the design and that inevitable rightness of arrangement of a Greek frieze combined with the rich colouring which Leighton and Alma Tadema have associated with pictures of classic events. Whether it is the study in blue and green of Ulysses gazing over the sea, heedless of Calypso, or the study in yellow and brown of the Killing of the Wooers, the illustrations create for us immediately the varying moods of the great and greatly loved epic.

BESTWAY COOKERY GIFT-BOOK



4s. 6d. (London: Fleetway House.)

Inducements for experimenting in the culinary art are very considerably added to by the most attractive photographs, coloured and otherwise, which accompany every recipe in this desirable book. Sometimes it is the process of preparation that is reproduced, but more often than not it is the finished article, served up as attractively as one could wish, and that after all is no small part of the business.

From A History of the Vikings
By T. D. Kendrick
(Methuen).

MEMORIAL STONES ERECTED BY KING GORM AND KING HARALD GORMSSON AT JELLINGE, DENMARK.

From The Romance of Archæology
By W H Boulton
(Sampson Low)

POMPEII: IN THE CRYPT.
(Italian Travel Bureau)

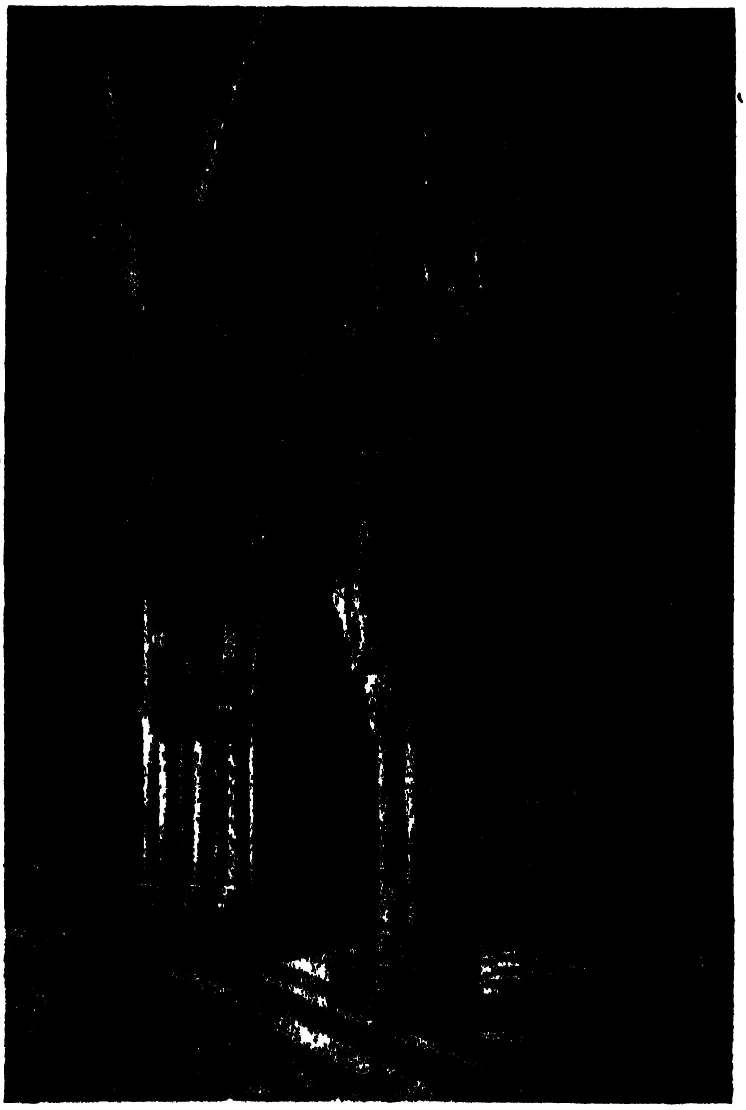
THE ROMANCE OF EXPLORATION

By G Gibbard Jackson Illustrated 6s (Sampson Low)

Gibbard Jackson has conveyed before now to youth the romance of the submarine and the modern world of inventions In the present characteristic book he journeys back to the great explorers, to Marco Polo, Cabot, Columbus, Vasco Da Gama, Magellan, Captain Cook, to Nansen, Peary and the Polar expeditions, to the discoverers of the Pacific, Madeira, the Amazon, Australia and the lakes and jungles of Africa We meet Mungo Park and Livingstone and Balboa and La Pérouse and Jacques Cartier We revisit Robinson Crusoe's island, tour the skies with the twentieth century Columbus, Francesco de Pinedo, and end with a flight in seaplane and aeroplane over Papua Mr Gibbard Jackson writes with ease and enthusiasm The very full illustrations and the attractive dust-jacket with its eighteenth century map complete a valuable and entertaining volume

PLAYS PICTORIAL

"As You Like It" By William Shakespeare Profusely illustrated in line and colour by John Austen 10s 6d (William Jackson)



"Everyman" With woodcuts by Thomas Derrick. 15s (Dent)

"Loyalties." By John Galsworthy With 8 plates by S van Abbe 8s 6d (Duckworth)

The John Austen "As You Like It" is a triumph—a worthy successor to the same firm's "Infernal Marriage" last year Here in the illustrations we have the delicate fairyland of Arden brought to life, with all the gossamer lightness of Shakespeare s summer dream, and far removed from the florid principal boy type of Rosalind to which we have become accustomed. The text used is that of the New Readers' Shakespeare, edited with modern stage directions by Dr. G. B Harrison, and these modern additions—which are really a commentary on the play—help to bring it to life At the end of the book the publishers have thoughtfully added a hand list of all the books illustrated by John Austen, which will be invaluable to collectors "As You Like It" is definitely a book to possess

A striking contrast to John Austen s delicate fancies are the bold, challenging woodcuts of Thomas Derrick s "Everyman," instinct with all the gloomy piety of this mediæval allegory. But there is humour in them too, and a very great strength It is impossible to divorce the illustrations from the text, for the book has been planned as a whole Page by page has been prepared by the artist, with the result that, as one turns the pages, one has the sense of witnessing the performance of the play It is a bold experiment and an eminently successful one

Galsworthy s "Loyalties," that modern, very English play of types, requires and is given altogether different treatment Here we have pictures, of photographic realism, of the principal characters, drawn with the object of portraying in line those people whom the author has drawn so vividly in prose Mr Van Abbe has done his work well and the illustrations are a commentary on and a complement to the play

From A History of Spanish Civilisation
By Rafael Altamira
(Constable)

THE GATE OF GLORY, SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA.
(Romanesque Sculpture.)

TO CIRCUMJACK CENCRASTUS

By Hugh M'Diarmid. 8s. 6d. (Blackwood.)

Mr. M'Diarmid seems to believe that the most commonplace opinions, if translated into the Scots vernacular, are automatically transformed into sparkling gems of satire. Much of the subject-matter of the satirical poems in this book is of the sort which appears in the correspondence columns of the Scottish evening papers over the signature of "Patriotic Scot," and is unredeemed by the verse, which lumbers and bumps along. On the other hand, the one or two poems written in English, such as "A Moment in Eternity," show genuine and original ability.

EGIL'S SAGA

Translated from the Icelandic by E. R. Eddison. 18s. (Cambridge University Press.)

The life story of Egil Skallagrimson is among the greatest of Icelandic sagas, and it seems one that persistently refuses to run into good English. Mr. Eddison falls badly between two schools—the archaism of William Morris and the colloquialism of other translators who aim at reproducing the "raciness" of the original Icelandic. The extraordinary things that Mr. Eddison does with the English language, his constant "gat" for "got," his "methinks" and "meseems," his substitutions such as that of "murther" for "murder," his inverted sentences such as "Bare they him then in the same hour," muddle an already involved story and give it anything but the speed it demands for lucidity; which is a pity, for Mr. Eddison's introduction and notes are good, and show what is so essential for a translator of the sagas, a knowledge of the districts in which they are set.

Those who know no Icelandic and wish to follow the doings of the great Egil in Norway, York, and Iceland will find Mr. Eddison's version better than no translation, but in ease and style (though not in accuracy) it is not a bit superior to that of the Rev. W. C. Green, which he abuses so roundly; and beside Dasent's "Burnt Njal" it is utterly dwarfed.

From Romantic Cheshire
By J. Cuming Walters
(Hodder & Stoughton).

CHESTER CATHEDRAL.

OLD WATERMILLS AND WINDMILLS

By R. Thurston Hopkins. 16s. (Philip Allan.)

In this book Mr. Thurston Hopkins has given us in most readable form the story of that race of giants now almost extinct—the windmills of England. The tale of the mills is, as he reminds us, the tale of civilisation, though those relying on the wind are unknown before the twelfth century and their origin is wrapped in mystery. But from that time until now the windmill has been an integral part of the typical English landscape and those who love it lament their decay.

Mr. Hopkins is like Mr. Kipling in that Sussex is in his heart the spot "beloved over all" and the Sussex windmills are for him the guardians of home. But he is fully alive to the beauties of other varieties (for every county has its subtle variations in building and design, and he describes them all with a zest arising from affection. The book is well illustrated with drawings and photographs.

SOME SUSSEX BYWAYS

By Viscountess Wolseley. With 8 plates in colour by Garnet Wolseley. 15s. (Medici Society.)

Book illustration is a battle ground, a no-man's land raked by alternate fires from the artist and the writer, claimed by both, sometimes nearly conquered by one but only to be half recaptured by the other. In "Some Sussex Byways" Lady Wolseley and Garnet Wolseley are the protagonists in a super-guide book to the charms of Sussex. For those who travel by rote there could be no more fascinating fashion to follow hearsay than by putting oneself into the capable and appreciative hands of the joint authors in a leisurely ramble to those places, many of which have hitherto only lightly been touched upon by other writers. Here historical and archæological points of interest mingle with the romance and architecture of old houses, while a more modern note is struck in the description of an ancient road recently discovered by air photography.

ON THE MINOR PROPHECIES OF WILLIAM BLAKE

By Emily S. Hamblen. 15s. (Dent.)

To most of us Blake is no more than the great pre-Romantic poet, the poet of "Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience" who saw the angels of God perched as birds in a tree. Blake the prophet we leave out. We look perhaps at his prophetic books, turn over the pages and admire the beauty of his designs, but frightened by the dark symbolism, we leave the long sketches of prophecy unexplored. To explore them certainly needs faith and determination and training. Miss Hamblen is one of an increasing band who has all three, and in this huge book, conceived and meditated on a lonely New Jersey farm, she has sought for the central plan to his mysticism and his cosmic poems. Finding it to her satisfaction, she analyses the lesser prophetic books, Tiriel, Thel, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, the Book of Ahania, the Book of Los, and particularly the Book of Urizen. If her studies seem esoteric on first reading, and on second, there is no denying her originality and consistency, her plausibility in emphasising the importance of Blake the seer, or her insight into such strictly biographical matters as Blake's relations with his wife.

FIGHTING FITZGERALD AND OTHER PAPERS

By Mary MacCarthy.
10s. 6d.
(Martin Secker.)

"The elegant and gentlemanly appearance of this man, as contrasted with the savage treachery of his actions, was extremely curious and without parallel of which I am aware," so wrote Mr. Dick Martin, "King of Connemara" or later "Humanity Martin," of George Robert Fitzgerald, and it was while writing about Martin, Miss MacCarthy tells us in her preface that her curiosity was aroused by the singular figure of "Fighting Fitzgerald." He was the eldest son of Mr. George Fitzgerald of Turlough and of Lady Mary Hervey, daughter of George II's Vice-Chamberlain and sister of the Earl Bishop of Bristol. "Brought up to belong to the best that the day could give him in the way of civilised worldly society in London and Dublin," he was eventually hanged together with two servants and a Methodist ex-lawyer hanger-on for the murder of his neighbour under circumstances of such fantastic brutality that he must by then have lost the little reason he had ever possessed. He lacks even that "charm" with which modern writers seem to be able to gild almost everyone of that "charming" period. Miss MacCarthy's outburst on his execution is surprising. "How outrageous does it seem that in the midst of his anguish on the scaffold, he had actually to call for a better rope with which to hang himself! How thankful we may be that such scenes are impossible at the present day. Let us hope that the rope as an instrument of execution will soon be abolished altogether." This pious hope and a habit of beginning her sketches with forced epigrams—"George Robert Fitzgerald was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, but he soon melted it down"—are blots on a style which is otherwise surprisingly free from any affectation.

The other papers are sketches of Mr. Dick Martin, the Earl-Bishop and John Lord Hervey, and are introductions to the longer studies a bibliography of which is given in an appendix.

From Pattern: A Study of Ornament in Western Europe. From 1180 to 1900
By Joan Evans
(Oxford University Press).

STAIRCASE TO ORGAN LOFT, ST. MACLOU, ROUEN.
(By Pierre Gringoire.)

TALLY HO

By Moyra Charlton.
Illustrated by Lionel Edwards.
5s.
(Putnams.)

What are young people coming to! Here is a book written by a little girl when she was eleven years old, with only a dictionary to help her! It is the story of a horse, from the time of its birth out on the grey moors until it becomes an old broken-winded hunter and returns to its native heath, to end its days as leader of a wild herd. Miss Charlton knows all about horses, writes of them with sympathy and imagination, and you really feel they would talk as she makes them talk if they could use human speech. The book has an introduction by Lord Lonsdale and several exquisite illustrations by Mr. Lionel Edwards.

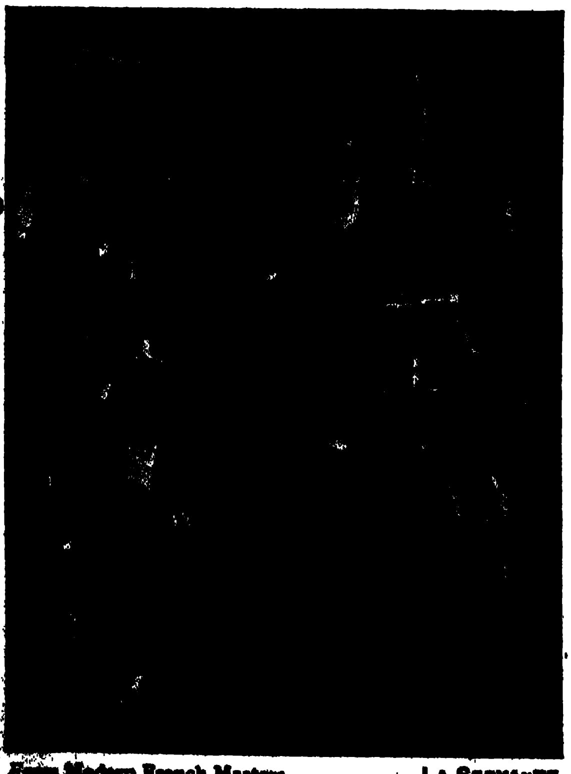
AN OUTLINE HISTORY OF PAINTING IN EUROPE TO THE END OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

By S. C. Kaines Smith.
21s. (Medici Society.)

This is an amazing book. Mr. Kaines Smith, now the Keeper of the Birmingham Art Gallery, has contrived to write a book, critical and informative, surveying the whole history of painting in Europe. Necessarily it is what its title indicates, an "outline" but that does not mean that it is a barren wilderness of dates and names. It is first and foremost a story told by an expert. Each of its eight chapters is devoted to one of the great schools of painting, and of the 149 illustrations twenty-four are reproduced by that colour-process for which the Medici Society has become deservedly famous.

THE WANDERER

By John Masefield. 8s. 6d.
(Heinemann.)



In his new book Mr. Masefield has returned to sea. He has told in prose and verse the story of The Wanderer, Messrs. Potter's four-masted barque—the unchallenged monarch of the many fine sailing vessels launched at Liverpool during the final ten years of last century—from her setting-forth in 1891 till her end in 1907. The book is illustrated by photographs collected from all quarters of the globe, and the material in it has been supplied from many sources. As Mr. Masefield writes:

From The Red Lily
By Anatole France
(John Lane).

SHE INSISTED ON TAKING SOME OF THE FRIED POTATOES.

> "She has been called an unlucky ship. The disaster of her first setting forth caused many legends of her unluckiness to go about the world. I myself, writing on the strength of these legends, may have helped to give her this name. I have now made this story of her so that the facts may be known, as far as I can learn them from imperfect records, the memories of men scattered all over the world, and notes in old newspapers."

From Modern French Masters
By Edwin Fagg
(Methuen).

LA SERVANTE DE BOCKS.
(Manet—Tate Gallery.)

In the "Philip the King" volume, Mr. Masefield celebrated the ship's beauty:

> "Tense, like a supple athlete with lean hips,
> Swiftness at pause, the Wanderer come again—
> Come as of old a queen, untouched by Time,
> Resting the beauty that no seas could tire,
> Sparkling, as though the midnight's rain were rime,
> Like a man's thought transfigured into fire."

And here again he writes of her, after her wreck which left her "in the quicksand full fathom five down."

> "Herself is not there, being Beauty Eternal, alive,
> She wanders the waters of thought, past disasters, past hates,
> Past the world's disapproval, across the black seas of despair,
> And on, beyond anguish to havens of peace whence she brings > Hope, Mercy and Courage, all gentle and beautiful things."

Beauty of course is a word which has a certain vagueness about it, and for those who desire a more exact cataloguing of The Wanderer's beauty, Mr. Masefield is considerate. He tells us (in the prose part of the narrative) that "she was of a full model, well-sided, rather hard in the bilge and with a flat floor, though she grew somewhat sweeter aft. . . . She was clincher built, with steel frames, beams and shell plating. The butts of her side-plating were fitted on the outside of her hull." And a great deal more too.

From The Red Lily
By Anatole France
(John Lane)

THE FLORENTINE TOLD THEM THE TIME-HONOURED TALES OF OLD ITALIAN STORY-TELLERS

CHRISTMAS CARDS, CALENDARS, ETC.

Raphael Tuck provide this Christmas their usual excellent collection of cards and calendars First and foremost of course are the Royal Christmas Cards—those of Their Majesties the King and Queen, the Prince of Wales, Princess Mary and the Duke and Duchess of York Then come those many novelties for which the firm is famous—"Milady's Handkerchief," which has a small coloured handkerchief attached to but easily detachable from the card; the "Pot-Pourri," which has some real potpourri concealed in it; the "Gramophone Record," which is a post card with a small record (which plays quite well) on it; the "Colorcraft" reproductions, which are made by a special process, and the "Butterfly Wing" with their striking colourings. Of calendars the usual variety is issued, most of them, like the cards, have a touch of ingenuity about them—the "Silver Mirror Calendars" and the tear-off calendars with quotation are especially popular

From Venice and Its Story
By Thomas Okey
(Dent).

ACCADEMIA—THE RICH MAN'S FEAST.
(By Bonifazio)

A LEAF IN THE WIND

By Patrick MacDonogh 2s 6d (Quota Press)

Perhaps Mr MacDonogh's poems make their chief appeal through their spontaneity, they are, for these days, astonishingly free from affectation, and because of this they touch the emotions in the strange intimate way poetry should You would not imagine reading them, that the author is a well known athlete, for that side of his character finds little place in such exquisite lines as

> Now earth is lonely for the feet
> Of beauty that walks no more at will
> The ploughs have been across our world
> Our dreams are with the daffodil

And most of the poems express a wistful groping after beauty, with the inevitable strain of Celtic sadness running through them Revealing more than promise, Mr MacDonogh's work should command the attention of all lovers of poetry. He has done his own very effective jacket design.

OLD SEA WINGS, WAYS AND WORDS

By R C Leslie 18s (Chapman & Hall)

This book, first published in 1890, has come to be regarded almost as a classic in the realm of nautical literature The author describes the evolution of the sailing ship from its early beginnings to the time when the "old sea wings" were being driven off the ocean by steam It is not only a history of ships, but of the manners, customs, laws and language of the men who built, navigated and piloted them It is profusely illustrated with delightful drawings by the author, and should make an ideal Christmas present for both young boys and old ones

From Ornamentation and Textile Design
By Professor Aldred F. Barker
(Methuen).

DRESS IN STONE-AGE PERIOD.
(4000 to 10,000 B.C.)

IN THE HEART OF THE NORTHERN FORESTS

By A. Radclyffe Dugmore. 21s. (Chatto & Windus.)

Mr. Radclyffe Dugmore needs no introduction to amateurs of natural history. Here, going back on old trails, he tells of his many observations and adventures while tracking wild life on the North American continent. He is too much a lover of animals to shoot them with anything but a camera, and so it is natural that he should concentrate on that side of animal life which is nearest to the human—the marvels of beaver engineering, the tragedy of the disappearing caribou in Newfoundland, and the habits of porcupine and opossum. Many of the smaller wild animals of Canada—chipmunk and rock rabbit are the most attractive—are given a place, and all are described with the simple directness which comes only from complete mastery. There are some sixty excellent plates, of which those showing the opossum "playing 'possum" may be especially commended.

SUNDIAL SAYINGS.

By the Rev. John C. Hill. 3s. 6d. (Allenson.)

It was an excellent idea to gather together the sayings which appear on various sundials up and down the country. Mr. Hill, in doing this, has cast his net wide, even throwing it as far as New York. How pithy and how wise these sayings are, and how wonderfully they lend themselves as texts for Mr. Hill's most inspiring little talks. Teachers and workers amongst children will find them most helpful and suggestive for further expansion.

THE GOLDEN ARROW.

By Mary Webb. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)

The third of Mary Webb's books to be illustrated, "The Golden Arrow," has just come to hand, replete with an introduction by G. K. Chesterton and many delightful illustrations by Norman Hepple. The latter may readily be appraised by the specimen which appears as one of our coloured insets elsewhere in the Number. Of the book itself we need hardly say anything here; it has, like the remainder of the all too few legacies of Mary Webb, long rooted itself in our affections.

From Art and Artists
By W. E. Sparkes
(Nelson).

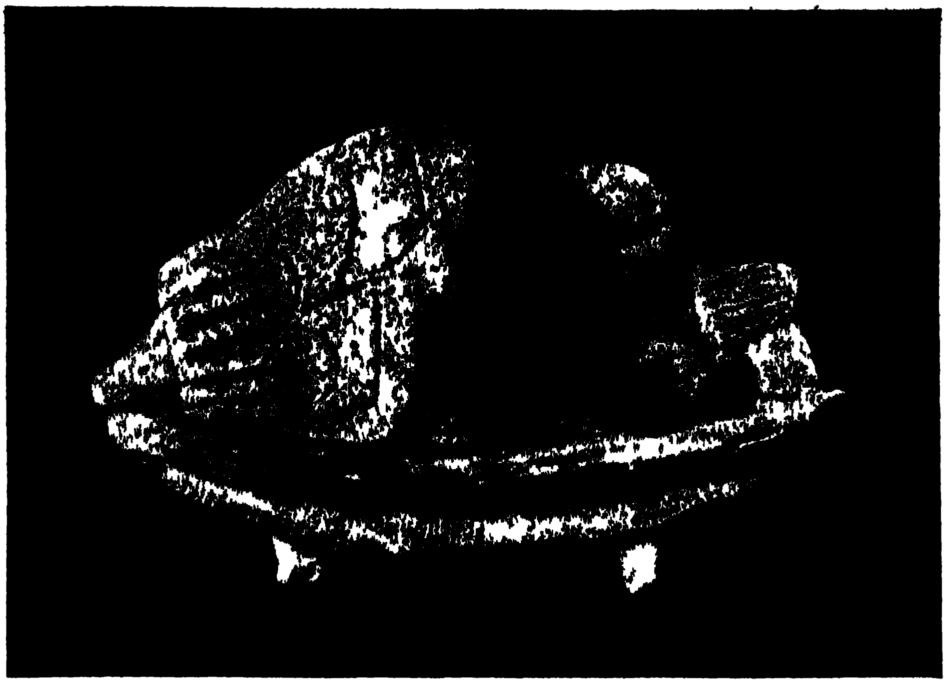
A DAIRY SCENE. THE FIGURES ARE CUT IN SHELL.
(From an ancient Chaldean temple, 3500–3000 B.C.)
(British Museum.)

CAREERS FOR WOMEN

By Leonora Eyles 5s
(Elkin Mathews & Marrot)

If people pick up this book, glance at the title, then fling it down in disgust saying "Another of these Feminist outpourings!" it will be a pity, for they will miss a wise and witty, as well as an exceedingly useful work



No one can accuse Leonora Eyles of not feeling strongly on the subject of the treatment of women workers It is to her credit that she avoids both sloppiness and unfairness The fact that she knows of conditions of "almost incredible slavery" under which some servants work, does not prevent her from knowing, also, that many domestic workers are incompetent Her indignation at the difficulties placed in the way of women by male workers, does not prevent her from commenting severely upon young women ' who cold-bloodedly married in order to be kept in idleness and are seeing to it that they did not marry in vain!"

Idleness to her is the one unforgivable sin, the great crime against the community Very few human beings can stand leisure something atrophies and they become degenerate '

Here is conveniently arranged information as to the main careers open to women, places where training may be obtained, cost of training, chance of posts, and amount of salaries together with a mass of good advice on human problems In addition there are two valuable introductory chapters on ' Women s Opportunities" and ' The Psychological Factor."

The ideal of Leonora Eyles is suitable work, efficiently done, by highly trained and skilled women, including those who have decided that looking after their own children is as much a career as looking after those of other people

A practical idealist, who preserves a sense of humour, and who combines varied experience with native shrewdness is worth a hearing, and those who are alive to the immense importance of women s new citizenship need not grudge five shillings for this little book

From Ornamentation and Textile Design
By Professor Aldred F Barker
(Methuen)

DRESS IN STONE-AGE PERIOD.
(4000 to 10 000 B C)

LET'S SEE THE LOWLANDS

By A A Thomson
Illustrated.
7s 6d net
(Herbert Jenkins)

We have nothing but praise for this charming discursion It is long since such a book came into our hands When a Scot and an unwilling Saxon embark on a tour of the Scotsman s native places one anticipates a lively adventure and such indeed was the adventure recorded in these pages Mr Thomson s method of linking up the geography of a place with its historical and literary associations is quite unique We are given many biographies in little, famous Scottish characters—tinkers, tailors soldiers sailors—are recalled and the setting of their excursions and alarms their romances and usually tragic endings fascinatingly represented We can suggest two uses for this book One, a reliable guide book that will not weary flesh or spirit, and the other—perhaps its highest recommendation a fascinating glimpse into the Robbie Burns country, the circumstances that nurtured, tortured, fulfilled and ultimately killed him One further thought What a couple of grand laddies Mr Thomson and his friend must be

From Modern Architectural Sculpture
By W Aumonier
(Architectural Press)

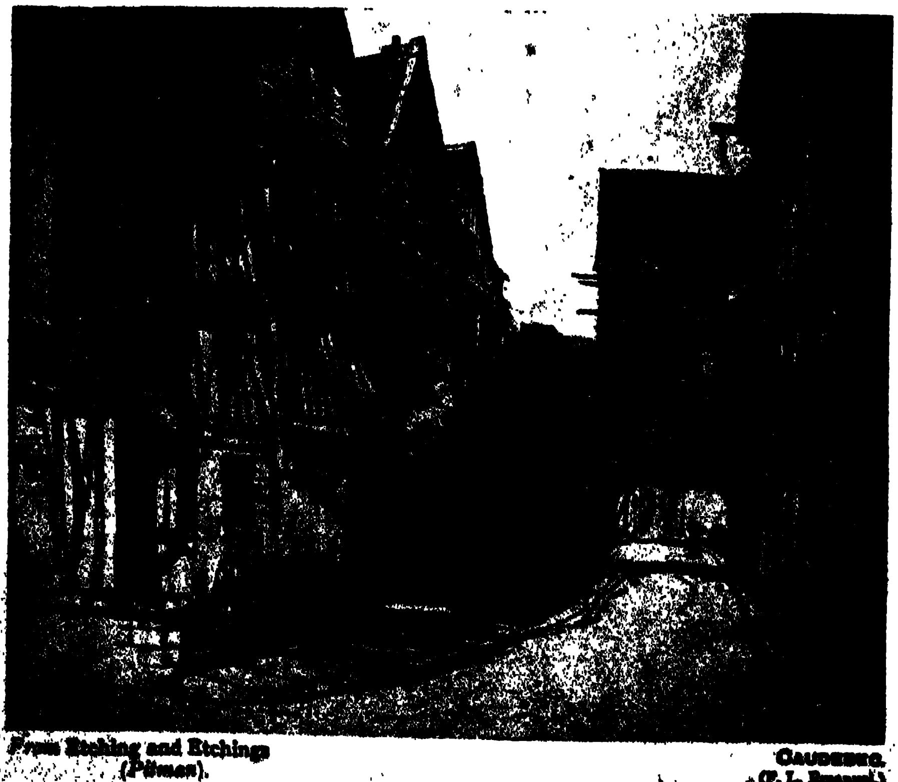
A PANEL IN THE CORRIDOR OF THE FREDERIKSBORG COURT HOUSE, COPENHAGEN.
(Sculptor Aage Edwin, Denmark.)

KATINKA

By Irene Forbes-Mosse. Translated from the German by Oakley Williams. 7s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

This story is charmingly told and unusually well translated. The theme is almost as fantastic as "Lady Into Fox," but it has more general human interest. Do you like cats, and rejoice in their grace and agility and their superb detachment? If so, you will like Katinka and Kitty, and sympathise with their sorrows and overlook their shortcomings.

It is a pathetic little history, but the writer has humour and insight as well as tenderness; and even those readers for whom cats are mere mouse-catchers or disturbers of slumber will find much entertainment.



From London Lanes
By Alan Stapleton
(John Lane).

COOK LANE.

BRITISH RAILWAYS: THE ROMANCE OF THEIR ACHIEVEMENT

By G. Gibbard Jackson. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

Though most youngsters would revel in it, this is not primarily a boy's book. It is an authoritative account of the development of British railways from the earliest times until the present day. Mr. Jackson reminds us that for the true origin of the railway we must go back to the granite setts which the Romans used for their chariot ways. He deals at length with the early history of the railway proper, and follows the record of many of the hundred odd British companies which were grouped in 1923 into four powerful trunk systems. Looking to the future, Mr. Jackson is less optimistic than many railway economists, and sees the only hope in nationalisation and complete electrification. There are interesting chapters on railway organisation and working, and no less than seven devoted to the story of the locomotive. The illustrations are numerous and excellent.

From Etching and Etchings (Pitman).

CAUDEBEC.
(F. L. Emanuel)

ENCHANTMENTS OF THE FIELDS

By H. A. Bryden. 15s. net. (Seeley, Service.)

These enchantments are for Mr. Bryden inseparably united with fox hunting, trout fishing, shooting and falconry at home, and with big game shooting abroad. It will surprise many British sportsmen to learn that until Somerville published his fine poem, "The Chace," in 1735, and Beckford printed his "Thoughts on Hunting" in 1781, all the honour and credit of the best treatises concerning hunting lay with the French. The author, who reveals a fine taste in books and pictures, has a specially fascinating chapter on "Old Sporting Prints."

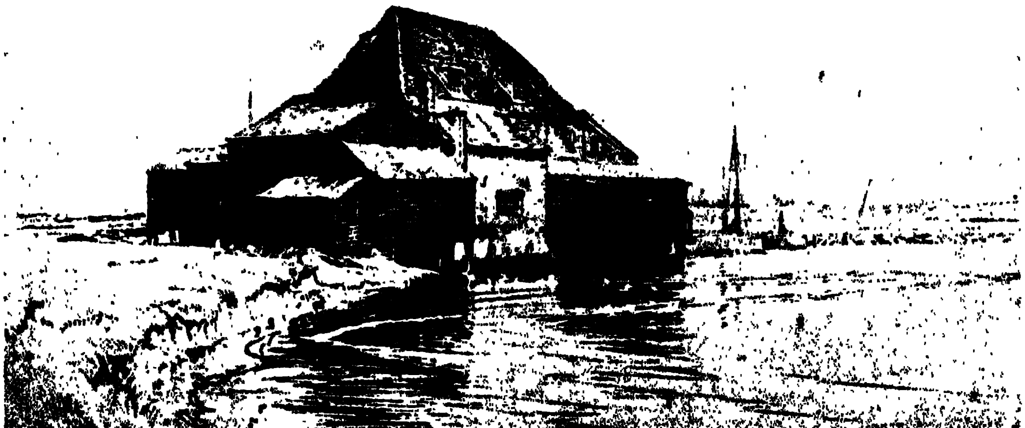
From London Lanes By Alan Stapleton (John Lane). LEATHER LANE air of aloofness and impersonality which adds enormously to their effectiveness.

MOBY DICK

By Herman Melville. Illustrated by Rockwell Kent. 15s. (Cassell.)

This very handsome edition of "Moby Dick" is lavishly illustrated with reproductions of Mr. Rockwell Kent's drawings which appeared in the three-volume limited edition printed in America. Mr. Kent's bold work is eminently suited to the story; his drawings are vivid and full of character, and every third or fourth page is enlivened with a vigorous black-and-white woodcut effect. A beautiful gift-book this, and one that will be treasured by all who can appreciate a truly artistic production.

SOUL'S DARK COTTAGE



By Richard King. 6s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. King has won an audience by his previous essays, so his new book is sure of a welcome. He writes once more of the thoughts and yearnings which rise in the minds of men when they stand apart from the common round, and think seriously of the world and of life. "Quarrelling," "Contrasts," "Parental Rights," are a few of his many themes. If Mr. King does not go very deep, he at any rate expresses for us, and not always without a hint of solution, some of the wistful wonders which often visit us in our more thoughtful hours. It is a real service.

PLATO'S BRITANNIA

By Douglas Woodruff. 6s. (Sheed & Ward.)

This book has the air of having been begun as a jest and finished as a serious treatise. The first part is good fun but no more. To satirise subjects such as London traffic, clubs, Olympia, and bargain sales in the manner of Plato—or rather, of Jowitt's translation of Plato—is too easy to be interesting. But the book soon develops into an extremely penetrating criticism of English life and politics, with the Platonic manner used less in the spirit of parody than as a method of giving the opinions expressed an

From Etching and Etchings (Pitman). TIDE MILL, WALTON-ON-THE-NAZE. (F. L. Emanuel.)

THE DUCHESS OF MALFI and THE WHITE DEVIL

By John Webster
Illustrated by Henry Keen 21s
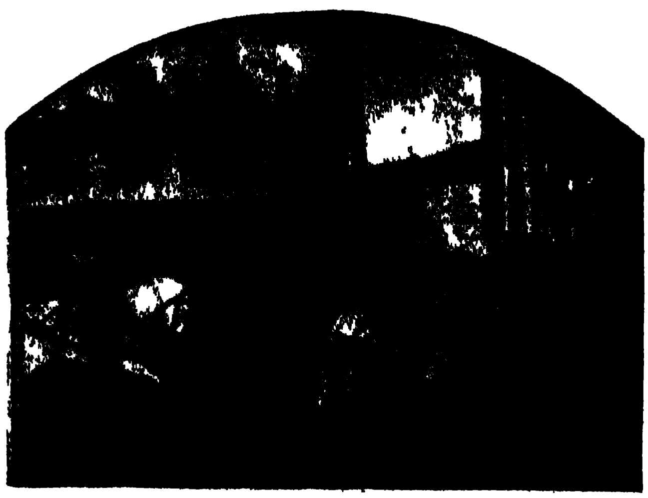
(Bodley Head)

Here of course the illustrations are the thing—the plays most of us prefer in a somewhat smaller format—and they have caught the macabre spirit of Webster admirably Mr Keen by the very restraint of his interpretation has heightened the horror the mad Ferdinand, the dying Brachiave, the murder of Antonio and the Duchess gazing wildly at the dead man s hand in her lap here are horrors treated as Webster himself treated them, as a matter of course Those who already love the great Elizabethan will welcome this illustrated tribute to the memory of genius Those whose acquaintance with him consists of ' Cover her face, mine eyes dazzle she died young may be induced by Mr Keen to go further into the text

From The Duchess of Malfi and the White Devil (John Lane)

"I AM BOSOLA, YOUR FRIEND."

AS THE HEART SEES



By May Belben
2s (Mate)

If you are looking for something rather special to send to a friend this Christmas, something more intimate than a Christmas card, yet small and dainty with an appeal of its own, Mrs. Belben s little book of essays will supply that need Her essays are short, almost in the nature of prose poems, and are beautifully illustrated with photographs she has taken herself She touches upon various subjects— Miracles, Praise, the Vices of Virtue, the Seeing Eye, the Really Happiest People—and always has something thoughtful and interesting to say. Furthermore she possesses the precious gift of brevity These small books of hers are unusual and very charming

MARY BAKER EDDY

By Lyman P Powell
20s net. (Nisbet)

Very flattering is this ' Life Size Portrait ' Mr Powell admires even the faults of his subject He has however made a fascinating volume out of the High Priestess of Christian Science, the founder of the Mother Church, the establisher of the Christian Science Monitor. When Mary Baker as a tiny child used to be asked, Mary, what are you going to be when you grow up ? she invariably replied, I will write a book " A very delicate woman for one half of her life, she came under the ministering care of Dr Phineas P Quimby, who was largely a faith healer Later she shook off his influence and took her own course which led to final triumph This biography covers her life from infancy, her three marriages and the people of importance who came under her hands

From An Informal Introduction to the Middle Ages
By G G Coulton
(Cambridge University Press).

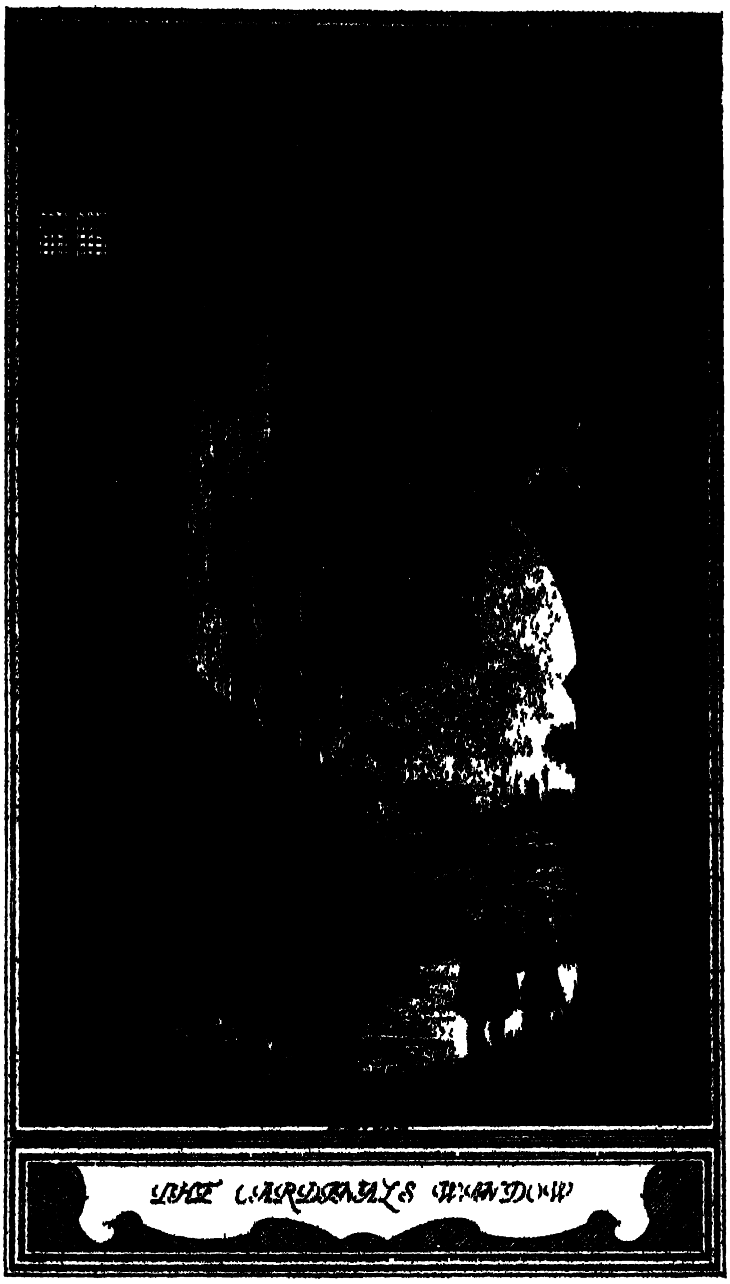
A FIFTEENTH CENTURY STREET SCENE.

JERRY

The Story of an Exmoor Pony

By Eleanour Helme and Nance Paul Illustrated by Cecil Aldin 8s 6d (Eyre & Spottiswoode)



Jerry was a little wild Exmoor pony Robin caught sight of him when he was down on Exmoor with his mother and father and small sisters enjoying a summer holiday, and his father bought the little ragged pony for him Three years later, when they came to live in the district altogether, he and his father broke the pony in and Jerry learned to ride him They became great companions, and the adventures they had together are told in this charming book Robin's stag hunt at the end, when he sees the stag and will not betray it to the hunters, is particularly well done.

I HEARD THE BELLS ON CHRISTMAS DAY IT WAS THE WINTER WILD

And Other Christmas Verse

(Mowbray)

These are two booklets, handy to slip into a pocket, handy to send as a "special" Christmas card They contain a particularly good selection of verses, well known and less well known, ranging from John Clare to Longfellow, from Shakespeare to Tennyson, and including poems by Herrick, Christina Rossetti, Whittier, Phillips, Brooks, Southey, Ben Jonson, Crashaw, Wesley—and some "traditional" The covers of the slim blue volumes are decorated by a reproduction of an Old Master and half a dozen reproductions are included between the pages The little books should meet with a ready welcome

From The Duchess of Malfi and the White Devil (John Lane)

THE CARDINAL'S WINDOW.

LIGHTER LONDON

Verses by Hubert Steel Drawings by Herry Perry 6s (Delgado)

Here's an amusing book that Londoners in particular will enjoy The history and characteristics of many of its streets and 'sights" are satirised in light verse, and the happy-go-lucky rollicking spirit of the verses is reflected in the illustrations Lord's the Albert Hall, the Mint Fleet Street, the Strand, the Harrow Road, Cowcross Street are but a few of the places honoured Chelsea is dealt with thus .

> "Do you lament the passing of that type,
> With dirty blouse, unshaven chin, big pipe ?
> 'Tis better thus—they languish void of hope
> Who make of art a substitute for soap '

Author and artist work in happy harmony

From It Was the Winter Wild (Mowbray)

OLD CHRISTMAS IS COME FOR TO KEEP OPEN HOUSE. (Jordaens.)

THE YOMAH—AND AFTER

By "Shalimar" (F C Hendry) 7s 6d net. (Blackwood)

"Shalimar" has found some repute among the readers of Blackwood's Magazine with his short sea stories In this full-length novel the details of sailing and seamanship are well handled, but the author fails somewhat when it comes to character portrayal He is distinctly better at sea than on terra firma On the whole however it is a readable adventure yarn It is the story of Captain John Hume's arrogant supremacy, humiliating disaster and resurrection on a new basis An old theme but still with some interest

THE GONE AWAY

By Dorothy Una Ratcliffe 10s 6d (Bodley Head)

Mrs Ratcliffe, whose poems and plays of Yorkshire folk and country are already known, has now written 'A Romance of the Dales In Three Acts" There is a "setting" to the play An old nurse who is steeped in the tales of the country-side knits and tells them to the child who sits, learning to knit also, at her side So is told the romance of "The Gone Away" But the play stands clearly by itself, and is so carefully provided with stage directions that it might well be acted The characters are live and natural and diverse, and the dialogue is crisp and easy Songs are introduced, and the calls of the hunting horn are heard now and again The illustrations, by Charles Simpson, are strong in line and beautiful in composition, and they add distinction to an already charming book.

From Hunters' Moon and Other Verses
By Captain Edric G. Roberts
(Constable).

GATES.

"Hounds are running below in the vale,
See them go, where the grass-lands prevail,
Twenty couple together as one;
Just a handkerchief, fluttered in fun,
Would cover them now."

"TINKER, TAILOR——"

By "Greenhorn." 8s. 6d.
(Bodley Head.)

In this account of a journey round the world, following a reckless wager with a friend in London, the anonymous author, who produces self photographs in plenty, describes a dynamic five years' existence in American lumber camps, mines, sailing ships and tramps, as a Canadian Mounty, an Australian sheep farmer and, finally, how he worked his passage to South Africa as a plate boy in a third-class liner. "Greenhorn" writes with spirit and good temper and certainly with broad reality—his descriptions of a fight in a lumber camp and the killing of the shark giving a dramatic atmosphere to a tremendously vital narrative. With the introduction of the romantic element, bound round Elaine, the reader becomes rather disillusioned. The episode is neither convincing nor necessary, and introduces the kinema mentality into a hundred per cent. exultation of mad living, with the lust of adventure and the determination to "see it through" driving him on.

HUNTER'S MOON AND OTHER VERSES

By Captain Edric G. Roberts. Cloth, 14s. Leather, 21s.
(Constable.)

A gift-book that will appeal to all who indulge in hunting is this book of lively verse by Captain Edric G. Roberts, illustrated with eight beautiful colour plates by Mr. Gilbert Halliday. The verses are written in the sporting spirit, rollicking and vivacious, many of them being quite short lyrics, such as "Hounds are Running":

"Hounds are running up over the hill,
See them go, by the derelict mill,
Altogether, and hunting a treat;
Not a doubt the proverbial sheet
Would cover them now.

From The Pegasus Book
Edited by Major W. E. Lyon
(Constable).

BLACKER AND HERBERT.

most people give—

HUTCHINSON

Books and Novels for Xmas gifts

TURNING POINTS IN HISTORY (7th Impression)
by the late Lord BIRKENHEAD
"Amazing achievement . . . vivid and remarkable book."—S. Times. Illus. in 2 colours. 21s.

MATA HARI (3rd Impression)
by Major THOMAS COULSON
"One of the most romantic if not disreputable figures of war-time history."—Star. Illus. 12s. 6d.

BRAN MASH
Foreword by Lord TENNYSON
by Capt. F. VICTOR HUGHES-HALLETT
Stage, Sport and Service Reminiscences. Illus. 21s.

LETTERS OF PRINCE VON BÜLOW
by FREDERICK WHYTE
"Will be read with pity and terror by all who are interested in the origin of the War."—Dly. Express. Illus. 24s.

STARK INDIA
by TREVOR PINCH
"You will read to the end, fascinated."—W. L. Andrews. Illus. 10s. 6d.

ROMANCE OF THE BRITISH VOLUNTARY HOSPITAL MOVEMENT
by L. G. REDMOND HOWARD and Dr. DELBERT EVANS
Lord Knutsford: "It will be standard work to all time." Illus. 18s.

THE GREAT WAR IN WEST AFRICA
by Brig.-Gen. EDMUND HOWARD GORGES, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O., F.R.G.S.
"I have been profoundly interested."—M. Dly. Dispatch. Illus. 21s.

HAUNTING YEARS (2nd Impression)
by W. L. ANDREWS
"A book I shall keep."—Dly. Express. 7s. 6d.

BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON
by ANONYMOUS
"Extremely readable."—Observer. 21s.

The Romance of the DERBY STAKES
by ALAN MACEY
A complete history of the great race. Illus. 10s. 6d.

COMPLETE WRITING FOR PROFIT
by MICHAEL JOSEPH
"Provides everything but genius."—Listener. Omnibus vol. 10s. 6d.

"SCOTLAND YET!"
by H. DRUMMOND GAULD, F.S.A. (Scot.)
"Wholly honest and faithful portrayal."—Leeds Mercury. 7s. 6d.

WOMAN UNDER FIRE
Six Months in the Red Army
"Incredible and revolting."—Mng. Post. 12s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF GEORGE VILLIERS
by Sir PHILIP GIBBS
"Spiritedly written."—Scotsman. Illus. 12s. 6d.

DOMINANT WOMEN
by PHILIP W. SERGEANT Illus. 18s.

FROM ARCHDUKE TO GROCER
by ex-Archduke LEOPOLD of AUSTRIA Illus. 21s.

FORTY YEARS AT THE BAR (2nd Impression)
by EDWARD ABINGER
"One of the best volumes of legal reminiscences we have read for a long time."—M. Post. Illus. 18s.

THE PIRATE WIND
by OWEN RUTTER, F.R.G.S.
"Full of Far Eastern colour and adventure."—Scotsman. "A thrill to almost every page."—Public Opn. Illus. 12s. 6d.

A MIXED GRILL
by the author of "A Garden of Peace," etc.
"A very cheery book."—S. Times. "Mostly of literary-theatrical London in the last century."—Evg. Standard. Illus. 21s.

THE ANNALS OF COVENT GARDEN and its Neighbourhood
by E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR
"Extremely interesting volume."—Public Opn. Illus. 18s.

AS I KNEW THEM
by ELLA HEPWORTH DIXON
"Crammed with entertaining reminiscences of celebrities."—S. Dispatch. Illus. 21s.

Lord HENRY BENTINCK'S FOX-HOUNDS
by Lord CHARLES BENTINCK
"A really authoritative work full of bed-rock common sense, such historic authenticity."—Field. Illus. 21s.

THE YARN OF A YEOMAN
by S. F. HATTON
Introduction by Field-Marshal Viscount ALLENBY
"A splendid story. . . ."—Evg. News. 10s. 6d.

CANNON FODDER
by A. D. HASLAM
"Here is life at the front from a new angle."—Yorks. Obs. 7s. 6d.

BRIAND: Man of Peace
by VALENTINE THOMSON
"Less a biography than an evocation of the living man." Illus. 18s.

MAYERLING: The Love and Tragedy of a Crown Prince
by CLAUDE ANET
"Always interesting."—Scotsman. Illus. 10s. 6d.

DRAMAS OF FRENCH CRIME
The exploits of RENÉ CASSELARI
"Exciting reading."—Mng. Post. Illus. 18s.

SO THIS WAS WAR!
by BOMBARDIER "X"
"Invaluable as a human document."—Sunday Sun. Illus. 7s. 6d.

MUD AND KHAKI
by H. S. CLAPHAM
"This is the real thing."—Aberdeen Press. 7s. 6d.

TURNPIKES AND TOLL-BARS
by MARK SEARLE
Special Introduction by Lord BIRKENHEAD. 2 vols. £3 3s. the set

THE GRIM BASTILLE
by F. R. KIRCHEISEN Illus. 10s. 6d.

THE CALAS CASE
by MARC CHASSAIGNE
Preface by HILAIRE BELLOC Illus. 18s.

"I WAS AN ACTOR ONCE" (2nd Impression)
by ROBERT COURTNEIDGE
"The expression of a strong, wise, kindly, audacious and upright individuality."—Arnold Bennett. Illus. 12s. 6d.

THE SILENCE OF SARRAIL
by PAUL COBLENTZ
The sole authorised life of General SARRAIL.
"Some very surprising disclosures."—D. Mail. "A remarkable picture."—D. Mirror. 18s.

OUT OF THE BEATEN TRACK
by Major COURT TREATT, F.R.G.S.
"His book is first rate for exciting thrill . . . native folk-lore . . . wild life, and for a story of courage."—Spectator. Illus. 18s.

THE LIFE OF CHRISTINA ROSSETTI
by MARY F. SANDARS
"Mrs. Sandars has told with sympathy a fascinating story."—News Chron. Illus. 18s.

MY 60 YEARS OF THE TURF
by CHARLES MORTON
"The greatest book of its kind ever published."—Jockey. Illus. 18s.

AMONG PRISONERS OF WAR IN RUSSIA AND SIBERIA
by ELSA BRANDSTROM
"Deeply impressive record."—Scotsman. Illus. 18s.

SERVICE TRIALS AND TRAGEDIES
by Lt.-Col. F. E. WHITTON, C.M.G.
"An admirable book."—Dly. News. Illus. 18s.

MONS, ANZAC AND KUT
by Hon. AUBREY HERBERT
"A masterpiece of its kind."—Augustine Birrell. 7s. 6d.

The Diary and Correspondence of HENRY WELLESLEY (1st Lord Cowley)
Edited by his grandson Colonel the Hon. F. A. WELLESLEY Illus. 21s.

THE RAVEN
A Biography of SAM HOUSTON
by MARQUIS JAMES
One of America's most amazing figures. Illus. 18s.

The Life of Sir William QUILLER-ORCHARDSON, R.A.
by HILDA ORCHARDSON GRAY
Illus. in 2 colours. 21s.

THE TEST OF SCARLET
by CONINGSBY DAWSON
"A finely written story."—Star. 7s. 6d.

VAGABONDING AT 50
by H. C. WILSON & E. R. MITCHELL
"A valuable addition to travel literature."—S. Times. Illus. 18s.

MY MARRIED LIFE WITH LUDENDORFF
by MARGARETHE LUDENDORFF Illus. 18s.

WOMEN-AT-ARMS
by REGINALD HARGREAVES 12s. 6d.

HORACE WALPOLE (1717-1797)
by LEWIS MELVILLE Illus. 18s.

* Send for free list No. 25 of important new books and novels to HUTCHINSON & CO. (Publishers) Ltd., Paternoster Row, London

THE STORY OF TOBIT.

Adapted from the Apocrypha by Doris Pailthorpe, Zoe Proctor and Dorothea Rock. Illustrations by Doris Pailthorpe. 2s. 6d. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

This quaint mediæval play requires a reader and several mummers to tell the story of Sara, whose lovers died as soon

From The Story of Tobit
Adapted by Doris Pailthorpe, Zoë Proctor and Dorothea Rock
(Sidgwick & Jackson).
A HEAD-PIECE.

as she wed them, and of the lover, Tobias, son of Tobit, who broke the curse. It has already been produced at the Guildhouse, Eccleston Square, with Miss Maude Royden as reader, and on subsequent occasions, and those who are on the look-out for something fresh would do well to secure a copy.

From The Sea and The Jungle
By H. M. Tomlinson
(Duckworth).
SOBERLY WASHING THEIR SHIRTS IN BUCKETS.

From Cobbett's Rural Rides
By G. D. H. and Margaret Cole
(Davies).
ONE OF THE VIGNETTES.
(By John Nash.)

THE SEA AND THE JUNGLE

By H. M. Tomlinson. Illustrated by Clare Leighton. With a new Foreword by the author. 15s. (Duckworth.)

Twenty years after, Mr. Tomlinson looks back on his early work. It has, he finds, the faults of youthful exuberance. It owes a large debt to earlier writers. But in fundamentals it is sound. And now it is reissued in a large edition, illustrated very beautifully by Clare Leighton, and has become, so to speak, the outward and visible sign of Mr. Tomlinson's acknowledged success. It may

From Near Neighbours
By Margaret Holden
(Toulmin).
SWALLOWS.

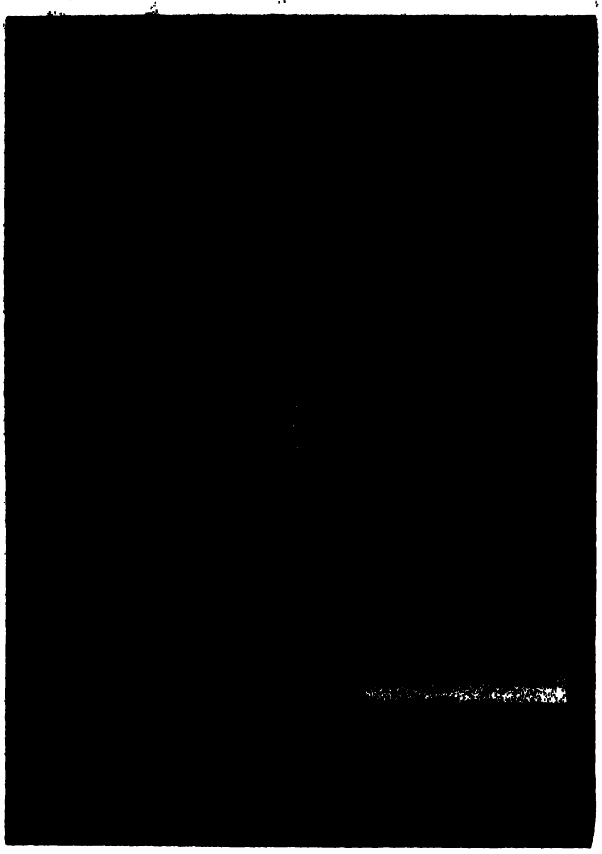
not be so precious as the first edition—a copy of which the author himself found in New York "listed at a figure too large to stir any desire to possess it"—but the woodcuts and the new preface should make it worth possessing for reasons unconnected with its intrinsic excellence. And for that—does not enchantment lie in the very sub-title of the book?

RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM

With illustrations by Willy Pogány. 15s. net (Harrap)

In this simple yet sumptuous edition of the "Rubáiyat" of Omar Khayyam lies great satisfaction Clear type on fine paper, a pleasant tint and generous yet not exaggerated margins, are all details not to be ignored And in this setting are the First and Fourth Renderings of the "Rubáiyat' by Edward FitzGerald All these things are excellent, but the main values of this edition, beyond the verses, are the delightful introduction by Professor Saintsbury and the distinctive illustrations by Willy Pogany The introduction so called, becomes an absorbing 'talk' (about Omar FitzGerald and the Rubaiyát,' by this humorous man of letters this sane scholar, this kindly, broad-minded critic The illustrations consist of twelve plates in colour, and on almost every page an exquisite design, figure or flowers, in black and gold, with an abundance of minor decorations The plates are the work of a finished artist steeped in his subject, full of romance and a subtle understanding of the poem It is a beautiful book

DYKES ON IRISES



Compiled and edited by George Dillistone 12s 6d (Tunbridge Wells Baldwin)

The death of William Rickatson Dykes was a sad loss to many and to the Royal Horticultural Society in particular, whose most indefatigable secretary he was From 1906 to the day of his death he was a frequent contributor to all the principal horticultural journals of the day, and Mr Dillistone has done real service in collecting practically all of these which relate to irises, and putting them out in such convenient form Though the contents are naturally for the iris grower in particular and are somewhat technical, they are not sufficiently so to deter the more general gardener, and the plates are exceptionally pleasing.

From Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám
Illustrated by Ronald Balfour
(Constable)

THE MOVING FINGER WRITES
AND, HAVING WRIT, MOVES ON.

From Things Seen in Portugal
By M. Smithes
(Seeley, Service).

THE CHURCH OF BELEM.

BY SURGING STREAMS.

By the Rev. J. G. Dawson Scott. 5s. (Allenson.)

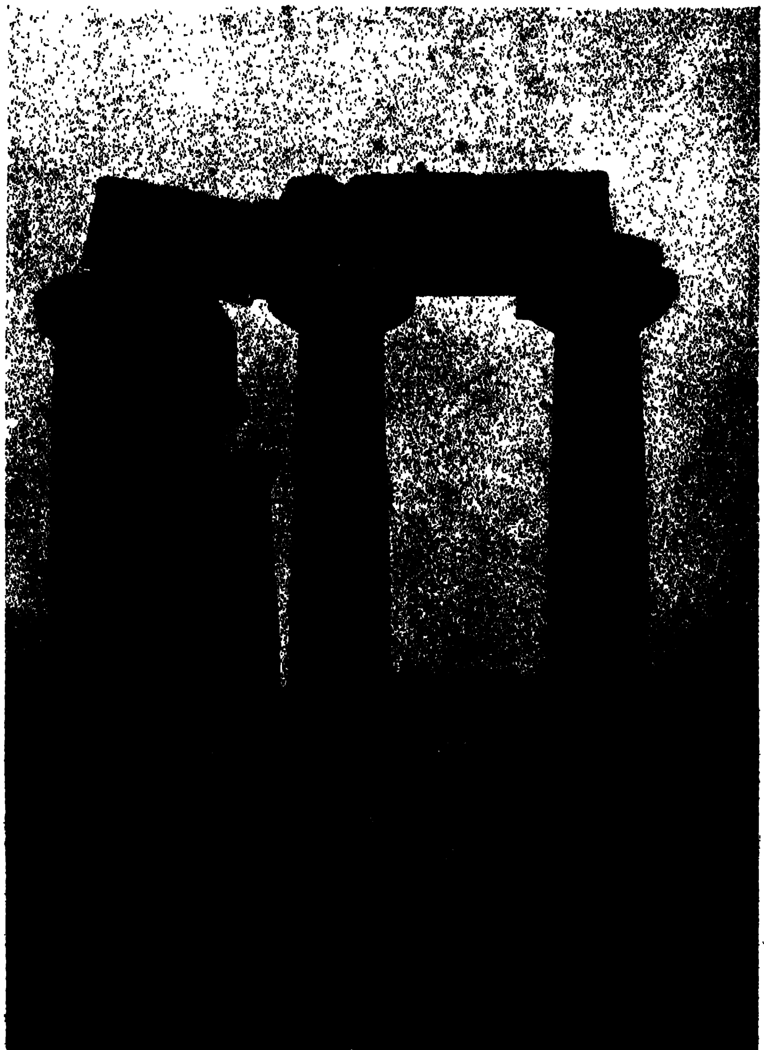
This book is a collection of homely addresses or talks to youth, which Mr. Dawson Scott has adapted from the wide and interesting store of general knowledge he has gained from his close observation of Nature and her ways. Coming under three main sections—Gifts, Growth and Character—the subjects vary widely—water-divining, on the finding and polishing of a garnet, hewing coal, pruning roses, growing dahlias, etc.—but all are capable, in this author's delightful and friendly manner, of conveying many familiar but often neglected truths. Much of his inspiration, by the way, has been gained by the surging streams of Scotland.

ROADS AND VAGABONDS

By Kenneth Hare. Illustrated by Cecil Aldin. 25s. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

The highway of England has had a varied history and has changed much in character even since Victorian days. Mr. Hare's book recalls the road as he remembers it before the arrival of motor traffic, and goes on to earlier recollections still, tales of the old coaches and of highwaymen and smugglers. It is a book to loiter over with keen enjoyment, not an anthology of the road—" selections of extracts are seldom satisfactory "—but the author has drawn on any material that appeals to him, and needless to say Mr. Cecil Aldin was the ideal man to do the illustrations.

THINGS SEEN IN PORTUGAL



By M. F. Smithes. 3s. 6d. (Seeley, Service.)

Merely to look at the photographs which illustrate this handy little volume makes you want to go to Portugal for a holiday, and when you read Mr. Smithes's description of the country—" England's oldest ally and faithful friend "—you want to go more than ever. One still finds many traces of the occupation of the Romans, but the little country has kept its independence " while successive waves of invaders poured over it during more than twenty-five centuries." The books in these series are invaluable to travellers, but of immense interest also to those who can only stay at home and read by the fireside.

SIMON THE ZEALOT

By John S. Hoyland, M.A., F.R.Hist.S.
7s. 6d net. (Williams & Norgate.)

This is in effect a Life of Christ, told from the point of view of a Jewish Nationalist (one of the Twelve) who hoped that in Jesus the political Messiah had come to deliver the chosen people from the yoke of Rome. The story follows scene after scene, bringing out the reaction of Simon's mind to the various sayings and doings of Jesus—his perplexities, his alternations of hope and disappointment. The bitterest disappointment of all comes after the Crucifixion, when Simon feels that the national cause has been lost through the refusal of Jesus Himself to carry it to the victory He might have wrought. Yet after Pentecost illumination comes, and Simon understands at last why Jesus died. The whole study is well worked out, with dignity and restraint, and enables the reader to understand how Christ's work must have impressed many of His contemporaries, and why it both attracted and repelled not a few.

From The Romance of Archaeology
By R. V. D. Magoffin and Emily C. Davis
(Bell).

APOLLO'S CORNER AT CORINTH.

From The Ancient Bridges of the South of England
By E. Jervoise
(Architectural Press).

ANFOLD-DEAN BRIDGE.

From The Ancient Bridges of the South of England
By E. Jervoise
(Architectural Press).

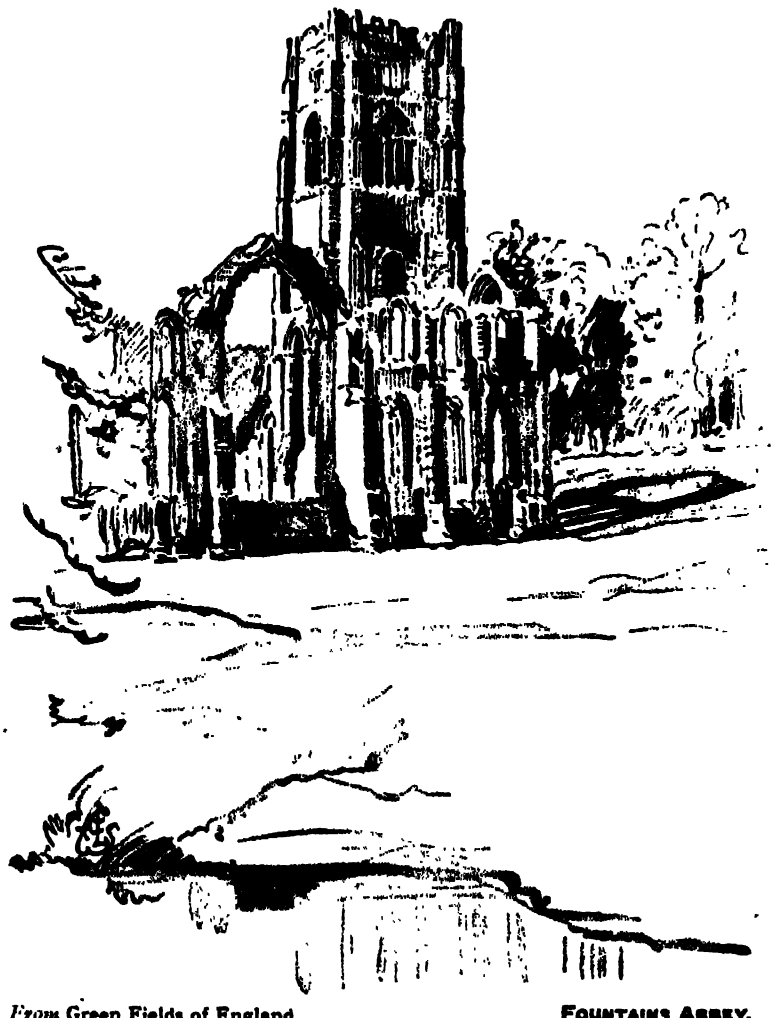
HELE BRIDGE, RIVER TONE.

THE ANCIENT BRIDGES OF THE SOUTH OF ENGLAND.

By E. Jervoise, A.M.Inst.C.E. 5s. 6d. (Architectural Press.)



Mr. Jervoise, who has written this book on behalf of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, has explored southern streams and rivers with great thoroughness, and given us a most valuable record. The book is profusely illustrated with photographs, and Mr. C. R. Peers, Chief Inspector of Ancient Monuments, supplies an interesting preface.

OUT OF THE BEATEN TRACK:

A Narrative of Travel in Little Known Africa

By Major C. Court Treatt. 18s. (Hutchinson.)

The name of Major Court Treatt is familiar to all who delight in films of natural history and wild life. There is no one living who knows better the wildest parts of Africa, and the experiences related in this book are all personal ones collected in the course of several expeditions extending over a period of twenty years. While a fearless big game hunter on occasion, Major Court Treatt prefers the camera to the rifle, and as in his remarkable chapter on "The Small Things of the Forest," shows himself as much interested in the insignificant denizens of the jungle as he is in elephants and lions. His knowledge of the natives tribe is again very apparent, and is the fruit of the confidence which he has won from them through long intimacy and sympathy. This fascinating book fully justifies its title, and the illustrations are of course unique.

From Green Fields of England
By Clare Cameron
(Constable).

FOUNTAINS ABBEY.
(Pencil drawing by Edmond L. Warne.)

THE KING'S CURATE

By Dorita Fairlie Bruce. 7s. 6d. (Murray.)

This is a romance of Ayrshire in the troublous times of the Second Covenant, when religious persecution was rife. Baron Mellish of Braidburn, dispossessed of his estates by Cromwell, accepts the position of King's Curate of Kirkaldie, the parish where his father had ruled as laird. He steadily refuses to combine the position with that of informer against the Covenanters as is the custom, his great desire being to bring peace to his country through toleration of religious differences. How he succeeds, and in so doing wins the love of beautiful Mistress Anne, now the owner of his old home the Braidheugh, is graphically told by Miss Fairlie Bruce, in a pleasing novel which captures the glamour of the period.

The background of the Covenanting period has been treated by many writers from Sir Walter Scott onwards. There is something in the grim times which makes them an ideal period for "atmosphere," and this Miss Bruce has caught well.

DENT

GENERAL

FLY FISHING
VISCOUNT GREY OF FALLODON

An enlarged edition of Lord Grey's classic of angling with additional chapters by the author and wood engravings by ERIC DAGLISH. Second impression. 10s 6d *

EVERYMAN
PRESENTED BY THOMAS DERRICK

The moral play of Everyman will never be out of date. And Thomas Derrick here presents it as a vital drama. His seventy three woodcuts in themselves enact the play before the reader. It is a very unusual book. 15s. Also a signed limited edition at 3 guineas *

OSCAR WILDE: PLAYS, PROSE WRITINGS & POEMS
IN EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

This new volume in Everyman's Library, edited by HESKETH PEARSON, includes the best of Wilde: the plays The Importance of Being Earnest and Lady Windermere's Fan, the essay The Soul of Man Under Socialism, his confessional testament The Critic as Artist, his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray, his poignant epic The Ballad of Reading Gaol, etc. 2s in cloth, 3s in library binding *

THE ALDINE CHAPBOOKS
A SUBSTITUTE FOR CHRISTMAS CARDS

Six new titles including well known copyright and non copyright essays are now ready in this attractive series. Designed and illustrated by ROBERTA WAUDBY the series has novel features as a substitute for greeting cards. Size 8 ins by 6 ins. 1s each *

THE STUFFED OWL
AN ENLARGED EDITION

Nearly six thousand copies of the first edition having been sold, a new edition of D. B. Wyndham Lewis's and Charles Lee's anthology of Bad Verse is now ready, containing many more choice specimens and a really enjoyable index. With 8 Beerbohm cartoons. 6s

VENICE AND ITS STORY
THOMAS OKEY

A new edition (the fourth) is now ready of Professor Okey's well known history and guide to Venice. It is superbly illustrated with 40 coloured plates and numerous other drawings. 15s

MUSIC

MELODY AND THE LYRIC
JOHN MURRAY GIBBON

A valuable contribution to literary history. An important book not only to musicians. Astonishingly cheap. Life and Letters. With 200 musical examples. 12s 6d

MUSIC COME TO EARTH
ADOLPH WEISSMANN

In this brilliant book one of the most discerning music critics of our time speculates upon the future of his art. Translated by ERIC BLOM. 6s

BIOGRAPHY

HENRY IRVING
GORDON CRAIG

A performance of unique distinction.' CONAL O'RIORDAN in the New Statesman. An adorable portrait of a great man. ARNOLD BENNETT in Evening Standard. A masterpiece of biography. SEYMOUR HICKS. Illustrated. Second impression printing. 15s *

JANE AUSTEN
R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON

The gay and genial sincerity of Jane Austen emerges from this book in an entirely convincing manner. HAROLD NICOLSON in Daily Express. Illustrated. 15s *

A BASKETFUL OF MEMORIES
THOMAS OKEY

An autobiographical sketch by a scholar of renown, the son of a poor East End basketmaker. The quiet story of a quiet mind, and it ought to sell by the ten thousand. Daily Herald. Illustrated. 6s

POETRY AND ESSAYS

THE GLANCE BACKWARD
RICHARD CHURCH

This is a book of individual beauty. L. A. G. STRONG in the Spectator. A finely printed edition with drawings by ROBERT AUSTIN, limited to 750 copies. 8s 6d

A BOOK OF GRACE
GRACE RHYS

Last poems and essays of the late Mrs. Ernest Rhys, including her most characteristic work. With a Memoir by ERNEST RHYS, Preface by SYLVIA LYND and two wood engravings by ERIC DAGLISH. 6s *

FICTION

SIMPLE STORIES FROM "PUNCH"
ARCHIBALD MARSHALL

Here are twenty four perfect examples of Mr Marshall's whimsical art, with their natural corollary of drawings by CECIL MORROW. Riotously funny. Sunday Times. 6s

THE BALANCE
ADA HARRISON

Written as a good artist sketches with quick graphic strokes, witty in observation and constant in sense of beauty. Evening Standard. 7s 6d

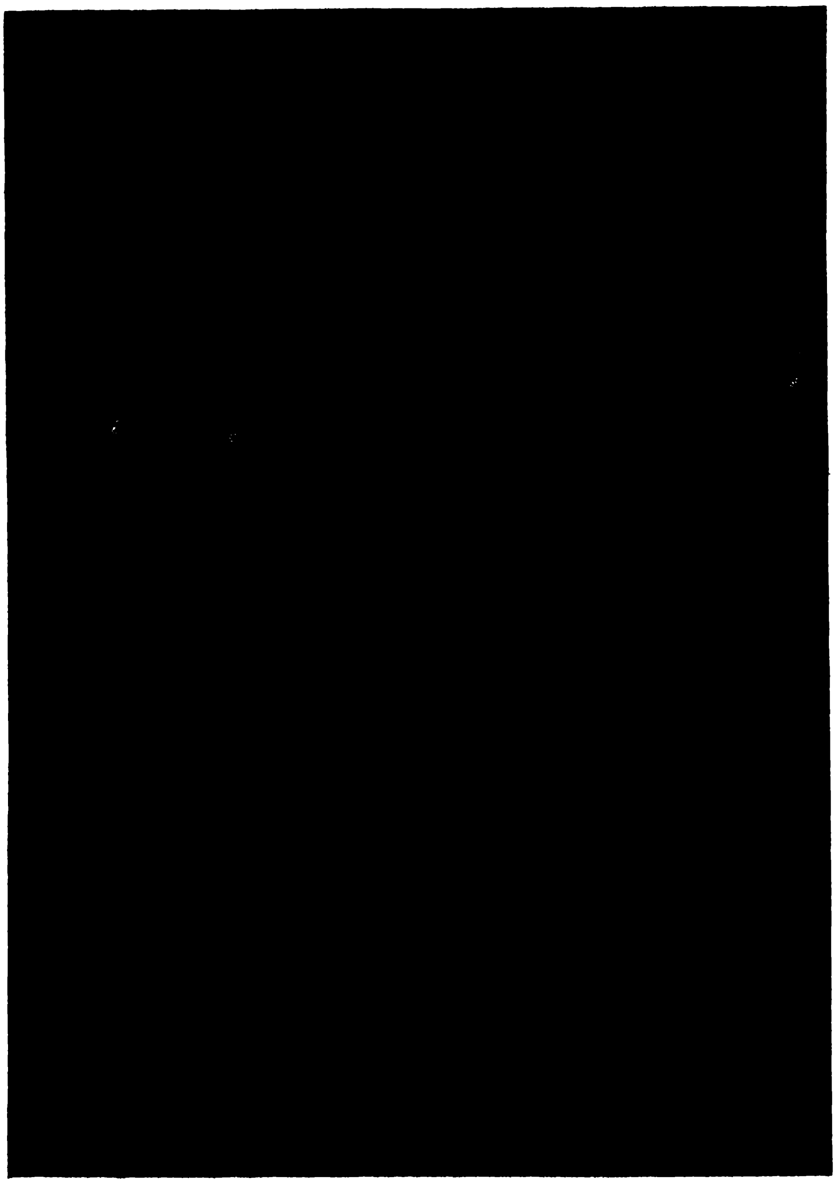
LISA
EDITH YOUNG

A novel of emotion which the publishers believe will make a reputation for the author. A thing of arresting beauty. Evening News. 7s 6d

REMEMBER that your stand-by for Christmas gifts, this year as always, is EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

Ask your bookseller for a list of the 260 special leather-bound volumes at 4s.

All prices are net. Prospectuses of books marked with an asterisk * together with a full Christmas List and a List of Books for Children, post free from 10, Bedford Street, London, W.C.2.



OVER THE HILLS

By Jeffery Farnol. 7s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

Mr. Jeffery Farnol presumably knows when he is "on a good thing." He is conscious that the general novel-reading public likes his historical romances, which (though we do not wish to cast any doubts upon his historical accuracy) are really original fairy stories in which, after very wonderful vicissitudes, the wicked people are laid low and the good, kind folk go to the top of the class and live happy ever after. In style and in general trend of narrative (not necessarily plot) he has followed his usual recipe in this his latest novel. He is wise in this, for his is a fashion of story-telling that wears extremely well, and were he to change it and evolve a new Jeffery Farnol he would, whatever else, disappoint many readers of fiction and break a happy line of stories.

On opening "Over the Hills" one is soon deep in the chapters whose peculiarly Farnolian labels are liberally sprinkled with the atmospheric words "telleth," "giveth," "describeth," and the like. (Where would Mr. Farnol be without his "eth"?) One chapter heading excels itself in that it "touches something on the art of swordmanship."

For this tale we are in the days of the Old Pretender's ill-starred rebellion, a period in which the author has a thoroughly happy time. The story is in the first person, coming from its hero, one Adam, called Thursday, foundling and valiant coward; it is his odyssey, his record of joys and sorrows, his love story; in addition to Adam and his lady, it is particularly concerned with an intriguing character—a "right-beloved enemy." It matters little that the tale may be put down as "the mixture as before," that the people do the kind of things Farnol folk have been doing for some time, and that there is again a great dependence on coincidence in the plot. And if the bad people are confounded so amazingly and improbably, and the hero, heroine, and their well-wishers presented with unimaginable slices of good fortune, it is no monstrous drawback. Mr. Farnol is still a master of his own particular kind of story; his dialogue and dialect, time and circumstance still crash their ways successfully past credibility to an unresisting acceptance that is wholly enjoyable. His new tale flows well and is easy to read. Though this time he does not convey the sense of period as well as usual, this is essentially a book for a delightful and easy hour or two. It is smoothly written and neither jolts the intelligence nor burdens the mind. Even the scenes of violence and bloodshed are right and proper to the story, nicely and quite pleasantly done.

From English Romanesque Architecture Before the Conquest By A. W. Clapham (Oxford University Press).

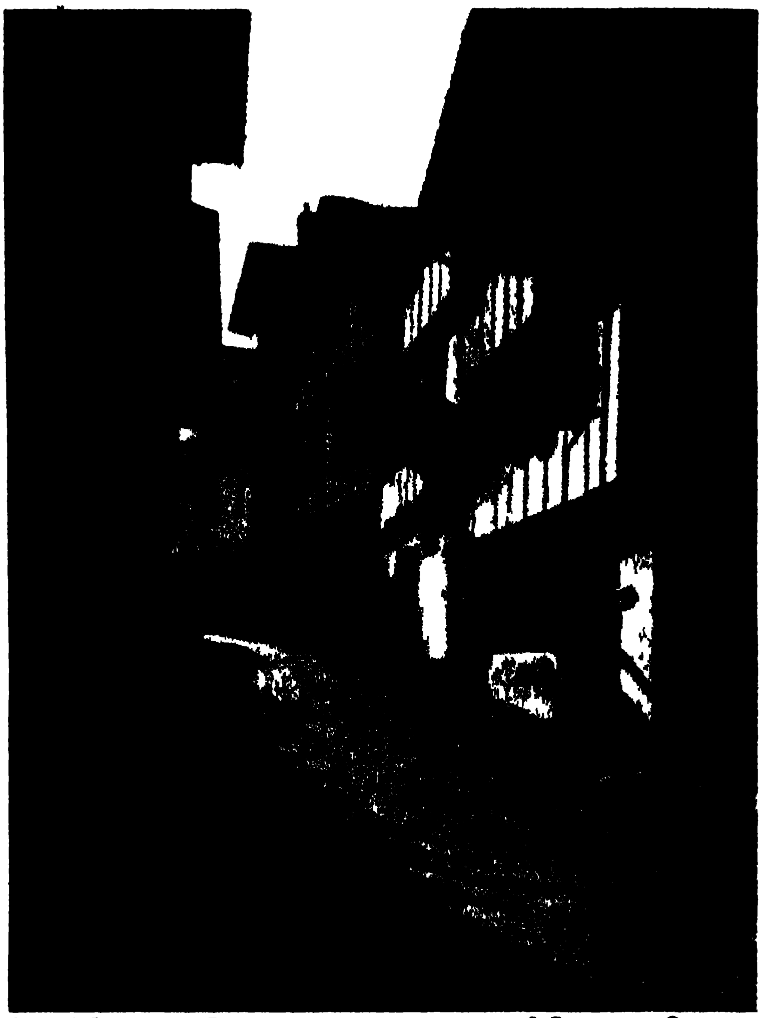
REPTON, DERBYSHIRE, CRYPT. (Tenth century.)

A MODERN HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE, 1880-1922

By R. H. Gretton. 12s. 6d. (Secker.)

Here is an omnibus volume which will be eagerly sought after. It consists of the three volumes of Mr. Gretton's history, of which the first two have for some time been out of print. His method is to record not only democratic and political and economic movements, but to recall the events which were influencing the 'man-in-the-street." Even the crazes of the moment are recalled. And the result is a very vivid picture of the years we have lived through and a true picture, too, because the details are true.

THAT DOG OF MINE



By Joe Walker. With over 50 illustrations in colour by G. L. Stampa. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

It would be hard to say which has given us the keener delight, the whimsical, knowing verses with their truly "doggie" point of view, or the equally knowing, jolly and always appealing illustrations. Dog-lovers generally (and they form surely no small percentage) will be only too ready to welcome this delightful successor to "My Dog and Yours." Mr. Walker's verses flow as joyously and spontaneously as ever and Mr. Stampa has caught the varying moods with remarkable ease and success. One can almost read the question, "Wherever you may be, can you be happy, master, without me?" in the illustration we have chosen to reproduce here.

A BOOK OF THE BASQUES

By Rodney Gallop 15s (Macmillan)

In this era of omnibus publications it is a pleasure to find one devoted to the reserved—and somewhat mysterious Basque 'For A Book of the Basques' is an omnibus publication it discusses (intelligently and without fever) the origin of the Basques, their language and literature their folk-dances, their music, their superstition, even their games, the last of which will interest not only the casual reader but as well the tennis player, who may discover in the description of pelota the reason for Borotra's control of his matchless volley In short Rodney Gallop has written a book for varied tastes and written it pleasantly Photographs and sketches, many of them witty, supplement the text.

From A Book of the Basques
By Rodney Gallop
(Macmillan)

A STREET IN CIBOURE.

A SAUNTER THROUGH KENT WITH PEN AND PENCIL

By Charles Igglesden F S A 3s 6d net
(Kentish Express Publishing Company)

This is the 24th volume in the series by Sir Charles Igglesden, and it deals with Hythe and its environs The author has a deft descriptive touch, and an encyclopedic knowledge of the history and geography of the county The old Cinque Port of Hythe has much more than a local significance for the historian and this volume tells us why, and hints at its departed glories

We notice an old fashioned touch about the production of the book, which is not altogether against it There is one certainty about it, and that is good value for money.

From The National Gallery
By Trenchard Cox
(Faber & Faber)

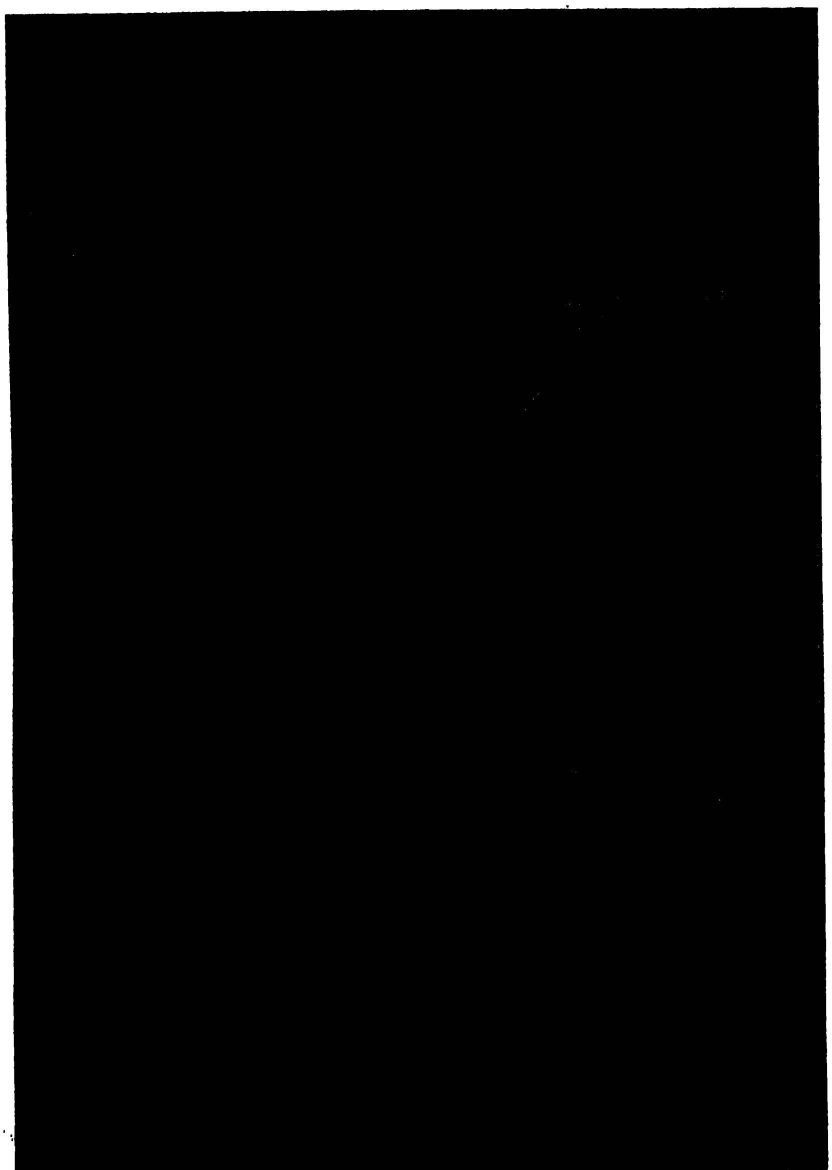
JAN STEEN:
THE SKITTLE PLAYERS.
(Room X)

TALES FROM THE PANCHATANTRA

Translated from the Sanskrit by Alfred Williams
Illustrated 7s 6d net
(Basil Blackwell)

A pathetic interest is attached to the production of this book in the fact that both the author and his wife (who helped him in a grim struggle for life) died shortly before its publication Alfred Williams, the 'Hammerman poet' was beautifully described in the Times Literary Supplement as 'the born artist who, sustained by beauty, early divined in it the key to complete experience, until all adversities of circumstance, of which he had so heavy a share, fell into subsidiary places and became transitional" The story of this poet's life reads like an epic This man, who fought the elements for a barren livelihood, steeped himself in the classics and finally gave us this translation from the Sanskrit The State was too late with its Civil Pension for this hero of literature and we must look to it that we are not lax in our appreciation of his work, of which this book is a fine example



OUT OF THE ARK, OR ANIMALS FACETIOUS, IN CUT AND DOGGEREL

By R. D. 6s. net. (Peter Davies.)

THE ADVANCEMENT OF LEARNING

" Hidden in their leafy villa
See Papa and Ma Gorilla,
Fearful of a visitation
From the Board of Education."

This is one of the bright verses printed by the side of an appropriate illustration. The whole book is well conceived and excellently produced. Each picture is of some animal or animals and R. D. prints his witty comments in verse opposite. It is uncannily clever, and there must be few indeed who would not enjoy the joke. Mr. Peter Davies has evidently gone to a great deal of trouble with the production of the work, and has succeeded admirably in giving us the right sort of format for a book that demanded exact treatment to be a success—which it is.

From Dykes on Irises
By W. R. Dykes
Edited by George Dillistone
(Baldwin).

IRIS JAPONICA.

OLD SHIP

By Lennox Kerr. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

This is the story of an almost incredibly bovine farm labourer who develops a passion for the sea, and of his murderous enmity towards an equally incredible shipmaster who uses beauty creams and powders his face. Dixon, despite the fact that he scarcely knows a ship when he sees one, manages to ship himself as a deckhand on the steamer Hillgrove. Though as unimaginative as an ox, he becomes obsessed with the notion that the ship is a living entity and that, like the rest of the crew, he is her slave. To him, Captain Busby, the degenerate shipmaster whose cabin is like a lady's boudoir, is part of the ship, and because of this he regards him almost as a superman, a sort of high priest. This persists until, for domestic reasons, Dixon asks to be paid off before the vessel completes her trip. The captain refuses, and thereafter the ex-yokel cherishes a growing hatred for him until, egged on by a communist seaman, he decides to murder him. The conclusion, though scarcely to be called " happy," is what convention demands. Incidentally Mr. Kerr attacks the system under which officers of the mercantile marine are granted their certificates, but does not suggest any alternative. His assertion that the " enforced inactivity " of a master mariner's life " saps his very manhood," seems strangely at variance with fact and tradition. Nevertheless the author knows the sea and ships, and the fact that he writes from the foc's'le angle may account for his inability to see anything good " abaft the mainmast."

DREAM DAYS

By Kenneth Grahame. 7s. 6d. (John Lane.)

It was the happiest occasion that brought about the collaboration of Mr. Grahame and Mr. E. H. Shepard, and nowhere have their combined efforts had a more welcome result than in this delightfully whimsical glimpse into the yearnings, imaginings and sprightly doings of Selina, Edward and Harold and their various friends. There is such a delicious crispness and neatness about Mr. Grahame's style which carries us along irresistibly, even though we may be long past the legitimate age for such diversion. Mere years in fact seem of little account in such joyous company. The same crispness and neatness fully characterise the numerous drawings, in fact we could not wish them better.

THE BOOK OF BEAUTY

By Cecil Beaton. 25s. (Duckworth.)

This is an attempt on the part of one who from childhood has been captivated by the beauty of woman to provide an " up-to-date version of the old books of beauty in which early Victorian belles were engraved in steel." The compiler writes: " In the old books of beauty tender poems were addressed to the same name as that borne by the distinguished lady opposite, but since I am no poet, I have tried instead to make my book an analysis of modern beauty, a collection of the loveliest ladies I have ever seen, and, in time, it may become a sentimental document for our grandchildren."

That sufficiently describes the scope of the book, which is illustrated by very fine sepia photographs and by drawings in the text.

THORNTON WILDER'S WORKS

Uniform Edition. 6s. net each

The Bridge of San Luis Rey
The Cabala
The Angel that Troubled the Waters
The Woman of Andros

Illustrated Edition 7s. 6d. net

WILDER'S BRIDGE OF SAN LUIS REY

Woodcuts by Clare Leighton

BRITISH BIRDS

ARCHIBALD THORBURN

In 4 volumes. 63s. net
Each volume contains 48 coloured plates, and can be had separately 16s. net.

THE SPIRIT OF MAN

ROBERT BRIDGES

Paper boards, cloth back, 6s. 6d. net; India paper, cloth, 8s. net; leather, 12s. 6d. net

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES

R. L. STEVENSON

Paper covers, 1s.; cloth, gilt, 2s. 6d. net

JOCK OF THE BUSHVELD

Sir PERCY FITZ-PATRICK

With illustrations 10s. 6d. net
Abridged Edition 5s. net

JUNGLE JOHN

A Book of the Big Game Jungles

By JOHN BUDDEN

Illustrated 6s. net

THE CHILDREN'S PLAY-HOUR BOOK FOURTH HOUR

Edited by STEPHEN SOUTHWOLD

4to 6s. net
With numerous Coloured and other Illustrations.

TRUE TALES OF AN OLD SHELLBACK

By STEPHEN SOUTHWOLD

Illustrated 3s. 6d. net

THE OUTDOOR WORLD LIBRARY

With numerous coloured and other Illustrations.
Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d. net each

The Outdoor World; or, Young Collector's Handbook
By W. S. Furneaux
Field and Woodland Plants
By W. S. Furneaux
British Butterflies and Moths
By W. S. Furneaux
Life in Ponds and Streams
By W. S. Furneaux
The Sea Shore
By W. S. Furneaux
British Birds
By W. H. Hudson

SIR HENRY NEWBOLT'S BOOKS

Cheap Edition. Illustrated. 5s. net each

The Book of the Thin Red Line
The Book of the Blue Sea
The Book of the Happy Warrior
Submarine and Anti-Submarine
The Book of the Long Trail
Tales of the Great War
The Book of Good Hunting

THE FAIRY BOOK SERIES

Edited by ANDREW LANG

Fully illustrated in black-and-white. Those volumes marked * have coloured pictures as well 5s. net each

Blue Fairy Book
Red Fairy Book
Green Fairy Book
*Yellow Fairy Book
Pink Fairy Book
Grey Fairy Book
*Violet Fairy Book
*Crimson Fairy Book
*Orange Fairy Book
*Brown Fairy Book
*Olive Fairy Book
*Lilac Fairy Book
*Blue Poetry Book
*True Story Book
Red True Story Book
*All Sorts of Stories
*Strange Story Book
Animal Story Book
Red Book of Animal Stories
*Arabian Nights
*Book of Romance
*Red Romance Book
*Book of Princes and Princess
*Red Book of Heroes
*Book of Saints and Heroes

Fourth Printing 18s. net

AS WE WERE

A VICTORIAN PEEPSHOW

Reminiscences of E. F. BENSON

"Nothing more charming and illuminating has been written about Early Victorianism."—Sunday Times

---

Fifth Printing 21s. net

RECOMMENDED BY THE BOOK SOCIETY

England under Queen Anne: BLENHEIM

By

G. M. TREVELYAN, O.M.

WILLIAM III AND THE DEFENCE OF HOLLAND, 1672-4

By

MARY CAROLINE TREVELYAN 21s. net

THE MAKING OF WILLIAM PENN

By

MABEL RICHMOND BRAILSFORD

With a Frontispiece by Clare Leighton 12s. 6d. net

THE AGE OF THE CHARTISTS, 1832-1854

A Study of Discontent

By

J. L. and BARBARA HAMMOND 12s. 6d. net

WOODCUTS

EXAMPLES OF THE WORK OF CLARE LEIGHTON

With an Introduction by Hilaire Belloc

With 36 woodcuts 42s. net

Edition limited to 450 copies each signed by the artist (200 of which have been sold in America).

RECOMMENDED BY THE BOOK SOCIETY

THE COLLECTED POEMS OF ROBERT FROST

With Portrait 15s. net

Robert Frost has been acclaimed as the greatest modern poet of America.

THE ISLAND OF PENGUINS

By

CHERRY KEARTON

With 90 Illustrations 10s. 6d. net

LAMENTS FOR THE LIVING

By

DOROTHY PARKER 6s. net

"It is the quaintest collection of stories and sketches of American life, pathetic or satirical, occasionally very grim indeed, but all of them little gems of a kind."—Sunday Times

---

THE ENGLISH HERITAGE SERIES

3s. 6d. net each

CRICKET	Neville Cardus
THE ENGLISH INN	Thomas Burke
THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION	Sir Maurice Amos
ENGLISH HUMOUR	J. B. Priestley
SHAKESPEARE	John Bailey
ENGLISH WILD LIFE	Eric Parker
THE ENGLISH PUBLIC SCHOOL	Bernard Darwin
THE ENGLISH PARISH CHURCH	A. R. Powys

LONGMANS

SLEUTHS, SPOOKS AND CORPSES

From Hunting and Stalking the Deer
By Lionel Edwards and Harold Frank Wallace (Longmans).

THE TRAVELLER.

How do they do it? The detective writers who ease cabinet ministers' troubled lives and make a humdrum world brighter with virtue rewarded, splendid dust-jackets and regions Sherlock Holmes never knew? These five thrillers do it very well, although Mr. Christopher Bush hints darkly that some detective story writers are not always as rigid guardians of the Decalogue as one might expect. In the longest and most involved of these thrillers "Dead Man Twice," the minor villain is a neurotic, jelly-fish and writer of detective fiction, a literary "ghost," and an apt enough criminal in his way. True he is only a third-rate provider of thrills and a second-rate bungling murderer. It takes a clean-limbed sportsman to plan and carry out the really efficient and remarkable murder in the book. But when Mr. Kenneth Hayles writes shockers he produces sliding panels, vanishing corpses, Chinamen, dope, himself as hero and books "as full of lumber as a tenth-rate antique shop." It must be said however that he gives Travers and Franklin, the amateur sleuths, a run for their money. "Dead Man Twice," apart from the shocking insinuation mentioned, is a tangle as

MR. CONINGSBY DAWSON.
Author of "Fugitives From Passion" (Hutchinson).

From Ronald Firbank
By Ifan Kyrle Fletcher
(Duckworth).

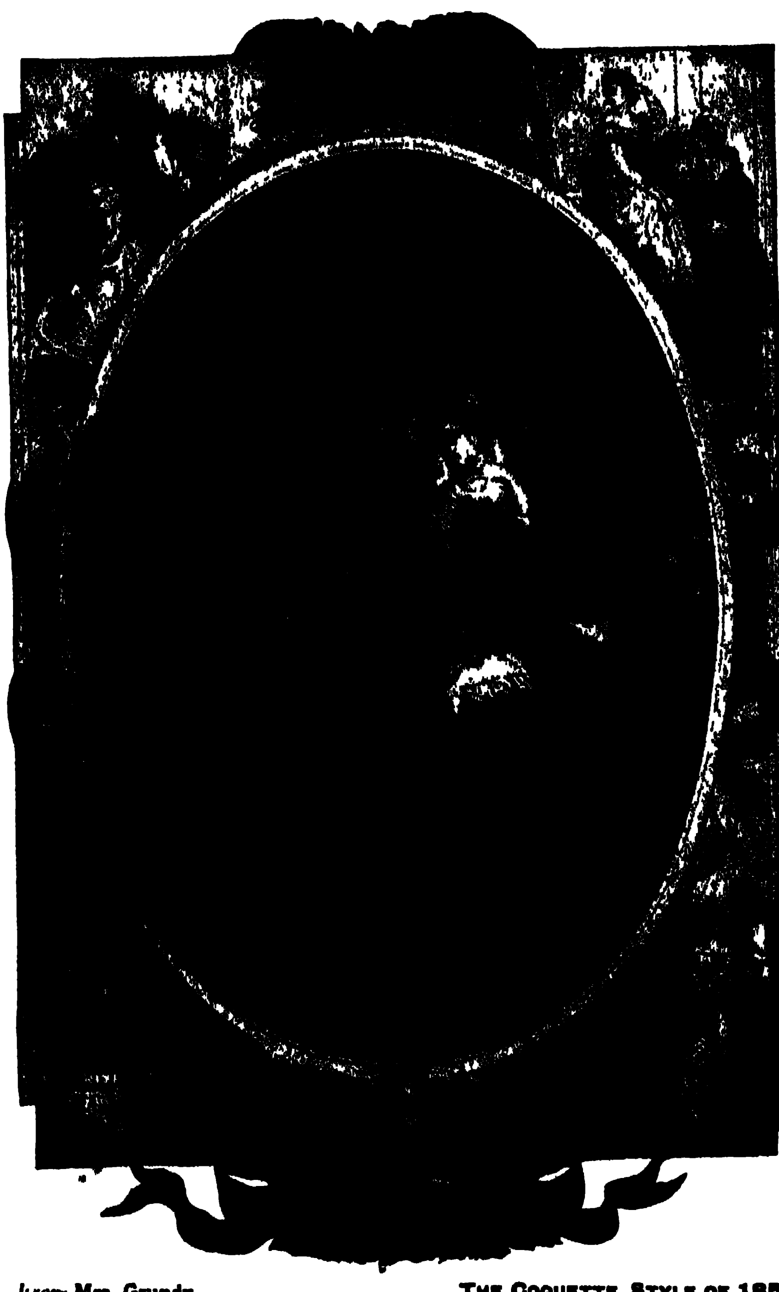
RONALD FIRBANK.
(From a drawing by Augustus John.)

ingenious and thrilling as one could demand from the author of "The Perfect Murder Case." Michael France, heavy-weight champion, dead upstairs in his mansion with a bullet through his head, and his faithful butler Somers dead downstairs, poisoned with a suicide confession in France's writing beneath his body. Three hundred excellent pages of alibis, clues and speculations follow. Mr. Christopher Bush is no Kenneth Hayles!

Nor is Arnold Fredericks, who, in "The Mark of the Rat,"[1] uses a new mechanism to tell his story—a really skilful blending of novel and serial—and moreover actually produces a new plot. Can a man actually murdered—murdered and as dead as mutton on the evidence of two doctors!—murder some two hundred pages later the man who murdered him? He can, and without coming back from hell either! But the gentle lady reader, despite charming love interludes in Virginia, where the action takes place, should have the strongest and most iron-nerved man she knows beside her if she reads "The Mark of the Rat" after twilight.

"The Pavilion by the Lake"[2] has a far-off resemblance to Mr Arnold Fredericks' book in the surprising solution to the murder of James Altamount, shipowner, found dead near a haunted pavilion in the grounds of his Bucks country house But the resemblance is common only in so far as both writers base their mystery on two different and obscure scientific facts. Mr Rees moreover has written a romantic novel with a deeper characterisation around his dual mystery, which rests in turn upon the disappearance of a miniature of Mary Queen of Scots. "The Pavilion by the Lake" is a first-class thriller, high above the usual detective novel for the ease of its style and its convincing atmosphere.



"The Avenging Ikon"[3] is at least the seventh thriller Mr Charles Barry has to his credit, and his Chief-Inspector Gilmartin again appears in this glorious blend of Oriental intrigue and Occidental setting. The dialogue is remarkably good, the "Avenging Ikon," indeed a trio of Avenging Ikons, grips the reader's attention at a very early stage, and there is a mild and pleasing romantic tinge.

"The Body on the Bus"[4] will give point to the opening question of this review, especially to a reader who turns to its pages fresh from Mr. Barry's cunning and sustained mass of motive and atmosphere. How do they do it? Mr. Hollingworth stages a solution-proof murder mystery the top of a London bus. One corpse, an amateur detective's vanity and weakness, an egoist's jealousy, that is the raw material. Apart from a questionable slip of Darton, the amateur detective, the reader is held to the final unravelling, conscious that Darton's idiocy is in keeping with his character, and without the slip, without a story.

A remarkable coincidence must puzzle the reader of these five books. Apart from two murderers Mr. Barry simply had to have committed for trial, five homicidal ruffians at least out of eight meet dramatic and not legal justice. The knot is cut by sudden death, self-inflicted or otherwise. The only scoundrel whose end will please the upholders of Jack Ketch is, and even this is by no means altogether certain, the masquerading wretch in "Dead Man Twice"[5] who could not write a decent and original thriller.

There is one consolation. Messrs. Fredericks, Rees, Barry, Hollingworth and Bush, on this showing, will never mount the scaffold.

DESMOND RYAN.

From Mrs. Grundy By Leo Markum (Appleton).

THE COQUETTE, STYLE OF 1851. (From "Godey's Lady's Book.")

[1] "The Mark of the Rat" By Arnold Fredericks. 7s 6d. (Stanley Paul)—[2] "The Pavilion by the Lake." By Arthur J. Rees. 7s 6d (Bodley Head.)—[3] "The Avenging Ikon." By Charles Barry 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)—[4] "The Body on the Bus." By Leonard Hollingworth. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)—[5] "Dead Man Twice." By Christopher Bush. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann)

THE TIN TREE

By James Quince. 7s 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

This for a first novel is a capital and most promising piece of work. Who would have guessed that the mystery of Gunner Rachelson, of the Garrison Artillery, would begin to get unravelled when the shell crashed into that tin tree of an observation post on the road to Bapaume in 1917? Of course the long arm of coincidence is rather busily employed; but why not? Murder most foul had been committed three years before, with lovers parted, and no end of trouble. All these things had to be put right, and so they are. The author may be congratulated on an exceedingly ingenious and most unexpected solution. The pace is fast and furious as the story unfolds; villainies are frustrated, and the heroines—for Embrance is as charming as Peggy—are not disappointed. As for that good fellow, Budockshed, he fully deserved his happiness. A thoroughly wholesome and diverting tale.

From Young England (N S S U) — THE MARCH OF THE LEMMINGS TO THE SEA

YOUNG ENGLAND

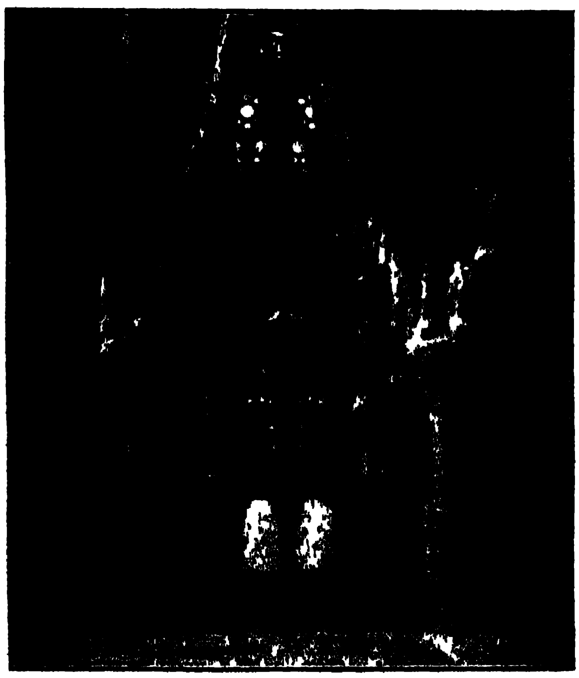
6s (Pilgrim Press)

The fifty-first volume of this most admirable annual which girls must enjoy as much as their brothers Open it anywhere, and you will be tempted to begin reading.

From The Ancient Bridges of the South of England By F Jervis (Architectural Press) — ABINGDON BRIDGE.

' The Making of an Indian Brave ' is the name of a capital article and near it there is a well-informed paper on the "Mysteries of the Migration of Birds ' Stories are here, well illustrated, and J W Hearne tells cricketers about ' Bowling Which Gets Wickets ' Boys off to camp should look up Major Gorman s advice as to how to sleep comfortably there No less an author than Mr Fresidder Sheppard has something to say about History, and recommends some fine books and does not omit one that we hope will never be forgotten—Crockett s splendid story, " The Raiders "

MODERN FRENCH MASTERS



By Edwin Fagg 5s (Methuen)

This is an ideal book for those who wish for a summary of the modern school of painting in France, with references to examples of their work which are easily accessible in London galleries Mr Fagg, after an introductory chapter on David and the traditional school traces the development of French art through Corot to the great Impressionists and so to the Post-Impressionist movement led by Gauguin, Cezanne and Van Gogh, with the various names and schools which have followed them

It is a most readable book and an excellent guide

From Pickwick Papers By Charles Dickens (Harrap). — A GRADUAL RECOVERING OF THE UNFORTUNATE INDIVIDUAL.

From Labels By Evelyn Waugh (Duckworth). — THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY FAMILY, BARCELONA. SOUTH DOOR, EXTERIOR.

S. P. C. K.

New & Recent Books

The Bible and Religion

DIGGING UP BIBLICAL HISTORY

Recent Archæology in Palestine and its bearing on the Old Testament. Vol. I. The Croall Lectures for 1928-29. By the Rev. J. GARROW DUNCAN, B.D., Director of Excavations in Babylonia, Egypt and Palestine. With numerous illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (December)

THE GOSPEL FOUNDATIONS

The Moorhouse Lectures, 1928. By JOHN STEPHEN HART, Bishop of Wangaratta. 5s. net

IRISH VISIONS OF THE OTHER-WORLD

A contribution to the study of Mediæval Visions. By ST. JOHN D. SEYMOUR, B.D., Litt.D., M.R.I.A., Archdeacon of Cashel and Emly. 6s. net

THE CHESTER MIRACLE PLAYS

Done into Modern English and arranged for acting. By I. and O. BOLTON KING.

With an introduction by Sir BARRY V. JACKSON. 6s. net

THE OXFORD CYCLOPEDIC CONCORDANCE

Containing New and Selected Helps to the Study of the Bible. Arranged in one Alphabetical Order. With illustrations and a new series of Maps. 4s. 6d. net

HISTORY

JOSEPHUS AND THE JEWS

The History and Religion of the Jews as Explained by Flavius Josephus. By F. J. FOAKES JACKSON, D.D. 12s. 6d. net

EPISCOPACY ANCIENT AND MODERN

Edited by CLAUDE JENKINS, D.D., and K. D. MACKENZIE, M.A. 12s. 6d. net

CHRISTIANS IN CHINA BEFORE THE YEAR 1550

By A. C. MOULE. With illustrations and maps. 15s. net

A LITERARY HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN FRANCE from the Wars of Religion down to our own Times.

Vol. II: The Coming of Mysticism (1590-1620). By HENRI BREMOND. Translated by K. L. MONTGOMERY. 16s. net

WORSHIP

CHURCH SERVICES AND SERVICE-BOOKS BEFORE THE REFORMATION.

By the late HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D., Litt.D. New Edition revised by A. J. MACLEAN, D.D., Bishop of Moray, Ross and Caithness. 5s. net

POETRY

SELECTED POEMS OF WILLIAM ALEXANDER, ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, 1896-1911, AND CECIL FRANCES ALEXANDER.

Edited by A. P. GRAVES, D.Litt. 3s. 6d. net

BIOGRAPHY AND MISSIONARY

MOTHER CECILE IN SOUTH AFRICA, 1883-1906.

Foundress of the Community of the Resurrection of our Lord. Compiled by a Sister of the Community. With several illustrations. 7s. 6d. net

A complete biography of a remarkable educationalist and saintly woman.

CANYONS, CANS, AND CARAVANS

By F. H. EVA HASELL. With numerous illustrations. 3s. 6d. net

The complete record of the author's caravan tours in Western Canada.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE,

NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, LONDON, W.C.2

And of all Booksellers Lists post free

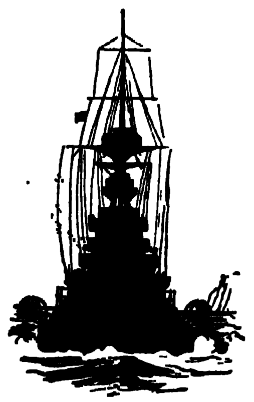
From The SHELDON PRESS List

The KING'S PAWNS

By Lieut.-Gen. Sir George MacMunn, K.C.B.,K.C.S.I.,D.S.O.

5s. net

The Author has had a distinguished career as a soldier. During this eventful life he has stored his mind with memories of "moving accidents by flood and field." These stories, founded on fact, are drawn from all parts of our far-flung battle line. They are War stories with a difference.



CASHIERED

By Bernard Bowles

7s. 6d. net

Robin Laing inexplicably failed in his duty as a soldier during a compaign on the North-West Frontier. At the court-martial he refused to make any defence, and was cashiered. His friend, Peter Jaffrey, in loyalty to a schoolboy oath, resigned the Service, and devoted his life to finding Robin. This is a man's book.

The ROYAL NAVY

The Sure Shield of the Empire

By Geoffrey Parratt

With a Foreword by Vice-Admiral J. E. T. HARPER, C.B., M.V.O. With numerous illustrations and diagrams. 7s. 6d. net

The Morning Post says: "A really admirable account of the Royal Navy."

The Navy says: "A vast amount of information compressed with great skill. We recommend this book and hope it will have a large circulation."

STUDIES OF THE SPANISH MYSTICS

Vol. II. By E. ALLISON PEERS, M.A., sometime scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge; Gilmour Professor of Spanish in the University of Liverpool; Member of the Hispanic Society of America. 18s. net

IN ENGLAND—NOW

The Country-side Week by Week. By MARIBEL EDWIN. With many illustrations. Cloth boards. 5s. net

A fascinating book for all who love the country-side by a writer who exhibits insight and imagination. A welcome gift-book.

A MOUNTY'S WIFE

Being the Life Story of one attached to the Force but not of it. By LUTA MUNDAY. With illustrations. 7s. 6d. net

This fascinating book covers a practically untouched field, the experiences of the wife of a Royal North-West Mounted Policeman. Mrs. Munday was often the only white woman within a 1,000-mile radius; her companions were Indians, Eskimos, and dogs.

THE SHELDON PRESS, Northumberland Ave., London, W.C.2

And of all Booksellers Please ask for Lists

From Limehouse Through Five Centuries
By J G Birch
(Sheldon Press)

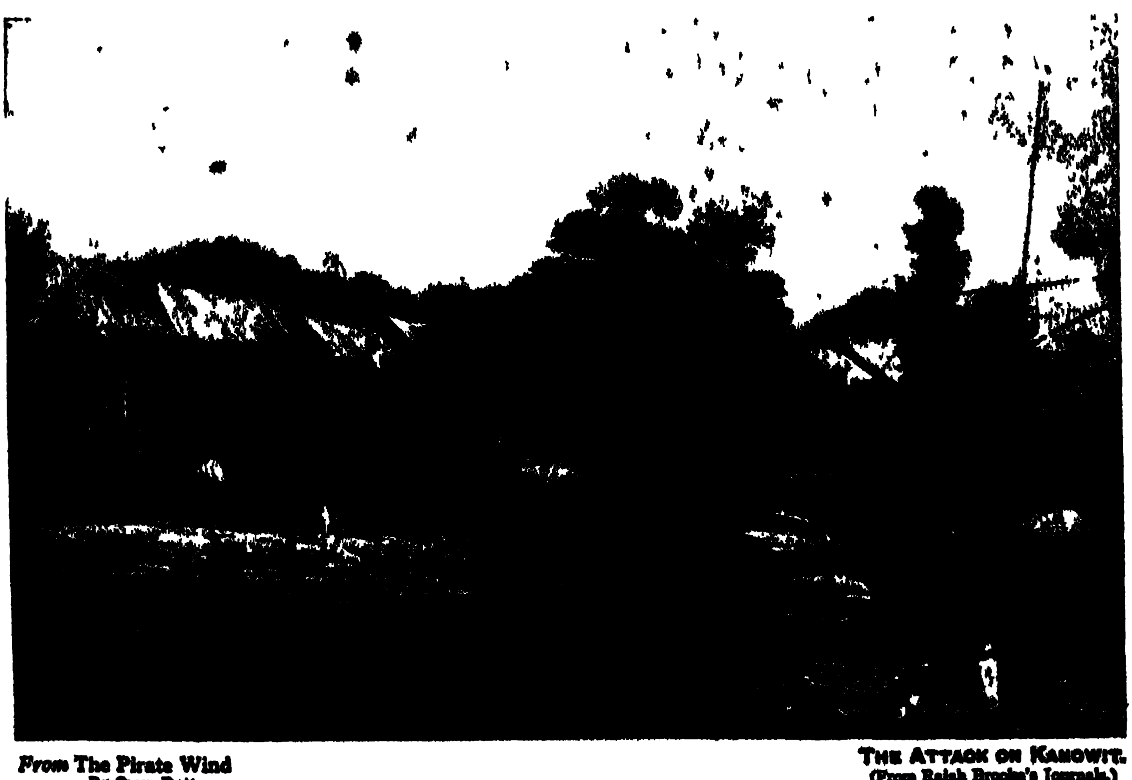
THE REGENT'S CANAL DOCK, 1828.
(T Shephert—G F Harvell, engraver)

LIMEHOUSE THROUGH FIVE CENTURIES

By J G Birch. 3s 6d (Sheldon Press)



Ever since the time when Shakespeare, seeking a term of abuse, coined the phrase "a limb of Limehouse," that district of East London has had its traducers As it has always been connected closely with the sea, and as sailors are apt at times to be lively and disputatious, some of its reputation has certainly been deserved But Mr Birch, who, as Rector, knows the modern neighbourhood very intimately, shows that Limehouse has also played a very worthy and very romantic part in London s history, and has associations with many great and famous names Mr. Birch has told the record of five centuries very interestingly and lucidly, and writes briefly but authoritatively about the Limehouse of to-day He warns us against taking Mr. Thomas Burke's " Limehouse Nights " too seriously. That book, he says, "may be literature, but it is not Limehouse."

THE PIRATE WIND

Tales of the Sea Robbers of Malaya

By Owen Rutter, F R G S Illustrated With Maps
12s 6d (Hutchinson)

Mr Rutter revivifies the grim and ruthless exploits of scarlet mail-clad pirates on the Malayan seas a century ago The shipping of every nation trading in the Eastern seas suffered from the Pirate wind blowing swift war-boats eastwards from a thousand lonely bays. The Americans were more ruthless in reprisals against the pirates than the Europeans, although in Rajah Brooke and Admiral Cochrane the Malayan pirate princes eventually met their match. Dutch, Portuguese, Spaniards and British traders were jointly responsible for demoralising

From The Pirate Wind
By Owen Rutter
(Hutchinson).

THE ATTACK ON KANOWIT.
(From Rajah Brooke's Journals.)

From Corsica the Beautiful
By Major A. Radclyffe Dugmore
(Hurst & Blackett)

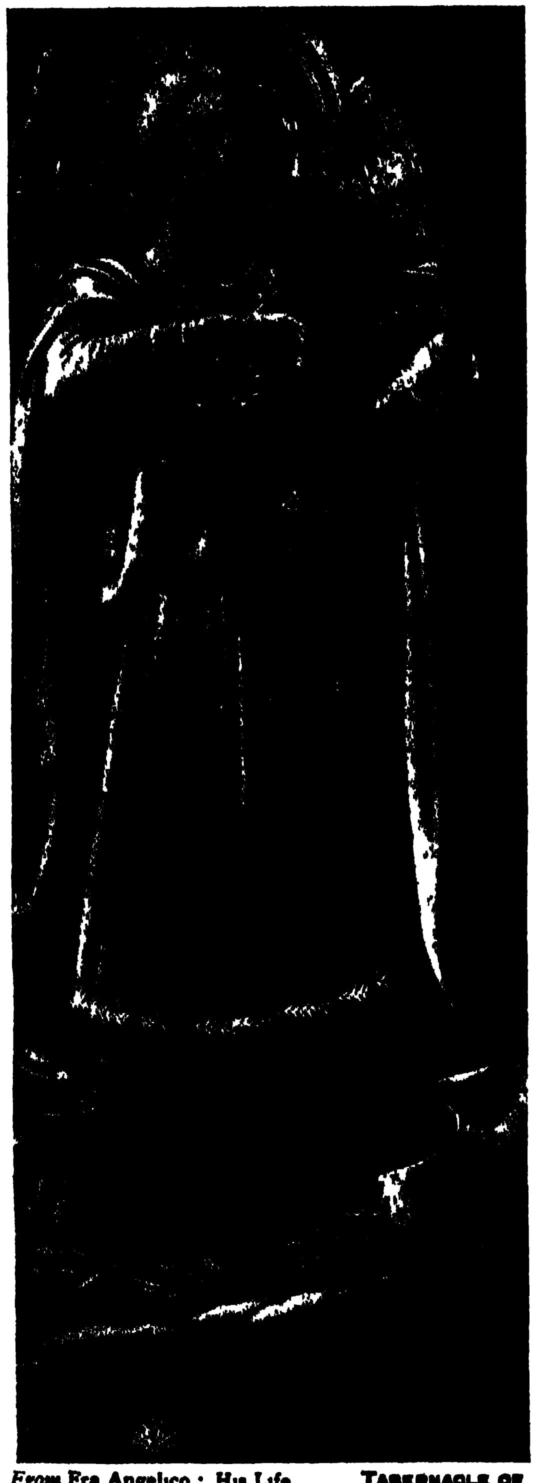
AJACCIO ABOUNDS IN INTERESTING NARROW STREETS AND ARCHES.

the peaceful Malayans by fomenting internal dissensions and disorganising their commercial enterprise. In Mr Rutter's twenty one chapters the rise and fall of the Illanun and Balanini pirate groups is graphically re-constructed from rare chronicles, official sources, and the author's own intimate knowledge of the Archipelago.

CORSICA THE BEAUTIFUL



By Major A. Radclyffe Dugmore, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. 18s. (Hurst & Blackett.)

A painstaking piece of work that gives us a good impression of the island as it is to-day and an accurate account of its chequered history. The attractions offered the tourist are entirely natural: beautiful scenery, grand mountains, jade green rivers. The old unspoilt towns and villages, though architecturally none too beautiful, are important for their historical associations. The Corsicans are an interesting race who seem able to rise to great occasions but unable to keep up any sustained effort in history and commerce. They are too easily satisfied and apparently diffident. Altogether this book makes one wish to visit Corsica to explore its rugged beauty and make the acquaintance of its people. The American sightseer, it appears, has not yet started on Corsica and that fact in itself suggests a recommendation.

THE RIVIERA

Edited by Harry Golding. 5s. (Ward, Lock.)

An entirely new and inexpensive handbook to the Riviera is a treasure for those who already know "The Playground of the World," and those who are contemplating a visit to it. For this book, we think, there will be yet another public, composed of readers who have not been to the Riviera or are not likely to go, but who enjoy reading a book which gives them information and amusement at the same time. While giving full, useful, reliable help as a guide, Mr. Golding's writing is so vivid and at times amusing that, without missing any practical and necessary details, one reads on for the sake of the interest. The maps and plans are clear and helpful, the illustrations are generous and beautiful.

From Fra Angelico: His Life and Work
By Paul Muratoff
(Warne)

TABERNACLE OF THE LINAIUOLI.
(Florence: S. Marco Museum.)

EVELEIGH NASH & GRAYSON

I HOPE THEY WON'T MIND

The anonymous author of this light and racy volume of reminiscences is intimately acquainted with society and the musical world. His unusually acute sense of humour manifests itself in the store of excellent anecdotes which are to be found on almost every page. It is probably the best volume of gossip that has appeared since the publication of that audacious and witty book Uncensored Recollections 12s. 6d.

DUMAS
FATHER AND SON

By Francis Gribble

MARJORIE BOWEN in the Morning Post: "Mr. Gribble makes the lives of father and son an entertaining affair."

Sunday Times: "Mr. Francis Gribble is an excellent critic, an admirable writer, and a most conscientious and trustworthy chronicler." 21s.

THE WIPERS TIMES

Those who served in the Great War should possess a copy of The Wipers Times, an historical document to hand down to their children as a unique record of the wonderful spirit that prevailed in spite of the horrors of 1914–18. 8s. 6d.

Evening Standard: "A real treasure of the war."

WIND DRIVEN

By Jacland Marmur

Times Literary Supplement: "This is Mr. Jacland Marmur's first novel. Mr. Marmur deliberately challenges comparison with Conrad. The similarity of style is so marked that there are portions of dialogue and whole paragraphs that might have been written by Conrad himself. His future work should be worth watching." 7s. 6d.

THE EMPTY HOUSE

By Algernon Blackwood

SHEILA KAYE-SMITH in the Sunday Express: "As good and gruesome a collection of tales as it has been my good fortune to read for a long time."

HUMBERT WOLFE in The Observer: "I have nothing but admiration for his curious and sinister imagination." 7s. 6d.

COMMON TO MAN

By Mary Chisenhale

A new Eastern novel by the author of Man's Love. 7s. 6d.

THE DARK NIGHT

By R. Francis Foster

Another intriguing story by the author of The Moat House Mystery. 7s. 6d.

EVELEIGH NASH & GRAYSON

GOD: IN CHRISTIAN THOUGHT & EXPERIENCE

By the Rev. W. R. MATTHEWS, D.D. 10s. 6d. net

"This is exactly the book that is needed by the educated general reader anxious to follow up for himself the recent pronouncements of the Lambeth Conference. Dr. Matthews has made an important contribution to the most important of subjects and put the Church heavily in his debt."—Week-end Review

MARY BAKER EDDY

By Dr. LYMAN POWELL.

Buckram edition, 20s. net. Leather edition, 30s. net

"Dr. Powell has made a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the life and character of the founder of, perhaps, the most steadily growing Christian religion of our time. . . . Mrs. Eddy stands out in this book as a tremendous Christian warrior."—The Observer

THE REAL STANLEY BALDWIN

By WICKHAM STEED. 7s. 6d. net

"The riddle of a public character has seldom been more engagingly set before its contemporaries than in this book."—The Observer

MOTOR CRUISING

By Commander HAMPDEN. 12s. 6d. net

With a foreword by Lord Jellicoe.

This well-known expert's new book on motor craft and every detail concerned with them is certainly the standard work of information and reference for everyone interested in motor cruising and marine caravanning.

A MERCHANT VENTURER AMONG THE SEA GIPSIES

By LEOPOLD AINSWORTH. 15s. 0d net

Horace Thorogood (in The Evening News) says:—"I read it with delight."

THERE IS A TIDE

By AGNES LOGAN. 7s. 6d. net

"An arresting story—tragic, sordid, dramatic, piteous—but, through all, tenderly human."
Liverpool Post and Mercury

"Miss Logan proceeds to show us how true she can be to life as we know it."—Times Literary Supplement

THE STORY OF MARYAM

Englished by JOHN ANTHONY. 7s. 6d. net

"Mr. Anthony has tapped a very rich vein of humour. It is to be hoped that he will continue to give us more of the same rare quality."
S. P. B. Mais, in The Daily Telegraph

"A book whose flavour is as unusual as it is refreshing."
Times Literary Supplement

PRINCES AND FAIRIES

By STELLA MEAD. 5s. 0d. net

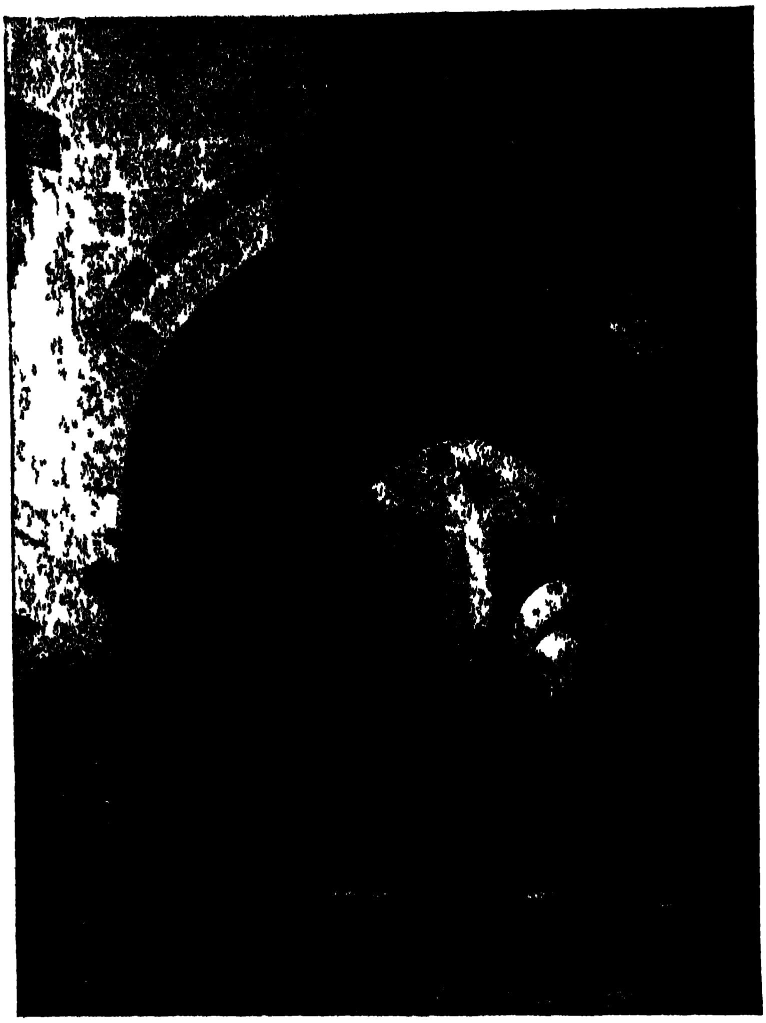
A book for children—but a book of a new kind. It is a collection of new stories worthy to rank with those of Grimm and Hans Andersen, told in a way that is always simple and sincere, but never childish. The illustrations are numerous and excellent. Princes and Fairies is a book that children read with joy and appreciate.



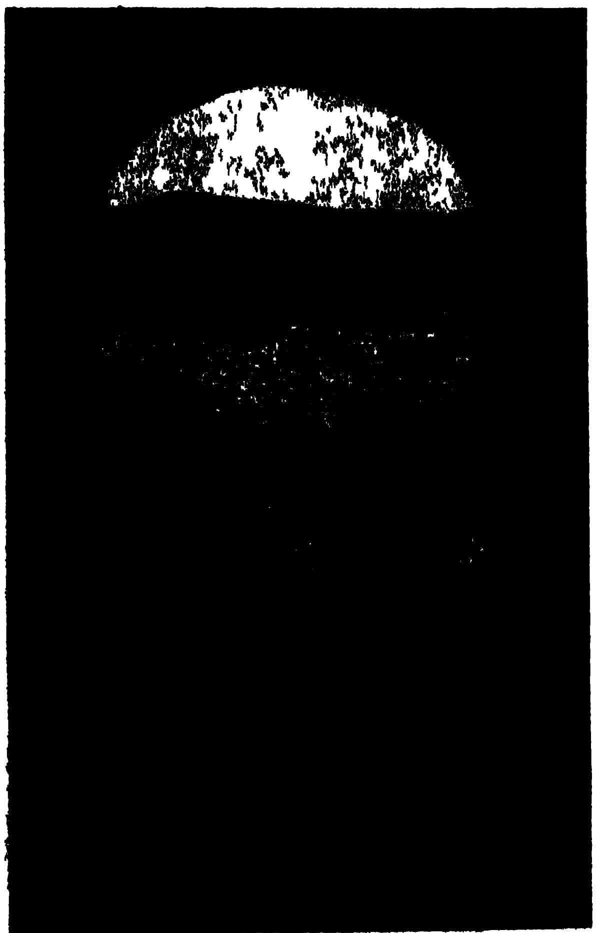
OF ALL BOOKSELLERS

NISBET

ANCIENT JERUSALEM

By James Baikie, DD, FRAS
With illustrations
2s 6d net
(Black)

As we are not all students of divinity, and yet may have a desire to sort out the real growth and history of that wonderful city of Jerusalem, one of the greatest cities of the world, let us at once say that there could scarcely be a clearer, more alive, yet sufficiently detailed account of its development, vicissitudes, glories and destruction than is to be found in this handy volume Page by page is revealed the wonderful story of this fortress on the hills, which grew to such size and splendour under the hands of David and Solomon, and on and on in wickedness, till the mighty Babylonian army sacked it and carried its people away captive and "By the rivers of Babylon" they wept Dr Baikie does not bring his story to a close there however Briefly he tells of the return and of the Jerusalem of Christ s day, and his picturesque and scholarly writing makes all very impressive Some beautiful and striking illustrations are included, four being in colour, by a well-known artist



From Ancient Jerusalem
By James Baikie
(Black)

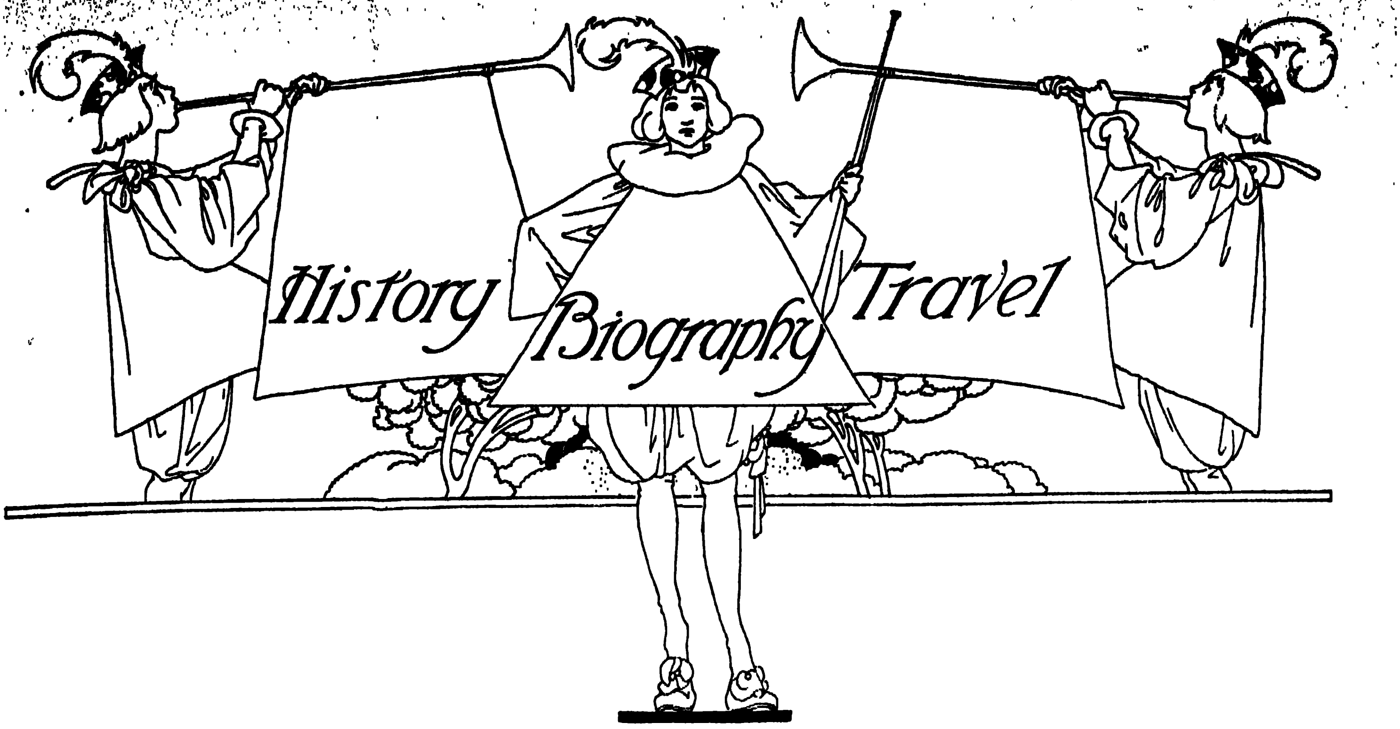
A STREET IN JERUSALEM.

THE FORERUNNERS

By Annie S Swan
3s 6d (Hodder & Stoughton)

Here is a happy idea, competently carried out We have first of all a section entitled St Andrews—Edinburgh, 1670" The middle of the book is concerned with "Moriston—Nithsdale, 1843 ' So far we have had an episode of Covenanting Days and an episode of the days of the Scottish Disruption The final part of the story is taken up with Etaples and France in the late War In all these stories we have a Rackstoun ready to suffer anything in order to keep the Faith, and the difficulties of each succeeding age exhibit the everlasting conflict that rages round the life of the spirit First there is Gilbert Rackstoun, done to death for preaching the pure Word of God then David Rackstoun, his descendant, ready to leave his home and manse on a point of religious belief, and, finally, a second Gilbert Rackstoun of our own days equally full of his duty as a Christian All are finely painted It is a full canvas and a moving story, told with the most sincere spiritual impulse We welcome particularly the part about the Disruption, which so many young folk have never heard of Mr s Burnett Smith has a peculiarly easy and winning style



From The Riviera
(Ward, Lock).

ALASSIO, FROM SANTA CROCE.

From The British Empire
By D. C. Somervell
(Christophers).

SYDNEY COVE IN 1788.

From Chapters of Autobiography
By Mrs. Edgar Dugdale
(Cassell).

ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR (1877).
(From a drawing by George Richmond, R.A.)

DOES ADVENTURE CHANGE US?

"Blenden Hall" By J G Lockhart 10s 6d (Philip Allan)

"New Zealand Memories" By Brenda Guthrie 18s (Bodley Head)

"Under Peruvian Skies" By A Hyatt Verrill 21s (Hurst & Blackett)

"A Merchant Adventurer Among the Sea Gipsies" By Leopold Ainsworth 15s (Nisbet)

"Turkey Yesterday To-day and To-morrow" By Sir Telford Waugh 18s (Chapman & Hall)

"Life on a desert island discloses but does not change the nature of a man His faults and his virtues are shown in a fiercer light The coward, the wastrel and the egoist are branded as such, the man of resolution and character rises above his fellows, and all, good, bad and indifferent, return on their release to the old way of life, no better and no worse than they were in the days before their great adventure

So declares Mr Lockhart, basing his conclusion upon the passengers and crew of the East Indiaman Blenden Hall, London to Bombay, who, after the wreck of their ship in 1821, spent three and a half months on Inaccessible Island, some twenty miles from the lonely Tristan da Cuhna An extraordinarily unpleasant crowd they seem to have been, the crew surly, drunken, mutinous, the passengers (or nearly all of them) domineering cowardly bickering The captain (from the published narrative of whose son Mr Lockhart's story is retold) was gravely to blame for losing his ship in the first instance, though he did his best to repair the offence, he lacked the force of character which would have aroused our sympathy for him in his plight on the island Of the eighty odd souls thus cast ashore in circumstances sufficiently desperate to call forth a man's whole courage and resolution a mere handful acted like men The rest -well Mr Lockhart's story should serve as a tower of strength to cynics and as a very useful corrective to purblind idealists

Is it not truer a truism in fact to say that a man derives from hardship and adventure exactly as much as he puts into it? Take for instance the early settlers in New Zealand, as described by Miss Brenda Guthrie, whose book is concerned with the fortunes of her forbears In a poor and crowded ship her grandfather and his young wife travelled, a little over ninety years ago, to a country primitive, wild, and largely unexplored By dint of determination, persistence, and a high sense of social endeavour, they and their fellows laid the foundations of domestic and commercial life there, which are now bearing such excellent fruit by their adventure they conferred a benefit upon the world Miss Guthrie describes also the lives of her father and her brother– both officers in the New Zealand R A M C – and if her method of narration is occasionally a trifle laboured, her story is without doubt an inspiring one

From Turkey: Yesterday, To-day and To-morrow
By Sir Telford Waugh
(Chapman & Hall)

SCUTARI IN ALBANIA. FORTRESS AND BRIDGE OVER RIVER DRIN.

In Mr Ainsworth and Mr. Hyatt Verrill we meet adventure of a slightly different sort but both, I am certain, would admit to returning from it enhanced in mental stature and strengthened in moral fibre Mr. Verrill, who knows Peru as well as he does his hand, is primarily an archaeologist but he does not stress his

From Sitka
By Barrett Willoughby
(Hodder & Stoughton)

THE VACATION CABIN ON THE SHORES OF JAMESTOWN BAY.

From House of the Temple
By F. W. Ryan
(Burns, Oates & Washbourne).

GENERAL BONAPARTE LANDS AT DOGANA, VALLETTA, 12TH JUNE, 1798, AND IS RECEIVED BY HIS SUPPORTERS IN THE ORDER.

subject too greatly; he gives a wide and wholly admirable picture of Peru and its inhabitants, drawn with fullness and skill out of a genuine love for his subject. I read him—and his is a longish book—in two sittings separated only by the necessity of fortifying the inner man—and that in spite of the unrestful type in which his publishers have thought fit to enshrine his words.

Mr. Ainsworth's narrative, on the other hand, is as clear and honest as the page on which it is printed, indulging in no literary or typographical fantastics. He reveals himself as a survey expert and not a "professional pen driver"; but he loves Malaya, and at the invitation of a merchant—whom incidentally he never saw again—he landed on a formerly uninhabited island in the Mergui Archipelago and there established and supervised a successful saw mill. The majority of his workmen were sea gipsies, Mawken who spend their lives in precarious canoes about the islands, but whom he transformed into efficient workmen on land; he writes of them with real affection, describing their ways of life and something of their methods of thought, and managing to include accounts of magic and snakes and drinking in the Tropics, and an amazing Englishman who lives semi-native as the "Great White Chief." Mr. Ainsworth's book is certainly one which ought to achieve popularity, so fascinating is his tale and so unvarnished and sincere the manner of its telling.

I suppose one can call the diplomatic life adventurous; at least Sir Telford Waugh has the power of making it seem so. Sir Telford spent forty-four years in Turkey, forty-four years which effected profound changes in the character, customs and politics of that country. His book of reminiscences follows the diaries he kept throughout his long period of service—except the chapter which he calls "To-morrow," and in which he estimates "the value of the various factors making for success or failure in the future." It is true that he refuses to prophesy; but of the past he is less cautious—his story, though discreet, is full, entertaining, informative, and lit by streaks of sly humour and gentle irony. From the long adventure of Turkey and diplomacy, Sir Telford has returned with the stature of a shrewd and kindly giant.

Mr. Lockhart will have to look again at human nature.

W. BRANCH JOHNSON.

SITKA

By Barrett Willoughby. 20s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

When San Francisco was little more than an adobe mission, the foundries of Sitka were casting bells and the young Russian colony was establishing a new mode of life in a land more northerly than any the white man had ever settled before. To-day a few buildings, a small parade ground, and an occasional priest of the Orthodox Church are all that is left in Alaska to remind the traveller of the Russian occupation. The Thlingets, the perfidious Indians with whom the Russians fought and traded, are likewise disappearing or surviving only when shorn of their old customs. But the spirits of both remain, and Miss Willoughby has caught and translated them for us with an easy art which must have been difficult in the making. She introduces her tales of Baranov, first Governor of Alaska, of the Potlatch feasts of the Thlingets, and of such modern eccentrics as the Father of Pictures, with a casual meeting, a reminiscence, or a meditation on a tombstone, and each with an easy grace which carries the reader on

From Early Travellers in the Alps
By G. R. de Beer
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

VIEW OF THE GLACIER OF THE RHÔNE, circa 1777.
(Drawn by Besson, engraved by Niquet fils, from de Laborde's "Tableaux Topographiques, Pictoresques," etc., Paris, 1777–80.)

From Memoirs of My Early Life
By the Rt Hon Winston Churchill
(Thornton Butterworth)

MEMBER FOR OLDHAM.

delightedly from tale to tale until at last the picture of a romantic land is complete Combining lightly carried learning and a warm interest in everyday things she has made with them one of the most fascinating books of travel we have had this year

DR. SIDNEY SPENCER BROOMFIELD.
From Kachalola : The Early Life and Adventures of Sidney Spencer Broomfield (Related by Himself)
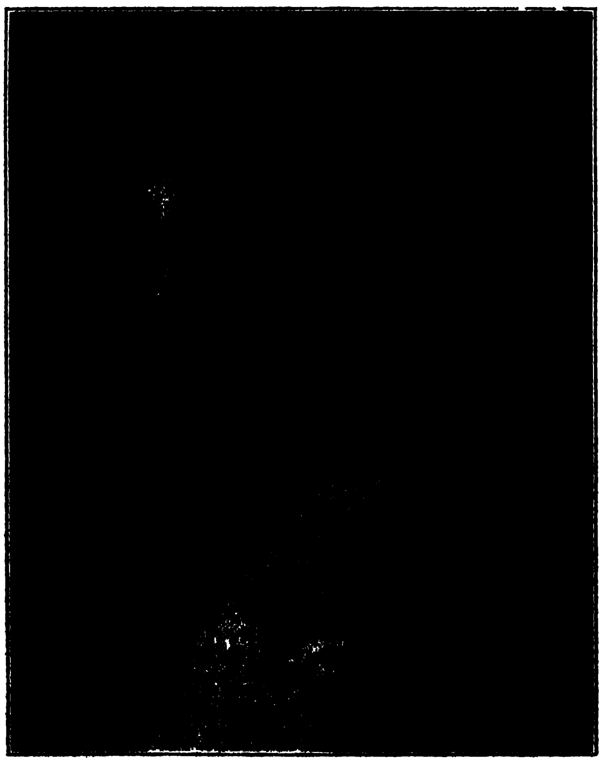
(Davies)

THE MAN THEY COULDN'T ESCAPE

The Adventures of Detective Michael Fiaschetti of the Italian Squad (New York Police)
18s (Selwyn & Blount)



STEINHAUER. THE KAISER'S MASTER SPY

Edited by S T Felstead With Introduction by Admiral Sir W Reginald Hall 18s
(Bodley Head)

These two books, dissimilar in many ways, have a withering candour in common Despite the romantic head lines and resounding adjectives lavished on these careers, the writers leave their readers no illusions If the life of Fiaschetti, told in the most fluent American, appears at first reading to be the Twenty-two Glorious Tales of the Renaissance Bravo turned New York Crime Cop, an alternative sub-title speedily suggests itself : " The Bleak Epic of the Stool Pigeon " Fiaschetti was for sixteen years leader of a special squad dealing with Black Hand cases, and six more years chief of the Italian Squad. He made over one thousand arrests, covered the most celebrated crimes, and sent twelve men to the electric chair. In 1920 he visited Italy in disguise and penetrated the inner circles of the Camorra. Bombs, cocaine fiends, gangsters, cryptograms, Fiaschetti, with the hard jaw and love for the opera, knows all about that He can tell, too, an amusing tale of his French colleague and the poignant tale of the murderer who shouldn t have gone to the chair, just to prove he likes a joke and has a heart But he speaks with amazing frankness about his methods " The commonest way to detect crime is to trade freedom for information It beats the cigar ashes and green whiskers all hollow " Though his matter is excellent, his vocabulary and personality are even more fascinating He sums up the world Everybody's stealing Everybody s shouting

Gustave Steinhauer, guiding spirit of German Secret Service in England, 1900–1914, takes his melodramatic nickname with a non committal modesty He also mentions his not unfriendly acquaintance with the late William Le Queux But he had little to learn from that colourful sensationalist, although he does destroy the legend of the ubiquitous and well paid German spy He describes his operations in Great Britain, mainly on naval espionage, and his accounts of his adventures in Scotland, June, 1914, are particularly vivid and absorbing There are, in addition many glimpses of romance, treachery and terror, with close character studies of the spies of all nations The second part of his memoirs is a straightforward and unflattering picture of the ex-Kaiser whom he served as officer and bodyguard for many year

DESMOND RYAN

From The World I Used to Know, 1860–1912
By Frau Marie von Bunsen
(Thornton Butterworth).

FRAU MARIE VON BUNSEN.

From Mayerling By Claude Anet (Hutchinson). RUDOLPH.

MAYERLING:

The Love and Tragedy of a Crown Prince

By Claude Anet
10s 6d
(Hutchinson)

Truth is proverbially stranger than fiction, and few novels could surpass in human interest and excitement this record of an actual romance and tragedy, culminating in the shooting-lodge at Mayerling in 1888, when the Austrian Heir-Apparent, Prince Rudolph, shot his seventeen-year-old lover, Baroness Marie Vetsera, and then committed suicide Of the interplay of character and circumstance that led up to this tragedy, with its redeeming element of loyalty, Mr Ault writes after a thorough survey of all the available facts, and his style is vivid and moving without violating due restraint

A HISTORY OF RUSSIA

By N Brian Chaninov
8s 6d
(Dent)

M. Chaninov's history is a serviceable work which, while not always in proportion, gives as fair an impression of the chequered course of Russian history as could well be done within so small a compass. Starting from the premise that Russian civilisation has never blossomed to the full—a premise which can be admitted only if one ignores the literary and artistic renaissance of the nineteenth century—he gives a good account of the early town-republics, and then passes rapidly over the Tartar invasion and the "time of trouble" to the reign of Peter the Great. To Peter he does full justice, as he does in slighter measure to Ivan the Terrible—another monarch whom recent historians have somewhat rehabilitated. But it is not until he comes to the women who ruled in Russia in the eighteenth century that he enters wholeheartedly into the spirit of his subject Around Elizabeth and Catherine the Great he has drawn a picture of Russian life in the eighteenth century which is at the same time a picture of Russian life, as he sees it, in all times It is not of course a complete picture. M Chaninov seems to be one of those Russians whose faith has been impaired by the events of the Revolution. But it is a true one, and one which every Englishman who would understand the Russia of to-day should know

From Mayerling By Claude Anet (Hutchinson). MARY.

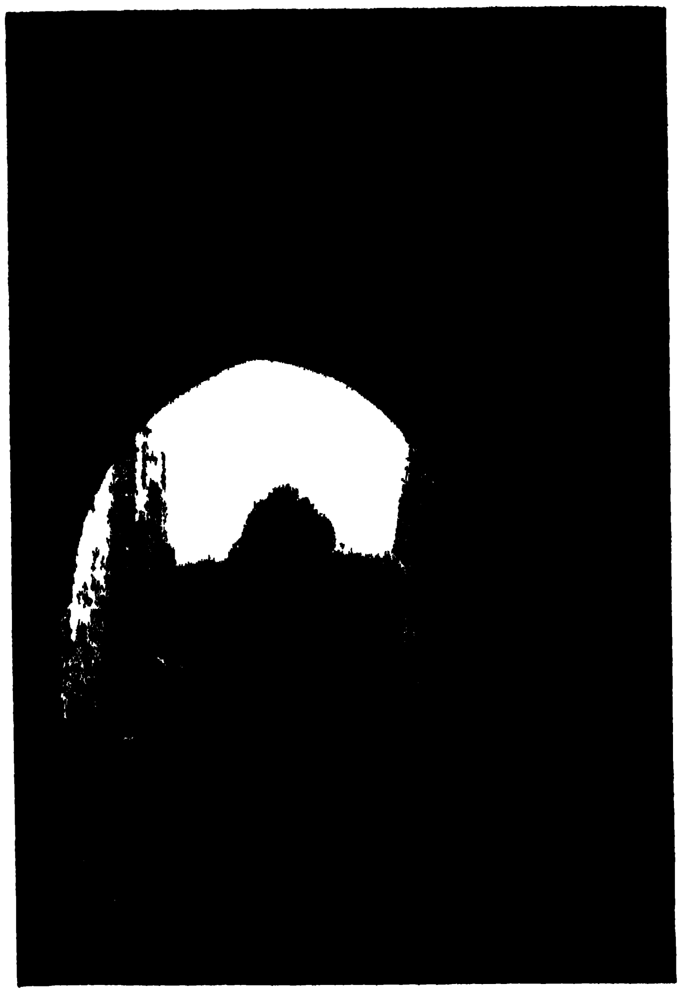
From The Royal Navy By Geoffrey Parratt (Sheldon Press). ADMIRAL JELLICOE.

FAMOUS SEA-FIGHTERS

By C L Lewis
10s 6d
(Harrap)



Though many people believe that our sophisticated youth have lost the taste for adventure stories, publishers' obviously do not. For once more in Mr. Lewis's book we have stories of life and adventure on the High Seas. "Famous Sea-Fighters" is a collection of the adventures of famous admirals and sea-rovers We may think that yarns of the sea have been exploited to the utmost limit; Mr. Lewis proves otherwise In his book we have a wider range than usual. His characters are not all Englishmen. They include Roman, Viking French, Austrian and Japanese.

Of course, no story dealing with the sea would be complete without its Drake and Nelson, and this book is no exception The author deals very fully with our national heroes, not provocatively, but not in any way dully. The whole book is pleasant and easy reading.

From Arabian Peak and Desert
By Ameen Rihani
(Constable)

SANA, THE COURT AND FOUNTAIN OF THE HOUSE WE OCCUPIED

From Life of Jesus
By Basil Mathews
(Oxford University Press)

TWO WOMEN CREPT OUT LIKE SHADOWS FROM THE CITY TO THE ORCHARD.

From The Messiah Jesus and John the Baptist
By Robert Eisler
(Methuen)

THE SLEB, A TRIBE OF WANDERING CRAFTSMEN OF SYRIA AND ARABIA.
(So-called from the mark of the cross (Salib) on their foreheads.)

From Wanderings in Wildest Africa
By Dugald Campbell
(R.T.S.).

THE TRANS-SAHARAN POSTMAN.

EARLY TRAVELLERS IN THE ALPS.

By G. R. de Beer. 10s. 6d. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

A large number of people will be going out to the Alps within the next few weeks, and they all ought to read this

From Sam Pollard
By Walter Pollard
(Seeley, Service).

SHOEING A HORSE IN THE BED OF A RIVER.

book to still their grumblings and help them to count their blessings. When they are in their sumptuous hotels they may remember the unfortunate tourists of 1545 who had to sleep in a fowlhouse, and the unhappy experience of John Evelyn, the diarist, who a century later occupied a bed recently vacated by a smallpox patient. The discomforts of travel nowadays are trivial indeed compared with those of earlier days, and this record, illustrated

From Early Travellers in the Alps
By G. R. de Beer
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

VIEW OF GRINDELWALD, circa 1700.
(Drawn by Meyer, engraved by Zingg, from Gruner's "Eisgebirge des Schweizerlandes," Berne, 1760.)

From The Story of Fergie Bey
Told by Himself and some of His Friends
(Macmillan).

"I ALSO HAD MY HOUR."

with reproductions of contemporary woodcuts and engravings, is of singular interest.

THE STORY OF FERGIE BEY

Told by Himself and Some of His Friends

18s. (Macmillan.)

As a District Commissioner employed by the Sudan Government, Captain Fergusson did wonderful work among the wild tribes, identifying himself particularly with the Nuers. He had inherited an aptitude for medical and surgical work which came in extraordinarily useful, and his unselfishness, optimism and capacity for hard work made him popular wherever he went. Owing to treachery he was murdered by the Nuers in 1927. This is his story, gathered from his own journal and other sources—an inspiring story of a full life gallantly spent.

THE LIFE OF A LONDON BEAK

By H. L Cancellor.
With a Foreword by Sir Chartres Biron
Illustrated 18s (Hurst & Blackett)

Mr Cancellor had a very wide experience of life on the London Bench at Marylebone, Thames and Marlborough Street Police Courts These memoirs, written during a busy life, were interrupted by death a few months after his retirement in August, 1929 A thoughtful mind, a humane reformer, and a conscientious magistrate are unconsciously reflected in these restrained but informative pages Part One is occupied with personal recollections of the first seven years as a Beak, Part Two with such problems as gamblers, husbands and wives, poor prisoners, children, fraudulent persons, betting laws and the Boys' Garden Colony at Basingstoke, Part Three with the good judges' friends and colleagues incidental to fifteen years' varied experience

ARTHUR KIPPS, ESQ.
(From a sketch by H G Wells)
From H. G. Wells
By Geoffrey West
(Gerald Howe)

From The Life of a London Beak
By H L Cancellor
(Hurst & Blackett).

SIR JAMES FITZ-JAMES STEPHEN.
(From a sketch by the late Sir Frank Lockwood, Q.C.)

The book has an apt title for, although witty stories abound and famous cases are recalled, the actual duties and methods of a magistrate and his daily unravelling of tragic tangles in London life are here minutely described and have the greater prominence

OUT OF THE DEPTHS

By Joseph Hocking
7s 6d (Ward, Lock)

This daring plot, in which an ex-convict out in a rough mining district of South Africa suddenly takes the place of a parson about to proceed to a Cornish parish, is triumphantly pulled off One might have thought that even in Mr Hocking's experienced hands the whole business might have been rather too improbable to be swallowed. Not at all! The reader, fascinated at the idea of a convinced unbeliever arriving to wear a dead man's shoes, reads on, enthralled. Treleaven, at the death of Barcroft so suddenly out there in the wilds, is resolved to become respectable again, and snatches eagerly at the idea of impersonating the man who has just passed over. How he carried through the services, preached, visited the dying, is all told with spirit and conviction.

From Dumas : Father and Son
By Francis Gribble
(Nash & Grayson)

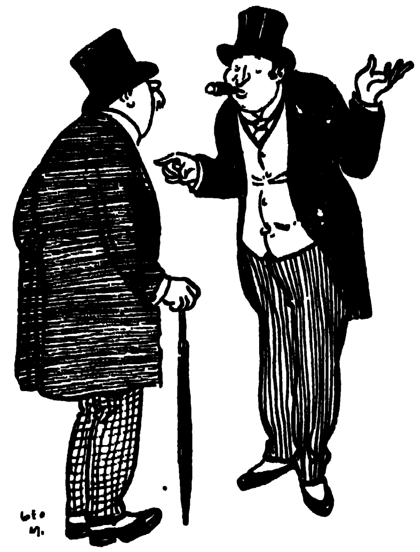
ALEXANDRE DUMAS PÈRE (1840).



BARRINGTON PICKING THE POCKET OF J. BROWN, ESQ., OF BRANDFORD.
From The Prince of Pickpockets
By R. S Lambert
(Faber & Faber).

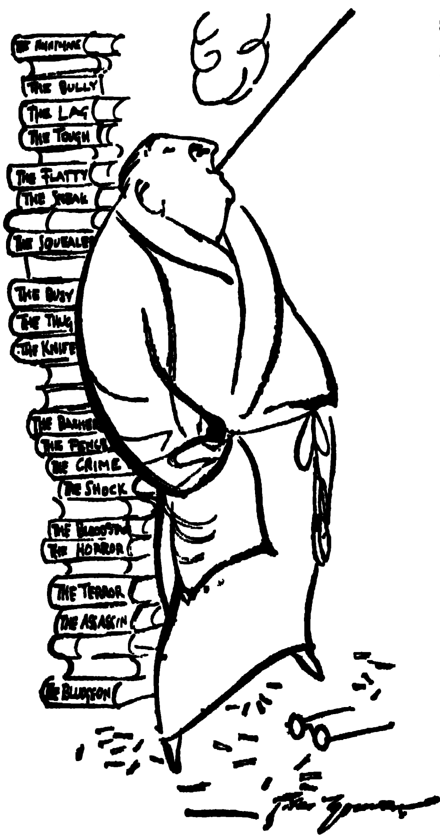
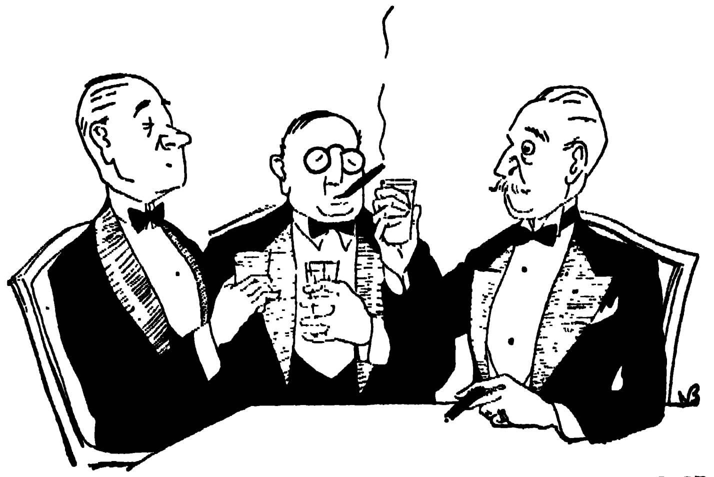
which Mr. West quotes freely, lighten up the story of his early struggles, which are related in the most fascinating detail. The later life of Wells the successful novelist, pamphleteer and prophet, almost, though never quite, degenerates into a list of books, but it ends with a shrewd appraisement. Mr. West glosses over nothing. Complimentary and uncomplimentary stand side by side, and he does not spare the rather painful relation of Mr. Wells's war-time jingoism. The general impression of the book is, as it should be, of the greatness and exceeding vitality of the man. It mav well be called a sketch, for there has been incident enough in Wells's life for volumes. Certainly the complete portrait will never be written without Mr. West's book as its foundation.

From The Conversations of Dr. Johnson Edited by R. W. Postgate (Knopf). TALKING EARNESTLY, IN A KIND OF CONFIDENTIAL WHISPER.



From Wisdom for the Wise By A. P. Herbert (Methuen). THE FINANCIER.

H. G. WELLS: A SKETCH FOR A PORTRAIT

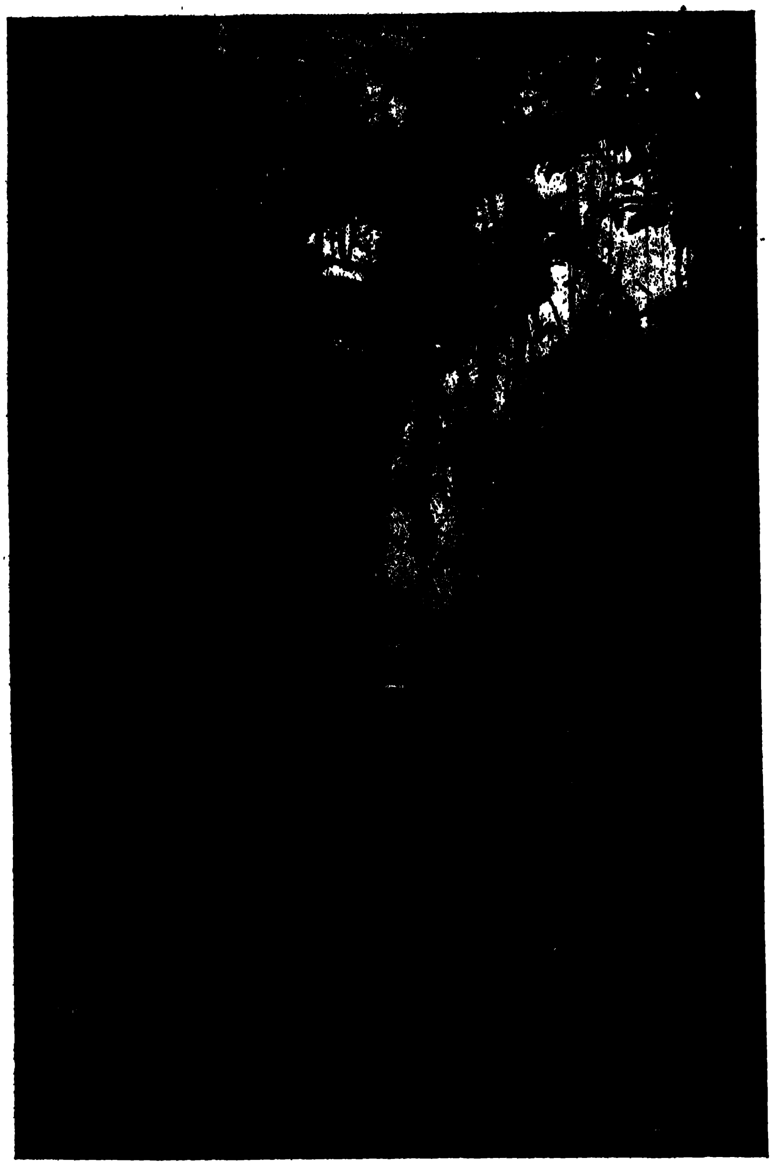


By Geoffrey West. 10s. 6d. (Howe.)

For this book, the first full study of his life, Mr. Wells has given every assistance, though, as he says in his introduction to himself, he sees no reason "why the particulars of an author's life need to be recorded." His brother, Mr. Frank Wells, and many others, particularly his close friend, Mr. Arnold Bennett, have also given freely of information and letters; and the result is one of those irritatingly absorbing books that must be read at a sitting until the fire is out and the hour decidedly a.m.

Wells must be a delightful correspondent. The vigour and fun of his letters,

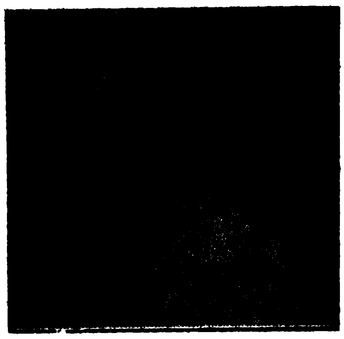
From Meet These People By Reginald Arkell (Herbert Jenkins). "I LIKE EDGAR WALLACE IN SPITE OF HIS BOOKS."



From New Cautionary Tales By H. Belloc (Duckworth). AT WASHINGTON. INSTEAD OF WINE THEY GIVE YOU WATER FROM THE SPRING WITH LUMPS OF ICE FOR FLAVOURING.

THOSE PEOPLE

"Meet These People." By Reginald Arkell. With caricatures by Bert Thomas. Revised and enlarged edition. 3s. 6d. (Jenkins.)



Mr. Arkell's comments on celebrities of all kinds in his charming and disarming verse and Mr. Thomas's brilliant drawings have made this book something of a classic. Every page sparkles with fun and, for those who have the misfortune not to know it, we can recommend no more lively Christmas book to "self."

From Amazon and Andes
By Kenneth G. Grubb
(Methuen).

THE BRAZILIAN FOREST.

amusing to consider how this rather solemn son of an entirely reckless father turned a love affair of his own into a kind of moral lesson in which it is the duty of a lady of pleasure to sacrifice herself on behalf of French male nobility.

MISS MARJORIE LAURIE,
Who has now completed the translation of the Works of Guy de Maupassant (Werner Laurie).

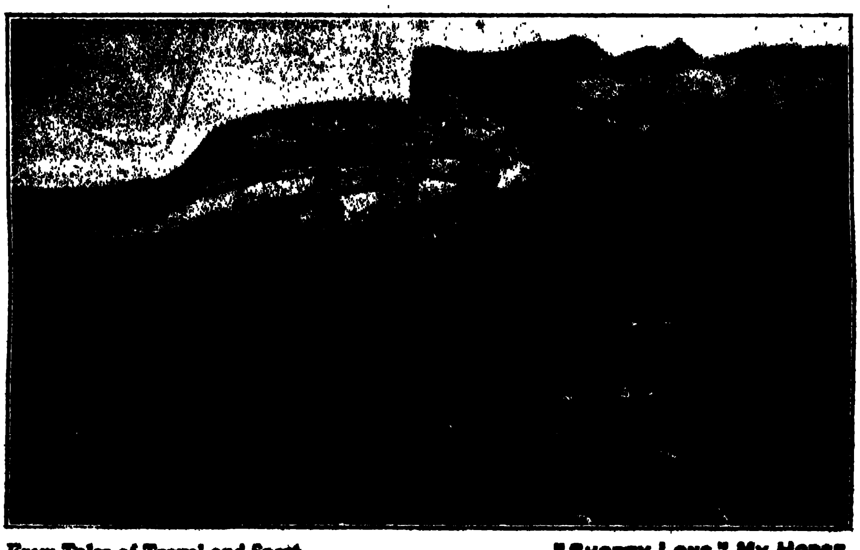
ROC

By Edmund Vale. 6s. (Dent.)

By this fanciful conceit, temperate and unsentimental, the vogue of the dog in literature stands a good chance of being re-established. Roc is an Irish setter and the story "gives a dog's-eye view of battle-fields, back areas, British soldiers, and French peasants." The author is gifted with a fine feeling for historic scene, and for the strange, sad poetry of desolation. The hare chase with the dog's illusion of freedom, the dramatic incident of the lone dog's visit to no-man's town, culminating in the word picture of the burning church, rival the imaginative power embodied in the description of the ghost dog in searing brevity. A skilful touch here and there forces the narrative out of the sombre key of death—the spacious plain of Douai, "a scene of great beauty, and yet it was sinister, so sinister that he could not recall a single work of art that could equal it in this respect."



MISS JOAN CONQUEST
Author of "The Reckoning"
(Werner Laurie).

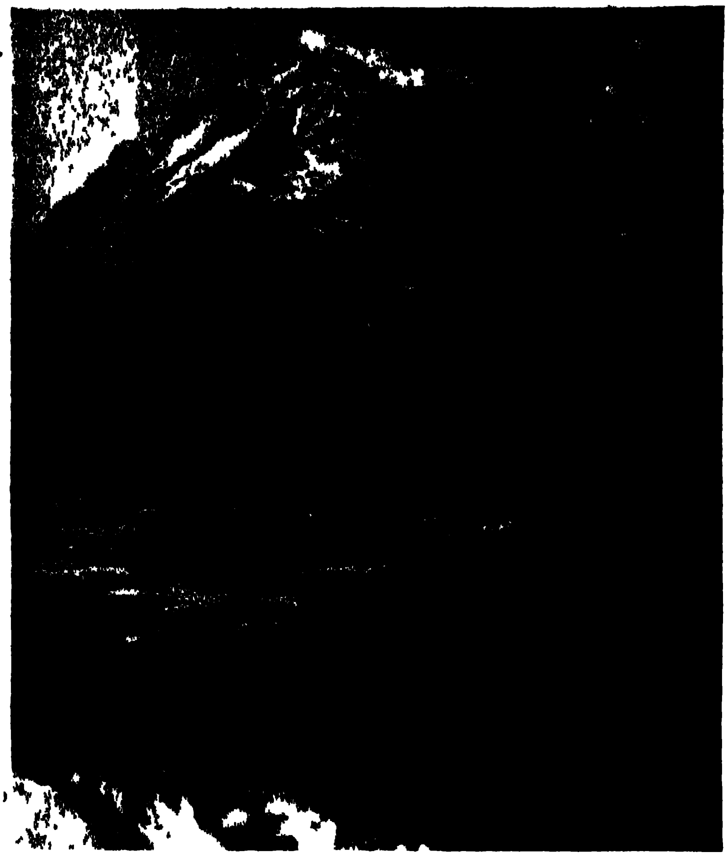
DUMAS FATHER AND SON

By Francis Gribble. 21s. net. (Nash & Grayson.)

The laughing glory of Dumas the elder, the literary fame of his more circumspect son, and the prowess of that Munchausen-like mulatto, grandfather General Dumas, are delightfully recorded by a loving and slightly ironic hand. This is one of Mr. Gribble's finest achievements in biography. In one very circumstantial chapter, the partnership between Dumas père and his business associate, Maquet, is told in detail. One is convinced that Maquet did a great deal of the immense work credited to the more famous pen; but is Mr. Gribble right in stating decidedly that Maquet "devised the stories and wrote them," leaving Dumas to make paraphrases, put in incidents and supply unlimited padding? That is claiming rather much for the lesser Frenchman. In the outlines of the life of Dumas fils the whole story of "The Lady of the Camellias" from its inception in life is fully detailed, with the transmutation of Marie Duplessis, the notorious courtesan, into the tender and high-souled Marguerite Gauthier. It is



From Tales of Travel and Sport
By Major P. M. Stewart
(Thornton Butterworth)

"SHORTY LONG," MY HORSE WRANGLER IN ALBERTA.

GOLDSEEKERS AND BUSHRANGERS IN NEW ZEALAND

By J. R. Elder. 3s 6d (Blackie)

From Goldseekers and Bushrangers in New Zealand
By John Rawson Elder
(Blackie)

MOUNT TUTOKO, MILFORD TRACK, SOUTHLAND, SOUTH ISLAND.
(New Zealand Government Publicity Photo.)

In five full and documented chapters John Rawson Elder, Professor of History in the University of Otago, New Zealand, tells the romantic, thrilling and sometimes sombre epic of early gold-mining and bushranging in a far dominion Prospectors, scientists, settlers and miners in the forties and sixties of the last century endured and dared much to found the young colony's prosperity. As the pioneers are here revealed their spirit, adventures, hardships and devotion surpassed all fiction in a constant round of peril, frequent disappointment and occasional ultimate reward Four chapters cover the Coromandel Thames, Nelson, Westland, Otago and West Coast goldfields and their sturdy explorers and conquerors The concluding chapter deals with the rare but dark episodes of robbery under arms in New Zealand's history The villainy of Burgess and his gang is a melodramatic contrast to the manly adventures of camp and bush the writer so well depicts

BERTRAM ATKEY,
Author of "The House of Strange Victims"
(Appleton)

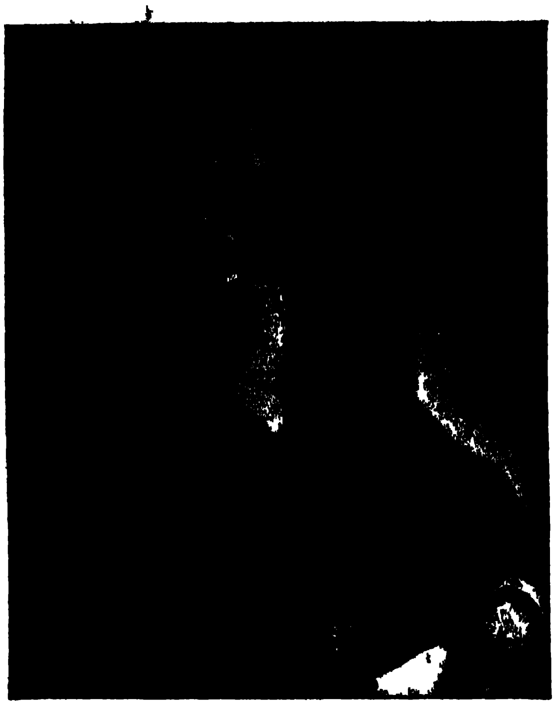
THE LETTERS OF TWO FISHERMEN



By Hugh Copley Illustrated 6s (Warne)

Angling experiences in West Africa and on English rivers have been used by the author in this pleasantly written little book to construct a series of sixteen letters between two young engineers One correspondent relates adventures on West African coasts and seas The other remains in England. But the common interest deepens as the correspondence grows and in a very readable form the reader can learn much about the art of catching fish, from landing pike to battling with sharks and other deep-sea monsters Mr Copley claims the sea-fishing possibilities of the West Coast of Africa are even to this day practically unknown and unexplored There is an appendix on suitable fishing-tackle for anglers the author's enthusiasm persuades to explore tropical waters, and twelve excellent plates.

From The Letters of Two Fishermen
By Hugh Copley
(Warne).

A BRIDGE IN NORTHERN NIGERIA.

From A Basketful of Memories
By Thomas Okey
(Dent)

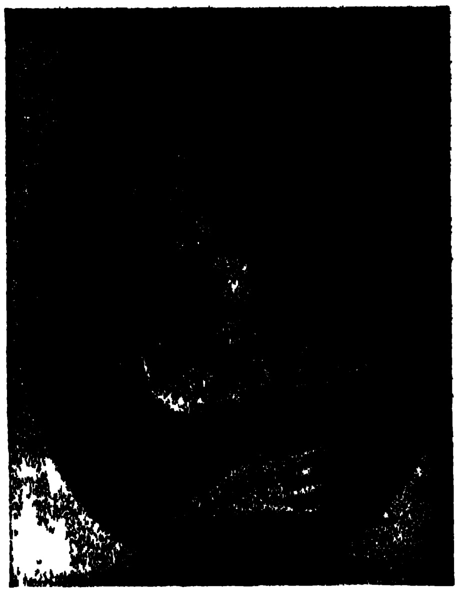
THOMAS OKEY.
(From the painting by Sir George Clausen.)

FROM SCOTLAND'S PAST



By J G Fyfe 6s (Heath Cranton)

A thoroughly readable book is a treasure for anyone to light upon, and that is what we have here in these chapters on the high events of Scotland's history It would be good if more of history could be taught, in a general way, by so entertaining a method, for Mr Fyfe's work is trustworthy and clear as well as attractive Like most good Scots he begins with the Queen, Mary, and her troublous life, begins indeed with Andrew Lang's striking words, "For Mary men poured out their blood like water She was more to them than a woman; she was a religion, an ideal" The chapters lead on to the attempt on King James's life, lured by the pot of gold, and on, with many a side piece of history, to the days of Prince Charlie, and that disastrous ending. The past lives again in the hands of this skilled narrator

HIGHWAY INTO SPAIN

By Marcel Aurousseau 21s (Peter Davies)

"Highway into Spain," by Marcel Aurousseau, is fruit from a different tree; it is, to put it briefly, "a stream of consciousness" travel book of a walking trip from Paris to Madrid, a trip which lasted for some fifty days The descriptions of the countryside and of the people met en route are well done and convincing; it is a leisurely work, even as it was a leisurely excursion, and the author finds material enough for seven hundred pages This reviewer can only say, so subjective is the book, that if this is the sort of thing you like, you will like this sort of thing.

ELIZABETH CLAYPOLE.
From a miniature by Samuel Cooper
(Copyright of the Duke of Devonshire)
From Studies in Cromwell's Family Circle
By R W Ramsey
(Longmans).

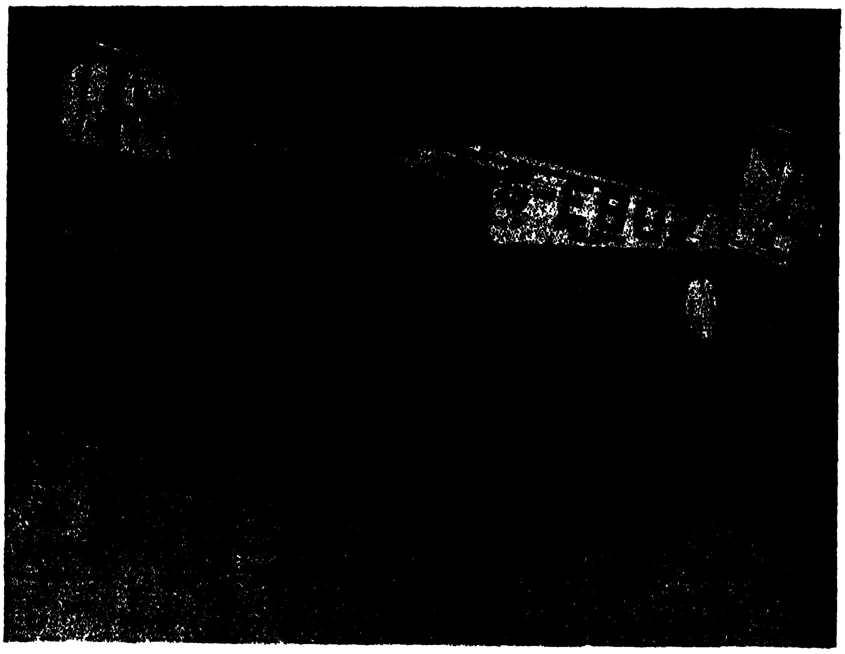
THE ADVENTURE OF PAUL OF TARSUS

By Rev H. F B. Mackay 7s 6d. (Philip Allan)

Biographies of Paul are many, but the story will always bear retelling by anyone who can strike the old keys with a new touch This Mr. Mackay can certainly do He recounts the tale as one of splendid adventure, and so it should be told. Thus it gets a kindling and arresting quality which more pedestrian "Lives" often lack The author's personal knowledge of the East enables him to paint vivid pictures of the Pauline itineraries. Besides this, he has that power—so dangerous if not kept under control, so helpful if disciplined—of getting inside the character of his man, and thus revealing not only the exterior, but the soul. Altogether a very fine book, and one from which even those who already know the mere facts of Paul's career from beginning to end will learn much.



From Byrd's Great Adventure
By F Trevelyan Miller
(Stanley Paul).

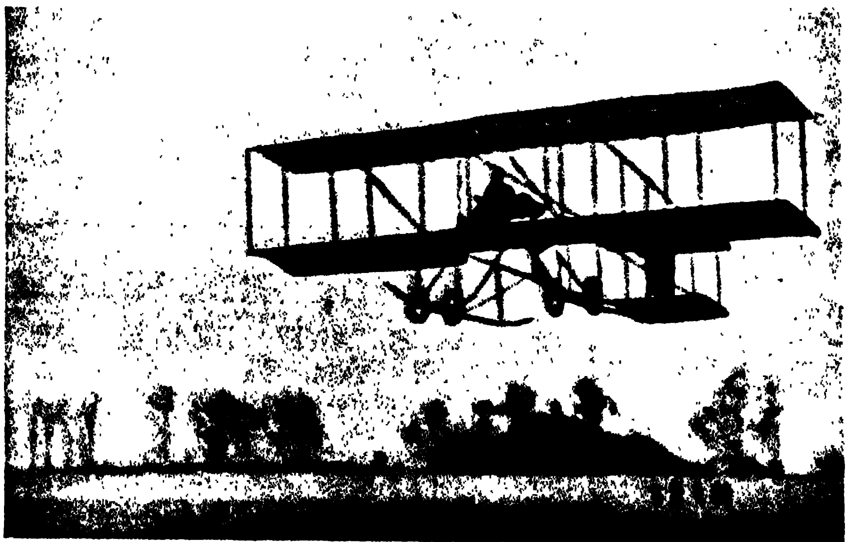
BYRD'S MOTHER AND HER FAMOUS SON.

THE ROMANCE OF A MODERN AIRWAY



By Harry Harper.
6s. (Sampson Low.)

The introduction to this volume gives a poignant note of tragedy. It is from the pen of Air Vice-Marshal Sir Sefton Brancker, who, as director of Civil Aviation, lost his life in R101. In the concluding paragraph he welcomes the work " as an additional means of educating the British Public to the great possibilities of commercial aviation, and its vital importance to our future as a nation." Mr. Harper divided his book into four sections ; A Peep into the Past ; A Modern Airway Station ; Wonders of Airway Progress ; Thrills and Delights of Airway Travels. As a reference book on modern aviation it is excellent. The hundred admirable photographic illustrations are a very considerable aid to the digestion of the reading matter.

From The Romance of a Modern Airway
By Harry Harper
(Sampson Low).

AIR PASSENGERS FROM PARIS ALIGHTING AT CROYDON.

From Flying
By Claude Grahame-White
(Chatto & Windus).

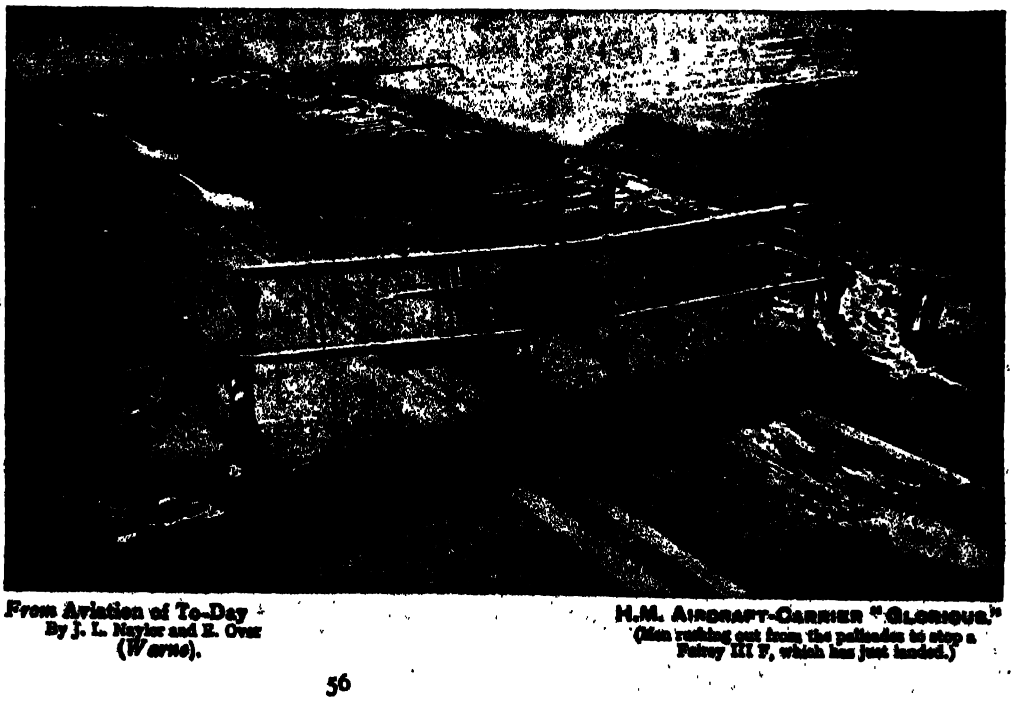
MR GRAHAME-WHITE ASCENDING ON HIS FIRST ATTEMPT TO FLY FROM LONDON TO MANCHESTER IN APRIL, 1910.

FLYING



By Claude Grahame-White. 12s. 6d.
(Chatto & Windus.)

In this book we have one of the best non-technical works on the development of aviation. The author is very well fitted for his task.

He was one of the great pioneers of English flying and in the Great War did great service as a pilot and instructor. Yet the book is in no sense a reminiscence. It is the history of aviation up to the present day and a forecast for the future. It is the latter which proves most interesting. Mr. Grahame-White carefully points out that, with international conditions and regulations as they are, the "development of long distance commercial flying will have little or no chance. He suggests a board of international air control, functioning in connection with the League of Nations.

Another chapter of great significance is that dealing with airships. The author, writing without any bias, compares the progress made by the giant airship to that of the aeroplane and arrives at the conclusion that, whatever the case for the airship there is a stronger one for the aeroplane, which will serve us better in the long run than any airship could possibly do.

The other parts of the book are all excellent : interesting and well written. The illustrations are remarkable and the book is a worthy acquisition for any library.

From Aviation of To-Day
By J. L. Naylor and E. Over
(Warne).

H.M. AIRCRAFT-CARRIER "GLORIOUS."
(Men rushing out from the palisades to stop a Fairey III F, which has just landed.)

THE SECRET VALLEY

By Nicholas Size With illustrations 2s 6d net. (Warne)

"The Real Romance of Unconquered Lakeland" is the sub-title of this book, and it will come as a surprise to many readers to learn that while all the other counties of England were held in the iron grip of William the Conqueror, Cumberland and Westmoreland defied him Not only did they defy him, but they kept themselves fed by mysteriously capturing the convoys of food that came up as far as Carlisle for the use of the baffled armies of the Norman It is a fine, proud story that Mr Size tells embellishing a little here and there, but never falsifying the chronicle The illustrations are fascinating, showing a bit of country well worth defending Mr Hugh Walpole has added an appreciative and sympathetic foreword Lakeland will have many a new visitor, we prophesy, after the reading of this book

From The Secret Valley By Nicholas Size (Warne)

WILD FIGHTING COUNTRY ON THE STYHEAD.

From Paterson of Hebron By W Ewing (Clarke)

HEBRON

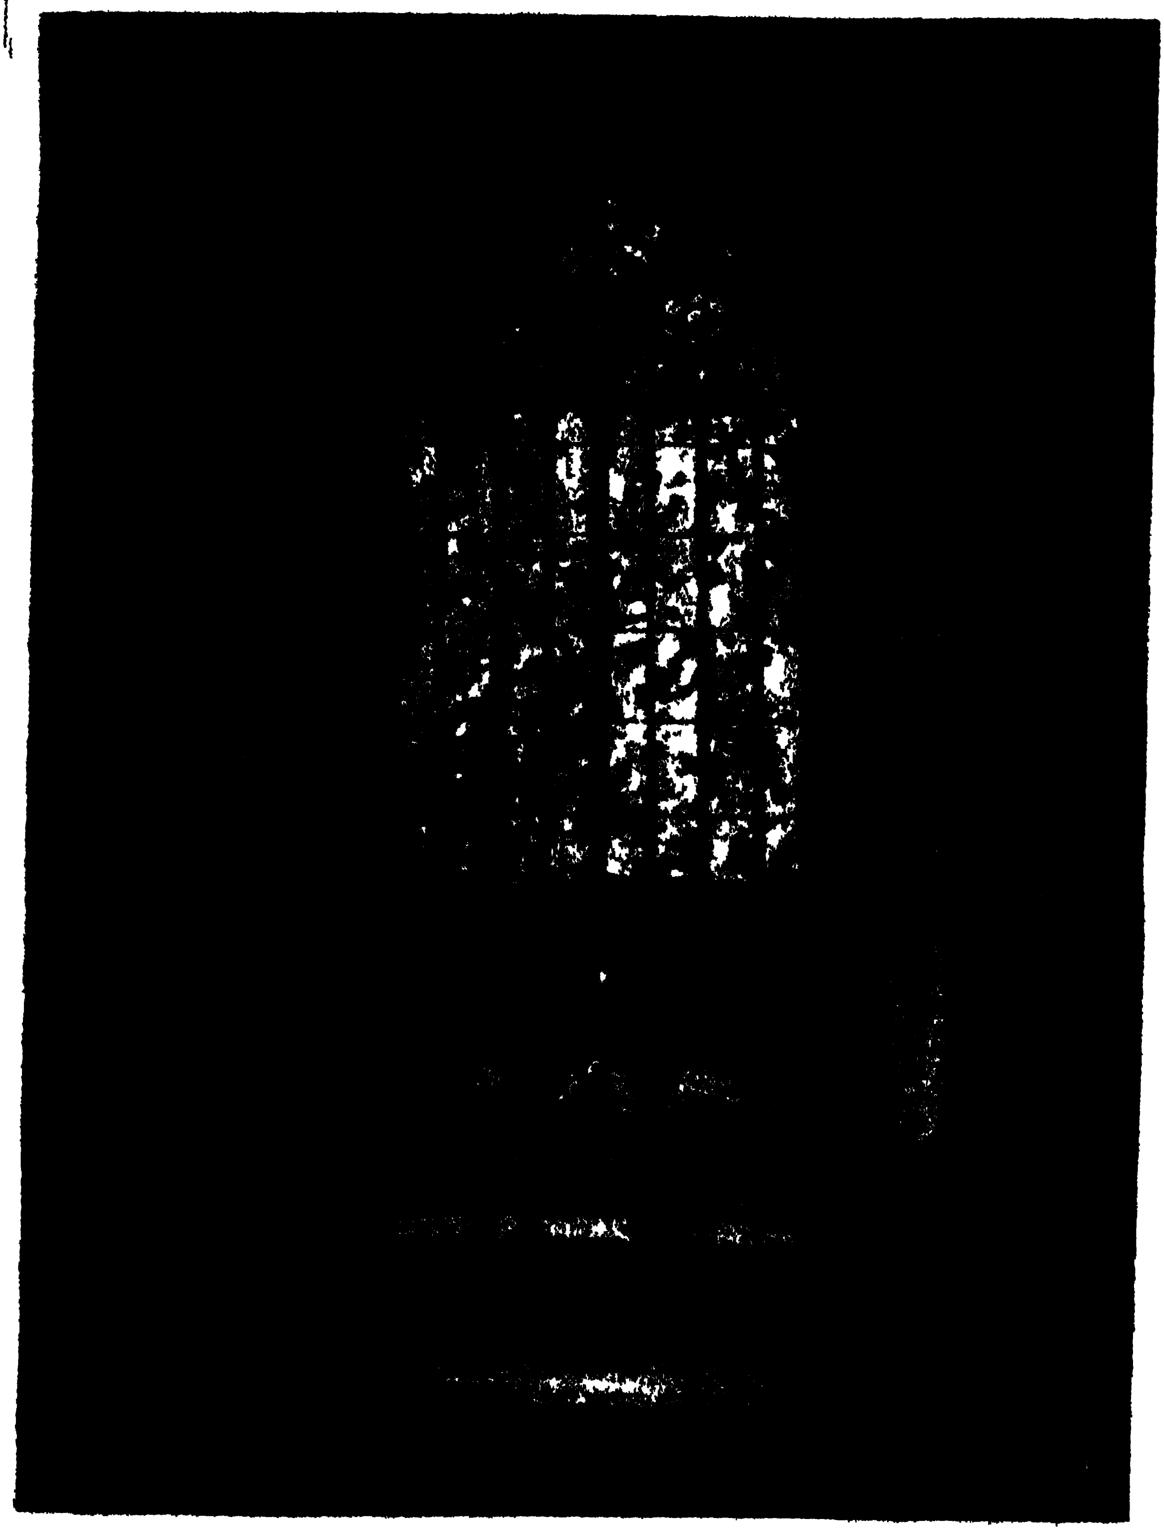
PATERSON OF HEBRON

By W. Ewing, M C, D D 8s 6d (Clarke)

The noble story of a noble gentleman who, through his devoted and unsleeping labours brought light and comfort to many who suffered in the grey old city of Hebron. Dr Paterson, a Scottish missionary, went to Hebron first in 1893 and left it in 1922. His medical skill took him into countless homes, he had thoroughly mastered the common speech and could gauge the subtle workings of the Eastern mind We are all aware how great have been the troubles and ferment in the vexed land of Palestine Dr Paterson was able constantly to give good counsel to those in authority and his influence was far-spread Professor Nicol, Convenor of the Church of Scotland Jewish Committee, told the General Assembly from personal witness how Paterson was loved Visiting a little patient he had cured, the father of the child, one of the Sheikhs of the Great Mosque, threw himself on the doctor's neck murmuring, "What is it that makes you Christians show such kindness to us poor Moslems ?" This is a fine stirring biography of a man who is one of our living heroes, and whom Palestine could ill spare

From The Seven Lost Trails of Africa By Hedley A. Chilvers (Cassell).

LEOPARDS PREPARING TO ATTACK THE WHITE HUNTER'S OXEN OUTSPANNED ON THE WAY TO THE LOST VALLEY OF PRECIOUS STONES.



JOHN MASEFIELD POET LAUREATE A PORTFOLIO BY EUGÈNE HASTAIN

Drawing by Eugène Hastain

THE POET LAUREATE

THE COMING OF CHRIST Painting by [illegible]

'Hail little captain, tender browed, with fingers far too frail for swords'

BEAUTY

Painting by Eugène Hastain

'I have seen the lady April bringing the daffodils'

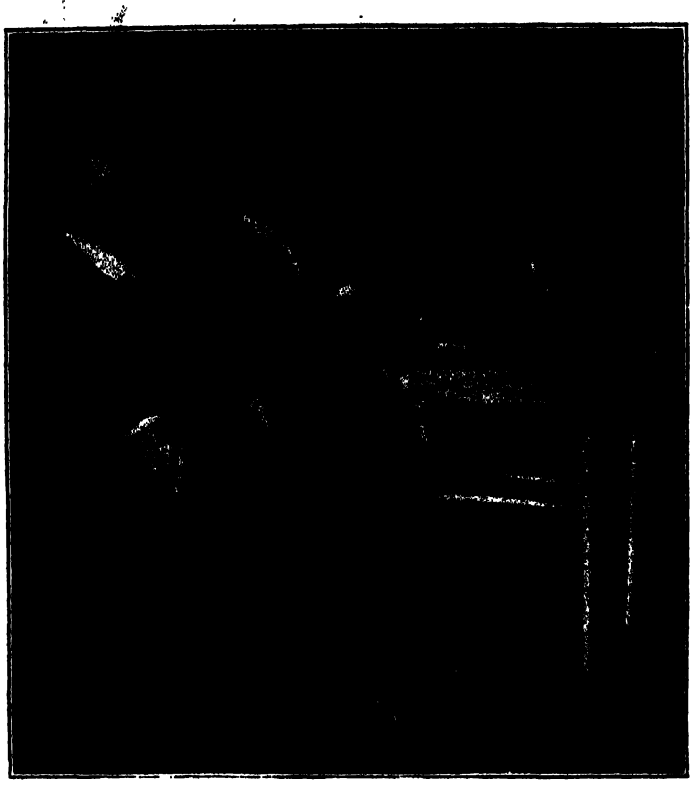
SPANISH WATERS

Painting by Eugène Hastain



'I'm the last alive that knows it
All the rest have gone their ways'

CARGOES

Painting by [illegible]

Engraved and printed by Henry Stone & Son, Ltd., London and Banbury

From Essays and Speeches on Various Subjects
By Gustav Stresemann
(Thornton Butterworth).

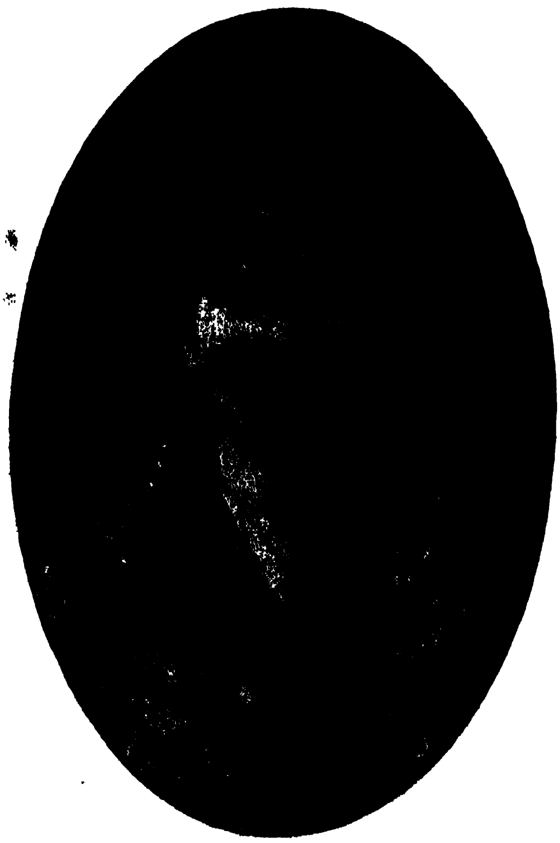
DR. GUSTAV STRESEMANN, SIR AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, AND M. BRIAND AT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS PALACE.



MR. PHILIP INMAN.
Author of "The Silent Loom"
(Geoffrey Bles).

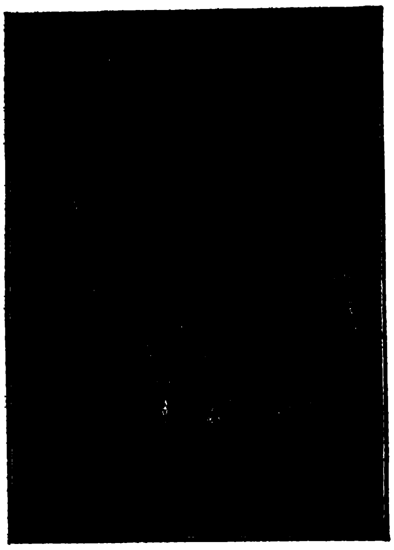
SOLO TO SYDNEY

By F. C. Chichester. 7s. 6d. (Hamilton.)

Mr. Chichester is a young man who left England, his birthplace, and travelled steerage to New Zealand, returned home first-class and flew back to Sydney. The book is the story of his flight and subsequent adventures on route. By now the route to Australia seems to have become one of the most popular ways of getting to that country. The author however had only been flying for three months, so his achievement is all the more meritorious.

The book is not quite as successful as the flight, but it has the virtue of being a consolation to amateur pilots who find themselves unable to fly a plane after the first few attempts.



From A Book of Grace
By Grace Rhys
(Dent).

MRS. GRACE RHYS.

From Parachuting
By Charles Dixon
(Sampson Low).

COLONEL CHARLES LINDBERGH, THE CHIEF CATERPILLAR—WHO HAS SAVED HIS LIFE FOUR TIMES WITH AN IRVIN PARACHUTE.

MR. UPTON SINCLAIR,
Author of "Roman Interludes"
(Werner Laurie).

THE ISLAND BUILDERS OF THE PACIFIC

By Walter Ivens, M.A., Litt.D. 21s net. (Seeley, Service.)

Dr. Ivens, who is the most conscientious of workers and brings to his labours a happy curiosity, has taken for his present research problem the question of how and why the people of Mal construct their artificial islands, the antiquity and doubtful origin of the practice, with a description of the social organisation, magic and religion of the inhabitants. Among scores of curious details, one comes across an instance of how the body of a chief is held in reverence. No one may cross over his legs. To do so is to despise him, being tantamount to a declaration of the infidelity of his wife. The book is profusely illustrated from photographs which are even more interesting than the text.

From The Island Builders of the Pacific
By Walter G. Ivens
(Seeley, Service).

STORE HOUSE.
ADA GEGE ISLAND.

From Digging up the Past
(Ernest Benn).

BAKING CLAY TABLETS AT UR.
(The tins are being put in a furnace heated by vaporised oil from the reservoir on the house roof.)

V. S. S. COLES

Edited by J. F. Briscoe, M.A. 7s. 6d. net. (Mowbray.)

This is a biography of one who held a high place among the workers of the Anglo-Catholic movement. To those who knew Mr. Coles the book will be a cherished memorial; and to those readers who did not know him the letters and addresses which make up a large part of the volume will reveal a fine intellect and a fine spirit. Those who want to know the inner side of the Anglo-Catholic movement during the last fifty years cannot afford to let the book go unread.

From Waters of Arun
By A. Hadrian Allcroft
(Methuen).

THE ARUN AT NORTH STOKE—THE SITE OF THE ROMAN FORD.

Choice Illustrated Books from BATSFORD'S List

LITTLE-KNOWN ENGLAND

Rambles in the Welsh Borderland, the Rolling Uplands, the Chalk Hills, and the Eastern Counties. By HAROLD D. EBERLEIN, B.A. With 120 illustrations in line and half-tone, together with a series of maps. 8vo, cloth gilt. Price 12/6 net

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE FOR THE SMALL COLLECTOR

Its Types, History, and Environment from Mediæval to Early Victorian Times. By J. P. BLAKE and A. E. REVEIRS-HOPKINS. With about 120 illustrations. Large 8vo, cloth gilt. Price 12/6 net

GEORGIAN ART, 1760-1820

An Introductory Review of Painting, Architecture, Sculpture, Ceramics, Glass, Plate, Furniture, Textiles, and other Arts during the reign of George III. Illustrated by 70 plates in colour and monotone. 4to, cloth gilt. Price 30/- net

CHILDREN'S TOYS OF BYGONE DAYS

By KARK GROBER and PHILIP HEREFORD. A beautifully produced survey of this fascinating subject, with 12 plates in colour, and 300 photographic illustrations. 4to, canvas gilt. Price 32/- net

"Its abundance of illustrations is wonderful. No one who buys it will be disappointed."—Daily Mail

EVERYDAY THINGS IN HOMERIC GREECE

The first volume of a new series by MARJORIE and C. H. B. QUENNELL. Authors of A History of Everyday Things in England. A wonderful little book which recreates the background to the legend and poetry of the Iliad and the Odyssey. With a frontispiece in colour and 100 illustrations from the author's drawings. Large 8vo, cloth. Price 7/6 net

THE ART AND PRACTICE OF SKETCHING

In all Media—Pen, Pencil, Water-colour, Oil, Wash, Crayon. By JASPER SALWEY, A.R.I.B.A., with 100 reproductions in colour, half-tone, and line. Medium 8vo, cloth. Price 12/6 net

A SHORT HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE

For General Readers. By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM, F.R.I.B.A., with 750 illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 16/- net

THE STORY OF ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND

By WALTER H. GODFREY, F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A. A popular account, in which the subject is simply explained, and linked up with the social life of the time. In two parts: I, From Early Times to 1500; II, From 1500 to 1800. Demy 8vo, cloth. 6/6 net per part

EVERYDAY ART AT SCHOOL AND HOME

By D. D. SAWER. Containing graduated lessons on Drawing, Brushwork, Design, Flower-Painting, Lettering, Leatherwork, and other Crafts With 64 plates from the Author's Drawings, and 8 plates in colour. Medium 8vo, cloth. 12/6 net

Illustrated Catalogue (100 pages) free on application to

B. T. BATSFORD LTD.

Fine Art Publishers & Booksellers

94, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON

West End Branch*: 15, North Audley St., Mayfair, W.1

BLACKWOODS' BOOKS

Life in Spain To-day

CHARLES WICKSTEED ARMSTRONG

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS

10/6 net

THE TORCH-BEARERS, Vol. III (The Last Voyage). By Alfred Noyes 7/6 net

The third and completing volume of the great "Epic of Science."

"As readable as a good novel."—Mr. J. C. SQUIRE (on the appearance of Vol. II).

A KENYAN FARM DIARY. By the Hon. V. M. Carnegie 7/6 net

A cheerfully written record of endless labour and varied adventure by an Englishwoman living on an African farm.

OUTLAWS I HAVE KNOWN. And other Reminiscences of an Indian Judge. By Sir Theodore Piggott 12/6 net

"An exposition of living drama."—The Observer. "Shows a penetrating knowledge of Oriental psychology which invests the material of the tale with a peculiar fascination. . . ."—Aberdeen Press and Journal

MAIDEN VOYAGE. Travel Letters of a Girl who ran away. By Doris Escourt. With illustrations and map. 7/6 net

"This charming book of travel letters . . . conveys (the author's) eagerness for all things vital and lovely."—Daily Sketch

ON GREENLAND'S CLOSED SHORE. By Isobel Wylie Hutchison With maps and illustrations. 21/- net

"Fairyland in its Arctic dress and colouring. . . . Miss Hutchison may be hailed as its discoverer."—The Scotsman

"A fascinating description of Greenland and its people."—British Weekly

TO CIRCUMJACK CENCRASTUS. By Hugh M'Diarmid 8/6 net

"All those who are interested in poetry and in the future of poetry would do well to read it."—Glasgow Evening News

". . . mingled grandeur, pathos, satiric power . . . scanty quotation can give only a poor idea of the scope and variety of this immense work, so instinct with the passion and power of exhilarating poetry."—Liverpool Post and Mercury

MISSING. By Flight-Lieut. T. B. Bruce 5/- net

"Everyone who can enjoy a real plot more intricate and more exciting than even those devised by Edgar Wallace will appreciate this book."—The Tatler

"This is a notable addition to the literature of escape . . . the reader shares the intense emotions of the originals as the grim game of hide-and-seek proceeds."—Morning Post

"His story deserves to be remembered among the classics of escapes."—The Sphere

FICTION 7/6 net

COLONEL DAM. By J. Storer Clouston

"I have enjoyed a number of his books, but none so much as 'Colonel Dam.' . . . His fairylike frolic is calculated to put even the sourest of cynics into the best of good tempers and is far too good to be missed."—Sunday Times

"A delightful and amusing story."—Daily Sketch

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIRT-SLEEVES. By Pousse Cailloux

"Deserves the publishers' description of 'epic,' and apart from the element in it, it has a value far beyond that of mere entertainment."—Scotsman

"Can be heartily recommended."—Graphic

"A remarkably fine book."—Morning Post

THE YOMAH AND AFTER. By 'Shalimar,' author of "Around the Horn and Home Again."

UNCLE WILLIAM. By Douglas G. Browne

Mr. Browne has made a name for himself in different walks of literature. As Captain D. G. Browne, M.C. he wrote the "Tank in Action," a comprehensive account of the Tanks in the Great War. Here in fiction he is at his best.

BARRY OF OURS. By H. F. Macaulay

A modern Romance by a descendant of the great Lord Macaulay, who carries on the tradition of his name.

"It grips from the first to the last page."—Daily Sketch

THE SPLENDID SMILE. By M. Sylvia Craik

"Above the ordinary . . . sincere and attractive. . . . It is good to meet the good people here."—Aberdeen Press and Journal

"A Love Story you will like."—Daily Sketch

THE IDEAL GIFT

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE

SUBSCRIBERS BOTH AT HOME AND ABROAD CAN HAVE "BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE" SENT DIRECT FOR 30/- YEARLY POST FREE

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS, LTD.
45, GEORGE ST., EDINBURGH
37, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON

From Black Cap : Murder Will Out
By W. & L. Townsend
(Marriott).

PATRICK MAHON.

MR. H. F. BIRKETT,
Author of "The Isle of Dreams"
(Hutchinson).

PLENTY COUPS: CHIEF OF THE CROWS

By Frank B. Linderman. 10s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

This life of a chief of the Crow Indians of Montana sustains the reputation which Mr. Linderman made for himself with his biography of a Blackfoot chief. The Crows of to-day are a peaceful people, with much to commend them, and nothing to their discredit. But Plenty Coups remembers the days when wars with neighbouring Sioux were part of the ordered round of life, and when Indian chiefs made treaties with the President of the United States. Mr. Linderman has allowed him to tell his own story in his own words, interposing only with explanations which serve as foot-notes, though not so cumbersomely placed. The tales Plenty Coups tells are of wild adventure, of reverent communing with the spirits, and of a love almost elegiac. His language is that of the Indian, often in parable and always beautiful. And the result is an unorthodox but inspiring record of an inspiring people, which makes one regret with Mr. Linderman that contact with the white race should have led so surely to its extinction.

From A Leaf in the Wind
By Patrick Macdonogh (Quota Press).

PATRICK MACDONOGH.

MR. TREVOR PINCH,
Author of "Stark India," published by Messrs. Hutchinson.

MYSTERIES AND HISTORIES.

"Pendragon" By W Barnard Faraday 7s 6d net (Methuen)

"Elfwin" By Fowler Wright 7s 6d net (Harrap)

"The Minion" By Rafael Sabatini 7s 6d net (Hutchinson)

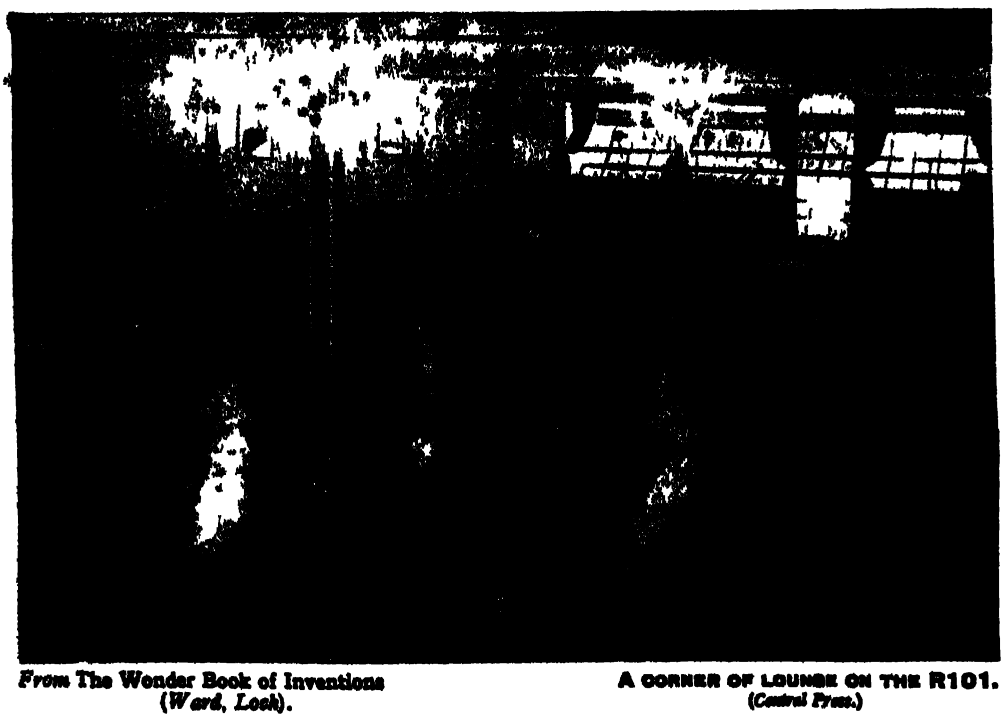
"The Uncertain Traveller" By John Fisher 7s 6d net (Duckworth)

"The English Paragon" By Marjorie Bowen 7s 6d net (Hodder & Stoughton)

Detective fiction is evidently affecting the historical novel, for three of these books are based on mysteries of the past In "Pendragon" Mr Faraday is concerned with the problem of King Arthur He tells us in a note that forty years ago he heard unlettered shepherds and wayside labourers in the Arthurian country side say, "When Arthur comes again the poor man shall come into ease and happiness," but the Arthur who comes again in his pages is very different from the hero of Geoffrey of Monmouth, Malory, Tennyson—or Mark Twain Sometimes one is reminded, as the overgrowth of legend is stripped away, of the old woman in the nursery rhyme with her petticoats cut round about —"'Lawk a mussy on us' she cried, 'this is none of I!'" Mr Faraday shows us a real and human Arthur—not actually a king, but of royal British birth—who was a mercenary of the later Roman Empire, and saved Celtic Romanised Britain Immense knowledge and research have gone to the making of this book

Mr Fowler Wright deals with a less familiar problem the treachery of Edward, King of Wessex and son of Alfred the Great, when Mercia was annexed The story of Elfwin and her Danish lover was well worth telling, and this little known period has evidently been very closely studied Only once or twice (and then he apologises) does Mr Fowler Wright dispel the atmosphere of forgotten Saxon days by digressions about Napoleon and the Great War

Mr Rafael Sabatini's "Minion" is Robert Carr, the favourite of James I, and his mystery the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury to which, with sympathy and understanding he supplies a solution In this coloured and dramatic story Mr Sabatini makes an effective use of characters and background It will please his numerous admirers



From Under the Red Star
By Norah Rowan Hamilton
(Herbert Jenkins)

STREET VENDORS IN TIFLIS.

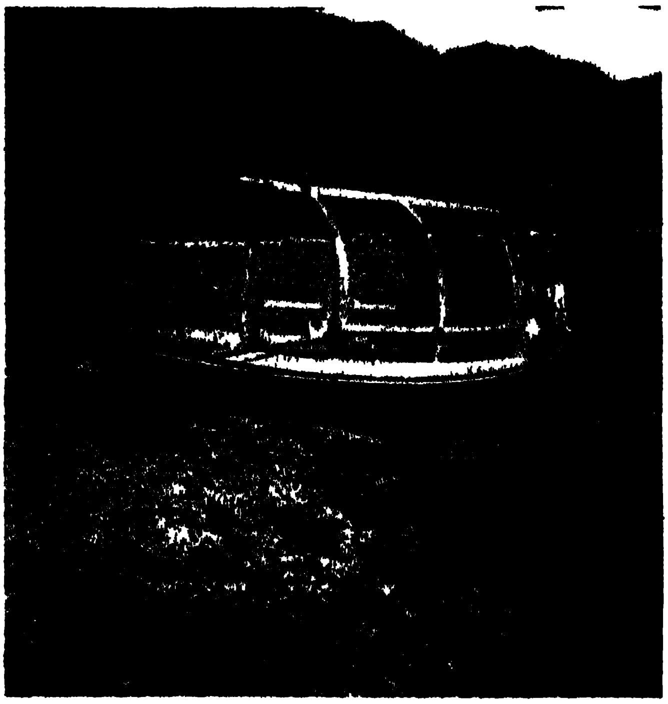
Mr John Fisher's "The Uncertain Traveller" is certainly, as its publishers claim a memorable first work by a young author, and I think we shall hear more of him It is perhaps a little weak in construction, but the writing is clear, direct and vivid, showing no hint of the amateur England, Italy and the United States of the mid nineteenth century are admirably depicted, and he draws a convincing picture of Garibaldi, "a great golden lion of a man on a tall white horse, his red shirt gleaming through the folds of his white poncho, his negro riding behind him on a horse as black as ebony"

Last, but by no means least, we have Miss Marjorie Bowen's "The English Paragon" Seville, Avignon the Pyrenees, Limoges—Don Pedro, Chandos, Queen Philippa, Du Guesclin, Pope Urban V, John of Gaunt—are names which Miss Bowen, with her knowledge of history and its by-ways, knows how to blend into a fine story of the Black Prince and his days. She is able to preserve the picturesqueness of chivalric times even while stripping from chivalry the false glamour which less competent writers have attached to it.

A. T. SHEPPARD.

From The Wonder Book of Inventions
(Ward, Lock).

A CORNER OF LOUNGE ON THE R101.
(Central Press.)



From A Mounty's Wife
By Luta Munday
(Sheldon Press).

BABY POLAR BEAR AND CINDERS

A MOUNTY'S WIFE

By Luta Munday. Illustrated. 7s. 6d net (Sheldon Press)

Here is a story within a story It is the history of twenty years devoted duty to a husband in the Royal North-West Mounted Police, and to the service that organisation has given to Canada. Mrs Munday's life has been one of almost constant hardship and anxiety, and this comparatively unemotional record of heroism, misery, breathless

From Idle But Happy
By Vere Ker Seymer
(Chapman & Hall)

AT DERVIO, LAKE OF COMO.

adventure and the will to serve commands our respect. It is incredible that certain of the situations the author describes did not deprive her of reason. On the contrary she was wise enough to take it all in as part of life's experience If we may venture a criticism, it is that the phrasing of the sentences is not always too happy. Certain minor incidents might have been omitted to allow for fuller description of more important things. But that is always difficult when a person's everyday life is fraught with danger and adventure, and at the least cram full of incident.

From Two on a Trip
By Lady Kitty Vincent
(Herbert Jenkins).

"WE'VE DONE IT."

PLIGHT OF PERETZ

By Noah Elstein 7s 6d (Allen & Unwin)

It is claimed for Mr Elstein that he is the Sean O Casey of the Jews, but he is in reality their Louis Golding This study of lower middle class Jewish life in a provincial industrial town is realistic without being unduly sordid. The Israel family, with its complaining but energetic mother, its depressed father, its two vital daughters, its cheaply smart son and its poetic son, is a microcosm of Jewry. Poor Peretz, sensitive to the disagreeable things about him, rejected by the refined girl whom he adores and redeemed by the vulgar young woman whom he learns to love, is an appealing if at times contemptible figure.

From A Kenyan Farm Diary
By V. M. Carnegie
(Blackwood).

THE ORIGINAL HOUSE, WITH JEBNERIGHI AND JELDGAM.

Burns Oates & Washbourne
LTD.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS

THE PUBLIC LIFE OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST
By ARCHBISHOP GOODIER, S J.
In 2 vols. Demy 8vo 21s. the set

THE MADONNA
AN ANTHOLOGY IN PROSE AND VERSE
Selected and Edited by SIR JAMES MARCHANT, K.B E.
65 illustrations. 7s 6d.

THE HOUSE OF THE TEMPLE
By F W RYAN
A Sketch of the Knights of St John, their origin and organisation through the centuries.
Demy 8vo. Fully illustrated, with maps. 25s.

YESTERDAYS OF AN ARTIST MONK
By DOM WILLIBRORD VERKADE, O S B
Translated by JOHN L STODDARD
Pages from the autobiography of a famous painter-priest.
Crown 8vo. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

IMPRESSIONS OF A PILGRIM
By A. J. FRANCIS STANTON
An experimental acquaintance with the highways and lesser known by-ways of life and religion.
Crown 8vo. 6s

THE MODERN ADVENTURE
By W. J BLYTON
A sympathetic story of the present-day interesting and somewhat dangerous period
Crown 8vo 6s

THE WORKS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON
Complete in 3 vols or singly.
Demy 8vo. Each 7s 6d.

ESSAYS
By ALICE MEYNELL
Imp. 8vo. With a Frontispiece 7s. 6d.

CATHERINE DE GARDEVILLE
By BERTHA RADFORD SUTTON
A modern novel of a girl torn between two influences.
Crown 8vo 7s. 6d.

ODD JOB'S
By CECILY HALLACK
An odd book of odd stories.
F'cap 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SHELLEY: An Essay
By FRANCIS THOMPSON
F'cap 8vo. 3s. 6d.

London: 43, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.1

VIRGINIA WOOLF
NIGHT AND DAY
A ROOM OF ONE'S OWN
have just been published in
THE CHEAP UNIFORM EDITION
5/- each

DRIFTING MEN
By R. M. FOX
6/-

"One of those rare books for which the authors deserve not merely the attention, but the gratitude of the public. He deals with the misfits and outcasts of society—of every kind."
Daily Herald

HOGARTH LIVING POETS SERIES
A BROADCAST ANTHOLOGY of Modern Poetry
4/6

DESERTED HOUSE
By Dorothy Wellesley 4/6

DEAR JUDAS
By Robinson Jeffers 5/-

THE HOGARTH PRESS

COMMENDED BOOKS FOR XMAS!

FICTION

PAT	Donald Garthe	7/6 net
THE HOUSE OF BREAD	Esther Roberts	7/6 net
OH, DEAREST BOY!	Clare Binns	7/6 net
OUR DEAD SELVES	A. Mabel Barker	7/6 net
HUON BELLE	Charlotte I. Dick	6/- net
THE PURPLE DAWN	Mary Florence	6/- net
WHOM GOD HATH JOINED TOGETHER	Walter Cranston	6/- net

POETRY

CAMEOS OF BOYHOOD	S. E. Cottam, M.A	5/- net
SONGS OF A WONDERER	"Question Marke"	3/6 net
WILD ORCHIDS	Leonora Brooke	2/6 net

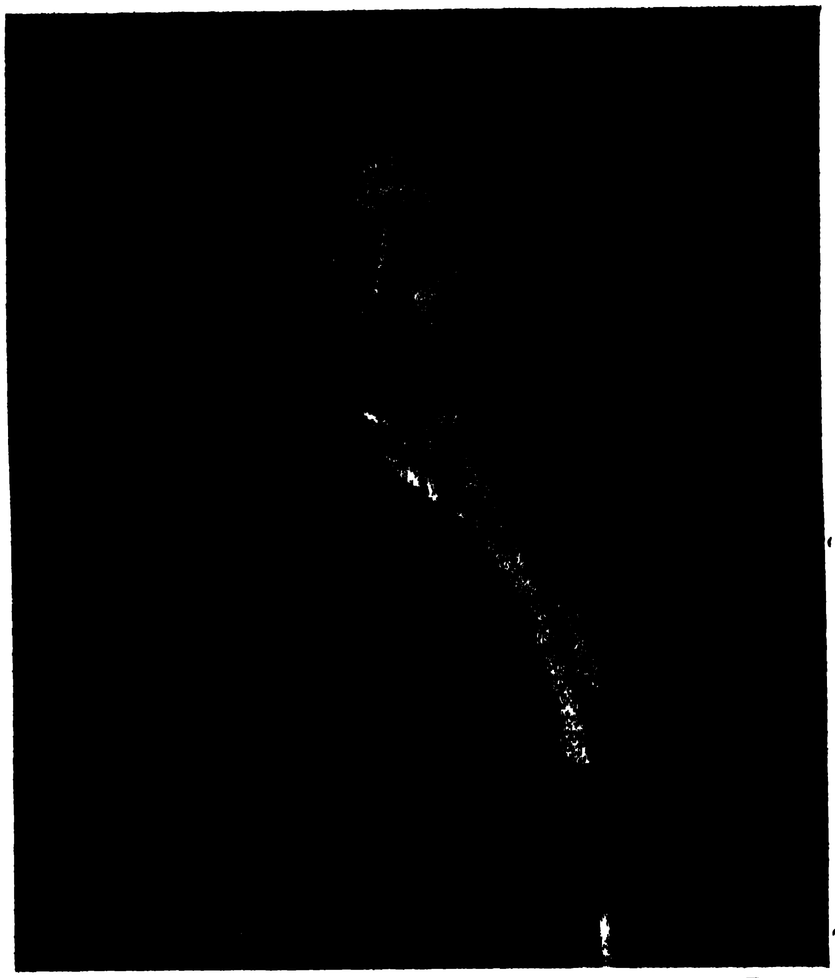
GENERAL INTEREST

EGREMOND'S RELEASE (Physical and Psychic History of Bolton Abbey, in Verse)	Thomas Hodgson	7/6 net
THE LIFE OF SIR HENRY MORTON STANLEY	Priscilla Price	2/6 net
NEMONA. (A Play)	J. Wilson	2/6 net
TALES OF AN OAK TREE (Illustrated for Children)	J. Wilson	2/6 net

ABOVE BOOKS, OR ANY OTHER TITLES IN OUR CATALOGUES, SENT YOUR BOOKSELLER FOR APPROVAL—ENTIRELY FREE OF CHARGE OR OBLIGATION

ARTHUR H. STOCKWELL LTD.
29, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON, E.C.4

BIG GAME HUNTING IN CENTRAL AFRICA



By W. Buckley. 10s. 6d.
(Cecil Palmer.)

Mr. Buckley has many interesting stories to tell in connection with his hunting exploits in Central Africa. Though elephants were his chief quarry, he hunted lions, leopards, buffalo, hippos, and other game as well, and often nearly lost his life. He describes how one elephant " collared me with his trunk by my hunting shirt and threw me about in the air, I hanging on to him for all I was worth I afterwards came down with a crash and he stepped on my left side . . " The book is illustrated with excellent photographs.

SIX MAXIMS TREASURED BY HIS MAJESTY THE KING

By Rev. F. C Baker. 3s. 6d.
(Williams & Norgate.)

These talks have a special interest inasmuch as they are based on six maxims which, we are told, the King keeps hung upon the walls of his Sandringham library. " Teach me to be obedient to the rules of the game ", " Teach me neither to cry for the moon nor over spilt milk " may stand as specimens. All the maxims are in a similar manly and forthright vein, and Mr. Baker's addresses on them are well matched to the texts. It seems that a friend thought the maxims themselves so pointed and sufficient that preaching on them would be a difficult task. Nevertheless Mr. Baker drives them home with power; and after all, a nail goes farther in for being well hit on the head.

From Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury
By T C Nicholson and A. S Turberville
(Cambridge University Press).

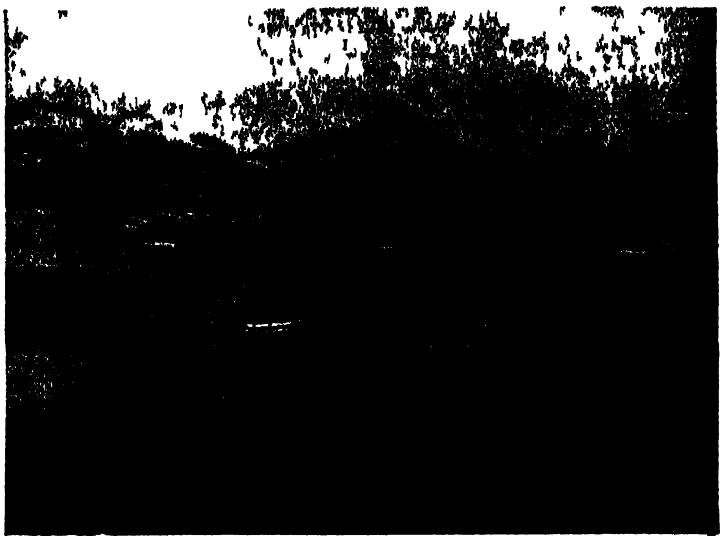
CHARLES TALBOT, DUKE OF SHREWSBURY.
(From the portrait in the National Portrait Gallery.)

ON GREENLAND'S CLOSED SHORE

By Isobel Wylie Hutchinson. 21s. (Blackwood.)

This book is the result of a long residence in Angmagsalik. Angmagsalik, we hasten to explain, is what its inhabitants call East Greenland. They also have several other charming names and words. Should you be there in December a note with the one word, " orpiharkugaluarpavtigit," may arrive—this is not a threat. On the contrary it is an invitation to Christmas dinner.

The author has used the special privileges she enjoyed to compile a very interesting book about the lives and habits of the people of Greenland; it may be a surprise to learn the boys smoke at an age when most English children are riding in their perambulators. This may of course account for the prevalence of consumption, a disease very common in Greenland. The people as a whole are industrious and friendly, though the tradesmen, we fear, are not unlike some of their more southern counterparts. In addition to an account of the life of the inhabitants, the author has supplied, in an appendix, a great deal of very interesting botanical data. It is a large book, well illustrated and written in straightforward style.



From Lord James of Hereford
By Lord Askwith
(Ernest Benn).

LORD JAMES AT HIS DESK AT BREAMORE.

From Maiden Voyage
By Doris Estcourt
(Blackwood)

ON THE MEKONG RIVER.

From On Greenland's Closed Shores
By Isobel Wylie Hutchison
(Blackwood).

"GERTRUD RASK" IN HARBOUR AT ANGMAGSALIK, EAST GREENLAND, 1927.

MAIDEN VOYAGE

By Doris Estcourt 7s 6d (Blackwood)

We are most grateful to Miss Estcourt for the thumbnail sketches in this vivid and engaging little record We rise from its perusal feeling we understand more exactly than we did what a street in Peking looks like It may be a mixture of club, dormitory, dining-room and bath-room On one corner imagine a cook, turning out exotic soups and queer dumplings, while the customers sit round him, squatting on their heels and jesting Farther down a wandering barber, seizing a client, shampoos and brushes his long hair and rebraids it into a queue, here and there are people serenely sleeping Through a million wrinkles an old toyseller smiles at small children, who are staring at his fearsome painted tigers and sugar dollies If Miss Estcourt had not shrunk from the idea of getting old in San Francisco and had contrived to pass two years in China and two in Siam, we should not have had these delightful experiences. We are glad it fell out as it did Her book makes a capital present for the modern maid in her teens

From I Sailed With Chinese Pirates
By Aleko E Lilius
(Arrowsmith)

"SHE HAD SINGLED OUT A LARGE BLACK JUNK WITH THREE YELLOW SAILS."

From John, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu: A Memoir
By Lady Troubridge and Archibald Marshall
(Macmillan).

THE SEINE NET.

I SAILED WITH CHINESE PIRATES

By Aleko E. Lilius
15s (Arrowsmith)

The author claims that he is the only white man who has made friends with the desperadoes of the Chinese Seas His book is much more interesting than the bulk of sensational fiction. There is some cruelty in it and a good deal of humour. Mr Lilius justifies his hardihood as an American journalist again and again by lucky escapes from awkward and ugly situations. His greatest success was in gaining the confidence of the famous pirate queen, Lai Choi San, and his partnership with Wong To Ping, whom he characterises as doubtless a murderer, kidnapper, seducer, opium addict and blackmailer, but none the less "a grateful cuss and a gentleman" Two of the best pages in a very vivid volume describe the author's induction as a blood-brother of the said Wong, in which a fowl had its throat slit and Wong ate its heart.

From Life in Spain To-Day
By Charles Wickstead Armstrong
(Blackwood)

A MOUNTAIN VILLAGE, CASTELLO CATALUÑA.

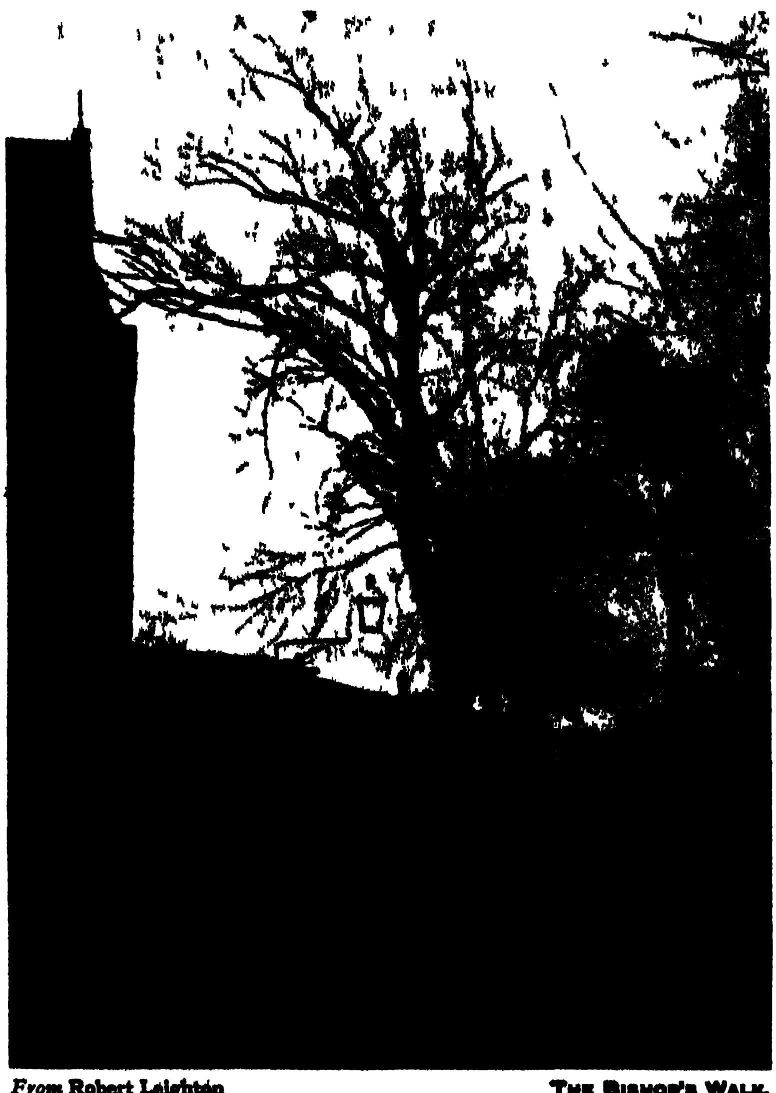
ROBERT LEIGHTON

Archbishop of Glasgow

By the Right Reverend E A Knox, D D
With illustrations 12s 6d net (Clarke)

In their forewords to this volume Mr John Buchan and Professor Main testify to the skill and lucidity with which Bishop Knox has chronicled an intricate chapter of Scottish ecclesiastical history The son of one of Laud's victims who suffered horribly for his faith, Robert Leighton lived to become famous for his saintly character and broad churchmanship This discerning and well-documented narrative is full of interest to students both of Scottish and English Church history, but it has, also, a much wider appeal in the pictures it gives us of seventeenth century civilisation on both sides of the Border Leighton, says Mr Buchan, was "a religious genius, a master of style, both Latin and English, and his writings have been the delight of believers and unbelievers, Evangelists and Catholics, philosophers and simple souls"

LIFE IN SPAIN TODAY



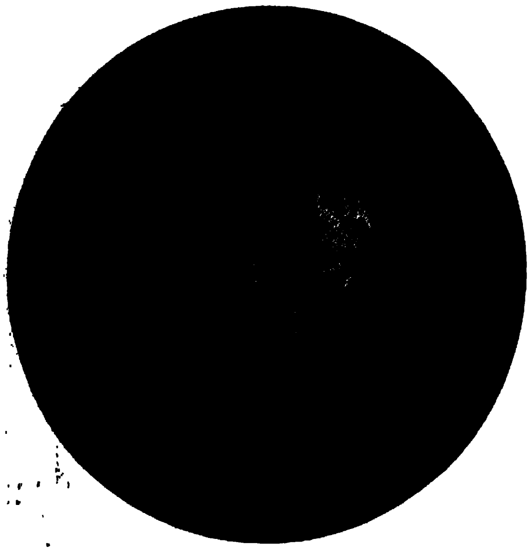
By Charles Wickstead Armstrong 10s 6d
(Blackwood)

"Life in Spain To-day," by Charles Wickstead Armstrong, is a book with a central thesis surrounded rather informally by lesser theses, and unfortunately the central thesis is too big for the book The author assumes (he produces no adequate evidence) that the Spanish race, whatever that may be, has sadly deteriorated and that regeneration is to be found only in the introduction of "Nordic blood" through the establishment in the peninsula of "agricultural colonies" of immigrants from "Britain, Germany and Scandinavia,' these adventurous Nordics to mingle with Spain's "Mediterranean population" But if the reader, to avoid unnecessary irritation, ignores this fantastic scheme, of which even the desirability is questionable, he will discover in the book many picturesque details of modern Spanish life.

THE LIFE OF THE SEA TROUT

By G H Nall M A, F R M S 21s net
(Seeley Service)

In this handsome and beautifully illustrated book is to be found all that is known about the sea trout It is of intense interest within its own limitations. Mr Nall is to be congratulated upon his painstaking and scholarly treatment of the subject, which apparently bristles with problems for the scientist and for that contemplative philosopher, the fisherman The production of this volume is yet another confirmation of the present day interest in all forms of marine biology



From Robert Leighton
By Rt Rev E A Knox
(Clarke)

THE BISHOP'S WALK, DUNBLANE.

GIPSIES

"The Wind On the Heath." A Gipsy Anthology chosen by John Sampson. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

The vast mass of literature which has grown up about the gipsy race may be divided into

William Beckford.
(About 1791–92)
(By Joseph Plat Sauvage.)
From A Bibliography of William Beckford of Fonthill
By Guy Chapman
(Constable).

From Heinrich Heine
By Professor H. Walter
(Dent).

Heinrich Heine, 1827.
(Drawing by Ludwig Grimm.)

two groups—that which concerns itself with a strictly scientific interest in the origin, speech and customs of an enigmatic people, and that occasioned by the purely romantic conception of a wandering race of outcasts.

Inevitably the second group threatens to obliterate the first with its mere size. The student, from Sir Thomas Browne down to the compiler of this anthology, has been baffled by the problem of who the gipsies are and where they came from. In point of fact the historian of to-day knows very little more about them that his predecessors did, yet the corpus of

From The Verney Letters
Edited by Margaret Lady Verney
(Ernest Benn).

Sir John Verney.
(First Viscount Fermanagh.)

George Gibbs,
Author of "The Fire Within"
(Appleton).

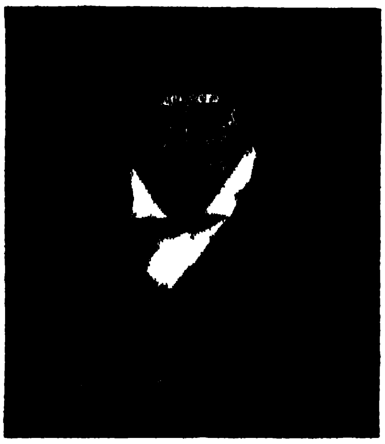
writing about them grows with ever increasing volume.

To the respectable citizen of to-day the gipsy appears much as he did to the Austrian monk of 1122 as a man "travelling far over the world." What he sees in his travels, what he thinks (as far as we are given the secret of it), what he hopes and believes and sings and hates are gathered in this book for us to judge him by. An ideal gift-book.



FRONTISPIECE

From Voltaire
By C E Vulliamy
(Geoffrey Bles)

HOW THEY DO IT IN ENGLAND

By Rudolf Kircher Translated by Frances Countess of Warwick
10s 6d (Elkin Mathews & Marrot)

As London correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, Dr Kircher was PORTRAIT OF LORENZO DA PONTE.

(By Samuel F Morse)
From Memoirs of Lorenzo da Ponte
Translated from the Italian by Elisabeth Abbott
(Lippincott)

known to be an honest and intelligent observer of English life. His present book is a serious attempt to explain by means of the knowledge then gained the nature of English men and institutions While there is nothing that is trivial, there is much which reveals the writer's profession Too many hares are started which are never hunted down, conclusions are drawn from recent incidents which may prove in the light of history to be no more than the aftermath of the War, and some of the sections, such as that on modern literature, are frankly little more than jottings

JOSEPH C LINCOLN,
Author of "Blowing Clear"
(Appleton).

Occasionally Dr Kircher reminds us of matters which we too often forget—that English production has increased since the War, and that the standard of life is very little, if any, lower now than in 1914 and of others which we prefer to ignore—that a great part of our difficulties in India, Egypt and elsewhere is due to the colour bar But for the rest his conclusions are in general gratifyingly like those drawn by our own countrymen Compromise is the heart of our political system, and the Labour Party, by insisting on governmental responsibility to party, is making compromise difficult and threatening the tradition by which English democracy has always been a matter of delegation King George, a greater man than his father, is the centre of the English Constitution, not least because he is the abiding link with Dominions who otherwise would have nothing but language and habit in

From Moliere
By John Palmer
(Bell)

MOLIÈRE.
(From a drawing by Roujat, after the painting attributed to Pierre Mignard.)

From Jane Austen
By R. Brimley Johnson
(Dent).

STEVENTON PARSONAGE.

common with the Motherland. A measure of Dr. Kircher's impartiality is to be found in his discussion of the East African Mandate, which he treats in a more reasonable manner than any German has yet done. The translator's English is at times not without a Continental quaintness.

THE DIARY OF A DOG

By "Tatters." 5s. (Cecil Palmer)

An amusing account of a holiday in Kashmir before the War, illustrated with photographs, and told by a rough-haired fox terrier, Tatters, one of the party of four. The others were his brother Rags, his master, "Our Own," and "Our Own's" sister, M. It is written simply, with a quiet sense of humour and an unusual understanding of the canine mind. Poignancy is lent to the tale by the fact that "Our Own" lost his life in the War. A foreword has been contributed by the Duchess of Hamilton and Brandon, and a preface by Sir Francis Fletcher Vane, Bart., of Hatton; and part of the proceeds of the book will go to animal welfare societies.

EVERYBODY'S BOSWELL

10s. 6d. (Bell.)

We are well aware of the rooted objection some people have to abridgments, but for the large number whose leisure is scanty there is a great deal to be said for the "half a loaf" measure We ourselves have found the epitomised "Pepys," which was the forerunner of this volume, delightful for dipping into, and are happy to place this beside it on the shelf. Again there has been much careful preparation, with continuity and perspective kept well in mind, while the range covers the complete text and the "Tour to the Hebrides." Sensitiveness, delicacy and vigour are well blended in Mr. E. H. Shepard's numerous illustrations which vividly reflect that robust and picturesque period.

From George Whitefield—The Awakener
By Rev. Albert D. Belden
(Sampson Low).

TOTTENHAM COURT CHAPEL WITH THE ADDITION OF OVEN GALLERY.

Fiction & Miscellaneous

From Cobbett's Advice to Young Men (Knopf).

From Fly-Fishing
By Viscount Grey of Fallodon
(Dent).

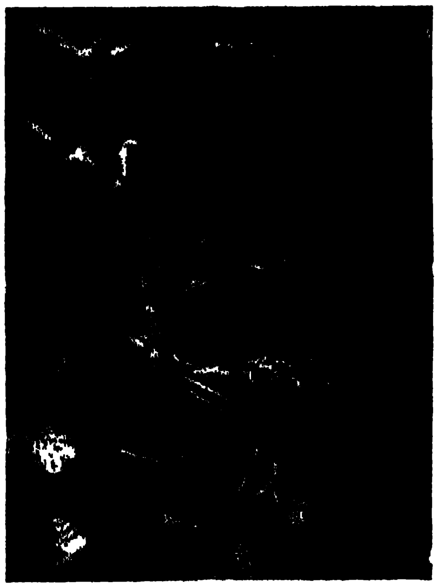
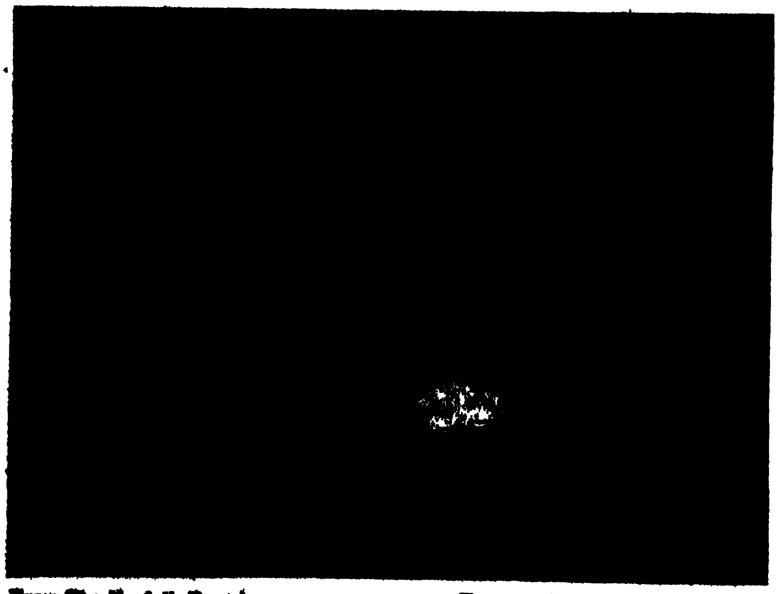
THERE ARE SCENTS IN THE AIR AND SOUNDS OF BIRDS' SONGS.



A VARIETY OF NOVELS.

"Mosaic." By G. B. Stern. 7s 6d (Chapman & Hall)
"A Woman with White Eyes" By Mary Borden. 7s 6d (Heinemann)
"But Not For Love" By Beatrice Kean Seymour. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall)
"Shallow Seas." By Richard Dehan. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth)
"The Perfect Marriage" By Ruth Brockington. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall)
"Cherry Gambol." By Eden Phillpotts 7s. 6d (Hutchinson)
"Out of Great Tribulation." By H. A. Vachell. 7s. 6d (Hutchinson.)
"The Unforeseen" By J. C. Snaith. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.
"The Gladiator." By Nikolai Gubski. 7s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot)
"They Die Young." By John Sommerfield. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

It ought not to be difficult to enlist a large enough body of determined lovers of first-rate fiction to get hold of Miss G. B. Stern and secure from her, under threats of awful vengeance, that she will go on to the end of her days writing about Rakonitzes and Czelovars and about nobody else It is possible, indeed probable, that the British public will never regard them with quite the same affection which they feel for the Forsytes, for they are after all people of an alien race, and as much at home in Paris and Vienna as they are in London. But nobody who has read "Tents of Israel" and "A Deputy was King," and then reads "Mosaic," can possibly experience any other feeling than a desire to know more of these entertaining and intensely human people. Great as the two former books were, there is in "Mosaic" something that makes this book Miss Stern's highest achievement so far. This book is made by the two sisters Berthe and Letti, the former a magnificent creation, using the word very much as a costumier uses it; the latter a subtler piece of portraiture, which repays close attention. Page after page is devoted to the life of these two in Paris, to their mutual reactions and to



WEASEL LOOKING OUT FROM WATER-VOLE BURROW.
From The British Girl's Annual (Amalgamated Press).

From The Girl's All-Round Book
Edited by Mrs. Walter Wood
(Nelson).

WHITETHROAT AT ITS NEST.
(Photo: Owen Martin.)

From The Norfolk Broads
By W. A. Dutt
(Methuen).

FEMALE MONTAGU'S HARRIER AND YOUNG.

their relations with the innumerable horde of family connections, especially, as far as Berthe is concerned, with the almost equally vital Elsa in London. The book ends with Berthe and Letti reunited after a short but tragic parting, and a gesture of friendship from the hitherto implacable Elsa, urged thereto by the news of the approaching birth of her first grandchild. It is a point from which Miss Stern must start again; her admirers will not be refused.

From A History of the Birds of Norfolk By B. B. Rivière (Witherby).

FEMALE MONTAGU'S HARRIER AND YOUNG AT NEST.

From Close-Ups from Nature By F. Martin Duncan (Sampson Low).

THE LITTLE OWL MAKES A CHARMING AND INTERESTING PET.

How different is the impression left by Mary Borden's new book. Greatly as the character of Caroline Merryweather will catch and hold the attention and sympathy of readers, it is doubtful if anyone will want to hear more of her. Not only is her story a very painful one, but the method Miss Borden adopts for the telling of it makes it more painful still. She has never chosen an easy subject in the whole of her literary career, and every line she writes bears witness to the agony of creation. This makes the fastidious critic anxious to read everything she writes, but it also makes it hard to describe her work as in any way entertaining. If, as some have said, the end of art, and especially of the art of fiction, is to entertain, Mary Borden must be written down a failure, but she has one supreme merit, she is entirely sincere, and it may be that sincerity is a truer and more lasting criterion than entertainment.

Richard Dehan is an old hand. She has given us one great story and a number of good workmanlike books. Her latest is not among her best, and it is almost certain to disappoint her public. She has a good tale to tell of German spies and Eastern mystery, but none of her characters come to life, and she makes things difficult for her readers by an involved style of writing as well as by unnecessary complexities of plot.

Beatrice Kean Seymour has found an excellent theme for her particular talents in her new story, but she has been handicapped by finding that it was too much for a short story and not nearly enough for a full-length novel. Had she been able to restrict herself to the story of the marriage of Vickey and Murray Gullan and its sensational, but by no means inartistic end, she would have credit for something quite out of the ordinary. As it is, we have

From Nature Rambles By Edward Step (Warne).

COCOON OF EMPEROR MOTH. SPRING TO SUMMER.

From Nature Rambles By Edward Step (Warne).

CATERPILLAR OF EMPEROR MOTH. SPRING TO SUMMER.

From The Story of England's Churches
By Rev. W. Escott Bloss
(Mowbray).

SALISBURY CATHEDRAL: WEST FRONT.
(Frith.)

a lot of preliminary matter which does not signify anything, though presumably the author means us to understand that what came later had its origin in it all.

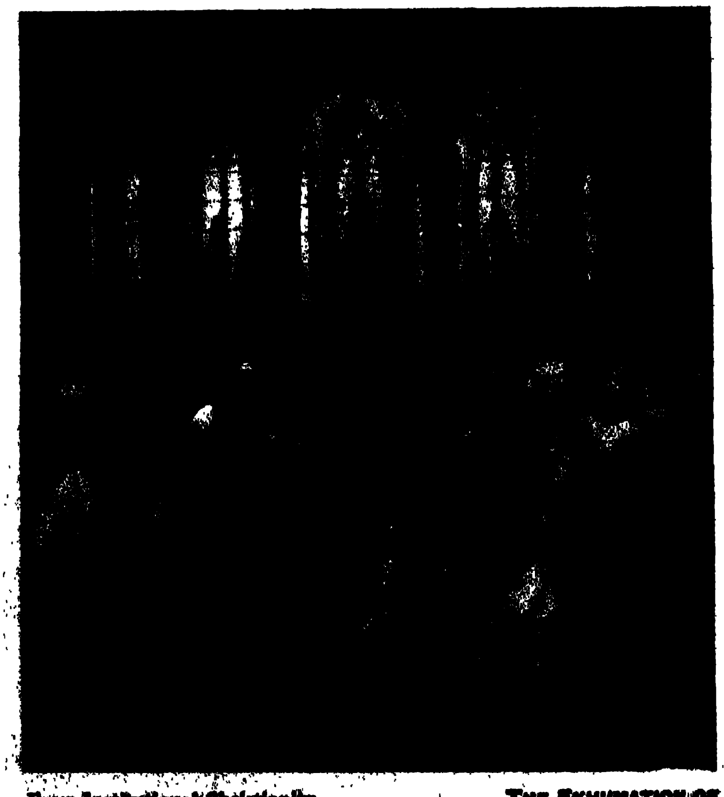
A young author who is making her way quietly but surely is Ruth Brockington. In "The Perfect Marriage" she has chosen a subject which suits her very well. It demands quiet, even unexciting treatment, and that is just what she is qualified to give and does give it. It is the story of the marriage of a sensitive, self-effacing girl to a very ordinary, selfish man, and the effect upon her conscientious nature of the reappearance of the man whom in her undeveloped girlhood she had really loved. There is no condescension to what is supposed to be modern taste in the description of the relations of the lovers. They are passionately in love, but they act as so many people in real life do, they deny themselves indulgence in the satisfaction of their desires, and not until the husband is removed tragically, but quite legitimately, is happiness possible for them.

After five women, five men, and first among them one of the masters of his craft, Eden Phillpotts. He would probably agree that "Cherry Gambol," which is a collection of short stories, does not show him at his best, but nevertheless it is a collection which provides some capital entertainment and proves that the author's hand has not lost any of its cunning.

Of Mr. Vachell's story it is hard to say more than that it will serve to while away an idle hour. It is not great stuff, and one feels that more might be made of the plot. It is an unusual foundation to have as two of the chief actors a middle-aged widower and a middle-aged widow, just engaged and deeply in love. That ought to have led up to something better than this.

"The Unforeseen," on the other hand, is perhaps the best book that Mr. J. C. Snaith has written. It tells the story of a murder, for which an innocent man has to suffer many years of imprisonment, thinking that by so doing he has saved the woman he loves. He believes her guilty, and she thinks the same of him. When he comes out and the mutual understanding is cleared up and they are married, they spend their energies in discovering the real murderer, and a very interesting person he proves to be.

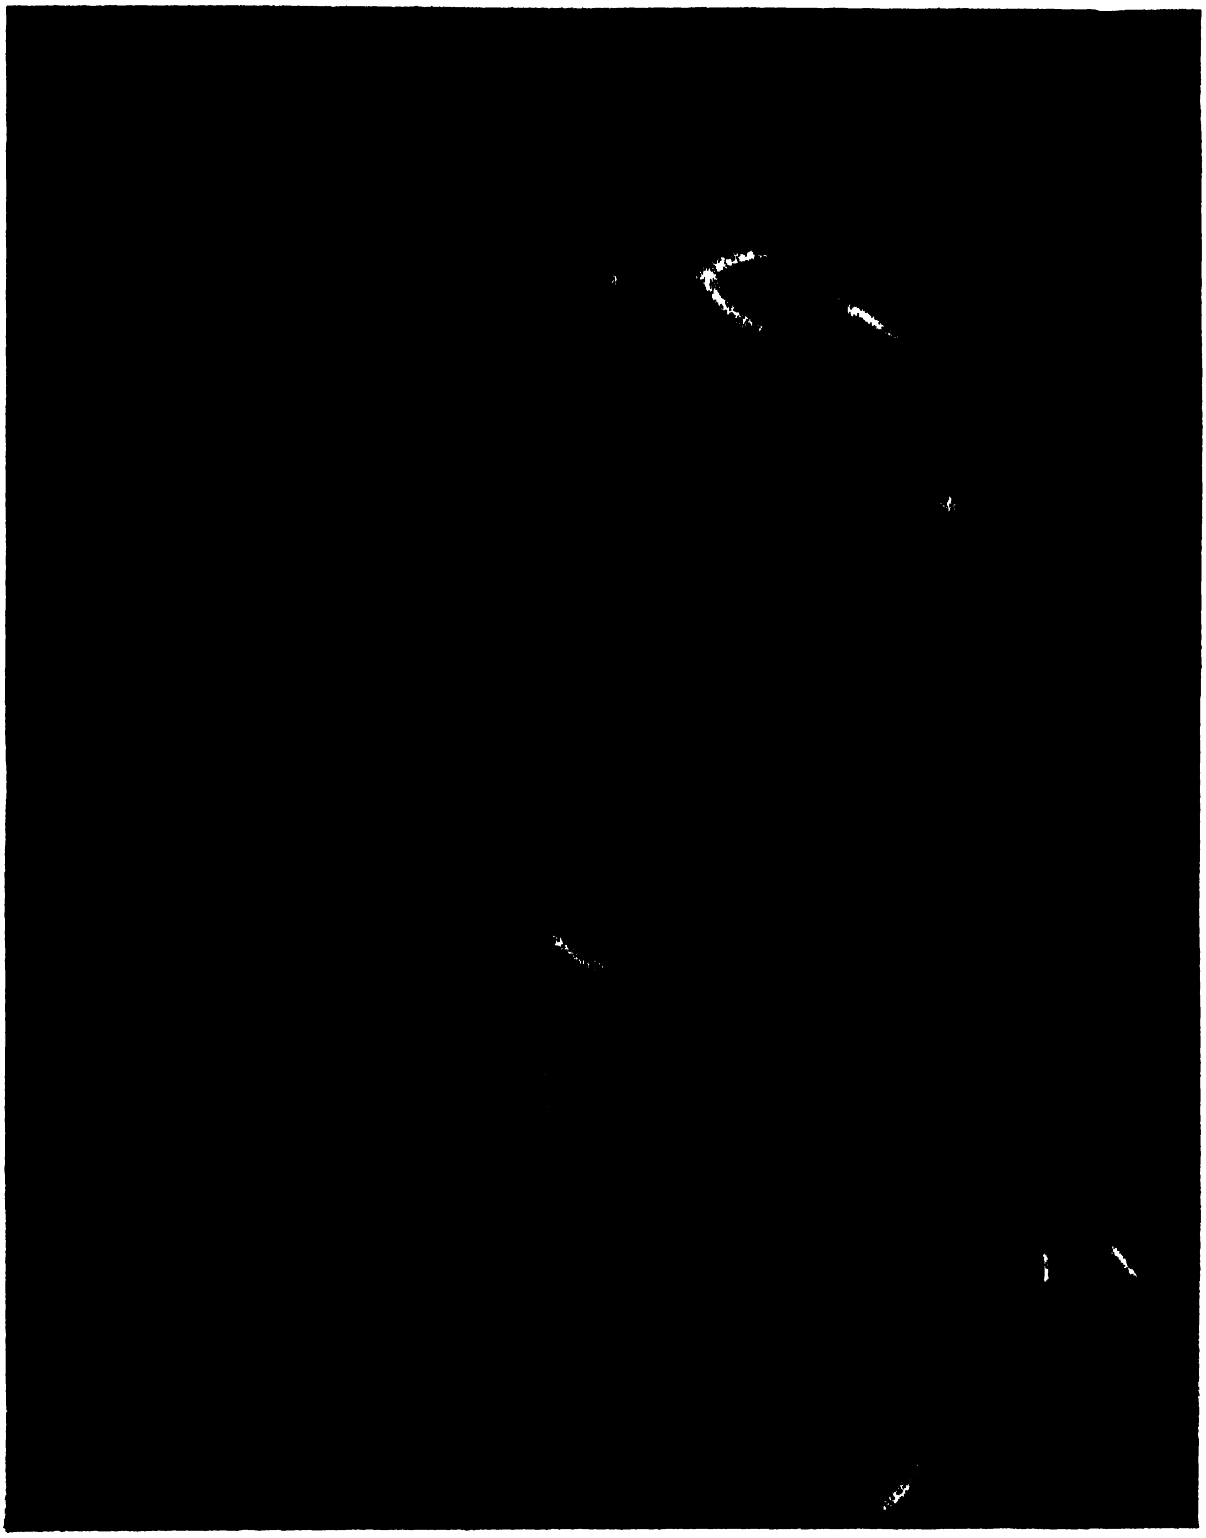
"The Gladiator" is a book about Russia, written by a Russian, but written in first-rate English. The noteworthy thing about it is that, though written in an alien tongue, it is Russian through and through. It tells of the drab and dreary existence with which the stories of the great Russians have made us familiar, and does it extremely well.



Readers of "They Die Young" will probably keep an eye on Mr. John Sommerfield also. Here is a most irritating, but at the same time a most remarkable first novel. The hero is painfully introspective, distressingly promiscuous and quite undisciplined by either himself or anyone else, and yet has considerable charm. One forgives him for his many shortcomings and follows his whirlwind career with real interest. His early death, however, is a relief. Mr. Sommerfield will write something better than this with his manifest gifts.

R. S. FORMAN.

THE STORY OF ENGLAND'S CHURCHES



By Rev. W. Escott Bloss. 10s. 6d. net. (Mowbray.)

There has been a number of books lately dealing with the church architecture of England, but Mr. Bloss has worked on a plan of his own. He has adopted the historical method—that is, he has passed in review the successive periods of our religious history and shown the different types of church which each period produced. For the general reader, whom a strictly architectural classification is apt to bewilder, this method is a real advantage. There are numerous illustrations.

From Institutional Christianity in England
By J. Gordon Hayes
(Richards Press).

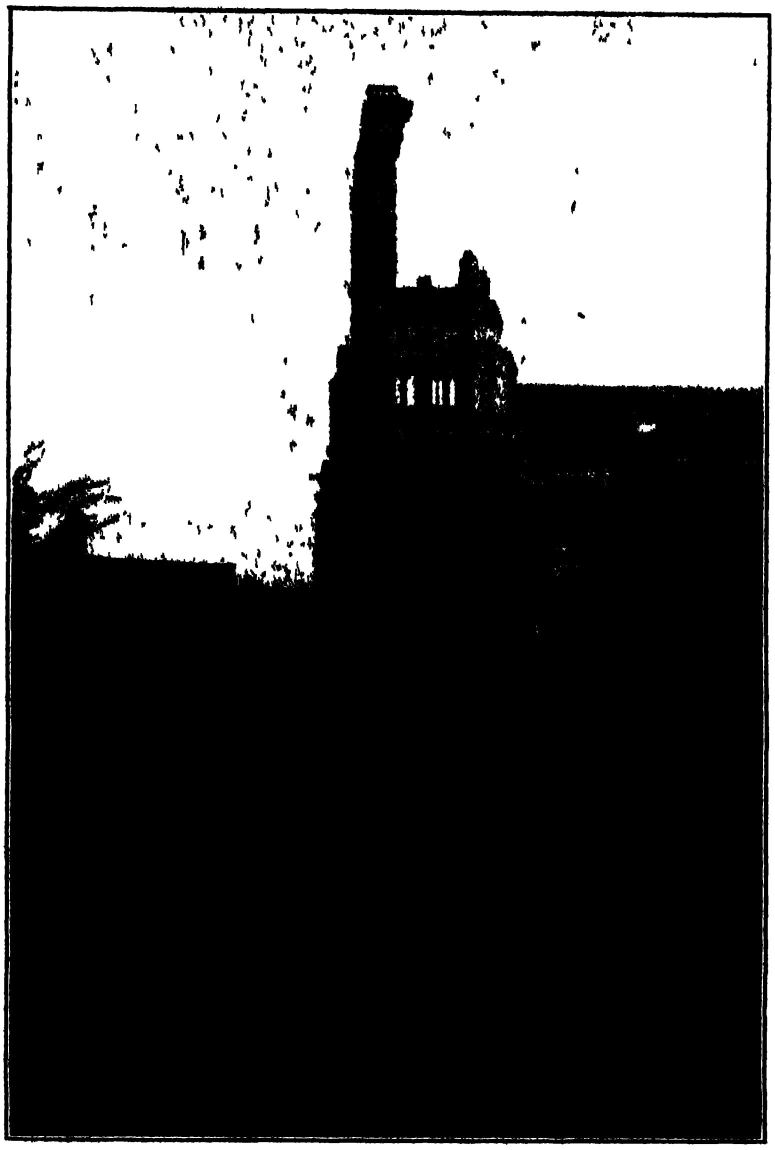
THE EXHUMATION OF ST. HUBERT.

STONECHATS. A. W. SEABY

FICTION AND MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE

FLY FISHING



By Viscount Grey of Fallodon. With two additional chapters and wood engravings by Eric Fitch Daglish. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

In 1899 this delightful book of Lord Grey's first came into the world as the worthiest successor yet that Izaak Walton has had. It is indubitably literature, distinguished on every page by personality and written throughout with a pleasant, easy style. When the place of Edward Grey comes to be considered in the history of our day, "Fly Fishing" will be invaluable for showing what manner of man lay behind the diplomatist. This new edition differs only in the new chapters and in Mr. Daglish's wood-engravings. The chapters, one on Spring Salmon Fishing, and one a Retrospect, are partly autobiographical; and sadly so. Lord Grey writes of his failing eyesight with a heartrending simplicity which all fishermen understand and admire. By 1918 he could no longer see a small fly floating on the water; by 1919 he could no longer see rises, and since then his eyesight has gone from bad to worse. It is tragic for one so wrapped in the joys of angling, in his beloved birds and in the world around him.

CLOSE-UPS FROM NATURE

By F. Martin Duncan.
6s. (Sampson Low.)

Mr. Duncan has written the most fascinating contribution to the study of the bird, animal and plant life around us which has appeared for many years. His aim, he tells us, was to give "the general reader a series of intimate sketches of some of the wonderful phases of Animal, Insect and Plant Life that form a part of the animate world around us," and he has more than succeeded. He writes charmingly on a fascinating subject. We must congratulate the publishers on having put out this book with its 100 delightful photographic reproductions at what is nowadays the astonishingly cheap price of 6s.

From Good-Bye to the Battle-fields By H. A. Taylor (Stanley Paul).

SOISSONS. THE CATHEDRAL.

GIRLS' ALL ROUND BOOK

Edited by Mrs. Walter Wood. 5s. (Nelson.)

It has been a general complaint of editors and publishers in the past that except for a few writers, who are in danger of over-writing, it has been almost impossible to get stories suitable for girls of school age—stories that is which register their interests and emotions. Messrs. Nelson however have put out in the "Girls' All Round Book" a volume which seems to give the lie to this complaint. The stories are varied and interesting; the articles on sport very well done; the contributions on hobbies just as they ought to be, and the illustrations in line and photographic reproduction quite effective. This will make a charming gift-book at Christmas.

NATURE RAMBLES

By Edward Step, F.L.S. 2s. 6d. each. The set of 4 volumes in leatherette case. 10s. (Warne.)

A most attractive gift for the nature lover, for whom the name of Edward Step is sufficient guarantee. In this set of four delightfully produced little volumes he has gathered together all the manifold interests, animate and inanimate, which one meets with during a country ramble the whole year round. Each of the four seasons offers its own especial inducements, and each is studded with many successful colour plates as well as black-and-white drawings and photographs of roots, flowers, fruit, birds and creatures of all sorts. For practical purposes the division of the seasons into separate booklets is a most happy one.

THE PURPLE DAWN

By Mary Florence. 6s (Stockwell.)

David Everdene was so attached to Blythe, whom he believed to be his sister, that he could not fall in love with any other girl and decided to get married simply because it was the usual thing to do. Then his real father appeared upon the scene and the tragedy of the past was revealed, changing David's destiny and carrying him off to America. The purpose of Miss Florence's story is to show how blessings come through suffering and that, inspired by religion, mankind, however depraved, is capable of amazing possibilities.

THE BRITISH GIRL'S ANNUAL

5s (Amalgamated Press)

This Annual lives well up to its name, for throughout its pages the characteristic we like to know as "British" is well displayed, a matter for admiration, encouragement and inspiration. Stories by well-known writers tell of hockey adventures, skating, tennis, holidays, schooldays, Girl Guides. Even a boys' story is included. Then there is an article on the making of inexpensive gifts, then articles on animals, wild and tame, on using a pen or a brush with fine skill, and other absorbing subjects.

From The Shropshire of Mary Webb
By W Reid Chappell
(Cecil Palmer)

SPRING COTTAGE, LYTH HILL

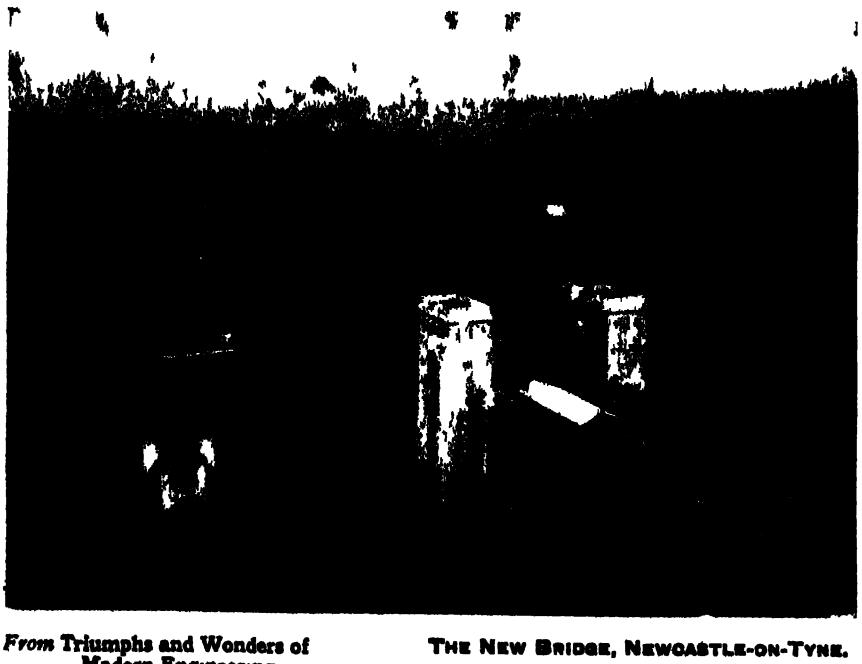
TRIUMPHS AND WONDERS OF MODERN ENGINEERING

By G Gibbard Jackson
6s (Sampson Low)

What will London be like in fifty years? Anyone who has seen the London of 1981 or thereabouts, as forecast by the films may have felt trepidation or scepticism But let us consider the progress made in the past half-century What has been the outcome of all our experiments? In a lucid and well illustrated volume Mr Jackson has reviewed the progress made by engineering We read how from a contraption of two wooden wheels the modern bicycle has been evolved, and what the first flying machine was like

The book is very useful, for the subjects examined are things seen and used almost every day, and even if one has no great interest in engineering it is pleasant to have some slight knowledge of things in common use But the book, we think is intended more for the enthusiastic young than the inquisitive old!

THE SHROPSHIRE OF MARY WEBB



By W Reid Chappell 7s 6d (Cecil Palmer)

The countryside of Shropshire as depicted by Mary Webb has laid hold of the imagination of many especially since the ironic stroke of fate which brought her such widespread posthumous fame, and now Mr Chappell actually brings it to life with his delightful pen and camera pictures Few writers, if any, have excelled Mary Webb in the witchery of her nature imagery, and it is delightful to wander, even at second-hand, among the people and scenes where many unforgettable memories had their source Many of the happenings and customs described had their groundwork in fact Mr Chappell too builds up a steady foundation for the historical bent in Armour Wherein He Trusted," the novel Mrs Webb destroyed in a mood of depression, and alas, was not able to finish re-writing! Many of her choice reviews for THE BOOKMAN were written at the cottage reproduced on this page.

From The Inky Way
By Alice M Williamson
(Chapman & Hall)

OUR SURREY COTTAGE

From Triumphs and Wonders of Modern Engineering
(Sampson Low).

THE NEW BRIDGE, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

A MIDDLE CLASS MAN

By Leonhard Frank
7s 6d (Peter Davies)

This is the sort of novel that one reads to the end against one's own will held by the brilliance of the writing The sufferings of the chief character, a rich young idealist in a German provincial town, are depicted with so stark a reality that at times the writing tears at the nerves of the reader with an almost physical effect The construction of the book is cinematographic, a series of vivid "shots" showing incidents in the life of the chief character as if seen through his own distorted vision Sometimes these "shots" are of isolated moments, sometimes they cover hours and days, but always they have the same merciless vividness.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SPEEDWAY

By Sprouts Elder. Foreword by Colonel the Master of Sempill. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. (Warne)

Sprouts Elder, most dashing of dirt-track knights, describes in this non-technical, vivid and amusing little book not only the romance but the inside story of motor-cycle track racing. He has many hints for those engaged in the sport on handling machines, the art of broadsiding, rules, etiquette and tracks. There are many lively personal sketches and reminiscences as well as concise and lucid descriptions of outstanding performances and records. He thinks a silent dirt-track display, even if possible, would be like beef without mustard, a roundabout without music, while "once you get the speedway habit you look upon bull-fighting as a kind of dairy farming."

From Water Polo
By Capt D. A. C. Shephard
(Chapman & Hall).

SKEGNESS OPEN AIR POOL.
(Photo: Capt. B. W. Cummins.)

From Twickenham Calling
By Capt. H. B. T. Wakelam
(Bell).

A SCENE IN THE MATCH BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE, 1930. A FRENCH FORWARD SCORES.
(Sport and General.)

WATER POLO

The Game and the Rules Explained

By Captain D. A. C. Shephard. 2s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

This clear and well illustrated little book should appeal to the wide public interested in a universal and picturesque sport. The rules and detailed explanations, although of special value to water-polo referees, should be read and marked by the many enthusiastic followers and spectators of the game. The author claims that 75 per cent. of present-day players have never read the rules, while among the remainder varied and conflicting views are held He uses his experience as player and referee to sketch in six common-sense and readable sections, a brief historical synopsis of water-polo, essential qualifications for players, observations on referees and refereeing, the lighter side, rules of the game, and an exposition of the rules, with explanatory sketches.

TWICKENHAM CALLING!

A Practical Book on Rugger

By Captain H. B. T. Wakelam Illustrated 5s. net. (Bell.)

Thousands of people have heard Captain Wakelam's microphone commentaries on famous Rugby matches, and know how fascinatingly he can describe the game. Here he is in this book telling us how to play and how to watch the game intelligently. In view of the increasing interest in Rugby football there ought to be a good market for this handbook, which is illustrated so as to demonstrate exactly what the author means. In criticism we suggest that the title is an unhappy one. The publishers will do well to emphasise exactly what the book is. The sub-title describes it.

From The Romance of the Speedway
By Sprouts Elder
(Warne).

SPROUTS ELDER.

ZOO WAYS AND WHYS

By T H Gillespie 3s 6d (Herbert Jenkins)

The contents of this volume were, in their origin, among the writer's popular "Zoo Talks," broadcasted for children during the last four years from Edinburgh and Glasgow The fact that the chapters have been written for children encourages the hope," says Mr Gillespie, "that grown-ups will read them!" Certainly every child under ninety will revel in these delightful animal sketches by the Director of the Edinburgh Zoo In a foreword, Professor Sir J Arthur Thomson while paying tribute to the author's many other fine qualities emphasises the main point that "Mr Gillespie avoids the error of reading the man into the beast But he recognises animals as personalities of a simple sort to be understood by love as well as by learning." The illustrations, from photographs taken at the Edinburgh Zoo, are uncommonly fine

From Zoo Ways and Whys
By T H Gillespie
(Herbert Jenkins).

A "BABY" CROCODILE FROM WEST AFRICA

LET'S TALK OF DOGS

By Rowland Johns 6s (Methuen)

Mr John's method of stringing his dog stories together is always ingenious, and in his new book he takes as his central character Mr John Francis Dolloy a man of keen observation, interested, among other things, in dogs and people who discuss them Here we find several adventures Mr Dolloy has had with dog-lovers recorded in Mr John's most entertaining manner, and all varieties of dogs dealt with As a short story writer Mr Johns possesses the rare gift of keeping a surprise for the end you never know what is going to happen next, and you go on from story to story with undiminished enthusiasm The book is delightfully illustrated by Mr Len Taylor

From Let's Talk of Dogs
By Rowland Johns
(Methuen)

STILL A REBEL, ESPECIALLY AGAINST THE GAME LAWS.

From That Dog of Mine
By Joe Walker
(Ward, Lock)

THE QUESTION

From Portrait of a Dog
By Mazo de la Roche
(Macmillan)

LIKE TWIN ARROWS, YOU SPED INTO THE TWILIGHT.

BOOKS TO BUY IN DECEMBER

Specially selected by the respective Publishers

THE CONQUEST OF HAPPINESS

By BERTRAND RUSSELL

"Mr Bertrand Russell's new book is beautifully planned and written . The author knows just what he wants to say, and says it brilliantly"—Spectator

7s 6d

GEORGE ALLEN & UNWIN LTD

MARKA OF THE PITS

By E. CHIRIKOF

Translated from the Russian by L ZARINE With a Preface by STEPHEN GRAHAM 7s 6d net

A remarkable picture of the strange gipsy-like tribe of people who are said to be descended from the original Volga boatmen

ALSTON RIVERS LTD, 52, BEDFORD STREET, W C 2

A WIDOW ON RICHMOND GREEN

By HILARY MARCH

"This is just the sort of novel that may be missed by the large public and I call special attention to its merits in order that my readers will not be able to blame me for having missed it —EDWARD CRICKMAY in the Referee 7s 6d net

BESANT & CO LTD 21 ORANGE ST LONDON W C 2

MY EARLY LIFE

By THE RT HON

WINSTON S CHURCHILL, C H, M P.

Illustrated 21s net

THORNTON BUTTERWORTH, LIMITED
15, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W C 2

ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK'S

new novel

PHILIPPA

7s 6d net

CONSTABLE

JEWS WITHOUT MONEY

By MICHAEL GOLD

7s 6d

Nine impressions sold in America

NOEL DOUGLAS

MAN AND HIS UNIVERSE

By

JOHN LANGDON-DAVIES

Illustrated. 16s net

HARPER & BROTHERS, 90, GT RUSSELL ST W C

Wonderful New Presentation of

RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM

With 12 colour plates and many line decorations by WILLY POGÁNY Cloth, 15s net, Leather, 30s net

Pogány's first Omar was pictured in the Eastern tradition Now he portrays the poem through Western eyes The text of both the first and fourth editions of FitzGerald's translation is printed and there is a sparkling introduction by Professor Saintsbury

HARRAP

Biography

THE LIFE-STORY OF HIS MAJESTY KING ALFONSO XIII OF SPAIN

By EVELYN GRAHAM Illustrated 18s net

The publication of this interesting volume has been fully approved and sanctioned by King Alfonso Mr Graham gives us a wonderfully absorbing description of the life of this remarkable King and man A study of deep interest

HERBERT JENKINS LTD, 3, YORK ST, ST JAMES'S, S.W.1

The Completion of a Great Work

THE SON AVENGER

SIGRID UNDSET 10s 6d

There is no other novelist writing to day who has the composure and absolute sureness of Sigrid Undset This is a noble book which makes us think well of mankind '—Everyman

ALFRED A KNOPF

In Omnibus Volume

STORIES FROM THE OPERAS

By GLADYS DAVIDSON 1 072 pages Cloth 8s 6d net leather 15s net

The Stories of 106 Operas in one volume

In this magnificent volume Miss Davidson has collated and combined her three standard works—Stories from the Operas, Stories from the Russian Operas and More Stories from the Operas—into one handy volume carefully collated and indexed

T WERNER LAURIE, LTD

The Standard for 55 Years

LIPPINCOTT'S UNIVERSAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY & MYTHOLOGY

By JOSEPH THOMAS, M D LL D 2,560 pages
New and revised edition 60s

This is a new and completely revised edition of a book which has been the standard for fifty five years It is now completely up to date

J B LIPPINCOTT CO, 16, JOHN ST, ADELPHI, LONDON W C 2

A New Novel by D M Locke

OPEN TILL SUNSET

By D. M. LOCKE

Author of CAST NOT A STONE (6th impression)

The story of a woman hater whose cynicism is cured by a lovely woman Told with the pen of a born writer this book is for the discerning reader who appreciates clever analysis of the moods of men and women

7s 6d

EVELEIGH NASH & GRAYSON

STEPHEN MACONI

By S. CUNLIFFE OWEN

Pott 4to 6s

An historical novel dealing with the Papal Court and Avignon at the time of the Renaissance

RICHARDS, 90, NEWMAN STREET, LONDON, W 1

THE PROTECTION OF OUR ENGLISH CHURCHES

3s. (Press and Publications Board of the Church Assembly.)

"Marble monuments ought to be kept more or less polished; they should be washed with Castile soap and then treated with beeswax and turpentine . . . a very high polish should not be sought." This is an extract from the fourth report (28–29) of the Central Council for the Care of Churches, a most interesting and valuable book which all those of us who love our English churches should study with hope and gratitude. Parochial church councils may now, we learn, avail themselves of the Report on the Care of Churchyards, containing the well-thought-out advice of many people all over the land. It is pleasant to read of the far-flung work of the diocesan advisory committees.

From Recollections of a Defective Memory
By Fred Kerr
(Thornton Butterworth).

MISS CATHLEEN NESBITT AND MR. FRED KERR IN "THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED," 1920.

PORTRAIT OF A DOG

By Mazo de la Roche. 7s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

Into this delicately sensitive—at times poignant — portrayal of canine nature, Miss de la Roche has brought the same penetrating understanding that characterises her saga of the Whiteoaks family. She has called it a "Portrait of a Dog," and while it remains that in its inimicable delineation of Argyle Bunty, a Scotch terrier, a great more is deftly woven into its fabric. Countless little episodes, showing a number of dogs in moods sensitive, impudent, ingenious and all the various stages of appeal and despair that they engender, are blended with what we take to be biographical happenings, both joyous and the reverse, concerning the author herself. What a real "doggy" household it was; sometimes the family boasted as many as sixteen dogs at a time. It is naturally a book for dog lovers, and one that they will find irresistible in its tender and whimsical appeal. The very delightful drawings by Mr. Morgan Dennis add a real contribution to the charm of the book.

OBSESSION

By Marita Lee.
7s. 6d. (Toulmin.)

Edna May is obsessed by her infatuation for the husband who has left her. That briefly is the theme and the recurring theme of this extraordinary novel. In retrospect we get the story of Edna's romance, of her childhood, her struggle to earn a living in New York, working in a bargain basement; her meeting first with Norrie Thutt, then with Wilbur, the song-writer, whom she marries. But Wilbur, we gather, was never a satisfactory husband. He "had made a habit of sneaking off in the night. He was constantly going, constantly coming back. . . ." At last he comes back no more, and Edna May, burdened with her obsession, goes away from New York to nurse an aged aunt and to ruminate on her own past, with its esctasies and disappointments.

From The New Spirit in the Cinema
By Huntly Carter
(Shaylor).

THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI.

This book will be reviewed at length in the January BOOKMAN.

EDITH WHARTON'S

new book

CERTAIN PEOPLE

A distinguished collection of six new stories, exhibiting in a wealth of colour and feeling an unusual diversity of scene and character. 7/6

ARDENT ADRIENNE — L. ROSE McCABE

The life story of charming Adrienne, who became the wife of the Marquess de La Fayette and came to live one of the most amazing lives in history. Illustrated. 12/6

ROUGH AND TUMBLE ON OLD CLIPPER SHIPS — ROBERT RAMSAY

With an Introduction by Sir WALTER RUNCIMAN.

"Few are left who have story to tell like that related by 'Captain Bob' Ramsay, and still fewer, if any, who could tell it so well."—THE SCOTSMAN Illustrated. 10/6

THROUGH ORIENTAL GATES

JAMES SAXON CHILDERS

An unusual travel book by the Author of "Laurel and Straw." Illustrated. 10/6

ACTORS—AND PEOPLE — PEGGY WOOD

The celebrated actress of "Bitter Sweet" writes witty chapters on great actors and actresses, on Bernard Shaw, Emma Calve, with intimate revelations and sparkling gossip. Illustrated. 10/6

Mrs. GRUNDY — LEO MARKUN

Four Centuries of Morals and Manners.

The taboos and pruderies of sex, the history of drinking, gambling, duelling, scandal, censorship . . . written with much wit, penetration and scholarship. Illustrated. 21/-

WHAT DO YOU KNOW ABOUT MUSIC? — ALBERT E. WIER

Contains over five thousand questions with answers on all matters of musical interest. Boards, 7/6. Cloth, 10/6

BLOWING CLEAR — JOSEPH C. LINCOLN

Humour, love, romance and mystery. One of the best of Mr. Lincoln's many novels. 7/6

TALES FROM FAR AND NEAR

Edited by ERNEST RHYS and C. A. DAWSON-SCOTT

Presenting stories from many countries by well-known authors: André Maurois, Thomas Mann, Willa Cather, with a story by John Galsworthy hitherto unpublished in book form. 7/6

COMRADES OF THE CLOUDS

LAURIE YORK ERSKINE

The life, the dangers and the development of a flying squadron during the war. A book with humour, drama, and the high tension of active service. 7/6

THE RAKE AND THE HUSSY

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

"Interspersed with a good deal of fighting, at which the hussy insists on being present, and all through proves herself delightful."—TRUTH 7/6

THE BOY SCOUTS' YEAR BOOK

It is humour that is the key-note of this new illustrated year book, which is made up of selected stories and articles that Boy Scouts will pronounce genuinely funny. Among the authors are Lord Baden-Powell (the Chief Scout of them all), and other writers of like rank. 7/6

D. APPLETON & CO.
34, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON

THE LONSDALE LIBRARY

Editors: LORD LONSDALE & Mr. ERIC PARKER

NEW VOLUMES

Volume VII

FOXHUNTING

Edited by SIR CHARLES FREDERICK, Bart., M.F.H.

By Earl Bathurst, M.F.H.; Isaac Bell, M.F.H.; Lt.-Col. Geoffry Brooke; Eric Parker; Col. Borwick, M.F.H.; and other M.F.H.

Edition de Luxe, with a special signed frontispiece by Lionel Edwards, limited to 375 numbered copies signed by the editor. Full leather, £5 5s. Quarter leather, 36s., buckram, 25s.

WINTER SPORTS

Edited by THE HON. NEVILLE LYTTON.

By Capt. S. Duff-Taylor, Lord Knebworth, Col. Moore-Brabazon and others. Quarter leather, 25s., Buckram, 15s.

THE LIFE OF THE SEA TROUT

G. H. NALL, M.A., F.R.M.S.

With over 80 illustrations and many diagrams. 21s. net

ENCHANTMENTS OF THE FIELD

Chronicles of Sport and Wild Life

H. A. BRYDEN Many illustrations. 15s. net

THE HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY IN THE GREAT WAR 1914–1919

Edited by MAJOR G. GOOLD-WALKER, D.S.O., M.C.

With many illustrations and maps. De Luxe Edition, 250 copies, £2 2s. net Cloth, 12s. 6d. net

LETTERING

GRAILY HEWITT. 403 illustrations. Edition de Luxe, 375 copies signed by the author, £3 3s. net. Cloth, 15s. net

THE RED MEN OF NIGERIA

CAPTAIN J. R. WILSON-HAFFENDEN. Many illustrations. 21s. net

THE ISLAND BUILDERS OF THE PACIFIC

WALTER IVENS, Litt.D. Many illustrations. 21s. net

THINGS SEEN IN PORTUGAL — M. F. SMITHES

Copiously illustrated. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net. Leather, 5s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE BIBLE

JAMES BAIKIE, D.D., F.R.A.S. 6s. net

Seeley, Service & Co. Ltd

Founded 1795

FOUR IDEAL XMAS GIFTS 3/6

LETTERS FROM ITALY

By KAREL ČAPEK (Author of Letters from England)

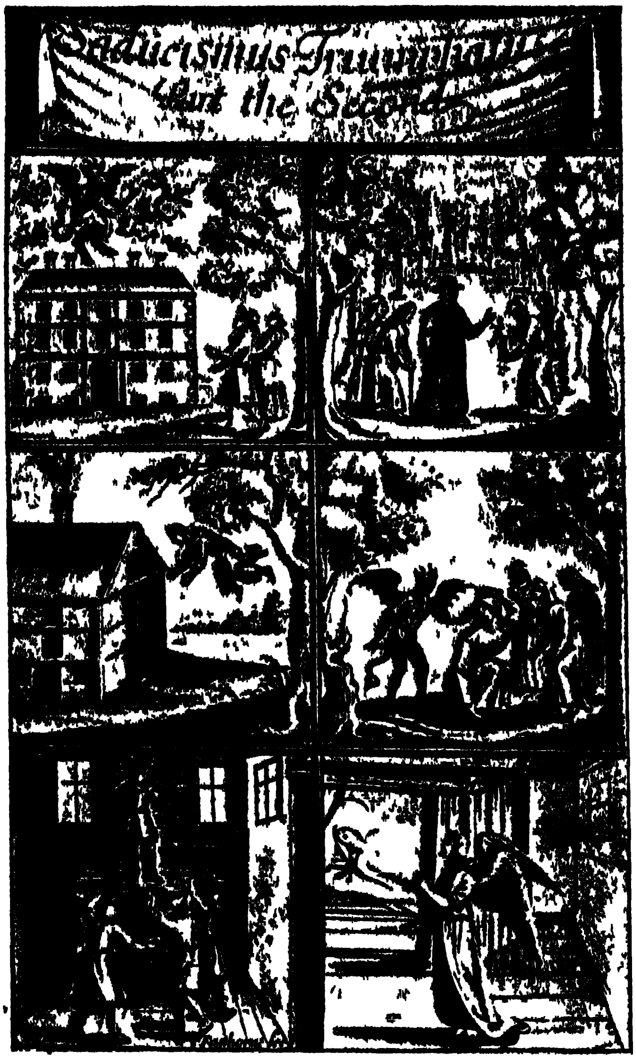
EXCURSIONS IN COMEDY

By HAROLD SIMPSON, with a Foreword by MARIE TEMPEST



EXCURSIONS IN FARCE

By HAROLD SIMPSON, with a Foreword by TOM WALLS

TINKER TAILOR

Written and illustrated by CLAUDE FLIGHT, R.B.A.

BESANT & Co. Ltd.
21, ORANGE STREET, W.C.2

From The Mystery and Lore of Apparitions
By C J S Thompson
(Shaylor)

APPARITIONS FROM "SADUCISMUS TRIUMPHATUS"
(By J Glanvill)

NAVAL CUSTOMS AND TRADITIONS

By Rear Admiral Gerard Wells 8s 6d (Philip Allan)

Practically a small encyclopedia in which are to be found brief explanations of many naval customs, curious observances and slang phrases It is a pity that space is wasted on definitions such as Clean boiled rag a white starch-fronted shirt," and others equally well known to the mere landlubber, when there are so many picturesque phrases to delight the ear and puzzle the understanding of the uninitiated Nevertheless it is a book which will be read with entertainment and profit by all who are interested in the British Navy and the sea generally There are some excellent illustrations from a number of hitherto unpublished originals

GREAT GHOST STORIES

Edited by Harrison Dale 7s 6d (Herbert Jenkins)

No anthology in any branch of writing is worthy of the name unless it has personality behind it and carries out a definite line or policy Mr Dale fulfils both qualifications, and supplies a candid and admirable preface which is one of the best essays one remembers on the ghost story as a fine art He makes the clear and useful postulate that it should be "creative fiction, as distinct from myth, legend, folk-tale, family tradition, personal experiences, psychic investigation and so forth." In the fifteen stories he gives us here he has kept to this stipulation in favour of the imaginative, and the one exception he admits certainly justifies the departure—a typical folk-tale translated from the Irish.

The selection includes examples from eight countries, from Japan to the U S A, and indeed it is hard to decide whether Lafcadio Hearn's belong to the one extreme or the other But the two best in the book are Scottish—"Wandering Willie's Tale" from "Redgauntlet" and Stevenson's "Thrawn Janet," each of them a work of genius unmasking the elements of horror and surprise

The worst limitation in this kind of book is the obvious one of copyright in the case of living writers But Mr Dale has done his best for the reader by indicating many specimens that the connoisseur may find for himself His introduction in fact is the best part of a book which is highly presentable in form, and ought to be a Christmas favourite.

LOBSTER QUADRILLE

By Theodora Benson and Betty Askwith 7s 6d (Grant Richards)

"Lobster Quadrille" is the story of a spoilt girl and a spoilt marriage happily redeemed from the commonplace by the high spirits of its joint narrators We confess ourselves unable to shed tears over the matrimonial sorrows of beautiful Caroline, who is the most unsympathetic heroine we have recently met, and well able to take care of herself To chuckle with her creators over her parents however is an easier matter The wit and freshness of the book is incontestable and it must certainly be read by those who want to keep abreast of the very latest thing in slang as used by smart society

From 39 Months
By D. V. Kelly, M C.
(Ernest Benn).

CARTOON BY LEON ARNAL

New and Recent Books

LACEMAKER LEKHOLM HAS AN IDEA

By GUSTAF HELLSTROM

Translated by F H LYON

"I am deeply impressed by Hellström's power of characterisation I did not find one person, among the considerable crowd of Lekholms in three generations who did not convey the impression of being a living differentiated human being"
J D BERESFORD in the Book Guild Review

7s 6d

CAESAR

By MIRKO JELUSICH

Translated by BERNARD MIALL

This vivid life story of Julius Caesar from his boyhood to his assassination, will hold the reader's interest until the end

10s 6d

FABER: OR THE LOST YEARS

By JACOB WASSERMANN

"As accomplished and fluent as the rest of this author's work of which the most salient feature is a passion for philosophical or metaphysical argument and the ability to class the argument into highly dramatic forms" —Times

7s 6d

PLIGHT OF PERETZ

By NOAH ELSTEIN

"Mr Noah Elstein has written a remarkable and valuable book It is a most subtle brilliant and illuminating picture of Jewish life" —Evening News

7s 6d

AFTER TWO THOUSAND YEARS

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN PLATO AND A MODERN YOUNG MAN

By G LOWES DICKINSON

"A small book in bulk and content but it is packed with ideas of immediate and topical significance It provokes thought and stimulates argument and it should enjoy a widespread currency among readers of a reflective temperament" —Daily Telegraph

6s

MORE POINTS OF VIEW

A SECOND SERIES OF BROADCAST ADDRESSES

By the ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, SIR JAMES JEANS Dame ETHEL SMYTH SIR JOSIAH STAMP Viscount GREY, HILAIRE BELLOC, SIR HENRY NEWBOLT

4s 6d

THE EXPERIMENT OF BOLSHEVISM

By ARTHUR FELLER

Translated by H J STENNING

"The most illuminating study of that strange and sinister experiment in revolution which all the world is watching"
Dean INGE in The Evening Standard

10s 6d

ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Vol II now out

By A F FREMANTLE

"Mr Fremantle's work rings true It is one of the most readable descriptions of life round about 1800 yet published The wonderful bibliography is in itself a contribution to learning"
Education

Vol I, 1801–05, II, 1806–10, 16s each

GEORGE ALLEN & UNWIN LTD

ALSTON RIVERS LTD.

Autumn and Christmas Books

MEMOIRS OF MARIE CORELLI

By BERTHA VYVER 21s. net

"An extremely interesting biography of an exceedingly interesting woman" SHEILA KAYE SMITH in the SUNDAY EXPRESS

HAYDEN COFFIN'S BOOK

10s. 6d. net

Frontispiece by SIR BERNARD PARTRIDGE
Introduction by the late T P O'CONNOR, M P Illustrations by JOHN HASSALL 36 photographs
"Hayden Coffin was the most popular musical comedy man ever known in England"
HANNEN SWAFFER in DAILY EXPRESS

THE LOVER OF LAMBALLE

A ROMANCE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION 7s. 6d. net

By HOWARD GORDON PAGE

Author of "The Shattered Idol" (A Romance of Lord Byron's Life)

"It would be difficult to give this book too much praise" —BIRMINGHAM POST

MARKA OF THE PITS

By E CHIRIKOF 7s. 6d. net

With an Introduction by STEPHEN GRAHAM Translated from the Russian by I ZAKINI
A story of the descendants of the original Volga boatmen

THE EMPEROR'S BEHEST

By J C KEYTE 7s. 6d. net

This book completes J C Keyte's Manchu trilogy of which The Daughter of Cathay and Minsan formed the first two volumes It is a mystery thriller in a Chinese setting, with modern Peking as the centre of operations

HAMLET

A ROMANCE FROM SHAKESPEARE'S PLAY

By MAY WYNNE 7s. 6d. net

This novel has a unique appeal The dark gut is Shakespeare's and the narrative and setting are drawn from the old Scandinavian records and authorities from which tradition tells us the poet dramatist obtained his information

TAKEN FROM LIFE

By GEORGE BELCHER 5s. net

A BOOK OF HUMOROUS CHARACTER STUDIES BY THIS WELL-KNOWN ARTIST

DARLINGS OF THE GODS

By EINAR NERMAN 5s. net

IN MUSIC HALL REVUE AND MUSICAL COMEDY

With an Introduction by IVOR NOVELLO

RHYMES FOR GROWN-UP CHILDREN

By F R S SKEILS 2s. 6d. net

Illustrated by BON
Humorous verses cleverly illustrated guaranteed to arouse laughter in all circumstances

PARTY 'SHUN

By MAJOR WHELLER O B E 3s. 6d. net

A collection of humorous stories gathered by the Author during the War

THE SWEEP AND THE DAFFODIL

By MABEL CONSTANDUROS 3s. 6d. net

A delightfully humorous book of children's poems, monologues, and a play by this popular broadcast artist

GABRIEL

By AUSTIN PRIESTMAN 3s. 6d. net

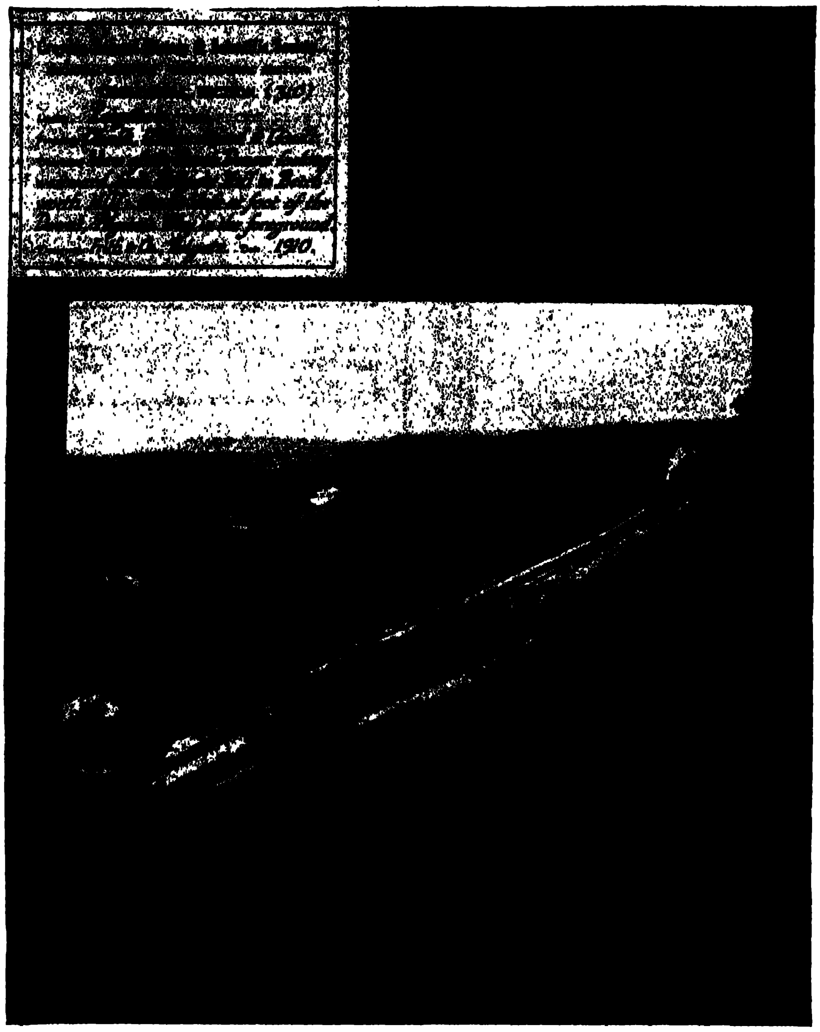
Charmingly whimsical in style and treatment this little volume is destined to become a favourite in every home into which it is introduced



---

ALSTON RIVERS Ltd., 52, Bedford Street, W.C.

AN INTRODUCTION TO REGIONAL SURVEYING

By C. C. Fagg and G. E. Hutchings. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net. (Cambridge Press.)

The interest of this book must of necessity be confined either to those interested in regional research for its own sake or to teachers who wish to use it as an instrument of education. This is not to suggest however that the subject is unimportant. On the contrary modern regional survey is the primary and most important step towards a future progressive development of a place for industrial and social life. We do recommend this book as an intelligible treatment of its subject.

From An Introduction to Regional Surveying
By C. C. Fagg and G. E. Hutchings
(Cambridge University Press).

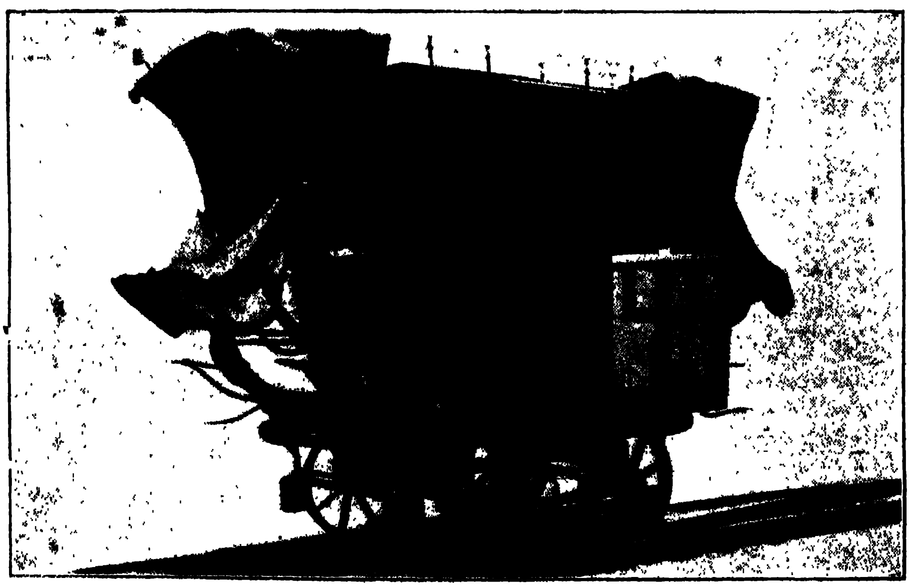
A REDUCED FACSIMILE OF A MOUNTED PHOTOGRAPHIC ILLUSTRATION.

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN AND (INCIDENTALLY) TO YOUNG WOMEN

By William Cobbett. £2 2s. (Knopf.)

The nineteenth century was started well on its course of prig production by having its early years enlivened by the existence of that prince of prigs, Cobbett, a stern moralist, intolerant, uncultured, complacent, insular, the mould from which was cast the ideal figure of John Bull. His "Advice to Young Men and (incidentally) to Young Women" owes most of its remaining edification to the numerous autobiographical anecdotes with which its author sought to drive home his humdrum morality, and still provides with an unsuspected source of entertainment a generation against which Cobbett would have employed, to the point of apoplexy, the highest powers of his invective. The Curwen Press has reprinted the book most delightfully, and further enlivened it with Gillray's stinging caricatures of Cobbett's adventures.

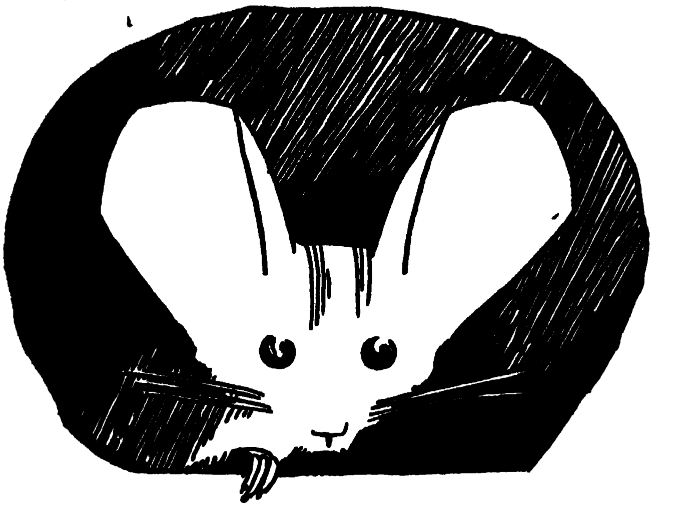
COLLINS' RAILWAY ANNUAL



Edited by John R. Hind. 5s. (Collins.)

Sir Henry Thornton gives this book a good start with his splendid article on "The Biggest Railway in the World," and the other contents are of a high order. Give this to the boy interested in railways. In between the assimilation of the chapters of introduction to the wonders of organisation and equipment, he will be able to read good stories of adventure and achievement. That is to say, the book attains its object—to be instructive and entertaining. The pictures in colour and line are pleasant to the eye and truly descriptive.

THE WONDER BOOK OF INVENTIONS



6s. (Ward, Lock.)

Messrs. Ward, Lock's Wonder Books have achieved well-deserved fame, and the present one has found tremendous scope in the amazing inventions and developments of recent years. These are not only well and lucidly described, but handsomely illustrated. All children of an inquiring mind will revel in the fascinating pages, and add considerably thereby to their store of general knowledge.

From Collins' Railway Annual (Collins).

AN EARLY AUSTRIAN RAILWAY COACH.

From How You Work
By Isabel Wilson
(Gerald Howe).

SOME EARS COLLECT A LOT OF NOISE.

From Biography for Beginners
By E. C. Bentley
(Werner Laurie).

"THE ART OF BIOGRAPHY IS DIFFERENT FROM GEOGRAPHY. GEOGRAPHY IS ABOUT MAPS, BUT BIOGRAPHY IS ABOUT CHAPS."

HOW YOU WORK

An Introduction to the Human Body.

By Isabel Wilson 3s. 6d. (Howe)

It is very difficult to explain in simple language the intricate mechanism of the body, but Miss Wilson has done this in the best possible way, and in a way that will appeal to all intelligent children. As Professor J. Arthur Thomson says in his admirable preface, hers is a book "full of quiet wisdom and good humour," and one to be earnestly recommended.

From Star-Dust in Hollywood
By Jan and Cora Gordon
(Harrap).

COUNTING THE RHYTHM INTO IT.

BACKWATER

By T. S. Stribling 7s. 6d. (Heinemann)

The scene of Mr. Stribling's new novel is laid in Arkansas. His hero is young Jim Murdoch, who returns from his college course at the State University with two ambitions—to pursue a scientific career and to marry Mary Meredith, who has been at college with him. Neither hope seems likely to be fulfilled, for

"THE TAILOR PLACED CLOPINET ON HIS DONKEY AND STARTED ON HIS WAY."
From Tales of a Grandmother
By George Sand
Translated by Margaret Bloom
(Lippincott).

Bill Murdoch, his father, combines with his cotton-growing the activities of whisky distilling and bootlegging, while Mary's father, who owns the neighbouring plantation near a Mississippi backwater, is as much respected for his aristocracy and his supposed integrity as Bill is notorious for his crimes. All turns out well at last, however, after a disastrous flood, of which we are given a vivid and moving account. The plot indeed, is the least noteworthy feature of the story. Mr. Stribling's strength lies in his fine descriptive powers and in his natural, vital characterisation, whether of white folk or of niggers. This is by far the most satisfying novel that he has, written. It is like all his work, full of colour. But it sacrifices nothing to sensationalism and is thoroughly convincing

Scythians... as portrayed by a Greek artist....

From Outline of History
By H. G. Wells.
(Cassell).

ONE OF THE FEW EXISTING REPRESENTATIONS OF THE ANCIENT SCYTHIANS.
(From a Greek electrum vase.)

OUR ROUGH ISLAND STORY

"1066 And All That." By W. C. Sellar and R. J. Yeatman. 5s. (Methuen.)
"Kings and Other Things." By Hugh Chesterman. 5s. (Methuen.)
"Biography for Beginners." Words by E. C. Bentley. Pictures by G. K. Chesterton. 3s. 6d. (Werner Laurie.)

Most historians differ as to method and these histories belong distinctly to opposed schools of thought. Messrs. Sellar and Yeatman believe in a laborious and scholarly conspectus of English history, from almost the earliest times till nearly the present day, with everything in its proper perspective. Nor do they shirk moral judgments where these are desirable. Mr. Chesterman is more selective and approaches events from the biographical point of view. He, too, seizes surely on the salient points of his subject and, to help the student's memory, casts his narratives into verse form. Mr. Bentley, in his standard work, here reprinted for the fifth time, foreshadowed the modern school of iconoclastic writers in stressing aspects of the private lives of his heroes which were not generally known to the public and which made imperative revised estimates of them.

To illustrate these various methods, we will take the three writers' words on Sir Christopher Wren. In "1066 and All That," we read simply:

> "In the following year, therefore, London was set on fire in case anyone should have been left over from the Plague, and St. Paul's Cathedral was built instead. This was also a Good Thing and was the cause of Sir Christopher Wren, the memorable architect."

In "Kings and Other Things," a page and a half is devoted to him and, among other things, we learn that

> "All day long he'd measure and limn
> Till the ink gave out or the light grew dim,
> And if a Plan
> Seemed rather baroque or too 'Queen Anne'
> (As Plans well may),
> He'd take a look
> At his pattern book
> And do it again in a different way."

This of course shows Wren in the best light. Mr. Bentley hints darkly at the other side of his character (indexed in fact under "Principle, absence of") in his four lines:

> "Sir Christopher Wren
> Said: 'I am going to dine with some men.
> If anybody calls,
> Say I am designing St. Paul's.'"

And there one has it.

From The Englishman and His Books By Amy Cruse (Harrap).

"DON'T TEASE ME, HENRY," SAID LUCY, "DON'T YOU SEE I AM READING."

From The Annals of Covent Garden and Its Neighbourhood By E. Beresford Chancellor (Hutchinson). Reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

BOW STREET POLICE COURT IN THE TIME OF SIR JOHN FIELDING. (After Rowlandson.)

AUTUMN BOOKS

Alfred Tresidder Sheppard

has delighted all with THE ART AND PRACTICE OF HISTORICAL FICTION (12s. 6d.). "Good humour, easy learning, and lively enthusiasm."—MARJORIE BOWEN, in the Morning Post. "Here is indeed entertainment."—H. L. MORROW, in Everyman. "I have thoroughly enjoyed reading it."—JOHN DRINKWATER, in the Daily Telegraph. "One of the fullest, most companionable, and most fascinating books we have seen for a long time."—Manchester City News.

SHEPPARD: HISTORICAL FICTION: 12s. 6d.

The Proper Study

of mankind being its noble self, we need not recommend a book whose title is THIS HUMAN NATURE (12s 6d.), especially when the author is CHARLES DUFF, the witty Irishman whose satirical skirmish with the execution industry, "A Handbook on Hanging," is one of the best modern examples of belligerent gaiety. From wrestling in the ketch-as-ketch-can style, Mr. Duff has turned to grapple with the immense oddity of man.

DUFF: THIS HUMAN NATURE. 12s. 6d.

"How to Manage" and Others

The Quite Impossible She is the theme of HENRY SAVAGE'S HOW TO MANAGE OUR WOMEN. "An engaging book . . . written in the style of Anita Loos, plus the Letters of Eve plus 'Paludes,' by M. André Gide"—HAROLD NICOLSON, in the Daily Express. (7s. 6d.) Of PIERRE LOVING'S CAT OF HEAVEN, novel-biography of Baudelaire, ALICE HERBERT writes: "The book is a wonder. It might have been the work of half a lifetime. Every personality of its period comes in and fits into the mosaic of the background; while the poet himself is first studied and then painted with amazing understanding . . . could hardly have been better told." (7s. 6d.) MARITA LEE in her first novel, OBSESSION, tells a poignant story of a wife's attachment to a fickle husband (7s. 6d) "A cleverly planned piece of work"—Times Lit Supp.

SAVAGE: HOW TO MANAGE OUR WOMEN: 7s. 6d
LOVING: CAT OF HEAVEN: 7s. 6d.
LEE: OBSESSION: 7s. 6d

Muirhead Bone Writes

a charming foreword to MARGARET HOLDEN'S NEAR NEIGHBOURS. A new house, a garden to be made, how it is peopled by families of bird friends; tragedies and comedies in their lives; many years of observation have gone to make the book. LAURENCE ANGUS'S wood-engravings are a joy in themselves; cunning work by one who is artist and bird lover too. (6s. and 10s. 6d)

HOLDEN: NEAR NEIGHBOURS: 7s. 6d

The Modern Boy Wants

a book that tells him quite straightforwardly how engineering marvels are accomplished. We have found it for him in W. D. BINGER'S WHAT ENGINEERS DO (7s. 6d.). Not a "children's book," but just what the lover of meccano and model railways wants. Appeal to the same quarter is made by OLD MAN OF THE WOODS (2s 6d). Its author, MARCUS WOODWARD, is well known to Guides and Scouts.

BINGER: WHAT ENGINEERS DO: 7s. 6d.
WOODWARD: OLD MAN OF THE WOODS: 2s. 6d.

Austen Illustrates a New Poet

JOHN AUSTEN has found a happy subject for his pen in THE GUARDSMAN AND CUPID'S DAUGHTER, a fresh and engaging poem from a new poet, VILLIERS DAVID. Five hundred copies signed by the artist at 7s. 6d.

DAVID: GUARDSMAN AND CUPID'S DAUGHTER: 7s. 6d.

Gifts at Three-and-Six

Theodora Benson SALAD DAYS
"Welcome and delightful"—GERALD GOULD

Ernest Bramah THE MIRROR OF KONG-HO
"Treasure Trove"—J. C. SQUIRE

Princess Mirza Riza VIOLA OF THE OLD STREET
"A romantic tale . . a touching tale."—MARY GRIGS

Kenelm Foss NUNCS CAUSEWAY
"Delightful study of London's Bohemia."—Star

And for those who like "thrillers"—

Howel Evans THE MURDER TRAP
"A capital plot."—Manchester C News

Johnson & Palmer MURDER AND MYSTERY
"A fascinating book."—Liverpool D. Courier

Jerrard Tickell YOLAN OF THE PLAINS
"I mark this—Very Good!"—ALFRED TRESIDDER SHEPPARD

Lists and Prospectuses from 21, Soho Square, W.1

HUMPHREY TOULMIN

FREE! A Lesson in Short Story Writing and Free-Lance Journalism given free to all who have Literary Ambition.

Kennedy Williamson, M.A., well known as an author, editor and journalist, will criticise, free of charge, an article or story (up to 5,000 words). His criticism will be quite candid and all MSS. should be addressed to him personally.

Kennedy Williamson, M.A., Director of Studies of the A B C Writer's Course

This offer is made by the A B C Correspondence Schools in order that anyone interested in Journalism and Story-Writing may see what can be done by practical tuition. There is no obligation to take the Course, but a specimen of the tuition given will convince the majority that without technical training no one can hope for substantial results.

MAKE WRITING YOUR BUSINESS

No Capital! No Office!

NO BIG EXPENSES!

The Writing business demands no capital, no shop, no office; just a table and chair, pen and ink, and—knowledge of how to write articles and stories, and what to do with them when produced.

Famous authors who contribute to the Course:

GILBERT FRANKAU
H. DE VERE STACPOOLE
ELINOR MORDAUNT
"SAPPER"

Whatever your age or sex, and however you are situated, provided you can give a reasonable time to study and will sincerely follow the advice and work out the suggestions given, you will find in THE A B C WRITER'S COURSE invaluable aid.

The A B C Course is conducted by Correspondence, which permits of spare-time study Individual tuition is given to every student Arrangements can be made for sections of the Course to be taken separately if desired. The fees are moderate and the methods of instruction are essentially practical and approach the subject of constructing articles and stories with an appreciation of the amateur's difficulties.

The Course is fully described in an interesting booklet, "WORDCRAFT," supplied free on request. This booklet is well worth the attention of all who have any literary ambition. Write to-day—do not send a specimen of work unless you wish—and you will receive a copy of "WORDCRAFT" by return.

The ABC WRITER'S COURSE
Dept. 61,
3, Pilgrim Street, Ludgate Hill, E.C.4

88 SHORT STORIES

By Guy de Maupassant. 8s. 6d. (Knopf)

This is one of the most valuable omnibuses yet published. It contains "Yvette," "That Pig, Morin," "The Olive Orchard" and "Useless Beauty," four of Maupassant's chief collections in which are some of his finest short stories

HAROLD BELL WRIGHT.
Author of "Exit"
(Appleton).

With the translation by Ernest Boyd and Storm Jameson, Mr Knopf's three-and-sixpenny series (from which the omnibus is reprinted) has made us familiar It is easy and competent, if not particularly distinguished Exactly one-third of Maupassant's stories are here presented Mr Knopf could do a great service by giving us the remaining two-thirds in two more omnibuses It is high time that such stories as "La Maison Tellier" were made more easily accessible in a good English version

From George Eliot
By J Lewis May
(Cassell).

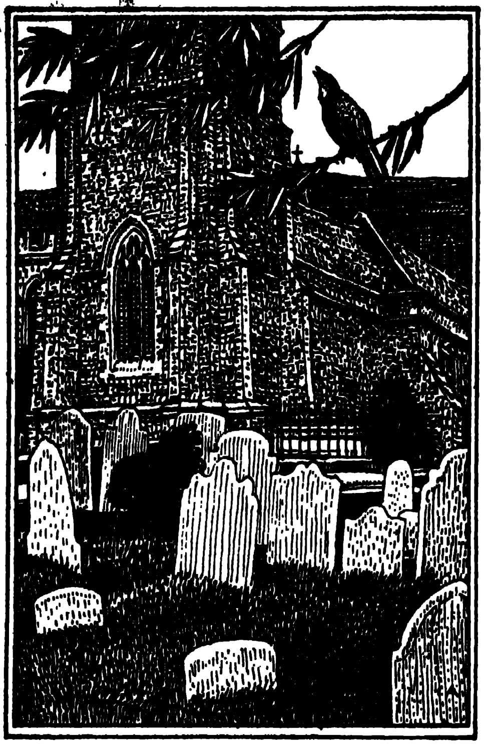
GEORGE ELIOT IN 1842.
From the water colour by her friend Mrs Charles Bray
(Copyright National Portrait Gallery)



From Meet Jane
By Evadne Price
(Marriott)

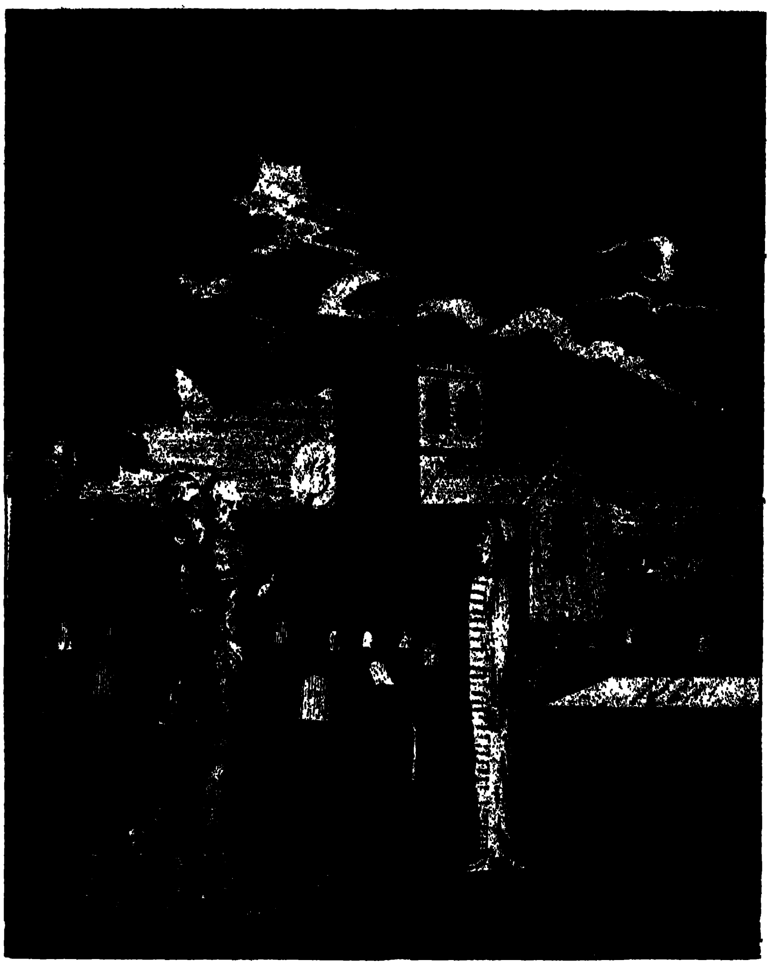
MISS EVADNE PRICE.



MR. S. F. HATTON.
Author of "The Yarn of a Yeoman"
(Hutchinson).

From The Glance Backward
By Richard Church
(Dent).

A DRAWING BY ROBERT AUSTIN.

From The Mystery and Lore of Apparitions
By C. J. S. Thompson
(Shayler).

A GHOST APPEARING TO MAGICIANS.
(From an eighteenth century engraving.)

THE ROMANCE OF THE BIBLE

By Dr. James Baikie, F.R.A.S. 6s. (Seeley, Service.)

In a fascinating fashion Dr. Baikie tells the story of the Bible's coming to Britain and to the world, from the Septuagint down to the translations made by modern missionaries for heathen lands—of course taking Wycliffe and the version of King James on the road. The method is strictly historical. That is, we are led down the ages and made to note the growth of the original Bible and the different versions of it which each successive age brought forth. Both text and illustrations are excellent, and for teachers the volume is ideal.

II
THE ROAMING LIFE

From The Wind on the Heath
By John Sampson
(Chatto & Windus).

THE ROAMING LIFE.

From My Oul' Town
By Louise McKay
(Stanley Paul).

"I SIT BY THE FIRE AND TALK TO THE KETTLE."

PEREGRINE

By B. Dyke Acland. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

This novel will certainly enhance the writer's already considerable reputation. The first half of the book is a very charming and amusing description of the childhood of two engaging scamps, Peregrine and Tom Okewood, the children of an equally engaging and original father, an ex-naval captain. The chronicle of the nursery, the dame school, and the preparatory school is written with sparkling humour and notable literary skill. The story is episodic in character and moves swiftly on to Peregrine's no less interesting and masterful career as a man of business. At every stage of his progress Peregrine is a fresh and attractive figure, and he is seen at his best in his wooing of Ursula who, with excellent humour and understanding, steers him into a political career. It is a pleasure to acclaim this clean and clever book, which arrests one, also, by the terseness of its style.

Princess Pocahontas.
(Drawing by John Hassall.)
From Hayden Coffin's Book
By Hayden Coffin
(Alston Rivers).

FRENCH WINES

By Paul de Cassagnac. Translated by Guy Knowles. 6s.
(Chatto & Windus.)

This is neither an exhaustive study of the subject nor one of those rather self-consciously literary essays on the pleasures of wine. It is a thoroughly sound and useful book for the ordinary wine-drinker of average means. There is a particularly good chapter on the choice of the right dishes to accompany fine wines.

From Love in Ambush
By Barbara Willard and Elizabeth Devas
(Gerald Howe).

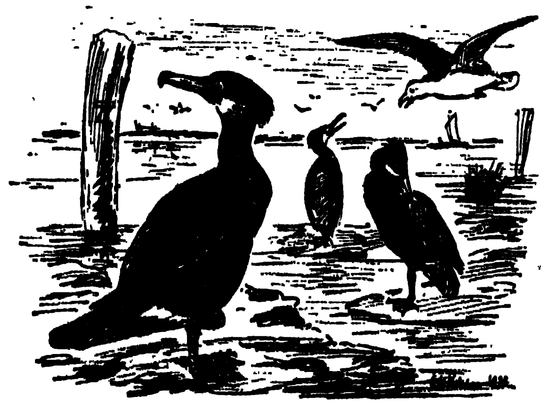
A Decoration by Barbara Willard.



From The Children's Book of Wild Flowers and the Story of Their Names
By Gareth H. Browning
(Chambers).

The Hop Clover. The Flax.

MORE POINTS OF VIEW

4s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

This is a second collection of addresses which have already been heard on the wireless. The topics are various. Perhaps the best way of giving an idea of their themes is to list the speakers. These are: The Archbishop of York, Viscount Grey, Sir James Jeans, Dame Ethel Smyth, Sir Josiah Stamp, Sir Henry Newbolt, and Mr. Hilaire Belloc. Every name, it will be seen, is weighty; and the addresses were well worth preserving in this permanent form.

From A Norfolk Naturalist
By Arthur H. Patterson
(Methuen).

Cormorants.

BOOK FRIENDS

A GOOD introduction is the first step towards friendship, whether between man and man, or between a booklover and his books.

Let The Times Literary Supplement be your introduction to the new publications that each week brings from the press. For 26 years it has performed that service for thousands of booklovers in all parts of the world.

Its reviews are famous for their impartiality, their wide knowledge, and their literary charm. No other journal can do so much to increase your circle of book friends.

The Times LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

gives week by week reviews of all important new publications. In addition, it contains a leading article upon some subject of current literary interest; a full bibliography of the week's publications; notes on sales; and other features of interest to the booklover.

Of All Newsagents and Bookstalls

EVERY THURSDAY 3d.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICES

Post Free

3 mths.	6 mths.	12 mths.
4/4	8/8	17/4

The Times Literary Supplement can be ordered from Newsagents and Bookstalls; or from THE PUBLISHER, PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4

The

MODERN GIFT for the ENTIRE FAMILY

'On Christmas Day let a Royal Portable begin a long life of usefulness for every member of your family.

They can quickly and pleasantly record the many valuable ideas that take life in quiet hours at home—and personal correspondence becomes a less exacting task.

The Royal Portable is made with the same precision as the famous, easy-writing business model Royal—and you can pay while you type if you like.

ROYAL

PORTABLE TYPEWRITERS

ROYAL TYPEWRITERS: 75, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.4
Phone: Royal 7601 (10 lines)

Please send me particulars of the Royal Portable and details of the Hire-Purchase Terms (439).

Name..........

Address..........

....

THE VISIBLE WRITING MACHINE CO., LTD., LONDON

From English Children's Costume Since 1775 By Iris Brooke (Black).

1835-1840.

ENGLISH CHILDREN'S COSTUME SINCE 1775

Drawn and Described by Iris Brooke. With an Introduction by James Laver. 6s. (Black.)

It is rather alarming to realise, as one turns the pages of this unique and uncommonly fascinating little book, how dominated we have always been by Dame Fashion. Miss Brooke has made a careful study of the subject, and shows us in pictures, amplified by brief word-descriptions, the manner in which fashions in children's clothes have changed since they first began to vary from adult fashions towards the end of the eighteenth century. From simplicity to elaboration and back again to simplicity the costumes of little boys and girls have progressed through gradual transitions. Merely from the point of view of general interest the book is extremely useful, but to those who for any reason want accuracy and precise details it will be more useful still, and Miss Brooke is to be congratulated on an unusual piece of work capably carried out.

THE CHURCH AND THE PEOPLE

By Canon T. Guy Rogers, M.C., B.D. 7s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

This very valuable and stimulating book ranges over a variety of topics such as those implied in its sub-title, "Problems of Reunion, Sex, Marriage, Women's Ministry, etc." The background of the whole treatment is Canon Rogers's conception of reunion. He hopes for a reunion which is not a mere absorption of other Churches by the Church of England, but rather a sort of federation in which each Church shall keep its own distinctive witness. How, this attained, the other problems might be dealt with, Canon Rogers proceeds to show. His answers to the many questions thus raised cannot of course be treated at length here. But a word of real welcome must be given to a work so thoughtful, so carefully wrought out on a basis of impartial inquiry, so finely catholic in spirit. Canon Rogers speaks very plainly—for instance, in regard to some of the findings of the Lambeth Conference—and is obviously impatient with the "die-hards" of every denomination. If every book on Church questions were like this, and had as much vision and sympathy behind it, some of to-day's religious problems would seem less insoluble than they sometimes do.

SIMPLE STORIES FROM "PUNCH"

By Archibald Marshall. 6s. (Dent.)

With an ambiguous smile the author turns to the task of betraying the foibles of our history, legend, and next-door neighbour (excluding of course ourselves) in twenty-four patently unsophisticated but slyly uproarious tales. Some readers may fear that Mr. Marshall is rather over dubious as to our sense of justice ("The Fur Box"), and that he is not sufficiently respectful to our leading human belief in the omnipotence of the Public School production ("The Cannibal"), but not even the most carping can deny the sovereignty of his imagination and humour. The Artist, The Jumble Sale, and the Joint of Meat rival the best of George Morrow's delicious drawings, which accompany the prose. In that Mr. Everyman will meet, with a private chuckle, relations, acquaintances and friends.

From Simple Stories from "Punch" By Archibald Marshall (Dent).

BROWN JUKES QUITE ENJOYED PAINTING HER.

FICTION AND MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE

THE ROMANCE OF THE HEAVENS

By Gerald Beavis. Illustrated. 6s. net. (Sampson Low.)

There are two things which amaze one in reading this book. First, what an extraordinary knowledge of the universe scientists possess, and second, more humbling thought, what a colossal amount they have yet to learn. Let us say at once that Mr. Beavis has performed his difficult task with distinction, and as a popular survey of the methods by which men explore the heavens and the state of our knowledge up to date, it is as good as anything we have yet encountered. The photographs are a history in themselves.

The chief difficulties astronomers had seem to have been theological, but now that sort of repression is past, our universe becomes more wonderful to us, and more and more are we led to detect mind and providential purpose behind it. A book like this does much to answer the ordinary man's questions in a way that inspires as well as instructs.

From English Children's Costume Since 1775 By Iris Brooke (Black).

1835-1840.

From The Four Leaf Clever By Owen Rutter Illustrated by Doris McLaren (Elkin Mathews).

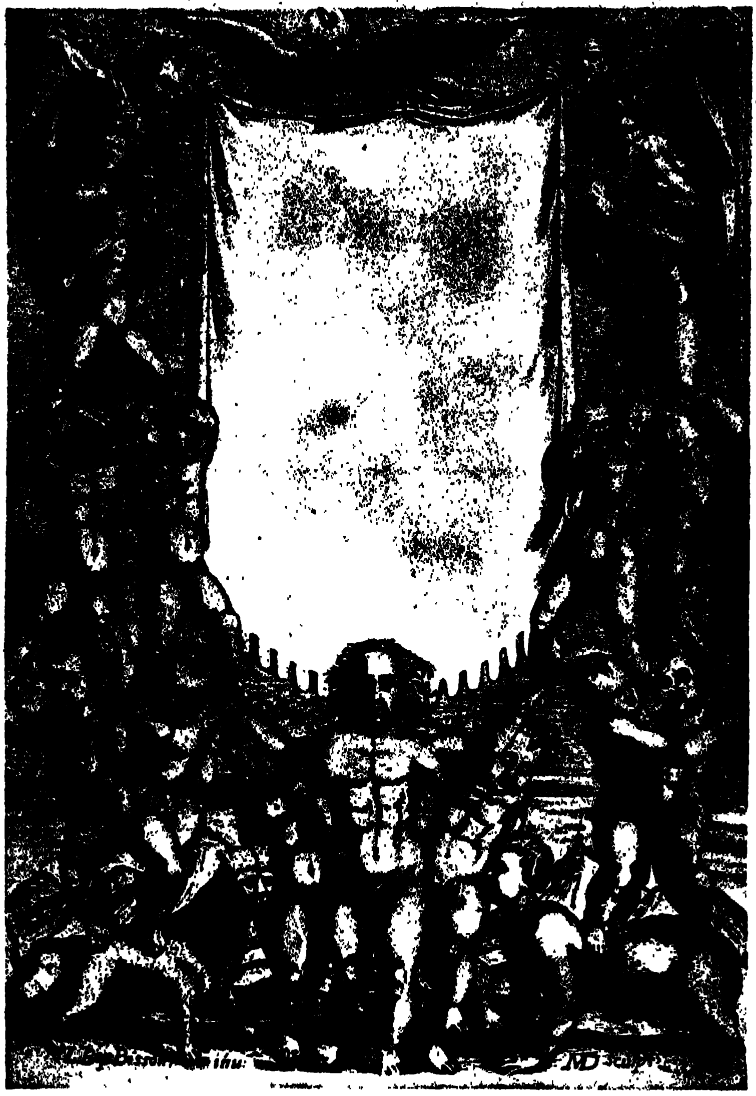
THE CASE FOR THE SEA-SERPENT

By R. T. Gould. 12s. 6d. (Philip Allan.)

After reading Mr. Gould's book, even the most sceptical will be inclined to agree that the author has made out an exceedingly good case for the existence of this semi-mythological monster. Having collected, collated and examined a vast amount of evidence on the subject, he is satisfied that the creature exists and is either a marine serpent proper or a survival of the supposedly extinct pleiosaurus. But whether one accepts his conclusions or not, the book makes fascinating reading, for of necessity it records many sea adventures sufficiently thrilling apart from their value as evidence in the case under discussion.

THE BLUE RIBAND

The Romance of the Atlantic Ferry



By Charles E. Lee. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

The Blue Riband has long been applied to the fastest Atlantic passage between Europe and America, but Mr. Lee very properly extends his story to the rise and progress of the steamship lines which have catered for the transatlantic passenger and mail traffic even before Samuel Cunard started the race in earnest. And in these days when daring pioneers are conquering the air with new epics of courage and tragedy, there is an added interest in Mr. Lee's chapters on the American, British and German struggles to win in speed and size on the great waters between New World and Old. Nothing is omitted: from a table of record runs and details of the largest liners down to the many colour and half-tone illustrations of famous steamships; from Britannia, the first 1840 Cunarder, to the Norddeutscher Lloyd Europa of 1930.

THE NARRATIVE OF JASPER WEEPLE

By J. R. Sutherland.
7s. 6d.
(Eric Partridge.)

A strange land whose people are ignorant of our world and its ways and needs to have its customs and beliefs logically explained is always a fascinating theme for the satirist. Mr. Sutherland employs it with much freshness, wit and originality in his entertaining story, told by Jasper Weeple. In this instance, the mysterious country is hidden away somewhere in the middle of England, some magic has concealed it from the makers of maps and only an occasional wanderer has found the way to it. Jasper finds the way, guided by an old document that comes into his hands at Oxford. Its inhabitants have a habit of falling into deep slumber which lasts for several years, and is only disturbed when a stranger accidentally roams into their midst and kisses the princess. Jasper's sojourn in Midanglia, his extraordinary adventures, his endeavours to describe familiar things in the world he comes from to an innocent, unenlightened, newly awakened people, are related with delicious humour. But the sceptic may, if he wishes, accept the theory of Jasper's uncle, the Reverend Daniel Weeple, who doubted the mentality of his young relative when, having disappeared into oblivion, he returned with such an amazing explanation of his absence.

From Mystery and Lore of Monsters
By C. J. S. Thompson
(Williams & Norgate).

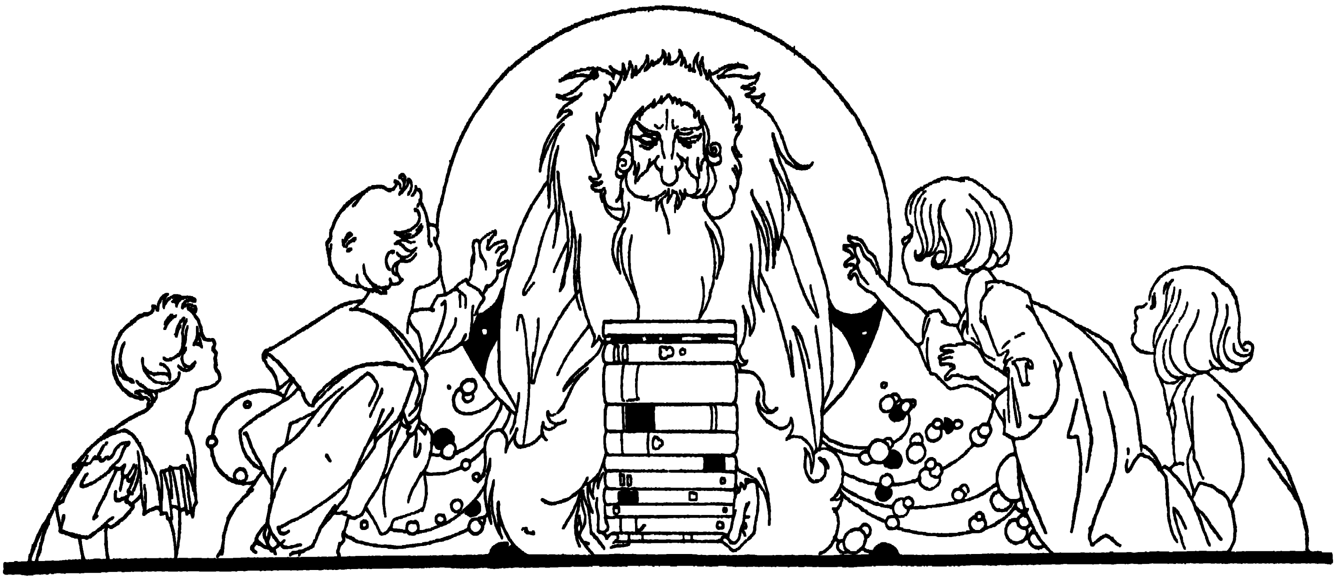
"De Monstrorum Natura," Fortunio Licetus, 1634.
(Engraved by J. Bap. Bissonina, M.B.)

SALLY AMONG THE STARS



By Concordia Merrel.
7s. 6d.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

How charming and simple, how countrified and sweet is this heroine, Sally! She is as white as milk, as red as roses and as frisky as an innocent lamb. "Sally didn't scamp her work (in the hat shop that gave such a starvation wage); Sally didn't dance all night and every night; Sally didn't talk about boys; Sally didn't make casual dates; nor did she use rouge or lipstick. Naturally they couldn't make head or tail of Sally." She is kidnapped in a very charming sort of way in a long, low, lovely car by a young man who says to her: "You see, buttercups and daisies was my standard, and you absolutely come up to it." Read the romance yourself to see why he carried her off. The film studio is realistically pictured and the film actresses are vividly outlined. For the young and sentimental this is the very novel.

From William III and The Defence of Holland, 1672–4
By Mary Caroline Trevelyan
(Longmans).

The Entrance of William III into Utrecht, 1672.
(From a contemporary print in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.)

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

From Cinderella
(Dean)

A Royal Footman finds Cinderella's Slipper

FATHER CHRISTMAS, HIS BOOKSHELF

Whatever there be of slump or sadness in the world, Father Christmas will have none of it.

He comes in as jolly as ever, with his gifts for good boys and girls and even for bad ones. Christmas gift-books for children have been coming back in increasing numbers since the War. When the Christmas gift-books dwindled we shed at least a lot of rubbish. I can remember a pre-War time when many books for children tended to be blatantly foolish. I am sure the children would have none of them, but one felt sorry for the poor child upon whom some indiscriminating person had foisted such a folly. I find nothing foolish in the Christmas gift-books of this year. Though they are all good in a degree, the best of all are those written for children by writers of quality, who still understand the mind of a child and realise the effect on the child's mind of what it reads.

Easily first in my budget comes Laurence Housman's "Turn Again Tales."[1] This book will mean happiness to the child who receives it. Laurence Housman is a poet of distinction, as well as an artist. He has put his mind and heart into these charming tales, simple, gay and beautiful. The children who pore over this book will learn precious things from it. I commend it most heartily to all who would choose a book for children. It sends one's mind back to those early short stories of Mr. Housman's which were instinct with the Franciscan spirit. The book is charmingly illustrated and produced in a way that befits the matter.

"The Heroes of Asgard"[2] reminds one of the very excellent novels of Annie Keary which had so high a repute in the last half of last century. She may be forgotten in the wild rush of books to-day; if she were here to say it she might say perhaps, as Wordsworth said to Coleridge—or vas it the other way about?—"Let us stand aside while this crowd goes by." Her "Heroes of Asgard" at least is not forgotten. Here is a charming new edition for the children, illustrated by C. E. Brock, which might pair worthily with Laurence Housman's book. There is wit and imagination in these stories and a knowledge of what will appeal to the mind of a child. There will be much delight for the winter evenings by the nursery fire with this reissue of a book which the children's elders loved long ago.

From No. 8 Joy Street (Blackwell). MR. DAPPOM AND HIS FRIEND.

For children who will delight in the last two books reviewed "No. 8, Joy Street"[3] will make a joyous third. I have my Joy Streets up to No. 4, and I shall certainly fill the gap, because these annuals are just the kind of books to be borrowed from the nursery by discriminating grown-ups. Like all Mr. Basil Blackwell's publications, it is beautifully produced with an originality in design which takes the eye and the heart at once. The colour plates are quite beautiful, and when I give a few names from the list of contributors, it will be enough to vouch for the quality: Laurence Housman, Algernon Blackwood, Madeleine Nightingale, Eleanor Farjeon—all the names are those who have the art of writing for the children and their elders. There is a piquancy in Mr. Algernon Blackwood's presence, and I am delighted to find again Mr. Compton Mackenzie among the contributors to this children's annual. Since he wrote his first book for children—that midsummer book full of beauty, with quips and cranks and imagination and fantasy—I have closed my eyes to the Compton Mackenzie of the novels and have rejoiced in this one.

This book is so excellent that one looks for one or two names expecting to find them. Rose Fyleman and Walter de la Mare come to mind, and "No. 9, Joy Street" should

From The Book of Simon By A. S. M. Hutchinson (Hodder & Stoughton). THIS ASTOUNDING CONCENTRATION OF THOUGHT.

From Warne's Pleasure Book for Children (Warne).

"IF YOU PLEASE, I'VE HURT MY FOOT!"

give us a story by Mr. Denis Mackail—but even with these omissions the book is admirable. Every nursery should have the whole set of Joy Street. There is nothing better among the children's books.

Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson has given us "The Book of Simon,"[4] inspired doubtless by his own little son. The alluring little picture on the cover draws one on to read, but one comes to the conclusion that it is rather the book for adoring parents than for children. Mr. Hutchinson's "If Winter Comes" had a success, which I had heard ascribed to the fact that most men saw something of themselves in the hero. Many children might see something of themselves in Simon, but I am not sure that the objective is the best way to please the children who are seldom interested in each other. The child I know best at this time has listened attentively to the reading aloud of a novel in proof, showing so much interest that his elders were puzzled, till they made the discovery that he took all the grown-ups in the story for children. Their ways must have been piquant, taken for the ways of children, but no doubt the patient listener of six years was the more interested because of the unexpectedness.

TAIL-PIECE TO "LOBSTER POTS."
From The Adventures of Mr. Woggins
By Olwen Bowen
(Collins).

There is a certain egoism in children that would prevent their being immensely interested in the minds and ways of other small children unless they had a wicked appeal. Mr Hutchinson's book is certain to be bought largely by the parents.

Once again "The Greatest Story in the World" is told for children in the "Greatest Gift,"[5] by Maurice Kerr and Eleanor E. Helme, with coloured plates by Harold Copping. Doubtless the children never tire of this story. The book is composed of episodes from the Old Testament leading up to the New Testament, told in a simple explanatory way to prepare the children for a further knowledge later on. It is sure to be much in demand this Christmas.

And now we come to the Christmas Annuals, always so surprisingly good and cheap and so diversified in their contents. "Arthur Mee's Story Book"[6] strikes an original note in these annuals. It is composed of stories, every one true, which appeared in the Children's Newspaper. Each of these stories is written about some wonderful true tale of courage, self-sacrifice, self-abnegation. Nothing could be better for growing boys and girls. The stories deal with all the ages and inclusiveness is shown by the telling of something so recent, so easily overlooked by the general reader, as the story of Kevin O'Higgins's condemnation of Rory O'Connor to death as a hard duty, and the recognition his motive met with when Rory O'Connor left all he possessed to the friend who had so condemned him. This annual is of the stuff to make brave men and women.

Here are all the old favourites in "Granny's Book of Fairy Stories"[7]—it is very ample and one misses none of the immortalities which have descended from child to child through the years of the world. The stories are told with a simple picturesqueness and just enough humour—for be it remembered that children have their own sense of humour and are apt to take their fairy stories seriously. This is an amazing three-and-sixpenny worth.

"Cassell's Annual"[8] is another full and excellent Annual, but one feels a little blankly that we often do not know who to thank for the pleasant stories and pictures. However, Cassell's Annual is an old and tried friend, and the children will not ask any questions when it comes to their lot to receive it once again, because the children are faithful, and "good wine needs no bush" might have been their adage.

"Warne's Pleasure Book for Children"[9] has a gay gold cover which is a symbol in itself of the good things

From Bunny and Brownie
By Ida Rentoul Outhwaite
(Black).

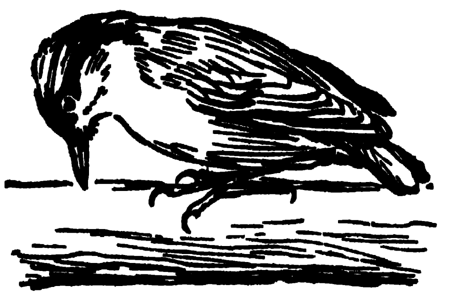
BUNNY BUSY WITH HIS PEN.



From Heroes of Asgard
By G A and E Keary
(Macmillan)

HEAD-PIECE.

within it These stories and pictures are for little children, and nicely calculated to please them, and there are the things children love—birds and beasts and all manner of good and pleasant things. "Warne's Pleasure Book" is fittingly named As regards small children, it should much ease the cares of nurses and mothers, keeping the little ones happy and content while the ordinary tasks are being accomplished.

"Open and See"[10] is another of these children's Annuals of which the same things can be said. You need not pass by "Open and See" when choosing a book for small children

"The Children's Treasury"[11] is a little different in that, with stories, poems and pictures, it also gives the children instruction how to amuse themselves by using their fingers as well as their eyes There are all sorts of ingenious devices here to relieve the tedium

From Old Man of the Woods
By Marcus Woodwood
(Toulmin)

THE NUTHATCH.

of too much reading, for children love variety It is a winter store house against tedium in the long afternoons

"Bunny and Brownie"[12] comes out of its due place in this review I should have placed it between "The Heroes of Asgard" and "No 8, Joy Street," if it was only for its charming pictures I think they are quite the prettiest of any of the Christmas gift-books I have seen this year The little stories in which Bunny and Brownie figure are told with just the right simplicity and naïveté for imaginative nursery readers. Mrs Outhwaite is a very notable addition to the workers in children's literature. The children deserve the best we can give them, and the pictures in this book are certainly of the best, while the letterpress is in happy keeping with them What dear, delightful, moth-winged fairies! One wants to be a child again to possess this book.

KATHARINE TYNAN

From The White Man's Garden
By Mervyn Skipper
(Elkin Mathews)

A YOUNG PELICAN ALIGHTED ON A TREE ABOVE THEM.

[1] "Turn Again Tales" By Laurence Housman 7s 6d net (Blackwell)—[2] The Heroes of Asgard By A and E Keary Illustrated by C L Brock R I 6s net (Macmillan)—[3] No 8 Joy Street" (Blackwell)—[4] "The Book of Simon" By A S M Hutchinson 7s 6d net (Hodder & Stoughton)—[5] "The Greatest Gift" By Maurice Kerr and Eleanor E Helme 10s 6d net (R T S)—[6] "Arthur Mee's Story Book" 7s 6d net (Hodder & Stoughton)—[7] "Granny's Book of Fairy Stories 3s 6d net (Blackie)—[8] Cassell's Children's Annual" 5s net—[9] "Warne's Pleasure Book" (Warne)—[10] Open and See" 2s 6d net (Wells Gardner) [11] The Children's Treasury" 2s 6d net (Nelson)—[12] Bunny and Brownie" By Ida Rentoul Outhwaite 10s 6d net (Black)

From Turn Again Tales
By Laurence Housman
(Blackwell).

A GANDER AND HIS GEESE.

OLD MAN OF THE WOODS

By Marcus Woodward. 2s. 6d. (Toulmin.)

A collection of light-hearted and highly instructive yarns given by "Old Man" to Boy Scouts on their rambles. We had best quote, to give some idea of the sort of thing that is found between these charming covers:

"One question," said Joe, by no means inclined for hare hunting. "How fast can a hare run?"

From Cartwheels and Catkins By Wilfrid Thorley (Shaylor). THE WITCH.

"Not so fast as a cheetah, supposed to be the fastest animal in the world over short distances; and not so fast as the greyhound, which can cover a quarter of a mile in twenty seconds. A hare can gallop at from thirty to thirty-five miles an hour. This I have often proved when in a car at night."

Nature's romance is assuredly more interesting than any other, and here, for half-a-crown, is a gift-book that must illuminate every young and eager mind. We are glad of the pictures, and emphatically commend the volume.

From Old Time Fairy Tales and Nursery Rhymes (Raphael Tuck). CINDERELLA.

OLD TIME FAIRY TALES AND NURSERY RHYMES

3s. 6d. (Raphael Tuck.)

No matter how many new rhymes and stories are introduced, we very much doubt if they will ever be allowed to oust the old favourites. Here is an excellent collection of the latter, containing all the good old "regulars," and many lesser known ones besides. The choice of illustrator has been particularly happy, for Miss Jennie Harbour has given a fresh and delicately whimsical depiction of many old familiars, both in colour and black-and-white: in each case the treatment is equally pleasing. It is a delightful addition to Messrs. Raphael Tuck's popular "Golden Treasury" Library.

From The Atlantic By Stanley Rogers (Harrap).

THE WORLD'S BEST STORIES FOR CHILDREN

Selected by Winifred Biggs. 7s. 6d. (Jacks.)

Here is a book that will surely settle all age difficulties between six and sixteen, and completely overlook those of sex altogether. By thus disposing of two outstanding problems the compiler of this collection has won our real gratitude. We need do no more than give a few of the authors' names whose stories are included: Walter de la Mare, Katherine Mansfield, Sir Edward Abbott Parry, E. Nesbit, A. A. Milne, Eleanor Farjeon, besides numerous others.

From The World's Best Stories for Children Selected by Winifred Biggs (Nelson). "HE RETURNED TO HIS BOOTS."

THE WHITE MAN'S GARDEN

By Mervyn Skipper.
With illustrations by the Author. 6s. net.
(Elkin Mathews & Marrot)

This is a book not to be missed, by the author of "The Meeting Pool." It is a tale, or rather, a series of connected tales, told in the garden of the White Man who lived in Borneo, and it is primarily a book for children, as Kipling's "Jungle Books" were books for children In this Garden" the numerous trees and shrubs of Borneo talk and tell tales, and in so doing reveal a great deal to us that a mere botanist might not think of mentioning The stories are amusing, cunning, characteristic. The White Man, his wife, and small son are one day seen to be packing their possessions, they go away over the sea, and the garden wonders about it, and is glad to be rid of discipline Later, the garden is lonely and overgrown, and uncomfortable, and it wishes the White Man back again It suffers, it tells stories, and in course of time the White Man, who has been away because there was a Great War, comes back again. The style of the book is easy and charming, and the illustrations are most excellent The solid yet delicate work of the tropical trees is only rivalled by the nonchalance of the Chinese Boy who carried the Emperor's snuff-box, or the down-dropped eyelids of the Rajah's youngest daughter or— but they must be seen We ourselves have been charmed

From Granny's Book of Fairy Stories (Blackie) THE UGLY DUCKLING.

From The Child's Own (N.S S U) "NOW WHERE DO WE GO?"

THE NURSERY BOOK

3s 6d (Nelson)

A large book, with large bold type, so suitable for the little ones who are just beginning to read, and a real profusion of pictures of all sizes and colourings One poem, "The Farmer's Boy," takes up quite a number of pages and covers the whole range of the farmyard, growing in snowball fashion There is another version of the woman who lived in a shoe, this time it is a wee little mouse, and she and her family are shown on one of the attractive colour plates

From The Nursery Book (Nelson) FEELING QUITE CHEERFUL.

From Little People's Annual (Raphael Tuck).

"THE MICE SANG CHORUSES."

CINDERELLA

Illustrated by Frederick Spurgin.

2s. 6d. (Dean.)

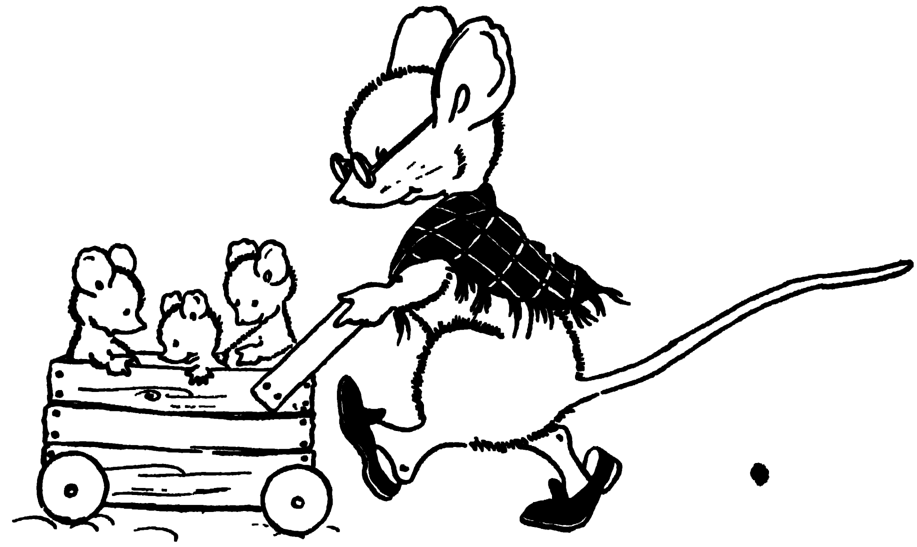
"Cinderella" is the hardiest of perennials among children's literature, and here it is in still another edition, with three other favourite fairy tales—"Beauty and the Beast," "The Sleeping Beauty" and "Puss in Boots." Produced in a large, attractively shaped volume, with coloured front board and many admirable illustrations in colour and line, and printed in very bold, clear type, a better edition could not be desired at the price. It should easily be a best seller among the season's gift-books for young people.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S ANNUAL

4s. (Raphael Tuck.)

The quite small children are delightfully provided for in this generous collection of stories, verses, puzzles and pictures galore. We quite envy the grown-ups who have the opportunity of sharing in the fun. Two very good points to note are the clear, large type and the unusually heavy paper which should stand harder wear than is generally the case. Five particularly delightful colour plates form a sequence of nursery pictures which make one long to lift them out and frame them.

THE PLAYTIME ANNUAL—1931



6s. (Amalgamated Press.)

This is an Annual specially planned, we realise, for the entertaining of children. There are stories in it of course, and verses, and pictures, but the marked feature of the volume lies in the puzzles and games, the jokes and jobs, the wealth of suggestions for heads and hands to think out and do. There is a play to act, there are codes in which the children can write to one another and keep up all the thrill of a secret correspondence. Instructions are given for making easy toys. Scores of interesting things are given for children to guess, and ask, and make. Indeed it is a play box in itself, able to keep a big party sufficiently noisy, or a family quietly employed. And gay colours rollick from cover to cover.

PLEASURE BOOK FOR BOYS.

2s. 6d. (Warne.)

Here is a collection of good stories interspersed with a few articles. It will while away many a dull hour on a wet day. The illustrations both in colour and line add to the charm of the volume. Parents faced with the problem

From The Playtime Annual (Amalgamated Press).

WIDOW MARTHA WAS WALKING OUT WITH THE LITTLE ONES.

of providing literature at Christmas time for boys between the ages of thirteen and fifteen couldn't do better than secure this year's "Pleasure Book."

NOT AN ORDINARY GIRL

By May Baldwin. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

May Baldwin is one of those authoresses who help to belie the often heard statement that no one can write good schoolgirl stories. Here she has a delightful tale to tell and tells it charmingly. It is a story of a girl's adventures in Normandy. The heroine's French cousin Athalie is a delightful creation.

From Bo-Peep's Bumper Book (Amalgamated Press).

HOW MILLY MOUSE WAS SAVED

From Rosamund Takes the Lead
By E. E. Cowper
(Blackie).

SOMEONE WAS TAPPING VERY GENTLY ON HER DOOR.

ROSAMUND TAKES THE LEAD

By E. E. Cowper. 3s. 6d. (Blackie.)

Miss E. E. Cowper has herself for so many years " taken the lead " in writing for school maidens the breathless, terse and thoroughly improbable yet convincing adventure story, that there is no doubt the tale of Rosamund will find many readers. Of the more delicate literary graces the story is entirely bare ; it is hurriedly, almost mechanically told, but there is no cessation in the ripple of the narrative. Rosamund is determined, backed by her school friend Ina and a plucky little lad called Adam, to clear up all the terrors that hang round Lakewood Manor. She catches sight of that sinister thing, the Ghost Van, and her bright eyes are open for every sinister sign, and she never flinches in her purpose. Your sporting girl will read the book and like Rosamund, but we have never met any Rosamund such as this in real life.

THE BIBLE STORY IN MODERN ART

21s. (R.T.S.)

What can one say of such a book more than that the text is from the Bible and that it contains sixty-four large colour plates from the original paintings by Harold Copping. Mr. Copping has brought back from the Holy Land a vast store of impressions and characteristic detail and to these he has allied all those distinctive qualities which have made his work so valued. There is no need to speak here of its strength and dignity, its rich warmth of colouring and vital suggestion of the Eastern atmosphere, it is far too well known. Nowhere, despite the large number of plates, can we see the least hint of hasty work, and though everyone will naturally have their favourites, each picture carries its own illuminating and persuasive charm.

"YELLERLEGS"

By L. C. Douthwaite. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

" Yellerlegs " is the slang name for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and this is the tale of a young constable, put in command of a particularly rough and dangerous district. He overcame his first enemy, a giant nicknamed Goliath, and turned him into a friend ; but he had other quarry to tackle. His exciting adventures make absorbing reading, and the drama intensifies when he falls into the hands of his two deadliest foes and is left tied to a tree to be devoured by wolves. How he escapes, to be captured again, and finally through his heroism wins promotion, forms the thrilling climax of a thoroughly good yarn for boys.

The Mounted Police are favourite heroes of the film ; they have even been made the heroes of musical comedy. Here, in book form, they will be equally appreciated by the boys of to-day as were the trappers and redskins who preceded them by the boys of yesterday.

From The Bible Story in Modern Art
Pictured by Harold Copping
(R.T.S.).

THE WELL OF SYCHAR.

THE LUCK OF THE OAKLEIGHS

By Irene Mossop 2s net (Warne)

"When Oakleigh's luck afar doth roam,
An Oakleigh maid shall bring it home"

The Oakleigh Luck "roamed" at the beginning of this story for girls. The old and honoured firm of Thomas Oakleigh & Son, seed merchants, was seriously threatened with ruin, the beautiful home of the four girls, Delphinium, Geranium, Nigella and Petunia, was let to a stranger, and they themselves were sent to the care of a charming lady who undertook to care for and educate them with five others who were already with her The chronicle of their life while with Miss Ambrose is rather 'off the lines" of the usual school story, and it makes very attractive reading The Oakleigh Luck does come home again, and the loyalty and sturdy friendliness of Nigella, the chronicler, brings it about The nine girls of the story are well worth meeting and the everyday life at Miss Ambrose's is naturally and often amusingly shown

EVERY BOY'S HOBBY ANNUAL

6s (Amalgamated Press)

This is excellent in its conception and admirably carried out It is packed with intriguing lures for the boy who likes to use his hands Here he may learn how to raise Pepper's Ghost compound invisible inks, construct a two valve set, manufacture a cutlery cabinet and learn all the tricks that can be done with matches This is a very inadequate résumé of the contents of a really admirable gift-book At the end of a month it should be well thumbed, and at the end of a year in spite of the excellent paper on which it is printed it should be in tatters

From The Greatest Gift
By Maurice Kerr and Eleanor E Helme
(R T.S).

WHILE JACOB WAS TALKING WITH THEM RACHEL CAME TO THE WELL.

From Dream-o'-Day Jill
By Evelyne M Williams
(Cassell)

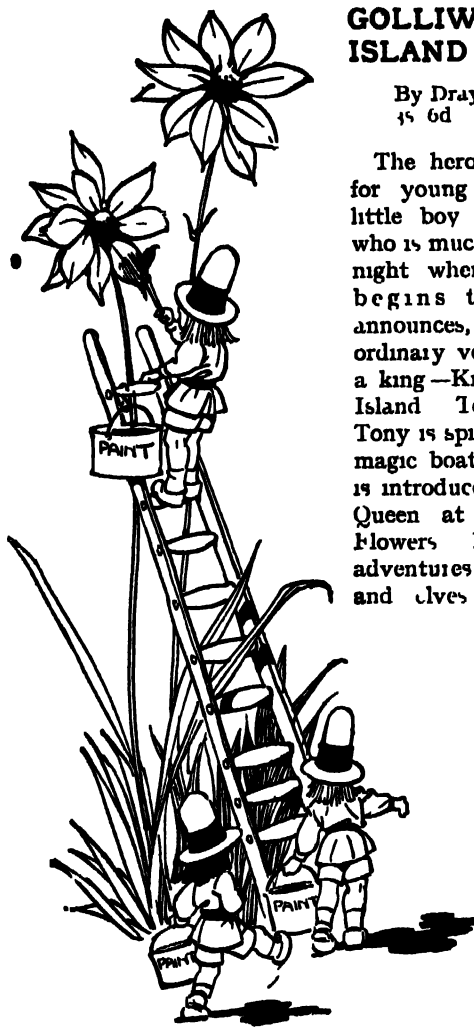
"HOLDING THEIR BREATH, THEY WATCHED THE BEAUTIFUL FIGURE SLOWLY FLOAT DOWN THE STAIRS."

THE WISHING WOOD.



By Margaret Beatrice Lodge
5s (Oxford Press)

Whimsical, original, amusing charming—it is hard to sum up in a word the outstanding quality of Miss Lodge's pleasing story for children Miss Lodge keeps a very firm hold on the everyday world and her characters are real people, yet she is conscious all the time of magic things unexpectedly mixed up with ordinary ones When the twins, Celia and Delia went to stay in the country with their great-aunt Susan and great uncle James they discovered by accident a magic place in the wood where wishes came true This story is of how they coaxed different people to the spot and made them express their dearest wish—and what happened when each wish in turn was realised The illustrations by Miss A H Watson are full of life and energy and have caught the refreshing atmosphere which haunts the book from beginning to end.

CHATTERBOX

5s (Simpkin Marshall)

This is the sixty-third appearance of this doughty volume, surely a noble achievement, and from a glance at the contents this venerable favourite has lost none of its vigour To begin with there are two excellent serial stories, which are interspersed with a remarkable range of general knowledge articles nature notes, short stories and poems These, added to the eight plates in colour and over two hundred and twenty black-and-white illustrations, form a generous and richly varied feast

From Golliwog Island
By Draycot M Dell
(Black)

"TUMMY" HAD HELPED TO DO THE WORK

GOLLIWOG ISLAND

By Draycot M Dell 3s 6d (Black)

The hero of this story for young children is a little boy called Tony who is much surprised one night when his golliwog begins to talk, and announces, in a perfectly ordinary voice, that he is a king—King of Golliwog Island To that island Tony is spirited away in a magic boat, and there he is introduced to the Fairy Queen at the Court of Flowers He has many adventures among dwarfs and elves before being captured by the King of the Dragon Flies, from whom he is finally rescued by the Golden Beetle All very young folk with a spark of fancy will enjoy this tale which has four coloured plates and other illustrations

TOYS

By C W Beaumont 5s (Beaumont)

This dainty little book of rhymes is written and published by Mr Beaumont and attractively decorated by Eileen Mayo Taking the alphabet through each letter provides a topic for one or more (generally more) verses in true nursery language, to which the pictures are admirably adapted

BLACKIE'S GIRL'S ANNUAL

(Blackie)

Among the annuals for girls this season, Blackie's' stands well to the fore as regards handsome appearance and attractive contents There are stories in it galore to suit both the home-keeping and the adventurous tastes, stories by writers who understand girls Then also there are articles which, even alone, would make a fascinating book One of these is by Violet M Methley, who tells of the successful plan made by a girl living in the country who could not leave home and yet needed to make money The plan—"The Amateur Actor Aid Association" makes capital and inspiring reading Then, that girl's favourite, Angela Brazil, tells about colours, some of the common superstitions, and why they came Margaret Middleton tells us how to make a perfect tent Poems are here too, coloured illustrations as well as others, games, needlework, and a play which is 'actable' From cover to cover the volume is packed with good things

SEVEN SUSPECTS

By Florence Ryerson and Colin Clements 7s 6d net (Skeffington)

Four murders and a suicide is surely a full allowance even for "Dead Man's Gulch" in California But the Lymans were a terrible bad lot, and with two of them 'bumped off' for a start, and then two more because

From Children's Book of Pantomimes (Cassell).

ALADDIN.

they knew too much, well might Jimmy Lane, author of numerous successful films, exclaim, "As usual, Ma Bascum is right Only the Lymans were murdered and I should say it was a good riddance" But Ma Bascum was a culinary genius and her passion for providing marvellously appetising dishes of quail and blueberry (let alone "venison pot pie with cranberry tarts to follow") left no room for sympathy with people like the Lymans "If ever there was a bunch that needed killin' it was them" However it's a pretty puzzle the authors of this exciting mystery story set the reader, and the secret is most carefully kept

From Every Girl's Annual (N S.S.U.).

THE SURPRISE OF THE EVENING HAPPENED.

HERE BE DRAGONS

A Book of Children's Verse

By F. Gwynne Evans. Illustrated by George Morrow. 7s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

" So I think I'll stay on land and be a highwayman instead,
And ride about in moonlight with a price set on my head;
I'll wear lace ruffles on my sleeves, a mask upon my face,
And astonish all the ladies by my gallantry and grace

From Dream Days
By Kenneth Grahame
(John Lane).

THEN HE WAS CALLED UPON FOR TRICKS, JUGGLINGS, ETC.

" I will choose rich people only to relieve them of their wealth;
To the poor ones I'll give money to buy wine to drink my health;
And when for years I've baffled all the efforts of the police
I'll settle down at last and be a Justice of the Peace."

So sings the young man who couldn't be a pirate because he suffered from seasickness—one of the many delightful people and animals and strange creatures you will meet in this companion volume to " Puffin Puma and Co." Both pictures and verses are highly amusing, and not only children will find them so!

TOLD

By Compton Mackenzie. 6s. (Oxford Press.)

A collection of stories and poems sure of a wide and appreciative public is Mr. Compton Mackenzie's new book for children, " Told." Illustrated by various artists, with four colour plates by Miss A. H. Watson, both verses and tales have a quaint humour which grown-ups as well as children will thoroughly enjoy Whether you like the Dickensian type of Christmas story such as " The Fairy God-Daughter," or a fantasy like " Mabel in Queer Street," or such odd, imaginative tales as " Candlelight Cottage," " The Unpleasant Visitors " or " The Adventures of Two Chairs," you are sure to be pleased—so long as you are young enough in spirit—because Mr. Mackenzie has made variety the key-note of his book. A safe gift this to choose for any boy or girl with a taste for reading and the ability to recognise good writing.

MABEL IN QUEER STREET.
From Told
By Compton Mackenzie
(Blackwell).

From Here Be Dragons
By F. Gwynne Evans
(Macmillan).

THE WITCH.

UNDER THE FOEMAN'S FLAG

By Robert Leighton. 2s. (Pilgrim Press.)

Mr. Leighton's hand never loses its cunning and his new book is full of vigour and dramatic force. It is a story of the Spanish Armada, and of four young English people—a girl, two youths of quality and a tutor—who, crossing the Channel, unwittingly ran foul of the Spanish fleet and " went through the battle of the Armada, and passed through peril and privation under the shadow of the Foeman's Flag " Full of thrilling incidents and exciting descriptions of naval warfare, it is just the kind of stirring adventure book every healthy boy likes to read.

From Dorothy's Dilemma
By Elsie J. Oxenham
(Chambers).

"WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO, D.C. P"

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL

(Blackie.)

A monster Annual, with twenty-four coloured pictures, eighty other illustrations and fifty stories and short poems, this magnificent book for boys and girls is undoubtedly one of the best annuals published this Christmas. The contributors include many well-known writers, and everything has been done to give newness and variety to the contents. Plays and a song are among the items that will win especial favour, and there are all sorts of stories to appeal to every sort of taste. The illustrations, both plain and coloured, reach a very high level, and altogether the production is one that leaves little room for criticism.

From Blackie's Children's Annual (Blackie).

THE CLOCKWORK GOVERNESS.

From Bobbety the Brownie
By May Wynne
(Warne).

MOST OF THE WATER RAN OVER BOBBETY'S FROCK.

BOBBETY THE BROWNIE

By May Wynne. 1s. (Warne.)

Another of the little "Welcome" series. Here is the story par excellence for the little maid of eight or ten. Bobbety meant to be such a particularly good Brownie, and such a great joy to mother! But when she tried to help, how hard she found it! She got hot and flustered trying to clean the grate, and it ended up by refusing to shine. She broke grannie's cherished blue vase, she could not chop the toughest bacon she'd ever met, and while she was fetching the cutting-out scissors to see if they would do, Gyp the dog ate it all up. And mother looked so dreadfully worried, although she was kind about it. Miss Wynne, who dedicates her charming and natural tale to the Brownies of the 8th and 9th Victoria Dock packs, is to be congratulated on another success.

THE BOOK OF ADVENTURE AND SPORT

6s (Raphael Tuck)

Many authors and many artists have combined to produce this volume for sport loving boys and girls, too, we think The "send off" is "What Sport Has Done for England," by Harold M Abrahams, who was captain of the British Athletic Team Olympic Games in 1928 It is a capital article on sport in general Lord Baden-Powell has written an excellent account of the Prince of Wales as Scout The great Jack Hobbs has something to say about cricket F H Temme tells "How I Swam the Channel" An ex champion writes about tennis The appeal of the book is wide Appropriate stories are interspersed and the illustrations by well known artists C E Brock, R I, Bernard Gribble, Fred Buchanan and others, are on a high level, six of them being full page coloured plates It is a lively volume, with much sound sense in it

From Game Fish of the Pacific: Southern Californian and Mexican
By G C Thomas, Jun, and G C. Thomas 3rd
(Lippincott)

TEENS

By Louise Mack 2s (Pilgrim Press)

This tale of a schoolgirl friendship in Sydney is a school story quite out of the common It is not all about school life, for the homes of Lennie Leighton and her friend, Mabel James—such different homes!—and Lennie's mother and father and brother and three young sisters play prominent parts in the lives of the two girls. The characters are remarkably well drawn and the whole story is so natural one feels it must be to an extent autobiographical Lennie's feelings at the examination, her mortification at only just passing, her adoration of Mabel, their founding of a school paper—all is charmingly told, and marvellous value for two shillings!

From Cross and Sword: A Story of Joan of Arc
By David Ker
(Chambers)

ROBIN UTTERED A CRY, AND WITH ONE BOUND HE WAS AT THE STRANGER'S SIDE.

From Boys' Book of Trains
(Dean).

A POWERFUL TANK ENGINE AT WORK AT THE DOCKS.

From The Book of Adventure and Sport
(Raphael Tuck)

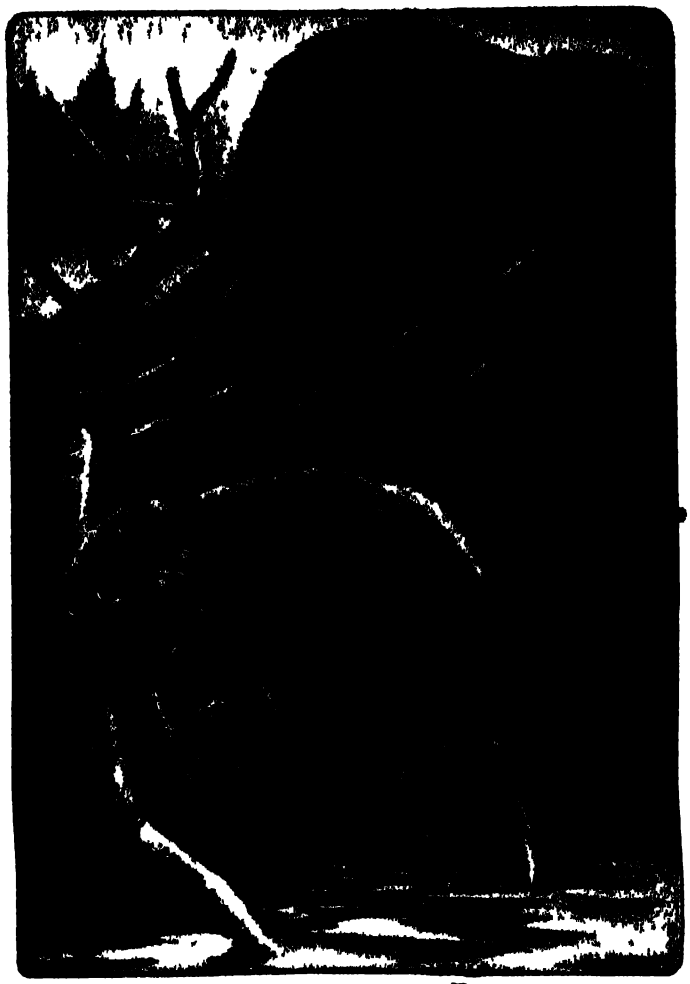
A DESPERATE HAZARD.

ZOO AND ANIMAL ANNUAL



Edited by H Mortimer Batten F Z S 5s (Collins)

All children, it is said, are fond of animals however indifferent they may grow to them in later life, and it is certainly extraordinary how interested children invariably are in all forms of animal life This splendid book of

From Zoo and Animal Annual Edited by H Mortimer Batten
(Collins)
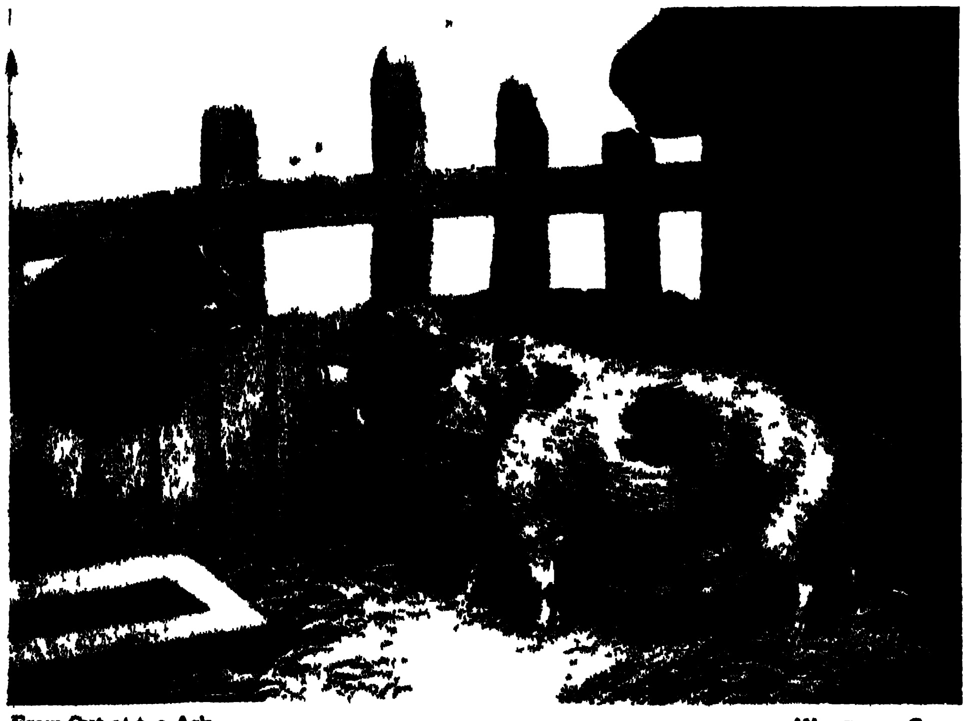
ELEPHANTS ENJOYING A DIP

animal stories, with special articles on such subjects as "An Indoor Aquarium " and " A Zoo of Our Own " will prove of immense attraction to numerous boys and girls— though it is a pity children should be encouraged to keep birds and animals in captivity, better that they should read about them and learn how to watch them in their natural state The book is profusely illustrated.



From The House In the Water
By his G D Roberts
(Ward, Lock).
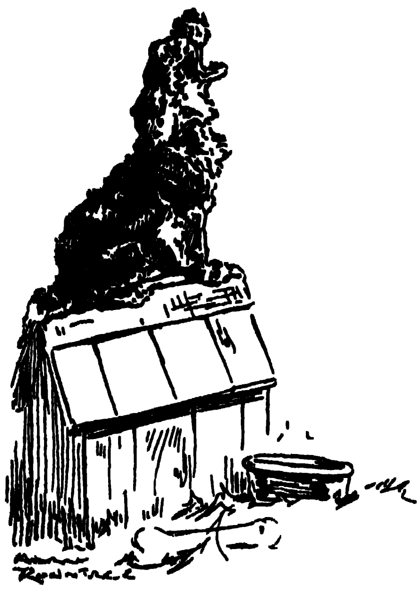
THE FINEST AND MOST PRETENTIOUS MUSKRAT HOUSE HE HAD EVER SEEN

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

2s 6d. net. (Wells Gardner)

Here is a big, gay Annual for the young people of about the age that still believes in fairies We do not mean to say that this is a book full of fairy stories it certainly is not but in addition to short tales of everyday boys and girls, there are stories and verses told by and about animals and flowers, dolls and vegetables There seems to be a picture, too, on almost every page, and the bright scene on the cover, showing the fairy queen in her pretty gown of green leaves and daisies, surrounded by smiling elves and gnomes and winged fairies, is an inviting sign of the good things to be found inside. Stories and poems are all printed in an admirably big, bold type, easy for the smaller readers and very pleasant for the bigger ones Many of the poems, we think, will soon be learnt " by heart." So many books for "the young" fail to understand and answer the child's need that it is a double pleasure to come across one so eminently suitable.



From Out of the Ark
By R D.
(Davies).
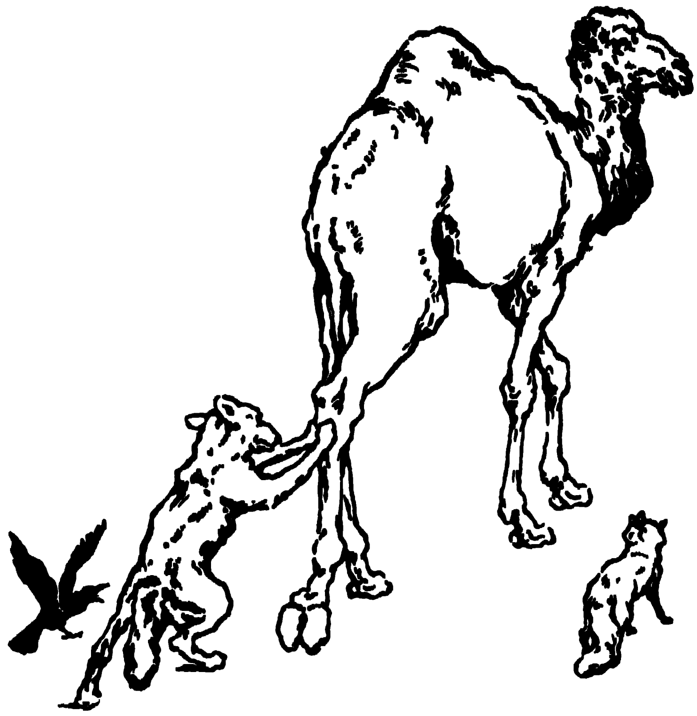
WOLF AND SOW.
(From All Talkie.)

LONE COWBOY

By William James 8s 6d net (Scribners)

All those who have read " Smoky " and the four other books of Mr. William James, will turn with avidity to his life story. Born on the prairie, reared as an orphan from four by a French Canadian trapper, living his life in the saddle and in the open air, the author has had an astonishing career. The French Canadian died when he was not yet sixteen, having helped him first to wrestle out the alphabet, read French books and understand the simpler arithmetic Bopy, as he calls Jean Beaupré is really the hero of the book Now at the age of thirty-eight Mr James, having got through his adventurous boyhood, earned his living as a cowboy, been in prison and in the army and tried out the business of film acting, has settled down as an author – and an artist His talent for drawing horses began when he was a child on the prairie before his father's death, was encouraged by Bopy and enabled him eventually to earn a living His medium as a writer is a very simple English American but he uses it with the skill of an artist and it is very effective This is one of the most delightful autobiographies published in recent years



From Re[illegible]ie's Band
By D[illegible]ris Twinn
(Warne)

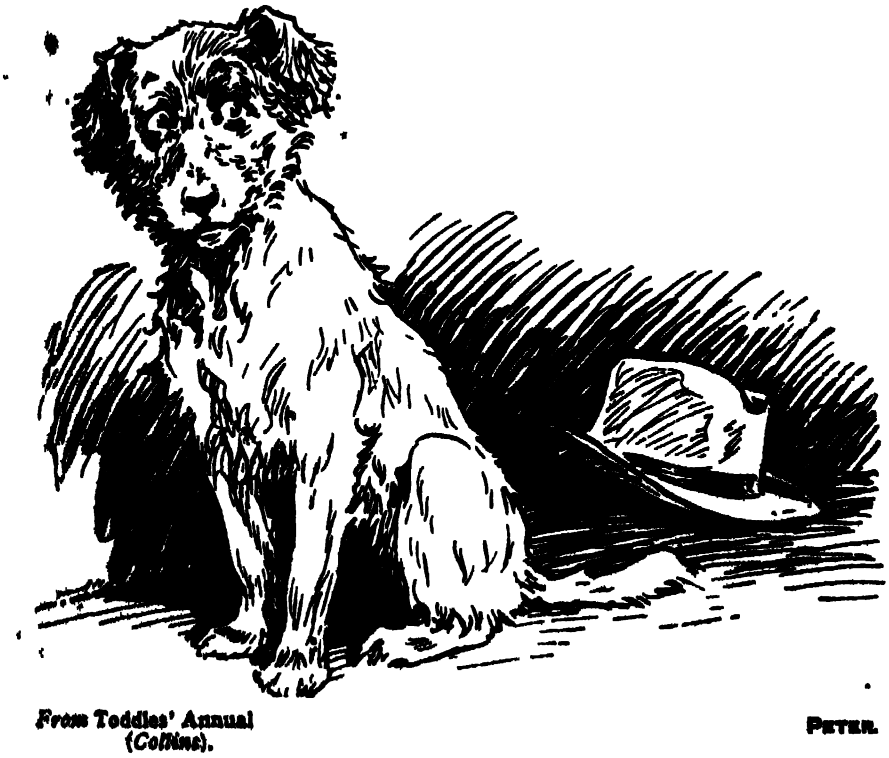
WUDGY CLIMBED ON TO THE ROOF.

CHUMS

12s 6d (Amalgamated Press)

Schoolboys, according to the editorial management of Chums, are creatures incapable of reading anything which calls upon them to pause for reflection even for a paragraph or so Their only stories are film pictures splashed into print Everything must hurtle in a thickening nightmare Incident must follow incident, and the greater the number of these incidents that can be squeezed into a chapter the more successful the story, from the editorial point of view This year's volume is packed between its red covers with fiction of this kind Even the school yarns get a move on and when one reaches a story like "The Master of the World" by John Sylvester, incidents fall upon the reader like a cascade of bricks from a felled mill chimney. It is a question whether the providers of these feasts of thrills do not underestimate the taste and intelligence of the average boy No wonder we have no classic boy authors now—though strangely enough the works of Talbot Baines Reed still sell, and Ballantyne and Jules Verne have not yet been relegated to the dust heap of oblivion. Chums for 1930–1931, for what it sets out to do, is an amazing production of 832 pages, and every boy who has seen it—or even taken it—in its weekly parts will want to possess the bound volume.



From Legends of Animals Far and Near
By Rose Yeatman Woolf
(Raphael Tuck)

THE CAMEL WAS RELUCTANT TO GO DESPITE THE BRILLIANT PROSPECTS.

"CHEEP, CHEEP," CRIED THE CHICKS, AND THEY STARTED TO RUN.
From Timmy and His Friends
By G D Rowlandson
(Warne)

From Toddles' Annual (Collins).

PETER.

FREDERICK WARNE & Co., Ltd.

A charming new work, illustrating in colour and black-and-white, the Poem by

ROBERT H. CHARLES

(as first published in "Punch") entitled:

A ROUNDABOUT TURN

The illustrations are by the well-known artist

LESLIE BROOKE

Cloth gilt. 3/6 net

The Italian Masters

A magnificent series of superbly illustrated Art books, each of which in addition to the beautiful illustrations gives a full biography of the artist and a very detailed survey and criticism of his work

Cloth gilt, gilt top and picture wrapper, each 31/6 net

Titles now available

CORREGGIO

By Corrado Ricci   With 296 collotype plates

FRA ANGELICO

By Paul Muratori   With 296 collotype plates

PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA

By Roberto Longhi   With 184 collotype plates

THE ELFIN OAK

OF KENSINGTON GARDENS

A massive old oak bole, twenty feet in girth, was placed this summer in Kensington Gardens, and on it Mr Ivor Innes has carved some of the well-known characters of Fairyland

In this book the artist's wife describes all the quaint figures that are to be found, and it is illustrated in colour and line by Mr Ivor Innes

Picture boards

2/- net

A Comprehensive Work

AVIATION OF TO-DAY

ITS HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT

By J L NAYLER, M A, F R Ae S and E OWER, B Sc A C G I, F R Ae S

Secretary and Assistant Secretary for the Aeronautical Research Committee

With a Foreword by

LIEUT COLONEL MERVYN O GORMAN C B D Sc

Chairman of the Schneider Trophy Committee of the Royal Aero Club

The most complete History of Human Flight ever written Illustrated in colour, half-tone, etc

Cloth gilt. 15/- net

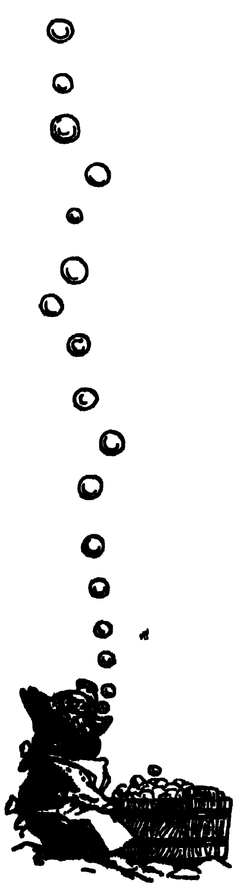
The COSY CORNER BOOKS

Latest Titles:

THE BROWSER FAMILY By Irene Heath

RONALD, RUPERT AND REG By Harry Rountree



THE TOY TOWN BOOK By G S. Hulme Beaman

TABBYKINS AND HIS FRIENDS By G. D Rowlandson

TIMMY AND HIS FRIENDS By G. D. Rowlandson

Beautifully illustrated in colour

Picture boards 1/6 net

This drawing is one of Harry Rountree's decorations in "Ronald, Rupert and Reg"

An Entirely New Work

Written and illustrated in colour and line by

BEATRIX POTTER

entitled:

THE TALE OF LITTLE PIG ROBINSON

A charming story and a worthy companion to "The Tale of Peter Rabbit"

Cloth gilt 3/6 net

CHANDOS HOUSE, BEDFORD COURT, LONDON, W.C.2

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1930

A BOY'S LIFE OF SIR HENRY SEAGRAVE

By Captain Malcolm Campbell and J Wentworth Day. 7s 6d (Hutchinson)

From How It Happened
By Rhoda Power
(Cambridge University Press)

THE FIRST MONKEY WAS ALREADY TRYING TO PELT BARTHALA WITH NUTS.

It is right that men who have the spirit of courage and adventure, coupled with modesty and humour—who devote their lives—and give their lives, if necessary—to a cause—should be held up for the admiration of the young. It was therefore an excellent idea to produce a Boy's Life of Sir Henry Seagrave. In "The Lure of Speed" Seagrave wrote his own autobiography; this is written from the boy's point of view with the technical and scientific details mostly omitted. Here we have the whole story of the man who travelled faster by land and by water than anybody has ever done before and ended his life on Windermere. The book with its interesting illustrations will make an admirable addition to the boys' library of heroes.

THE CHRISTMAS PICTURE BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

1s each (Mowbray)

Each a perfect little Christmas anthology, with a vivid picture of the Babe in the manger on the cover. The title of the four books are 'Hark, the Herald Angels Sing,' "Good Christian Men, Rejoice," "Good King Wenceslas Looked Out" and "While Shepherds Watched." Fathers and mothers who wish their children to see something deeper in Christmas than the mere giving of presents and pulling of crackers may turn young thoughts in a different direction by slipping one of these books into the stocking, and it will be pondered over, verses and prose and pictures too, on the blessed morning. We heartily commend the volumes.

VIGNETTE ON TITLE PAGE.
From Fairy Tales of Hans Andersen
(Faber & Faber)

MR PAPIN GAY'S CARAVAN

By Marion St John Webb. Illustrated by Frank Rogers. 6s (Collins)

We are pleased to take this opportunity of introducing one of Mrs Marion St John Webb's last books to a still further public, though we have previously reviewed it in these columns at some length. Her passing last spring was a real loss in the realm of children's literature. She undoubtedly ranked high among the writers of to-day in that sphere, and was beloved by a very wide circle for her remarkably sympathetic interpretations of the child mind. On countless programmes her delicate, whimsical verses are to be found, and the characters which kept popping up in her different books and articles, especially the renowned Mr. Papingay, Robin and the rest, have steadily inveigled themselves into our affections. Mrs. Webb stamped a hall-mark on all she wrote—that of a tender and true understanding—and her books will be treasured accordingly.

From Folk Tales of a Savage
By Lobagola
(Knopf)

A LARGE OLD MONKEY WALKED INTO THE VILLAGE.

VAPEX

(REG. TRADE MARK)

INHALANT

Breathing Passages Clear . .
Germs Overcome . . . .
Your Cold must disappear .

This is how "Vapex" conquers colds. Whilst the breathing passages are choked with mucus the respiratory system cannot function properly. If the germs are not dealt with, the real cause of the cold is left unattacked.

"Vapex" succeeds because it deals with both the problems at the same time.

The simple act of breathing the "Vapex" vapour from your handkerchief—

Opens a way through the mucus-laden passages of nose and throat.

Carries a powerfully active germicide right into the breeding places of the germs.

How "Vapex" acts

You can definitely feel the first part of the "Vapex" activity—the stuffiness and congestion are rapidly relieved, the head clears, breathing becomes easier. And all the time the germicidal vapour is fighting the hidden infection which is the real cause of the trouble.

How Germs grow

The warm dark moist surfaces of the mucous membrane form an ideal nursery for germs which multiply at a most amazing rate, a single germ being capable of developing into seventeen millions in twelve hours. Hence the importance of dealing with a cold at the first symptoms.

Always keep "Vapex" in your Home.

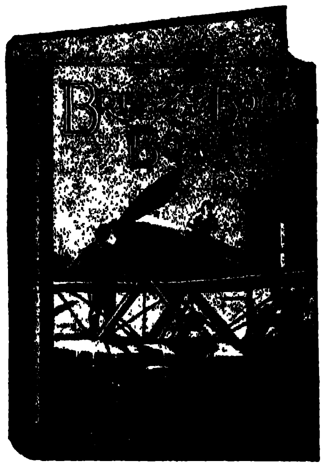
Fly to "Vapex" at the first sign of a cold—the "stuffiness" which means that the germs are multiplying. Clear them out of your system by the safest, swiftest, most effective treatment for colds.

Use "Vapex" and Breathe!

Of Chemists 2/- per bottle. Double size 3/-

Thomas Kerfoot & Co. Ltd. Bardsley Vale, Lancs.

V67



Dean's Mickey Mouse Annual

2/6 net

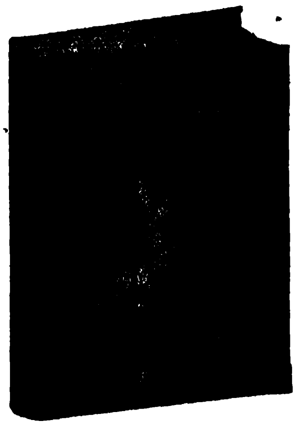
Size 8¾ × 6¾ × 1¾ in.

The book contains 132 pages of Mickey's droll and delightful doings. Four coloured plates. Bound in strikingly attractive full coloured, stiff boarded cover, varnished.

Dean's Monster Books

2/6 net

Size 7 × 9½ in.



A splendid series of books containing delightful stories well illustrated in colour and black. Bound in stiff pictorial boards, varnished, cloth backs. Three titles.

Dean's Best Books

1/- net

Size 5½ × 7¼ in.

Delightful books for girls and boys, containing 96 pages of exceedingly interesting stories, which are charmingly illustrated. Strongly bound with pictorial covers, varnished. Three titles.

Dean's Easy Painting Books

1/-

Size 8½ × 11 in.

A fine series of painting books designed on new and very bold lines, specially produced for young artists. The pictures are most delightful, yet all are done in absolutely flat colours, so that any child can copy them. Each book contains twenty-four pages printed on strong cartridge paper. Covers varnished. Six titles.

Dean's Cinderella

And Other Stories

2/6

Size 11½ × 8¾ in.

A most attractive book of nursery stories, charmingly illustrated by Frederick Spurgin in a delightfully new way, which cannot fail to attract.

DEAN & SON, LTD.

Debrett House, 29 King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.2

From The Sweep and the Daffodil
By Mabel Constanduros
(Alston Rivers)

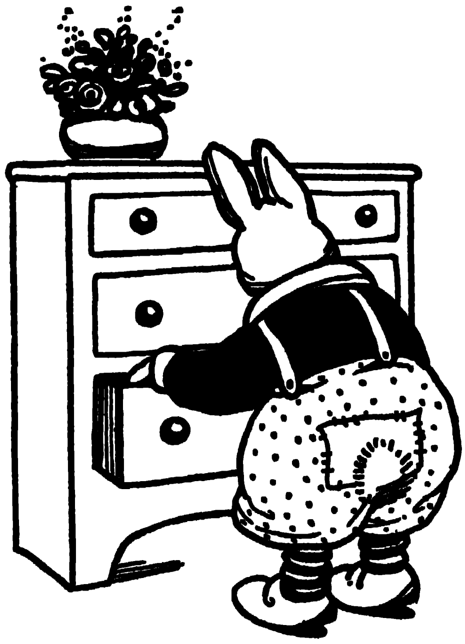
COOK WAS MOST TERRIBLY ANGRY.

THE SWEEP AND THE DAFFODIL

By Mabel Constanduros
3s 6d (Alston Rivers)

Gay verses on all sorts of subjects, also dialogues, and at the very end two plays One, ' The Dragon s Bride, ' a comic opera en casserole is manageable at home and would be very effective acted on an afternoon of the Christmas holidays, with a king a princess village wench, gardener, villain and dragon (who only appears as a hiss !) But young folk will like the poems best



> The Crocuses so gay and small
> Are pushing up their yellow faces
> Not where I planted them at all
> But in most unexpected places

Mr. Harry Folkard supplies pictures in black-and-white and colour, with plenty of character and spirit

NODDY GOES A-PLOUGHING

By Margaret and Mary Baker 3s 6d net.
(Blackwell)

The author and artist of this most attractive book appear to think the same thoughts, so perfectly do the illustrations accord with the letterpress The story which runs along the appropriately-shaped pages tells of Noddy, the orphan son of a farmer, who had neither home nor money Noddy had however a cheery, contented nature and a kind heart, and his good nature and kindliness lead him to fortune He wins the ploughing match which earns him the post of ploughman to the Duke of Duckpuddle There is plenty of humour in this volume. The illustrations are in silhouette style, and we give them unstinted praise They are instinct with life and reveal some beautiful work

From The Big Cosy Corner Story Book
By H G C Marsh Lambert
(Ward Lock)

BENJIE WAS DETERMINED TO WEAR HIS VERY BEST CLOTHES.

From Noddy Goes a Ploughing
By Margaret and Mary Baker
(Blackwell)

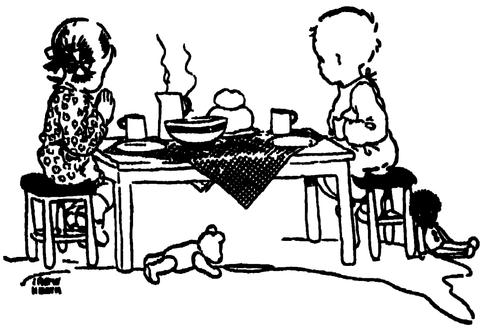
NOT ONE OF THEM BUT COULD EAT EVERY DAY TILL HE WAS SATISFIED.



From John and Me and the Dickery Dog
By Marion St John Webb
(Harrap)

A BIRTHDAY BOOK FOR CHILDREN

By Irene Heath 2s 6d (Warne)

This idea may have been carried out before, but it can hardly have been done more delightfully The daintiest little drawings of tiny tots in all manner of occupations appear on every page, together with several lines of verse, whilst several pages are provided at the end for memory notes There will be no doubt whatever of its welcome

From A Birthday Book for Children
By Irene G Heath
(Warne)

THANK YOU FOR THE BREAD WE EAT.

WARNE'S COSY CORNER BOOKS

1s 6d each

WARNE'S BONNIE BOOKS

6d each

Messrs Warne have made wonderful provision for all varieties of purse, the slender no less than the ample In the two series mentioned above are to be found delightful little stories and a profusion of the most entertaining pictures, coloured and otherwise In each instance the value for the small cost makes one wonder how it can possibly be done We have been particularly charmed with Mr S G Hulme Beaman's quaint little creatures and their antics in "The Toy Town Book" (1s 6d), and would much like to have given the names of other authors who have contributed but, alas, space forbids

From The Children's Treasury
(Nelson).

THEY REACHED THE DRAPER'S SHOP.

From Saucy and All
By Helen Shackleton
(Macmillan).

"BUT EAT YOUR TEA, DO!"

THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN CARFAX

By Lawrence R Bourne 5s (Oxford Press)

Something there is entirely novel and attractive in the binding of Mr Bourne's new romance of the far-away days of Bonaparte It is in rough cream linen, with a sailing-ship boldly outlined in black on it Mr Bourne thoroughly understands the ingredients that boys like to be put in the pudding Here we are introduced to young Carfax, a young lusty lad who, having got into trouble over a smuggling affair, is sent abroad with his tutor to see the world He is pressed into the Navy, and tis he up on topmast cross trees who presently spies a sail "She's a Frenchie," declare the crew with satisfaction Jack is given a special tot of grog he doesn't want for his cleverness "Try her with bow chaser, Mr Bates, I'll luff a trifle This is the sort of stuff the boys enjoy

From The Browser Family
By Irene Heath
(Warne).

PETER PLANTING PRIMROSES

WESTWARD HO! WITH DRAKE

By Escott Lynn. 5s. (Chambers.)

It is to be hoped that, even now, no boy can resist the lure of a book with the sub-title " A Story of the Spanish Main." This story tells the wonderful adventures of Vivian Audley who, when his father was reported dead found himself surrounded by enemies at his ancestral home. Befriended by his father's old shipmates he went filibustering with Drake, rescued his father from the Inquisition, and returned to share Drake's reception at the Court of Elizabeth. The story is written by a practised hand and the interest is unbroken. Mr. Burgess, the illustrator, has entered into the spirit of the narrative.

THE OXFORD ANNUAL FOR BABY

3s 6d (Humphrey Milford.)

The instincts of a baby to look at pictures and to destroy develop at the same time. It would be an exceptionally lusty youngster, however, who could tear or otherwise damage the thick rag boards which make the pages of this book. The illustrations, printed in colour and depicting children and animals, are admirably adapted for their purpose, and the small amount of letterpress is just of the kind to interest young readers who have begun to like a story of the simplest and briefest kind.

From The Oxford Annual for Girls (Oxford University Press). PAMELA'S PROVERBS.

From Westward Ho! With Drake: A Story of the Spanish Main By Escott Lynn (Chambers).

"'TIS BUT AS A LOAN I OFFER IT." CICELY CRIED.

THE STRANGE OLD MAN

By S. H. Skaife. 7s. 6d (Longmans)

The old man in this unusual and very ingenious story for children is a professor who has devoted his whole life to the study of birds, insects, spiders and other wonderful creatures. He discovers a drug which causes all who swallow it to become very small indeed, and he uses this drug when he goes out to study the wild creatures in their natural haunts. Adopting two orphan children, he allows them to share in his adventures, first among the insects, then in a beautiful little aeroplane among the birds, and finally in a miniature submarine to learn something of the ways of the sea-creatures. The story is not only very good fun, but supplies much natural history lore in a palatable form. The photographs, with the figures of real children apparently reduced to the size of insects, are a novel and intriguing feature of the book.

THE GOLDEN YEAR

5s. (Wells Gardner.)

The size of the " Colden Year " will, we are sure, commend itself highly to children and to parents. It is so beautifully big: a good size larger than most annuals. And it has such a frankly Christmassy cover, with children in paper hats and crowns with such rich red in their cheeks! Altogether a very jolly book (this is the correct adjective), and eminently suited to the young and mirthful. The illustrations, which are many, have a royal and lavish touch about them, and the stories and verses are good and gay. Till the babes are about eight years old this book will be very welcome in the nursery, and it is always nice to have big coloured pictures as well as the black-and-white ones. It is pleasant, too, to come on some of the old fairy stories bound in with the others.

From Leading Strings
(Chatterbox Company).

A VISIT TO THE DOCTOR

THE CHUMMY BOOK

3s. 6d. (Nelson.)

An excellent name for the jolliest of volumes. It is packed from cover to cover with the most whimsical creatures imaginable. Here are more of Mr. Hulme Beaman's inimitable little figures, this time doing a deal in Hot Cross Buns, of course in Toytown, while a glance at the Contents shows a number of other well-known names and promises a real feast of entertainment.

LEADING STRINGS

2s. 6d. (Simpkin Marshall.)

An excellent gift for the little ones round about five and six, who will delight in spelling out the easy words for themselves and following the profusion of pictures. We wonder how many little heads and hands will be busy this Christmas over "Easier Than It Looks," and finding out "Who Is Helping Mousie?"

FATHER TUCK'S ANNUAL

5s. (Raphael Tuck.)

Father Tuck's Annual has brought its contribution to the joyousness of the Christmas season for thirty-three years, and this year it has more than maintained the old traditions. It has kept well abreast of the times in all directions, having not only added several new features, but sixteen extra pages, and is printed on stouter and more durable paper.

From Cassell's Children's Annual (Amalgamated Press).

"YOU'VE GOT THE WRONG KIND OF THROAT FOR SINGING," SAID DOCTOR PECK.

From The Chummy Book
(Nelson).

AND HE LAUGHED MERRILY.

From Father Tuck's Annual (Raphael Tuck).

THE ELEPHANT AND THE PANCAKES.

From Ray at Greenwater
By Mary Gervaise
(Warne).

"MY FRIENDS, BIRDS," SAID THE OLD MAN QUIETLY.

THE AMAZING ADVENTURES OF LITTLE BROWN BEAR.

By Dorothy Burroughs. 2s. 6d. (Methuen.)

A jolly book for kiddies, with illustrations by the author. Little Brown Bear who hated Arithmetic, and all the other amusing animals he met will soon be favourites in the nursery. The book, by the way, is a very good size to fit into a stocking !

THE NEW NATURE BOOK

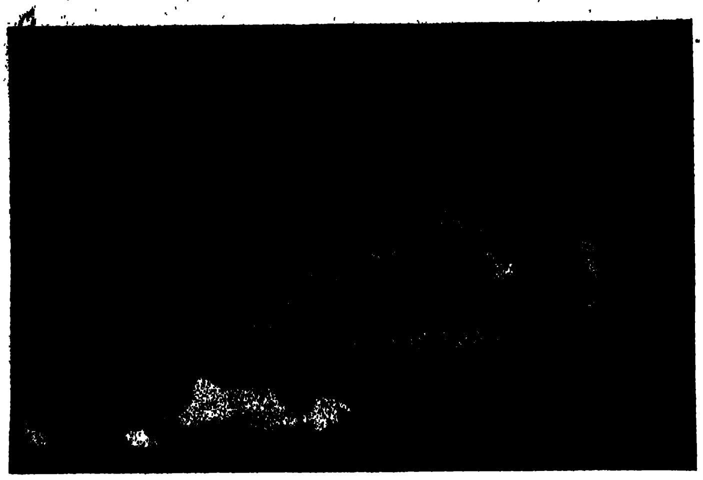
6s. (Amalgamated Press.)

What an amazing production this is. It is a veritable art gallery of pictures, no. only of all the well-known members of the animal kingdom, but of a great many lesser known and in some instances very peculiar creatures. The book is evidently supposed to be for boys and girls, but the age limit will have to be considerably extended when it is about. Both pictures and stories reveal the creatures either in their natural surroundings or displaying many of their curious idiosyncrasies in captivity. We have been amazed at the success of some very difficult photographs, and no less delighted with the entertaining and instructive letterpress.

RAY AT GREENWATER

By Mary Gervaise. 2s. (Warne.)

Ray had an exceptional sort of life. Her young uncle looked after her usually, in London with a governess, while her parents lingered in South Africa. But suddenly the governess went off to Vienna, and the uncle's play was accepted, so he had to take it to New York. There seemed nowhere at all for young Ray to go, and no time to fix anything up. She was dead against the idea of school, being unconventional. The uncle bethought himself of an old friend, a certain Miss Howard, who lived in a lonely house called The Tower in Devonshire. He wired to her that he was dispatching Ray, and she arrived to find a vague, wild and miserable looking hostess in a weird old dwelling. Now Ray was a "sport," and when she sat up in bed that very first evening and heard footsteps creeping cautiously by, she merely muttered "'Horror by Night,' or the 'Secret of the Tower'!" Then a bat came in! It is all very amusing and lively, and above the average. How little too this excellent tale costs !



THEY TOSSED EVERYTHING OUT OF THEIR MISTRESS'S WORK-BASKET, AND THEN TURNED IT UPSIDE DOWN.
From Tabbykins and His Friends
By G. D. Rowlandson
(Warne).

From Our Girl's Annual
(R.T.S.)

SHOULDER HIGH ROUND THE GROUNDS.

From Katie, My Roving Cat
By Frances Pitt.
(Arrowsmith).

TO GET A GOOD SNAPSHOT WAS INDEED AN UNDERTAKING.

KATIE—MY ROVING CAT

By Frances Pitt. 5s. (Arrowsmith.)

Miss Frances Pitt's animal books ought to be given to every child; not only are they interesting as stories, but they will help to broaden the imagination and to make children understand and be kind to animals. Katie was a real character, and the tale of her life is as entertaining and dramatic as any school story! The realism is added to by a quantity of splendid photographs which show Katie at different periods of her career, and give glimpses of her animal friends, and the strange children she adopted.

From The Tale of Little Pig Robinson
By Beatrix Potter
(Warne).

THERE WERE CROWDS IN THE STREET AS IT WAS MARKET DAY.

From Warne's Pleasure Book for Girls
(Warne).

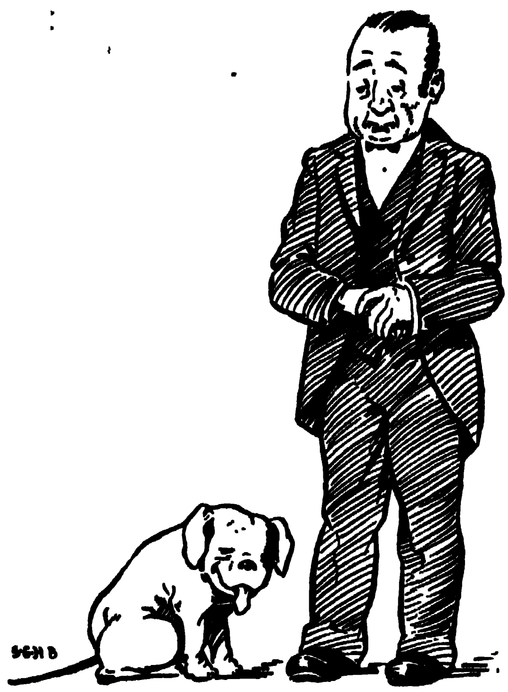
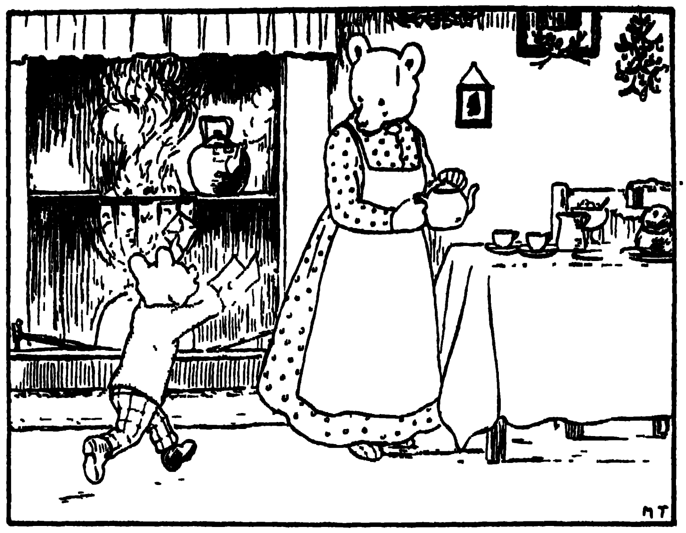
"I WAS LEARNING TO RIDE QUITE CREDITABLY DURING MY STAY AT WARRINA."

WARNE'S PLEASURE BOOK FOR GIRLS



3s. 6d. (Warne.)

Magnificently cheap, and full of short stories for girls. "She ran lightly up the fire escape." "She would go out to-morrow, and if she came across any of the fugitives she would help them." "The Fates were against that feast." "What," inquired the Matron in mingled horror and rage, "is the meaning of this behaviour?" "There's something wrong: Elsie can't stay under the water longer than nineteen seconds." "You're no Jackaroo, Nan," he said. "I take that back. You're a Bush hand now, old girl." These are just a few sentences taken at random from these diligently exciting stories which are each and all adequately illustrated.



From The Christopher Robin Birthday Book
By A. A. Milne
(Methuen).

JULY.

From The Oxford Annual for Scouts (Oxford University Press) "THE DOG HORACE, MADAM."

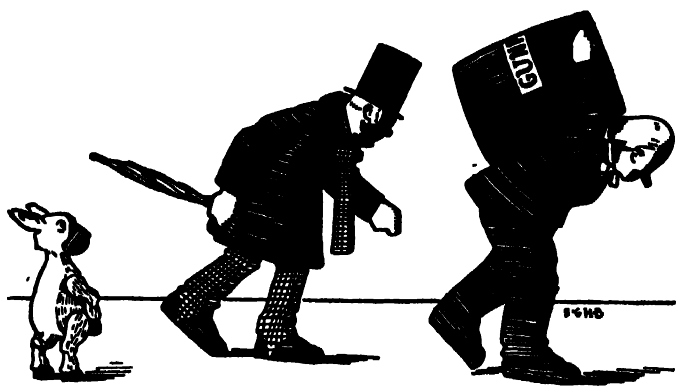
From Rupert in Trouble Again By Mary Tourtel (Sampson Low) RUPERT AND THE FANCY DRESS PARTY.

THE OXFORD ANNUAL FOR SCOUTS

Edited by Herbert Strang. 3s. 6d net. (Oxford Press.)

There seems to be no end to the resource and ability of Mr. Herbert Strang. This is another example of the "instruct and amuse" books now prepared for boys and girls. Each story in this volume is of definite interest to the Scout, with references to tracking, camp cooking, the Jamboree and a host of other things that fascinate lads in the Movement. The book stirs the blood and keeps one tinglingly alive. Our advice to boys is that they should go and buy it for themselves -if it is left to father there may be some delay in presentation.

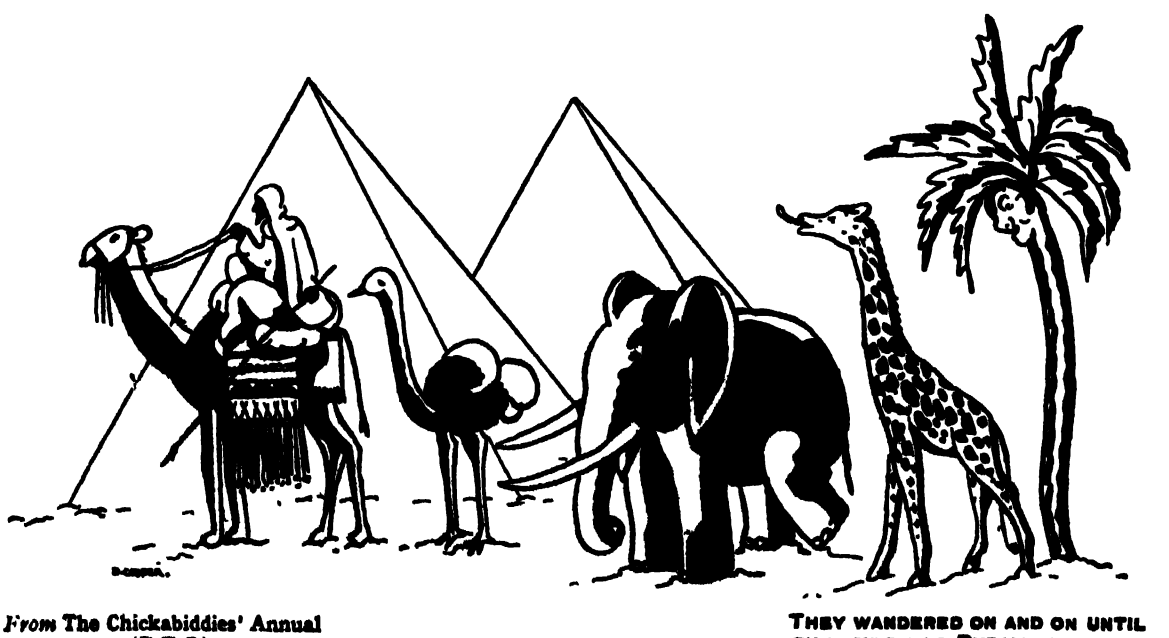
THE CHICKABIDDIES' ANNUAL



3s. 6d. (R.T.S.)

How many little tots will be able to read Mrs. Blackbird's lesson, we wonder, which we would say is cunningly composed of pictures, words, objects, signs, etc., all jumbled up together. When they have finished this they will find an abundance of delightful stories and verses, and the jolliest of pictures. It is, as is usually the case from the R.T.S., an excellent production.

WIRELESS IN TOYTOWN



By S. G. Hulme Beaman. 5s. (Collins.)

Whether they represent animals or humans, Mr. Beaman's grotesque, square little figures are masterpieces of art. How he manages to put so much vigour and expression into them is nothing short of marvellous. All the old friends of the author's wireless talks are here met with again—the Mayor, Ernest the Policeman, the Magician, Larry the Lamb and the rest of them, all adding their share to the joyous entertainment provided.

From Wireless in Toytown By S. G. Hulme Beaman (Collins). THEY WERE CARRYING A HUGE BARREL.

From The Chickabiddies' Annual (R.T.S.). THEY WANDERED ON AND ON UNTIL THEY MET TWO PYRAMIDS.

From Good King Wenceslas Looked Out (Mowbray) CHRISTMAS ANGELS.

From Children's Story of Literature By Edward Albert (Collins). INTERIOR OF AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY COFFEE-HOUSE.

No explorer had ever a more difficult task, for his researches took place in the heart of the Gobi Desert in the China of to-day, with its official bandits in the form of soldiers, and its unofficial bandits who behaved in exactly the same way. The story of the Flaming Cliffs is a wonderful narrative. The illustrations are excellent and it is difficult to conceive of any book which will be more welcome on the home shelves Here we have real adventure and real romance.

FRIENDS OF THE CHRIST CHILD

With illustrations by Jenny Oliver Dick 2s 6d (S P C K)

This is another of the "Pax Books" which the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge is publishing from time to time. It is composed of poems and what may be called short biographies of some of the saintly persons who knew well, or met, or followed the Christ Child. The first poem, rightly, is of "Our Lady," Christ's Mother, and the second is of St Joseph Then follow St Christopher, St. Francis, the Holy Innocents, and others, ending with St. Theresa, who, walking one day in the shade of the cloisters, saw a child at her side. She asked him his name, but he asked her to tell him her name, first. "Theresa," she said, and told him that after she became a nun the title "of Jesus' was added

> "'Theresa of Jesus you are called,'
> The Boy said, and He smiled,
> And then, as mild as any lamb,
> 'I Jesus of Theresa am'
> He was the Holy Child"

There is a mediæval rhythm about many of the poems, and all are picturesque and simple and devout. The full page illustrations are appropriately simple with much careful work in them.

ROY ANDREWS—DRAGON HUNTER

By Fitzhugh Green 6s. net. (Putnams)

This is a most striking addition to the publishers' Adventure Series. Here we have the amazing story of how Roy Andrews discovered a dragon's skull and a nest of dinosaur eggs which had been buried for ten million years—to mention only a few of his discoveries.

From Friends of the Christ Child A Pax Book (S.P.C.K.). S. EDWARD THE CONFESSOR

COLOUR WORK
—the test of the Engraver.

We have specialised in Colour Work for many years and have a staff of skilled and experienced craftsmen, with every modern appliance to enable them to turn out the best work.

A R C Process Blocks give facsimile results and are to-day unexcelled by any other Process House either at home or abroad.

We always make our customers and their wants our first and only consideration.

We should be glad if you would put this to the test.

We are well equipped for all orders, however large, however small, in all classes of reproduction ; Colour, Half-Tone, Line and Combination ; Mechanical Tints a speciality.

Prompt Delivery and Good Service always assured.

The ARC ENGRAVING CO. LTD.

4 & 6, Farringdon Avenue,
LONDON, E.C.4.

Telephone CENTRAL 9288 (2 Lines)

Telegrams "ENGRAVEDAR, LUD LONDON"

also at WIMBLEDON & PARIS

THE IVORY TALISMAN

By Captain F A M Webster 3s 6d. (Warne)

Do you know a lad who likes specially to read of natives, of Africa, dense unexplored forest, elephants and lions? If so, this is the appropriate book, and here is the right mixture Captain Webster has quite evidently travelled himself (is he not late the King's African Rifles?) He tells his tale of Luke Whitman, professional big game hunter, in a dashing and decorative manner The real hero of the story is a schoolboy, Bill, who goes to South Africa to see if he can find traces of his father who has not been heard of for a long time and whose signet ring with a strange ivory talisman has been found by Luke Bill eventually discovers his parent safe and sound, and the fever of Empire building, now in his bones, turns him to a yet greater adventure

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL

12s 6d (R T S)

When testimonials from two prime ministers are printed on the inner cover, a reviewer may hesitate to express his own opinion But as, like Mr Ramsay MacDonald, the present critic browsed upon the very first number of the Annual and has read nearly every subsequent number, he may be entitled to give an opinion or at any rate to raise a lament that there are no really first class writers of boys' stories now The present number of the Boy's Own Paper is as good, or better, than any similar periodical on the market but its contents have not that unique flavour that they once had There is something automatic about the production, as if the editor set himself to collect a certain class of literary material featuring certain well-known forms of adventure and left it at that But the Boy's Own Paper is still the Boy's Own Paper, it is a mine of romance and adventure, and some of its articles are interesting and informative

From Boy's Own Annual (R T S)

A KNIFE GLITTERED IN THE TAWNY LIGHT.

From Ivory Talisman By Capt F A M Webster (Warne).

THE POOR BRUTE, TRUMPETING MADLY, TORE AWAY WITH ITS STRANGE BURDEN.

THE TALE OF LITTLE PIG ROBINSON

By Beatrix Potter 3s 6d (Warne)

A new Beatrix Potter book is more than sure of its welcome We hardly know which has charmed us more the delightful stories of Susan the white cat, Aunt Dorcas the speckled hen, Aunt Porcas and her nephew little pig Robinson, etc, or the equally delightful illustrations, showing these quaint folk in their whimsical aping of the humans, six of which are tinted in the most delicate colourings

FROZEN IN

By Clarke Crichton Junior With illustrations 6s net (Putnams)

To the publisher's well-known series of Boys' Books by Boys Clarke Crichton contributes an interesting account of his experiences as cabin-boy in the fur-trading schooner Nanuk The ship was caught in the Siberian ice and her rescue was effected by intrepid airmen, two of whom lost their lives while trying to save the valuable cargo of furs This narrative, which is very fully illustrated, is told in a simple and graphic way that will hold the attention of juvenile readers better than many more pretentious records.

THE CHAMPION ANNUAL FOR BOYS—1931

Illustrated. 6s. net. (Fleetway House.)

This is the sort of book that fathers, in a superior fashion, buy on the way home to give to their sons, and then postpone the gift until they have read it themselves. This Annual contains an admirable mixture of fable and fact, though one regrets that so far as the fiction is concerned the "sword and cloak" romances of earlier days have given way to the internal combustion engine adventure. However that may be, here is a fine present for your boy —full of well-written stories and interesting articles. The editor had at least one stroke of genius—when he asked Mr. J. B. Hobbs to tell us how to play cricket.

From The Champion Annual for Boys (Amalgamated Press).

GINGER, RAISING THE PAIL OF WATER: "WHERE'S HIS NECK?"

LORNA DOONE

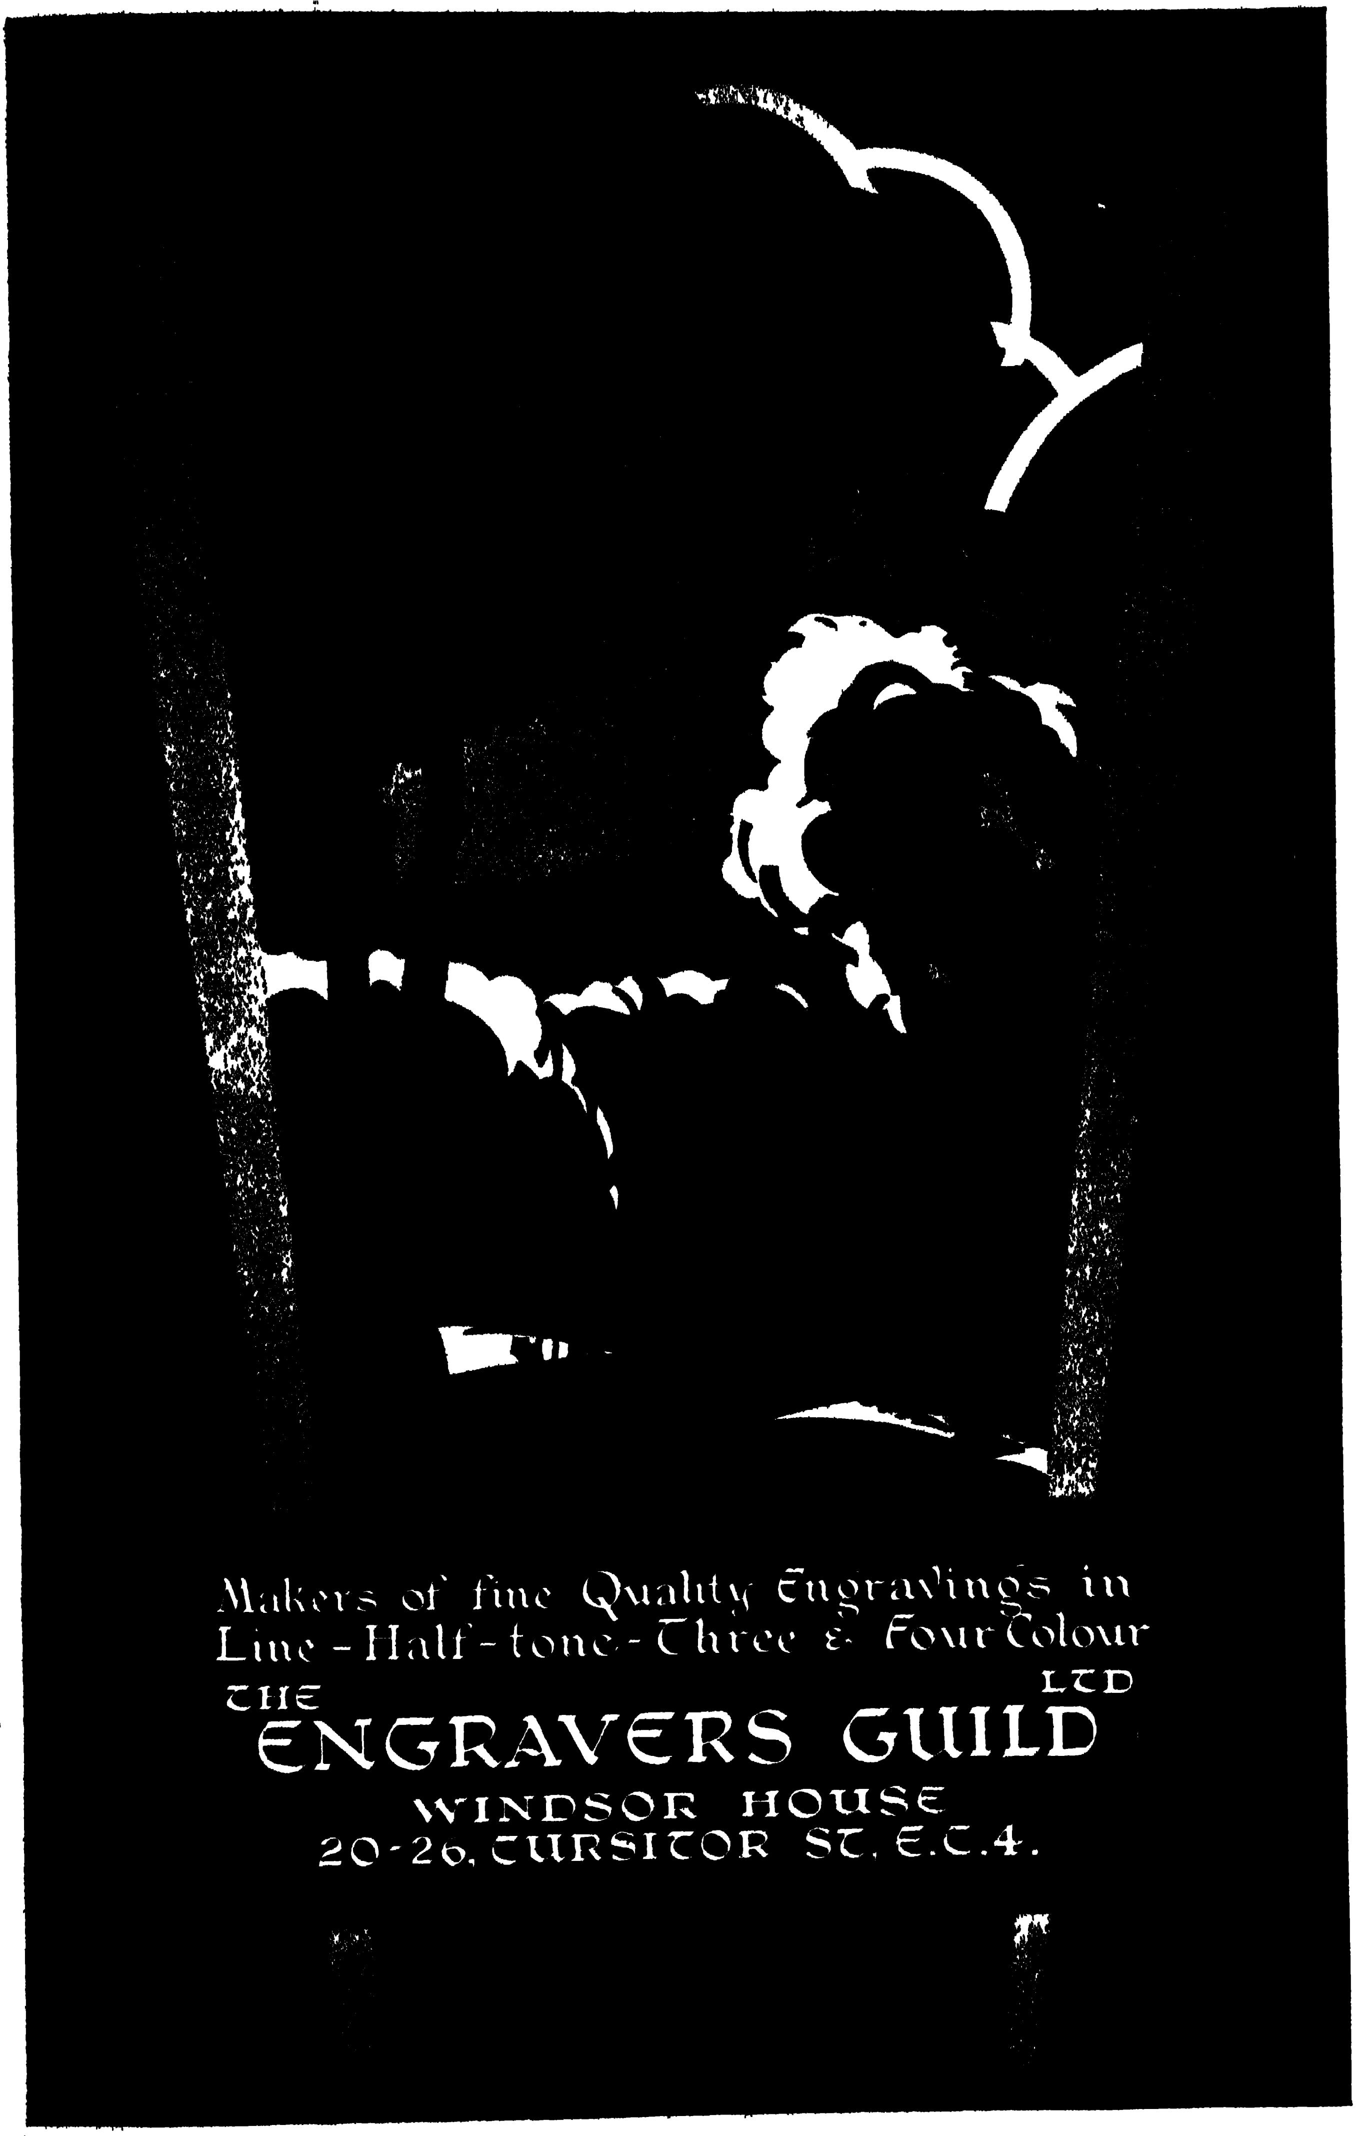
By R. D. Blackmore. 6s. (Chambers.)

One of the perennial favourites is undoubtedly "Lorna Doone," and the edition to hand from Messrs. Chambers is a delightful one, being embellished with no less than thirteen pictures in colour and sixty-one pen and ink drawings by Gordon Browne. The former have caught the spirit of the moors and their doughty, fearless inhabitants with marked success, while the latter, down to the very smallest, are equally true and appealing. A particularly pleasing gift-book.

TRUE TALES OF AN OLD SHELLBACK

By Stephen Southwold. 3s. 6d. (Longmans.)

These delightfully told stories of the sea and sailors will please all those who already know Mr. Southwold's genius for understanding the mind of the young. The sea in any case is a fascinating subject for boys, and all its varied romance is brought out in just the right way in this book. There are many good illustrations.



From Dare at St. Martin's: A School Story By D. Stapleton (Chambers).

THE JOYOUS OCCUPATION OF DRAGGING THE FAT AND SQUEALING TUBBY OUT OF BED.

LAID HOLD OF DEAR ANNIE IN A HIGHLY COMFORTING MANNER.

From Lorna Doone By R. D. Blackmore (Chambers).

Makers of fine Quality Engravings in Line - Half-tone - Three & Four Colour
THE ENGRAVERS GUILD LTD
WINDSOR HOUSE
20-26, CURSITOR ST. E.C.4.

KNIGHT TEMPLAR

By Leslie Charteris. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

You will not like "the Saint" if you dislike exaggeration. But if you do enjoy reading of a regular swashbuckler, of an unemployed Archangel, here is a hero that will fascinate you as much as did, no doubt, the Scarlet Pimpernel. In fact the Saint is a worthy companion to him, being an equally intrepid soul. The narrative here races on from thrill to thrill, but always the author is concerned with his picture of the hero whom he quite properly adores. How does "the Saint" talk? Like this: "Queer fish are my hobby. . . . There was a smear of bloater paste, once, that fetched me from the Malay Peninsula, via Chicago, to a very wild bit of Devonshire." Personality and vivacity shine through this adventure story.

THE LONGER DAYS

By the author of "Miss Tiverton Goes Out." 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

This is an entertaining story of Victorian family life as lived in cultured and artistic circles running side by side with a theme of fantastic unreality. It is told by the heroine's daughter, who has gathered together what facts she could of her mother's early days and interpreted them in the light of after knowledge.

Even in childhood beautiful Brenda is not quite like other people, and after her idiot son is born the most vital part of her inhabits a dream world with him while she retires more and more from contact with ordinary life. The early scenes have great charm which is somewhat dissipated by the length of the book and its many anti-climaxes.

From St. Palfry's Cross
By Cosby Hadath
(Cassell).

"She uttered with a little gasp, 'Man, you're starving!'"

From Eustacia Goes to the Chalet School
By E. M. Brent-Dyer
(Chambers).

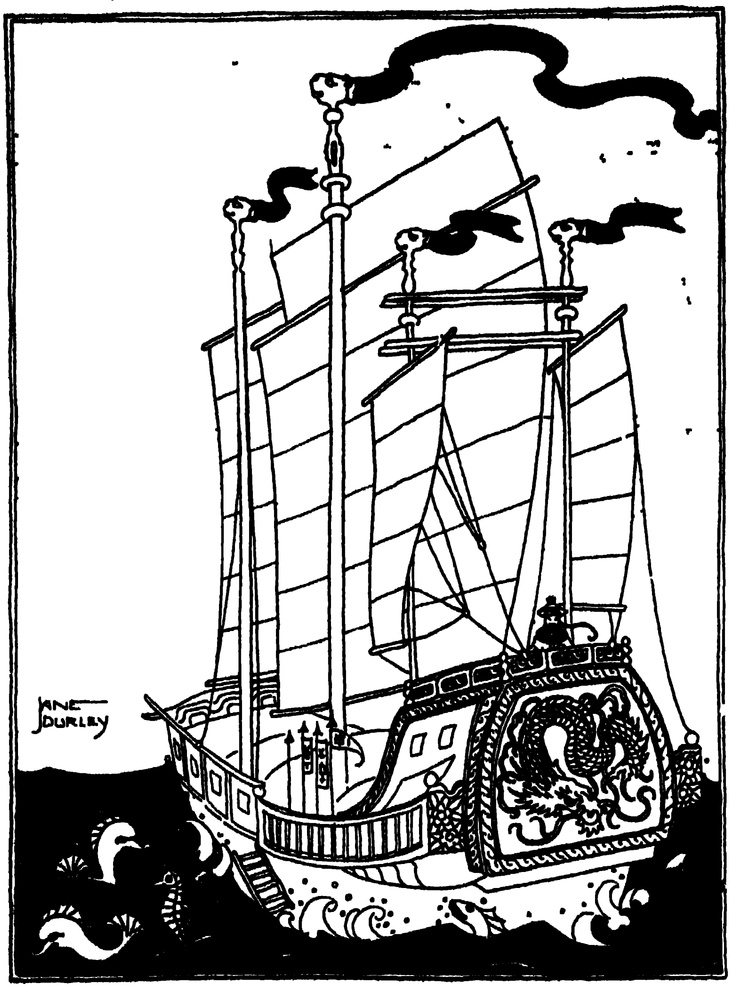
Again and again she had called

CÆSAR

By Patrick Russ. Illustrated by Harry Rountree. 5s. (Putnams.)

A book that shows an amazing knowledge of wild life is this story of a Panda leopard by a boy of sixteen. The leopard cub's earliest recollections were concerned with killing and eating, but after many adventures he was captured and put in a zoo. His master succeeded in taming and training him, and took him hunting. The man however was lost in the high snows and Cæsar ran wild until he found a mate, and died defending her and their young. The story is told graphically and is astonishly well done. Mr. Rountree's illustrations are of course a most valuable addition.



LACEBURY MANOR

By Robert Gathorne-Hardy. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

Lacebury Manor is another case of the Victorian revival. Though the scene is laid not in England but in an island colony off the coast of Canada, there is no doubting the period, which is the middle of the nineteenth century. The story describes an autocratic old father (sketched with considerable humour) and his three daughters, who might be sub-titled Resignation, Resentment and Revolt. Those who are not irritated by the artificial atmosphere and can extract pleasure from his shrewd observation will find much quiet amusement in Mr. Gathorne-Hardy's book.

T. & A. CONSTABLE, LTD

UNIVERSITY PRESS, EDINBURGH

From Cartwheels and Catkins
By Wilfrid Thorley
(Shaylor).

THE GALLEON.

CARTWHEELS AND CATKINS

By Wilfrid Thorley Illustrated by Jane Durley
3s 6d (Shaylor)

The freshness of the ideas and the swinging, lilting measures of Mr. Thorley's poems will make his book of verse a source of endless pleasure to children and grown-ups alike He never writes aimlessly, every poem has an original fanciful turn or some quaint notion that lingers in the memory, and the lines run with a delightful smoothness, also the lyrics are short and crisp " Of Pools " is a good example

"In April down the country lane
The night sky following the rain
Makes every pool a window pane.

"And thence the fairies looking through,
Say 'How's the weather? Is it true
That overhead again there's blue?'

"But by and by a cart will pass
With heavy, heedless wheel alas
And shatter all the shining glass'

Miss Durley's drawings show a pleasing and unusual combination of boldness and daintiness.

THE TRADER'S WIFE

By Jean Kenyon Mackenzie 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

In this short and lovely novel there is that curious atmospheric glamour which marked Sheila Kaye-Smith's "Tamarisk Town," Elinor Wylie's " Jennifer Lorn " and Joseph Hergesheimer's " Java Head." Lucy Harford, the reformed slave trader's wife with " white arms and black hair, the daffodil blossoms of the candles and a golden light on her breast," is a thing of faery, not of life. Her taciturn and cold-blooded husband, who sees his wife wasting away under the cruel African sun, appears the type of male person who strangely attracts such fragile beauty. There is pathos in Lucy's arrival as 'a smiling, crinolined queen at the trader's dark island': there is tragedy in her distracted end. Here is an unforgettable book about old days when American slavers sailed from Newport to the breeding grounds of their serfs.

LIZA

By Edith Young 7s 6d (Dent)

Something of Liza is always shrouded in mystery even when she is trying to reveal herself most fully (for part of the book consists of extracts from her diary) In spite of her passionate nature, she is one of those inviolates who in her own words is ' unmoved by all experience once it has become 'a memory.' The slight, rather sordid story is beautifully and subtly written, betraying the author's wide culture and pictorial gifts of a high order In the creation of a tense emotional atmosphere by a few swift touches she is particularly successful We shall look forward to other work from her sensitive pen

THE MAN WHO MADE GOTTLIEB.

By Anthony Bertram
7s 6d (Chapman & Hall)

Daniel Loveday, the son of a Sussex farmer, has musical talent, and having had his head turned by a local success, he goes to London in search of fame and fortune As a young man of promise Loveday is totally unconvincing, and does not even suggest the touch of genius he is held to possess, but his failure (which is hardly to be wondered at in a man of no musical education) and gradual disillusionment are well handled by Mr Bertram who gives to the ageing self-styled professor one ray of satisfaction in the world-wide success of a former pupil, Gottlieb Upon this alone Loveday's self-respect depends, and when he is denied all participation in Gottlieb's triumphs his life's tragedy is complete

From The Sea Captain's Hostage
By Dorothy Dell
(Warne).

"LOOSE THE PAINTER, GILES, AND SET US ADRIFT," ORDERED MY FATHER.

THE CHILDREN'S PLAY-HOUR BOOK

4th Hour

Edited by Stephen Southwold. 6s. (Longmans.)

Each Christmas season brings an increasing crop of books for youngsters which have been contributed to by authors of outstanding reputation. This book is an excellent example, for we have Henry Williamson telling a delightful story of how he saved some tiny titmice from a bomb in the shape of a cuckoo's egg, verses by John Galsworthy, the late Marion St. John Webb, John Drinkwater, Sir Henry Newbolt, Walter de la Mare, "The Romance of an Air Port," from G. G. Jackson. These and many more stories, verses, playlets, games, pictures, etc., by well-known people, including the editor, are included in this most welcome book.

BLACK BEAUTY

By Anna Sewell. With illustrations. 6s. net. (Oxford Press.)

There is something of a thrill about a new edition of "Black Beauty." It is one of the "loved" books of England. It made its own position as soon as ever it was published, nearly sixty years ago, and it has never lost its hold. It is the autobiography of a horse, told in simple words, with thorough knowledge and understanding and without undue sentimentality. This new edition contains a short introduction telling us a little about Anna Sewell, the crippled author, and it is illustrated by, seemingly, a horse lover, H. C. Metcalfe. The coloured frontispiece is specially charming, of Black Beauty as a foal, and his mother. It has been said that if everyone who had to do with horses was to read "Black Beauty" there would be very little cruelty in England. This is a good edition to begin with.

From Warne's "Top All" Books for Toddlers (Warne). BROWNIE FARM.

From Black Beauty By Anna Sewell (Oxford University Press). A TALK IN THE ORCHARD.

THE PLAYGROUND

By Katharine Tynan. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

Miss Katharine Tynan has brought her narrative gifts to bear on a story of great benevolence and idealism. John Tracey was born in a Dublin slum, where with his parents, five brothers and a crippled sister, he inhabited one room of a tenement house. He was a thoughtful, good little boy with a knack of attracting influential friends. Early in life he was helped and educated by a wealthy farmer who, seeing that John had a gift for gardening, apprenticed him to Sir Joshua Dent's famous Formosa Nurseries. After that his rise to the top of his profession was rapid and easy, culminating in marriage to Sir Joshua's daughter. Throughout his successful career John cherishes the memory of Nonie, the little sister who died at an early age, Nonie who loved flowers and longed so for the country she never saw, and in memory of her John dedicates his energies to making playgrounds for the benefit of slum dwellers.

From The Children's Play Hour (Longmans). TRESPASSERS IN THE FARM YARD.

From A Mystery of the Broads
By Percy F. Westerman
(Blackie).

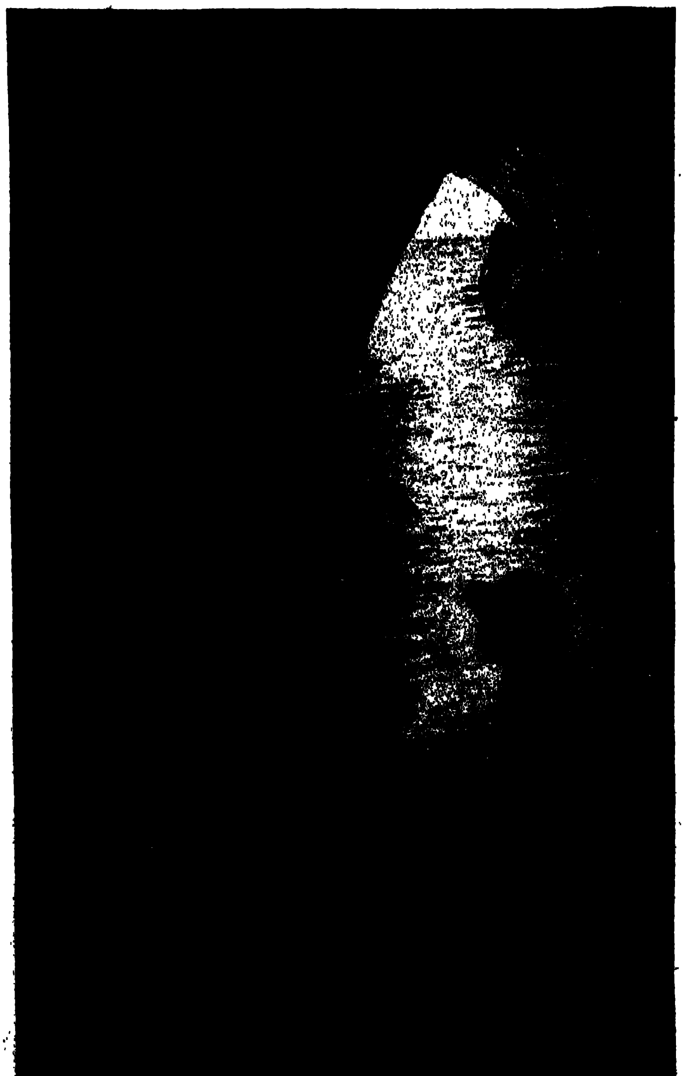
UNDER WATERLOO BRIDGE.

A MYSTERY OF THE BROADS

By Percy F. Westerman. 3s. 6d. (Blackie.)

Mr. Westerman is an old hand at an exciting yarn, and boys will settle down to his latest story with keen anticipation. In the first chapter we are led on board the Zoroaster, a motor cruiser depending mainly upon her fifteen-twenty horse-power. In charge, and just about to take his beloved Putney Sea Scouts on a trip, is Scoutmaster Forbes, who in real life is employed as a detective. Just when the Zoroaster is starting for the Medway, Forbes is called to a case. He must occupy himself with the mysterious disappearance of one Dellifer. But he decides that he can work both mystery and Sea Scout holiday together by changing the ship's destination to the Broads. This is a capital plot, and to the Broads they go, and if by the time a boy has read this book he is not crazy to be a Sea Scout, we shall be surprised. Never a father but who will be most happy to read it all too. The chain of evidence in the Dellifer case is most cunningly linked.

DOWSED LIGHTS



By Adam Sadler. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

Sailing under dowsed lights and in the company of Captain McGrath certainly promised much in the way of excitement and adventure, but it fulfilled no less. The reader falls as surely under the spell of this wiry, loose-limbed Scot as did Matheson himself, the journalist who was knocking about the South Seas at the behest of his fancy and preserving his self-respect by acting as newspaper correspondent. McGrath was the ideal hero-villain, with his lazy slouch and nonchalant appearance, he had only to look or speak and things happened. Round his various ventures in the service of Yuan Pei-fu and rescuing an English girl from captivity, Mr. Sadler has embroidered a vigorous pattern of mystery, intrigue, jealousy and revenge. One is almost breathless with the rate at which rajahs are removed and replaced, while treachery is dispatched with equally alarming speed and neatness. We have purposely resisted giving away any of the thrills, the pace is too steady and even for mutilation.

THE WORLD'S COARSE THUMB

By W. B. Phillips. 7s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

Only the prologue of this novel is laid in the trenches. The story proper deals with some of the problems and questionings that confronted the demobilised. The opening scene concludes with the dying confession of Harry Peveril to his chum Dennis Harvey that he had wronged a girl in their native village, and with his entreaty that Dennis should befriend her and keep the facts from the Peveril household. All this on his return Dennis loyally carried out, with the result that the world put its coarse thumb on his friendly interest in Nellie Gunter, and created suspicion and estrangement between Dennis and Harry's sister, whom he loved. In the end his loyalty was fully repaid and he triumphed over the malice of business rivals who had gladly availed themselves of the lying rumours. The story is written with obvious earnestness, but the handling betrays inexperience. Much of the dialogue is ineffective and unnecessary, and the reflections on social questions are superficial.

From Haunted Islands
By Isabel M. Peacocke
(Ward, Lock).

KNEELING ON THE ROCK HE HELD OUT HIS SINEWY BROWN HANDS TO HER.

From Hey, Diddle Diddle
By Stephen Southwold
(Collins).

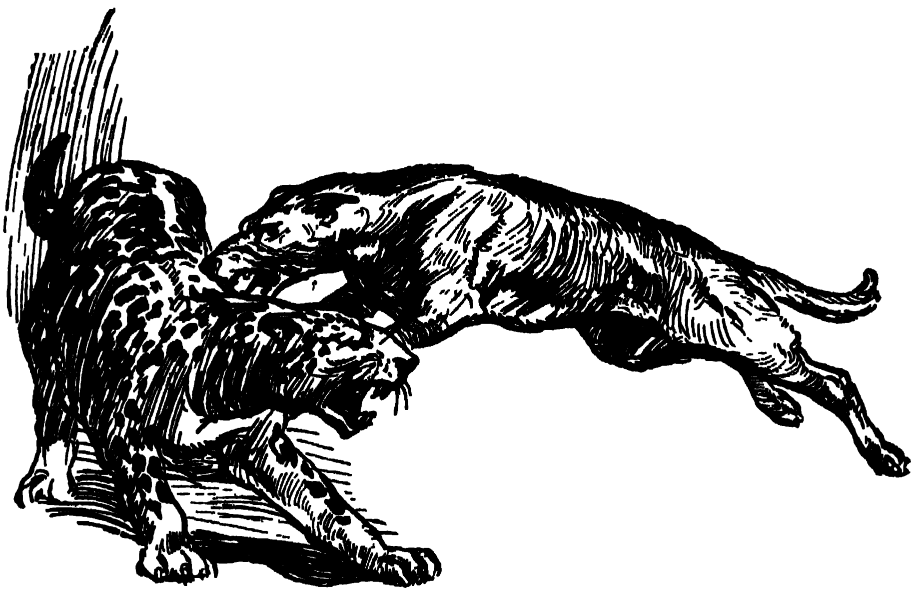
THE HEDGEHOG LISTENED TO THEIR CHATTER.

THE KNIFE THROUGH THE ACE



By William Macleod Raine. 7s. 6d.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

Raine is an author of great popularity with a public which likes to read of sheriffs and tenderfeet, cattle thieves and valiant cowboys, lone range riders, bonanzas and sparkling Western girlhood. His latest novel is as racy as any of its predecessors. Young Jim Rutledge is a prince of cattlemen, doing immense deeds of daring against Dave Moss and his hellion sons, and incessantly depriving them of their ill-gotten gains. It was unfortunate for Jim that he shot the heroine's brother, Steven, a red-headed lad who kept bad company; but vigorous young Ellen Lawson could not help loving her chivalrous admirer. The novel is packed full of knightliness, villainy and shooting.

HEY, DIDDLE DIDDLE

By Stephen Southwold
Illustrated by Ernest Aris 6s.
(Collins)

If some of the stories in this book are likely to distress sensitive and imaginative children you must blame Nature, not Mr. Southwold. It is not his fault animals prey on each other and big fishes eat little fishes, and he has for the most part woven his tales around the facts of life—only taking the licence of translating the language of birds and beasts and fishes into human speech. And several of the stories are simply amusing and not sad at all. There is the one about the brier bush, for instance, with its homely moral which children will be quick to appreciate, and the one about the sparrow and the old toad, and the one about the sociable scarecrow—indeed, it is an admirable collection of nature tales, full of variety. Mr. Aris's many illustrations add greatly to its fascination.

From Warne's Pleasure Book for Boys
(Warne).

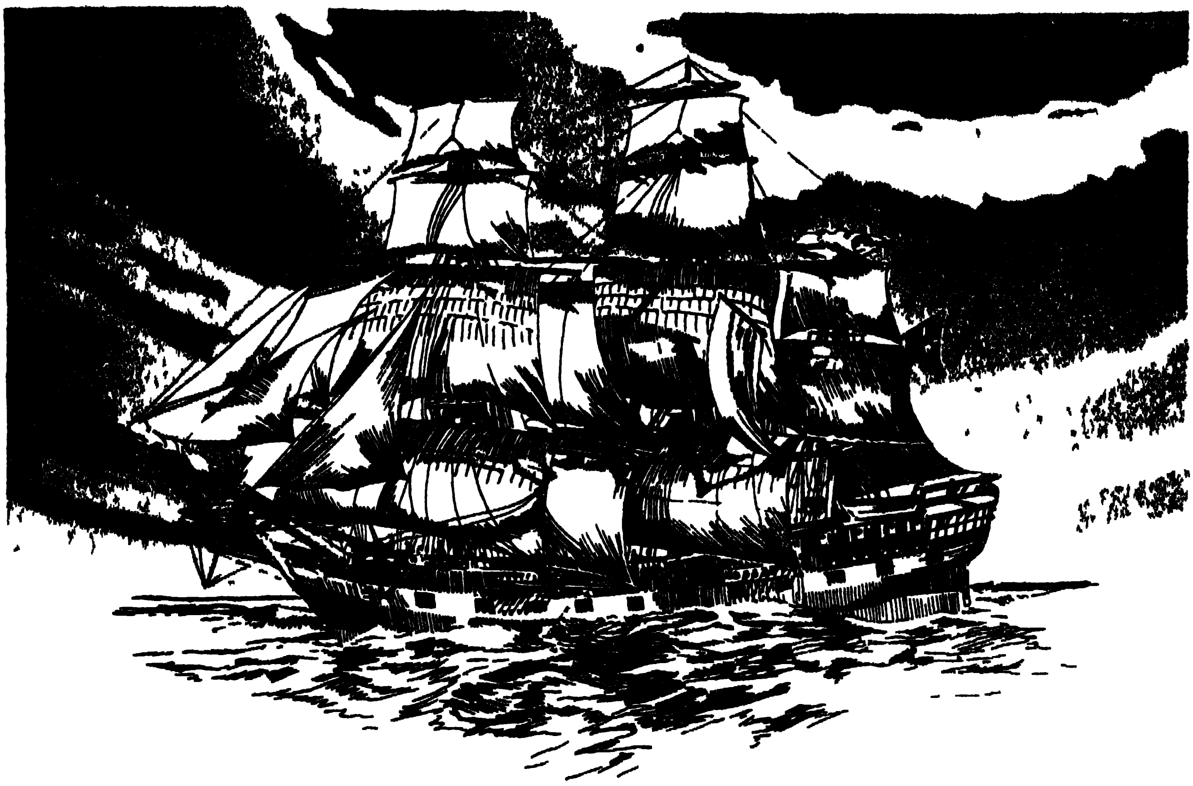
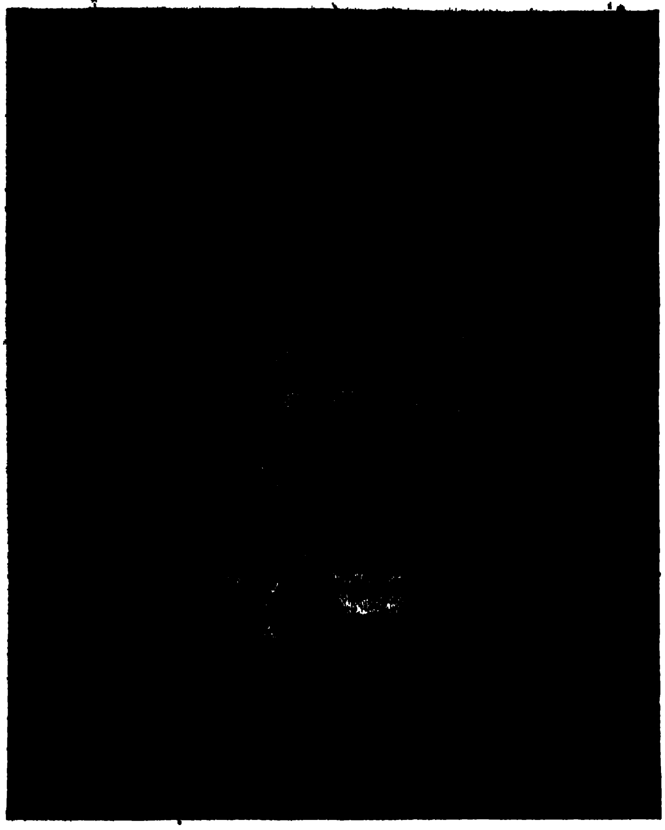
BULLY'S LAST FIGHT.

THE THREE MAIDENS



By Eden Phillpotts. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson)



This is a story of East Devon, told with the knowledge of local scenes and people which made the success of "The Farmer's Wife." Mr. Phillpotts's characters are always homely people (in the English, not the American, sense) and he has the rare gift of holding our interest in them, with no help from melodramatic incidents or rich uncles dying overseas. The main story concerns the adventures in love of three maidens, Marian, Freda and Lily. Freda is a philosopher and her shrewd sense expresses itself in many a phrase of worldly wisdom. "If he ain't right now," she tells Lily, "he won't never be right, because marriage don't change 'em more than a cold in their heads." Freda is a good friend and Lily's ultimate happiness is hastened on by her practical methods. Then there are the countrymen who are always much in evidence in a Phillpotts story, farmers and gamekeepers and poachers, men whose talk has a character and edge of its own. The whole book goes with a pleasant swing from start to finish.

From Kalulu The Hare
By Frank Worthington
(Collins).

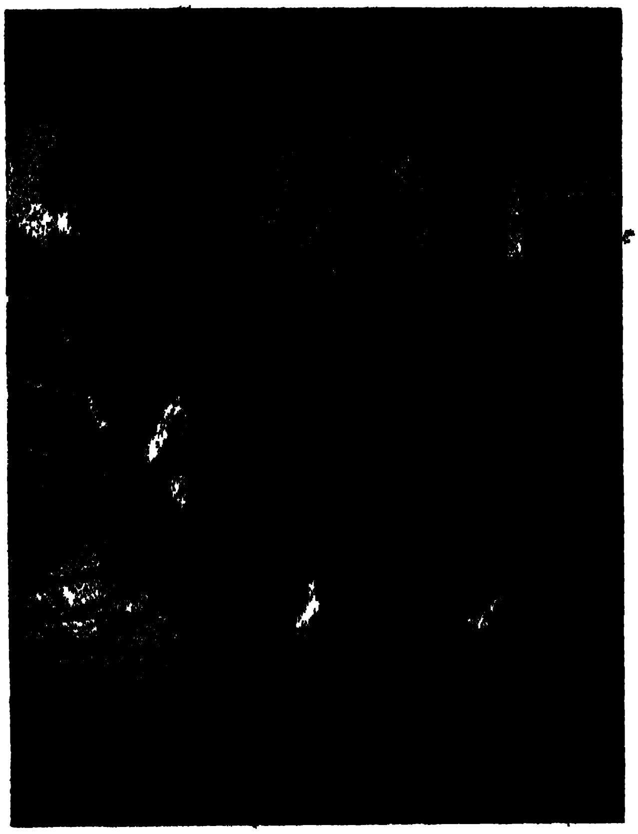
AND THE NEXT VILLAGE THEY CAME TO WAS THE VILLAGE OF LION.



From Animals In the Wild and In Captivity
By E. G. Boulenger
(Ward, Lock).

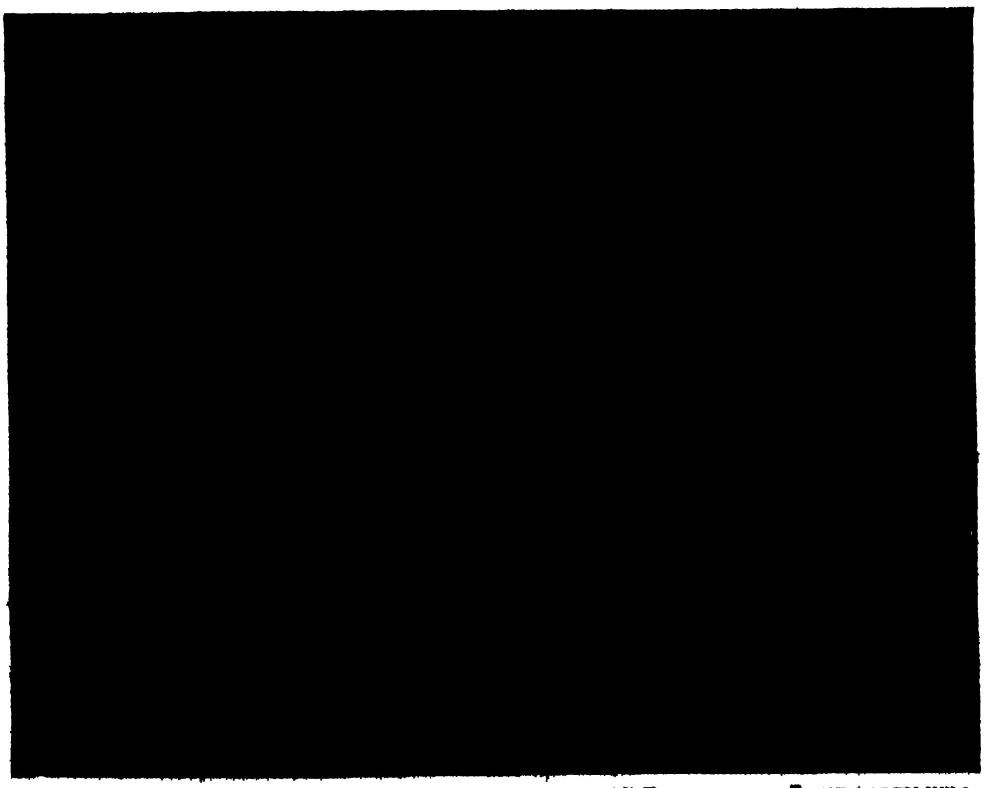
THE TIGER TAKES A MIDNIGHT PROWL.
(Photo by F. W. Champion, Indian Forest Service.)

TRIO



By Phyllis Bentley. 7s. 6d. net. (Gollancz.)

Miss Bentley's method is an austere one. She is not afraid of writing about such everyday matters as the weather, clothes or the baby's under-linen. The wonder is in fact that with such unadorned matter-of-factness she manages to keep our interest alive; but she does. Here is the story of three girls' lives—three diverse characters bound by common circumstance into a "trio." We begin with their school days and we quit them only after marriage. We watch them first in their separate antagonisms and affections (a fine study in the clash of characters), and then we watch them as these antagonisms and affections widen to the world in general and to their prospective husbands in particular. If anything, with the exception of Rachel, who remains until the end a rather dim creation, the girls are overdrawn: Esme is too obviously "catty," and Lena is too obviously designed to win our sympathies in her battle against the harsh odds of life. Nevertheless it is a fine tale that Miss Bentley tells, despite the rather wearisome monotony of its telling. We are carried along surprisingly against our will. It is not often these days that a writer can be accused of keeping her writing "down" too much; but Miss Bentley's work, mature in many ways as it is, would certainly benefit by a little indulgence of the poet that must be present in every good prose-writer's make-up. As it stands one can almost see from the beginning how her novel was planned. One can certainly see how it will end.

From Five Thorns Farm
By Eleanor E. Helme
(R.T.S.).

"NOW THEN, TONY, UP YOU GET."

From Animal Fun and Frolic
By Jessie Pope
(Ward, Lock).

"GET UP," BETTY CRIED, "THE PARTY WILL SOON BE HERE," AS SHE TICKLED HER NOSE WITH A LONG STRAW.

From Martin Thorn—Adventurer
By Mona Tracy
(Oxford University Press)

I DODGED JUST IN TIME TO ESCAPE A BLOW FROM HIS WICKED FLIPPER.

From Little Folks
(Amalgamated Press)

SHE WHIRLED ROUND WITH A LITTLE SHRIEK, ONLY TO MEET THE GRINS OF THE OTHER GIRLS.

MARTIN THORN—ADVENTURER

By Mona Tracy 3s 6d (Oxford Press)

A close-knit yarn by one who understands just how much boys and girls love adventure Miss Tracy writes well and clearly, and she has contrived for innocent Martin (wrongly accused of crime) a magnificent series of terrible happenings The glimpse of Norfolk Island with its ragged and tattered convicts is impressive, and among them we find poor Martin, who is in reality a proud baronet of England That right is done at last to the fine young hero goes without saying He has a stainless name and great courage Miss Tracy does not know how to be dull

LITTLE FOLKS Vol 112

5s net (Amalgamated Press)

Lives there the man who could write of a "Little Folks" Annual without affection Reviewers of to-day remember it in their own nursery days It may conform to more modern needs, the fashions of its pictures may change, the subjects of interest widen, the very shape of the page may be altered, but "Little Folks" remains "Little Folks," and its hold on the young affections continues. The present volume contains pleasure for all. The stories are told with all the verve and thrill, humour and appeal that 'Little Folks" stories have ever been noted for, the editor talks to his readers in a manner that amuses them, wins their confidence, and makes them long for the next number; there are Clubs and Societies, a Parliament, a Page for Young Brothers, and a Competition Corner that is worthy of a volume "all to itself."

From The Topping Book for Girls (Dean).

THE ABBEY SECRET.

From A Roundabout Turn
By Robert H. Charles
(Warne).

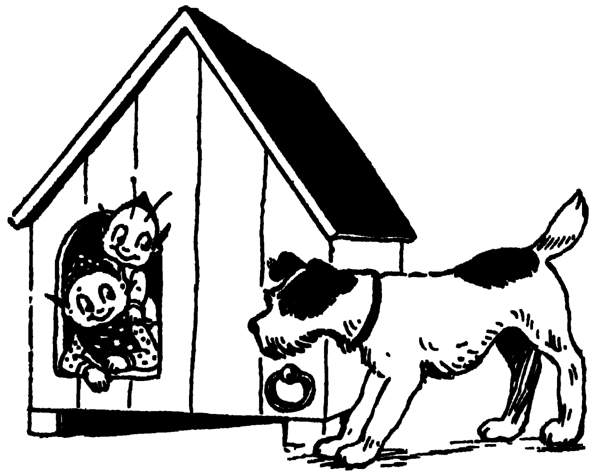
"WELL, AND WHAT HAVE YOU FOUND, DEAR ?"

THE OXFORD ANNUAL FOR TINY FOLKS

3s. 6d. (Oxford Press)

Just brimful of joyous laughter and fun is this delightful book for the tiny tots. What whimsical and jolly creatures are pictured on every page and what uncommon names some of them have. Some of the pictures nearly tell their own stories, they are so numerous, while others peep in and out of the jolliest tales.



From The Oxford Annual for Tiny Folks
(Oxford University Press).

JERRY HUMBLE AND TOBY.

A ROUNDABOUT TURN

By Robert H. Charles. With drawings by L. Leslie Brooke 3s. 6d. net. (Warne)

The verses of "A Roundabout Turn" originally appeared in Punch and rightly so. They tell the short tale of a Toad who lived on Albury Heath, and quite realised its merits. But Albury Heath was flat, and he had been given to understand that the world was round, and he wanted to go and see. So he started to see, and he saw, and he felt Seventy-nine rides on the Roundabout were sufficient. All we who have known and loved Mr. Leslie Brooke and his drawings since we first met him and them in "Johnny Crow's Garden" many years ago, will know full well what he can do with such a subject as this. These drawings of Mr. and Mrs. Toad, and of the great adventure, are inimitable. One may well envy the child who gets this volume. Four of the "plates" are in colour

From The Playbox Annual (Amalgamated Press).

THE PIXIES FIND A NEW HOME.

THE ISLAND OF PENGUINS

By Cherry Kearton. 10s. 6d. (Longmans.)

In the space available here one can barely touch the fringe of the amazing and interesting experiences of Cherry Kearton on the Island of Penguins. To begin with its bird population seems staggering. Just a piece of rock, certainly no more than four miles square, and yet at certain seasons of the year there are no less than (quite literally) five million penguins Some small idea is gained from the frontispiece which shows but a small section of one colony. And here Mr. and Mrs. Kearton have spent many months on the most intimate and friendly terms with the birds. "I saw the comfortable old gentleman, the social outcast, the mischief-maker, weddings, fights, the tragic collapse of a house—every happening almost that would provide a head-line in our newspapers if it occurred in London or New York. Yes, Mr. Kearton has revelled in his fascinating adventures and we in turn have delighted in his descriptions.

From Quinton Kicks Off!
By Michael Poole
(Cassell).

"THE PAIR OF THEM WERE ACTUALLY TIED TO THE CHAIRS IN WHICH THEY SAT."

THE SKIPPER OF THE TEAM

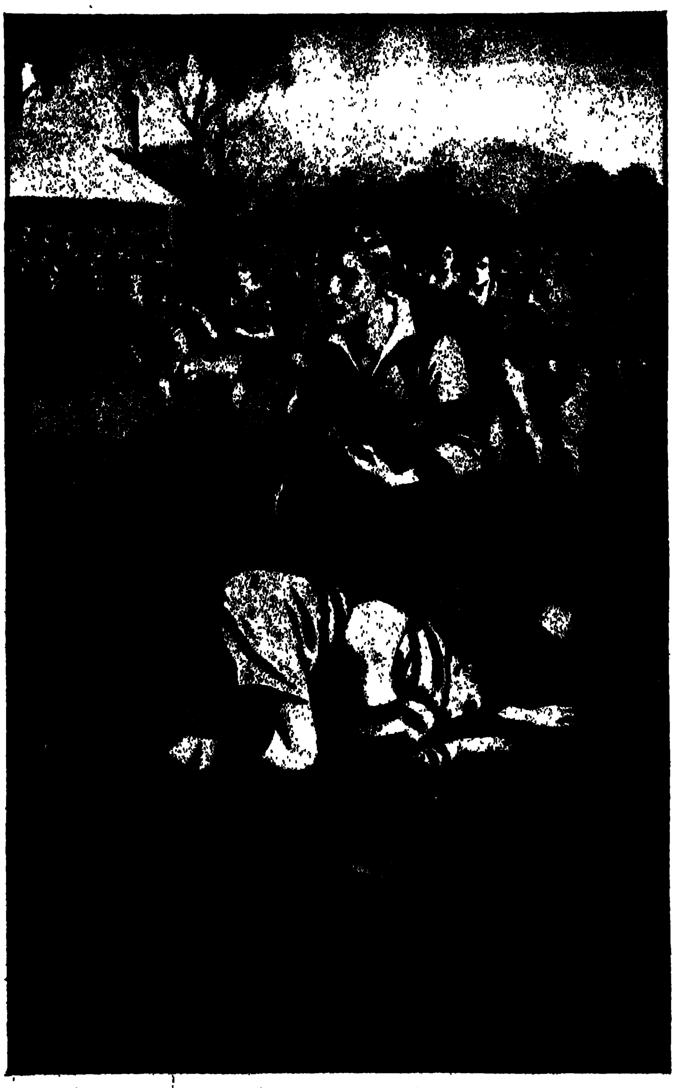
By A. L. Haydon. 3s. 6d. (Warne.)

The materials may be familiar, but a school story of this type can never be told too often. It tells the story of the downfall of Deane Aylmer, who was led by conceit into failing to play the game, and his place of pride at Brideford was captured by his rival, Venables, who succeeded in impressing his schoolfellows by sheer strength of character. The story is full of exciting episodes, thrilling matches, breaking of bounds, ragging of masters and suchlike delectable tit-bits. The boys are well drawn and differentiated, and the book may be commended not only as a thoroughly healthy and interesting yarn, but as marvellous good value for the price.

FAMILY GROUP

By Sibyl Phillpotts. 7s. 6d. (Arrowsmith.)

That the primness of the Victorian maiden was only skin deep is being made increasingly plain to us by recent novels of the period, and the theory is reinforced by Miss Sibyl Phillpotts's exceedingly natural picture of Victorian life.



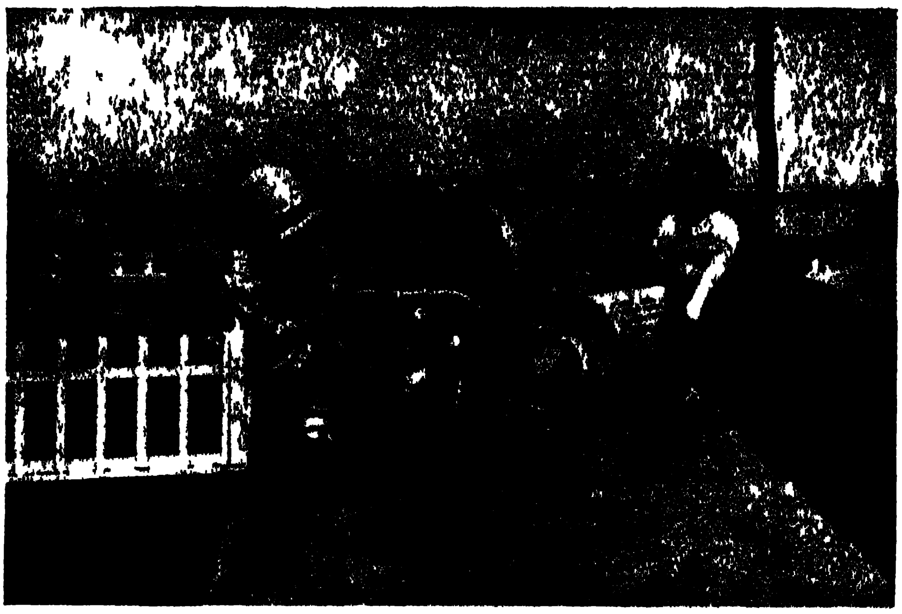
Ann Rymer is the only member of the family group with whom we have much sympathy. We are told, but somehow remain unconvinced, of the brilliance of her father, the Captain, perhaps because he is generally moody and reserved at home, although kind to his handsome, stupid and adoring wife. Dorothy is pretty and affectionate if insipid, but Ann, who is intelligent but not brilliant, dutiful but with no inclination to martyrdom, and conventional except when in love, has a sober charm all her own, and is presented with the kinks and inconsistencies that we look for in real people.

Miss Phillpotts has a rather dry concise style that covers a good deal of observation and humour. She has too the courage of a decidedly unexpected ending. We lay down the book glad that Ann is to have the beauty and adventure she missed as a young girl, but not altogether satisfied. When a woman over thirty marries an artistic impulsive man six years her junior the old tag "and they lived happily ever afterwards" is not a foregone conclusion, and it is a tribute to the author's skill that we feel uneasy about her heroine's future.

PASTIMES, HOBBIES AND SPORTS FOR BOYS

By S. Gibbard Jackson. Illustrated. 6s. net. (Sampson Low.)

A book for the boy who asks questions and seeks reasons, for the lad whose fingers are itching to make something and whose mind is beginning to challenge things as he finds them. Mr. Gibbard Jackson is just the man and here is just the book to occupy the boys' mind intelligently. It is not merely a collection of mechanical devices but a handbook that satisfies many different appetites. Apart from the instructional side there are chapters that deal with unexplained mysteries and such a question as the existence of the sea serpent is revived, and sea serpents ought to interest any boy. Congratulations to author, artist and publisher.



From The Skipper of the Team
By A. L. Haydon
(Warne).

FLINGING OUT A HAND, HE FENDED OFF THE OTHER AND SHOT PAST HIM.

RHYMES FOR GROWN-UP CHILDREN

By E R S Skeels Illustrated by Bon 2s 6d net. (Alston Rivers)

On the whole we feel that the illustrations in this book were worth a better letterpress There are one or two of these brief rhymes which scan well, but there are many which one has to gabble through in order to recite properly In writing comic verses the author should have remembered the two chief rules of the game—the words must be chosen so as to receive their correct emphasis naturally, and the subject must be funny There is a certain amount of fun in this book which might have been much worse but could certainly have been much better.

From The Katy Kruse Play Book
By Rose Fyleman
(Harrap).

AS YOU WERE

By Wilfrid Benson 7s 6d. (Hogarth Press)

Those who have resolved to read no more War novels can take up Mr Benson's book with a clear conscience, as it is concerned only with army life in England Except for a couple of aeroplane crashes it is free from physical horrors, though it dwells almost exclusively on the sordid preoccupations of men who have temporarily lost their sense of the value of life

The story follows the career of a public school boy who joins the Inns of Court O T C at the beginning of 1918 He is a rather enigmatic person in spite of his innocence, which is rapidly dissipated in the atmosphere of hard-drinking men which now surrounds him What really interests the author, we feel, are the emotional relationships between the various men who fill his pages—Plomer and Lamb who hate each other with such ferocity and can never be found apart, Sergeant Warren who both loves and hates the unconscious Carne, and contends with the parson Beresford for his friendship

At times the author can be brilliantly amusing, as when during an account of a game of bridge he interposes a merciless caricature of the Colonel, but on the whole the irony is cool and restrained, though none the less deadly, in its criticism of army life

From Not an Ordinary Girl
By May Baldwin
(Chambers)

"MADEMOISELLE, PARDON ME, BUT THAT IS NOT THE WAY TO MANAGE YOUR LINE."

THE BALANCE

By Ada Harrison

7s 6d (Dent)

This is an unusually interesting first novel written with a fine perception of the delicate relationships that exist between modern mothers and their grown-up children

Helen herself, her mother's love carefully controlled and masked by friendly detachment, is a triumph of delineation, but the author is no less successful with her young people, and presents widely varying types with equal ease and naturalness.

Miss Harrison is well endowed with the novelist's gifts, she has shrewd observation and an all too rare sense of form. If it might be contended that the book lacks sparkle, we submit that there are many who prefer a good cup of tea to champagne.

THE DOLLS' HOUSE

By Rose Fyleman. 5s. (Methuen.)

This is the story of Mr. and Mrs. Godolphin, their daughter Pansy and their son Hamish Douglas Alexander, not forgetting Dulcie the maid, and how they enjoyed themselves in their jolly dolls' house when Daphne was away for the summer. How deliciously whimsical it all is, Mr. Godolphin writing verse about a chair although he was not able to sit down, Dulcie's trouble with her cap which would come unstuck in hot weather, Mrs. Godolphin continually having to be propped up, the poor Captain who belonged to a family inclined to blaze up when they got very near to a flame, and more fantastic still, the means they used to rescue him from the fender. It is all delightful and made all the more attractive by Miss Margaret Tempest's quaint and jolly illustrations.

THE SHEPHERD OF GUADALOUPE

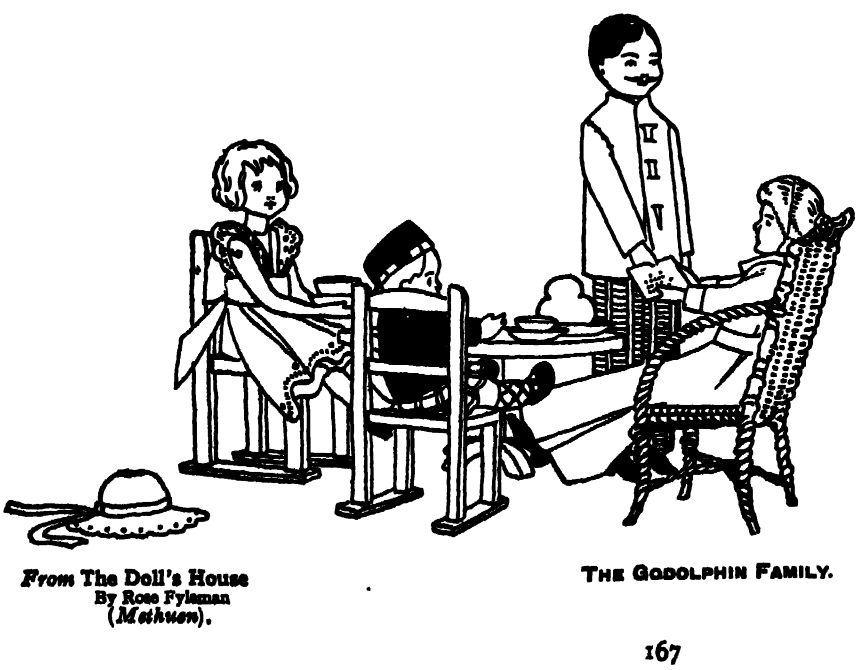
By Zane Grey. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Tens of thousands of readers follow with avidity the chronicles of Zane Grey in the open spaces. He can also devise a very delightful love story. Quite charming is the curious idyll of Clifton Forrest returning, wounded to death, from the Great War and meeting on the voyage home Virginia Lundeen, the beautiful daughter of his father's worst enemy. Virginia is frankly in love with dying Clinton, and has been ever since she was a small child. Clifton, ruined in fortune as well as in health, is reluctant to turn to her and accept sacrifice. The story of his very gradual return to health and fighting life is a fine one. There is a capital villain in the story in the person of the dago, Malpass, the evil genius of Virginia's weakly criminal father.

PRINCES AND FAIRIES

By Stella Mead. 5s. (Nisbet.)

" The great secret of telling tales to children is simply the art of gathering honey from their imagination," says Miss Mead, and by means of such inspiration she has culled this delightful collection from the land of humans, animals and fairies. Though some of them are reminiscent of old favourites, they all carry a distinct note of freshness. Who ever heard of soup tasting like chocolate, ice-cream, strawberry tart, etc. Yet that was what Hans had in the old woman's wonderful house, with its still more surprising household. And round that strange concoction Miss Head has woven one of the jolliest of the stories. The book is most tastefully produced and delightfully illustrated by several artists, including A. H. Watson.



From Our Animal Friends By Harry Golding (Ward, Lock) "FULL-UP INSIDE ONLY."

THE YEARS THAT CROWN

By Gwen Clear. 7s. 6d (Longmans.)

Curious to find that such an unexaggerated story as this, of the heart of the City, could be published in these days of the harsh mechanical glaring pattern of the average novel. Miss Clear, whose verses we have already on our shelves, is poetic in outlook. She disdains the conventions of the novelist; there is nothing symmetrical about her plot, and we cannot deny that her pages contain long, dull passages. The tale is concerned with Alice Farnham, whose brave mother keeps a successful coffee house in the Minories. This charming and imaginative maiden (it is 1893, when girls wore capes and ostrich feathers and long walking skirts) comes in contact with a dissatisfied dreamer of forty-five. His half romantic, half practical nature is ever at war with itself. He loves Alice, she loves him, but he considers himself too old for her, and goes away. Alice marries another in spite of herself, but his memory remains. Overworked and poor, she lives on certain intangible things. Some phrases that keep her going in her uncongenial days are: " Delicate strength, the strength of a racehorse, a runner.' " Lace that lasts a hundred years." " The Years That Crown " is a distinguished, sombre piece of work, and for the philosophy beneath it one must delve carefully. Did Alice's years crown her ?

From The Doll's House By Rose Fyleman (Methuen). THE GODOLPHIN FAMILY.

From Hahtibee the Elephant
By Charles Slaughter
(Knopf).

THERE WAS NOTHING ELSE TO TRY, SO HE DECIDED TO SIT DOWN AND SLIDE.

THE PASSAGE

By Vance Palmer. 7s. 6d. (Stanley Paul.)

This story of a small coast town and of a family who had always lived there, gives a remarkably vivid impression of Australian life. Lew Callaway, since his father's death, had had the burden of the family on his back; his brothers and sisters might be granted opportunities, might go away to complete their education, but they looked to him for support, and his mother seemed to think he should be satisfied to carry on with his fishing and have no higher ambitions. And Lew, though he felt he was unfairly used, sacrificed his love of music to the humdrum business of getting a living. He seemed fated to make a muddle of his life, let the girl who was his real mate go abroad to study art, and married one totally unsuited to him and the quiet existence at the Passage; but it was all natural and inevitable and consistent with his temperament. Mr. Palmer handles his characters with a deftness that makes each one stand out as a real, living personality; there is much beauty in his story, and from tragedy Lew emerges to a happiness he has fully earned.

From The Prize
(Chatterbox Company).

PERFORMING ANIMALS IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

From My Picture Book of the Circus
(Ward, Lock).

"GOOD-BYE, ALL."

From a photograph by CENTRAL PRESS.

JOHN MASEFIELD

THE BOOKMAN

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS NUMBER 1930

HODDER AND STOUGHTON
LIMITED LONDON

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS

FRONTISPIECE: PORTRAIT OF JOHN MASEFIELD

PORTFOLIO: SCENES FROM THE WORKS OF JOHN MASEFIELD. BY EUGÈNE HASTAIN

PRESENTATION PLATES IN COLOUR BY

ARTHUR RACKHAM, NORMAN HEPPLE, JOHN AUSTEN, ETC.

FULL PAGE PORTRAITS AND DRAWINGS OF

ERIC GILL, T. S. ELIOT, LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE, PHILIP GUEDALLA, HON. VICTORIA SACKVILLE-WEST, ALLARDYCE NICOLL, OSBERT SITWELL, SIEGFRIED SASSOON, E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM, HERBERT READ, SIR PHILIP GIBBS, R. H. MOTTRAM.

PRESENTATION PLATES AND DRAWINGS BY

CLARE LEIGHTON, ERIC FITCH DAGLISH, LIONEL EDWARDS, HARRY ROUNTREE, AUGUSTUS JOHN, G. L. STAMPA, GEORGE MORROW, C. E. BROCK, DONIA NACHSHEN, HUGH THOMSON, WALTER CRANE, H. STACY MARKS, RANDOLPH CALDECOTT, KATE GREENAWAY, SYDNEY P. HALL, SIR JOHN TENNIEL, D. NICHOLSON, KRAMER, RAPHAEL NELSON, A. H. WATSON, HAROLD COPPING, ANGELA VERNE, PEGGY SMITH, FRANK SLATER, HELEN WILSON, MAITLAND HOWARD, HOWARD COSTER, POWYS EVANS, ETC. ETC.

PORTRAITS OF

DR. ROBERT BRIDGES, ALFRED AUSTIN, ALFRED TENNYSON, WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, JOHN DRYDEN, SIR A. CONAN DOYLE, C. K. SCOTT-MONCRIEFF, D. H. LAWRENCE, CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, BENJAMIN CONSTANT, SIR WILLIAM WATSON, E. H. YOUNG, WICKHAM STEED, ST. LOE STRACHEY, JANE AUSTEN, W. H. DAVIES.

MADE AND PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

TRADE MARK REGD.

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS—continued.